He was a man of about eight-and-twenty, and would have been strikingly handsome had it not been for the bitter, discontented expression which his features wore in repose. His usually proud, self-possessed bearing had now forsaken him, and the restless, nervous twitching of his hands, and the burning, unsatisfied longing that gleamed from his eyes would have been a revelation to his most intimate friends.

"What am I working for? Why do I take all this trouble?" he muttered. "I don't know myself. My present path would gratify the highest ambition, but I neither fear the gallows nor desire the throne. I would have served the King loyally if this woman had not come between us. But I want her, and I must have her, come what may! Everything else is worthless in my eyes."

Stood looking rather defiantly at him.

He stopped his restless walk and buried his head in his hands.

"Madman that I am! I know how base, how hopeless it is; but I can't help myself! Men have gone mad over women ever since the world began, and they will do so till the end of time."

A sound outside the door made him pause and pull himself together before his next interview.

"La Fontanelle" was the wife of a tavern-keeper whose house was much frequented by important political personages, and Montruel had often found her a source of valuable information. She had various ways of eliciting news from her customers, and took care to provide them with all sorts of entertainments calculated to throw the most wary off their guard. The best music and dancing in the city was to be heard at their tavern, and all the performers were famed for their personal attractions as well as their talents.

From her Montruel learnt the astonishing news that the new Freemason adept and the Saracen, Mahmoud-el-Reis, were one and the same person, and, moreover, that she had not been able to gain any more information from him than this one significant fact, which had come to her knowledge through his being addressed by his two names by two separate persons who had spoken with him in the tavern. He had refused wine, and had turned a deaf ear to all the amusements provided, so that "La Fontanelle" had little cause to remember him with gratitude.

Digitized by Google

Montruel instructed her not to relax her efforts to fathom his secrets, and then dismissed her.

"Agnes the Fair is with me. Will you not see her, my lord?" said the woman as she turned to go.

At first Montruel refused, then yielded to her persuasions, and told her to send the girl to him.

Agnes the Fair was rightly named. She was tall and He buried his face in his hands.

supple, with the easy carriage and unstudied grace of a Hungarian; dark, glossy hair and large, lustrous eyes that bewildered with their ever-varying expression.

She came towards him with a quick step and smiling face, and threw her arms round his neck. The first touch of her lips gave him almost a sensation of pain, and he tried to repulse her; but, unheeding his coldness, she persisted in her caresses until he succumbed and kissed her upturned forehead.

Then, being well-versed in the art of coquetry she withdrew from him and stood looking rather defiantly at him.

"Well, what is the matter?" he asked.

"I want you to make me rich, this very day! You are rich and you love me, so I ought not to have to wait any longer."

He frowned and asked coldly:

"I thought you just said you loved me?"

"So I may, my lord, but I love myself better. Is not that the secret of all love?" she answered with a harsh, mocking laugh.

He did not reply, but sat looking sadly before him. Irritated by his silence she went on:

"My lord, dare you swear on your honour as a knight that you love me for myself?"

His eyes fell before her, and seeing that he winced under her gaze she continued bitterly:

"You dare not! and you are right not to perjure yourself for so poor a thing as me. Why did you change my name to Agnes? Why did you tell La Fontanelle to give me an ermine mantle and dress me in things fit for a queen? Was that all for my own sake? No! It was because the wife of Philip Augustus is like me, or I am like her, only I am younger and prettier than she is, yet your eyes follow her wherever she goes. I am only like a doll dressed up to remind you of her!"

The suddenness of this outburst, and the truth of her pitiless words completely disarmed Montruel for the time being. He saw that denial was useless, and his only aim was to end the interview as soon as possible.

"Girl, you shall have the money you want—not for the love but for the hate I bear you. You shall be rich this very day, but only so long as you hold your tongue. The first word that passes your lips——"

"My lord," interrupted the girl calmly; "I do not fear your threats. You shall not only pay me but fear me! I am stronger than you."

His eyes flashed dangerously, and his hand sought his dagger, but at the same instant his tormentor had reached the door at the farther end of the room.

"True," she said scornfully. "I had forgotten that some men can kill a woman. You were not quite quick enough this time. Au revoir!"

He heard her ringing laugh from the other side of the door, and as he turned uneasily on his couch, he saw the gaunt form of his secretary, Samson, standing at the other end of the room.

"The knave must have heard all!" thought Montruel to himself savagely. "His mouth must be stopped."

"What did you come back for?" he asked sharply.

"I thought you would like to know that it is said that the two masons who came to-night are Danes, and are supposed to be in league with Queen Ingeburge."

"She is not the Queen. There is no queen but Madame Agnes, the King's lawful wife. Begone! and keep your head clearer to-morrow. Here, take that, though it's more than you deserve."

With these ungracious words he threw a purse of gold towards Maitre Samson who picked it up with alacrity and pocketed it with a knowing chuckle. He knew why his master was so generous.

Montruel went to his sleeping apartment, and for the few remaining hours of the night, tossed about in the vain attempt to sleep, haunted by the consciousness that his secret was in the possession of two of his own creatures.

At eleven o'clock the next morning two visitors were announced. Herbert Melfast, Lord of Pevensey, and Mahmoud-el-Reis, the Saracen.

The former had been despatched to Syria in search of an assassin by John of England, who was particularly anxious to get rid of his powerful rival, and in part, liege-lord, Philip Augustus of France. After a long and protracted search, Melfast had returned to Europe with Mahmoud-el-Reis, a Fédavi, or brother of the Crystal Poniard, and had brought him to Amaury Montruel, in order to obtain access to the royal presence for the assassin.

This strange man with the dual name seemed to have a dual nature also. As Jean Cador, the Freemason, he was the enthusiastic artist who had learnt the secrets of Eastern art and dreamt dreams of delicate tracery, graceful curves and carved saints in purest marble, whose only weapons were the hammer and chisel. As Mahmoud-el-Reis, the fanatic, he planned murder and faced death with the impassive fatalism of an Oriental.

Herbert Melfast had come with the intention of getting a definite answer from Montruel, who had hitherto vacillated between his fear of detection should the plot against the

Digitized by Google

King's life fail, and his desire to get rid of the husband of the woman he loved.

"My dear cousin Amaury, the time for hesitation is past," Melfast said, after they had been talking for a few minutes. "Before we leave you this morning, we must know whether you are for or against us."

Montruel looked like a hunted creature at bay. He had not the courage to take any definite step fraught with danger to himself, and now, craven that he was, the words failed to come to his white lips.

The Syrian stood by, cool, calm, and impassive. Melfast showed evident signs of impatience, and said at last:

"By all the saints! I'm at my wits' end, with one man as silent as the grave, and another who's as frightened as any old dame and daren't say yes or no!"

"If it were a mere matter of a sword thrust——" began Montruel.

"And if I were in your place a sword thrust should have settled it ere this. There's the man you hate as much as we do—more—for you are mad with love and jealousy—and yet you let him live to possess the woman you adore before your very eyes! You are with him day and night, you sit at his table and sleep at his door, and have not the heart to kill him! Where is your lance when you ride behind him, or your dagger when he lies sleeping?"

"We French knights keep our weapons for other purposes than assassination!" said Montruel, with an attempt to assume his usual proud manner, for his blood boiled at the cutting words he was forced to hear.

Melfast smiled contemptuously.

"Then, I take it, you are against us?"

"Would that I were, my lord," said Montruel dejectedly, after a short pause, "for I have sworn fealty to Philip, my Sovereign; but I seem to have neither faith nor reason left. I love Agnes de Méranie to my soul's perdition. I cannot go against you—I am—yours."

His voice broke completely as he said the last three words, and, sinking down in his chair, he buried his face in his hands.

The Lord of Pevensey watched him with ill-disguised contempt, and asked him coldly to name his own terms. Montruel bargained first for Agnes de Méranie, then for the wealth and princely estates that would be indispensable to her material happiness. These conditions were readily complied with by Melfast, in the name of his Royal master; but there was still another item, which Montruel almost hesitated to name.

"For some time back," he began, "Madame Agnes has felt very strongly that her happiness and security cannot be established on a firm basis so long as Ingeburge of Denmark lives——"

Melfast smiled again.

"I see. Well, we cannot let so fair a lady suffer annoyance for so trifling a cause. I daresay you would have no objection to dispatching her rival with your poniard, friend Mahmoud?"

The Moslem crossed his arms upon his breast and answered:

"The will of Allah be done! She is a Christian and a queen. She is condemned."

"Now, that's the sort of man I like, and you might take a lesson from him, Montruel. Well, the bargain is concluded. You give us the King's life in exchange for two rich duchies and the person of the Queen. Not a bad thing for you, I take it. But we must know definitely how and when you will deliver his majesty into our hands."

"It will be necessary to watch our opportunity, for, as you know, he is closely guarded, and we must be cautious, and I must have my duchies first, for your Royal master has been known to break his promises."

"That is entirely in my hands, you need have no fear," replied Melfast curtly. Then turning to Mahmoud he asked:

"And how about your share in the transaction, friend?"

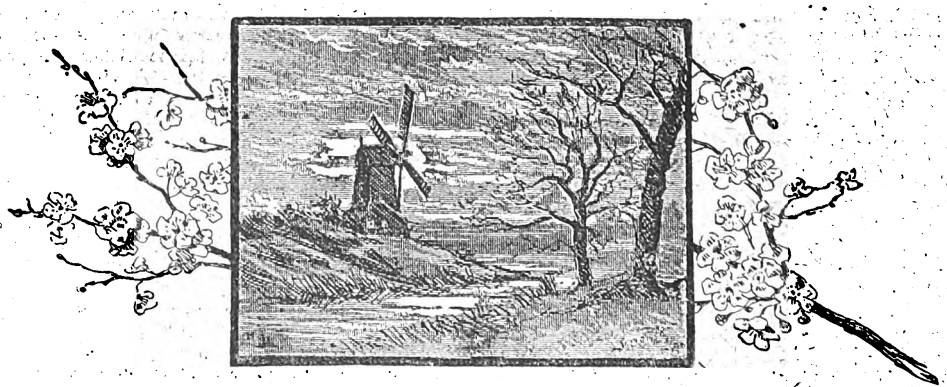
The Moslem drew himself up to his full height and began in his grave, musical voice:

"There is but one God, and Mohammed is His prophet. I am Mahmoud-el-Reis, son of Omir. My divinely appointed master, Mohammed, said to me: 'Follow that man and take your poniard.' I loved Dilah, who is lovelier than the houris in Paradise, and was loved by her. We were to have been united. I kissed away her bitter tears, for the Master said: 'Return with the infidel's blood upon your dagger, and Dilah shall be yours.' I went to Dilah as the evening shadows were falling, and said: 'I shall return, wilt thou wait for me?' and she answered: 'I will wait for thee.' When I left at sunrise the next morning, I heard her dear voice murmur behind the flowery hedge: 'Return quickly, my beloved!' and from that hour I have been as a body without a soul. My spirit dwells with Dilah under the palm trees. At night I seek the stars she may be looking at, but you have nothing in common with us, not even the same stars! If the blood of the Queen will procure for me the blood of the King, she shall die, for I must return to my bride. I have promised the white-haired priest to carve him a statue, and that I can do in a few days. If my task is accomplished and Queen Ingeburge is no more, will you admit me to the King's apartments this day week?"

The respite seemed to give Montruel fresh courage:

"If the Danish Princess has ceased to breathe, I will admit you to the royal chamber this day week," he replied, almost with a sense of relief.

(To be continued.)



Digitized by Google

THE SCHOOLMASTER.

It was two o'clock on Saturday afternoon in the latter part of August. Mr. Gray sat at his desk in the superintendent's office of the high school, looking over the row of pupils, noting the transfers in the different forms, and counting the number of scholars assigned to each, for the ensuing school year.

"New teachers to break in," he grumbled. "I had just got my ladies into good running order, and now it is all upset. Miss Smith married; Miss Warren ill; Miss Allen gone; only Miss Gordon left. Then," referring to his papers, "there is Miss West, and Mrs. Harris—both experienced teachers, and highly commended. I think I can rely on them. I only wish I felt as sure of this Miss Wayne. Nobody knows anything about her, except that she comes from Bloomington, and has good certificates.

"A teacher needs a great deal of energy, tact, and firmness, and education, to deal with the arabs of the form she will have charge of. I suppose I'll have another such experience as I had with that room three years ago, when they ran out one teacher, and would have done the same with the second, only the holidays came to an end, and prevented them," and the schoolmaster sighed and rubbed his brow as if it already ached in anticipation of coming trouble.

"A quarter past two," he went on, "they ought to all be here in half an hour, but they won't."

Donald Gray's scholarly face looked paler in contrast with his very black eyes, hair, and more scholarly by reason of his glasses—worn to remedy his near-sightedness.

He was on the sunny side of thirty-five, unmarried—"a confirmed old bachelor," people said, and so he said himself. He had always been so wrapt up in study and books that he rarely went into Society.

He was a man who put heart and soul in his work. He followed teaching as a profession because he loved it. He was proud of the success, and ashamed of the failure of teachers and pupils in his school, just as parents are of the victories or defeats of their children. What wonder then that, with three hundred of the most unruly children on the one side, and an untried set of teachers on the other, his brain ached, and his heart sank at the prospect.

His gloomy thoughts were interrupted by the sound of a brisk, light step in the hall, and a moment later a young lady appeared at the door.

"This is Mr. Gray, is it not?" she asked, coming forward to the desk, "I am Carrie Wayne. No, I do not wish to disturb you," as he laid aside his papers—"for I know you are busy. I came early so as to have a look at my room—make a map as it were, of the battle ground, and plan the coming campaign. If you will tell me which one it is, I'll not hinder you further."

"It was no hindrance at all," he hastened to assure her. "Indeed, he was glad she had come, that he might make her acquaintance. He thought she was wise to 'take the lay of the land' before setting to work."

This and much more he said, as he accompanied her to the room in question, and called her attention to the new style of blackboards, and the latest improvement in desks.

He might have added much more—but he didn't. He might have told her that her promptness, her quick, energetic step, her cheery voice, her clear, steady eyes, her quickness of decision—had lifted a weight from his mind and heart. The anxious schoolmaster went home well satisfied with the corps of teachers with which the management had provided him.

It was not long before, by one means or another, Miss Wayne had won the respect, the confidence, and finally the devotion of every one of her unruly girls and boys. To be sure there were pop-guns and tops and other toys those trials common to all school teachers. There was even a long string with a mouse at one end, and Johnny Maloney at the other, that nearly frightened some of the girls into hysterics. But these minor difficulties were easily settled, and in such a way that, while the pupils felt they had to obey, still—as Johnny Maloney put it—"Miss Wayne was awful nice, and she would treat a fellow like a gentleman as long as he treated her near the mark."

The schoolmaster was happy. He found it very pleasant to chat with his young assistant as she stood at the window during playtime to watch her own scholars in the ground. They would occasionally discuss some book, or some question in metaphysics, and Miss Wayne could argue a point skilfully. It grew to be really a rest to him to step into her room on his round; there was such an atmosphere of cheerfulness and good fellowship.

One day, as he entered the room, there was a roar of laughter in which teacher and pupils joined—a laugh so hearty, that he smiled in sympathy. As soon as she could steady her voice, Miss Wayne turned to him saying, "Mr. Gray, Victor wants to know if it would not be a good plan to dig great wells and drain the lava from volcanoes, so that there would be no more eruptions. Will you answer him?"

Digitized by Google

In the laugh that followed, and the simple explanation with blackboard illustrations that called forth his love of geology and astronomy, the schoolmaster forgot all the vexation and weariness which the others had caused him, and went away refreshed.

So the weeks and months passed, until the summer vacation was again near at hand.

One morning Miss Wayne was absent from her post, "not well enough to come to school," her note ran, "but she hoped a few days rest would make her all right again."

Somehow the day was dull, and the schoolmaster went home uncommonly weary. He wondered how Miss Wayne was. Then he remembered that she had not seemed like her own bright self for several days past. She had looked worn and tired, and there had been a bright flush on her cheeks.

He believed it was all interest in the welfare of the school, for the closing examination, which no one could conduct so well as she, had made him worry continually over her absence. For she was ill, dangerously so, the lady teachers said.

It was not until the examinations were over and the doors of the school closed for the holidays, that Mr. Gray took time to call on his missing assistant. Late in the afternoon of the lovely July day he climbed the hill to the rose-covered cottage where she lodged. Her easy chair had been drawn to the window. The book she had been reading had dropped from her slender fingers, and she lay back with closed eyes, so that she did not see him as he came up the gravel path.

What was there in the sunny smile with which she greeted him when he was announced, to cause his heart to bound so?

Why did the sight of her wasted hands and pale face bring such a thrill of pain? He did not ask himself why. He did not realise how much it meant to him. He was content to sit beside her and answer her eager questions concerning the examination, the varied success of her pupils, and all the other items dear to a teacher's heart.

Then with congratulations over her convalescence and heartfelt wishes for her complete recovery during the holidays, he bade her good-bye.

He went away for his summer rest happy in the thought that she would be at her old post when school began again; and he did not dream of any change till the list was handed to him on his return.

"Miss Gordon, Miss West, Mrs. Harris, Miss Forsythe. Why, where is Miss Wayne?" he asked with a sudden sinking heart.

"I do not know," responded the trustee. "She went away some three weeks after school closed, leaving no application for a return and we have heard nothing of her since. We are all sorry, for she had proved herself so efficient that it was hard to supply her place."

How insufferably hot and close the room became all at once to the schoolmaster. He would certainly be stifled if he did not get out. Why did Mr. Butler drawl so, and explain everything at length? How he dreaded the coming school year all at once. How would he ever get through it? His head ached, and brain whirled, and heart sank at the very thought of it. And yet—why, only an hour before, he had been eager for the work to begin!

At length he was free. He seized his hat and hurried out.

A sudden darkness had fallen over the glare of that bright August day. There was a great weight on his heart—the weight of a passionate, burning love, that had been growing silently, swiftly for months, and had not discovered itself until too late. "Too late! too late!" he said it over and over to himself as he strode along.

He saw nothing but a pale, sweet face against its background of black shawl—heard nothing but a low voice with its silvery laugh—the face and the voice which meant all the world to him.

He found himself at last at the very gate of the cottage where he had last seen her. This had been her home, why should it not be his? Perhaps she would not seem so lost to him if he could live where she had lived, walk the same path to school which she had trod so often, or sit in the same chair in which he had last seen her.

With Gray, to think was to act. His ring at the door was responded to by a motherly old lady, who recognised him at once and gave him a cordial welcome.

"Yes," she said, after a little preliminary talk. "Miss Wayne has left, and I have three rooms empty in all. I can accommodate you, sir. Yes, I missed her a good deal at first."

"And you never heard from her?" the schoolmaster asked, waiting eagerly for his answer.

"Yes, once. She wrote from Aberdeen, where she was visiting her aunt. She said she was going farther north in a short time. She said she'd write again, I've had no letter yet."

That was all the news, all the hope he received. He settled down to his work, going through it in a mechanical sort of way, missing her at every turn. Every evening he looked for news through Mrs. Benton, and as constantly was he disappointed. At home his favourite companion was a volume of Emerson's essays, which she had left by mistake, and which had evidently been a favourite of hers also. It was well-worn and much interlined, there were marginal notes, written in her clear hand, and numerous references—many of which he remembered hearing her use in their talks together.

Digitized by Google

So time passed on until four years had flown. Mr. Gray remained the same quiet, reserved man of yore, and silver threads were beginning to show themselves amid his black hair.

He was no longer principal of that school, but he had been appointed Government Inspector with a fine salary.

During this time he had tried to put away from him the love he had discovered so long before.

He had tried to make himself believe that fate had not intended his life to be otherwise. Had told himself that Carrie Wayne was too young and fair and bright for such a man as he, but in vain.

No word had ever come from her, and he no longer looked for any. She had forgotten the old town. Perhaps she was married. He knew she was happy wherever she was. She was always happy, and made everyone about her so.

With lagging steps he dragged his way up the front walk, tired with the day's work. Evidently his landlady had company, for she was talking in a very animated manner, and as he neared the open door he could hear that she was talking about him.

"Yes, Mr. Gray had lodged here for the last four years, and she had become quite attached to him." Then his heart gave a wild throb, and for an instant ceased beating, as a fresh, happy voice answered: "Mr. Gray and I were quite good friends four years ago, and I shall be very glad to see him again."

His pulses were bounding fast enough now. "She had come back at last. She was glad he was there!"

He heard her swift step coming through the hall, and started forward to meet her.

"Why, it's Mr. Gray!" she cried with a little start, as they met face to face at the door, and she held out her hand with a smile of welcome.

"Carrie!" he cried, in his excitement using the only name by which he had thought of her all those years! He was possessed with a mad desire to fold her in his arms, to cover her face with kisses, and to whisper all his long-restrained love in her ear. But reason told him it would not do.

She had gone away thinking that he cared nothing for her! She had lived all this time in the same belief. Perhaps she loved some one else—why shouldn't she? She might even be married. He must wait and see. All these things flashed through his mind in that brief moment that he held her hand, and just as rapidly did his traitorous eyes reveal them to her quick intuition. Then he said, as steadily as he could, "And you have really remembered us again, and come back to take a look at the old place?"

"I had never forgotten," she answered, while her eyes dropped before his passionate gaze. Then with an evident effort she recovered herself and said, "Come and sit down out here, and tell me the news. I am impatient to hear of all the old teachers, and what my former pupils have accomplished since I left. Does Victor still ask his comical questions, and do the chimneys still smoke?"

So she plied him with questions and listened eagerly to his answers, all the time reading the "old old story" so dear to a woman's heart, which his ardent eyes and subdued voice were unconsciously telling.

When he reached home the next evening he found Miss Wayne with the copy of Emerson in her lap. He went up the steps and sat down beside her. There was a strange new light in the eyes she raised to his when he said—pointing to the Emerson:

"Ah, I see you have got your own book again. I must thank you for forgetting it, for it has been a favourite companion of mine these four years." Then, all at once catching the meaning of the light in her eyes, he bent towards her, his voice low and trembling as he said, "Shall I tell you why it has been so dear to me, Carrie?"

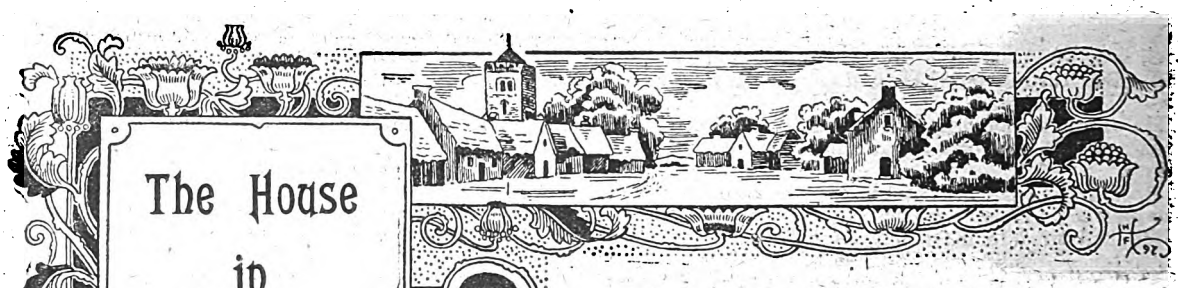
"There is no need," she said. "The marked Emerson has told me what your eyes had not already said."

"And you understand it all? How I loved you all the time—but found it out too late. How I have stayed here, hoping that some day I should hear where I might find you! How my heart has longed for you and found comfort only in being where you had been, and touching the things which your hands had made sacred! Oh, Carrie, have you understood all this?"

She looked steadily into his glowing eyes for a moment, then lifted her lips to his. That was all the answer he needed.

Arnold Rees.

Digitized by Google



The House in Rotherhithe.

A TALE OF THE PRESS-GANG.

My cousin Humphrey hated me, and, though I make enemies through the confession, I hated my cousin Humphrey.

"Qui s'excuse, s'accuse," says the French proverb, so I am not going to try and vindicate my hatred, except by the telling of this story.

To begin, then, Madge was the cause of all the disturbance. If she had not been so winsome and so enchanting, my cousin Humphrey and I would never have fallen out, and I—well, I should not have married the loveliest maiden in all the world.

They were troublous times, those of '98, when I was a lad, and the iron hand of Bonaparte lay on Europe.

Now we Tamplins had never been a war-like race. My father and my father's father had been but honest merchants, and there was I, an orphan, the head of a business that required constant watching, and betrothed to Madge, who was, like myself, alone and without the sheltering hands of parents to watch over her.

And now I come back to Humphrey, my cousin. From boyhood up he and I had been at constant variance. At Christ's Hospital we were for ever fighting, the one against the other. Then he went to Oxford and I to the counting-house in Cheapside, and we lost sight of each other for a space. Then he left the University and came to live in London, to live, as he held life—a roué, a gamester, a tavern brawler.

And now he aspired to the hand of my Madge. Can you wonder at my hatred? And as his passion grew stronger for the girl, so did her abhorrence of him deepen.

She was always begging me to be careful. I used to laugh at her forebodings. But one day matters came to a head.

We were strolling together one Sunday morning in Whitehall. All that morning Madge had seemed to be constrained, as though there was something on her mind which she was loth to put into words.

At last I taxed her with it. In a moment she burst out into voluble speech:

"You are right, sweetheart," she said eagerly, and there seemed to be a touch of tearfulness in her voice, "I have been for long wondering how I could tell you what is on my mind. And even now I can scarce come to it, for I know that you will but laugh at me."

She paused, and her dear eyes, like those of a frightened fawn, gazed up into mine.

"Speak on, dearest," I said, and I well nigh forgot where I was, in my longing to gather her up in my arms, and kiss the shadow from off her face. "What ogre do you see in me?"

"Well," she went on. "I had a dream last night, an evil, evil vision. I seemed to see your cousin Humphrey standing over you with a sword in his hand, pointing it straight at your heart, and I could not move, could not stir to help you. I screamed, and then I awoke, and I was screaming when I came back to wakefulness."

She shuddered, and the tears that had been hiding for long behind her lashes, broke loose from their bonds, and trickled down her rose-flushed cheeks.

How could I chide her foolish—as I thought—imaginings. I could but comfort her and promise caution. And then we talked of other things, of the future, and of our marriage, and so I forgot the occurrence.

A week passed by. One morning, seated in my office as usual, a note was brought to me. The handwriting was strange, and my clerk could give me no clue as to the sender. It had been found in the letter-box, among my other missives. The seal was of plain red wax, with merely the impress of a finger as signet.

I unfolded the paper. This is what I read:

"Your cousin Humphrey means evil to you. I can save you. Meet me to-night at seven of the clock at Number 15, Little Sword Lane, Rotherhithe. Come alone and in disguise. Knock and it shall be opened to you."

That was all. For a moment I hesitated, and he who hesitates is lost. I thought of Madge and her vision. If cousin Humphrey really wished me ill, here would be a chance of settling the matter for once and for all time.

And so I resolved to go to Rotherhithe that night.

Six o'clock came, and with it a fine rain driving through the streets of the city. Sombrely clad, and with an old hat I had long ago discarded upon my head, I sallied forth on my strange journey, by this time eager to learn more of the business, and curious as to who or what might be waiting for me in Little Sword Lane.

I had some little difficulty in tracing my way to the rendezvous. Rotherhithe has never been a savoury neighbourhood, and in those days it was a hotbed of infamy, the haunt of foreign seamen, the lair of many a desperate footpad.

At last I hit upon Little Sword Lane, a narrow thoroughfare bordering on the river. Arrived at No. 15, I hesitated for an instant, and then, summoning up all my resolution, lifted the latch and entered.

There were two occupants of the room in which I found myself—a squalid enough apartment, with a lantern upon the table, otherwise devoid of furniture—two men heavily cloaked and hatted.

Digitized by Google

They rose as I entered. One of them advanced without a word to the door, which he bolted, the other faced me, though I could see nothing of his countenance, by reason of his great hat, and the cloak he held over the lower part of his face.

"To what—" I began, but further speech froze on my tongue. The man threw back his cloak, and the next instant I was gazing down the barrel of a pistol, and into the sinster face of—my cousin Humphrey.

"Well met, cousin," he said with a sneer. "So you got my letter?"

If I felt fear you may be sure my hate killed it.

"So it was you," I made answer. "This is indeed an honour. How long have you taken up your abode in Rotherhithe?"

The villain laughed. "'Tis but a short lease I have," he answered tauntingly, "but 'twill serve my purpose. I would give you to understand that you are in my power, sweet cousin."

I shrugged my shoulders. "Have you taken to the road?" I asked banteringly. "There be many gentlemen who are of that calling now."

His face paled beneath my sneer. "Have a care," he hissed, "but why should I waste time. Listen. I have hated you all my life, and now the time has come for the payment of my debt. You think that you are safe, you think that because you have tricked me out of Madge's love you have won her. Fool! To-night the press-gang will be here. The captain of them is a friend of mine. I have promised him a fine recruit. In ten minutes he will be here. In twenty minutes or a little more you will be on board one of His Majesty's jolly-boats, and then—" he lingered diabolically over the words: "We shall see who is the winner of the final game."

I started back, white to the lips. My braggart spirit fled, and fear took its place. Yes—why should I be ashamed to confess it?—fear, abject fear, was mine.

At that very moment the sound of voices outside fell on my ears, followed by a hurried battering at the door. Humphrey's face was terrible to look at in its expression of horrid exultation.

I glared wildly round. There was no hope of escape; I was caged like a rat. The door was flung open, the room became full of sailors with cutlasses in their hands, at their head an officer.

Humphrey still held the pistol levelled at my head.

"Here is your man, Captain Vincent," he said.

The officer took two steps forward. I glared wildly at him. As I did so my heart gave a great bound, for in him I recognised Jack Vincent—he who had been my friend years ago in the old days at Christ's Hospital.

"Jack," I cried despairingly, "Jack, for the sake of old times, spare me!"

Jack Vincent staggered back as though he had been struck.

"Roger," he answered, and at his tone my vanished hopes came back to me, "is't you, dear lad?"

Then he turned to Humphrey.

"You villain!" he said. "Seize him, men; aye, and his confederate!"

Humphrey glared round him like a wild beast at bay. The men swarmed round him. A wild cry leapt from his lips. There was a flash, as flint struck steel, and the next moment a red-hot line seemed to run through my head. I flung up my hands and fell senseless.

* * * * *

When I came to myself I was lying in my own bed-chamber, with Madge bending over me, her gorgeous eyes full of blinding tears.

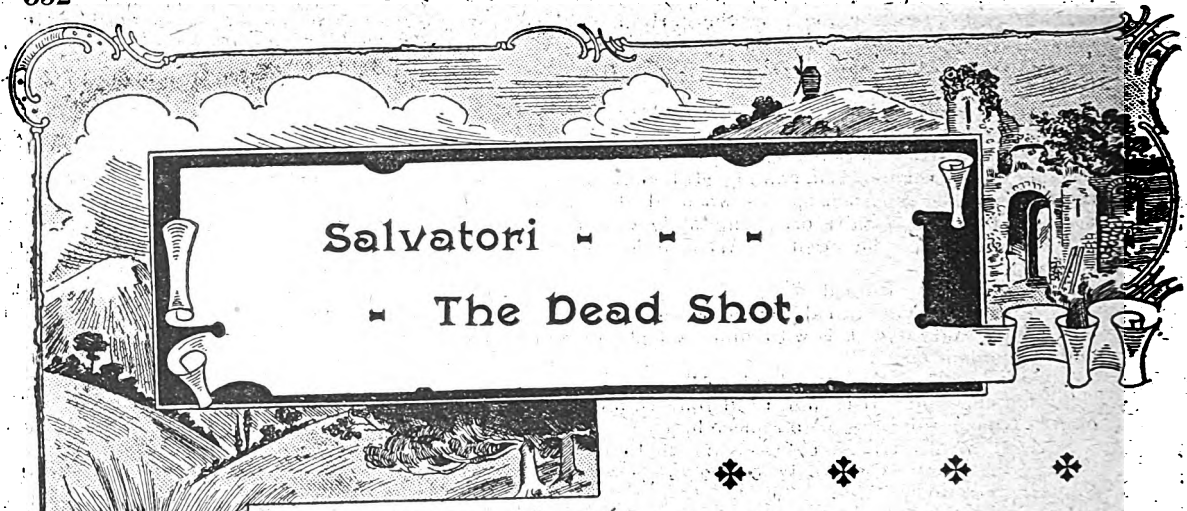
Well, it's all over, now. I am living up here in Warwickshire with my wife and family, sunning myself on the grass-grown terrace that sweeps down to the placid Avon.

Humphrey! He was killed on Vincent's ship, the Zealous, at the battle of the Nile.

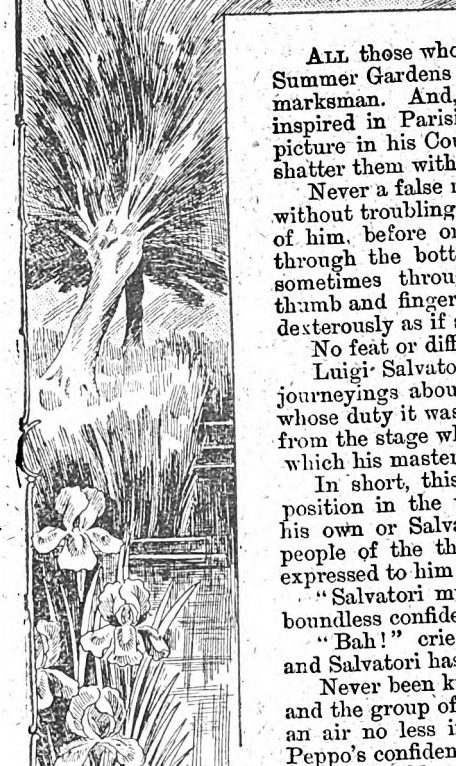
Requiescat in Pace!

Richard Bird.

Digitized by Google



Salvatori - - -
- The Dead Shot.



All those whom Paris counted as its most aristocratic worldlings flocked to the Summer Gardens to see in the zenith of his glory Salvatori, the illustrious Italian marksman. And, really, Salvatori justified by his surprising art the delight he had inspired in Parisian circles—tall, erect, superb in figure, handsome as a Vandyck picture in his Court costume, and tossing his glass or porcelain balls into the air to shatter them with the bullets from his rifle as they rose or fell.

Never a false movement, never an ungraceful gesture, seemingly firing at random, without troubling himself to aim, and the bullets struck the bull's eye to right or left of him, before or behind him, at the will of the marksman—sometimes passing through the bottom of a bottle, the bullet entering by the opening at the neck; sometimes through the heart of a card nailed to a target, or held between the thumb and finger; then, again, cutting the stems from clusters of roses as neatly and dexterously as if snipped with scissors.

No feat or difficulty too great for his wonderful skill.

Luigi Salvatori, at the time we first see him, always carried with him in his journeyings about the world a young lad by the name of Peppo, a sort of assistant, whose duty it was to see to the paraphernalia, to remove the broken balls and bottles from the stage when done with, and before the public to hold the cards and flowers at which his master aimed in his various feats of marksmanship.

In short, this Peppo filled not only a distinguished, but a decidedly dangerous position in the work of the evening, and one in which the least false movement—his own or Salvatori's—would surely have cost him his life. Time and again the people of the theatre, with whom he talked and amused himself between the acts, expressed to him their amazement at his nerve and daring.

"Salvatori must pay you," they said to him, "a good big salary, or you have boundless confidence in his skill."

"Bah!" cried Peppo airily; "the ball that will kill me is not yet moulded, and Salvatori has never been known to miss his aim."

Never been known to miss his aim? No matter, his comrades were not convinced, and the group of dancers awaiting their call to the ballet shook their pretty heads with an air no less incredulous. Only one of them, little Paulette, seemed to partake of Peppo's confidence.

"I should not fear M. Salvatori," said she, with a tone and a face so earnest that her companions began to banter her, and to cry out teasingly:

"You are a sly-boots, Paulette. But we know what ails you. You are in love with M. Salvatori!"

* * * * * * *

"To-night, Wednesday, July 17th, Monsieur, the Prince of Luisitana will attend the Summer Garden to see the incomparable Salvatori in his wonderful and dangerous feats, and who will doubtless surpass all former efforts in honour of the royal spectators."

Such was the announcement that on the morning in question headed the columns of all the prominent journals, and that when evening came crowded the house from pit to dome as soon as the doors were opened. The public sat even upon the window-ledges, and Stirler, the lessee, while awaiting the hour for the performance to begin, strolled through the wings and reviewed the scene.

"Such a night! such a night!" he cried to the throng of artistes flying in haste from room to room, filling the wings with the noise and bustle inseparable from the moment, just before the rising of the curtain. "Such rank! such beauty! Hurry, hurry, and dance your best; hurry, I say, hurry, the scene is just going to begin."

Digitized by Google

And the lessee, rubbing his hands and smiling delightedly, ascended to his private office. He had been there some twenty minutes, perhaps, examining the receipts for the evening, and smiling still more blandly as he ascertained the exact figures, when all at once the door burst open, and Salvatori precipitately appeared.

"We are lost!" he cried. "We are lost—lost—ruined!"

"Eh? What? Ruined?"

"Precisely. That rascal Peppo is as drunk as a lord. You know how it is with him—a taste of wine and the game is ended."

"So it is. What'll you do about it?"

"What can I do? It is ruin, I tell you—ruin for both of us. No one will consent to replace him."

"Stay! Wait a bit. We'll see about that."

And Stirler started hurriedly for the wings, Salvatori following behind him.

Five minutes later everyone—singers, gymnasts, jugglers, and dancers—hurriedly crowded together in the huge green-room of the Summer Garden, gazing upon the strange spectacle of the lessee shaking above his head a crisp piece of paper that all could see for themselves was a new bank-note.

"Peppo, who accompanies M. Salvatori in his performance," said he, "is ill and unable to come this evening. This note—five hundred francs all told—for the one who will consent to replace him!"

There was an eager stir in the motley crowd, and hands were extended, drawn by an irresistible itching for the money, but at the thought of how it was to be earned they quickly dropped again. As Salvatori said, no one would take the risk.

Stirler drew out a second note: "One thousand francs," said he. This time not even a stir—the silence unbroken.

Comprehending that it was useless to insist—the size of the sum was a nothing compared to personal fear—the lessee turned despondently upon his heel.

At that instant a group of ballet girls in the corner of the hall parted for the passage of a little figure coming from the shadow of the corridor, and advancing to his side.

"If you please, M. Stirler," said a soft, musical voice, "I will assist M. Salvatori."

"You, Paulette?"

"Yes, M. Stirler."

The crowd pressed about them to curiously regard this strange child, for a child she was, but seventeen years old, and so charmingly pretty, with her curly blonde hair, her fluffy, mist-like skirts—the silvery pink of a summer dawn—and her slender, rounded form. She seemed, indeed, standing under those curious glances, one of those dainty, exquisitely-tinted Dresden figures that are found among the treasures of a collector of rare china.

"Thanks, my child, a thousand thanks, and—a thousand francs beside!"

"No, M. Stirler, I do not want the money; I assist M. Salvatori because—well, because it amuses me."

"Ah, if it amuses you, good! It makes a difference!" and Stirler, enchanted to draw out of the affair without loosening his purse-strings, returned the money to his pocket, whilst the others hurried away to finish the scenes before Salvatori's appearance, and the latter dragged Paulette behind a screen to give her some necessary instructions regarding the part she was about to play.

* * * * *

"You understand me," demanded he anxiously. "You are sure you know what to do? First, balls in the air that I will break; then the target and the card between the thumb and first finger, very delicately, the arm extended. After that the cluster of flowers and the rose between your teeth, your profile towards me, and held without a movement till the bullet parts the stem and the blossom falls, cut from within an eighth of an inch of your lips. No danger, however—not a particle. I never miss my aim. You have seen me and Peppo—that he is never afraid?"

"Oh, yes, I know. But ——"

"But what, my child?"

Paulette hesitated, dropped her eyes, then timidly:

"At the last moment, please, M. Salvatori, do not—look me in the face."

Not look her in the face? Salvatori smiled. He had begun to comprehend.

"But why not?" said he gently, almost tenderly. "Why not, little one?"

"I—I am afraid of seeming afraid," Paulette answered, a trifling incoherently as to phrasing, perhaps, but read clearly as print by the man beside her.

"So be it, I promise you," said he. "But tell me, Paulette, tell me why you refused the thousand francs that Stirler offered you. It would have made you rich."

"No, on the contrary it would have——"

"Well, go on, 'on the contrary.' Finish what you were going to say."

But happily for Paulette the voice of the call-boy saved her from further questioning—the curtain was up.

* * * * *

The scene between them was simply an enormous success. Never had Salvatori shown such daring and prompt decision, and the entire Press next morning, without a dissenting voice, could not say enough in praise of the charming child who, at the last moment, had thrown herself into the breach created by Peppo's absence.

As it seems to be necessary that romance should enter into everything, so they invented stories to fit the occasion regarding the antecedents of the "courageous beauty." All declared her a young girl of aristocratic parentage, seized with an irresistible fancy for the handsome Italian, and ready to abandon her family on his account, one of the papers going so far as to name a certain duchess from whom she was lineally descended.

Digitized by Google

Salvatori also recognised how the appearance of Paulette beside him increased and emphasised his own success; how it doubled the attraction, because of the feminine grace and mystery surrounding her, so enticing to the eye of the public and stimulating to curiosity.

Nor did it take him long to become convinced that Paulette was a girl whose only thought and desire was the care of an aged and infirm mother. More than that, he had been deeply touched by the proof of love she had given him in assuming that rascal Peppo's duty.

How pretty she was, too! And, as he really believed that he would never again find a woman as devoted and loving as she, he married her.

A dream of happiness suddenly realised for this guileless child! Salvatori was her ideal—her god. Her only joy in other times had been to approach him, to speak to him a single word. One look from him brought sunlight for the entire day—enough to last her till the morrow.

But joy does not often kill. Paulette accustomed herself to her new honours, and returned for them a love that was an adoration. Salvatori, too, seemed to adore Paulette. They were truly the most united of couples, and the most charming to see.

The happy husband, loaded with honours and triumphs, a guest at the tables of sovereigns, told the wife, ardently and truthfully, that it was to her he owed it all.

"My happiness, even, comes to me through you, Paulette. I love you! I shall never, never love anyone but you—you who have held yourself so straight and bravely before the muzzle of my rifle!"

* * * * *

Alas, that when one has climbed to the pinnacle of bliss, one must descend again—frequently with a plunge!

Paulette had been too happy, and after two years of joy without a cloud, and mutual love, felt all the more cruelly the sting of the sorrow that had come upon her.

Salvatori loved her no longer.

He was still kind to her as in the past—still amiable and apparently attentive to her wishes, nay, at times, anticipating them, but this was not that other love. Paulette felt that she was no more mistress of her husband's heart. Correspondence withheld from one long and unexplained absence on the part of a husband—it does not take a wife very many days to discover that her reign over her husband's affections has reached its limit.

But Paulette, you see, was such an innocent; she had never read a single romance or studied the world around her; she did not reason, and a notion of revolt never once entered her head any more than that of resignation. She did not say to herself:

"Wait, Paulette, wait; he will surely return to you—you will have your happiness back again."

She did not even make an effort to regain it. No, not a sigh, not a tear, nothing.

"He loved me once," she thought. "For two years his heart was mine, and mine alone. Alas, that this world's happiness should be so short! To-day it is done with—everything ended. Then, if it is ended, why am I on this earth?"

Should she speak to Salvatori of her gnawing sorrow? Should she utter a complaint? Oh, no, never! He had shown himself enough of a prince when he had descended to her level and made her, a little ballet girl, his honoured wife. He had been very good to her, very patient, and for two whole years he had loved her and given her an undivided heart.

Nevertheless, though Paulette knew he loved her no longer, she felt no anger against her husband. She suffered cruelly, true; but then it was all her own fault—she should not have felt things so keenly.

Two years of perfect happiness! How few could count upon even two years with certainty? She had had them; she would keep them! How? The simplest way in the world; as the gambler keeps his winnings when luck goes against him: by throwing up her hand.

One thing only troubled her in accepting the deliverance open to her. Salvatori might blame himself, accuse himself of a crime, or suffer remorse. But she put it from her, this harassing thought.

"I will write it down," she murmured. "I will write everything; no one must censure him!"

* * * * *

After a period of absence, Salvatori returned to Paris. The Summer Garden was packed, and a perfect ovation greeted the handsome marksman as he entered for his work, Paulette beside him.

First the balls, which Paulette tossed and Salvatori shattered; then the target; the bottles, which the bullets entered by the openings in their necks with swift unerring precision. After these the clusters of flowers, and then the rose between Paulette's teeth severed from the stem "within an eighth of an inch"—Salvatori's own words—of the rosy lips.

The same old programme, and this, as of old, the closing feat; but Paulette's lips were not, as usual, wreathed with a happy smile. As the moment came she drew a rose from the front of her corsage—a rose with a stem so very short the people shivered as they saw it—and stepped to position.

"One, two—are you ready, Paulette?" Salvatori cried, as his wife stood straight and white before him, her eyes, filled with a strange sadness, turned upon a box to the right of the stage, in which sat a beautiful woman smiling at her husband.

A smile, too, which Salvatori returned, as once more he repeated his question, "Are you ready, Paulette?" Once more he began his counting, and raised his rifle.

Ready? Oh, yes. Paulette was ready, and an instant later—dead upon the boards. She had bent her head as the last words left her husband's lips, and would suffer no more.

Weston Maire.

A Magazine for One Penny.

These are the days of cheap literature, and some wonderful pennyworths can be bought.

The most remarkable production of the literary world, however, is The Sunday Reader, which has just changed its form, and is now a dainty magazine.

There are thirty-two pages of deeply interesting reading matter, but the price remains at the extraordinarily low figure of One Penny.

With this week's number—the first of the new series, and the first of a new volume—a magnificent coloured engraving is given away. Order The Sunday Reader at once from your newsagent. You will be delighted with it. It is the only religious magazine published at One Penny.

NOW READY. 32 PAGES AND A COLOURED PLATE. ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

THE EMPRESS OF THE EARTH

THE TALE OF THE YELLOW WAR

BY M. P. SHIEL.

SUMMARY.

Yen How, a shrewd Chino-Japanese doctor, who has spent a portion of his life in almost every country in Europe studying the various nationalities and customs in all classes of life, falls desperately in love with an English nursemaid. His advances are rudely repulsed, however; but he leaves England with a fixed determination to win the object of his affections in spite of all opposition. The means he employs for this purpose are immeasurably vaster than the end.

Yen How goes first to Japan as a Japanese, where, by reason of his authority upon all matters connected with Europe and his high rank, he soon becomes a member of the Japanese Parliament. He rapidly becomes intimate with the prime minister, Marquis Ito, to whom he proposes a league between the two races of China and Japan, and an immense scheme by which Europe may be reduced to a waste, and China become the Empress of the Earth with scarcely an effort of her own. He then goes to China and becomes virtual ruler of that nation. In the course of a conversation which he has with Li Hung Chang he unfolds his scheme for setting all the European Powers against Great Britain. After the slaughter China will step in and conquer the remnants of the armies. The Halcyon is sent to Malta convoyed by the Majestic. In the Bay of Biscay La Gloire, a French battleship, is encountered, and fights the Majestic, which ultimately rams her opponent and then sinks. The crew is saved by the Halcyon.

Great Britain now prepares for war. A picket boat in the Channel sights a foreign fleet convoying transports, and John Hardy, a consumptive midshipman home on sick leave, brings the news to Portsmouth. Immediately troops are concentrated at Brighton under the command of Sir Evelyn Wood, and the Channel fleet sails from Spithead to meet the foe. John Hardy gets on board the Jupiter, and, solely by his strength of purpose, is permitted to remain. The British fleet meets the Allied ships in Mid-channel and a battle ensues. Although the British vessels are outnumbered by two to one, the superior tactics of the British, and of John Hardy (who escapes on the Jupiter from the fight, and rams all the transports some distance away), result in the destruction of the Allied fleet. Hardy is ill for a time, and on his recovery decides to go to China. Before going, however, he endeavours to obtain a promise of marriage from Miss Bosey Jay, a young lady artist, but is refused.

CHAPTER X. (continued.)

Had Mr. Hardy been more successful in his love affair he would have walked straight home, and to bed, and so the course of the world's history might have been otherwise.

As it was, he went wandering through a number of streets in a desultory mood, not knowing whither he went.

Night had fallen.

He had left Bosey Jay more in love than when he had approached her door. He said to himself, walking himself tired among the streets: "I will have her, I will have her, by the Lord——"

Suddenly his own name caught his eye. He was in front of the Palace Theatre of Varieties.

London was alight. The streets were thronging with people. The façades of the Palace were arrayed with galaxies of brilliant jets.

There, on a large board, with the printers' ink still wet on the placard, appeared the attraction of the night:

MISS LOTTIE COLLINS
Will Appear To-night
In Her New Patriotic Song, Entitled:
"BRAVO, JOHN HARDY!"

The song had been composed, learnt, orchestrated, and rehearsed, all in the course of a single day, in the fixed assurance that it would "catch on."

John stood looking at the placard, smiling. He felt in his pocket; he had some money. It was about time for the entertainment to begin. He went in.

His mind was, in some of its aspects, as unstable as water. It shifted like phosphorescences in the dark. All forms of pleasure, especially, had great power to deflect and draw him. He could be won from grave to gay by the simplest means. He had not only the soul of a hero, but the mind of a baby.

He remembered that one could smoke and drink in music-halls. He would make a night of it. If there was blame, the blame was Bosey Jay's. He put his hand into his pocket again, and looked at what money he had. Good; there was plenty.

Nearly all the afternoon, and at this very hour, a stream of carriages, containing ecstatic photograph-hunters, Mr. Goschen, Lords of the Admiralty, pressmen rabid for an interview, and nondescript distinguished persons, were moving toward, and away from, the door of No. 11a Cavendish Square. But John Hardy did not happen to be at home. He found himself in one of the "pit stalls" of the music-hall, during the performance of a ventriloquist and his talking dolls. In a few minutes he had provided himself with cigars, and a goodly tumbler of spirit-and-soda-water.

A girl sitting next to him touched a companion on the other side of her—a soldier, whose name was John Brabant—and whispered:

"Just look at him; isn't he handsome!"

Her name was Ada Seward. She was the woman who, alone in all the world, had been able to break into fragments the cold rock of Dr. Yen How's nature.

She was a small creature, with skin of a warm yellowish colour, and little quaint Chinese eyes, and light hair with the faintest tinge of red in it; not perhaps pretty, but with some unspeakable attraction of piquancy about her queer, saucy little face, which had caused her to receive no less than twelve offers of marriage before she was twenty. Her friends declared that she was the living image of Miss Marie Tempest, the "Geisha" prima donna. In figure she was typically English.

She was perishing to speak a word to the sweet, pink face by her side, with its delicate, aristocratic lines. At last, during a loud song consigning the German nation to perdition, she found her chance.

"Now, young gentleman," she said, "that is my dress please; it won't be fit to look at to-morrow if you throw any more brandy-and-soda over it."

John gave her the sweetest smile she had ever beheld on mortal lips, and said: "Pardon me."

At the same time he looked into her face, and liked it.

The waiter had already borne him three whispering glasses of beverage

Digitized by Google

"May I?" he said; "here, waiter—may I order for you and your companion?"

John Brabant bowed low with a hearty:

"Thank you, sir!"

But Ada, who was quite three or four grades higher in the social scale than he, being only in his company on account of old associations, nudged the soldier deprecatingly, objecting to the obligation from a stranger.

It was too late, however. The offer had been accepted. In a few minutes John Hardy and Ada were talking—Ada laughing, John smiling. Brandy-and-soda became the order of the day.

All the time the audience was in a queer mood, impatient, intolerant. There was neither an empty seat nor a spare inch of standing-room in the place; but the people's interest was all bent upon one future point in the entertainment—the entrance of Miss Collins—and meanwhile they took not the least pains to conceal their indifference to the other performances. There was something rowdy and noisy in the tone of the assembly.

"By Jove, I do like you!"

His lips were at her ear.

"Ah, now, that's the drink talking, not you."

"The drink? Nonsense! I do, really. Do you like me back?"

"Ah, that would be telling!"

"You do!"

"Go away with you! Why, I have only just seen you!"

"That is of no importance."

"Ah, isn't it, though!"

"Don't be a cruel girl. Here, waiter——"

"Do you know what I think you are—from your ways?"

"No; tell me."

"You tell me; let me see if I am right. What are you?"

"You mean my profession?"

"Yes."

"I am a sailor."

Had Ada's ears been more delicately nurtured, she would have detected in that sentence, half-drunk though Hardy was, a very slight intonation of quiet, but imperial arrogance.

"A sailor? You? Go on! Show me your hands."

"Oh, my hands are not very rough, I admit. But still—I am a sailor. You may believe me—in the Navy, you know."

"I see. Well, do you know I had an idea of something like that? A sailor! Yes, that is what you are. You come to the point so soon, don't you?—like sailors do."

"Well, but do you like me back, now?"

"No, thank you. No sailors for me. They are here to-day and gone to-morrow."

"That is because they must. You can't punish them for doing their duty to their country, can you?"

"The country is one thing, but girls have got to look after themselves, you see."

"You are too practical."

"I have got to be."

"But you will have me for your sweetheart?"

"Perhaps I will, and perhaps I won't. It depends."

Here was a Study in Indefiniteness. John Hardy fled from the mental indeterminateness in which the answer left him, by turning to his glass for a drink.

The shifters of the indicating numbers removed the card 7 and put up the card 8; "8" meant Lottie Collins. A murmur of expectancy rumoured through the building. The air grew electric. Everyone knew that "ructions" were coming. Already the nerves of the audience were strung high and tense.

"That is very indefinite."

"I can't help it. Wait and see how we feel to-morrow morning."

"Only say now that you like me."

"Well, suppose I say—yes. No, no—it's too stupid!"

"Sweet of you, Nell! Is your name 'Nell'?"

"Yes. How on earth did you know? It is my second name. They call me 'Ada.'"

"Ada—what?"

"Ada Seward."

"I shall call you 'Nell.' I like that better."

"And what is yours?"

"John."

Ada was smitten by the Coincidence. On each side of her was a "John"—one a soldier, the other a sailor. She was the link which united and disparted Her Majesty's forces.

"John—what?"

Here John paused. He was now in a high state of fuddlement, but he was still capable of remembering that his name was on placards all about the town, and was about to be proclaimed aloud by "No. 8."

"John—what?" came the question again.

But Miss Collins rescued him. There was the rattle of a drawn-up curtain—an intense "Sh—h—h" swept through the building—and at once there followed a clap and cry of applause as the whole audience leapt to its feet. Miss Collins had bounded on to the stage, bedraperied from head to heel in the Union Jack.

Amid a dead silence, the artiste lifted up her right arm, and so stood for about a minute. Then she gave a sharp, shrewd twist to her wrist, and passionately shouted:

"Bravo, John Hardy!"

And again the audience leapt to its feet, with howls of rapture, which lasted nearly five minutes. The boxes were packed with some of the most distinguished people in England, with Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Henry Irving, Mr. Stopford Brooke, Sir Henry Hawkins, the Lord Chief Justice, and many others.

At last there was quiet. The artiste began to sing. The tune was simple, catchy, and stirring—the words were like strong brandy:

When the Allied fleet came over, and passed the Straits of Dover,
They thought they'd have it all their little way;
But a knowing little cardy (they call him Johnnie Hardy),
He crashed them his Ta-ra-ra-Boom-de-aye.

Chorus.

Oh! isn't he a tricky little boy?
And don't he know his little way about!
When he handed in his card, and the French saw "Johnnie Hard,"
Lord! transformation scene, you bet, and wild, distracted rout!

There's a little sailor lad, and his eyes are mild and sad,
And you'd think he'd not one single word to say!
But Holy Moses guard ye (he's known as Johnnie Hardy)
When he crashes his Ta-ra-ra-Boom-de-aye!

Chorus.

Oh! isn't he a joy, that jolly sailor-boy,
And don't he know his little way about!
When he winks his other eye, you may just lay down and die,
For his red right hand is thunder, and his eyes shoot lightnings out!

By this time the audience, wrought up to a high key of excitement, had caught the lilt of the tune. When Miss Collins repeated the last chorus, the house vociferated it, utterly drowning her voice in the wheeling tumult which now prevailed. She pretended to retire, loaded with the masses of flowers which had been showered upon her from the boxes; but she at once returned at the call of the audience. She sang:

Ah, boldly they came over; and they crossed the Straits of Dover;
But "Hardy!" was the answer which England hurled that day;
And Johnnie winked his eye, and they all lay down to die,
When he crashed them his Ta-ra-ra-Boom-de-aye!

Chorus.

So isn't he just bricks, with his little crafty tricks?
And don't he know his little way about?
For his head is crisp with curls, and he's a devil with the girls,
But ten thousand times a devil when the Dogs of War are out!

Once more she repeated the chorus, the audience taking it clamourously up. Then she tripped from the stage. But the house roared after her with the frenzy of men parting with their last earthly hope. She had now utterly mesmerised and enthralled them. The moment was ecstatic with an electrical tension impossible to describe. They bawled, they yelled, they stood up straining forward with frenzied gesticulations, tears pouring down many faces, handkerchiefs waving. At last she reappeared. She had a verse in reserve. She sang:

Digitized by Google

Old England is the mother, and each of you a brother,
To this stern brow that bids the world obey;
And now he shan't be tardy (God bless you, Johnnie Hardy!)
In crashing more Ta-ra-ra Booms-de-aye!

Chorus.

So, isn't he a joy, this British sailor boy?
And don't he know his little way about?
He couldn't hurt a fly, but he's tricky, and he's sly,
And he makes the sky to redden, and the roaring Deep to spout!

She rendered this last verse with almost distracted nerve and heat; and before proceeding to give the chorus a second time, stretched forth her arm, and in a fierce tone of command, cried: "Stand all!"

The audience sprang upright yelling, the male part of it uncovering. The singing of the last chorus burst forth universally. And there, too, was John Hardy, hopelessly drunk now, with an arm round Ada Seward's arm, he, too, standing, he, too—with an empty glass brandished high in his right hand—laughing and singing:

So, isn't he a joy, this British sailor-boy?
And don't he know his little way about?
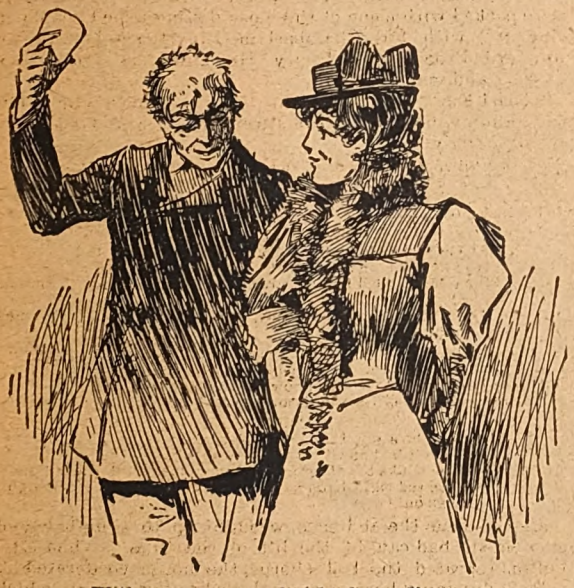
He couldn't hurt a fly, but he's tricky, and he's sly,
And he makes the sky to redden, and the roaring deep to spout!



With an arm round Ada Seward's arm.

No sooner had Miss Collins disappeared, amid an unparalleled tempest of sound, than the audience scattered. They were capable of no more emotion for that night.

John Hardy found himself in the street, leaning on Ada Seward's arm. They were alone. Where the soldier Brabant had vanished to, neither of them knew.

"Shee cheers for ole Nelson!" cried John Hardy. "Ha! ha! ha!—ole Nelson. Shee cheers, by the Lord——"

"Come now, be good," said Ada. "Get into this cab, will you?"

"Where you live?"

She gave him the Pattison address, and impressed it upon him.

"Mind, I shall expect to hear from you," she said, as she shoved him into the cab, and kissed him.

John, going home in the cab, murmured, with fainting, intoxicating breath:

"Bosey! Bosey! I shall have you yet, by the Lord——"

And Ada waited in vain. The next morning he had clean forgotten her address.

But he remembered—her name.

CHAPTER XI.

John Hardy Among the Nations.

The next day John Hardy shut himself up in a fit of sulky moroseness, flatly refusing to see anyone. The day after that was Sunday, and on Sunday evening he was at Freshwater.

His yacht was ready to sail.

He had in his breast-pocket letters-of credit from the bankers of his solicitors to business houses in Paris, Berlin, Petersburg, Pekin, and Shanghai.

He had also with him a French dictionary, a German dictionary, a Bible, and a very elementary French conversation-book.

He had also with him a portrait of Bosey Jay, which he had obtained that morning from Lady Sinclair.

He had also with him a shilling map of Northern China, four sorts of foreign coin, and a revolver.

As he stepped from the train from Newport at Freshwater he saw a late Sunday-edition placard announcing that 100,000 British troops were about to embark for Havre for a French invasion; and this made his heart rejoice.

The English Bird weighed anchor at eight p.m. He was under requisition by letter to attend at the Admiralty the next day, but he took not the least notice of it, leaving it to be supposed that he had set out before receiving the requisition. He was a free subject, he said to himself.

Before sunrise on Wednesday morning he arrived at the quaint old town of San Sebastian on the north Spanish coast.

He had taken the precaution to bring no linen marked with his own name. He intended to travel as an American citizen, under the name of Petersen. From San Sebastian he sent back the yacht to England, and at once proceeded with a small trunk by train to Bayonne, thence to Bordeaux, and thence, by way of Angoulême, Poitiers, and Tours, to the French capital. He reached the Gare d'Orléans on the Thursday morning at 9.30, nearly a week after the Battle of Shoreham, and proceeded westward to a hotel in the neighbourhood of the Madeleine, reporting himself in the hotel bulletin as having travelled from Spain.

The first thing that happened to him was that he fell in love with that charming courtesan, Paris.

He had been so exceptionally and scrupulously insular, that he had always instinctively shrunk from leaving England, except in the ships on which he served. Hence he knew some of the ports of Europe very well, but had never been to Paris.

Paris is the fille de joie of the cities of the earth. She alone is purely feminine. She is as queer, and treacherous, and lovely, and indescribable as woman. Whoso truly loves woman will not escape her witchery. She is a divine sinner.

John Hardy intended to leave Paris at three o'clock; but he put off his departure till the next day; and meantime he got into trouble.

The news of the disaster to the Allied fleet had four days since reached France. But the whole thing was wildly incredible; it was not believed, or believed with only half the mind; and for this reason: that the news had come by the round-about way of the Mackay-Bennet-cable—from New York! What lent some colour of truth to the report was the incomprehensible fact that the Contre-Amiral and General de Rosney had sent no dispatch boat to announce the landing of the troops on English soil. Yet the nation refused to believe the incredible. They waited, with suspended mind, with bated breath, wildly hoping.

In the impossible contingency of their fleet having been defeated, they argued that at least one ship would have escaped to bring them the news. But no ship had come: the fleet could not be defeated.

Digitized by Google

The fact was that five ships had escaped—three liners, and two battleships. But of the three liners, one was towing another at the rate of about half a knot an hour, and the third was just barely forging through the water against a head wind under sail alone. The two battleships were German, and in sorry plight. One with a broken screw, and one with disabled engines, they were making their slow way north-eastward with a vague outlook toward Bremerhafen in their mind's eye.

Of the British ships not one single craft had remained afloat.

However, on the morning of John Hardy's arrival in Paris, one of the three liners drifted on to the French coast, near St. Valéry en Caux, having on board an infantry brigade, and a crew, perishing with hunger, on the verge of frenzy with thirst. By noon Paris knew.

Then there was brouhaha and houlabalu, or, as we say, "ructions."

Paris, in her rages, as in all else, is like a woman. She tears her finery and ribbons to shreds; she foams at the mouth; her hair is all over the place.

Her last exuberance had taken the shape of the Dreyfus riots, half Anti-Semitic in its objectif, partly Anti-Zolaesque, and partly only rowdy. At all events, Monsieur Zola, in the people's plight for an object for their wrath, had been the scape-goat. The Government had triumphed. Monsieur Zola had been declared a "dégénéré" by the University; he had been regarded as a "cas" by the scientific aliénistes; he had been hopelessly lampooned and caricatured by the press; the sale of his books had ceased; he was regarded as a man over and done for.

He waited. On this Thursday morning, the 23rd of March, he had his revenge.

Under the great statue of France in the Place de la Bastille he stood, and the crowd round him spread far up the various avenues leading into the Place. He was recognised: "C'est M. Zola! C'est M. Zola!" And he harangued them.

He had always been known as a very decent orator. And he three times used the word "trahison."

This word, "treason," has a strange glamour for the French mind, carrying with it an extraordinary hint of the blackest infamy.

It was a word which Paris could ill bear at that moment. It simply made the crowd a kennel of rabid dogs. Already in other parts—in the Cité, the Place de la Concorde, la Vilette—excited throngs were rushing riotously about the rues and avenues and boulevards, without the incentive of M. Zola's "trahison." And in the midst of M. Zola's crowd, in the deadliest peril, stood John Hardy.

On his forehead was the strip of black plaster which covered the scratch he had received at the Battle of Shoreham.

By some sure intuition, the French know an Englishman at once; they say of you at a glance, "Il est Anglais." And John Hardy was very much of an Englishman.

If ever human boy enjoyed himself, it was he at that moment. He loved a row for its own sake, and here was the sweetest of all rows—a French row.

What added a touch of intense exquisiteness to his enjoyment was his inner knowledge of the cause of the row. These children had dashed themselves like impotent waves against the rock of England, and were now astonished to find that rock was hard, and could shatter them.

John could hardly understand a word of the harangue, though he once heard his own name, but he guessed what it was all about, and he saw it in the distorted faces of the people. He stood looking up into the staring eyes of the orator, quietly smiling.

At the first sound of the uproar he had run from his hotel, and followed a crowd eastward. No thought of his danger occurred to him. His attitude of mind towards the people among whom he found himself was one of quiet and assured dominancy, almost like that of a master towards his servant.

M. Zola was about to complete his oration, and the mob to rush away with some indefinitely hostile purpose toward the Elysée, when John Hardy felt himself touched with a deliberate tap on the shoulder.

He looked round and up.

He was confronted by an extremely foreign-looking person, a middle-aged man to judge by his face, but with a head of quite white, long hair, and a splendid white beard and moustache. He wore a grey, broad-brimmed, soft felt, sombrero sort of hat, which dropped on one side like a lady's Gainsborough. But the part of him that attracted attention was his two hands; they were simply two constellations of bulky, flashing jewels: on each of the eight fingers being several huge rings, glittering with every variety of luminous stone.

His face was very excited. But he said to Hardy, with perfect polished politeness, lifting his sombrero:

"Ah, monsieur a marché sur mon pied!"

"Je ne comprends," said John.

"Ah! it is as I thought. Monsieur is, then, English."

"That is so," answered John incautiously.

"Ah! English—good. Very well—all right. I wished to say that monsieur has marched on my foot."

John knew that this was a lie. He had not marched on anyone's foot. But he made a concession; with a condescending nod and smile he said:

"Merci!"

He meant to say "Pardon." But "merci" and "pardon" were very much mixed up in his mind; he often used one instead of the other.

The very foreign person said with a bow:

"I cannot but think that the act was intentioned on the part of monsieur."

"Go away, will you?" said John Hardy.

"But monsieur has not answered my question."

"Yes, I have. Be good enough to go to the devil."

"To the—? Very well—all right." And at once he lifted his voice high, interrupting the orator, crying out:

"Voilà, messieurs—un Anglais—de la Marine Anglaise——"

John had committed the indiscretion of wearing his mariner pea-jacket, with brass buttons engraved with anchors.

There arose an outcry round him. A commotion spreading wider through the crowd, like circles round a pebble-splash in water, had him for its centre. M. Zola ceased to hold forth.

They pressed round stiflingly. John began to cough feebly. He pushed back with his elbow a rough-looking, brazen-eyed fellow in an ouvrier's smock. But his effort to free himself was poor in force. In a moment or two his jacket was rent off him, and a cruel fist smote him heavily in the jaw. He saw clearly now that he was on the point of being torn to pieces.

He wondered what he could do, and having calmly measured the situation and seeing no chance of escape, he broke into a laugh at his own expense, calling out loudly:

"Cochers! Cochers!"

By "cochers" he meant to call them "pigs," but, of course, only called them "cabmen."

In a moment he was on the ground on his back.

But whatever Force it is which underlies the world, had this frail and dauntless lad in its keeping for the time being. He was necessary to the future.

A diversion was caused by a loud pair of lungs, which cried:

"Mais, messieurs, écoutez-moi, écoutez-moi——"

It was the very foreign person, who was also vehemently interposing his utmost bodily vigour to the rescue of John.

"You know me—you know me all—listen to me—I am Edropol——"

Digitized by Google

"C'est Edropol! Edropol!"

Instantly the rumour spread far, amid "Vive!" Edropol, the duellist, the Bulgarian, the world-renowned master of the pistol and the rapier; it was he.

He explained. The English sailor had committed upon him a personal outrage. He begged—it was his simple right—that the life of the miscreant should be spared to make the réparation which was only his, Edropol's, plain due. The stranger's death was certain either way, but, in short, messieurs, the other way was more neat—more convenable.

And so John Hardy was, as it were, torn from the rough hands which had seized him. Edrapol's popularity in Paris was paramount. The mob, led by Zola, rushed westwards. Hardy and Edropol were alone.

The escrimeur, bowing, handed his card to Hardy, and requested a return of the favour.

"What for?" said John. "I have no card."

"But monsieur will meet me?"

"Where?"

"In the Bois, monsieur."

"But what for?"

"Why, to fight, monsieur."

"You don't mean a duel?"

"Why, naturally, monsieur."

"I see. But an old man like you?"

"Not too old, monsieur, perhaps! Does monsieur, then, hesitate?"

"I do. It is absurd."

"Monsieur is, of course, alive to the interpretation which would naturally be put upon any hesitation on his part?"

"No. I am not alive to it. What interpretation?"

"That monsieur is a coward."

"Well, but I am not one, interpret as you please."

"Still, monsieur, I say the natural interpretation. I am sure you will recognise my point of view if you recollect that I have the reputation of being the deadliest swordsman in Europe."

"Is that so? Oh, I didn't know."

"Now I think that monsieur realises my point of view?"

"I do, rather."

"And monsieur will now fight?"

"I don't mind. What with?"

"All that will be arranged for us by others, monsieur. If you will give me your name, your address, and the address of a friend to whom I may send a friend of mine——"

"I have no friend worth mentioning here. Send your friend to me personally."

He gave his real name and his address, and turned away from the bowing figure before him. He set out for his hotel.

Later in the day he found himself in front of the Chambre des Députés, and dropped in with a stream of the public.

A glance round the Chamber showed a very full house, a first-night sort of audience in the balconies—Zola, Papa Sardou, the new popular novelist, Pierre Louys—and the Parisian pressmen, packed beyond breathing power, overflowing into the foreign press reserves.

A picturesque assembly below. No dull uniformity, as in the House of Commons, but variety, shades of colour, contrast of race. There is M. Grenier, the Mussulman deputy, in his white Arabian burnous, near the "passage of the Left." The Left—the Socialists—are in force, many of the members carelessly leaning against the light balustrade flanking their end of the "hemi-cycle."

The Centre is packed—Republicans and Opportunists—Government supporters all these. The Right is the stronghold of the Clericals and Legitimists, led by the Abbé Lemire; and here, too, no seat is vacant.

"Ah, monsieur a marché sur mon pied."

Situated in the centre of the circle is the tribune, from which speeches are made; it is ascended by a number of steps—a real pulpit; and behind the tribune, but towering above it, is the high throne of the President of the Chamber, M. Brisson.

M. Brisson wears no wig like our Speaker; but his stern countenance and patriarchal beard are full of majesty.

M. Hanotaux, in the Tribune, is explaining in his fine, suave, diplomatic manner, that "nothing in the actual situation is so far of importance in obviating the annihilation of the British Empire in the near future!"

Furious applause from Centre and Right. Queer ominous sounds from the Left. As sure as there is a sun in the heavens there is going to be a row.

M. Hanotaux is determined. He fully intends to say what he has to say. "It is a coalition whose very name is Victory."

"It has already been defeated!" yells a voice from the Left. (Huge, universal hubbub; M. Jaurès bouncing up and down on his seat; M. Clovis Hugues, the long-haired poet, hurling his arms like a windmill.)

President Brisson rises. For a few moments the uproar continues; but the President, with his commanding voice, calls upon them to recollect that the country looks to them to give the example of calm and sage deliberation. "Délibération calme et sage!"

John Hardy hears the words, and understands them, because they are exactly like English words, and he throws a gasp of laughter behind his head, crying: "By the Lord!"

M. Hanotaux proceeds, though interrupted by wild cries. He has often seen the like in that Chamber. In his peroration he makes a fine appeal to the interests that are above party, to the honour, the glory of France. Applause from the Centre and Right; the Left dumb. M. Hanotaux descends slowly.

Digitized by Google

From the Left there comes a cry of "Jaurès! Jaurès!" And the young leader of the Socialists, tall, blonde, broad-shouldered, swings himself up to the Tribune. He proceeds to hurl a string of personal insults at the Centre and Right. "Hanotaux is an infame. France has been made the tool of Russia and Germany!" President Brisson rises and calls the speaker to order. Jaurès gives no sign that he hears; there is deaf obstinacy in the curve of the broad back which he turns towards the President. He singles out M. de Mun, the orator of the Catholics, for his fiercest invective. M. de Mun retorts furiously. The two men glare at each other. Like a ball flung from hand to hand, so the stinging and witty retort darts quickly to and back between them. The Socialists egg on their men with cries, the Right their man.

The air is charged with lightning. A voice from the Right: "You are the paid spy of the British Rothschilds!" It is Count de Bernis who speaks, a deeply-bronzed man, moustached, looking like an old captain of Cuirassiers. "You are a liar and a coward!" roars M. Jaurès.

There is a swaying struggle on the front Right benches. It is De Bernis held back by his friends. The air is electrical. The journalists in their compartments stand up and yell out their own various views of things.

Suddenly, from the Left, a strange figure makes a sort of reeling run like a drunken man. He seems to be running for the exit. He dodges the stray members on the floor, then wheels round and fetches De Bernis a swinging blow.

Ha! sits the air so then? John Hardy chortles loud, rearing with glee. The attendants rush in and seize the assaulter. In the passage leading from the Right to the lobbies there is a swaying scrimmage. On the Right benches there is another, of which De Bernis is the centre. Suddenly there is a break away from this group, a swift figure darts up the steps of the Tribune, and in a moment the Count de Bernis has given Jaurès a terrible blow under the ear. He quickly and guiltily descends, while the blonde giant reels as though he would fall down the opposite stairs.

In a moment he was on the ground on his back.

Then all is chaos. Everybody is rushing everywhere. Wherever anyone sees a head, he drives his fist at it, yelling like a maniac. The whole Chamber rolls and tumbles in a whirlwind of tumult. They are like bits of vegetables wheeling promiscuously in a boiling and bubbling pot. President Brisson, calm, but laden with sorrow, puts on his tall hat as a sign that the séance is at an end. The mêlée forces itself out into the lobbies. The attendants clear the galleries. Outside there is a clash of drawn swords; a sound of pistols. John Hardy has seen—France.

Meantime, all over the city the garrison of Paris was in the streets, trying to clear them of the rioters. Night fell.

At eight o'clock a gentleman waited upon Hardy from Edrapol. But he could not speak English, and the interview was a fiasco. Hardy sat down and wrote the following letter, which he handed to Edrapol's second to bear to him:

Sir,—This is to let you know that after consideration, I have changed my mind about the duel for the present. If you like to think I am afraid of your fine swordsmanship, you can, but that is not really the case. On the contrary, when I tell you my motives, you ought to consider the writing of this letter, if anything, a rather brave and worthy act on my part. The fact is, I am a servant of Her Majesty the Queen, and have already in my humble way been able to do some good for my country. As you know, England wants men just now, and that is why, after consideration, I do not see my way to expose my life wantonly, while things are as they are, for a mere trifle. I am sorry to have to disapoint (sic) you, and myself too, in our little duel; but that is how I look at it. However, I make you this promise: that on the day this present war is over, I will seek you out, in whatever country you may be, and present myself before you for the purpose of getting through with our little duel; and on that you may rely. I keep your card.

I remain, sir,
Your servant,
John Hardy.

The amount of self-suppression, and of noble patriotism which the writing of this simply-worded, but great, letter implied for the arrogant spirit of John Hardy may be guessed; when it was finished, he flung it with a curl of the lip, and without a word, before the ambassador of Edropol.

Digitized by Google

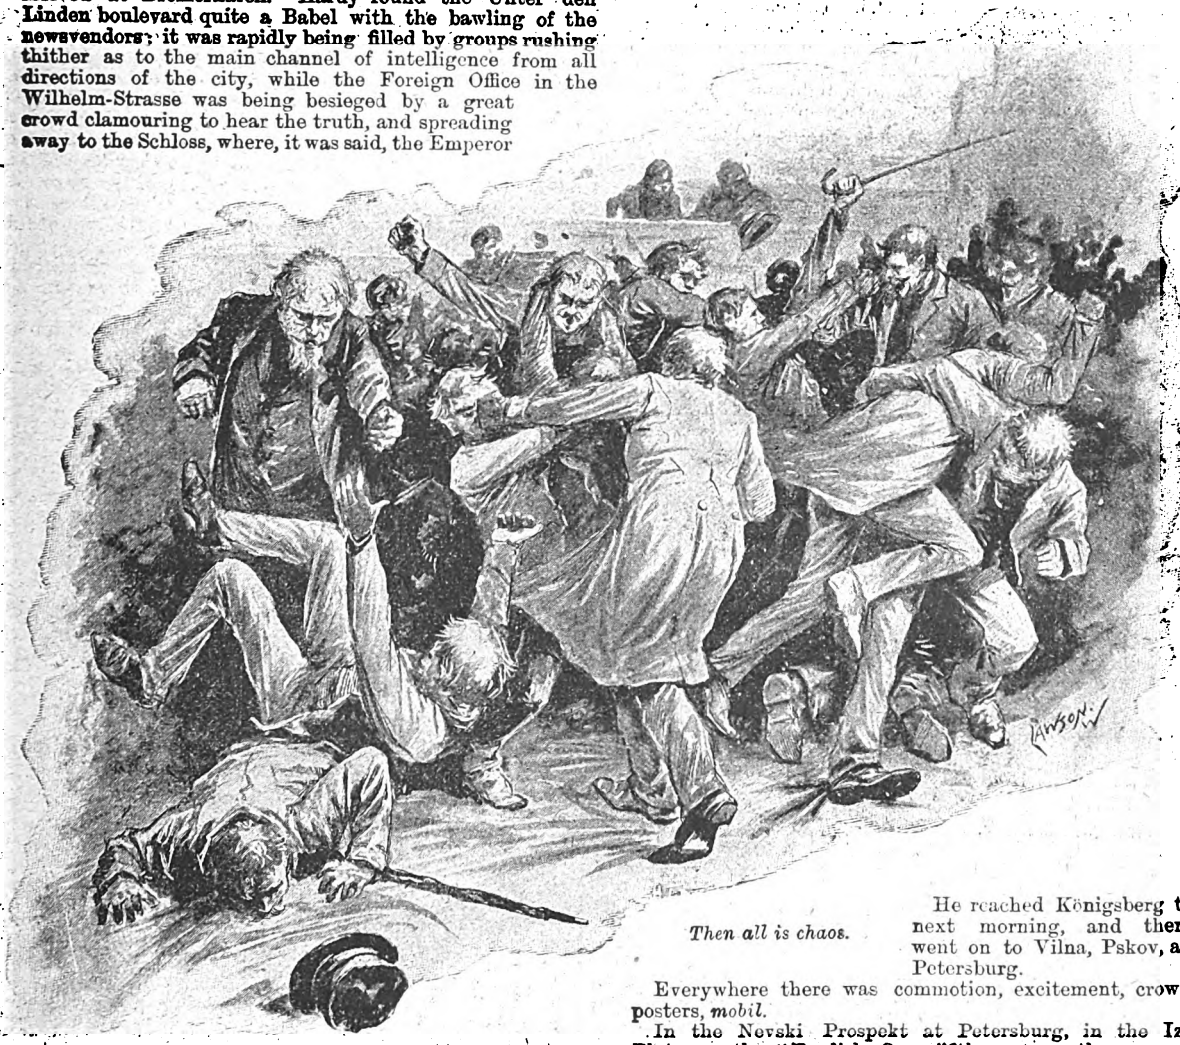
The next morning he left Paris, and reached Aix in the evening, whence he proceeded to Berlin. To Berlin the bare news of the disaster had been flashed the day before; but it was not until the next morning that more detailed accounts came from the two ruined battleships, now arrived at Bremerhafen. Hardy found the Unter den Linden boulevard quite a Babel with the bawling of the newsvendors; it was rapidly being filled by groups rushing thither as to the main channel of intelligence from all directions of the city, while the Foreign Office in the Wilhelm-Strasse was being besieged by a great crowd clamouring to hear the truth, and spreading away to the Schloss, where, it was said, the Emperor was closeted with his Chancellor and his Chief of the Staff. The humour of the crowd was sullen; but it needed only the appearance of Wilhelm, accompanied by the Empress, on the front balcony of the Schloss, to turn discouragement into elation. Wilhelm suddenly drew his sword, and flashed it in the sunlight. Then there was joy. No nation under the sun can cheer like the Germans. Demonstration is their specialité. They excel in looking pleased. Their forte is to claim the Future with verve and assurance, whether it really belongs to them on not. John Hardy was in the midst of the crowd round the Schloss. He saw the flash of Wilhelm's sword. An hour later he was with the crowd cheering itself hoarse in front of the Austrian Embassy, opposite the old home of M. Benedetti, so closely associated with the outbreak of Germany's '70 war. The Austrian Minister had unexpectedly appeared before the people, who now went wild, a large area of the crowd presently starting to sing old Schneckenburger's "Wacht. am Rhein." John Hardy observed every gesture, and every expression of every face which came within his range of vision, and he said to himself:

"So much for mein Herr, then."



Then all is chaos.

He reached Königsberg th next morning, and thenc went on to Vilna, Pskov, an Petersburg.

Everywhere there was commotion, excitement, crowds posters, mobil.

In the Nevski Prospekt at Petersburg, in the Iza Platz, on the "English Quay," there were throngs, pro clamations, and printed heads of the Tsar, and every ope space was gaudy with banners. The town, however, wa fairly quiet, though there were some arrests of Nihilist The Russians were the most English of the Continentals, tended to be so, when once their various races became mor homogeneous. They had the ruralness, and something the stoicism, the Puritanism, and the nimbleness of th British; with this was mixed a certain Orientalism— vermilion streak in the grey of their character.

At his hotel John found an ostler of the Simbir Province, an adventurous and cosmopolitan man, who ha been a sailor trading between Hull and Copenhagen f some years. He understood English. He struck up friendship with John, and told him his history. Joh offered him 500 roubles if he would undertake to deliver a letter by hand in England, setting out at once. And this offer Ivan accepted.

Digitized by Google

The letter which John wrote was as follows:

My Dear Bobbie,—Here I am in Petersburg, after passing through France and Germany, and just about to set out to get by the Trans-Siberian Railway over all that great continent of Northern Asia to Vladivostock (sic) on the other side of the world, and so, please God, to Pekin, and my ship.

Dear Bobbie, this is what I have to tell you, and you can write a letter to the Times yourself, so as to let the country know what little I have to say. The French are about to mass four Army Corps in the direction of Havre, and I don't think that for the present we can do much with them there, though later on, when we get our pecker up a bit, I know that ten Frenchmen won't be able to hold out against one Englishman. The German Cock-of-the-walk has telegraphed for the King of Saxony, and Prince Albrect of Prussia, his Field-Marshals, and for Count Waldersee, Chief of the General Staff. Seven of his twenty Army Corps are mobilising, namely, the 1st, or East Prussian; the 17th, or West Prussian; the 12th, Kingdom of Saxony; and the 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 6th, belonging to Brandenburg, the Province of Prussian Saxony, Posen, and Silesia, respectively. But whether all these are intended to go to help the French, or to defend his own northern coast, or what, I do not know, not knowing much about fighting on terra firma.

Well, dear Bobbie, I have seen my full of the people among whom I have been. I saw some splendid fisticuffs in the French House of Commons, and no end of fun; and some very excited people in Germany and Russia. My opinion of the French is, that they are very nice people, the French women especially. But they are old, they are no good any more, they have not got any youth and go left in them; you know what they are like, Bobbie? like pattê (sic) de foie gras, nice, but tainted. They are over-civilised, like an old Dowager that's not fit for anything, but to make love-matches. France is no good any more, except for ornament, and for tourists to come to. For energy she has got vivacity, and for nerve, vervo—like a frivolous old beau. The world has nothing to expect from her. They are wonderfully ahead of us in some things—their lower class especially is far, far ahead of ours in everything—but they do not move, their legs are heavy with age. The future belongs to us. At the rate we are going now, we shall soon have all that France has, and a thousand thousand times more, for we shall have youth, and energy, and vastness as well. The Germans are a young nation, and they have all the enthusiasm of a young nation, and they will go ahead perhaps, alright (sic). But they have not got anything in reserve, Bobbie. Frothy, enthusiastic and young, too, but not very strong. I think the Russians would make mincemeat of the Germans, just as the Germans would of the poor pretty French. But the Russians are raw, new, and not, I don't think, a nation at all. Not one of them is the chosen race, dear Bobbie, "the peculiar people." If you want to find that, I think you had better look nearer home.

Well, no more at present. I shall expect you to take good care of yourself, mind, while I am away, so that I shall find you hale and hearty when I come back, if I ever do. Don't be getting up too early in the mornings, now; and don't forget your bottle of porter regularly every night, as something is wanted at your time of life.

With love to Bobbie, from his son,

John Hardy.

From this letter it will be seen that John Hardy could not only express his ideas clearly, and with point, though in the simplest Saxony, but that he possessed a large tract of brain, capable of taking in the world, and summing it up, and passing judgment upon it, "as one having authority."

The letter reached England three weeks later, and could not escape the keen scent of the pressmen. It was published bodily in all the papers, bad spelling and all, the public gloating joyfully over its wisdom, its humour, and its unaffected simplicity.

All this time John was travelling, partly by train and partly by camel caravan, towards his fate in the capital of China.

(To be continued.)

WHAT IS THE NEXT BOOK WE CAN SEND YOU?

Every week we shall give away half-a-dozen books.

All a competitor has to do is to send us one Book Coupon cut from The Sunday Reader, one from the Athletic Record, and one from Short Stories.

Send these to us in one envelope together with a request for any single book in the whole world of literature.

From the applications we receive we shall each week pick out six and send the books asked for.

All applications to be addressed to "BOOKS," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please let me have: S. S.

Book.....

Price.....

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Result of the "Book" Competition for the Week Ending February 19th.

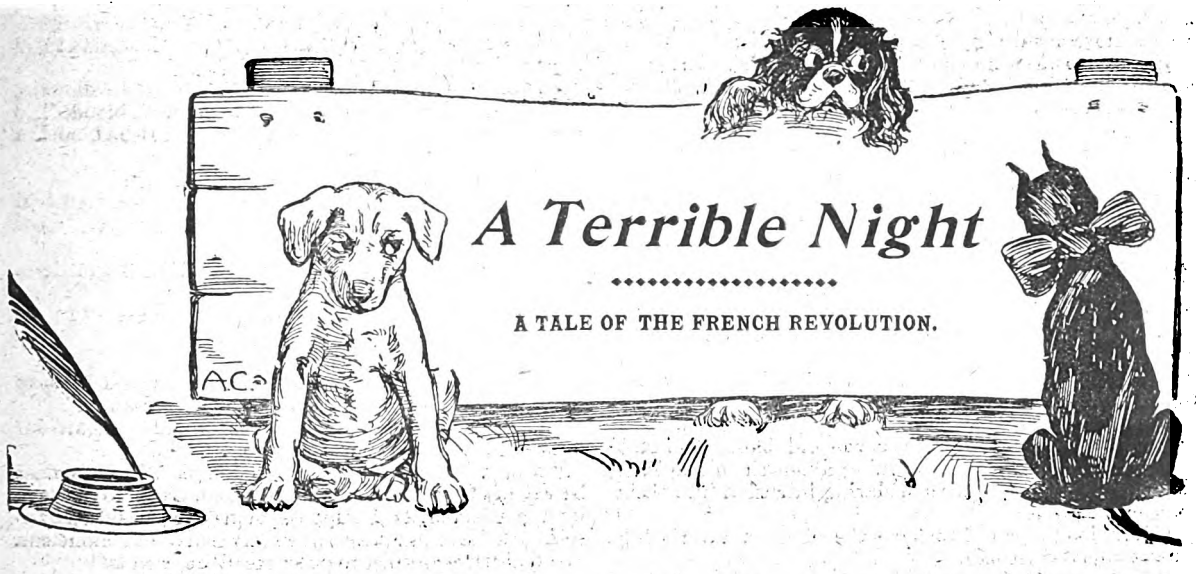
Thos. Wood, 27 Moss Lane, Swinton, Manchester. "Dr. Howard the Philanthropist." 5s. G. E. Mitchell, 333 Raglan Street, Lowestoft. "Vitruvius' Architecture." 5s. E. Peak, c.o. Mrs. Griffith, 8 Bond Street, Swansea. "Flowers of Spring." 7s. 6d. G. Singler, 57 Poplar Walk, Herne Hill, S.E. "Engravings and Value." 15s. J. R. Ibbotson, 18, Portway, West Ham, E. "Vicar of Wakefield." Macmillan and Co. 6s. Mrs. McCourt, 47 High Street, Airdrie, N.B. "John of Strathbourne." 3s. 6d.

DAN LENO'S COMIC JOURNAL.

OUT EVERY TUESDAY.

THE PRICE IS ONE HALFPENNY.

Digitized by Google



A Terrible Night

A TALE OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

"Mademoiselle, Raynal has returned!"

"Returned! Where is he? Let him come here at once!"

"He is waiting outside, if Mademoiselle pleases."

The speakers were two girls, one, a serving-maid, and on the heels of the latter, a shock-headed man, half forester, half farm-servant, enters.

"Did you see my father?" asked the young lady quickly.

"Yes, Mademoiselle; he rides towards Saverdun, where he is to meet Monsieur André, and they hope to cross the mountains to-morrow."

"Did you meet any of the Jacobins?"

"None. I kept to the woods. But they say there are bands roving all about, swearing that the seigneurs are plotting to bring down the Austrians and the brigands, and destroy everything, and vowing that they will not leave an aristocrat alive."

"Enough! Did my father or—or Monsieur André send no message?"

"M. le Comte bade me say that he committed Mademoiselle to the care of the good God, and Monsieur André sent his most respectful farewell, and he gave me this note—it is not for mademoiselle"—as the girl held out her hand and as quickly withdrew it—"but to take to M. Latreille."

"Very well; hasten then!" said his young mistress, turning away to the fire-place as the servant left the room.

She stood before the fire and mused, staring into it with her hands lightly clasped in front of her, and listening to the howl of the keen February wind as it rushed over the whole tower. She was not much afraid of the Jacobin mobs, although it was the year 1792, when the peasants of Languedoc were mad with panic, fears of the reactionaries and the plots of the dethroned seigneurs. The de Lussacs were only small nobles, very poor, and had been on good terms with their dependents; and the Château de Lussac (an old grange with one tower of the ancient fortress still standing) was out of the way, and little visited. But she had heard enough of the events of the past three years to make her feel anxious and lonely, and she thought that her father, or perhaps her cousin André, might have sent her a further message.

She sighed, walked to the window, and looked out The view was fine; and the window commanded the road for a long way—right away to the pine-wood in the far distance, over which the sun was now setting.

Something was moving on the road just outside the pines. What was it? She stared at it absently, and then looked more attentively. It was a black mass with a few glitters of light here and there; but it would have to come a quarter of a mile nearer before anything would show distinctly; and the level rays of the fast-sinking sun blinded her.

She left the window and called her maid, who came at once.

"Rosine, you have a keen sight. What is that moving on the road near the woods?"

"I cannot tell, Mademoiselle; the sun is so bright." Then, with a scream, "Ah, it is the Jacobins. There is one on horseback. And, see, the sun glitters on their spikes. Quick, Mademoiselle, quick; let us hide in the upper woods. They will kill us both, and burn the château as they burnt La Liassac."

Her mistress turned pale for a moment. Then the slender throat lifted, and the girl's delicate lineaments hardened as all the pride of her fiery ancestry came to her aid.

"You can go if you are afraid, Rosine; I shall not leave the château! My father left it in my charge."

"But, Mademoiselle, we shall be murdered! And only we two here."

"I repeat that I permit you to go," returned her mistress coldly.

"Of course I will not leave, Mademoiselle; but, Holy Virgin, what will come of us?" cried the pretty country girl, wide-eyed with terror.

"Silence, then, and do as I bid you. They will be here presently. Go down and open the great door, and remember, on your life, you know nothing of my father."

A short while after, as Alais de Lussac stood at the head of the steps leading to the tower door, a mob of thirty or forty people surged up to the château and halted abruptly as it saw the slight figure, quiet, firm, and unmoved, waiting to receive it. They were all on foot—for Rosine's man on horseback had disappeared—some women, most were peasants evidently, with stupid faces, debased further by fear and the cruelty which is bred from fear; but there was a sprinkling of men and boys from the neighbouring small town, and these looked to Alais the more dangerous.

Digitized by Google

There was a confused outcry from many voices: "Where is Lussac?" "He is a traitor!" "He is intriguing with the Austrians!" "The Royalists are coming from Jales to burn us all in our beds!"

A burly and brutal-looking butcher from the town stepped to the front.

"Silence, all you," he said, "and put guards round the house! Now, pretty one, we will come into that old Bastille of yours, and if you answer all questions no harm shall befall you."

The girl looked at him steadily and coldly, and without a word retreated into the old hall. The rest followed her in, and stood looking about them stupidly, half afraid even now of their daring intrusion into their seigneur's house.

Alais' look seemed to have the effect of infuriating the savage spokesman.

"Here, girl!" he shouted to the shrinking Rosine, "bring us food, we're hungry, and this dainty aristocrat shall dine with a peasant for once."

"It will not be the first time I've eaten with a peasant," said Alais, "as Pierre Leroux there knows," and she pointed to a man who slunked back ashamed, for she had nursed his sick wife.

"Enough clatter!" shouted the butcher. "Now answer me true. Where is the traitor Lussac?"

"My father, M. le Comte de Lussac," said Alais, "is not here; and if I knew where he was I would not tell you."

"It is false; she does know," said a voice behind; "Raynal brought her a letter from her father only an hour since."

"There, little fool," said the butcher, "you are caught, you see. Tell me now, or it will be worse for you."

"I will tell you nothing," said the girl bravely. She was pale as May bloom. She had made up her mind that she would have to die for her father's safety; but she buried her hand in the bosom of her dress, for she meant to die in her own way.

A tumult of cries and savage ejaculations arose, in the midst of which the butcher said:

"See, pretty one, you don't know Michel Lemoine. We shall soon see if you are so obstinate. Here, some of you, go and get a good bunch of withes whilst we strip off that fine gown, and we will see if an aristocrat's back will bear stripes as well as a poor devil of a peasant's."

Alais still stood pale and defiant, and as several rushed forward to seize her, she drew a little stiletto from her breast and said:

"If you touch me, I will kill myself!"

A clatter of horse's hoofs outside, and a man entered hurriedly. The new comer was in the dress of a gentleman, tall, dark, and harsh-featured.

"What is all this?" he said. He listened quietly to a babel of explanations, and then said, "Such sharp measures will not be necessary. Mademoiselle will no doubt listen to reason; I will speak to her alone." And he led the way to an inner room.

"Why alone?" burst out Lemoine. "What is all this plotting for? These Lussacs are all aristocracts. If you let her go I will see that the Commissioners know it."

The butcher's words were taken up by his followers, who seemed now fairly thirsting for the girl's blood. The uncouth weapons they carried were flourished, and a ring of angry faces turned on the stranger.

He faced them and said, still quite quietly:

"I am responsible to the Commissioners, and will answer to them. You see we cannot leave this room without your knowledge."

He let Alais pass into the room and shut the door, and they faced each other,

"Mademoiselle is in great danger," he said. "I have come to save her."

She glanced suspiciously at him.

"I do not know you, monsieur. But as you seem to have influence over these people, send them away."

"I cannot do that. To attempt it would cost both our lives—except under one condition."

"And that condition, I suppose, is that I should betray my father? A worthy proposal, truly, to be made by a gentleman, as I suppose monsieur considers himself. I have already given my answer, monsieur. We had better return to your excellent friends."

"Mademoiselle has not done me the honour to hear me out," he replied with a trace of anger in his voice. "I am no gentleman, but plain Bermond Gourdon, bookseller, of Bourg-Desnay. But I had no thought of imposing such a condition."

"What then?"

He seemed to find a difficulty in replying, or even looking at Alais, who faced him with every faculty at the fullest stretch. At last he spoke:

"Mademoiselle, the only way is for you to consent to marry me. Nay, hear me," as she started back, "it is true I am no gentleman, but I love you—have loved you long—though you have known nothing of me. I am all unworthy of you, yet in some way not so unequal as you believe. I have learnt such things as your associates know."

He was actually proceeding in his agitation to a foolish catalogue of his capabilities, but stopped short, and the girl burst in:

"Marry you! Marry you! You must be mad!"

"Mad I am; yet if Mademoiselle would but deign, these distinctions are now done with."

"I, a de Lussac, marry a tradesman, the leader of a Jacobin rabble! Monsieur, my family have known how to die, but not how to endure disgrace."

She gazed wildly about her like a trapped animal, and wrung her hands. Not all the excitement of the past hour had so moved her! The horror of it all was that the man, she could see, meant all he said. His very gesture and look and the working of his dark face showed it. But he recovered himself and stopped her.

Digitized by Google

"Calm yourself, Mademoiselle. I will urge you no more," he said bitterly. "It was a foolish dream; and yet, if you will believe it, even a tradesman can feel the worst part of his failure to be that he seemed to force what should come of liking. But now what will you do? These people seek your life."

"Let them have it! Call them in, and let them see how little I fear them."

* * * * *

A cry outside in the court.

"To arms! The Royalists! In the woods towards Latrielle! Quick! Quick!"

Then a scurry of feet, a clatter on the road, and all was still. They looked out. The hall was empty and silent, but out of the darkness which had now fallen outside could be heard cries growing fainter and fainter.

"Mademoiselle," said Gourdon, "your safety comes from another hand. You can now escape if you wish, though I think they will not return."

A man cautiously entered. It was Raynal.

"Aha! that was a good idea," he said. "I've sent them on a fine wild-goose chase."

Another footstep at the door, and in rushed Lemoine.

"Have you, you rascal!" he thundered. "And you, my little bookseller! So you were going to let your girl escape! I arrest you—all three!"

He advanced on Gourdon, who stepped back. There was a crack of a pistol, and the butcher fell back with his head blown in pieces.

"Take that carrion away and hide it quickly," said Gourdon to Raynal. "Farewell, Mademoiselle, and forgive me."

Alais seemed not to hear him. She swayed heavily where she stood, and would have fallen to the ground if Gourdon had not caught her. She was in a dead faint. Gourdon laid her down and stood looking at her as Rosine rushed in to her. Then he stopped, lifted her hand and kissed it reverently, and cut a ribbon from her dress.

"Tell her she is safe, and will see me no more," he said, and was gone.

* * * * *

Seven years passed by and Alais had lived on the château a still life, unmoved by all that happened in France. The Monarchy had fallen, the Revolution perished. She had heard that the château had been sold, but no one had disturbed her, and she lived there, for she had nowhere else to go. Of Gourdon she had heard nothing. Then her cousin André returned with the other emigrants, by the permission of Napoleon. He brought her a dying father's message that they should marry, and she became the wife of the man she had always loved.

On the eve of her wedding-day she heard that a sick soldier wished to see her. She went with her husband to a cottage near by, and there, on his death-bed, lay Gourdon. On a chair by the bed was the uniform of a a colonel in the French Army! The dying man's face lighted up.

"You have come," he said. "I knew I should see you once more. I have something to give back. I bought the château when it was sold by the Convention. It is yours again. See!" He fumbled beneath the pillow and produced a paper. "Take it," he said; "take it as a tradesman's gift—even he can give; yes, and fight. See! I earned my rank!" And he pointed to his uniform. A ribbon fell from the papers. He grasped it. "Not that, not that; that I keep." He started up wildly, and fell back dead.

"He was not a bad fellow, ma mie," said André to his wife; "and we will forgive his presumption for the sake of his gift. Really, a very proper feeling."

Alais looked at him. Perhaps just then she learnt a lesson—as most of us learn them—too late.

Winifred Scott.

Digitized by Google

There was so much talk about Professor Chesney before he arrived that Larry declared herself sick of the subject. Augusta, having spent several weeks in his company the previous summer at the house of their mutual friend, Mrs. Marston, felt she had a prior right to him. "A primary mortgage on him," Larry said, in her girlish impertinence. Gertrude, who had met him several times, and who was considered very clever, called him a "congenial spirit." Mrs. Austin, knowing his social standing and large income, declared him "a model man, one in a thousand." Mr. Austin pronounced him "an up-and-down good fellow." Even Jim Annsley, their cousin and adopted brother, expressed approbation of him.

Larry was the only one of the family who had not met him, and with her usual perversity made up her mind not to like him. He was learned in mathematics, which only scored against him in her eyes.

"The calculating power alone should seem to be the least of human qualities," she quoted, her small nose in the air. "There is something wrong about a man whom everybody likes. My prophetic soul tells me I shall not take to him, at least."

"Your 'prophetic soul' makes mistakes sometimes," put in Jim wickedly. "I've no doubt you'll succumb to his charms before he has been here a week. But, for sisterly affection's sake, don't interfere; give Augusta a chance."

"Don't alarm yourself!" cried Larry loftily. "I'm not susceptible, and dried-up, fusty old professors don't appeal to me in the slightest. I shall be truly thankful when this wonderful 'Admirable Crichton' has been and gone. I'm positively sick of the sound of his name."

"Professor Chesney is certainly a wonderful man," began Jim sententiously; but Larry at once pounced on him and he was ignominiously put to flight.

The Wednesday the professor was expected, Larry went for a long walk; she met Ned Erskine and Harry Winthrop, two young artists with whom she was good friends, and enjoyed herself very much, getting in barely in time to dress for dinner. They were all assembled round the table when she slipped into her place, and there was a reproof in her mother's voice as she said:

"My third daughter, Larinda, Professor Chesney."

If there was anything that her "third daughter" hated, it was being addressed by her baptismal name. With a mutinous pout of her red under lip, she bowed hastily, and it was not until she had disposed of her soup that she looked at her opposite neighbour. A tall, thin man with brown hair and a short brown beard and moustache thickly streaked with grey, a large, dome-like forehead, and near-sighted grey eyes that looked kindly at her through his spectacles.

He was a little surprised at the hostile expression in the brilliant brown eyes, which surprise deepened into astonishment when, in answer to a low-voiced remark from Jim, the young lady replied, also in a low voice, but so distinctly that he heard every word:

"I think he is an old fossil!"

Notwithstanding this, several times during the meal his eyes strayed to the white-robed figure, the bent, shining brown head, and once, in the midst of a remark from Augusta, he turned quickly to listen to a peal of merry laughter from Larry.

Several of her friends came in during the evening, and she devoted herself to their entertainment, completely ignoring the Professor. When she had kept up this behaviour for nearly a week, it attracted the attention of her family as well as that of the visitor, and when gentle hints were scorned, Larry was severely reprimanded.

"You are positively unladylike!" said Mrs. Austin; "and I insist on, at least, civility. He must think you an ill-mannered child."

"I dare say I do seem a child to his advanced years," saucily answered Larry.

"But what is your objection to him?" asked her mother. "To me he appears a most kindly, estimable gentleman——"

"Ugh!" cried her spoilt daughter with a gesture of deep disgust. "If there is one thing that I despise more than another, it is that word 'estimable,' as applied to people. Call them good, bad, weak, strong, brave, cowardly—anything but 'estimable.'"

Digitized by Google

"You are exceedingly impertinent!" answered Mrs. Austin, who was now very angry. "I insist on your being polite to Professor Chesney, and doing your share towards entertaining him, or I shall certainly complain of you to your father. Leave the room, miss."

A little ashamed and wholly angry, Larry whisked out of the room, almost into the Professor's arms, with such force as to rather stagger him. With a hasty "Excuse me," she sped along the corridor and up the stairs, while the "estimable gentleman" stood and looked after her.

"An old fossil!" he murmured, with a faint smile, stroking his beard.

Shortly after this, to the surprise of all, Larry suddenly changed her tactics, and at dinner one day addressed the Professor. He answered courteously, and very readily joined in an argument between herself and Jim. Her remarks were bright and amusing, if somewhat crude, and the brown eyes and changeful face were very attractive. In the evening she played and sang for him, and was as sweet and bewitching as the heart of man could desire, much to the surprise of some, and the annoyance of others, of her family.

"She means mischief!" thought Jim uneasily. "Are you beginning to succumb to the Professor's charms?" he whispered. "You know I gave you a week."

"I am thinking of getting up a collection of fossils," she answered, with a mocking laugh, "and this is too fine a specimen to lose. Don't you dare interfere."

"Poor wretch!" rejoined Jim. "He has my sympathy."

Unable to account for the change in Larry's manner, the Professor, nevertheless, found her very agreeable; and, though never neglecting anyone else, it soon became evident that she was the attraction. The other two reluctantly gave way to her, and she it was who went with him to picture galleries and lectures and concerts, who was the life of theatre and opera parties, saucy, wilful, charming.

With all his gravity and erudition, it was plain that he admired this ill-regulated young woman. He had never before been thrown closely into companionship with such a nature; he admired her beauty, her dainty costumes; even her girlish extravagance of speech and saucy disregard of his opinion pleased him better than Augusta's unvarying politeness, or Gertrude's cleverness. His eyes followed her every movement, a wistful light in them sometimes that touched Jim.

"He's in for a severe attack, I'm afraid," he thought. "Bad taste to take late in life," and went off whistling:

> Two bright eyes 'neath a scarlet hood,
> One beguiling, and one beguiled.

* * * * *

Larry was curled up in a deep window-sill overlooking the park, basking in the sun, for she was a veritable Persian in her love of sunlight, when Professor Chesney came into the room. He leant against the side of the window, looking at the picture she made in her quaint puffed and furbelowed gown, the sunlight falling on her brown head.

Larry looked up, nodded with a smile that showed her small white teeth, and settled back into her original position, waiting for him to speak; and so he did, after a while, but not as she expected.

"I am going away to-morrow, Miss Larry," he said. "My pleasant visit has come to an end all too soon."

"To-morrow?" echoed the girl, sitting up straight. "I am very sorry you are going." And much to her surprise, she realised that the remark was perfectly sincere.

"I am glad to hear you say that," said the Professor, trying to keep his voice steady. "It makes it a little easier to say something that is in my heart."

Then he told his story in warm, eager words, very unlike his usual calm ones—words that stirred Larry strangely. There was a queer expression on her pale face as she stood before him.

"Professor Chesney," she said with quivering lips, "I am not worth the love you have offered me. You'll realise that when I tell you I have only been pleasant and civil to you all these weeks, not from any liking of you, but to plague the others."

Thoroughly ashamed she bent her head, unable to meet his eyes.

"You mean that you have deliberately played a part all these weeks? You, whom I thought so frank and true? How could you do it? Then you've not the slightest love for me in your heart—that, I suppose, is out of the question?"

There was a hurt, shocked tone in his voice that touched Larry keenly.

"I don't love you," she answered, "but I shall be very grateful, if, after what I have told you, you will let me be your friend."

She put out her hands and moved a step nearer to him, but, to her mortification, her extended hands remained untouched.

"I did not ask for your friendship," he said unsteadily, "and just at present I want only what I ask for. By-and-bye I may be able to appreciate your offer; I shall try, but you've taught me a hard lesson, Larry, one I'm not likely to forget. Perhaps I ought to have known better, but," with a break in his voice, "I'm not used to women—I'm only an old fossil, after all." And without another word he left her.

Up in her room Larry was still more surprised to find a fit of crying necessary. She could not account for the unhappy feeling that took possession of her as she reviewed the past weeks and realised that the kindly, pleasant companionship she had accepted so heedlessly was at an end.

"I suppose he'll hate me now and for ever," she thought, between her sobs. "But how could I say I loved him when I didn't?"

Digitized by Google

"Mistress Mary, quite contrary," mocked a parrot in the next room.

"He was so hurt. I wonder if he'll ever forgive me?"

"Contrary, quite contrary," shrieked the parrot, with such force that it sounded positively personal to conscience-stricken Larry.

"Fiendish bird!" she cried, "I wish some boy would wring its neck."

Then she sobbed all the harder.

The Professor left the next afternoon, while Larry was out. A box of white roses lay on the table addressed to her, a card attached, on which was written: "From your friend Roger Chesney;" that was all, but she guessed dimly what an effort it cost to write it. With trembling fingers she made three parts of the flowers, and gave them to her mother and sisters.

"I don't want them," she said proudly in answer to her mother's remonstrance. "I was only civil to him to please you all."

Jim noticed that the brilliant eyes were full of tears, and that she took the card away with her.

"It must be a relief to you to have him gone," he said as they stood for a moment in the hall. "Association with such a serious man must have been a trial to you."

He was unprepared for the way she flamed out at him.

"Such a trial as makes me more willing to accept the statement that man is made after God's own image, and possesses some godlike attributes. Now go!"

And he did, a lurking smile under his moustache and a most emphatic "By Jove!" upon his lips.

* * * * *

One bright morning early in June, Jim opened the door of Mrs. Austin's sitting-room. Larry was there alone. She had an industrious fit on her, and with the sleeves of her blue morning dress turned back, displaying two prettily-rounded arms, feather duster in hand, she was whisking the dust off some rare old pieces of china.

"Larry, here is an old friend of yours," Jim announced. "Treat him well, for he sails for the Cape to-morrow, never to return. I'll be back in a minute."

He vanished; and there inside the closed door stood Professor Chesney—thinner, greyer, but with the old kindly smile on his lips that she remembered so well. Startled out of her self-possession, Larry stood with her duster suspended over grandma's hundred-year-old teapot.

"I sail for the Cape to-morrow," said the Professor, taking a few steps into the room, "and I may never return. Won't you wish me God-speed, Larry?"

Crash went grandma's priceless teapot in a dozen pieces on the polished floor, and the next thing Larry knew she was crying.

The Professor approached her.

"Are you crying because I am going away, or because you have broken the teapot?" asked the visitor.

"Both!" cried Larry, with a convulsive sob which was smothered in the folds of the Professor's coat, as the arms of that "estimable" gentleman closed round her.

"How about your prophetic soul, Larry?" Jim asked later on. "I thought you called him a fossil?"

"So I did," answered the young lady quite unabashed. "But I also said I was getting up a collection of fossils, and recognised the fact that he was too fine a specimen to lose. Don't you remember?"

H. P. T.

SHALL WE MAKE A MINIATURE FOR YOU?

With the enterprise born of repeated success, Pearson's Weekly makes an extraordinary offer to the whole of its readers for a limited time only. We will send a beautiful little miniature (about 2¼-inches by 1⅞-inches) in exquisite colouring, and completely framed in a dainty gold-plated oval frame, of any single portrait readers like to forward.

All you have to do is to send your photograph, together with the coupon, and seven shillings and sixpence. The miniatures may be also had in chased gold ornamental frames, the total cost being 10s. 6d.

Of course, the better the photograph you send, the better will be the reproduction.

Write your name and address on the back of the photograph, and mark your envelope "Miniature."

Specimens of the Miniatures can be seen at:

Manchester—Messrs. Abel Heywood, Oldham Street; and Mr. John Heywood, Deansgate.
Liverpool—F. A. Latarche, 63, Lime Street; and M. Partington, 9, Renshaw Street.
Edinburgh—H. Robinson, 111 and 115, Leith Street; and David Crawford, 75, South Clerk Street.
Glasgow—W. Love, 221, Argyle Street; and Mr. Barr, 88, Sauchiehall St.
Dundee—Mrs. Littlejohn, The Pillars.
Bradford—W. H. Clough, 28, Forster Square.
Bristol—T. Thatcher, 44, College Green.
Newcastle—Messrs. R. J. Porteus and Co., 19, Grainger Street West.
Leeds—Mr. H. Walker, 37, Briggate, Leeds.
West Bromwich—H. N. Ellison, 3 and 3a, Bull Street.
Cardiff—W. White, 1a, Severn Road, Canton.
London—Pearson's Weekly Offices.

Name .....
Address .....
.....
Colour of eyes .....
„ „ hair .....
Complexion .....
Description of dress .....
.....

£ s. d.

Please send ..... @ 7s. 6d.
„ „ ..... @ 10s. 6d.

Amount of Postal Orders inclosed... £ s. d.

LOVE STORIES.

The Companion paper to Short Stories. Costs one Halfpenny.

Each number consists of a complete illustrated novel, besides information on Love, Courtship, and Marriage by the Countess M.

Digitized by Google

When old John Menard died, people came far and wide to look at the low, long building—a modern roof built on a battered stone edifice of the sixteenth century. A more modern blacksmith's shop had been built on at one end whose doors had long been closed. A solitary pine tree, half dead and beaten by a century of storms, lifted its black crest close by, and a waterfall, hidden in evergreen woods, came muttering slowly over the rocks in the rear. People talked in whispers about there being a ghost on the premises. Doctors shook their heads and said that the bad drainage was enough to make a churchyard full of the sheeted and shrouded gentry. Artists on the staff of illustrated newspapers came there to sketch the ruined buildings as the oldest in the country, and burglars slyly ransacked the place at due intervals—as old John had the name of being an ideal miser, who hid bags of money up the chimney and kept boxes of gold coins under the flooring of the unused rooms—always, however, without any satisfactory result. And old John sitting like a withered mummy in the sunshine, on a certain old bench which he much affected, grinned and chuckled when people asked him why he didn't keep a watch-dog or take another family into the house to protect him.

"Good gracious!" said the old miser. "What do I want of a dog to eat me out of house and home? And as for a family—well I fancy there're fools enough in the house a'ready since Mary Jane fell in love with Bill Jones, the cooper's son. Let the ghosts go ghosterin' round. They don't hurt me. And as for burglars, dear heart, if they knew how little there was to steal, they'd be a-spendin' their time to better advantage somewhere else."

Bill Jones, a strapping young giant, with a yellow, curly head and simple blue eyes, was regarded as a brave man when he went to ask old John Menard for his granddaughter's hand in marriage. The old miser regarded him with scornful eyes, and worked his toothless jaws about after a most appalling fashion.

"Eh?" said John. "My Mary Jane? What is it you're sayin' about 'er?"

"I love her, sir," repeated Bill, "and she loves me."

"Pshaw!" cried Mr. Menard.

"And I want to marry her," protested Bill Jones, sticking gallantly to his post.

"Well, you can't!" snarled Menard; "and there's an end of the matter."

"I can support her," said Bill Jones. "The cooperin' business is lookin' up and——"

"That don't make no difference," said the old man. "My gal don't marry anyone but a blacksmith. The old shop has got to be opened again, the business has got to go on."

Bill Jones stared. Then it was true, as the neighbours said, that John Menard was wont at times to light the forge fires at midnight and work away on rusty old nails and bars of long-used iron, especially on stormy nights, when sleep fled from his pillow.

"Don't you think, sir," he ventured, "that the cooperin'——"

"I don't know nothin' about the cooperin' and I don't care nothin' about it," said John steadfastly. "But this I do know: the man who marries my girl has got to be a blacksmith."

"Then," said Bill Jones, clenching his Herculean fists, "I'll be a blacksmith!"

He meant it. He apprenticed himself the next day to a sturdy son of Vulcan, whose forge roared in red volleys of flame up the chimney of a neighbouring shed, and never rested until he had qualified himself to shoe any horse in the county.

"I wouldn't do that for any girl," said Harvey Martin, Farmer Martin's nephew.

"Ah," said Bill Jones; "but you don't know how I love that girl! I have loved her ever since I met her comin' down Rabbit Hill that snowy afternoon with a horse-shoe in her hand. 'Grandfather says it's bad luck to pass a horse-shoe,' says she, laughin', when I made bold to ask her what on earth she was a-goin' to do with it; 'so I always bring 'em home. Grandfather has got a pile of 'em in the old shed behind the forge.' She had such a pretty way with her, don't you see; and her cheeks were that pink, and her eyes that black, as you couldn't think of nothin' but a doll. A blacksmith indeed! If the old man had bid me be a rope-dancer, I'd ha'e gone to work, practisin' with a will!"

Old John smiled grimly when he saw Bill Jones handle the red hot iron in the old forge, and viewed a set of horse shoes that his mighty hand had hammered out.

"It ain't bad work," said he. "You'll be a blacksmith, boy, if you keep on. Yes, you may marry Mary Jane if you like—now!"

Mr. and Mrs. William Jones's wedding trip was only to the nearest town to buy a carpet for the best room, and a set of blue edged crockery to start housekeeping with.

Digitized by Google

"It's sheer extravagance!" growled old John. "Clean scoured boards is good enough for anyone, and there was enough old cups and plates about the place, though a trifle cracked and chipped. But it ain't my money they're going to spend, and I'spose Bill Jones has a right to do as he pleases with his own."

But when the young couple returned, on a sunshiny October afternoon, old John sat out on his bench, his head bowed over the staff, which he clenched in both hands—dead!

There was no sign of violence, no trace of mortal agony on face or form. Had he fallen asleep he could not have looked more peaceful and calm, and Bill and Mary Jane both agreed that it was better so.

"He was peculiar, I know," said Mary Jane, bursting into tears; "but he was always good to me. Oh, poor grandfather!"

Then it was that the mob of sightseers, newspaper artists, curiosity hunters, inquisitive neighbours, and the innumerable army of people who have nothing else to do, beseiged the old place, going into ecstasies over broken spinning-wheels, three-cornered cupboards, brass fire-dogs, and canopy-topped bedsteads. And Mr. Griscombe, the lawyer, arrived and unlocked the old desk, which was propped up with a brick on one side, and had had all the panes of the glass front broken out at different times by enterprising burglars.

"No papers," said he; "no will on file here. I didn't suppose there would be. Mr. Menard deposited his last will and testament with me, ten years ago. It's very simple. It leaves everything—including, by name, the stock and fixtures of the blacksmith's shop and the collection of horseshoes which from time to time the deceased had accumulated for luck's sake—to his granddaughter, Mary Jane Menard. Now," he explained, "Mrs. William Jones, I'll read it to you."

"But," cried the neighbours, "where is the fortune? What has become of the old miser's money?"

"There is no mention made of money," said Mr. Griscombe dryly, "nor of fortunes."

The neighbours were greatly disappointed. Not so Bill Jones and his blooming wife.

"Polly is a fortune in herself," said Bill complacently.

"And I am sure no amount of money could make me happier than I am now," said cheerful Mary Jane.

And so Bill flung open the doors of the musty old blacksmith shop, lighted a huge fire, and put on his leather apron and sleeves, while Mary Jane took her needlework and sat out on the bench, where grandfather Menard had died, and sang softly to herself like a little human thrush.

"I don't know, I'm sure," said Bill Jones, "what I'm going to do with all this heap of old horseshoes."

"It was for luck, you know," apologised Mary Jane.

"Grandfather never could pass a horseshoe without picking it up and bringing it home, and somehow he got me in the same habit. Some of these are very good, I think."

"And some of 'em ain't!" observed Bill, shrugging his broad shoulders. "However, I'll just give 'em all an overhauling and see what they do amount to. It's my opinion they'll most of 'em fetch just a halfpenny a pound for old iron."

"Well," said Mary Jane, with a sigh, "I suppose it's of no use keeping them."

"Hallo!" shouted Bill. "These down at the bottom are of a mortal queer colour! Eh? Iron? Not these ain't—not if I'm a judge of metal! Polly, these are gold!"

"What!" cried Polly.

"Solid gold!" said Bill Jones. "Tarnished and discoloured, and nigh the colour of the old horseshoes themselves, but solid gold! Polly, Polly, my girl, we've found the old man's fortune at last! No wonder the burglars never robbed him of it, for, as true as you live, he's beaten it into horseshoes!"

"It can't be possible!" cried Polly, who, dropping the blue gingham apron that she was making, had hurried to the spot.

"But it is!" said Bill Jones triumphantly. "Don't you know gold when you see it, Polly? Just look here!"

It was true. John Menard, full of whim and caprice, had taken his own measure for preserving his own property; and all the clue which he had chosen to furnish as to the whereabouts of his not inconsiderable savings was the decree that his granddaughter should marry no one but a blacksmith.

And now the rush of sightseers, correspondents, and curious neighbours became greater than ever. And they have been ransacking the old place, ever since Mr. and Mrs. Bill Jones removed into more modern and commodious quarters, for hidden treasures, but in vain.

And Bill has nailed one of the best of horseshoes—an iron one, not a gold one—over the front door of his new house.

"For luck's sake!" he said.

And Mary Jane whispered also:

"For luck's sake!"

PAN.

DON'T MISS THIS NUMBER

OF

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE

NOW ON SALE.

PRICE SIXPENCE. PRICE SIXPENCE.

SOME OF THE CONTENTS:

ARTISTS AND THEIR WORK. (Illustrated.) Amongst the many charming pictures which are reproduced this month are splendid examples of the work of Mr. Solomon J. Solomon, A.R.A., as well as a most amusing picture by M. Pirez, and many others equally as interesting and as beautiful.

MOUNTAINEERING IN ENGLAND. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By Austin Fryers. The striking photographs which illustrate this article show that it is quite unnecessary to go to Switzerland to break one's neck in mountaineering. The climbing that can be obtained at home is as perilous and as excellent a test for the nerves as the most courageous and hardy mountaineer could desire.

THE WEALTH OF THE WORLD. Written and illustrated by J. Holt Schooling. Here we have presented to us in picturesque form some most interesting facts about the distribution of the wealth of the world.

CHANGING SILVER INTO GOLD. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By Herbert C. Fyfe. This article gives full information about the remarkable discovery which has recently been made by Dr. Emmens.

THE DEVIL'S PICTURE-BOOKS. (Illustrated with Examples.) By J. H. Kemmis. Under this title are reproduced a most interesting series of the playing-cards used in different parts of the world.

HOW THE HANDS ARE HELD. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By E. Le Breton-Martin. The author of this article has obtained a very striking series of photographs of the most curious attitudes for carrying the hands, which have come under his observation.

THE PERSONAL INTERESTS OF MR. GLADSTONE. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By W. Arthur Woodward. This is the most complete account that has ever been published of Mr. Gladstone's recreations throughout his long and varied career.

ANIMAL ACROBATS. (Illustrated by H. Piffard.) By J. Malcolm Fraser. In this article a description is given of some of the very clever tricks which dogs and cats have been trained to perform, and illustrations are given of some of the most difficult feats.

AND HALF-A-DOZEN COMPLETE STORIES.

Digitized by Google

SHOULD STOUT PERSONS STARVE THEMSELVES?

We are afraid that semi-starvation as a cure for corpulency prevails very much to a dangerous degree. Mr. Archer, the late well-known prominent jockey, was in the habit of going without food for a long stretch in order that he could ride a certain horse at its weight, and there is not much doubt that the debility resulting from this habit of abstemiousness was certainly not conducive to combating the dire attack of fever which was perhaps indirectly responsible for the untimely end in the zenith of his fame, of this unfortunate but accomplished horseman. Even Mary Jane in the kitchen will eat sparingly of the food allowed her, while she will seek to reduce her fat by copious draughts from the vinegar cruet, and succeeds only in injuring the coats of her stomach—the forerunner of dyspeptic trouble which will be difficult to overcome. The Continental medicos seem to advocate this great reduction of ordinary foods, but one of these savants suggests that the stout person should eat considerably of fatty meats, in order that the appetite be appeased, and consequently less food required, so that practically this is indirectly advocating semi-starvation. On the other hand, Mr. Russell, the British specialist, takes a different course. He says: "Eat as much as you like," and as it is an acknowledged fact that under his treatment persons lose from 2lb. to 12lb. per week, it beyond doubt stands out pre-eminent against those so-called starvation cures "made in Germany." Some claim that Mr. Russell has to insist upon his patients drinking hot water every morning; but, on the contrary, he avers that it is dangerous to do so, and has, of course, never advised it. No; the success of Mr. Russell's treatment is incomparably beyond other specialists, for he resorts to no stringent dietary, and simply prescribes a harmless vegetable tonic combination, which is the outcome of years of study and botanical research. We advise all those interested in this question to get this book, the price of which is only threepence. It is entitled "Corpulency, and the Cure" (256 pages), and is published by him at Woburn House, Store Street, London, W.C. It can be had direct.—Ilfracombe Observer.

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS IN THE TREATMENT OF OBESITY.

"Our corpulent readers will be glad to learn how to positively lose two stone in about a month with the greatest possible benefit in health, strength, and muscle by a comparatively new system. It is a singular paradox that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive, and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto; yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one to two pounds daily, as the weighing-machine will prove. Thus there is no suggestion of starvation. It is an absolute success, and the author, who has devoted years of study to the subject, absolutely guarantees a noticeable reduction within twenty-four hours of commencing the treatment. This is different with other diseases, for the patient in some cases may go for weeks without being able to test whether the physician has rightly treated him, and may have derived no real or apparent improvement in health. Here, we repeat, the author guarantees it in twenty-four hours, the scale to be the unerring judge. The treatment aims at the actual root of the disease, so that the superfluous fat does not return when discontinuing the treatment. It is perfectly harmless. We advise our readers to call the attention of stout friends to this, because, sincerely, we think they ought to know. For their information, we may say that, on sending three penny stamps, a book entitled 'Corpulency, and the Cure' (256 pages), containing a reprint of Press notices from some hundreds of Medical and other journals (British and Foreign), and other interesting particulars, including the 'recipe,' can be had from a Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C."—Extract from The Belfast News Letter.

Digitized by Google

MANY HAPPY RETURNS OF THIS PAGE.

W. M. wishes to know whether wooden shoes are worn by any considerable number of people in Europe.——It is estimated that there are no fewer than 70,000,000 Europeans who wear wooden shoes. Bass wood is ordinarily employed for sabots, but willow is the best material. Poplar, beech, walnut, and birch are also used.

Lucy is an advanced young lady. She thinks she can make a mark in journalism, and proposes to go to Japan; as that country is advancing by leaps and bounds, an enterprising journalist ought to start an up-to-date paper and make money quickly.——I am afraid there is no chance for you in Japan, Lucy. Some time ago a law was promulgated prohibiting women from becoming publishers or editors, as "the discharge of such work by females is neither becoming or desirable." Better stay at home.

L. G.—Neither Darwin nor any other responsible naturalist ever said that "men were descended from monkeys." He merely pointed out that it was probable that man and monkey might be descended from the same ancestral stock, which is quite a different thing to saying that one is descended from the other.

C. G. complains that the old saying about not being able to get a quart into a pint pot is inaccurate. "It implies that you cannot get more than a pint into a pint pot. Why not, seeing that water is compressible?"——Water is compressible theoretically, but practically it is not. If you subject water to an additional pressure of one atmosphere, it is compressed about one twenty-thousandth part of its bulk. Let the old saying alone, C. G., it is sufficiently accurate for ordinary mortals.

Henry writes thus: "My namesake, King Henry I., is said to have had an arm measuring thirty-six inches, hence the length of the present yard. I am curious to know whether this is also the origin of the 'yard-arm'!"——Henry, editing this paper is a serious business. You should try the Big Budget.

S. S. wants to know who St. Valentine was.——He was a Christian martyr, put into chains by Claudius XI. for having assisted the martyrs during that Emperor's persecution of the Christians. The custom of sending love tokens on February 14th is of Pagan origin, and it is supposed that in early times the Christian pastors attempted to give to the ceremony a religious character by using the names of certain saints, and by fixing the feast on St. Valentine's Day.

J. J.—The Income tax was at its highest during the Crimean War. From 1854 to 1855, on incomes of £100 and upwards, it amounted to 1s. 2d. in the £, but in the course of the next few years it dropped to 5d. It fell to its lowest point in 1874 to 1876 when it was only 2d. Since then it has been steadily on the increase.

A. L.—Japan is a corruption of the Chinese word Shipen-Kue, which means "Root of Day," or "Sunrise Kingdom," because Japan is directly east of China.

M. A. writes: "Is it true that you can frighten a lobster to pieces? I was told so, but although I have tried it on several lobsters, the trick won't work."——It is only partly true, M. A. The lobster, like its brothers, the crawfish and the crab, is peculiarly sensitive to loud noises, and it is a fact that a loud clap of thunder will cause him to drop his large claws in order that he may scurry over the ground, and get out of danger the more quickly. The loss of his claws inconveniences him for a short time only; he is blessed with the faculty of growing others.

D. K. when in his teens, had one great ambition; he wanted to be a "six-footer," as he terms it. But Nature was against him, and he has had to be contented with five feet eight inches. He now tries to console himself with the reflection that had he been over six feet, he would have been conspicuous.——To some extent yes. Only one person in two hundred is over six feet in height.

H. M.—When writing to a Frenchman, always put the Monsieur in full; it is bad taste to contract it to M.

D. S. L.—Skating had its origin in Holland hundreds of years ago. This sport had its bone age before its iron or steel one. In the thirteenth century, young men used to fasten the leg-bones of animals under their feet by means of thongs, and slide along the ice, pushing themselves by means of an iron-shod pole.

H. S. wants to know what proportion of the tea consumed in this country comes from China.——Barely one-tenth is supplied by the Celestial Empire, and it is probable that even this comparatively small portion will dwindle almost to nothing by the end of the present century.

Country Cousin has come up to town to see the "sights," and being a very demure young lady, she is anxious to know whether it would be considered "proper" for her to ride about in a hansom alone.——Several years ago such an action would have been thought extremely unladylike, but that idea has long since been exploded, and if you care to see London in a hansom, you may certainly do so without being guilty of any impropriety.

B. D. H.—Railway trains are a great deal heavier than you think. One of average size with the engine would weigh two hundred and forty tons. The engine alone often weighs as much as eighty tons.

G.—Perhaps the most singular thing that ever got into Chancery was a cheese. It was made by a number of Somersetshire farmers, and intended for the christening of the Princess Royal. Being of huge proportions it was made for some time before the event was to come off, but, unfortunately, in the meantime the joint owners fell out, and one party applied to the Court of Chancery for an injunction to restrain the other party from exhibiting the cheese. The injuction was granted, and the cheese came under the control of the Court until the owners were reconciled.

Stanley writes to say that judging from the old oil paintings of people a hundred years or more ago, to be seen in the National Gallery and elsewhere, he considers that, as a nation, we must be growing decidedly handsomer, for the majority of the afore-mentioned pictures he considers are "awful frights."——You have probably not made any allowance for the effects of dress, and for the very different style of wearing the hair that were in vogue in the old days. Then again, each age differs in its opinion as to what is beautiful, as indeed almost every nation does, and could the originals of the old pictures to which you refer once more visit the earth, they would probably think what "awful frights" the present inhabitants are.

G. P.—It is estimated that at present the English language is spoken by about 115,000,000 people.

G. H.—Probably the queerest form of language is that employed by the natives of the Cameroons, by means of which they are enabled to send messages quickly from one village to another. It is what may be called the "drum" language. A peculiarly shaped drum is used, the surface of the head being divided into unequal parts. In this way the instrument is made to yield two distinctive notes. By varying the intervals between the notes, a complete code of signals for every syllable in the language is produced.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.
Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.
A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious, Non-Alcoholic Wine.
Agents Wanted.
NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES
are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger Lemon, Orange, Blackberry etc.
YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM
(REALLY GENUINE).

In Patent Air-tight Tins. ¼lb., 10d.; ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; including tin and postage.

MRS. CONYERS,
MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON

WADE'S
WONDERFUL OFFER
A SOLID SILVER WATCH GIVEN AWAY.
SEND NO MONEY.

In order to introduce my name into every household in the Kingdom, I undertake and guarantee to give away one of my "World-Famed £2 Silver Watches," last price, Ladies' or Gentlemen's, to every reader who sends me the correct reading of the Rebus printed below. I am preparing to send out immediately 2,000 of these watches. This is a perfectly genuine competition, and the only thing you have to do is carry out the conditions, and if you succeed in guessing correctly you have the advantage of our truly wonderful offer.

These pictures represent three well-known English Wild Flowers. The conditions of the Competition are that you find out what these flowers are, and if you are correct you undertake to purchase one of my inexpensive Solid Silver Chains. These chains are the best made, are marvellous value. Money returned if dissatisfied. Send at once, enclosing stamped and addressed envelope, so that I may inform you if correct.

W. W. WADE,
WATCH MANUFACTURER.
Dept. 35. GOLD EXCHANGE,
Hammersmith, London, W.

HAVE YOU SEEN OUR CATALOGUE OF CHEAP CROCKERY? If not, please get a post-card, and send it to THE

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY, and you will get it by return, together with particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES
For £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery.

This is the pattern of the DINNER SERVICE

Thousands Sold all over the World.

Post-Cards and Letters to be addressed to the PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY, STAFFS.

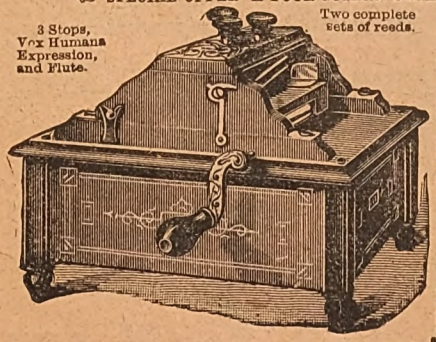
DIRECT FROM THE PATENTEE & SOLE MANUFACTURER TO THE CUSTOMER AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

THE WONDERFUL ORCHESTRAL ORGANETTE.

☞ SPECIAL OFFER—A FOUR-GUINEA ORGANETTE FOR 35/-

3 STOPS



The very ACME OF MUSICAL INVENTION, an instrument with as much variety of tone as a £25 organ. Every Orchestral Organette has 28 FULL-SIZE AMERICAN ORGAN REEDS, controlled by THREE STOPS, viz., Flute, Expression, and Vox Humana, furnishing the GRANDEST ORCHESTRAL EFFECTS. THE RANGE OF MUSIC AND TONE IS PRACTICALLY UNLIMITED. For HOME ENTERTAINMENTS THEY ARE UNSURPASSED. We REFUND THE MONEY AND PAY CARRIAGE to anyone not entirely satisfied after receiving it. Any tune can be played with artistic effect by anyone, young or old. We will give a selection of MUSIC FREE with each instrument. Send money by Registered Letter, Crossed Cheque, or Money Order. For 2s. extra, the Organette will be sent carriage paid. J. M. DRAPER, Organette Works, BLACKBURN.

EASY PAYMENTS.—We have decided to sell a limited number on following easy payments—10s. deposit and 5s. monthly. Price 40s. Full particulars on application.

By Royal Letters Patent. A mere child can play it.
Size: 14½in. long, 13½in. wide, 9½in. high, weight 8lb.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"GOLDEN SHRED" MARMALADE

A DELIGHTFUL APPETIZER

NO BREAKFAST OR TEA TABLE COMPLETE WITHOUT IT

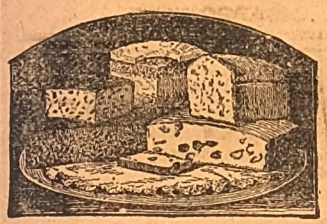
Unrivalled piquant stimulant for the delicate.

PREPARED BY JAMES ROBERTSON Paisley.

FREE SAMPLE ON RECEIPT OF 2d FOR POSTAGE.

PURE WHOLESOME FOOD.

If you have not already tried a sample of NARCISSUS CAKE we would respectfully invite you to do so.



Twenty years ago this delicious cake could not have been bought under 1/4 or 1/6 per lb., and it can only be sold retail at our price incidental to the fact of our having every facility for manufacturing cake on the most approved principles, and in large quantities, and in conjunction with the fact that owing to our enormous business we are able to buy the very finest products of the world's markets at the lowest possible prices. NARCISSUS CAKE, sold by Grocers and Stores, 8d. per lb. in cuts, or in 2lb. and 6lb. cakes. Every ½lb. of Cake bears our registered signature and the name of the Cake.

DIPLOME d'HONNEUR, BRUSSELS, 1897.

JOHN HILL & SON,

Tudno Cake Factory, Ashton-under-Lyne.

FLEMING'S HOUSEHOLD SPECIALITIES

THE MIKADO TRADE MARK MOTH PAPER

AMMONIATED CAMPHYLENE CREAM

A CERTAIN REMEDY

A LUXURY IN THE BATH.

MIKADO MOTH PAPER, specially adapted for folded clothes, &c. 1/- per box.
ALABASTER NO TABLETS, for placing in wardrobes, chests, etc., 1/- per box.
CRYSTALLISED CAMPHYLENE, for scattering under carpets, among furniture, etc., 1/- per tin.

For the TOILET, BATH & NURSERY. Possesses great stimulating and invigorating properties. Refreshing, healthful, and agreeable in odour. Contains no injurious or deleterious substance. In the bath it is unrivalled. Will not injure the most sensitive skin. In pint bots., 1/3 ea.

If any difficulty in obtaining at Chemists, Grocers, Stores, etc., will be sent direct post free from Sole Manufacturers: Fleming's Oil & Chemical Co. Ld., 101 Leadenhall St., London, E.C.

NUCOLINE

A PURE VEGETABLE BUTTER.

FOR BAKED & BOILED PASTRY, FRYING, etc.

A PERFECT COOKING BUTTER.

NUTRITIVE, DIGESTIVE, ECONOMICAL. FIVE PRIZE MEDALS AWARDED.

Stocked by all London Stores, etc.

A SAMPLE TIN SENT POST FREE FOR THREE STAMPS. Write

NUCOLINE LTD., SILVERTOWN, LONDON, E.

ZEBRA Grate Polish.

In Packets or as a Paste in Tins.

Digitized by Google

A CHINESE ARMY OF 400,000,000! See "The Empress of the Earth."

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 481. FOR WEEK ENDING MARCH 19TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

DR TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

THE WONDERFUL FOOD BEVERAGE.

A Food Beverage such as Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, with its unique powers of nutriment and exceptional vitalising properties, is a means whereby strength and nervous energy is gained as a rational outcome of increased vitality.

It has the refreshing properties of fine tea, the nourishment of the best cocoas, and a tonic and recuperative force possessed by neither, and can be used in all cases where tea and coffee are prohibited.

Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, 6d., 9d., and 1s. 6d. can be obtained from grocers, chemists, and stores, or from Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa Limited, 60, 61, and 62, Bunhill Row, London, E.C.

DAINTY SAMPLE FREE.

But mention SHORT STORIES.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"Its food value is double that of Bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

will not only help to improve your digestion and consequently your health, but will also bring back that energetic and happy feeling of good health. Man does not live a natural life, so a good portion of a natural food, in the shape of HOVIS, at each meal will largely counteract the bad influence that modern life has upon the health and digestive organs. This is not an idle remark, but a proved statement, daily being verified.

HOVIS is baked and sold by all good class Bakers. No loaf genuine unless stamped HOVIS. 6d. and 1/- samples of Bread and Biscuits sent on receipt of stamps by

S. FITTON & SON, Millers, Macclesfield.

You Can't Afford—

to be without

Antiseptic.
Pure.
Preserves Food and Milk.
Stops Smells.
Arrests Decay.
Purifies everything.
Invaluable for the Bath and Toilet.
For Rinsing and Cleansing.

By Special Appointment — Makers to Her Majesty.

THE PATENT BORAX CO. LTD., LADYWOOD, BIRMINGHAM.
LONDON DEPOT: 129 HIGH HOLBORN.
Grocers, Oilmen, and Stores keep it

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

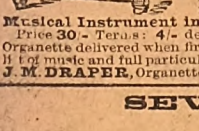
COCOA

SILVER QUEEN CYCLES!

Best Value on Earth. Immense stock of Ladies' and Gents' machines. New and Secondhand. Wonderful bargains. Carriage paid. Easy payments from 10s. monthly, or large cash discount. 1 year's guarantee. Illus. price lists post free on application. Old cycles exchanged. The SILVER QUEEN CYCLE Co Ltd., 221 Tottenham Court Road, London.

THE 'ENGLISH' ORGANETTE.

WITH EXPRESSION STOP.
EASY PAYMENTS. 4s. MONTHLY.
1 STOP.



Plays Hymns, Popular Airs, Quadrilles, Waltzes, Polkas, Reels, Hornpipes. Any tune can be played with artistic effect by anyone. No musical knowledge required. A mere child can play it. Most marvellous Musical Instrument in the World.

Price 30/- Terms: 4/- deposit and 4/- monthly. Organette delivered when first 4/- is paid. Write for list of music and full particulars. Mention this paper. J. M. DRAPER, Organette Works, BLACKBURN.

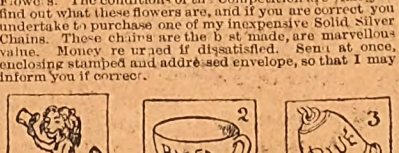
WADE'S WONDERFUL OFFER

A SOLID SILVER WATCH GIVEN AWAY.

SEND NO MONEY.

In order to introduce my name into every household in the Kingdom, I undertake and guarantee to give away one of my "World-Famed £2 Silver Watches." list price, Ladies' or Gentlemen's, to every reader who sends me the correct reading of the Rebus printed below. I am preparing to send out immediately 2,000 of these watches. This is a perfectly genuine competition, and the only thing you have to do is carry out the conditions, and if you succeed in guessing correctly you have the advantage of our truly wonderful offer.

These pictures represent three well-known English Wild Flowers. The conditions of the Competition are that you find out what these flowers are, and if you are correct you undertake to purchase one of my inexpensive Solid Silver Chains. These chains are the best made, are marvellous value. Money returned if dissatisfied. Send at once, enclosing stamped and addressed envelope, so that I may inform you if correct.



W. W WADE,
WATCH MANUFACTURER,
Dept. 35, GOLD EXCHANGE,
Hammersmith, London, W.

A. A sum of from 10/- to 20/- per week offered for spare time to either sex everywhere. Work can be done evenings. Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 89, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

"JUNO" CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

DIAMONDS from £10. 16/8 monthly. JUNO Lady's or Gents' Safety £12 12/- 21/- monthly. £14 14/-, 24/6 „ £16 16/-, 28/- „ Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories, sent post free to any part.

THE COLUMBIAN MACHINIST CO. LTD., 75 and 76 Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.; and at Piccadilly Circus, exactly opposite the Criterion, London, W. N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. New JUNO Riding School, 1,700ft., now open.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably"

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MR. CLAUDE CARTER, of Thorn House, Johnstone, N.B., says: "Your Tablets much reduced my weight and I have been waiting to see if it was permanent, and so it has proved."

MR. CANHAM, 87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, says: "Tablets cured my wife two years ago of extreme stoutness. It has never returned."

MARION TAYLOR, of Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "Have lost quite two stone."

A. PEEL, of Darley Hydro, Matlock, writes: "They have reduced and benefited me a good deal."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than one stone."

MR. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead. "I think them wonderful not only to reduce fat but as a medicine."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement London. E.C.

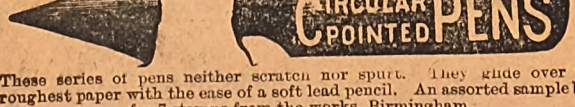
SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.



These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 481.] For the Week ending March 19th, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

THE UNCANNY HAND.

"WHAT a restless creature you are," said my friend Stephen Vronsky, one evening, as we sat together in an apartment which I had just then taken, and which overlooked the Champs Elysées.

"Ah!" I answered, as I puffed a blue cloud into the air.

"Yes, I should think you were what you Theosophists call an astral body. I received one letter from you postmarked Calcutta. A week later I heard of you in Ceylon. Then you were on a camel's back headed for Damascus, and—now, well, I don't know whether you are really here or not, for you seem so nearly ubiquitous that you make me dizzy."

"But you are glad to see me all the same, eh?"

"That, of course, my boy. But how do you manage it?"

"I don't manage it, Stephen; I strictly follow the impulse of Theosophy. I am migratory; not so ubiquitous as our Mahatmas can be. But I find my happiness in being on the move. I'm not a rooted tree, but a creeping vine."

"I should say a flash of lightning! Still, here you are, and I propose to enjoy you to the top of my bent. By-the-way, splendid rug, that!"

"Yes, I got that of an old dealer in Bagdad. You never saw one like it, I imagine?"

"And that tapestry?"

"Oh, I'm glad you appreciate that. Bought it at an auction three years ago, here in Paris. Louis XIV."

Stephen had a fine eye—a perfect hawk's-eye—for bits of rare pottery, old vases, antique bronzes, and the like. So we spent half-an-hour in looking over my collection; and then we talked about Theosophy.

"Well, that's the queerest thing yet," he said, as he stood at my table, some time afterwards, looking at half-a-dozen bits of bric-à-brac.

"The inkstand?" I said. "Yes, that is quite worth a critical survey. I bought it in——"

"No, no!" he interrupted impetuously. "Not the inkstand; but that——"

"Ah, yes," I answered. "It was one of my prizes, perhaps my chief prize; but the story connected with it is one I seldom tell."

"I never saw its like," he went on.

"Probably not, my dear boy, and its like you never will see again."

"It looks like a skeleton hand."

"That's precisely what it is."

"Truly?"

"Certainly. Those are the bones of a human hand."

"Where did you buy it?"

"I didn't buy it; it was given to me—by the owner."

"The what?" he said, in a genuine surprise.

"The owner," I said. "A dead man gave it to me in payment for services rendered."

"A dead man! A Mahatma?"

"No, I think not," I answered. "But I am telling you the plain, unvarnished truth. If you want the story you shall have it; but I assure you beforehand, you will not believe a word I say. Nobody would or ever could believe it, so I have kept the matter to myself for fear of being dubbed a fool."

He took it up and examined it carefully.

"That's real bone, I should say," he soliloquised. "It's a coarse, hard, big hand; and the man who owned it was a——"

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"A thief," I broke in.

"You are very observing, Stephen; and your description of the man does you credit. When he gave it to me the several bones dropped apart, of course; but I had them carefully mounted, as you see, and it is one of my most sacred souvenirs."

He insisted on my telling him the details of the incident, which I did, not wholly without reluctance, because it deals with what is commonly regarded as the impossible. I couldn't blame him for discrediting my statements, neither can I blame you if you follow his example and shrug your shoulders.

"In October, '89, I roamed through parts of southern Europe bordering on the Adriatic, and never visited by tourists. I was on foot most of the time, for it gave me leisure to see the country and to study. I passed through Herzegovina and Montenegro, and got well down to the borders of Albani, which is close to Greece, and, being very tired, planted myself in a wretched inn in Parga. The hills at the back of the village are infested by brigands who are very gentlemanly and very savage. They treat you with the utmost respect until they've got your last penny, and then send you to glory with a bullet in your brain. I had been warned, however, and managed to avoid the friendly attentions of these rogues.

"If you want to find the climate of Paradise, go to Albania in October. Right before you lie the placid, deep-blue waters of the Mediterranean. Above you is a sky with such a depth of colour as your eyes never beheld. It seems to bend over you in confidential friendliness. And as for the fields and mountain sides—— But, bless me, what's the use in trying to paint the picture? It can't be done. And the nights—the October nights! I never saw such stars—cohorts, legions of them vieing with one another in brilliancy. Not a cloud to be seen; only that vast expanse of blinking gems.

"Well, just outside the village limits is a graveyard. It's not much, but it's antique and quaint. I used to wander through its paths, and wonder how men could die with such a beautiful place to live in.

"They told me that a famous brigand had been buried in one corner of this little God's-acre, and I had a morbid curiosity to find his grave. It was not difficult; and one evening I sat on the sod that covered him, and indulged in the moody thoughts to which the occasion gave rise. Perhaps I had been there half-an-hour—the latter part of the time with closed eyes.

"Suddenly I heard a strange rattling of bones at my side. Opening my eyes, and turning my head, I saw, sitting close to my side, a skeleton.

"'Good-evening, signor,' said the bony jaw.

"You know I pride myself on my Italian, so I returned his salutation; but, I admit, with a strong, creeping feeling, which was about as close to fear as I care to come.

"'I live down there,' he said, pointing to the grave.

"'So I judge from your looks,' I replied.

"'I have been dead,' he went on—'let me see—it's forty years now.'

"'Fully as much as that,' I remarked, as I called his attention to the fact that there was no flesh on his bones.

"'I am, indeed, terribly wasted,' he said with a sigh; 'but they are all so. The waters are close, and there's no fresh air. I was once as plump and round as you are. And now see!' He shook his arm, and its joints made a very unpleasant, grating sound, like the opening of a door with rusty hinges.

"Then I half rose, thinking I had had quite enough for one evening; but he placed his left hand on my arm, and said:

"'Sit still, signor. I have something to say—a secret to divulge. You can help me. Will you?'

"I professed myself entirely at his service.

"'You know who I am?' he asked.

"'I have not that honour.'

"'Did you never hear of Antonio Berotti?'

"'What! The famous old rascal—the terror of all the country round—the bandit?' I exclaimed.

"'The same,' he replied; and something like a smile wreathed his fleshless mouth.

"He was evidently gratified at my knowledge of his career.

"'Well, what of him?' I asked.

"'I am Antonio;' and as he uttered the words he fairly chuckled. 'Yes, I am Antonio, and there has been no brigand since to compare with me. The fellows nowadays are all apprentices. They never learnt the profession; they bungle. But, bless you, signor, you should have seen me in my palmy days. Why, the girls were all in love with me. I could have taken my pick of the lot. And as for the men—well they grew pale when they heard I was coming down from the mountains. See that high cliff yonder? How it stands out against the sky! That was my home. I had many a happy year up there, and many are the pretty lips I have kissed—the prettiest in all the country. Lack a day, but I'm dead now, and I don't believe they would like me in this guise. It's a great burden to be dead, signor. Allow me to say I don't like it.'

"I intimated that I had no personal knowledge on the subject; but had no doubt, judging from appearances, that he was a good authority.

"'Now to the point,' he said, with some degree of impatience. 'I order you to go to——'

"'Order me?' I asked, rather irritated at the imperious manner he assumed.

"'I beg your pardon, signor,' he instantly responded. 'If I were in the mountains, as in the old days, I should use those very words, and if you failed to obey, your head would pay the forfeit. But now'—and there was a sigh in the air—'now I am only a dead lion. I plead with you, therefore, and most humbly beg you to——'

"'Go on,' I said. 'I will do what I can to serve you. But I am an Englishman, and not accustomed to being ordered by anyone.'

"'And you have no bandits in your country?' he asked, with a surprised tone.

"'Well, no professional bandits,' I answered. 'We have, however, a large number of company promoters who exercise your functions.'

"'Ah, what an unhappy country for an enterprising man to live in. I don't wonder that you have come to dear Albania.'

"'Are you an enthusiast in your profession?' I remarked.

"'I am, indeed,' he replied. 'But to return to my request. I am anxious just now that you should find the widow Borosi. I have an important communication for her.'

"'Ah, I see! There's a woman; it's always a woman. Can't you get along without these dallyings, Antonio, now that you are in your grave?'

"'You mistake—you mistake, signor. The moment you see her you will understand that there is no love in the case. Why, she is cross-eyed, and has the temper of a walrus. You do not compliment my taste.'

Digitized by Google

"I saw that he was really offended, and I hastened to apologise.

"'This is my story,' said the brigand, who was easily mollified. 'Just before I was——'

"'Killed?' I suggested.

"'Quite right. It's an ugly fact, and I don't like to recall it, but as we are talking confidentially, I may as well say "killed." Well, just before that event occurred, I made a raid with my band on the villagers. It became necessary, in the course of the scrimmage, to put a stiletto into Pietro, the woman's husband. That is to say he had a large sum of money in the house, and very unreasonably refused to give it up. I tried all proper arguments, but somehow he wasn't convinced. Some people—a brigand, perhaps, notices that more than the layman, because his opportunities for observing human nature are greater—some people part with their cash very reluctantly. I didn't want to do Pietro any injury; but, to tell the truth, it couldn't be helped. I had only half-an-hour to spare for the job, and was naturally in a hurry to get through with it, and out of the way of the officers, who were not friendly to me. So I made a pass at the old man, and he went down. The woman behaved in the most frightfully unbecoming manner. She wailed, and moaned, and screamed. I rebuked her tenderly, but she was deaf to my words.

"'Well, her son—unfortunately he was her only son—broke in on us, and was inclined to be violent. I rather liked the boy, but he was altogether imprudent in getting mixed up in the affair. If he had simply attended to his father all might have been well. But he rashly produced his blade, and that angered me. He even succeeded in making a flesh-wound on my left arm. I'll show it to you, signor, for he was a brave boy. See! Ah, I beg your pardon; it's no longer on my left arm. I forgot. However, the upshot of the business was that I was forced to kill the son, too. I was sorry; but business is business, and must be attended to.

"'I took the money, and I got away; but, for some unaccountable reason, that woman's voice haunted me. I heard it at the most inopportune times. I would come home tired and worn out by a little excursion, and I couldn't sleep. A sort of chronic insomnia attacked me, and I became very uncomfortable. I used to reason with myself. What are a couple of men, more or less, I argued, in a great world like this? They were honest fellows, and doubtless went to Heaven. They had, therefore, nothing to complain of. But it did no good; my sleep was gone. I couldn't understand it; but there was the fact.

"'The woman was impoverished! I took everything she had. What of it? The world is full of poor people, and every merchant takes all he can get, doesn't he? Isn't that the policy of all commercial transactions? I was neither better nor worse than other men who are profoundly respected, and yet—will you believe it?—I couldn't get my usual sleep.

"'A month after this affair I got badly caught. My nervous system was overtaxed. I had done too much work, and here I am. The Borosi money I never used. I had an aversion to it; so I hid it in a secure place. I want you to find it, for this insomnia pursues me even into the grave. Everyone else in the churchyard enjoys his slumbers; but I wake up with a start, and am terribly lonely.

"'Now I'll tell you where the bag of gold is concealed, and I pray you to find it and deliver it to the old woman; after that I hope to have a good rest. Signor, on your honour, will you do me this favour?'

"I gave the required promise.

"On my return to the hostelry I found the proprietor ready to retire, and, therefore, anxiously awaiting me. He yawned, complained of the lateness of the hour, and suggested that all honest people had been in bed a full couple of hours.

"He went before me to my room, and deposited the candle on a quaint old washstand. As he was taking his leave, I said casually:

"'Did you ever hear of Antonio Berotti?'

"He dropped into a chair and stared at me.

"'The—the——' he began.

"'Yes, precisely; the brigand.'

"'I have heard of him—that, is, I have heard the villagers speak of him,' he answered.

"'Killed, wasn't he?'

"'Yes, yes, killed by a stray bullet from a gendarme.'

"'Where was he buried?'

"'In the north-east corner of the churchyard yonder.'

"'Did you ever see him?' I ventured to ask.

"He hesitated and his eyes grew large.

"'I see,' I said; 'I see, old man. You were one of the band in your younger days, eh?'

"'For the Holy Virgin's sake——'

"'Oh, of course! I keep secrets very well. I only wanted to satisfy my curiosity. Good-night, and pleasant dreams.'

"The next day I went to find the bag of gold.

"I never had so much difficulty in following a clue in my life. You see, forty years make a difference even in Albania.

"Two miles east of the village, I ran at last into a forest road.

"Then I saw that I was getting on famously. Right ahead of me was the mountain spur, which was my most important landmark. I was to get to a position which would bring a deep gulch in line with the bald head of this spur. It took two hours of hard climbing, but I did it. So far, so good.

"Ten rods to the right of that spot I was to find a boulder. All right; there it was, and I began to feel rather jubilant. From the boulder I was to travel just a point west of north for sixty paces, and I should come across an old gnarled beech. That was the terminus of my journey. I could be sure that the beech was the right tree, because, if I put my back against it, compass in hand, I could see the southern ledge of the mountain-spur projecting over the chasm, as though some giant had crawled on hands and knees to the edge, and was looking over.

"But there was no gnarled beech in sight, only a huge stump. However, I followed the directions, looked at my compass, and then raised my head. There, right ahead of me, was the ledge, sure enough. Where was the tree, though? I rambled about in search of it, but could find nothing. By that time I was pretty nearly tired, and heartily wished that the skeleton of Antonio had chosen someone else to do his will. I sat down by the side of the stump, lit a cigar, and began to think. Forty years ago! Well, even trees grow old in that time, and perhaps this one had been cut down and used for firewood long ago.

"I noticed that the stump was hollow. As a mere act of curiosity, I thrust my hand in up to my arm-pit, and began to fumble about. I touched something—a stone, probably, I thought; but what in the world was it doing there, and how did it get there? I drew it out. It was a gold piece. I had struck the treasure by accident. I thrust my hand in a second time, and drew out the tattered, decayed remnants of a leather pouch. The next time I got hold of a handful of gold—ten pieces. I was evidently in luck. Well, there were sixty-five of them in all, and they represented the savings of I don't know how many years on the part of poor Borosi and his wife. I concealed them carefully, and went home with the feeling that the old skeleton had good cause to congratulate me.

Digitized by Google

"The next morning I roamed through the bazaar and bought a big leather purse, evidently the counterpart of the one that had rotted, and then started to find my widow. That was not very difficult, for I found that her name was still Borosi. She had never married in all these years. That struck me as strange, for when I entered her poor little cottage, she was a comely old creature of seventy-eight, and at thirty-eight she must have been worthy the attention of some enterprising man. But women have all sorts of oddities, and I was too much interested in other matters to ask impertinent questions.

"'My good woman,' I said by way of introduction, 'are you married?'

"She shook her head.

"'How long since your husband Pietro died?'

"'Oh, so long, I can hardly remember.' She rocked to and fro in her chair.

"'And your son?' I queried.

"'He died the same day,' she answered. 'But why do you ask, signor?'

"'Because I am an acquaintance of Antonio Berotti,' I said.

"The effect of my words was electrical. The past came out of its obscurity, and was a vivid, living present. She shuddered—buried her face in her hands.

"'My all!' she cried. 'My dear ones the good God permitted them to die. I was left alone. All we had was taken.'

"'Yes,' I said, 'I know the whole story. Antonio told it to me.'

"'But he is in the churchyard,' she muttered. 'He, too, is dead. God forgive him his crime and the misery he caused.'

"'He never spent the money,' I suggested.

"'I do not know. I only know he took it.'

"'And he asked me to bring it to you.'

"With that I laid the pouch on the table and rose to go.

"'What does it mean?' she asked, thoroughly startled and frightened.

"'I don't know what it means, any more than you do,' I replied. 'There is the money, however. The very same gold pieces which Antonio took. Please to count them and see that the amount is correct.'

"She took them one by one, and strange reminiscences chased each other through her mind. It was a pathetic scene. She trembled in every limb, and her eyes were filled with tears.

"'They are all there,' she said sadly. 'All there, just the same as forty years ago. Oh, what a day that was! I have been an old woman ever since. My husband and my son! Alas!'

"But I couldn't stand it, so I hastily left the house, and I half believe she thought I was a ghost. I came so suddenly, had so strange an appearance—possibly she had never seen a foreigner before—and disappeared quickly. At any rate, she had the money, and my mission was pretty nearly at an end.

"At ten o'clock the following night—it was as dark as a pocket, by the way, and I ran into half-a-dozen head-stones—I was seated once more on Antonio's grave.

"He was a long time coming, but just as I was giving it all up for that night I heard the old rattling of bones, and there he was close by my side. He was evidently in a good mood, for he chuckled as well as he could under the circumstances.

"'Well, signor?' he asked.

"'It's all right,' I said.

"'You found the tree?'

"'Yes—or rather the stump—for the tree fell long ago.'

"'Ah, yes; I forgot that,' he muttered. 'It was very careless of me. But, you see, I don't mingle with the world much, and can't get round in the daytime to see how things are going.'

"'There were sixty-five pieces,' I said.

"'That's the number. And you gave them to old Borosi?'

"'I did.'

"'Good. A thousand thanks, signor. You have done me a great service. My insomnia is already relieved. I feel positively drowsy. My bed isn't exactly comfortable, but it'll do. I heartily wish I could give you some souvenir of my gratitude, but my quarters down below are scantily furnished, but I am very grateful. Good-bye, signor; good-bye. I will go down and take a nap. I need it, I can assure you.'

"With that he began to sink into the sod. When he was nearly out of sight I heard him say feebly:

"'A thousand thanks, good signor!' and he stretched out his hand.

"I took it; to my horror and dismay it came off at the wrist.

"I cried out quickly:

"'My dear fellow, you've lost your hand!'

"He replied sleepily:

"'It's of no sort of consequence. Keep it, if you will, and perhaps it will convince you that Antonio the Brigand did one good deed.'

"That is the hand, Stephen, and that is how I came by it."

E. W. Waters.

Digitized by Google

New Serial Story.

A TALE OF OLD FRANCE.

By MARY FERMOR.

SUMMARY.

AMAURY MONTRUEL, a knight, and Mahmoud-el-Reis, a Saracen, meet on the road to Paris. The former's mission is to kill the Queen of France; the latter's to kill the King. At the same time two children, Eric and Eve, are on their way to Paris to aid the Queen, and overhear the conversation of these two horsemen. Shortly afterwards a knight and his page give the children a lift on the road, and, on arriving in Paris, place them under the care of the Freemasons. Maître Samson is Montruel's secretary.

CHAPTER III.

THE KING OF THE BASOCHE.

As the sun was rising next morning over the still sleeping city, two men crossed one of the wooden bridges which then connected the two parts of Paris divided by the river Seine. They were returning from a night's carouse, and looked considerably stupefied after their hard drinking. One wore a long, close-fitting great coat and student's cap, beneath which were the cadaverous features of Montruel's secretary Maître Samson.

His companion was dressed as a knight, with a scholar's rusty gown thrown over his shoulders. His clothes were discoloured by smoke and stained with wine, but he carried himself with the air of a gentleman, and through all his shabbiness there were evident signs of better days. He was a tall, spare man of six-and-twenty, prematurely aged by dissipation, and his features wore a reckless expression. His threadbare cap rested on dark, bushy curls, he wore a dagger at his belt and, according to the fashion of his time, his long pointed shoes were tied up to his knees, only in his case the customary gold or silver chains were replaced by bits of cord.

This was Tristan de Pamiers, King of the Basoche,* at once the terror of the "town," and the glory of the "gown" in those early days.

The fresh morning air seemed to revive them, and suddenly Tristan stopped short before one of the low, wooden houses near Nôtre-Dame, saying, as he extended his hand tragically:

"That's it."

"What?"

"That's the abode of the prettiest girl in Paris."

Samson shrugged his shoulders contemptuously. Wine was his only mistress.

"I saw her yesterday at her window, but she ran away when she saw me looking. Ah, that glimpse was like a sight of Venus herself, illuminating this dingy hole with her radiant beauty!"

"Are we going to talk business or not?" growled Samson.

Tristan took no heed of his words, but stood as if rooted to the spot, with his hands clasped on his heart, and his eyes raised to the closed window, half in ecstasy and half in jest, apostrophising his new divinity.

"You may stop here and play the fool by yourself, then. I'm going home," said his disgusted companion.

"Heart of stone!" sighed Tristan. Then, changing his tone, he continued: "Look here, you miserable wretch, what right have you to speak to me like that? It's your place to wait my pleasure and hold your tongue."

"I hold the purse," said Samson, rattling the coins in his pouch.

The student smiled. "So you do, friend," he replied, "and your purse is very useful, even though every decent feeling is dried up within you. Your crowns are good gold, and I excuse much in virtue of them. I will come another time to the shrine of my goddess. Now I am at your service."

They moved on, and the conversation took a serious turn. Samson began:

"Have you heard the news about Agnes the Fair? Montruel has given her the castle of Étampes and I saw her being carried there in a beautiful gilded litter last night."

"Why has he done that? I thought the king had only given it to him a short time ago?"

"She knew a secret, and that was the price of her silence."

"Is that the secret you know?" asked Tristan.

The wily Samson crept closer to him and whispered:

"I have a double secret, and I shall expect two castles as the price of my silence. I mean to be a lord before I am much older."

Tristan laughed heartily to the annoyance of his companion, but their attention was diverted by the sight of four men on the other side of the river carrying something that glittered in the sunlight.

"Heavens!" cried Tristan. "We were talking about a litter, and here comes a beauty."

Samson made no answer, but watched the approaching group with marked attention.

"Why don't you speak?"

"Your sight is better than mine, tell me if there is anyone in that litter," he said at last.

Tristan shaded his eyes with his hand, and looked intently.

*A name given to the law-students of Paris—in the middle ages—they were a somewhat turbulent and anything but law-abiding class.

Digitized by Google

"No, it is empty."

Meanwhile the men had reached the bank and were being ferried across to where the two friends were standing.

"You had better ask the bearers."

"It is certainly her litter," said Samsom in a low tone, "but why has it come back empty?"

"You had better ask the bearers."

He hesitated, for he recognised them as belonging to Montruel's secret service, men chosen by himself for their unscrupulousness and silence. However, upon second thoughts he asked as they passed:

"You are returning from the castle of Étampes, are you not?"

"No, Maître Samson, we did not get so far," answered the leader, adding with a malignant smile:

"As we were going through the forest we were attacked by some scoundrels who took a fancy to the lady's jewels."

"And what happened? Where is she?" faltered Samson.

"Oh, she's out of harm's way. She'll wear no more finery in this world," said the man callously as he moved on with the empty litter.

"Diable! if your secrets are like hers, my friend, perhaps you may not be allowed to take possession of your castles, either!" said Tristan to Samson with an uneasy laugh.

"Oh, I'll see to that. But now to work again. My noble master, Amaury Montruel, wishes you to organise a rising in the city shortly."

"That's quite easy."

"Yes, I know, but he wants something a little out of the common—not a mere students' fray with a few broken heads—but an organised movement to strike a decided blow."

"Against the King?"

"No, for the King."

"Well, explain yourself more clearly."

"You know that the Pope has sent a special Legate over here to preside at a great Council of Ecclesiastics who are to meet in a day or two to discuss this question of the King's two wives. Last night Philip Augustus went to the palace of Jean de Nesle, unattended save for this page Albret, and surprised all the great barons of France in the act of signing an agreement with the Papal Envoy to disclaim all allegiance to the King if he should persist in retaining Agnes de Méranie as his wife. At first the Duke of Burgundy, who was at the head of the conspiracy, tried to defy Philip and carry matters with a high hand, but he was glad to come to terms in the most humble manner when he found that his master had Cadocu, who was there too, and his Free-Lances at his back, for he knew that none of his men would hold the field for an hour against the Free-Lances and the King's body-guard combined. The result was that the would-be rebels found themselves practically prisoners in the hands of the king they were plotting to betray, and the Legate had the pleasure of seeing them all sign a fresh bond of fealty to Philip instead of becoming the tools of his Holiness.

"Well, that is all very well as far as it goes: but this Council will have a great effect on the minds of the citizens, and so we want the students to assemble in a body and decry Ingeburge as the real cause of all the disturbances of the Interdict, and the constant plots against the Crown which are springing up both outside and inside the Kingdom."

"But it's a lie. She is quite innocent of it all."

"That doesn't matter. If a lie is shouted by hundreds of voices, it carries far more weight than the truth spoken by a few."

The King of the Basoche thought for a moment. Then said:

"Montruel thinks he knows the students, and I know he doesn't. He wants them to tell the people a lie which will defame an innocent woman. Now these wild youngsters may have many vices——"

"Every vice," interrupted Samson.

"Well, every vice if you like; but they are younger than we are. They know Ingeburge was Queen first, that she is beautiful as well as unhappy, that the woman who ousted her is proud and insolent, and all their sympathies would go out to Queen Ingeburge, for their hearts are not dead yet!"

"Their hearts, indeed!" sneered Samson.

Tristan folded his arms and looked critically at his companion.

"You are not thirty yet, and you look like an old hag. You scoff like a fiend at the word 'heart,' at the idea of enthusiasm or chivalry. Have you quite forgotten that you were ever young?"

"Quite."

"Well, so much the worse for you, but I have not, and however low I may have sunk, I remember the time when I should have answered such a proposal as this with my dagger and not with my tongue."

As he said this, a flush of honest indignation overspread his features and restored to them some of the nobleness that they had lost for ever.

"Yes, I daresay you would have done that then, but what answer do you give now?" Samson again jingled the coins in his well-filled pouch as he asked this question, and the action took effect.

"Now," said Tristan, hanging his head, "I am nearly as base as you, and my heart only wakes up at long intervals to remind me of my lost honour; so I leave my dagger in its sheath while I treat with a knave, and if his offer is good enough—well—I take it."

Samson drew out of his pouch twenty-five gold crowns, which he counted out carefully on the ground, saying as he did so:

"We are not children, and although I don't sympathise with your high-flown ideas, I dare say there may be some truth in what you say about the students. The fact is, we never trusted to them, but to you, yourself—you understand?"

Digitized by Google

"But how can I raise a riot by myself?"

"You might get others to help you; our good students don't go about labelled——"

An unpleasant light seemed to dawn on Tristan's mind, but he still kept silence.

"You don't seem very sharp this morning," said Samson testily, "but look here, now you've got the money there's no going back!"

"Then speak plainly."

"Certainly. I'm not squeamish. All men look pretty much alike in the same clothes. Dress a beggar, or a thief, in a student's gown, and who's to know that he's not one? Eh?"

"But it's infamous!"

"That doesn't matter. The question is: Can it be done?"

"I think——" began the other unwillingly.

"If you won't undertake it, give me back the money and I'll find someone else."

Tristan put his hand into the pocket of his ragged hose, not to take out the crowns, but to defend them in case of violence.

"If you can do it," pursued his tempter, "hold out your hand and I'll give you twenty-five more crowns, and later on you shall have what you want to prepare and bribe the vagabonds."

The King of the Basoche hesitated for a few seconds, then, stamping his foot on the ground and growling something like an oath under his breath, he held out his hand.

This conversation took place under the shadow of Nôtre-Dame, then in process of erection, and during this period a curious drama of old city life was being enacted around it. Along the right bank of the Seine, where the soil was soft and swampy and easily affected by the slightest rise in the river, stood groups of miserable wooden hovels in an advanced state of ruin, for no one took the trouble to repair them, seeing that they were only serving as temporary dwellings for the workmen employed at the cathedral. In many of the larger buildings lodgings were let upon a principle very similar to that of our modern "rookeries," in others privacy could be secured by extra payment, but comfort was unknown in all.

In addition to the legitimate workmen there congregated a whole colony of loafers and vagabonds, of loud-tongued vendors of various wares, who drove a thriving trade among the masons, so that "The Enclosure," as it was called, was the centre of life and interest, the happy hunting-ground of thieves and beggars, and the haunt of all the idlers of the city.

On the left bank of the river stood handsomer buildings, churches, convents, and fortress-like palaces raised their varied spires and clock-towers in picturesque confusion among the poplars which lined the Seine.

While Tristan de Pamiers had been standing before the hut which he said contained "the prettiest girl in Paris," a man enveloped in a long cloak, with a peaked cap well pulled down over his face, had been watching his movements closely, and as soon as the King of the Basoche and Maître Samson had passed out of sight, he emerged from the shadow of the protecting buttress behind which he had been standing, and, raising his cap, showed the handsome features of Albret, the king's page.

"Samson," he said to himself, "the tool of that villain Amaury Montruel, in close confab with the King of the Basoche! That means some devilry! I wonder what Tristan was looking at up there? I don't see anything very interesting."

The rickety wooden shutters of the houses were still all closed. No sign of human life was visible in this usually bustling place, no human form was to be seen on the many scaffoldings, and the great outline of Nôtre-Dame stood out against the morning sky, vast and silent above him. The day's work had not yet begun.

Albret stood in something like despair alone in this strange scene. At last he said, almost petulantly:

"Well, it's no use wasting my time in this way. I have to find that pretty boy we met the other night on the road and take him to my master before the day is many hours older. How I'm to do it is another matter. Certes! how pretty he was! And his skin! Many a court beauty would give all she possessed for one like it. I never heard a boy with a voice like his either; I can hear it still, but I wish I could hear the original instead of the echo."

While he was debating how he should set about his search he heard a rattling noise above him, and saw the shutters of a small window in the house opposite pushed open, and the face of a young girl appear in the dusky frame.

Albret stood stupefied. "I must be dreaming," he muttered. "It is, and yet it can't be! But I never saw such a marvellous resemblance. It must be his twin sister or else I made a mistake in the darkness. There can't be two faces like that!"

He drew back behind a stack of timber, and the girl, wholly unconscious of his presence, was looking at the strange scene around her with the rays of the rising sun playing among her golden curls, and her heavy downcast lashes shading her blue eyes from the strong light. She had evidently just got up, and was not yet fully dressed; but, emboldened by the apparent solitude, she leant out of the window with her elbow on the sill, drinking in the fresh morning air.

Albret's perplexity soon took the form of sweet certainty that, whoever she might be, this girl was one who appealed to him in a way that no woman had ever done before. He tried to laugh himself out of the conviction, but it was no use; and with the realisation of his own interest in the fair unknown, came the hideous thought that perhaps Tristan had also discovered her whereabouts! The King's commission was forgotten in the sweet contemplation of her whom he already called his love. In a few moments the vision vanished, the girl was called away by someone within, and Albret still stood disconsolately gazing at the empty window-frame.

She was kneeling beside the old man.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER IV.

Little Adam Finds a Friend.

When Eric and his sister Eve left the kindly shelter afforded to them on the night of their arrival by the Freemasons, they were directed to go to the house of one, Maître Thomas, with whom lodged old Christian the Dane, and where they would be able to obtain a separate room for Eve. It was at the window of this tiny compartment, called by courtesy a bed-room, that Albret had seen her, and it was the knocking of her brother and Christian at the door that had cut short her reflections and the page's love-dream.

A few moments later she was kneeling beside the old man, while Eric recounted to him the events which had led up to and had happened on their journey. Their old countryman did not hold out much hope of their being able to do any good by their presence in the city.

"But surely our dear Princess Angel is not dead?" asked Eve in an earnest tone, using the quaint Danish form of the name they loved so well.

"God forbid!" replied the old man gravely. "But you will not be allowed to see her. Though I was one of her attendants who came with her from our Northern home, I have not been permitted to enter the abbey, where she is confined, for the last five months. The guards drive me away, though I have begged them on my knees to admit me. The only answer I get is the crossing of their halberds and the swinging of the massive gate in my face. Such are the King's orders."

"How cruel he must be!" said the girl bitterly.

"No, he is bewitched by that gipsy he has pretended to marry!"

His two young hearers turned a shade paler with horror, and the old man went on, as if to himself.

"No, the King is not cruel. I believe he would have loved Ingeburge, for the first time he saw her he was struck by her sweetness and beauty. But the very day before the wedding, that bold, scheming, evil-eyed Hungarian had a long interview with him, and from that hour the troubles of France began. Berthoud de Méran brought a gold medallion containing the portrait of his daughter, and the King wore it round his neck even when he went to the altar."

"When he married Princess Angel?"

"Yes, even then. And many a sign was sent to warn men of coming disaster, signs in the sky, in the air, and on the earth; but no one heeded them. All through the service I saw this Berthoud looking at our Princess with an evil expression, and the King was so ill at ease that his answers could hardly be heard by those standing nearest to him.

"After the ceremony Philip Augustus withdrew to the palace with Berthoud de Méran and Amaury Montruel, who has since been his chief favourite, while the newly wedded bride was taken straight from the church to the Abbey St. Martin, where she has been shut up ever since. Shortly afterwards Agnes de Méranie joined her father in the city, and the unholy alliance was entered into between her and the King. Now the Pope has laid the kingdom under an interdict, and sent a legate here to compel the King to obey the church on pain of losing the allegiance of his barons."

"I have no doubt it will be very hard for us to see the Queen, but you must not discourage us too much, Christian," said Eve. "We have found one friend already, you know."

"Who's that?"

"The knight Dieudonné, who brought us into the city."

"I never heard of a French knight of that name," said the old man incredulously.

Felt himself firmly seized by the collar.

"Well, there is one, and he must be a man of some importance," put in Eric, "for he told me to go to Bishop Maurice de Sully, and ask him to give me work on the cathedral. The moment I mentioned the knight's name, the bishop told me I should be taken on at once, and I was to go to the overseer this morning. It is nearly time to start."

As he finished speaking the great bell clanged out the stroke of half-past six, and the men swarmed like ants out of the surrounding huts, each bearing his hammer and trowel ready for the day's work. The booths were opened, fires were lighted to prepare the men's food, hawkers began to cry their wares in the harsh, strident voice peculiar to their class, men went about carrying wine in large cans, from which they doled it out to customers in leaden mugs, and announced their whereabouts by jingling a bell that might be heard even above the turmoil.

Among the crowd of whining beggars, two were especially worthy of remark. They rejoiced in the names of Ezekiel and Tréfoulloux, and were familiar figures in the inclosure. Begging, even in those early days was a trade that made great demands upon the ingenuity of its followers in order to gain a hearing from the public, and competition ran so high under the walls of Nôtre-Dame that an ordinary cripple had no chance of making the poorest living. Therefore Ezekiel, who was of an inventive turn of mind, had folded his legs back under his body something like those of a trussed fowl, then he had twisted his arms almost out of their sockets, and, with the aid of red ochre, had embellished his temples with a long gaping gash. He wailed thus to the passers-by:

"Look, good Christians, here is a man who has lost both legs while fighting against the infidels, who has had his arms twisted with heathenish instruments of torture, and his head cloven with a Syrian's scimitar! He was left for dead on the sandy desert, and lay there two whole weeks without a soul to care for him. Have compassion, and save your own souls by succouring a martyr for the Faith."

Digitized by Google

Tréfouilloux, who in some respects excelled his brother in misfortune, had painted what looked like a big ulcer on his left breast, and so realistic was the work that the credulous observer fancied he could see the gangrene forming and eating away the wasted flesh. He bared his chest for the consideration of half a farthing, and invited the charitable to come and study his anatomy through this gruesome hole, assuring them that it was their last chance, as he could have but one more day to live before the poison of the boar's tusk completed its deadly work. And yet with all these attractions they barely earnt enough to buy paint, let alone food. All the profits were carried off by a huge woman, known as "Poor Louise," who was stretched out on a dirty heap of straw exhibiting four arms, one of which terminated in a goat's hoof.

Albret was still watching the deserted window when Christian, Eric, and Eve, wearing her boy's costume, came out of the house. He was in the act of going up to speak to them when Tristan de Pamiers, who had returned alone to the enclosure, thrust himself before Eve and asked rudely:

"How, now, my beauty, I should like to know what this masquerading means? Why do you hide the daintiest figure in the world under an ugly workman's blouse?"

Eric stepped forward, and, raising his hammer threateningly, said:

"He's only a child, master, you'd better wait till he's a man before you insult him."

The crowd closed in, expecting a row, and as Tristan laid his hand on his dagger to punish Eric's presumption, he felt himself firmly seized by the collar and dragged back a few paces.

"Who dares to lay hand on the King of the Basoche?" he said, trying to turn round. His wrath subsided a little when he recognised Albret, his former friend.

"Oh, I didn't expect to see you here, comrade! But never mind. I only know two good ways of welcoming an old friend. One is with the clinking of glasses and the other with the crossing of swords. So draw, my friend! I prefer your sword to the hammer of this churl."

The page did not attempt to draw his weapon, but stood contemptuously measuring his would-be antagonist.

"My glass shall never touch yours again, Tristan de Pamiers! As for my sword, that's another matter, but there's an old score to be paid first. How about the sums of money I've lent you in the old days?"

His cutting tone roused the other's pride for a moment, and, thrusting his hand into his pocket, he drew out a handful of gold crowns and held them out towards Albret; but the sight of the coveted gold made him regret his good impulse, and in another moment he had drawn back his hand, saying, with a forced laugh:

"The deuce take your old debts! Can't you trust me, Albret?"

"No, I cannot trust you," was the calm reply.

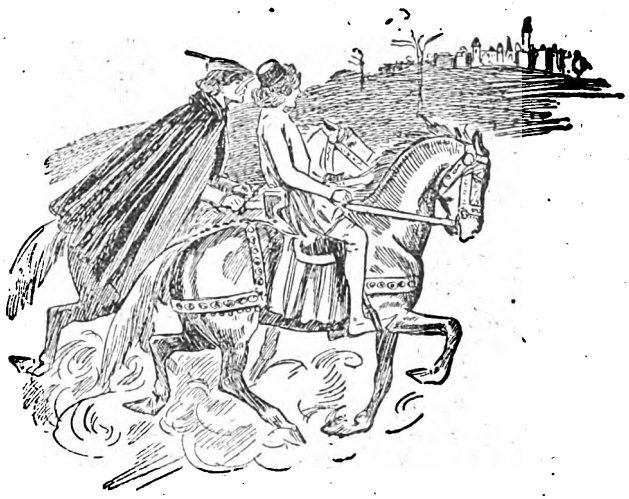
"All right, then," said the student insolently, as he repocketed the money. "You'll not have the honour of trying your strength with me this morning. I don't confer favours for nothing, and," he added with a frown, "this gold has been too hardly earnt to be parted with in a hurry."

With that he turned away amid the jeers of the crowd, and fought his way through the seething, unsavoury mass of human beings in no good mood either with himself or the world in general.

The three whose advent had unwittingly caused this quarrel had been standing by fearful of the result. Eric promptly expressed his deep gratitude for the page's timely intervention, and though Eve said little, her eyes were eloquent in their acknowledgment of her champion. In a few words Albret explained that he was commissioned to escort Little Adam to the presence of his master, the King. Old Christian looked dubiously at the young man, but dare not question him, and Eric was at no pains to conceal his anxiety for his sister's safety when he heard that he was not to be allowed to accompany her.

Only Eve herself seemed to have no fear, and her voice was quite steady when she said:

"I am ready to go with you, sir."



Albret and Eve were riding quickly.

After a hurried leave-taking they separated, Eve accompanying the royal page, who piloted her carefully through the gaping crowd to where he had horses in readiness for them, and the two men, with sad, anxious hearts to begin their day's work at the cathedral.

Ezekiel and Tréfouilloux resumed their piteous appeals when this little excitement had subsided, and their perseverance met with some reward, for, as a country bumpkin was stooping down to look at the painted wound, the dying possessor thereof managed to steal his purse in addition to the coin which had been duly paid for the wonderful sight.

Ezekiel, who had not been so lucky, now bent forward, and putting one of his twisted arms on his friend's shoulder, said:

"Come now, go shares, or I'll call the fool back!"

Tréfouilloux felt the injustice of the claim, but there was no appeal, so he complied with as good a grace as he could, and a couple of hours later these two sufferers were hopelessly intoxicated in a neighbouring wine-cellar.

Albret and Eve were meanwhile riding quickly in the direction of the Porte St. Honoré, and for some minutes neither spoke. He cast many a tender, furtive glance at his fair companion, but she seemed too busy with her thoughts to notice him.

"Sir," she said at last. "Are you not the page of the knight Dieudonné?"

"Yes, Maître Adam. I have that honour," he answered with a smile.

"And the knight Dieudonné is, I suppose, a servant of the King?"

"You are right again. The King has no more faithful follower."

After a moment's thought she began again:

"Sir Page, could you not manage to let me see the knight Dieudonné before I see the King?"

There was a note of plaintive entreaty in her voice that went straight to Albret's heart, but he could not promise an impossibility, so he said gently:

"You shall see them together, Little Adam."

When they had passed the gate, and were riding away from the city, he suddenly pulled up his horse and said, with his hand on her bridal:

Digitized by Google

"Do you recognise this place, Little Adam?"

They were in an avenue of young elm trees, and as she looked round her she saw the city behind them, and the dark towers of the Louvre standing out against the sky in front, while on either side the rich wooded fields stretched far and wide in the beauty of early spring, but it all seemed strange to her.

"No, sir; I don't think I have ever been here before."

"It was night, and you were half dead with weariness and pain; but surely you have not forgotten your ride into Paris so soon?"

"What? Was it here we met you and the knight?" she asked eagerly, with sparkling eyes.

Albret looked at her, his own eyes seeming to take fire from hers, and, with the proverbial indiscrimination of a lover, thought her as lovely in her poor apprentice's dress as if she had worn all the splendours of a court costume.

"Yes," he said, "it was here I helped you on to my horse and saw your sweet, fair face for the first time. It was here," and his dark eyes grew more eloquent, "that I guessed your secret."

Poor Eve was completely thrown off her guard by this sudden turn of the conversation, and now she almost reeled in her saddle.

"What do you mean?" she faltered.

"Look into my eyes before you turn from me in fear," he pleaded. "I know you are no boy! You are a woman, and I love you—only look at me and tell me if you think you could love me in return."

The more he pleaded the more she lowered her eyes in timid perplexity, till at last he said:

"Perhaps you have left a lover in your distant home?"

"Oh no," she whispered, but so low that he could hardly catch the words.

"Then listen," he went on with a bright, winning smile. "I believe it is destiny, for they tell me that you are the foster-sister of Queen Ingeburge."

"The brother," she corrected.

"Will you not at least trust me that far?" he asked reproachfully, "for you cannot deceive me; and even if you reject my love, I would still be your friend and hers. The knowledge that you left home and kindred to come and help the poor Queen makes you, if possible, more dear to me."

"And do you really love our Princess Angel?" she asked, forgetting all caution.

"If my life would serve her, I would give it gladly?"

"And yet you are a Frenchman; you don't know her as we do?"

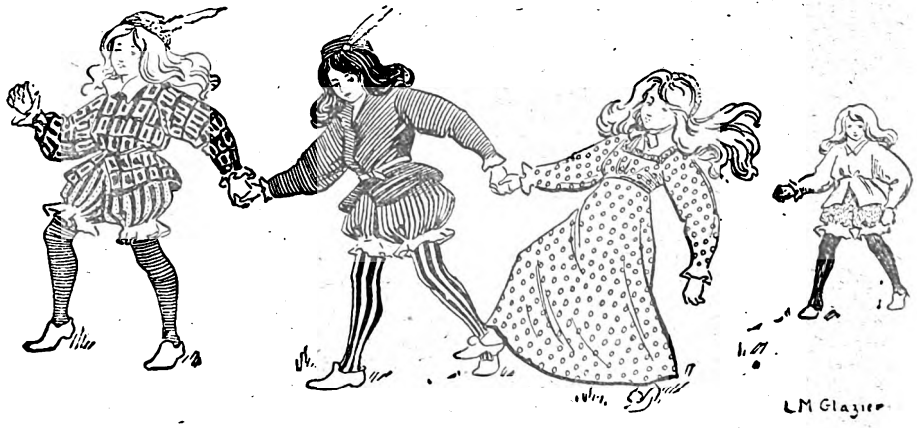
"I know that she suffers, and that she is noble and pure."

Eve held out her hand to him in an ecstasy of delight.

"How can I ever thank you for those words! They have made my heart much lighter than it has been for many a long day. I know now that she has one more faithful friend in this great, cruel city, and as her friend I will trust you. You are right, I am a girl; but Eric made me wear this dress to protect me from annoyance on the journey. I am sure you are noble and good, I do trust you, and—" she added shyly, "I think—I could learn to love—you."

In her own mind she was not sure that she did not do so already.

(To be continued.)



Digitized by Google

A Note and a Telegram.

When I left the train at Elmwood and found that no one was there to meet me, I was surprised. I made inquiry of the porter.

"Wasn't Mr. Torrington's carriage here to meet this train?" I asked.

The man shook his head.

"It was down for the three o'clock," he replied. "Took a gentleman off."

This announcement served to increase my perplexity. Here I, having been formally invited to a house and having formally accepted, was compelled to make my way thither in a public conveyance, while another had been met at the station and carried off in comfort. Over this unusual condition of affairs I puzzled my brain on the drive out to Torrington's. The discomfort of my position was not lessened by the fact that the dinner-hour was rapidly approaching, and that I was hungry. But at length we rattled through the gates and up the drive to the house.

Maria Torrington greeted me at the door, and it struck me that there was confusion in her tone.

"I'm very glad to see you," she said; "it's a surprise, indeed."

"Surprise?" I said. "You knew I was coming."

"Er—yes," she murmured hesitatingly. "But it's so late we'd given you up. You must hurry for dinner. Hobson, show Mr. Bottomley his room."

Here a tall figure loomed out of the darkness into the foreground, and before I could follow the servant who had taken my bag, my hand was seized, and a heavy voice said:

"Hello, old man! Glad to see you!"

"Why, hello, Brooks!" I exclaimed. "I'm glad to see you."

Glad to see the man with whom I had been racing for two years for the fair prize, Maria! When I was alone, I stamped the floor vigorously, and tore open my bag with such violence as to send the contents scattering. This thing was getting unpleasant. I found it hard to forgive her for asking Dick Brooks and myself at the same time, and driving him home in triumph, while I was left to take a fly.

I was angry—so angry that I went down to dinner with tan shoes on, and when I finally entered the drawing-room the family awaiting me, I remembered that I had forgotten to brush my hair, and was conscious that it was all standing out at the back. It seemed that, flustered and dishevelled, I was making a very poor show in comparison with the immaculate Brooks.

"I am very glad to see you," said Mrs. Torrington cordially. "It's a special pleasure, as we understood you weren't——"

Maria glanced sharply at her mother, and the kindly woman stopped, flushed, and added:

"As we were afraid you weren't coming."

During the dinner several remarks were made which indicated surprise at my presence, and I mentally vowed to have an explanation from Maria. After dinner I succeeded in inducing her to walk on the lawn.

"Now tell me why there is all this surprise on the part of you and your family," I said, when we were out of hearing.

"I think we had cause to be surprised," she said coldly.

"Cause?" I cried. "I received a note from your mother on Thursday asking me down for to-day. I accepted."

"You declined," she said, in a tone that brooked no contradiction, "and so I telegraphed to Dick to come down. See what a position you placed me in. I couldn't let him know he was second fiddle."

We had stopped walking, and she stood facing me in the light of a window. Her glance was one of deep reproach. "We are always glad to have you, as you know, but this time it is just a little embarrassing."

Digitized by Google

"But I accepted," I maintained stoutly.

"Your note said plainly, 'I regret that another engagement prevents my——'"

I broke into a hearty laugh.

"What are you laughing about? I don't see anything particularly amusing."

"Why, Maria," I said, "it was my fault, and until this minute it never occurred to me. I got your mother's note on Thursday. I had an engagement to meet a lawyer late this afternoon to try to settle a case I am concerned in. As I couldn't attend to the business and catch the train in time to get here to dinner, I determined to try and postpone the matter. So I wrote two notes—one accepting, the other declining the invitation, to be used according to success or failure. I took them both up to town next day, and as the attorney consented to my postponing the interview, I posted the acceptance."

"You mean you got them mixed and sent the wrong one," she said. A half smile lighted her face for an instant, to give place to a settled look of displeasure.

She turned sharply, and, carrying herself with exaggerated erectness, entered the house, I following crestfallen at her heels.

The next morning I could see that Brooks was trying to get Maria by herself, and at last he succeeded. They strolled in the direction of the pond.

For a time I chafed in the library, but my feelings proved too much for me, and I went out.

My steps carried me in the direction of a pond, over a stretch of lawn, through a grove, till I halted at the sight of two hats protruding over the top of a bush a few yards away.

"Maria," I heard Brooks say in earnest tones, "I have waited now for a year for an answer. Sometimes my hopes——"

I whistled to the collie that had been bounding along near by, and when Maria Torrington and her companion stepped hurriedly into view I cried: "Hello!"

For a moment all of us must have looked foolish. The silence was broken by the girl. She had completely recovered her composure, and, fixing her eyes on me, said: "Harry, as you have doubtless heard, Dick—Mr. Brooks—has just asked me to marry him."

"Asked for the thousandth time," muttered Brooks sheepishly.

I could not hide a smile at his embarrassment, but my amusement was of short life.

"And you have also asked me," Maria Torrington went on, with a coolness that astounded me.

"Yes," I said stupidly, "asked you frequently."

"I like you both very much," she said, fixing her eyes on Brooks, who was fumbling his stick among the leaves.

It hardly seemed fair that she should look so kindly on my rival, so I called her eyes back to me by asking: "Can't you choose between us?"

"No," she replied, after a moment of thoughtful silence. "I've tried very hard, but I can't. A plan of choosing was suggested to me by your unexpected coming."

We waited for her to continue.

"There is an old saying about marriage being a lottery. I propose to increase the chances. If you two consent, I shall carry out at once the scheme that I have evolved after carefully thinking."

"Are we to toss a penny?" I asked.

"No. This afternoon I shall write two notes, one an acceptance, the other a refusal. They will be put into plain envelopes, mixed up, directed and posted. You will both know by to-morrow morning."

There was a long silence, and then Maria looked from one to the other of us and said earnestly: "You'll agree to my plan, won't you?"

"There is nothing else we can do," said I.

"Nothing," repeated Brooks.

The scheme rather appealed to me, for of late things had not been going so smoothly as I could have desired. It had seemed at times as though Brooks was drawing away from me in the race. Now a chance had been offered. Once for all the question would be settled. My luck was usually good. The plan was not so agreeable to my rival. Doubtless he felt that he had the advantage of me, and in entering into such a scheme was gambling to obtain what was already almost his own. He had no other course but to assent, though, and he did it with rather bad grace.

I was up early next morning at my rooms in town. I had calculated everything to a nicety. The postman would reach the house at 8.10 o'clock; the train for Elmwood left at nine o'clock. Provided the contents of the note that I expected were satisfactory, I would just have time to breakfast and reach the station. Should the note prove to be wrong, I certainly would not need any breakfast, and much less to catch a train.

The chances seemed all in my favour now.

Having brought myself to a state of comparative confidence, I began to pack a couple of bags full of clothes, for I had made up my mind to make a long stay at the Torrington house while I was about it. As I stuffed my golf things into a portmanteau, I pictured to myself the splendid time I would have with Maria.

A loud knock at the door called me back to realities, and when I received a square envelope addressed in a small, angular hand I realised that perhaps, after all, my joy had been premature. The note was brief, so brief that in an instant I comprehended its contents, sank into a chair, and, tossing the paper from me, repeated the fatal words:

"Miss Torrington regrets that owing to another engagement she cannot accept Mr. Blank's kind invitation to become his wife."

Why had I ever consented to risk all on a mere throw of the dice? Why—but no speculation could alter it now; I would go abroad. I would exile myself rather than witness one minute of his triumph. I would take the very next steamer——

No! After all it would but add to the satisfaction of my rival to have me eating my heart out in some foreign city. Far better to stay where I was, to work and become famous, to bring home to the girl a full sense of what she had lost by her foolish lottery.

Would a true-hearted girl—a girl worth having—have played with a man's love as she had done? She was a flirt—a confirmed flirt! How lucky was I in getting the wrong note! How fortunate!

I sprang from my chair and danced round the room, singing a snatch from a song. A bag, half packed for the journey, caught my eye, and in a frenzy of joy I kicked it and sent the contents flying over the floor.

A knock at the door interrupted the celebration of my good fortune. It was the servant with a telegram.

I opened it and read:

"Dreadful mistake. Letters got mixed. Sent you wrong note. Come to me.—Maria."

Wilson James.

Digitized by Google

His Excellency the Fool.

FROM THE GERMAN OF HUGO KLEIN.

Ha, ha, ha! Ho, ho, ho! Even the King laughed until the tears ran down his cheeks, while his courtiers, from the general in command of his Majesty's troops down to little Biberitz, the dullest page that ever carried a lady's train, echoed their sovereign's hilarity.

And what had caused all this merriment? Someone had played a mischievous trick on "His Excellency the Fool"—otherwise Baron von Gundling. At the moment that he had entered the audience chamber, there had appeared at the opposite door a diminutive ape, clad in a costume exactly like that worn by the Baron. The little creature, which had evidently been well trained for the comedy, approached the King, bowed deferentially, and presented a petition. One of the courtiers took the paper, and with feigned gravity read the contents aloud to the assembled company. In his petition, the ape stated that he was the only son and heir of Baron von Gundling, who cruelly and persistently refused to acknowledge or support his child. The ill-treated child, therefore, humbly begged his gracious Majesty's aid in securing his legal rights, as well as kindly recognition from his lawful parent.

The laughing courtiers surrounded von Gundling and overwhelmed him with reproaches for his cruelty to his son and heir. The scene was very amusing, and his Majesty was greatly entertained. Even "His Excellency the Fool," joined in the boisterous hilarity—he had enough sense left to feel that to resent the insult would only incite his tormentors to fresh ridicule.

His Majesty had now had enough of the rude sport; he turned on his heel and quitted the audience chamber, followed by his laughing suite, who were eager to repeat throughout the city the latest joke on "His Excellency the Fool."

The echo of their voices yet resounded in the corridors when von Gundling threw himself into a chair and covered his face with both hands, while bitter sobs of anger and grief burst from his tortured heart. Suddenly a hand was laid on his shoulder and a grave voice pronounced his name.

"Paul!"

The fool lifted his head and turned inquiringly towards the speaker.

"Ah, is it you, brother-in-law?" he exclaimed with a half suppressed sob.

"Yes, Paul; come with me. I want to talk with you."

The Baron nodded and rose to his feet. He knew very well what would be the subject of their conversation; but in his sober moments he was always ready to hear disparaging comments on the ignoble rôle he was compelled to play in the gay court. Always in his sober moments he felt the bitterest humiliation; and he now longed to pour out his heart to this friend who had witnessed the degrading scene with the ape.

Herr von Ilgen led the way to his room in another wing of the palace. Von Gundling seated himself in a chair near one of the open windows. Herr von Ilgen did not at once begin the conversation, but thoughtfully paced the floor for several moments, from time to time casting a searching glance towards the silent man near the window.

"Paul," he began at last, halting beside his brother-in-law, "what misfortune brought you—you, once the ornament of the university—to such a pass?"

"Are you really curious to hear my story, Ilgen? It is a fool's history—but an instructive one for all that," he added with sudden bitterness.

"I do not ask out of mere curiosity, brother," returned Herr von Ilgen, but because I am ready and willing to do all in my power to help you out of this position."

The Baron shook his head hopelessly.

"That is not so easy a task as you imagine, my friend, the evil is too firmly rooted. The devil of a wine cup has too firm a hold on me. My degradation began in Berlin. You remember what a sensation there was when I was appointed a professor in the university at Halle? I was very young for so important a position; but the King, who was my patron, had confidence in my ability to perform the work. You know how zealously I devoted myself to my profession? I won many friends. A brilliant future lay before me. Then came the turning point of my life.

"You have no idea how beautiful she is!" after a while he went on, pursuing aloud his train of thought. "Picture to yourself a slender, lissome form, with the majestic bearing of a queen; a pale, pure face, with a pair of dark eyes that can enchant you with a smile and freeze you with their hauteur."

"Who is she?" abruptly inquired Herr von Ilgen.

Paul looked up in surprise.

"You don't know her?" he exclaimed. "Ah, then you will hardly understand my story. She is the daughter of the distinguished historian, Monsieur de Larrey. He came to Halle to examine some ancient manuscripts and during the three months he was absorbed in his work he left me to entertain his daughter, who had accompanied him.

Digitized by Google

"It may seem strange to you that Monsieur de Larrey was willing to trust his daughter to the intimate companionship of an entire stranger; but if you were acquainted with Jeanne de Larrey, you would understand that her father ran no risk in trusting her in any society. There is about her an indescribable something that renders her as unapproachable as an iceberg. She is accustomed to the society of the most distinguished women of our age. She has travelled everywhere. She speaks fluently a dozen languages; she can repeat in the most faultless original whole pages of Homer. The world I had learnt to know amid my studies was not peopled with such women; nor were those with whom I associated in any way like Jeanne de Larrey."

"You must have fallen very deeply in love with her," observed Herr von Ilgen, when Paul stopped to draw another long breath.

"Must have fallen in love with her," repeated slowly the Baron. "Yes, but the feeling that took possession of me was very different from the sentiment usually called love. I loved—nay, love her all my life. The confidential manner she adopted toward me from the very first day we met, allowed me no confidences in return. She would tell me about her lovers—about a certain English baronet who was enamoured of her—and arouse my most jealous fears. In short, her smiles made me happy, her hauteur cast me into the depths of despair. But I felt all the time that there was no hope for me. Even if she loved me, her pride would never allow her heart to decide in my favour."

"Did you never tell her that you loved her?" asked von Ilgen.

"Yes, at least, I gave her to understand that I adored her. I told her my love in a story, but her reply chilled me. I knew that she had understood me. In silence we retraced our steps to the city. Neither of us spoke again until we reached the paved streets. I felt as if a world had been annihilated. Just before leaving her at the door of her lodgings, I summoned courage to say:

"'Were you in earnest, mademoiselle?'

"'About my opinion of the love question in that incident you related?' she asked lightly.

"'Yes.'

"'Certainly I was in earnest.'"

He ceased, overpowered by painful recollections.

After a pause, Herr von Ilgen said:

"What happened afterwards?"

Paul laughed harshly.

"What happened? The rest is easily told. Jeanne was able to control her heart, but I—I was not so strong. I made illness an excuse for not calling on her again, and soon afterwards her father completed his work, and they left the city. Monsieur de Larrey came to bid me good-bye; Jeanne sent me a few cold lines of farewell. Here is the letter," taking from his breast-pocket a worn, faded paper, and extending it toward his brother, who refused, with a gesture of repugnance, to take it.

"I was very ill for several months," resumed Paul, carefully returning the letter to his breast. "I sought forgetfulness in study. My illustrious patron appointed me professor of history in the academy which he had founded for the sons of noblemen. Perhaps hard work would, in the end have cured my disappointment, but the King died, and his favourite academy was closed.

"His successor took me into his service; conferred on me the patent of nobility, and gave me the post of chamberlain. My sole task now was to entertain his Majesty at dinner, and in the evenings, when state affairs did not occupy him. It was an easy position, but for me a most unfortunate one. I led the life of an idler. I had too much time to think. There was no work to drive torturing thoughts from my brain.

"One day at dinner I happened to take too much wine. I was surprised to find what a singular effect it had upon me. It made me forget. I was gay, cheerful. All trouble had vanished from my heart. That is how I became a drunkard! Spare me, dear friend, a further recital of my downfall! I became a willing tippler, because wine brought oblivion; but it changed the once dignified professor into a buffoon, a clown. The King once in jest, called me 'His Excellency the Fool,' and the name clung to me. I am now what you see; a miserable sot—the court fool, the sport, the jest of every blackguard who chooses to mock me. Last week they had this costume made for me, and I wear it by His Majesty's order."

"Shameful! Atrocious!" indignantly interposed Herr von Ilgen's voice. "I shall take it upon myself to punish the miscreants who dare to do——"

"No, no!" interrupted Paul. "Why should you? They do only what my conduct gives them the right to do. Can I ask them to respect me when I have no respect for myself? I deserve their ridicule, and find consolation in the wine cup. My fate is sealed. I have neither the strength nor the desire to change my mode of existence. My ambition, my hopes, my love, all lie buried on the mountain where I told Jeanne of my love. Let me go my way, brother. Let me drink—and forget!"

Herr von Ilgen found that further remonstrance was useless. He determined, however, that the diplomatic errand which had brought him to Potsdam should also prove his brother-in-law's salvation.

A few days later, Baron von Gundling heard, while at an entertainment at the palace, a piece of news that affected him deeply. The French historian, Monsieur de Larrey, so it was said, and his daughter, the celebrated beauty, had arrived at Potsdam, and were to be presented at court.

This intelligence filled the poor court fool's heart with renewed bitterness. Although he still longed to behold once more the fair face which had so enslaved his soul, he felt that he must forego the painful pleasure. Consequently, on the day Monsieur de Larrey and his daughter were expected at court, "His Excellency the Fool" drank so deeply of the cup which gave him oblivion, that he had to be carried to bed, and eighteen hours passed before he roused from his drunken stupor. When he became quite himself again Herr von Ilgen appeared before him and said:

"Paul, I want you to go somewhere with me, but not in that buffoon's dress. Put on your black clothes."

Without a question or demur, the Baron obeyed. They drove to the Holland quarters of the city, where the carriage stopped in front of a handsome villa. They rang, and were admitted by a servant in livery, who conducted them to a lofty reception hall.

In a few moments the soft rustle of feminine garments was heard approaching, and before von Gundling could realise what had happened, Jeanne de Larrey, more majestic than ever, stood before him.

A mist suddenly obscured the court fool's vision—the meeting was so unexpected, so unhoped for! His self command utterly deserted him; his throat seemed compressed by a band of steel. Without a word he bent over the hand extended in cordial greeting toward him, and covered it with tears and kisses.

Digitized by Google

"Are you really so glad to see me again, professor?" she asked smilingly, but with a tremour in her voice.

He merely bowed. He was not yet able to command his voice.

"And yet you have no greeting for me!" she added gaily.

"How beautiful—you are—mademoiselle!" he stammered confusedly, unable to say more.

"What! You have become a flatterer! You, the grave professor, have learnt court manners? But come, let us sit down and chat together as we used to at Halle. First, tell me about yourself. What have you been doing all these months? Are you still angry with me? And how did you manage to forget me so entirely?"

The half jesting, half earnest question suddenly brought the court fool to a consciousness of his situation. He turned as if to seek help from his brother-in-law, but that wily diplomat had retired.

"Where is my brother-in-law?" asked Paul helplessly.

"He is probably with my father, with whom he has business of importance," replied Jeanne.

And now he understood why his brother had brought him here! He was to be lectured by this haughty beauty. His face darkened. This poor sot who permitted all the world to humiliate him, would not submit to one word of reproach from the woman he adored.

Jeanne noted the change in his manner, and fearing that she had too soon touched upon a painful subject, hastened to add:

"My father will be delighted to see you. He has not forgotten how kind you were to us."

But Paul paid no attention to these words. Instead, he said slowly, fixing his eyes upon her face:

"How did I manage to forget you, mademoiselle? I managed it admirably. I became the court fool."

Jeanne grew pale and trembled—not at his words, for she had heard of his downfall. It was his tone, his glance, that frightened her.

"And that is not all, Mademoiselle de Larrey," he continued. "You shall hear more, since you are interested in my fate. I am a drunkard, a sot, who is happy only with a full bottle. Ah, turn in abhorrence and disgust from one so utterly vile! I do not blame you. I am a low, vulgar buffoon, not fit to breathe the same atmosphere with one pure and proud as you!"

"Herr von Gundling!" she gasped in a beseeching tone.

But a harsh, grating voice interrupted her.

"Rejoice, mademoiselle, rejoice at your work—at your work! Do you hear? It was to forget you that I lost my wits in wine. I know very well that the rose is innocent when her fragrance intoxicates the butterfly; that the star cannot help it if her brilliance dazzles mortal eyes. Nor are you, mademoiselle, to blame that your rare loveliness enchanted my soul. No, you are not to blame for winning my love; but that you loved me, and allowed your pride to scorn my love—for that I blame you. Don't turn away; don't hide your face. You cannot deny it—you loved me! You succeeded once in quieting the voice of your heart. Will you hereafter be able to silence your conscience? Answer me, mademoiselle!"

All the bitterness, all the misery, that had accumulated for years in his sore heart rushed, an overwhelming flood, from his lips in this passionate accusation.

Pale, silent, and trembling, Jeanne waited until he had concluded. Then, unable to control herself, she buried her face in her hands and burst into tears.

At this outburst of long-suppressed feeling, Paul's anger suddenly vanished. All his suffering was forgotten. He flung himself on his knees at her feet, drew down her hands, and covered them with passionate kisses.

"Forgive—forgive—Jeanne," he murmured, with quivering lips and burning eyes. "I am so unutterably wretched I know not what I say. Jeanne—Jeanne—say that you forgive me!"

"Forgive you?" sobbed Jeanne, bending towards him and laying her hands on his shoulders. "Forgive me, Paul. I deserve your reproaches, your accusations; but believe me, I do bitterly regret my miserable pride. My life has not been happier than your own, for I could not forget either. But I am here to atone for my folly. I rejected your love when you offered it to me. Will you in turn refuse mine? Look up, Paul, dear Paul, for this alone I came here. I want to be your wife."

A few days later the betrothal of Herr von Gundling to the daughter of the French historian was announced at court.

There was a decided sensation. The courtiers marvelled greatly at Mademoiselle de Larrey's choice, for it was well known that she had refused a score of distinguished suitors.

It was Jeanne's wish that her engagement should be made public. She wanted all the world to know that she was the future wife of the scorned "court fool." This was her atonement.

Many jests were made at the expense of the "fortunate clown," and brilliant plans for the celebration of his marriage were concocted in the King's audience chamber. A fitting procession should escort the bridal pair to the altar; there should be all sorts of festivities; the courtiers would arrange a series of tableaux to represent "The Triumph of Folly" and the "Fool's Reward."

But these brilliant intentions were never carried out. The fool, so it was said, fell ill; so seriously ill, indeed, that no one was permitted to see him. His illness lasted for several weeks. The marriage festivities and tableaux were indefinitely postponed, because the wedding took place in the sick-room, no one being present except the immediate relatives of the bride and groom.

Two days after the ceremony the court learnt with surprise that von Gundling, the court fool, was dead. Then the thoughtless crowd wantonly decided to make a parade of the funeral. They insisted upon taking the coffin and burning it. They never thought to look inside.

At the same hour, a close travelling carriage rolled swiftly along the highway towards Dresden. Within the carriage sat a lovely woman, the dark-eyed Jeanne von Gundling, but no one would have recognised in the sturdy postilion on the box the former court fool.

For the last time von Gundling wore the livery of servitude. When the hour came for him to remove his coachman's coach and hat, he would be a free man. He urged the steeds into swifter pace, that they might more quickly bear him from the scene of his disgrace and humiliation.

And when, after many days, they arrived in the friendly land, another postilion occupied the coachman's seat, and by the side of the lovely woman in the carriage sat her happy husband, who never wearied of whispering tender words.

Digitized by Google

The Tale of the Yellow War.

BY M. P. SHIEL.

Author of "The Man-Stealers," "Prince Zaleski," "Shapes in the Fire," "The Rajah's Sapphire," etc.

SUMMARY.

Yen How, a shrewd Chino-Japanese doctor, who has spent a portion of his life in almost every country in Europe studying the various nationalities and customs in all classes of life, falls desperately in love with an English nursemaid. His advances are rudely repulsed, however; but he leaves England with a fixed determination to win the object of his affections in spite of all opposition. The means he employs for this purpose are immeasurably vaster than the end.

Yen How goes first to Japan as a Japanese, where, by reason of his authority upon all matters connected with Europe and his high rank, he soon becomes a member of the Japanese Parliament. He rapidly becomes intimate with the prime minister, Marquis Ito, to whom he proposes a league between the two races of China and Japan, and an immense scheme by which Europe may be reduced to a waste, and China become the Empress of the Earth with scarcely an effort of her own. He then goes to China and becomes virtual ruler of that nation. In the course of a conversation which he has with Li Hung Chang he unfolds his scheme for setting all the European Powers against Great Britain. After the slaughter China will step in and conquer the remnants of the armies. The Halcyon is sent to Malta convoyed by the Majestic. In the Bay of Biscay La Gloire, a French battleship, is encountered, and fights the Majestic, which ultimately rams her opponent and then sinks. The crew is saved by the Halcyon.

Great Britain now prepares for war. A picket boat in the Channel sights a foreign fleet convoying transports, and John Hardy, a consumptive midshipman home on sick leave, brings the news to Portsmouth. Immediately troops are concentrated at Brighton under the command of Sir Evelyn Wood, and the Channel fleet sails from Spithead to meet the foe. John Hardy gets on board the Jupiter, and, solely by his strength of purpose, is permitted to remain. The British fleet meets the Allied ships in Mid-channel and a battle ensues. Although the British vessels are outnumbered by two to one, the superior tactics of the British, and of John Hardy (who escapes on the Jupiter from the fight, and rams all the transports some distance away), result in the destruction of the Allied fleet. Hardy is ill for a time, and on his recovery decides to go to China. Before going, however, he endeavours to obtain a promise of marriage from Miss Bosey Jay, a young lady artist, but is refused. He goes to the Palace Theatre of Varieties, and there meets Ada Seward, the nursemaid with whom Yen How is in love. She sends him home intoxicated, and a week later he is in Paris, where he has a row with Edropol, the Bulgarian duellist. John, however, does not fight, but goes to Berlin, and from thence to Petersburg Here he sends a letter to Bobbie, his old servant in England, and starts out for China by the overland route.

CHAPTER XII.

John Hardy and Yen How.

Dr. Yen How was seated in a garden of the Imperial City, looking at his hands.

He was arrayed in sumptuous robes of the softest, richest silk, embroidered with the tongue-darting Dragon, in token of high rank.

His pigtail reached to his calves; but, at present, only one inch and a half of it was of the doctor's own hair. The rest was artificial—made of fine black silk. Many dignitaries of even the highest rank in China adopt this device.

Yen How, a minute or two before, had drawn the chopsticks between his lips as the final ceremony to a dainty feed on rice-birds (just then in season) and the juiciest, tenderest tea. The meal had been held before him by attendants in gorgeous robes, themselves of high rank.

The ice-bound Winter of Northern China was over. The sudden, hot Spring was here.

By the right hand of Yen How was a stand of ebony arabesqued in walrus-tusk. On it was some of the pigment which the Chinese use for ink, and some of the brushes which they use for pens; there were also some folios of fine silk paper; there was a silver gong; and, half falling to the ground, the North China Daily News.

In Yen How's hands was an old copy of the Shanghai Mercury. Yen How was reading it; and as he read, his eyes went small in a smile. Something amused the doctor.

It was this: Herr von Bülow, the German Foreign Minister, had, a good many months before, made a remark in the Reichstag which was reproduced later on in the Mercury. Von Bülow had said: "The Chinese Empire has already lasted 4,300 years; it will last another 3,000."

"He did not mean it," murmured Yen How, "because he is a fool. But a fool may sometimes say a true thing, without meaning it."

At the same time he touched on his breast the decoration of the Red Eagle of the First Class, which the German Emperor had conferred upon him immediately after the grant by China of the territories to Germany.

Then he went on with his slow, contemplative reading.

We have spoken of the meteoric career of this man in China; we said that he "rose like a rocket." But let it not be supposed that he did all this by miracle. A rocket will not rise of itself; it must be impelled by an upward, quite accountable, force.

To what did Yen How owe his supreme authority?—for his authority was now far more supreme than that of any

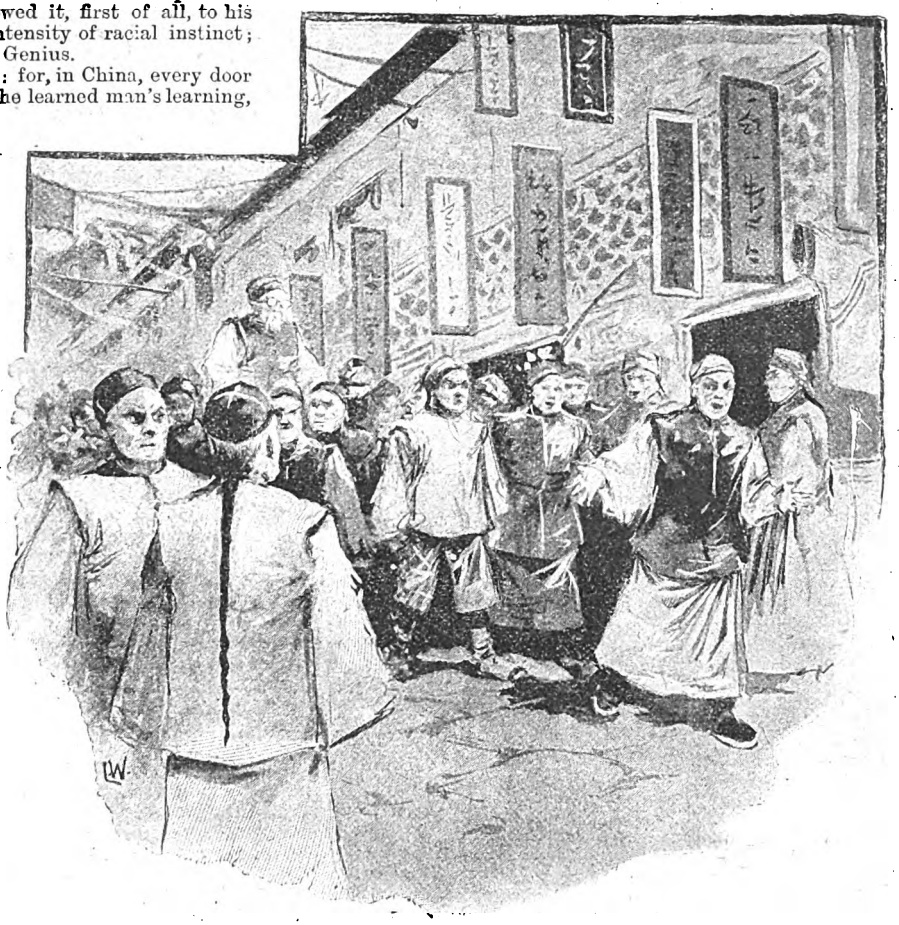
Digitized by Google

Brother of the Sun and Moon who ever occupied the thereon of the Hsüs. He owed it, first of all, to his Learning; secondly, to his intensity of racial instinct; and thirdly, to his audacious Genius.

To his Learning, first of all: for, in China, every door is open to the learned man. The learned man's learning, however, must be Chinese; and here was the miracle of Dr. Yen How's achievements in the State Examination Halls of Canton and Pekin: that he who there proved himself more instructed than the pundits in Chinese wisdom, had spent the greater part of his life in acquiring Western scientific views and methods in Heidelberg, Paris, and Edinburgh.

He began at the bottom He passed through the examination at Canton. The "Hall" is not a hall at all, but a double row of small sentry-boxes, each capable of holding one person only, in which the examinee, provided with food, ink, brushes, and paper, spends two solitary weeks, seeing no one, answering his questions. He usually comes out more like a dead than a living man, and, even for the most erudite, the ordeal is one of fire.

During that fortnight of dark seclusion, Yen How smiled, and smiled, and smiled again. He was examined on the complex Theology, the fanciful History, the intricate old Law, the amazing Astronomy of the Chinese. In all these subjects, and many more, their Learning consists of an immense range of minute dogmatism, which the whole lifetime of their wise men is spent in acquiring. Yen How's big brain knew all about these subjects—more about them than his examiners. But he differed from them in this: that he alone knew the falseness of the answers which he painted. His eyes were all smiles as he sat there writing about the earth going round the sun in so many seconds, and about the place of Confucius in the third hierarchy of the gods. It was the sweetest fun to him.



He was carried to his home through the streets on the shoulders of the people.

When he came out from his sentry-box at the end of the two weeks among a number of wan and tottering men, his tough visage showed no sign of fatigue. He smiled always. He knew that he would be First on the list.

And First he was. A couple of weeks later, when the result was announced at the portal of the "Hall," he was carried to his home through the streets on the shoulders of the people.

The Chinese populace still cherish the same awe and high reverence for the Learned Man which, in Europe, was cherished in the Middle Ages for what was called "The Scholar."

Yen How at once received a summons to appear before the Viceroy of Nanking. He appeared. A choice of two things was put before him: he might either accept a Judgeship in the Province of Kiang-si; or he might go north, and compete in another examination at Pekin, where, if he was moderately successful, he would possibly obtain a post in the Inner Court of the Imperial City.

One offer was a certainty; the other hypothetical. But Yen How had not the slightest intention of going to be a Judge in the Province of Kiang-si. What he wanted was Ada Seward.

He went to Pekin; and very soon underwent the far sterner ordeal in the famous Examination Halls of that city. Again he was easily First on the list—a feat which at once admitted him to high honour in the Imperial Court. He had gained his entrée.

Another Chinaman would now have said: "I have achieved my end." Yen How said: "I have made a beginning."

But the rest was not difficult. In Oriental countries, rises, as well as falls, are rapid. "Let Hainan be hanged and let Mordecai be put in his place." The prophet Daniel rose from nothing to the supreme power in a night. Yen How did it in two months.

So great was the necessity for Western methods, and Western science, in the Government of China, that the Chinese were actually compelled at that very time to overcome their shuddering racial abhorrence of the white man, and to pay large salaries to white experts, in various departments, to plan and to administer. Germans drilled China's army, Britons collected her customs, Frenchmen planned her railways.

Digitized by Google

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

German drill sergeants were replaced by Japanese officers.

It is not possible to estimate the omnipotence which would suddenly fall into the hands of a real Chinaman who could do all this better than either German, Englishman, or Frenchman. To the Chinese tongue he was sweet as white mice preserved in honey. He became the Emperor of the Emperor.

But then, besides Knowledge and Race, Yen How had something more: he had Genius—the large Eye—the summoning Voice—the enchanter's Wand. The vastness of his outlook,—the world-dimension of his schemes,—was simply fascinating. "Talk, my son, talk," old Li would say, sitting before Yen How, holding his chin in his hand, his eyes riveted on the doctor's face; and when Yen ceased, Li would say: "Talk on, my son, talk on; your words have flavour; and the palate of the ear is led astray by them."

Yen How soon became a sort of dissipation for the aged Minister.

When Li wanted sensation, he came and sat with his chin in his hand, and listened with delicious musings to Yen. It was at Li's own suggestion that the Yellow Jacket was given to Yen How. It was among the necessities of things, and Li saw it. And at once—without an hour's delay—the little Heidelberg doctor began to act.

His first care was to bring about a secret treaty between Japan and China.

He had not been idle in Tokio. He had taken frequent voyages down the Peiho to Tientsin, and thence to Tokio. Of his insinuations to, and relation with, the Marquis Ito, we have spoken. But Yen How kept his most delicious plum of temptation in reserve, till the last. He then showed that however great China became, Japan would always be the mistress of China; when China was the mistress of Europe and Asia, that meant that Japan would be the mistress of the world. The treaty was signed. It was his first step.

Yen How saw that the navy of Japan would be absolutely necessary to his schemes. Without that nothing permanent and final could be done.

His next step was to bring about the European war.

He did it so boldly, with such a grand disregard for appearances, with such contemptuous prodigality, that it was a wonder that both his present and ultimate motives were not divined. For it must be remembered that the idea of "The Yellow Danger" was no new one to European statesmen. Again and again had the more keen-eyed of politicians pointed Eastward, and said to Europe: "The Yellow Danger! the Yellow Danger!" Only a year or so previously had Lord Charles Beresford, in a speech delivered, we think, at Hull, used words like these: "The cloud at present may seem only the size of a man's hand—but it is there; and its seemingly small size is due merely to its remoteness, not to its intrinsic smallness. What appalling fate would be that of Europe, if the yellow races, in their hundreds of millions, organised a westward march, is beyond the imagination of man to conceive." Again and again had this note of warning been sounded. But the mischief lay in this very fact: that the cloud had appeared of "the size of a man's hand." It was too remote. The idea was not yet realised and assimilated by Europe.

Still, as we say, there was nothing at all new in Yen How's idea of over-running Europe, as is proved by the fact that that phrase, "the Yellow Danger," had become quite common in everyone's ears; what was new, was, firstly his discernment of the fact that the yellow races would probably fail in the attempt, unless Europe were, to begin with, made ready for them by a great inter-European war; and secondly, the novel means which he took to bring about that war.

No single soul outside China and Japan suspected his ulterior motive of overrunning Europe when he made the grants of territory—for the cloud, though often pointed out, was like "a man's hand;" but three people, at least, suspected his present motive of bringing about a European war. One was a young student in the Quartier Latin in Paris; another was Sir Charles Dilke, who mentioned it as just a possibility at a dinner at the National Liberal Club; the third was a Hampshire gentleman, who, as we said in a former chapter, wrote a letter to the Times during the excitement preceding the war, making this suggestion of China's motive. The letter attracted little attention. This Hampshire gentleman was John Hardy.

His eye had seen.

Yen How's first step was the league with Japan; his second was the European war; his third was the organisation of China.

This last was a great task—it was stupendous. Only a new Confucius could have done it. But Yen How was quite that.

To wake a nation which has been asleep for four thousand years! To lift the arm!—and cry aloud!—and wake them in their myriads with a "Rouse ye! rouse ye! the Hour is come! The Day breaketh!" in a voice like the Trump of Doom!

The little doctor could do it,—and did it.

But again, he did not do it by miracle. He knew his way.

Digitized by Google

The results attained by Genius, do, indeed, look like miracle; but they are not really so. The genius himself knows that he must use definitely precise ways and means, which, if used by anyone else in the same manner, would produce the same results. Genius is Industry—the capacity of being infinitely interested,—of taking infinite pains.

Yen How had been taking infinite pains from the day when he could first pronounce his own name.

All his acts in the organisation of China were based upon a minute and profound knowledge of the Chinese character. The principal points of this character are an immeasurable Greed, an absolute Contempt for the world outside China, and a fiendish Love of Cruelty.

It is impossible for the vilest European to conceive the dark and hideous instincts of the Chinese race.

The first thing that happened after the outbreak of the war in Europe, was a wholesale massacre of all Europeans in the East. Wholesale—but not haphazard: for Dr. Yen How was directing it. For the time being, every European became precious in his eyes—he collected them with care—he preserved them scrupulously—and he distributed them with deliberate wisdom. They were conveyed over China from Yun-nan to the villages round the Ming Tombs, and from the Yellow Sea to the Tien-Shans. No district was without its white victim. Then sounded Yen How's first trumpet blast to the nation he meant to rouse.

The Day breaks! It is morning! And at once there occurred a memorable Passover-Day through the length and breadth of China—a holiday of gore, an orgy of death, to symbolise the annihilation of the white race all the world over. When it was ended, there was not a white man or woman alive on Chinese soil, except on an island or two; all had perished in the act of undergoing the most loathsome public tortures. This Solemn Feast-day, this Sacrament of Blood, made a lasting impression upon the spirit of the Chinese race, which is very Sensitive to the suggestiveness of Symbols. Yen How had begun well. Certainly, he knew his man.

The killing of the German drill-sergeants of the Chinese Army had been left to be performed by the hands of the soldiers whom they had drilled.

The territories granted to the Continental nations were as yet unoccupied by them. The small European garrisons actually in China had been easily overpowered. And Europe was busy at home, fighting against herself. At last China was free to do as she chose.

The attitude of the nation as a whole at this moment resembled that of a sleeping cat, which hears a sound, and pricks her ears.

To say even so much of the Chinese is to say a great deal. For centuries they had laid in deep, stolid slumber without one prick of the ears. There were still many millions of them who, as Li Hung Chang had said when he visited Europe, had never so much as heard of the Chino-Japanese war.

How to stir up such a people? How to get at them and fire them, and make them act? Yen How knew.

He must first of all, now that he had given them a morning Dream of Blood, kick them hard to wake them, bruising their flesh, if necessary: then, as they rubbed their wide and startled eyes, he would preach to them the Gospels of Greed—and Race—and Cruelty.

Already, by the time John Hardy had reached Vladivostok—just about four weeks after the Battle of Shorcham—the "kicking process" was in full swing. There was a strange stirring, a movement, a new something, in old China. Men said: "What is toward? What is to be? Can these dry bones live?" The Spirit of a Man was abroad in the land—an intense Mind, a vitalising Leaven—kneading, fermenting, energising, creating.

The massacred German drill-sergeants were replaced by Japanese officers. But where there had been one German, there appeared now a thousand Japanese.

Yen How's scheme was nothing less than this: that every Chinaman should be a soldier.

Conscription in China!

Here was a lesson learnt from Europe.

But when we say "a soldier," we mean something different from what is understood by the word among us. We do not mean a man equipped with smokeless powder and magazine rifles, with Lee-Metfords, and Martinis, and Sniders. We mean only a man having some sort of arms—a club, or a dart, or a match-lock, or a poker—anything which would give him the idea that he had to fight, and which would perhaps delay his death a moment while myriads of others swept over those who had killed him. The Chinese host was to resemble a flight of locusts, covering the entire sky from horizon to horizon, each member of which was armed with some implement, not so much for the purpose of killing, as for the purpose of protracting his own death, while the rest of the host pressed forward, blighting as they went. His duty was hardly to fight, but to occupy time in dying. For this service none were too old, few too young—and women were as good as men. Yen How's army would consist of the 400,000,000 which formed the population of China.

Each corps was furnished with a vast corps-cavalry-brigade.

Digitized by Google

Walked softly towards the great little man.

The organisation of this war-host he planned principally on the French model.

He divided the whole of China into 240 army corps regions, each containing about two million inhabitants. This arrangement included Thibet, Mongolia, Manchuria, and Korea, the heads of which countries he had long since brought into line with his plans.

In each region he quartered the principal elements of the field army corps with the necessary Staff, setting up in each region a large number of recruiting depôts, and depôts of artillery, transport, supplies of food and forage, with clothing and camp equipment.

The whole of the troops and organisation for this purpose was put under the command of the General of that particular army corps and its region. And this General was, in every case, a Japanese.

Each region was divided into two hundred subdivisions, each of the subdivisions furnishing one reginent of infantry of the line, twenty subdivisions forming an infantry brigade command, and forty subdivisions that corresponds to an infantry divisional command. Divisional commands were also intrusted exclusively to Japanese; brigade and regimental commands to the most trustworthy of the Chinese officers of the regular army.

Each corps was furnished with a vast corps-cavalry-brigade, the horses—to use an Irishism—being mules, and the weapon the long spear.

Each regiment was subdivided into three battalions, each battalion into four companies, and each company into twelve squads.

Each squad numbered from sixty to sixty-three persons, who were known by numbers, from No. 1 to No 63.

They contained children over the age of nine, women (except the wives and daughters of mandarins and other upper classes), and old men tottering on the verge of the grave. The priest and pundit classes were exempted also.

The whole nation was organised into an army.

This was one way which Yen How employed to kick and prick it into wakefulness.

Each army corps contained, besides its squadrons of cavalry and its batteries of artillery, six sections of artificers, six artillery parks, thirty companies of pontooners, one telegraph section, and forty field batteries.

But there were no field hospitals, or hospital orderlies, no ambulances, no medical provision. Yen How could afford to spare men. He had plenty.

One important feature of the army corps was the provision of armoured carts. They were to serve not only for transport, but for defence in battle, and their shape was contrived with this view, being long and low, with small wheels, and rather ponderous. One had been made, or was to be made, for each "peloton."

All this was not yet accomplished, but all was in rapid and intense progress. And the rest of the world knew nothing about it!

China, north of Tonquin, had telegraphically isolated herself.

In Japan the manufacture of guns, swords, spears, and small arms was going forward with agonised activity; and these were coming over to China in ship-loads. China's chief manufacturing energies were directed to the making of armoured carts, and the sewing together of tents.

But the drilling of China was only one half of Yen How's plan for rousing it. He knew that it was necessary to drive the nation further still, even to the verge of frenzy. He did this by taxing it.

Let it not be supposed that any part of his motive was a need of money to any pressing degree for all this war preparation. The loan raised in the previous year, which should have been spent by China in paying Japan's war-indemnity, was still in the pockets of China.

The loan had not been necessary to China at all! She could have raised sufficient to pay Japan by an issue of Treasury bonds, the purchase of which may be made compulsory in China, if they are not subscribed to voluntarily.

Or she could have called upon the various Viceroys to wring enough out of the mercantile and agricultural classes.

But neither loan, nor bonds, nor Viceroy extortion had been necessary! Japan was not anxious to get this large sum into her hands. She would have had to find some profitable investment for it, as she could not, of course, lay out eleven millions sterling in warships at an hour's notice. Her mere credit was good enough for the building of the vessels she needed; and the money, paid over to Japan, would simply have lain in the Bank of England to Japan's credit. As a matter of fact, in the secret treaty between the Marquis Ito and Yen How, the payment of the idemnity was remitted altogether.

From this source alone China was, for the present, rich; but under the guidance of an exact administrative brain like Yen How's, she was vastly richer still from quite other sources.

China, in reality, was never a poor country; on the contrary, she was potentially about the richest in the world. Manchuria was an El Dorado of gold. The mineral mines of Kwang-tung, Heilung-Chiang and the Kirin provinces had been the envy of the nations. But the curse of China had been her official class. The greed of the mandarin had throttled every industry. The heavy likin charges, which went, nearly all of it, into the pockets of its collectors stifled many an industry. The Government income was estimated at two hundred and ten million taels, but only seventy million of this—one third—was accounted for. On the remainder the mandarins wallowed in fatness.

Digitized by Google

Yen How's eyes screwed up into a smile, and he said "No more of that, my son!"

The substance of what he said, and what he did was this: "You are to extort, you are to squeeze, and plunder, and grind the people ten times—a hundred times—more than you ever did before—till they perish like sheep of it. But this time you are going to do it, not for your own benefit, but for my benefit, and for the benefit of China. I, Yen How, have said it, and will see to it."

Within two months after his attainment of the supreme power, he had created a Board, formed on the lines of the Imperial Maritime Customs, for a clean-handed collection of the internal revenues. It contained some Chinese officials, but consisted mostly of Japanese.

The immediate effect of this change was an increase—by tens and hundreds—of the revenues which began to pour into the Treasury of Pekin.

From the working of the mines, specially organised and superintended by Yen How himself, a vast increment of wealth began to flow into the swollen coffers of China.

Yen How was not popular. He was kicking and pricking poor sleepy China into unpleasant wakefulness. But he knew that he had the sweetest oil in store to salve her bruises at the right moment.

All these measures of his would have spelt insurrection, revolution at another time—the introduction of the Japanese element, especially, into the new life of China was very distasteful to the people. But now the stern universal military organisation nipped every thought of rebellion in the bud.

If you want to turn a two-legged beast into a man—drill him, straighten his spine, make a soldier of him. He will never be a hopelessly unintelligent animal after that.

Yen How was drilling the Chinese beast, straightening his spine. By the time the beast could look round twice to tear whoever it was that was disturbing his slumber, lo, he was already turned into a man, with sufficient intelligence to see that there was no resisting this new Power which had him in its grip.

The Chinese, when they saw no help for it, began to fraternise with the ubiquitous Japanese element introduced into their midst. Yen How had foreseen this. They had already, more or less, learnt to submit to the domination of white men. And the Jap was much less a foreign devil than the white man. On reflection he was judged to be an improvement. On reflection, Yen How, too, would, in time, be judged to be an improvement.

But, meanwhile, he wore a secret steel plate over his breast.

The people of China were being terribly oppressed and badgered.

The order of the day was drill, drill, drill—tax, tax, tax—work, work, work—all over the land.

As yet no one knew why all this was—what was in the mind of the gods above. Yen How had not yet begun to preach his three Gospels to the people.

So matters stood, when on the 18th of April, Yen How sat in his garden, near a little tea-house, reading an old Shanghai Mercury.

An attendant opened a little door in the courtyard, walked softly towards the great little man, and prostrated himself before him.

"Speak on," said Yen How.

"A white man has been captured at Monkden, Your Excellency, by soldiers of the Liao-Tong division, and sent on to Pekin. They have just arrived at the Palace—and await your instructions."

"Let him be taken to the Imperial Prison-house for the night," said Yen How, "and beheaded at sunrise to-morrow."

He went on reading. The servant made an obeisance, and turned away.

Do not call the man back, Yen How! Let him go and do your bidding, and read your paper, and be at peace! For this is John Hardy that you have ordered to be slain—and he is as strong as the rocks, and the strong earth, and the sky, and the stars in their courses fight for him!

But Yen How called the man back.

"Stop!" he cried.

The attendant returned.

"What nation is he of?" asked Yen How.

"His interpreter says that he is an Englishman, Your Excellency."

"Let him be brought before me here."

And Yen How went on reading his paper.

(To be continued.)

THE VERY BEST PAPER.

THE very best paper for Sunday reading is, undoubtedly, The Sunday Reader; a paper which at the present time seems to have attained the highest possible standard of excellence. This is accounted for by the fact that The Sunday Reader has been going in for improvements.

It is now compact in size, and contains thirty-two pages, crammed with interesting articles, amusing anecdotes, brightly written interviews, striking illustrations, and stirring stories, in addition to which there is a remarkable serial running through its pages which surpasses everything which has ever been published in its own line.

Here are some of the subjects which are dealt with in this week's Sunday Reader; there is an interview with a blind gentleman who spends his life in visiting and cheering the blind population of London; there is an account of the quietest sanctuary in the world; a church which is, in fact, built in the heart of an immense boulder, and dozens of other articles.

EVERY WEEK.] THE SUNDAY READER. [ONE PENNY

ALL LOVERS OF GOOD FICTION

should take care to secure a copy of this week's Home Notes and start reading the grand new serial novel entitled:

"Playing for High Stakes,"

by Mrs. C. N. Williamson. The story is one of absorbing interest and is full of surprises from beginning to end.

In addition to the new serial Home Notes is full of bright articles and stories and a more than usually good novel is published in Home Notes Library this week. The whole form ever offered to the public.

ONE OF THE MOST MARVELLOUS PENNYWORTHS

PICK-ME-UP.

Note the New Features:

"The Great Pirate Syndicate," a grand serial story, by George Griffith, author of "The Angel of the Revolution," etc., etc., has just commenced.

"Pick-Me-Up Interviews," with Cartoons.

Short Story.

Pictures by the most eminent black and white artists.

PUBLISHED EVERY TUESDAY, ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

THEY were two, Wilhelm and Frederika Brahm, and they twain were one flesh. She, tall and massive of build; he, taller and spare unto leanness. Their little cottage home stood on a populous street of a populous South African city. Everything inside was dingy and crowded. Everything outside was smothered in plants and vines.

The twain lived there alone; they and Fritz, the tiny black and tan, who was child and messenger and guard in one. The three sat out in front every evening from early spring-time till late autumn; she just within the little hall-way, filling up the door; he outside on the miniature piazza, or else down on the grass; the terrier, anywhere that he could best show his importance and his devotion.

Perchance a passer-by halted a moment to speak a pleasant word to the "Kaiser"—for so we called him by reason of his lofty ways—or to listen silently to the strains of the sweet old violin he was wont to play. The good wife spoke English so brokenly that she did not often do more than smile in her broad way; and Fritz usually barked desperately at every interference.

It was the impression that the Kaiser had scraped together a great deal of money. People came to overlook his silent ways, his close living, his unsocial habits, when they got wind that he was very rich. Poor people may be mean; the rich are only eccentric.

So the years dragged along, and they still sat out at twilight. Often he read aloud to her from a German paper; more often he drew his bow softly in wailing minor strains that told a tale of heart-hunger in a strange land. Heimweh quivered and sobbed along the strings, but none ever dared to speak to him of his hopes, his regrets, or his losses.

Winter came and drove the Brahms indoors. The first time I saw them out again was one mild spring evening, after my return from a prolonged visit out of town. I was struck with the change in the Kaiser's appearance. He was pallid unto ghostliness. Involuntarily I halted at the gate, and Fritzie went mad at my audacity.

Mrs. Brahm answered my unspoken query.

"Mein Villem" (so she called her Wilhelm) "have been awful ill. I don't shust know if he vould be vell some more."

"What has been the trouble?" I asked, and I knew my face was full of sympathy.

"We don't know vat it ish, but he ish weak, und he can't eat nodings no more."

Her voice stopped in a wail which Fritzie promptly echoed, his piercing eyes gazing into hers with the anguish of his own impotency.

The neighbourhood began holding conferences on the old man's looks. Clearly he was in a decline. They were wont to say he had only to close his eyes to end it all. May and June went by, and he began to shrivel up like yellow parchment. Still he sat under the clustering vines; still he drew out the long hose to water his flowers and the dusty street, feebly directing the stream upon his own domain, and not an inch upon his neighbour's dust. He still managed, too, to play the old violin.

The July heat closed in about him, and day by day the passers-by noted how he grew sparer and more cadaverous. He and his old wife had not made friends, and now, in their impending trouble, not even the most sympathising would intrude upon them. Ugly stories had got out that they were too miserly to eat enough; that they would not give away a bit of fruit, not if it wasted before their eyes. I knew better. I did not believe all I heard.

One Sunday, Ethel and Margie started to Sunday-school, when in a moment they came hurrying back to tell me there was crape on Kaiser Brahm's door. He was gone, then—the struggle was over. Towards nightfall I went. Two of the neighbours sat there in dutiful attendance, but silent and awkward. For the first time I penetrated the family room, a little square chamber close and full of stuffiness. Mrs. Brahm was not crying. She was flushed and flurried, and talked without stopping. She turned to me as a fresh and welcome listener, when I entered with words of solemn inquiry upon my lips.

"It vas his liver—his liver vas so long bad—he vent to town und he shust could git back. He said, shust feel his heart beat, und I send for de doctor. I said he must not walk any more like dot. Und de doctor, he give him de morphine. Dot killed him."

"Oh, no, Mrs. Brahm!" I hastened to reassure her. "Perhaps he would have suffered too much without it."

Digitized by Google

"No," she stubbornly insisted, "I dinks not. He did not vish to take de morphine—he said he vould not.

"He made his vill," she added in an elated way; "he give me all de dings vhat he had. I have blenty of moneys and houses."

How proud she was. She was quiet through the funeral. It was all cold and formal, I thought. But the "knights" of the local "order" to which he belonged, with their nodding plumes and glittering uniform, had a look of royalty in her eyes. She fancied her Wilhelm was going down into the grave with all the pomp and circumstance of power—the insignia of rank; and it gratified her. In her simple way she overestimated its significance.

After the first day the neighbours fell away. Mrs. Brahm did not encourage them to come. But she was on my heart, poor, lonely old Frau. The house was smothered in gloom now, as well as in riotous green. The careful pruning fingers were at rest.

It was not quite eight o'clock one evening, some two weeks after the funeral, when, leaving my moonlit porch, I strolled down to the little wicket gate and went in.

I rang the worn bell, which rebounded with a metallic snap against the door and echoed dismally through the still rooms. Fritzie's sharp bark instantly responded, and never ceased; not even when the clumping step came out and uncertain fingers bunglingly lifted the bolts. He kept up the din while Mrs. Brahm stood in her short gown and petticoat, the moonbeams pouring their cool radiance upon her heavy features.

"Oh, I beg pardon!" I hastened to say. "I had no idea you were gone to bed, Mrs. Brahm. I feared you might be lonely, so I came down. Pray don't disturb yourself—good-night."

"I vas not feeling vell," she said. "Hush up, Fritzie! I thought I vould lay down—shust to rest me, you know—I could not shleep. I vas very silly," and she tried to laugh a little. "I heer de violin all de nights!"

Oh, poor heart-broken "auld wife!" She was now realising her loss. I could well believe she heard the wail of the silent strings, so interwoven with the long summer evenings under the despoiled lattice. I hurried away, and afterwards tossed on my pillow with thoughts of the deserted creature in that cruelly silent house, all alone.

I went again and again. She was gradually losing her morbid loquacity, so I encouraged her to talk. Her mind was full of plans. It worked slowly, but grief and solitude were goading her to the extent of her powers. She would remain in this country, she said, for three months, and then she would go back to the "Fatherland." Her husband's property amounted to ten thousand pounds. She would give nothing away till she died; then she would leave some to her sister and the bulk to her niece. She would not buy much till she reached Germany.

Smoothing her rusty, black cloak of a pattern of long ago, and thereby scattering some of the few aspiring beads left on its worn surface, she told with childish pleasure how she would buy her mourning in Germany, where it would be so cheap. Three months a widow, yet her lifelong apprenticeship of saving had put off the mourning outfit till she could get it cheap!

She said good-bye, and thanking me again for the small attentions I had rendered, said she would have a letter written to me on her arrival.

A few days later she went away. The old house came to show signs of life, if not altogether cheerful; but it could never be the same to the passers-by.

Six weeks afterwards, as I approached the old Kaiser's house at dusk, I was surprised to see a waggon in front of it, and a cluster of men, women, servants, and children about the gates. The men were slowly lifting something out. A thrill went through me as though a coffin were being handled, and I involuntarily paused. Gathering courage, I quickened my step, and arrived in time to see Mrs. Brahm seated in a chair which was being carefully conveyed up the steps by Schmitzer and another man. Amazed and in genuine concern, I followed, and inquired what it meant. The Frau could tell nothing, but lay with her eyes closed on the little bed upstairs, where the old violin had startled her sad memories that day. Nor did the others know, except that she had telegraphed Schmitzer the day before to meet her at the station.

The people in the house gathered wonderingly round and tenderly disrobed her. She could give no account of herself and was deaf to Fritzie's appeals.

During the night she revived somewhat, and they gathered from her mutterings that she had had a fall the day before the ship sailed and strained herself too severely to proceed on her voyage. Where she had been or what she had done all these weeks she was not able to tell.

The next morning a physician was called. He said she was suffering from pneumonia with cerebral complication. At noon, under powerful stimulants, she rallied, and the physician coaxed her to talk. He told her she was very ill.

"Will I get well?" she asked in an indifferent tone, but in good English, such as she was not wont to use.

"I can't say, Mrs. Brahm. If you have not made your will, I would advise you to do so at once."

At the magic word she half arose on her elbow and almost shrieked in tones that told of long-repressed anguish:

"Mein vill is made! My niece Gretchen—she vill git my monies," and falling back, she babbled on into incoherency.

She lay unconscious almost all the time. On the fourth evening an idea struck me.

"Where is the violin?" I suddenly inquired.

They did not know, but taking a bunch of keys from Mrs. Brahm's travelling-bag, we opened her trunk and soon came to what we sought. Lifting the box reverently, I opened it and, tightening the jangled strings, I softly drew the bow with its stiff, scraping cadence across them. The sound was not music, but it called back the fleeting senses to the world of real things

Fritzie started up to a sitting posture, and with ears erect and forehead wrinkled, gazed with glistening eyes, and gave a succession of mournful howls. The old Frau stirred uneasily, and arousing with an effort, looked fixedly at the instrument. Then she began muttering, while the colour came and went, and her breathing fell in gasps.

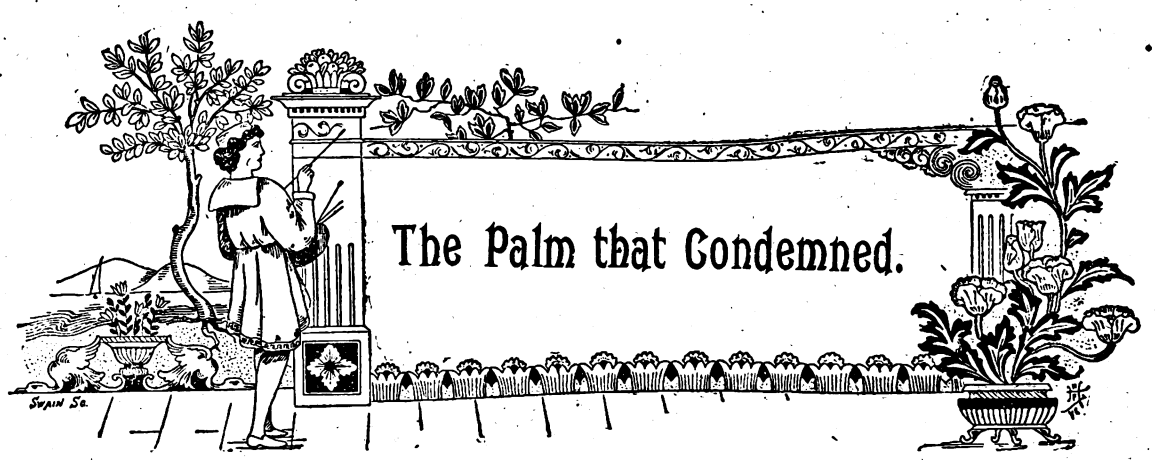
"Mien Villem," she murmured, then at intervals more words, among which I could distinguish "Faderland," "monies," "Gretchen," and "mein vill."

She never spoke again. As the last streaks of the wintry sun crept through the tiny window panes, she ceased to breathe.

We buried her beside her Villem. Three days later the little dog, to whom her coming back had been a reviving of sorrow, was missed, and the sexton of the dead city found him stretched out, stark and still, upon the frozen mound. There he buried him.

Eugenia Potts.

Digitized by Google



The Palm that Condemned.

I was visiting my friend Grace Lawrence at her father's home in a large city in the north, a beautiful old house shaded by noble old elms. Early one morning Grace burst into my room like a wild thing. Her hair was dishevelled and she was sobbing violently. I had just finished dressing and exclaimed quickly:

"Why, Grace, what is the matter?"

"Papa is dead, Eleanor—murdered!" she cried.

"What do you mean?" I asked. "Who has done it?"

"I do not know. They will not let me in."

I ran out to Mr. Lawrence's room. The door was open, and the bed had not been slept in. The servants were gathered in the hall below, and the neighbours were rushing in, as they always do at such times.

I went quickly downstairs and to the library door, which was open, and there I saw the most ghastly spectacle that ever met my vision. Mr. Lawrence, the kind father of my dearest friend, a man universally beloved and respected, and chairman of the National Bank of the City, had been foully murdered. He was sitting in his chair by the library table and had been reading one of the reviews, which still lay open on the table before him.

A deep gash in the back of the head and another in the neck, separating the jugular vein, told the story. Some miscreant had crept in through the open window and attacked him from behind. It was Mr. Lawrence's habit to read after the rest of the family had retired for the night, often sitting up until midnight for the purpose. The night had been a warm one, and evidently the cruel deed was done while we were all sleeping calmly in our rooms above.

While we stood there the officers of the law arrived, and took charge of the body. They at once ordered all of us out of the room and closed the doors; but before I went, I noticed the bloody print of a hand on the side of the window casing. When I was allowed to go into the room again it was afternoon. I went at once to examine the hand print.

You ask me why?

For some months I had been studying the science of palmistry. I had taken it up at first only from idle curiosity. Then becoming convinced that there was something in this science more than I had been taught to believe, I procured some books, and had become quite expert in reading the lines of the palm. In some instances I had surprised my friends, and even myself, by the accuracy with which I read the past and foretold the future of my friends, upon whom I practised the art at every opportunity.

When I had finished looking at this print, which the officers had given orders should not be washed off at present, I went upstairs and got my amateur photographic outfit and took a photo of the lines, for the imprint was that of the full palm and fingers, with all the main lines distinct.

What I saw there would have convinced me, had I not known the dreadful secret of the library. This imprint, I say, would have convinced me that it was the hand of a murderer. The head, heart, and life line met almost under the mount of Saturn, and there were other indications of a murderous tendency.

I knew that officers and detectives would examine these blood stains, and I knew that experts would be called upon to bear witness in regard to them. I think it was only my interest in the study of palmistry that led me to transcribe the picture of that tell-tale hand. I little dreamt how closely it was to connect me with the unfolding of the mystery of the Lawrence murder case.

Poor Grace was so upset by the events of that night that I had all I could do to keep her from nervous prostration. She was an only daughter, and her mother had died five years before. She had been housekeeper, companion, and all in all to her father since leaving school, and he had idolised her. How she was to live without him, how she was to bear up under the fearful ordeal which faced her, was more than any of us could tell.

The funeral at last took place and the body was buried.

Much against her will we had overpowered the desire of Grace to remain at home, to which she seemed to cling with a morbid affection, and persuaded her to come with me to a summer resort on the coast.

It was the night before we were to start. Detectives had been busy on the case, and officers had scoured the country for some clue to Mr. Lawrence's murderer. No one had been more actively willing to help us in every possible way than Herbert Sheldon, the young cashier of the bank, a personal friend of Mr. Lawrence.

Digitized by Google

He had gone into the bank when he was a young lad as errand boy, having been the son of a friend of Mr. Lawrence's youth, who had died in destitute circumstances. The boy had risen rapidly. He had for several years been first assistant cashier, and then cashier of the bank. He was proud of saying that he was the youngest cashier in England.

For several months he had evinced a great liking for Grace's company and had even asked her for her hand, but Grace had not returned his admiration and had given him no encouragement. Now, however, he had come forward and been like a brother in his suggestions and watchful care of the household. He seemed to feel Mr. Lawrence's death very deeply, and could not endure any mention of him, saying several times that since matters were as they were and that none of us were able to control our grief it seemed best not to talk about it, but to try and forget it. This to me, not to Grace.

As I said, it was the evening before we were to start for the seaside. Mr. Horton, who was really a private detective at work on the case, although no one in the village but Grace and myself knew this, had called for a private talk and to ask us a few questions.

Suddenly Mr. Sheldon was announced. He came in, and contrary to his usual custom, he held out his hand willingly to Grace.

The light from the piano lamp, under which she stood, struck his open palm in such a manner that I, who happened to be standing opposite her, saw there plainly written the evidence of guilt. I knew that Herbert Sheldon could be a murderer.

Then a thought came to me with a sudden shock. For an instant I could not speak. No suspicion of such a thing had entered my mind. What could have been his object?

I sat down, allowing the others to carry on the conversation for a few moments; then the desire to read that hand more fully took possession of me. I resolved to do it.

Fortune favoured me. A little "Guide to Palmistry," which had been such a help to me in my studies, happened to lie on the table. Mr. Horton, seeing it, picked it up and said:

"Hallo! who studies palmistry here?"

"Eleanor does," said Grace; "she can read your hand like an open book. Let her try."

"All right," said Mr. Horton. "I am sure I would like to know my destiny. Wouldn't you, Sheldon?"

Herbert Sheldon laughed lightly. "Well, yes, if any young lady can tell anything from my hand, here it is." And he held out his open palm, which I so much desired to see.

For a moment I studied it in silence. It was the exact palm of that tell-tale hand on the window-casing!

I stumbled through some sort of a description which should not in any way compromise my sudden knowledge. My wit told me that if I said anything now it would put him on his guard.

Mr. Horton had not intended to stay long when he came; this I knew. My thoughts were busy, however, and I soon formed a plan. I pretended that I wanted to show him a book, so went into the library and wrote on a slip of paper:

"Wait here until Herbert Sheldon goes. I have something to tell you."

I slipped this into a book, and, carrying it back, handed it to Mr. Horton in such a way that he noticed the note and kept it concealed. He didn't even look at me, and at first I did not know whether he had noticed it; but he stayed on and on, and finally at ten o'clock Herbert Sheldon took his departure.

When he had gone, I said to Grace:

"My dear, I have something which I must tell Mr. Horton. I am afraid you cannot bear to hear it, and perhaps you had better go upstairs."

She went out of the room without a word, and I turned to the detective.

"Mr. Horton," I said, "have you ever suspected Herbert Sheldon?"

"Don't put me on the rack," he answered, smiling. "It is my business to ask questions, not to answer them. Tell me what you think."

"Herbert Sheldon's hand," I said, "is the exact counterpart of the imprint on the window casing in the library."

He started as though he had been shot.

"Heavens!" he said. "Is it possible? What proof have you?"

"I photographed that hand exactly on the day of the murder. I have the print of it upstairs."

"Why did you never tell me of this before?" he said.

"I do not know," I answered. "I only did it in the interest of science—that is, the science of palmistry."

I went upstairs and got the print. Mr. Horton looked at it carefully, and asked if he might keep it, and if I had the negative. I said yes to both questions. Then he inquired as to the previous relations of Mr. Sheldon and the Lawrence family. When I had finished, he said simply:

"Say nothing, even to Miss Lawrence. I believe we have the real clue to the murderer, but I can say no more. Keep your own counsel, and I will work it up. If I need you, I will see or send for you."

Grace didn't ask any questions as to my business with Mr. Horton, nor did we ever speak of it again. We left for the seaside early the next morning. Four weeks afterwards I received the following telegram:

"We have our man. Herbert Sheldon was arrested this morning. Has confessed."

The telegram was signed by Mr. Horton. Following up the clue of the tell-tale hand, his first step had been to have the books at the bank examined by an expert A deficiency of about two thousand pounds was found, Sheldon's peculations extending back for two years. He had been seen also in excited conversation with Mr. Lawrence in his private room at the bank on the day before the murder, and had left him pale and very much out of temper at four o'clock in the afternoon.

When he was arrested and confronted with the evidences of his guilt, he broke down and confessed all.

The letter finished as follows:

"It is all as plain as day now. But I doubt if we had ever unearthed the mystery if you had not studied palmistry and photographed that tell-tale hand."

Helen Winslow.

Digitized by Google

A MOTHER'S LOVE.

The flaming light of the sunset had long paled on the sky, and a thick wall of clouds had effaced the last ray of departing light on the horizon. Night was descending to the earth, spreading herself to the little village, and the lonely cottage at the end of it. The dark shadows crept in at the low windows, covering the ceiling, the corners, the cupboard, and the table, and only the large eyes of a purring cat, which sat comfortably on the bench near an old woman who was knitting, shone in the darkness. It was quiet in the little room, save for the untiring, monotonous clicking of the needle, the unceasing tic-tac of the clock. Now, with a whizzing sound, the clock began to strike, and its clear tones rang through the dark room.

"Eight! Now it is night; he will soon be here."

A sigh of relief left the old woman's breast. She laid aside her knitting, rose, and lighted a smoky oil lamp. Then she sat down again on the bench near the stove. The needles clicked on, the white-haired head sank on her breast, and she thought of the past.

Two years and a half ago! It was autumn. She was sitting on the same bench, waiting for her only son, who had been dismissed from the army service, to return. But he came not. The night passed, another day came, and again it was night. He came not.

"He will come to-morrow," she said each day; but the morrow dawned, and still he was absent.

Thus a week passed. Then the old letter-carrier passed her cottage.

"A letter, mother, from the only one!" he cheerily called.

He knew the stiff, awkward writing. Then he had hurried away, and "mother" had put on the horn spectacles—an old family piece, with large round glasses—stepped to the window in the full light of day, and opened the letter with trembling hands.

"Now I shall know," she thought.

She read the letter slowly! She had to spell it out word for word. The characters seemed fairly to dance on the white paper, and presently her eyes grew moist and the glasses became blinded.

"My Jano! my only son!" she moaned. Was he coming? Alas, no! The old woman sat down on the bench near the stove, clutched the letter nervously in both hands, and the tears, rolling over her wrinkled cheeks, fell upon the crumpled paper.

No, he was not coming! Perhaps he would never come! He was sitting in a close, dark cell; heavy, clattering chains fastened him to the wall. He was a criminal. He had killed a man in a scuffle. Now he would not come.

"Mother, I am innocent," he wrote, "I do not know how it happened."

The old woman only nodded her head. She knew how it happened. First the dismissal; then they drank and made merry. Her Jano was a gentle lad, but when men drink, what follows? She could picture the whole scene. Heads became heated, taunts flew hither and thither, one word provoked another, and then Jano's fist stirred, thrust itself upward—and the deed was done.

No, he did not return home. Two years and a half in prison! The old woman sat there, silent. Not a word of complaint passed her lips, not a tear shone in her eyes. She was thinking how she could avert some of the consequences of this calamity.

Suddenly she rose, put on a cheerful mien, forced a smile to her withered lips, and went to call on her relatives and friends. At every house she related, hesitatingly at first, then fluently, that her Jano, her only son, would not return home at present; he had become a sailor on a man-of-war, and was going on a cruise round the world. Her listeners were surprised at first; then they praised the courageous boy, and believed it all. The old woman thought she must choke with this, the first lie of her life. But no; upheld by her purpose, she told everybody without blushing or stammering, until the whole village knew the story.

"But what of Katha?" asked one. "She has waited long for Jano, and Peter, the miller's son, has been heard to say——"

"Ah! that false one! Let Katha beware of him!" quickly replied the old woman. "For the rest, she must be patient. Is not Jano winning money for them both? In truth, such a brave, handsome lad is worth waiting for."

She spoke with assurance; no one should know that in a fit of madness her Jano had fallen—that he was in prison. No—in that event he could never return to his village, to her, his mother, who loved him so. All the people would shun him like an outcast, would walk out of his way. The children would follow him, pelt him with stones, and call him "jail bird." Then, too, Katha, who loved him, who had remained true to him in spite of Peter's fierce wooing, who counted the hours until his return, when he would lead her to the altar—she would turn from him in disgust. No, not a soul should know of it.

And the old woman smiled, was friendly to everyone, and at the same time Death dwelt in her heart. At night, when all the villagers were sleeping, she knelt before the crucifix, and wept and prayed to God that He might spare her boy in prison.

One thing still worried her. Jano must return with good clothing, must bring back money from the long trip! And so she began to save, put penny after penny away. She liked sweetened coffee very much, but now she drank it bitter, and bought no more sugar. Penny after penny! Then she spent half the night in knitting for a city firm. But no one should know it. No, indeed! She stole away from the village, and came back secretly, like a thief, week after week, summer and winter, in storm, rain, or snow.

So time passed—two years and a half. Now it was time for Jano's return—that very day she expected him.

The old woman rose, went to the cupboard, taking from it a package of warm woollen stockings, a knitted jacket, a new pair of boots, and a silk kerchief. She had saved all that. She spread out the things on the white scrubbed table. Then she stepped to the bed, and took from under the pillow a small bag of coarse linen. There was a clinking within it. She was radiant with smiles. Two hundred francs! Yes, it had accumulated in the course of time.

Digitized by Google

She placed bread, ham, sausage, and butter on the table, and gave a last loving glance at it all. Everything was ready; now Jano could come.

Again she sat down on the bench, but ceased knitting. She listened. Was that not the well-known footstep approaching? She heard it in the yard, coming into the house; it stopped in front of the door of the room. She jumped up, but stood as if rooted to the spot, looking breathlessly towards the door. It opened softly; a tall, well-built young man came in, and two dark eyes peered at her questioningly from out a pale face.

"Mother!" he whispered.

But she had already thrown out her arms.

"Jano!" came trembling from the white lips, and in a moment he lay at her breast, and held her in tight embrace.

He had returned, her Jano, her only son!

Yes, he was again at home, and remained there. The threatening spectre of prison punishment lay behind him, thanks to his mother's love. The villagers greeted the well-dressed young man in friendly fashion, shook hands with him, and were happy that he was again in their midst. The men of the tavern made room for him at their table, drank to his health, and he had to tell them of his travels round the world. He related all sorts of things, as he had read or heard other people tell them. They had no exact knowledge of such matters here.

Then he began to work in field and meadow, day after day, untiringly. As his mother said, Jano was a good lad, industrious, kind, and honest. His only fault had been a fondness for the cup at times; but the terrible lesson he had learnt had cured him of that for ever.

After work was over, when approaching night bade all labour cease, his betrothed came tripping over the fields, and then all three, mother, Katha, and he, sat in the garden and talked over the future, the wedding, and how happy they would then be! So Jano gradually lost a certain nervous expression which had at first been noticeable, and appeared as gay as ever.

He laughed and joked, and made his old mother's life happy and bright. She looked at him with pride and forgot the past, while to Jano the dreary years spent in prison seemed like a bad dream.

It was a warm summer day. The sun shot its vertical rays down upon the earth. Worn and weary, the flowers drooped their heads. The leaves on the trees looked wilted. Not a bird in the air, not an animal in field or meadow. All had fled from the piercing rays of the sun.

Jano came along the path which lay between the gardens. He wore no coat; a wide-brimmed straw hat shaded his face, and he carried a rake over his right shoulder. Thus he walked along cheerfully, not heeding the dust which whirled up in dense clouds at every step, and then remained suspended in the air, immovable.

Suddenly he halted. A man, stooping and crawling along, slowly approached him. He was bare-footed, wore torn linen trousers and a patched and greasy jacket, under which a soiled shirt was visible. A crushed felt hat covered his unkempt hair. His face was framed by a stubbly grey beard, and the wild eyes glanced about unsteadily and penetratingly.

The tramp halted when he espied Jano. He shielded his eyes with his hand in order to see better, whistled softly, and, with a few steps, was beside the young man.

"Look here," he said in a husky voice, distorting his face by a horrible grin, "isn't this my partner of number seven?"

Jano turned pale, made a step backwards, and looked at the tramp in horror. But the latter continued calmly:

"Well, you do not remember me, it seems. I'll help your memory. I am Long Jacob, your old room mate and friend."

"And what do you want here?" Jano stammered confused.

And the beggar laughed hoarsely to himself.

"What do I want here? I want money—nothing more!"

Jano took a few francs from his pocket and said:

"There, take these, but go away from here—do not beg in the village. Don't let anyone see you. Don't tell anyone you know me."

The ex-convict had seized the coins quickly; now he asked in a surly tone:

"You are ashamed of me, are you?"

Jano shook his head, looked about cautiously, and whispered in his ear:

"No, no. But the people in the village do not know that—that I was in gaol, and they shall not know it, either. I never drink now. I have reformed."

"Reformed!" The beggar shook his head gravely. "I would like to reform too, but people will not let me; and beside, I suppose I have grown too old. Well, I won't betray you, Jano. Why should I? You were always a good fellow to me and were more sinned against than sinning. Never fear; I am going now, and in five minutes I'll be outside of the village. You may believe me, and I'll give you my word for it. I have a bit of honour left in me, too! A tramp's honour!"

Again he laughed low and mockingly, nodded to Jano, grinning, and dragged himself slowly on.

The young man stood watching him until he disappeared round a corner, and then looked about him anxiously. Far and wide nothing stirred—no one was to be seen.

"I am still safe," he muttered.

With a sigh of relief he went quickly towards his cottage. The threatening storm seemed to have passed by him fortunately once more.

But he had hardly left the scene of the interview when a stalwart young peasant emerged from behind a dense shrub in a neighbouring garden, leapt over the low fence, and ran quickly in the direction in which the beggar disappeared.

"Ah! ah! my fine fellow, we shall see!" he exultantly cried.

It was Peter, the miller's son.

The old tramp had really intended to leave the village, but as he walked down the road and neared an inn, he suddenly stood still, undecided as to what he should do. He shook his head, and walked on hesitatingly; then he again stood still, turned round, and came back slowly, muttering to himself:

"Well, I suppose I can take a little wine; I won't have to say anything because of that."

Presently he sat in a dingy corner of the low tavern with the third glass of wine standing before him. Ah, how the taste revived him! The stuff was good, and the cool room was agreeable to sit in, in spite of the innkeeper looking at him sideways distrustfully.

"Oh, I will pay! I have money!" he cried.

He put his hand into his pocket, brought out a franc and threw it on the table.

Digitized by Google

"Give me another glass of wine."

The innkeeper came up promptly, seized the franc, and soon brought the liquor and some small change. At the same moment another guest came in at the door. It was the young peasant. When he espied the tramp in the corner he approached him, slapped him on the shoulder, and cried:

"Good morrow, good friend. I have but now come from Jano. You know him—are relative to him, perhaps?"

The tramp, half intoxicated, looked up in surprise and muttered, swinging his heavy head to and fro:

"Not that I know. He! he! Related!"

He laughed, seized the full glass and emptied it at one draught.

Peter beckoned to the innkeeper, and then continued:

"Well, I presume then that you are not. But drink on; I'll pay for it, and these"—he held out two bright francs—"shall be yours, if you'll tell me what you know about Jano."

The tramp shook his head, but reached for the full glass.

"Oh, I guess not! I guess not!" he chuckled. "Shall I betray Jano—such a good fellow! No, no, I won't do that! Have some honour left in me!"

Peter shrugged his shoulders, produced another two francs, and pushed all four close to the convict.

"These, they are yours—and now tell me quickly what you know; I have no time to spare."

The tramp gazed at the coins avariciously.

"Four francs!" he murmured, "four francs! I have given my word—but four francs! And it is nothing very bad." He turned to Peter. "You needn't tell anybody about it—for—well, yes."

With a hasty motion he secured the money and said:

"In a scuffle Jano knocked his opponent lifeless, and so had to spend a few months in gaol. It was done in self defence. There is nothing more—nothing more."

He muttered something incomprehensible, but Peter had already left the tavern. He stood out in the street, clutched his fists, and hissed through his teeth:

"At last, Jano, at last! Now Katha will be mine!"

* * * * *

It was evening. In the far west the sun descended to the horizon, and sank in a sea of flame. Laughing girls with the rake over their shoulder, and sober peasants, with smoking pipes in mouth, returned from the field, and all seemed refreshed by the fine, cool evening.

Jano came along a grassy path. He looked very handsome, with his glossy hair and bright eyes, and a smile of contentment played round his lips. Presently he reached the cottage where his Katha lived with her mother. The door stood open, but he went by it, passed round the house, opened a small gate, and entered a large orchard and vegetable garden.

Over yonder, on a wooden bench, sat the girl he was looking for. Her back was towards him. As he stood behind her, calling to her, she turned round as if frightened, and Jano, much astonished, looked into a pale and tear-stained face.

"Katha!" He bent over the girl and touched her shoulder. "You have been crying. Why? What has happened?"

She did not answer, but buried her face in her hands and sobbed aloud.

"Katha, tell me what is the matter; what ails you?"

Then she drew her hands away from her face, looked at him steadily, and although she trembled, yet without faltering the words came from her lips:

"Jano, I beseech you, by our love, tell me the truth; is it true that you did not sail round the world, but you were—in prison?"

He looked at her in dismay; his face had turned deathly pale, and he had to lean against a tree to prevent himself from falling.

"Katha, who—who told you that?" he stammered.

She did not heed his question, but stepping nearer to him repeated:

"Tell me, Jano, is it true?"

It never occurred to the young man to deny the charge. He was above the sin of deliberate falsehood. His head sank, and in a dull, scarcely audible tone, he said:

"Yes."

She answered nothing. Silently she turned from him, drew the little narrow gold band from her finger, placed it on the bench and went slowly towards the house.

"Katha!"

The cry was heart-rending, but she did not turn back once, and disappeared into the house.

Jano stood leaning against the tree for a long, long time. Not a word passed his lips, nor did he revile the drunken man who had betrayed him; his only thought was his mother.

"Poor mother! You worked, suffered, and endured hunger in vain. Your son is a convict! The people will shout it loudly into your ears, and in your old age you will reap mockery and taunts. Poor mother!"

Night had come. Silver stars sparkled in the sky; a cricket chirped in the corn field; the frogs were croaking over in yonder marsh; the rushing of the river close by sounded dull. Suddenly there was a piercing scream. It came from a great distance. Was it the cry of some animal?

At early dawn next morning a group of men moved along the village street. Two of them carried a bier covered with a cloth, and behind them walked the miller and the village squire.

"Yes, it was this way." The miller was just concluding a long speech. "When the people called me they had already found Jano. How he fell into the river I do not know."

"H'm! Neither do I," the squire remarked.

"I am sorry for his poor old mother," continued the miller. "She has hardly had Jano back after so long an absence when she must lose him in this terrible way."

"Yes, I pity the poor woman," the squire said.

They had by this time reached their destination.

"Wait out here," the squire ordered the two bearers, and then he entered the cottage with his companion.

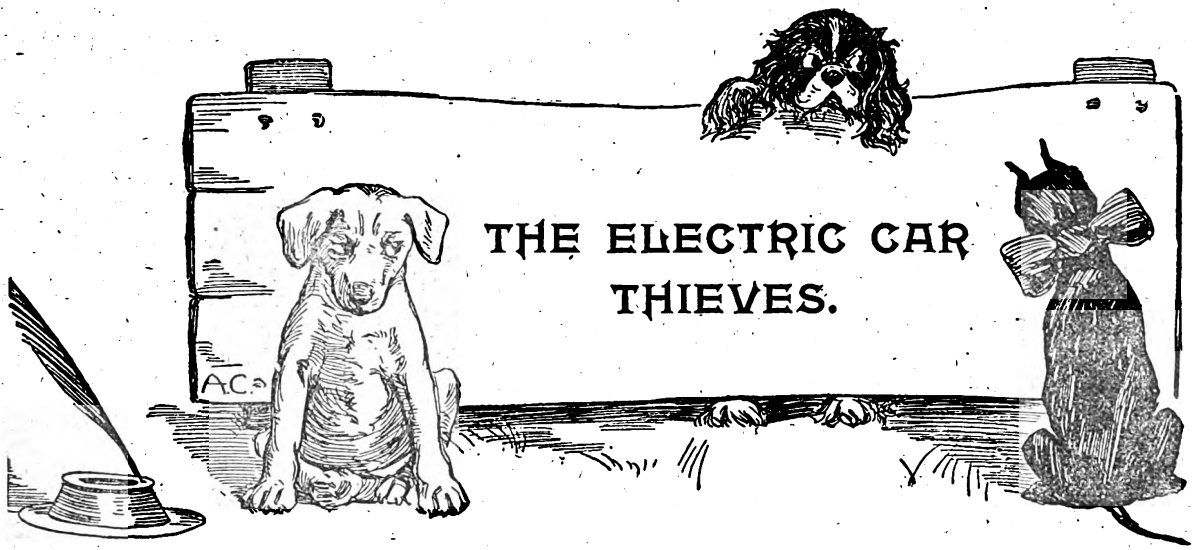
They walked through the dark hall into the one room. It was dim here. But the sun was rising, colouring the sky a fiery red, and the reflection shone through the little windows, skimming over a white scrubbed table, upon which lay an open Bible, and the old woman, who sat upon a chair with her hands folded. The white-haired head was inclined slightly forward, her face pale; a peacefully quiet smile played about her white lips, and the wide opened eyes stared fixedly.

Both men cast one glance only at the woman apparently asleep; then they doffed their caps, folded their hands, and murmured a prayer for her who had so peacefully passed out of life.

Yes! God had spared her the worst. Jano's mother was dead.

François Surl.

Digitized by Google



THE ELECTRIC CAR THIEVES.

"I BELIEVE my reputation as a detective began while I was in Germany," said the inspector in reply to my inquiry. "I was brought up in Berlin, and I joined the detective force in that city. I'll tell you about my first real success.

"It was just after the electric trams had started in—— well, I won't mention the place, as it might offend some of my friends over there.

"It seems that the authorities of the city had had much trouble with pickpockets, and after failing to catch any of them, they had decided to send to Berlin for some unknown detective to work the lay. The chief detailed me, as the least known I presume, and two days later I was in the private office of the head of the city police, receiving instructions.

"'These robberies,' said he, 'are evidently the work of some persons well up in their profession. Why, to tell you the truth, my own men have had their pockets relieved and known nothing of it until they came in to make their report that no suspicious characters were on the street. Think of it! Much of the trouble has been on the tramcars—the electrics—and although I have had at least two men on that service for more than a month, the complaints have continued just the same.'

"I told him it was necessary that my arrival should be kept a profound secret.

"'Without that,' said I, 'I shall be of no more use than your own men, for I do not think that I am any smarter. They have failed, doubtless, because the thieves know them, and avoid them. If they learn that I am here, and come to know me, I might as well go back home.'

"This little flattery did the chief good, and he agreed at once that no one should know of my presence, he being the only one of the force that was aware of it yet.

"With this arranged, I bade him 'good-morning,' and at once prepared my plan of campaign.

"I had brought a number of disguises with me, and, putting on one of these, I made a thorough examination of the city, rode on the cars, visited some of the saloons and beer gardens, and generally took in the town.

"When I had concluded, I was obliged to admit that I had seen nothing that gave me the slightest clue to my game, and that the work cut out for me was evidently of the most difficult.

"The second day I appeared as a farmer, clad in heavy, rough clothing, with muffler and mittens.

"In this style I rode on the cars of the electric line from one end of the city to the other; saw thousands of people, but not one that I could with safety call a 'crook.' The matter troubled me more and more every hour, and when, that night, I found my own pocket lighter in change, I was not only puzzled, but, as you may think, thoroughly angry.

"I would catch the clever thief, or make this city too hot to hold him, or them; and with that determination I began my third day's work.

"This time I filled my pockets with small change, and rode on the electric line again. For the complaints, strangely enough, were almost confined to that line.

"Upon examining my pockets in a quiet place after a long ride I missed some money. I was angry, so much so that I decided to rest for the remainder of the day.

"The morning following I was early at work, this time as a labourer, but money sewn into my pockets, so that any effort to extract it would come to my notice.

"The day was stormy, and riding uncomfortable because of the crowds. It was bad, too, for my plans, but I kept at it without the slightest sign of any luck.

"As I left a car about twelve o'clock and turned toward a coffee-shop to find a lunch, I was followed by the conductor, bent on the same errand.

"As we entered the restaurant together, he, remembering me on the car, spoke of the weather, and how bad it was for traffic.

"I replied, and we sat down at the same table.

"After some general conversation he said with a laugh:

"'Did you see that fellow get a shock this morning? He got his heel against the heater, and as his other foot was on the metal mat on the floor, and wet with snow, he got quite a dose. He jumped as if he had been shot!'

"'How's that?' said I. 'Do I understand that it is possible to get a shock on your cars? I thought the claim was made that they are perfectly safe?'

Digitized by Google

"'Oh, they're safe enough,' he replied; 'but, you see, the heater that stands against the seats behind your legs is full of electricity. Of course, it won't hurt you simply to touch it; but if your feet are all snow and on the metal mat when you touch it, you will get a shock. I've often laughed to see women jump.'

"After I had eaten my lunch I returned to my watch, but no results followed. Then I went to my room and proceeded to think. When I retired that night I had evolved a plan that I believed would result in the capture of my quarry.

"The next morning was bright and pleasant, and soon after nine o'clock I was again on the cars, this time as a retired soldier—that is, I had an empty sleeve, my arm being hidden under my buttoned coat, and in general was military in manner and appearance. But there was one thing that did not pertain to my disguise, and it was this: in each pocket of my trousers I carried a long key-chain of steel, which, if allowed to dangle, would reach quite to the floor. How I proposed to work it will appear later.

"Before entering a car, I took pains to cover my feet with snow to such an extent that I could knock off enough on the floor to wet the shoesoles of anyone sitting next me. Then I chose a seat near the little heaters that stood against the sides, and fell into a doze.

"I would ride sometimes a mile, and sometimes further, then change cars, avoiding any appearance on the same car twice. The fine day was in my favour, for many people were without rubber-soled shoes, and therefore the more likely to feel the shock if they meddled with my pockets.

"Although seemingly half asleep, I can assure you that I watched carefully the parties who seated themselves near me, and if a suspicious-looking one appeared, I would allow the steel chain to dangle down to the floor until it touched the heater, then with the wet snow on the metal mat about the feet of my neighbour, do you not see that any hand coming in contact with the coins, which were in the same pocket as the remainder of the chain, would necessarily receive a sharp shock?

"I had passed two hours or more, riding a number of miles and watching a number of persons, but no one had yet appeared who seemed to me at all suspicious.

"At last, just as I entered a car and knocked a fresh lot of snow on to the mat at the side of the seat I desired, two men came into it, both of whom looked to me like 'crooks.'

"I was on the alert at once, and as they stepped in, I was about to move so that one of them might seat himself near me, when two ladies also entered, both well dressed, and evidently women of fashion, and the men paused and permitted them to take seats first.

"One of them placed herself close to me, and I looked as if I were going to change my position.

"The chain was hanging as I have described, for I had arranged it as the men entered, and I was mentally reviling my ill luck, paying no attention to my business at all, when a shriek rang through the car, I felt a hand struggling in my pocket, and almost mechanically I seized it.

"In an instant the car was in an uproar, for I had gripped the fair wrist of one of the fashionables who had seated herself by my side—and worse, within her closed hand she held some of my money and a bit of my key-chain. The clever pickpockets were women.

"Recovering my self-possession as soon as possible, I smilingly apologised to the lady for the condition of affairs, but retained my hold of her hand and insisted upon her accompanying me to the police-station.

"At first she objected, and her companion joined with her in refusing, but I quickly showed my authority for arresting them.

"A sudden hush fell upon those in the car, and as my prisoners began weeping, I said:

"'Ladies and gentlemen,—I am not a resident of this city, but have been called here to discover certain unknown thieves who have picked your pockets for the past few months. I am pleased to announce that I have been successful, and that the electric cars will be safe for travel after my friends here have found a new lodging.'"

Margie K.

WHAT IS THE NEXT BOOK WE CAN SEND YOU?

Every week we shall give away half-a-dozen books.

All a competitor has to do is to send us one Book Coupon cut from The Sunday Reader, one from the Athletic Record, and one from Short Stories.

Send these to us in one envelope together with a request for any single book in the whole world of literature.

From the applications we receive we shall each week pick out six and send the books asked for.

All applications to be addressed to "BOOKS," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please let me have: S. S.

Book.....

Price.....

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Result of the "Book" Competition for the Week Ending February 26th.

E. F. McCalmont, 115, Sugarfield Street, Belfast.
"Peter Sharpe's Flax Spinning." 3s. 6d.

A. C. Quick, Church Square, Guernsey.
"More Tramps Abroad." By Mark Twain. 6s.

E. Lambert, 1, Sunnyside, Sandgate, Kent.
"Townsend's Everyday Book of Modern Literature." 5s.

W. G. Harris, Upper Street, Shere, near Guildford.
"Final War." By Louis Tracy. 6s.

Harvey Smith, 52, Vincent Parade, Balsall Heath, Birmingham.
"To Greenland and the Pole." 5s.

Charles Chadwick, 103, Harewood Street, Bradford.
"Wright's Book of Poultry." 10s. 6d.

Digitized by Google

No Beauty Without White Teeth.

DR. EMY'S
ALBAZENE.

THE PUREST AND MOST ELEGANT DENTIFRICE IN THE WORLD.

TO KEEP YOUR TEETH SOUND KEEP THEM CLEAN.

Absolutely Uninjurious.

In boxes, 1s., of all Chemists, or Post Free from THE ALBAZENE COMPANY, 276 STRAND.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. Taylor, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

Deer Rectory, Mintlaw, Aberdeen,
From Rev. J. H. Burn. November 8th, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

Digitized by Google

LAST WRITTEN, ▪ ▪ ▪ ▪ ▪ FIRST READ.

MINER wishes to know if it is true that the Mint authorities will coin a man's own metal for him.————If you refer to gold, it is perfectly true, but they will not coin your silver for you. The Mint buys its own silver and makes a very good profit on coining it.

L. D.—Quite right. In Scotland, at one time, capital punishment was by drowning.

F. B. G.—There is no reason whatever why your wedding should not take place upon any day of the year your bride-to-be should fix upon. A couple of centuries ago it was quite a different matter, however. There were certain "close" seasons every year. From Septuagesima Sunday until Low Season, weddings were forbidden, also from Rogation Sunday to Trinity Sunday. At Advent marriages were once more discouraged, and it was not until January 13th following that weddings were again permitted.

L. P. C. wants to know why soldiers carry canes in their hands.———— Probably to prevent them from slouching, as a good many civilians do; and they undoubtedly add smartness to the general appearance of Tommy Atkins.

NATURALIST.—To find the rarest bird in existence, you must go to the mountains between Annam and Laos, where there is a certain kind of pheasant. For many years its existence was known only by the fact that its longest and most splendid plume was in much request by mandarins for their headgear. A single skin is worth £80, and the bird living would be priceless, for it soon dies in captivity.

ATHLETE.—Indian wrestlers and athletes train on a diet consisting chiefly of milk, with a little goat's flesh and plenty of farinaceous food.

JACK asks: "Why do widows wear caps?"————The origin of the custom is extremely ancient. It may be traced back to the Egyptian and and Grecian practice of shaving off the hair in periods of mourning. But as without hair there was a danger of catching cold, the men wore wigs upon their bald crowns, and the women caps. The custom was continued by the Romans for some time, but after it was partially abandoned, the women still concealed their hair.

N. P.—The reason popular tales are not put into writing amongst the Mohammedans is that the reading of romances is forbidden in the Koran; they are therefore passed from one story-teller to another.

SOCIALIST.—The share of land that would fall to each inhabitant of the globe were it equally divided would be about twenty-three and a half acres.

J. C.—Yes, it was stated by an electrical expert only about twelve years ago, when giving evidence before a Parliamentary Committee, that he did believe that the telephone would come into very general use in this country. He probably admits his mistake now. The telephone would be far more extensively used than it is, were the service as efficient as it ought to be and the rates less exorbitant; but while the annual fee is so high, and the instrument retains the character it seems to have acquired as a machine for the generation of bad language, its use will be restricted.

D. G.—The costliest fur is that of the sea otter. A single skin of this animal will fetch as much as £200.

E. B.—As regards its main origin, English is certainly a Low German language, while modern German is a High German tongue. This does not, however, imply any inferiority in the origin of our speech, as you seem to imagine. Low German was spoken by the inhabitants of the low-lying coastland whence our Saxon ancestors came, and High German by the inhabitants of the higher interior country.

DUBIOUS writes: "If a man finds a letter lying in the road, stamped and addressed, what should he do with it?"————The most sensible thing would be for him to post it in the nearest pillar box. If, however, he did not care to take the responsibility of posting it, he had better hand it to the first policeman he meets.

S. C.—If kept continuously running, a watch will tick 160,144,000 times in a year.

STICKLER.—Your idea that only one who has lost both parents is, correctly speaking, an orphan, is quite wrong. The word "orphan" comes from the Greek, and merely means one bereft of either parent. The word was, therefore, used quite correctly in the phrase to which you take objection.

W. D.—There are many ways of proving that the human eye does not always see things as they are. For instance, if a column which supports an entablature is perfectly straight, it appears to lean outward, and it is therefore made to lean inward; the edges of roofs are raised slightly at the centre, as if made perfectly level they would appear to drop about the middle; corners are made to look square by being in reality a little broader-angled, and hundreds of other similar examples might be given.

WILLIAM B.—A single bee collects only about a teaspoonful of honey during a season.

ALICE G. has recently broken off her engagement, but she has not yet returned the ring. She writes to ask if this is necessary.————Of course it is. You should not have broken off the engagement in the first place without returning the ring at the same time. Under the circumstances it would be quite natural if your lover were to suppose that you were not serious, and merely regarded it as what is commonly known as a "lover's quarrel." Besides, to dismiss the man and keep his presents would be distinctly bad taste on your part.

S. W.—The first permanent military force in England was the King's Guard of Yeomen, established in 1486.

ALWAYS THE SAME writes to say that he cannot understand why people should be constantly changing the cut, shape, and general style of their clothes. To him it is nothing but a source of annoyance and inconvenience. "For instance," he writes, "twenty years ago I began to wear collars of a certain shape, but, no sooner had I got accustomed to it, than it was out of fashion. As it was extremely comfortable I have refused to wear any other style ever since, but have had to have them made specially for me."————————You ought to try and accommodate yourself to the varying moods of fashion, to a reasonable extent. Under the circumstances you ought to go to China. There a man may wear the same clothes for a lifetime without being out of style, so little does the fashion change.

O. H. asks: "Has a woman ever been Pope?"————There is a tradition to that effect, but it has been refuted over and over again. "Pope Joan," as she was called, was supposed to have lived in the eleventh century, and to have worn the tiara for the space of two years under the title of John VII.

W. S.—Your morning cup of coffee will give you a good idea of what kind of weather to expect. When the bubbles that collect on the top of the coffee form a frothy mass in the centre of the cup, you may rely upon fine weather; on the other hand, if it collects in a ring round the edge of the cup, you may expect rain.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

HAND STAMP

in Handsome Box, with Ink, post free on receipt, 2s. 2d.

WILLIAM J. SLOANE, 19 CARLISLE ST., DUBLIN.

DR MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL SOAP

Prepared with Arsenic, Zinc, and other Ingredients as a beautifier of Skin and Complexion.

Madame PATTI says: "Most Excellent."

6d. and 1s.

Eradicates Spots and all Imperfections.

Of all Chemists, etc., or post free from S. HARVEY Ltd., 5 Denman Street, London Bridge, S.E.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO. 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road. 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

CYCLE DEPOTS

High-class Selection of GENTS', LADIES', & JUVENILE CYCLES. From £3 Cash, or on Easy Terms 10/- Monthly. Head Depot: 52 to 55 Blackfriars Road, London, S.E.

BEST IN LONDON. Lists Post Free.

CYCLEDOM LTD.

RIDING SCHOOLS

Practical Tuition Until Perfect, 10/6. Single Lesson, 2/-. PURCHASERS TAUGHT FREE. Open 9 till 9. West End Branch: 124 King's Road, Sloane Square, S.W.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps.

ALEX. ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London.

Opposite Bedford Row. (Est. 1850.)

Parcel free from observation

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates Free. Tobacconists Commencing. See Illustrated Guide (259 pages), 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000. Tobacconists Outfitting Company, 186 Euston Road, London.

The largest and original house (50 years' reputation). Mgr., H. Myers.

THE BEST HAIR DYE

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d., 5s. 6d., and 10s. 6d.

A BIG OFFER

£3 IN MONEY TO EACH PERSON £3

Purchasing a Box of Tablets, and who fills in the two lines of rhyme correctly as below. This exceptional offer is to advertise ARCHER'S DIGESTIVE TABLETS. All we ask in return is that purchasers will recommend them to all their friends; by so doing it will largely advertise our Firm, and help to rapidly build us up a large trade. Every box bears the Government Revenue Stamp.

DR. ARCHER.

ARCHER'S DIGESTIVE TABLETS.

Price 1/3 per box, post free.

The best and simplest of spring medicines.
Far better than noxious Pills and dangerous Drugs!

ARCHER'S marvellous little Tablets are made on the principle that most of the ordinary troubles of Indigestion are due to an over-acid condition of the secreting glands of the stomach. Any doctor will tell you this. Counteract this acidity, and Indigestion, with all its many unpleasant consequences—Biliousness, Pain in the Chest and Back, Flatulence, Sick Headache, Lassitude, Want of Appetite, Liver Disorders, Constipation, &c.—all disappear. This happy result is almost magically brought about by taking after meals one of ARCHER'S TABLETS.

In order to well introduce Archer's Tablets we make the following

SPLENDID OFFER.—Underneath are four lines of Rhyme; in the first two most of the letters are left out. We don't pretend it is good poetry, but it tells what our Tablets are, and what they can do. That is all we want.

TO EVERYONE who fills in the missing letters correctly, and sends them to us with a Postal Order and Stamps value 1/3 (for a box of Tablets), we promise to send £3.

A . . . . . 's D . . . . . e T . . . . . s H . . p T . D . . . . t T . . F . . d.
T . . . . . y C . . . . . e T . . S . . . . . m, S . . . . . n A . . S . . . . . n T . . B . . . d.

Sweet and pleasant in flavour they are liked by young and old,
Once tried, always taken: worth their weight in gold.

ARCHER'S DIGESTIVE TABLETS HELP TO DIGEST THE FOOD. THEY THOROUGHLY CLEANSE THE SYSTEM FROM ALL IMPURITIES, AND STRENGTHEN AND SWEETEN THE BLOOD.

DIRECTIONS.—Write the two lines filled in correctly on a sheet of paper, and send it with a Postal Order value 1/3 (for the tablets), and a stamped addressed envelope for results, to ARCHER'S TABLET CO., 111 GREAT RUSSELL STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Those availing themselves of this big offer must send their orders for Tablets soon as possible, as it will close on April 14th, 1898. The results and Prizes will be posted to all on April 25th. The Tablets will be sent soon after the order is received as possible. Write your name and address on the envelope very plain. (This offer applies to the United Kingdom only.) Mention the name of this paper.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.

Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.

A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious, Non-Alcoholic Wine. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger Lemon, Orange, Blackberry etc.

YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

Google

1898 PROCLAMATION.

"OH, YES! REVENUES FROM ECONOMY ARE ENORMOUS."

THE RICHEST PROVISION in KNOWLEDGE made ABSOLUTELY EASY for the ACCUMULATION of this INCOME. Write to Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son, Carpet Manufacturers, of the City of Leeds, who will provide you with full information, posting you free (if, when writing, you mention this paper) a large, amazingly interesting, valuable, instructive, and detailed illustrated "Spring" Reduction Catalogue, showing you what you can save, what to buy, and where to buy Carpets, Mats, and Hearthrugs of every manufacture, including Wilton, Plush, Brussels Velvet, Antique, Foreign, and Furs, also QUEEN'S ROYAL HOUSEHOLD, PRUDENTIAL, ECLIPSE, and ALARM CARPETS and HEARTHRUGS (Regd.). Also Blankets, Curtains, Sheetings, etc., and a thousand other articles wanted in every household. (Copyright.)

The "Queen's Royal" Household Carpets and Hearthrugs are extolled by all the Nations of the Earth.

Gigantic Sale of the "QUEEN'S ROYAL" Household

Sale Price. 2/- HEARTHRUGS Regd. Sale Price. 2/-

In Reversible Rich Turkey patterns, measuring 6ft. long, and 3ft wide. These Hearthrugs have gained a world-wide reputation for Magnificence, Cheapness, and Utility, having no equal. Registered New Designs, and considered Works of Art. Thousands of repeat orders and testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 for 5/9, 6 for 11/3, 12 for 22/-.

Gigantic Sale of the "QUEEN'S ROYAL" Household Reversible Rich Turkey Pattern

TRADE MARK ON ALL GOODS. CARPETS (REGD.) BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

ADMITTEDLY THE CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD. Woven without seam. Altogether superior quality, with handsome border to correspond. A marvel for excellence and beauty. Thousands of repeat orders and testimonials received giving the highest satisfaction. When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

Reduced Sale Price.	Reduced Sale Price.	Reduced Sale Price.	Reduced Sale Price.
6ft. by 9ft. 7/6	9ft. by 9ft. 11/-	10½ft. by 12ft. 18/-	12ft. by 15ft. 25/6
8ft. by 9ft. 9/-	9ft. by 10½ft. 13/6	12ft. by 12ft. 21/-	12ft. by 18ft. 30/-
6ft. by 12ft. 10/6	9ft. by 12ft. 15/-	9ft. by 15ft. 19/6	12ft. by 21ft. 35/6
	9ft. by 13½ft. 16/6	12ft. by 13½ft. 22/-

COLOSSAL SALE OF RICH VELVET PILE Sale Price.

REAL BRUSSELS HEARTHRUGS 5/6

In Rich Oriental and Indian Art Designs, measuring 6ft. by 3ft., which for price, real value, weight and richness of manufacture will be found unapproachable.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Rugs, 16/-; 6 for 31/-.

"Melville Castle, Glasswade, Midlothian, June 1st.

The Right Honourable The Viscountess Melville writes: "I am very pleased with the 'Royal' Velvet Hearthrugs to hand, and would like four more Hearthrugs. Her ladyship would also like two Velvet Carpets at 39/-, one ditto 60/6 to match them. Cheque £8 14s. inclosed."

Colossal Sale of

RICH VELVET PILE REAL BRUSSELS CARPETS.

Extraordinarily Heavy, very best Quality, Newest and Choicest Designs. In Old Gold, Sultan, Terra-Cotta, Crimson, Sky, Navy, and the latest colours. With handsome border to correspond. Guaranteed to wear for years, and give every satisfaction. The sizes and prices as follows (all ready for putting down):

REDUCED SALE PRICE LIST.	4½ft. by 7ft. 11/-	VELVET PILE BRUSSELS CARPET SQUARES.	9ft. by 12ft. 38/-
	6ft. by 9ft. 18/-		11ft. by 12ft. 47/-
	7½ft. by 9ft. 23/-		12ft. by 13½ft. 59/-
	9ft. by 9ft. 28/-		12ft. by 16ft. 69/-
	9ft. by 10½ft. 33/-		12ft. by 18ft. 77/-

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any colour preferred.

GENUINE CARPETS

IMPORTANT REMARKS.—A lady customer writes complaining that we send out too large a carpet for the money. Be this so or not, we send out no carpet measuring less than 6ft. by 9ft.—even for 2/6. Test them. They Will Surprise You. A Sample "Alarm" Carpet, Reversible and Bordered. Guaranteed Genuine Bargains. Large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room; if post free, 8d. extra.

Cheques and P.O.'s to F. HODGSON & SON, LEEDS.

REDUCED SALE PRICE 2/6

SPECIAL. Specially Reduced 1898.

INTRODUCTION SALE PARCEL

With FREE GIFT enclosed.

THE LOT 10/6

CONSISTING OF

1 Magnificently Rich Cream-Coloured Curly Sheepskin HEARTHRUG, average size 6ft. by 3ft., perfection in quality.

1 Beautiful Reversible Art Crimson Plush BED RUG, SOFA COVER, OR TABLE COVER, double warp, very heavy, size 50in. by 78in.

2 Beautiful Silver Goatskin DOOR MATS, lined woollen cloth throughout, pinked edges, best finish, ornamental to any room.

1 Elegant HAIR BRUSH, highly finished, with mirror back.

"Given Away."

Providing "Short Stories" Coupon, 19/3/98, is quoted, a FREE GIFT will be enclosed—a very handsome Electro-Silver Plated "OWL" PEPPER STAND, with coloured eyes and gilt feet.

Cash returned if not satisfied.

(Signed) F. Hodgson & Son.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE POST FREE.

We rely upon spontaneous Repeat Orders from our Clients for the Maintenance of our Trade. Established nearly a Quarter of a Century. All Orders dispatched same day, in rotation, as they arrive by post. N.B.—Foreign Orders executed and packed free, and shipped at lowest rates.

Telegraphic Address: "ECLIPSE, LEEDS." CHEQUES AND P.O.'s PAYABLE TO

F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

OUR NEW VENTURE.

Yes, Two Different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the price of one! (Copyright.)

PRODIGIOUS SALE OF THE "PRUDENTIAL"

REVERSIBLE CARPETS (Regd.)

Reversible, woven throughout, with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in twelve sizes only. These Carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine on one side the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian, and on the reverse the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

When this Design is wanted in Hearthrug or Carpet as shown above, kindly quote Registered No. 203405.

	Reduced Sale Price			Reduced Sale Price
6ft. by 9ft.		4s. 9d.	9ft. by 15ft.		12s 9d.
7½ft. by 9ft.		5s. 11d.	12ft. by 12ft.		12s. 9d.
9ft. by 9ft.		7s. 6d.	12ft. by 13½ft.		14s. 6d.
9ft. by 10½ft.		8s. 6d.	12ft. by 15ft.		15s. 9d.
9ft. by 12ft.		9s. 6d.	12ft. by 18ft.		19s. 6d.
10½ft. by 12ft.		11s. 6d.	12ft. by 21ft.		22s. 6d.

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

Blairquhan, Maybole, N.B., Aug. 3rd.—Lady Hunter Blair writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son send her another 'Prudential' Carpet, same as before, crimson and gold, dimensions, 9ft. by 10½ft. Cheque enclosed."

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Regd.), to match above Carpets, sent for 1s. 6d. extra, size 2yd long and 1yd. wide.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Hearthrugs for 4/3, 6 for 8/-, or 12 for 15/6. Sterling Value

F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 482. FOR WEEK ENDING MARCH 26TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

PHYSICIANS AND SCIENTISTS REPORT THAT FROMMS EXTRACT
IS A PERFECT FOOD
FOR INFANTS AND INVALIDS
AS WELL AS FOR THE
STRONG AND HEALTHY.
HALF THE PRICE OF MEAT EXTRACTS.

SOLD BY CHEMISTS AND GROCERS

10/6 ALLEN FOSTER & CO., 10/6
SOLE MAKERS OF THE
'Alfosco' Costumes

These marvellous Costumes are acknowledged throughout the world to be far SUPERIOR IN VALUE, STYLE, AND FINISH to any Costumes ever yet offered to the public at anything approaching the same prices.

Design No. 847.—Ten and Sixpence.
The Chesterfield Costume is in great demand this season.
ALLEN FOSTER & CO. are offering a special line of extraordinary value. This charming Costume is made in the Specialite Serge, tailor made, and well-finished. Full size skirt.
PRICE ONLY
10/6
SKIRT ONLY 5/6
or in the new Venetian Cloth, only 13/6
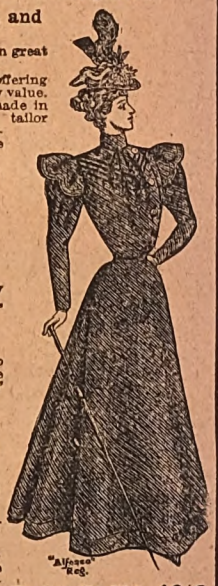
This Costume also looks well in the pretty Edinboro' Tweed, price
18/6
PATTERNS FREE.

Design No. 750 Ten and Sixpence.
This is a very smart "Alfosco" Costume made in the Specialite Serge. It has the new Russian Blouse Style of Bodice shaped to the figure at back. It has prettily designed epaulettes, and the bodice is trimmed with rows of flat braid and large buttons. The bodice and sleeves are lined; the skirt is cut full and well made. ALLEN FOSTER & CO. have great confidence in recommending this Costume. It never fails to give the utmost satisfaction.



Design No. 847. 10/6 Design No. 750. 10/6

THOUSANDS OF TESTIMONIALS.

Costume Complete, 10/6. Skirt only, 5/6.

This Costume in our New Venetian Cloth, 13/6. It can also be ordered in our Edinboro' Tweed and Estémene, all wool serge. All particulars and PATTERNS POST FREE.

Regular Stock Sizes are 34, 36, and 38in. round bust (under arms); the Skirts being 38, 40, and 42in. long in front. Larger or Special Sizes made to measure, 1/6 ex. Each Costume securely packed and sent carr. paid, 6d. extra. Skirt only, 6d. extra.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., The London Manufacturers,
17 ROSCOE ST., GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE John Noble

COSTUME COMPLETE, 10/6 Skirt alone, 5/6

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Sent by Parcel Post, safely packed, to all parts of the globe, direct from the Largest Firm of Costumiers in the World, and universally admitted to be the

HIGHEST KNOWN VALUE FOR MONEY.

The Costumes on this page are made up in two good durable Cloths:

I. John Noble Cheviot Serge—weighty and weather-resisting.
II. John Noble Costume Coating—smooth-surfaced, and of lighter weight.

The latest Illustrated Fashion Book and to all who name Short Stories, and need not be returned.

PATTERNS SENT POST FREE

A FULL DRESS LENGTH (6 yards, 52in. wide), of either of these two fabrics for 7/6. Carriage 8d.

COLOURS of all Costumes are: Black, Navy, Myrtle, Ruby, Cinnamon, Fawn, Sage Green, Reseda, Purple, and Grey.

THE THREE STOCK SIZES are 34, 36, 38in. round bust (under arms). Skirts being 38, 40, 42in. long in front. Any other size can be made to measure, 1/6 extra.

LADIES' OWN DESIGNS made up in any kind of fabric by skilled dressmakers at minimum cost. A Box of 1,000 Patterns of New Spring Dress Goods lent to select from, and sent carriage paid.

The New "Gordon" Costume. Model 894.—Well-cut Bodice, trimmed at centre with braid a l'Ecosse. Full wide tailor skirt. Price, 10/6 10/6 complete. Safely packed and carriage paid 6d. extra. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d.

A Useful and Becoming Mode, Model 900.—A well-cut and finished Open Coat, and full wide Tailor Skirt. Price complete costume, 10/6. Sent safely packed and carriage paid, 6d extra. Skirt alone for 5/6; carriage 5d.

MOURNING ORDERS

Executed and Sent off in Twelve Hours.

The "Kerry" Costume. Model 899.—A well-made and finished Bodice trimmed braid. The Skirt, full wide, drapes well. Price complete, 10/6 Safely packed and carriage paid, 6d. ex. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d.

Model 648.

This design still continues to meet with great approval. It consists of stylish Blouse Bodice and neat Skirt. The Bodice is lined through and made with prettily gathered front, new sleeves, and shaped belt, as sketch. Lengths 35 38 42 46 Prices 6/11 7/11 8/11 9/11 Carriage 6d.

FROM 6/11

Eglinton Road Post Office,
Plumstead, Kent.

JOHN NOBLE.—DEAR SIR,—About ten years ago I was persuaded to give you a trial for dress material, which has been more than justified by the value received. I have not since bought a single yard from anywhere else. Your serge requires no recommendation from me, as it speaks for itself; in fact, if I were to tell you what it was doing now, you would scarcely credit it. The One Pound Bundle should receive attention from the mothers of families. I tried one last month. I have had made six girls' dresses, varying in ages from 8 to 15, two capes and two boys' suits. So you do not exaggerate when you say that they are worth double.

Believe me, yours truly, ALICE HARRIS.

40s. in the £.

JOHN NOBLE Ltd. have an unusually heavy accumulation of Dress and other Fabrics, all in good useful lengths, the very thing for large families, institutions, etc. These Remnants, all in perfect condition, will be sent out during the next few weeks in £1 Bundles, each to contain in addition, at least one superior Full Dress Length, fit for any lady's wear. The bundles are agreed to be worth 40/- and even more. Price, carriage paid,

REMNANTS

£1 ONLY.

BANKERS:—
'LONDON & MIDLAND' BANK Ltd.

Please mention "Short Stories" when ordering.

THE JOHN NOBLE KNOCKABOUT FROCK FOR GIRLS.

"An ideal School or Holiday Garment for Girls."

Sizes—
21, 24, 27, 30, 33, 36, 39, 42 inches long in front. Prices—1/6 2/- 2/6 3/- 3/6 4/- 4/6 5/- each. Carriage 4d. extra.

Warm Well-knitted WOOL CAPS supplied in all shades at 1/- each. Ladies' Tam o' Shanter Caps, well knitted, at the same price, 1/-

Model 895.—A smart, Tailor-made Suit. The Coat is well cut and fastens with one button. The Skirt is in the latest mode, and is full wide. Price, 15/- complete. Packed in leather-board box and carriage paid, 1/- extra.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook Street Mills, MANCHESTER.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 482.] For the Week ending March 26th, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

THE PRETTY PEARL AND THE CRAFTY COMMISSIONER

Told at Soong-Kong on the Banks of the Grand Canal, on the 6th day of the month called Mow.

IN the cool of a lovely evening in the middle of summer, Mr. and Mrs. Chun were sitting in the veranda of their charming villa in Se-chewen, enjoying the breeze which came off the river, and discussing the prospects of the lady Chao.

Chao, who by reason of her exquisite complexion and surpassing beauty had been named the Pearl, was the one fair daughter of the house of Chun, and the marriage agents had on their books quite a number of "eligibles" who had been casting "sheep's-eyes" in that direction; for in loveliness of form and purity of feature the lady Chao, it was reported, could give points even to the famous beauty Kin-leen.

Mr. Chun laid down the letter from the agent who represented Moo Kat, the eldest son of the chief Salt Commissioner, and remarked to his wife that the Salt Commissioner's son was "a very estimable young man."

"Hai-yah! Mr. Chun," said the lady. "And what, pray, do you know about arranging these affairs? A man who meddles in woman's matters always reminds me of the owl that tried to sing like a nightingale, but only succeeded in looking like a fool. While your mouth is filled with the praises of Moo Kat, you know so little of the Book of Rites yourself as not to be aware that it is the mother's province to arrange the marriage of her daughters."

All rights reserved.]

"Well, of course, my dear," said Chun, feeling somewhat abashed under the sharp attack of his wife, "if you have anyone in your eye ——"

"A thousand thanks, Mr. Chun," replied the lady smiling sarcastically. "But were I in your place, sir, I would yield gracefully. Moo Kat, indeed! If you were still as I found you, toiling at the desk or drudging in the warehouse—Moo Kat, who belongs, I allow, to the official class, might do well enough. But not to-day, thank you! We've cut the shop, sir; and set up our quarters in the delightful village of Everlasting Felicity, in a house dedicated to the Goddess of Connubial Happiness; and, I don't care an orange-pip, Mr. Chun, for all the Moo Kats between this and the great wall.

"It was a blessed day for you, my dear," the lady ran on, "when I was weak enough to accept your contemptible presents and allow the red cords to bind my 'lily feet' to your pair of pedal deformities. I should like my daughter to do better than her mother."

Chun, who had the mildest disposition in the world, merely rubbed his palms together and murmured: "I thank Heaven and the Three Pure Ones* continually for having given me such a woman."

His wife gave a scornful little laugh, and sniffed at the white roses which crept about the veranda.

"I'm very pleased, Chun," said she, "that you have sense enough to acknowledge that this is my affair—not yours. Now listen to me"—the poor man had been doing very little else but listen all the years of his wedded life—"here have you been going into the town to look at the papers every day for a week; and every day you've come back to me with the same silly tale, 'There's nothing in the papers to-day, wife.' Of course, I never did believe that you went to read the papers, and now I'm sure of it. But if there's one thing I hate it's domestic scenes. I do like peace at home; and to enjoy that, a wife soon learns that if her eyes and ears may be kept open, her mouth must be kept shut. Now, sir, after this, don't tell me any more that you're going into town to 'look at the papers.' Oh! you husbands," she exclaimed, shaking her head at the long-suffering Chun, "you're all matrimonial frauds."

* The Chinese Trinity.

Digitized by Google

He hummed in the Prefect's ear.

Poor old Chun stole a look at his wife which intimated plainly that she had travelled very far away from him.

"Then you really haven't heard?" screamed the lady, coming down on the unfortunate man with the suddenness of a typhoon in the Yellow Sea. "Has no man then, so much as mentioned the greatest piece of news which has been told in these parts since the days before the Flood! What, in the name of Confucius, I wonder, do you men find to talk about? Nothing of any consequence, that's certain. We poor women could give you a long start and a good beating. Why, the news only arrived at mid-day, by special express messenger from Peking, and Mrs. Weng was here with it an hour later. Ha! ha! Chun."

Now the village of Everlasting Felicity, in which the establishment dedicated to connubial happiness was situated, lay so far out of the world that the latest intelligence of the doings at the capital took four months and twenty days to reach there by the ordinary channels. Small wonder, then, that Chun should meekly attempt to draw his wife's attention to this not unimportant fact.

But the lady, beating her ivory-mounted fan against the enamelled porcelain table, cried:

"Listen, sir, listen! Pray am I not to be allowed a word? You know very well you're only trying to palm off a paltry pretence to excuse your unpardonable conduct. Oh! you're a clever man, Chun, but I'm too cute to be caught by limed twigs. Now, then, not another word, please, till I've done.

"An Imperial courier has arrived to-day with a proclamation that the Emperor Yang Te has commissioned his minister Ma-o to select from the marriageable maidens in the Empire of Han, ninety-five of the most beautiful girls he can discover, and send them up to Peking for his son Lo Yang to choose wives from.

"Now where, I should like to know, is he going to find a more ravishing creature than my Pearl? I say, tell me where, Mr. Chun. You cannot? Then you might have the grace to say so. The girl is matchless; in truth, she is more like a child of the gods than a daughter of men. Oh, you needn't pocket the compliment, Chun! Yes, Pearl is a stork among poultry. Her beauty eclipses that of the moon, and is enough to make the flowers turn green with envy.

"The minister is to arrive to-morrow, and the girls are to be at the yamun next day precisely at ten o'clock. The Prefect will be in attendance to see all's fair and no favour. Ninety-five are to be sent up; but only half-a-dozen will be chosen, and my Pearl's going to come out at the top. Now I must be off to see about the things she's to wear, and I shall expect you to do a father's part by the girl, Chun, and give her a handsome trousseau."

* * * * *

On the day of the great choosing, the scene in the large hall of the Prefect's yamun defies all description. Only the great poet of the Sung dynasty could do justice to it.

The province of the Four Streams is famous for the beauty of its women; and on this occasion the loveliest forms and the fairest faces were all in one basket.

"You miserable creature," screamed his wife.

Digitized by Google

The police never had such a day's work. Not till the Prefect, assuming his sternest official manners, had called for a one inch bamboo and administered summary justice on the principal offenders, was sufficient silence obtained to start business.

Such a galaxy of beauty, such a battery of dark almond eyes, such an array of exquisite features lit up with pleasure and expectancy, was more than mortal man could endure with equanimity.

And, before the Imperial Commission, as elsewhere, Pearl stood like a phœnix among crows, resplendent as the moon on the fourteenth night, and fascinating as a fairy. While others owed no small debt to the "make-up" box and the costumier, Pearl had discarded the lavish adornments and richly embroidered robes provided by her mother, and trusted solely to a simple country gown and her own natural beauty.

"May the graves of my ancestors be dishonoured," exclaimed Commissioner Ma-o, "if the lady Chao is not a Pearl of price—a jewel meet for the Imperial Crown." And, under pretext of consultation, he hummed in the Prefect's private ear:

"Of all the girls where'er I've been,
Of all the girls my eyes have seen,
This pretty Pearl of winsome mien
Will make Lo Yang the prettiest Queen."

While the Prefect, responsive to the influence of so many pairs of feminine eyes bent upon him in sweet simplicity, relaxed so far as to tap the Commissioner playfully on the near arm with his sandal-wood fan.

It was a delicate business, that of choosing the maidens fit to be "basket and broom"* to Prince Yang; but Ma-o was a connoisseur in such matters and at last his list was filled. After the damsels, the fathers.

Chief Commissioner Ma-o was troubled with an itching palm. Nothing served to allay the irritation but a liberal application of the metal called silver. It was the custom for the fathers of the "chosen" to provide the "remedy" when Ma-o had named the right amount.

In the usual course, he called upon Mr. Chun to arrange for Pearl's portrait to be painted by the artist attached to the Imperial Commission; and incidentally mentioned that the fee for giving Pearl a "good place" was five thousand taels of silver.†

"Do you want to ruin me!" exclaimed Chun.

"I'm very sorry if you haven't such a paltry sum by you," said Ma-o, "but really I haven't time to discuss the matter. So many girls to look after."

Chun offered four thousand.

"I've no taste for bargaining," answered Ma-o. "You can send it on. But I'm leaving as soon as the portraits are completed; so you'll excuse me reminding you that 'a stitch in time saves the garment.'"

That there was some occult threat conveyed by this hint, Chun quite understood; and while he was bemoaning the fate of fathers who only reared daughters for other men's sons to run off with, in tripped Mrs. Chun, eager to learn how "it had gone off."

"You miserable creature," screamed his wife before Chun had half finished. "I see what it is. My daughter against your money! And do you suppose that I shall allow the girl's chance to be ruined by your stinginess? I should be ashamed to squabble over a paltry thousand taels. What if he has asked you twice as much as he demanded from Koo Pee—it's a compliment, you poor, blind mole, that cannot see it. Isn't Pearl worth it? The Commissioner, it seems, has a far better idea of the girl's value than you have, though you do claim to be her father. There! I do not want to make a scene! I never knew a man who understood a woman yet! For goodness sake, Chun let's have no scandal. Send him the money with your apologies, and let there be no more words about it."

Commissioner Ma-o was handed over to the public executioner.

So Ma-o got his five thousand taels, and, having directed the damsels to appear at the Emperor's Palace in the Purple City* on a day named, packed up his portraits and departed. But the Commissioner had pigs of his own to bring to market—nieces he called them; and as blood is thicker than water, their names appeared high up in the list of the ninety-five.

Spring Day and Summer Cloud were not bad-looking girls; and their uncle had taken a few pardonable liberties with their official portraits. But not a girl of them all stood the ghost of a chance alongside Pearl, the lady Chao.

No sooner thought, no sooner done. Out comes Pearl's portrait, off goes Ma-o to a private artist—result, a copy, in which Pearl the inimitable appeared as a passably good-looking lot, but nothing to sing over. And, behold when the Emperor inspected the miniatures, bang went the Imperial pencil through the lady Chao's name; and poor Pearl was bundled off with the "rank and file," who were sent to console themselves in the "Cold Wing" of the Purple Palace.

Time will not permit of us returning to the village of Everlasting Felicity to see how it fared with Mr.

* Chinese synonym for wife. † £1,500.

* The innermost of the four cities of Peking.

Digitized by Google

and Mrs. Chun. But exactly twelve months after the marriage of Lo Yang and Spring Day, the Emperor happened to be strolling in his grounds one quiet evening when he was startled by the sound of singing. The voice was of such entrancing sweetness that involuntarily he raised his eyes to Heaven, expecting to see a Celestial vision. Presently, however, he discovered that the melodious strains came from a window in that part of the building known vulgarly as the "Cold Wing." It was Pearl singing to her lute. Afraid to move for fear of losing a single note, the Emperor remained rooted to the spot.

The words, the air, the voice made a deep impression upon his Majesty's mind. For several minutes after the singing ceased he kept his place, only withdrawing when the syren sounds no longer lingered in his ear.

To summon the singer to his presence was the first command he issued, and scarcely had the Gracious One composed his features and settled himself on his cushions, when Pearl, in all the piquancy of déshabille, appeared before him. The sight of her ravishing beauty filled him with such utter astonishment that for some time he was unable to do aught but stare—stricken dumb by a loveliness surpassing all that the mind of man could picture or conceive.

You may guess it did not take long after this to pull the crooked straight and put the saddle on the right horse.

Spring Day, as a punishment for the crime of being niece to a wicked old uncle, was packed off to the "Cold Wing," while Commissioner Ma-o was handed over to the public executioner, with instructions to start him at once on a visit to the Yellow Springs by the longest of the usual official routes. But soon all else was forgotten in the preparations that were being made for the marriage of Lo Yang with Pearl, the lady Chao.

The wedding was celebrated at the next full moon, which the astrologers declared to be one of the most fortunate in the whole year for marriages. And amid the merry strains of the Dragon and the Phœnix from the massed bands of the Peking garrison, and the acclaiming shouts of "may a hundred sons, and thousand grandsons be your portion" from the seething million, Pearl was lifted over the pan of charcoal at the threshold, and entered the Purple Palace as the beauteous bride of Lo Yang, the Emperor Yang Te's eldest son.

H. Hunter.

Old Karl's Secret.

A delightful September afternoon found me, after more than a year's wandering through Europe, seated upon the low, squatty porch of one of the little inns near Czegled, upon the road towards Buda-Pesth. I was smoking one of those monstrous meerschaum pipes, which the Germans love so well. It was a marvel of workmanship, the design of the bowl being a Turk's head.

I frequently took it from my mouth to rub the rich mahogany-coloured stem, or to examine the unique carving, for I doted upon that pipe. As I sat thus engaged, I noticed upon the steps of the porch an old man, apparently of the peasant class, whom I had observed about the inn on the day previous. He, too, seemed to be admiring the pipe intensely, for he eyed it as though he had never seen one before.

"I wonder what he thinks of it," thought I.

That was speedily disclosed, for no sooner had I caught the old fellow's eyes than he arose, and approaching, said respectfully, in good English:

"That is a very fine pipe you have there."

I was a bit surprised to be addressed in my own language by one of such humble appearance.

"Oh," I replied, "do you speak English? Come over here and talk with me, then. Yes; that's a beauty; I picked it up in Constantinople last year. Ever seen one like it?"

A smile spread over the face of the Hungarian.

"No, sir; never. It must have cost much money."

"More than I ought to have paid, perhaps; but I am fond of curios, and make it a point to get some wherever I travel."

"Yes?" somewhat eagerly replied the Hungarian; "and have you a large collection?"

"My private collection is said to be one of the finest in my native land. Where did you learn to speak English? You pronounce it remarkably well."

"My father taught me. He was bred at Prague," was the simple reply. "How come you to be here? Seek you here for specimens?"

"Yes, partly. I am on the way to procure some memento from the famous battlefields of Napoleon—Austerlitz and Wagram, you know."

A dark shade passed over the old man's face. It was a strong, stern countenance, very dark, but beaming with intelligence. At the mention of Napoleon's name, he frowned gloomily.

"Tyrant! Devil!" he muttered in German. "His army plundered my father's estate to the last spear of grass. His soldiery burnt our home. The estate itself was confiscated by old Francis, upon some false charges of treason, brought by General Mack, and my aged father became a wanderer upon the earth, and died in a shepherd's hut."

I could perceive the features of the peasant working strongly as he strove to master the powerful passions of grief and vengeance which surged mightily through his soul. Then, brightening once more, he exclaimed:

Digitized by Google

"Mementoes from Austeriltz and Wagram? Why should you wish to be reminded of German misfortune, or Russian poltroonery, or French bloodthirstiness? There are better things for you here if you are able to obtain them."

"How 'able'? Will not money buy them?" I demanded.

"No, no; money buys not all things. Are you from London?"

"Yes," I replied.

A fresh gleam brightened the old peasant's face.

My curiosity was pricked. I took my pipe from my mouth and stared hard at the Hungarian. There was a suggestiveness about his conversation that was puzzling, but his countenance thus far betrayed nothing. I was, however, as much amused as curious.

"Tell me what there is here which I cannot get for money?" I said.

The evident anxiety and eagerness of the old peasant became intense.

"No, no," he replied. "I cannot tell you what there is, nor the price which is demanded, until I know more of you. Who are you, and what is your business in Austria?"

I began to be aroused. For answer to his question I gave him my name and address, adding: "I am only a sightseer on the Continent." I had in my pocket, with my passport, a letter from Francis, nephew of the Emperor Ferdinand, to some savants of Vienna. I had become acquainted with him some several weeks previous, and he had good-naturedly given it upon his own suggestion, for we had some tastes in common. These I handed to the queer old fellow, more in a spirit of fun than anything else, and quietly leant back to watch the effect. His face shone with genuine pleasure when he read them.

"Yes, yes; you are fortunate to know such men as Francis and Herr Loestein and Professor Rahl. I believe, too, that I am fortunate to meet you. I believe that you are the man for whom I have been waiting these many years."

Plainly, thought I, here is a queer old character, who probably has some heirloom of which he wishes to dispose at a good price. I said, half banteringly:

"Why have you waited for anyone? Can you have anything to sell? Come, perhaps we can transact a little business together."

The peasant seemed to shrink timidly within himself. At length he replied: "Walk with me down the road to yonder trees. What I say to you must not be overheard, even by walls, for they have both eyes and ears."

Surely it could do no harm to humour the old fellow. I rose, and we walked rapidly to the point indicated, and seated ourselves beneath the shade of a fine oak.

"Now, then," said I, "out with it."

The Hungarian burst forth impetuously:

"Sir, listen. I have a secret to sell which will make you a richer man than you have ever dared to dream, and me both rich and happy once more. I have something to dispose of, but it lies buried in the earth, and shall lie there for ever unless you, with your nationality, your money, and your influence, and I with my knowledge, unite to drag it to the light. But even you cannot do this unless you will swear a solemn oath that, upon my revealing to you the nature of this secret, you will deal faithfully with me."

"Whew!" I whistled through puckered lips. "A sort of buried treasure fiend, I take it. Wonder who and what he is?" Aloud to the Hungarian, whose dark old eyes were flashing with excitement, I said: "What is your name and occupation, and where do you live?"

"I am but a humble shepherd now. My flock is upon the Carpathians. My son tends it while I am absent. My name is only Karl, for it is not safe to tell you my surname. Our family was years ago exiled, and I may only live here in my native land in peril of my life. More than this you shall not know until we have agreed further."

The hurried, broken manner in which these sentences were uttered made an additional impression upon me.

"What kind of an oath do you want me to take?" I asked.

"Go with me to the Prothonotary in Czegled. He will draw the paper."

"Oh, I see! You want my bond, do you? Now look here, you should know by this time that I am a man of honour. I do now solemnly promise that I will not reveal the secret to anyone, if, upon learning its nature, we cannot agree further. If that is not sufficient"—here I refilled the meerschaum—"say not another word."

Great beads of perspiration started to his face. His eyes rolled and flashed, and his bosom heaved almost convulsively. He gasped forth at length:

"Sir, as you will have it, I must trust to you, or perhaps never again have an opportunity. I am already an old man. I must," sinking his voice to a whisper, and drawing so near me that his breath was hot upon my face. "On the little plot of ground that I call home, at the foot of the Carpathians, I have found a tomb, filled with untold wealth."

"Why don't you go and get it, then?" I demanded, still half amused, and adding to myself, "I made a guess that time."

"Why? Ah?" he exclaimed bitterly, "do not fancy that you are now in free England. Go and get it—for whom? Myself? No! but for the coffers of my Emperor."

A light suddenly dawned upon me. "I see, if you dig it up Ferdinand will seize it as treasure trove; while if I should smuggle it out of the country we alone get the benefit."

The peasant flung his arms about my neck, and fairly hugged me as he cried: "True, true! And more, the treasure I have found is not in coin alone, but"—here he thrust his hand into his bosom—"jewels and plate." He withdrew his hand, and placed a small sheepskin bag in mine. "There is the proof that I have spoken no lie, and thus I show you why it is that while really rich beyond computation, I must yet remain poor and humble—as now."

I opened the bag, and to my amazement it contained a number of strangely cut gems—rubies and diamonds and emeralds—of purest lustre. It was now my turn to become excited.

"Why, where in the name of ——" I began.

"Hold! Would you have still other proof? Here, then—you are a collector of curiosities—what make you of this?"

He drew from his bosom another packet, carefully depositing it on my lap. With hands all trembling with nervous excitement I untied the strings and drew forth a small crown or coronet of pure gold. What the peasant said during the next five minutes I never knew, although I heard his voice in animated talk. I only gazed in mute astonishment at the slim golden circlet in my hands. The metal was cleanly polished, showing a

Digitized by Google

workmanship which was unmistakably of great age. Carefully turning it over and over I discovered some cabalistic figures or letters engraved on its front. Held so that the light would the better fall upon them, I made out the pregnant initials, S.P.Q.R. (Senate and people of Rome—Senatus, populus que Romanus.)

Had one of the old emperors of the Eternal City suddenly arisen from the dust and confronted me I could hardly have been more agitated than upon beholding so startling a memento of Imperial Rome. It flashed across me that the Hungarian was possibly telling me the exact truth. He might have stumbled upon the ancient burial place of some colonial nobleman or governor, who, during his lifetime, had been voted the golden crown by the Senate and people of Rome; or, possibly, it might be a deposit of the plunder of some outlaw, who had died with his secret untold. I could thus account for the presence of a considerable treasure in the tomb, and could also readily see why the old peasant had not been able to profit by his discovery.

Had one in his circumstances offered any of the old jewels or precious metals for sale, inquiry would at once have been set on foot as to where he had obtained them, and the old fellow would have been forced to disclose the hoard for the benefit of His Majesty the Emperor of Austria, and perhaps suffer the extreme penalty of concealing treasure trove from the monarch —death. Already those internecine disturbances, ending in Ferdinand's abdication, were beginning to make head, and the Austrian treasury, never plethoric, would have welcomed any addition however small.

My visit to the plains of Austerlitz was, for the time, forgotten, and all my energies were concentrated upon concluding a treaty with the peasant, and perfecting a plan whereby the treasure might be got safely out of Austria. As Karl had said, he was getting old, and now, if ever, was the time to realise the hoard. He had no friends in whom he could confide, and must depend upon a stranger, like myself, and take chances upon being fairly dealt with.

The country was at this time filled with police spies and Government agents of all kinds. How to elude these was a problem which bothered me considerably. I solved it, however, with the aid of an influential resident at Vienna, who, after much difficulty, procured me a dispensation from the Government to transport my trunks and baggage through and out of the empire without police inspection. This was done upon my representation that they contained nothing but curiosities of no particular value to anyone but myself—which was true enough at that time—and that they were liable to irreparable injury or destruction from an overhauling by careless hands. Armed with this document, given under the seal of the Secretary of State, I knew that I need fear no meddling with my baggage. The next thing to be done was to get the treasure.

Supplied with a few necessary tools, a few days later found us in the old peasant's hut, in a deep ravine in the blue Carpathians. The situation of the hut was one of absolute and utter isolation; not even a shepherd kindled fire within four miles. The hut was a one-room affair—as humble a place of abode as I ever entered. The son was absent with the flocks when we arrived. I had, fortunately, brought with me a supply of provisions, which added materially to the scanty larder of the shepherd.

It was after nightfall when we reached the hut, but so eager was I to be at the buried treasure that I could scarcely restrain myself from compelling old Karl to show me the spot at once. When morning came, Karl said that the work must be done in the darkness, so I was obliged to curb my impatience once more.

"Does your son know of the treasure?" I asked.

"He knows nothing of its value nor situation, although he is aware of its existence. The poor lad is——" Here he choked, and ended by tapping his forehead. "'Twas the fever did it," he added a moment later, and tears trickled plentifully down the brown cheeks. "He went to Wagram, where I thought he might get better employment. When I next saw my son some months later, his intellect was darkened."

By eight o'clock we were ready to set forth. The peasant now was feverishly anxious to bring the gold to light. The meal over, we sailed forth equipped with lanterns and a spade and pick. An eighth of a mile down the ravine was the sheepfold, and towards this old Karl silently took his way, I following. This fold was a large pen, with a covered shelter at one end about five feet high. Passing through the bars, we entered the pen, and then lighted our lanterns. I was on tip-toe with suppressed excitement. As the light streamed out, I noticed in one corner a heap of rubbish. Diving into this with both hands, the peasant soon laid the ground bare, and then exclaimed: "Come! Our work is here!"

I needed no second bidding, but immediately set to work with the pick, the shepherd throwing the dirt behind us. Soon a large round boulder was exposed to view.

"Behind that rock," said he, "is the cave. We may easily roll it away, for I put it there."

In an hour the whole work of excavation was done, and the mouth of a deep cavern in the hillside was opened. I dared not enter it at once for fear of poisonous air; but old Karl, who now seemed half crazed with excitement, crawled in. In a moment he crept back, nearly overcome with asphyxia. Plainly, the air must be purified before we could proceed. While the shepherd was recovering, I went to the hut and returned at once with a large bag of powder. Placing this as far into the cave as I dared go, I laid a trail to the entrance and lighted it. Immediately there was a dull flash, followed by a blinding cloud of smoke gushing from the opening. As soon as this had cleared I took my lantern and again crawled into the cave. The explosion of the powder had driven out the foul air, and I could breathe easily.

The cave was deep, but not large, and proceeding to the far end, I discovered a shelf of stone, upon which lay a huge metal coffin. Clambering upon the ledge, I carefully examined the casket, to discover, if possible, something of its age. It was apparently very old, and far too heavy for me to lift. I struck a few blows upon it with the pick, and stooped to notice the effect. It was startling and unlooked for. A dull, yellow gleam at the point of impact was all, but quite enough to convince me that the coffin before me was doubtless of pure gold.

Straightening up in astonishment, my attention was attracted to a large copper plate, fastened into the wall of the cavern just above the coffin. It was green with verdigris. Brushing this away as well as I was able, I could perceive an inscription which had evidently been in Latin. After many minutes' study I made out a few of the letters, still decipherable, the remainder were hopelessly defaced by the chemical action of the moisture and gases in the cave, but there, still clear cut and bold, were the two words:

Digitized by Google

"ATTIIA sum . . . . ."

I knew that I stood in the presence of the mortal remains of Attiia, the Hun, Destroyer of Nations and Plunderer of the Roman Empire.

The truth, as it flashed across my brain, was overwhelming; and I turned and ran to the entrance of the cavern, overpowered at the tremendous discovery I had made. Old Karl was just entering. I caught him by the collar, and hugged him in a frenzy.

"Karl! Karl!" I cried, "within this vault lie the spoils of the mightiest city the world has ever seen! Beyond doubt, we are in the presence of untold millions of wealth, plundered from Rome and her provinces by barbarian hordes, and buried with Attiia the Hun."

I told him of the inscription on the copper plate, and together we returned and examined it. My companion was unacquainted with Latin, which had been much affected by the conquering Huns; but he could clearly read the name Attiia staring at us from the wall of the tomb. It was too real to seem real. So soon as our excitement had somewhat abated, I inquired where we must look for the treasure.

"You are standing in it," he replied.

This proved to be true. The floor of the cavern was of rock; but it was covered with silver and gold in every form of workmanship, to a depth of two feet.

We were overcome with excitement. At once returning to the hut, we brought to the cavern my three great trunks, now empty, and several heavy packing cases, and filled them with this lost wealth of old Rome and her colonies, and then we had made no perceptible diminution of the vast hoard. There were doubtless one hundred million pounds sterling at our command, and we laboured until long after daylight, picking and choosing the heaviest pieces of metal and choicest gems.

It was far into the day when we returned to the air, and replaced the stone before the mouth of the cavern. I seemed to have lived ten years in that single night within the bowels of the mountain. The old shepherd, on the contrary, had apparently renewed his youth by twice that time. He refused to leave the fold, when I declared myself utterly exhausted with hunger and fatigue, but remained to guard the spot, while I departed to get food and to sleep. Hastily devouring a half-eaten loaf and some dried meat, I threw myself on the heap of skins in the corner, and was almost instantly asleep.

It was again night when I awoke. The old shepherd was still absent, so I filled a bag with some food, and at once bent my steps towards the cavern. Karl was there, and told me that he had neither eaten nor slept during my absence. He snatched the food I had brought, and ate ravenously, and then we re-entered the cave.

After many hours' discussion, I persuaded the old peasant to consent to our leaving with what we had secured, showing him that at some time in the near future he could buy his peace with the Government, return to Austria, and repurchase his family estate. That then it would be far easier for us to get the remainder of the treasure and dispose of it. In the meantime the cavern could be concealed as it had before been. Karl finally agreed to this plan, and after removing every vestige of our labour from the outside, we returned to the hut.

I intended to go the next morning and buy an ox team and cart to carry away the priceless boxes and trunks, and by early dawn I was on the road. Two days passed before I found what I sought. Being unfamilar with ox driving, I employed a peasant to take the team to old Karl's hut. I was fearfully eager to get back to him, and hurried on the driver at the team's best pace; but on the afternoon of the third day, while only about two miles from the cave, we stopped a few minutes to rest upon a low summit on the opposite side of the valley.

The previous ten days had been so crowded with startling events that now I began to feel the strain. My accidental meeting with the shepherd, and his strange story; the enormous wealth at my command; the amazing discovery of the identity of the tomb, which would make mine one of the famous names of the nineteenth century; and, lastly, the responsibility resting upon me of taking the treasure safely out of Austria to a market.

A strange quivering ran through the ground. For an instant I fancied that my highly-wrought nerves were playing me tricks, then another long-continued tremor, and my ears were deafened by a mighty crash, as though the world were bursting asunder. I sprang up and looked across the valley where the hut lay, but could now discern it not. The giant hill, which had stood sentinel for fourteen centuries over the most magnificent treasure ever accumulated by human hands, had split in two, and was even then falling into the ravine, a frightful spectacle.

A second of suspense, and with an awful roar it struck a wild chaos of earth and rock, and a vast cloud of dust arose and curtained the catastrophe. The shock threw me, half stunned, to the ground. In a moment I was on my feet again, though all the hills trembled and rocked with the vibration. I shrieked in fear and despair, for it seemed as though the earth had thrown off her adhesion to the solar system, and were rushing to destruction in the voids of space; but as minutes passed, the blinding dust cloud which overhung the ravine cleared, revealing the true extent of the cataclysm. Alas! for all my hopes! A million tons of granite rock were heaped upon the spot where old Karl —rest his soul—had built his cot and sheepfold.

The great strain under which I had been labouring and the shock of the appalling disaster were too much to be borne by human nerves. I swooned away, and for many hours lay as one in the arms of Death.

There was no mystery about the great upheaval. In the half of the hill yet standing I could see what had been a great hollow basin, evidently of volcanic origin, showing traces of the recent presence of water. Almost straight up from this, through what had been the centre of the mountain, was a channel, terminating at the lake bed on the summit. The water from the lake had doubtless been centuries in percolating through to the basin beneath. Once this communication was established, however, the channel must have rapidly enlarged. It looked to be four feet in diameter. The weight of the water in this tall column and in the rising lake, acting with growing and resistless power upon the accumulated water in the lower chamber, had burst asunder the mountain as surely as ever was Herculean labour performed by hydrostatic pressure.

I made no effort to locate the possible whereabouts of the hut and sheepfold—that had been a hopeless task for an army. Never again would the eye of man behold the lost treasure of plundered Rome. And old Karl, with his poor, soul-darkened son, should rest through all eternity amidst the mass of treasure we had so nearly won, with the broken mountain for his headstone. and the heart of another for his tomb, side by side with the dust of Attiia the Hun.

De Leon Hall.

Digitized by Google

A DETERMINED LOVER.

I THINK it may be stated, without fear of successful contradiction, that at no period of a man's existence does Cupid strike so deeply and cause so much sleeplessness as at the age of one score or thereabouts.

I always feel sorry for a chap in this sort of pickle, and I felt particularly sorry for poor Shorty Fleming. I knew I ought to discourage him, but he was such a good little fellow, and so much in earnest, that I would have defied a far more severe man than his brother Jack for his sake. Besides, Shorty was not one of the chaps who got over anything easily, and I knew failure would go hard with him.

Jack was not the only "obstacle." Sam Parker, Nettie's papa, also objected. He was not a stern, unreasonable parent, by any means, but his objections, even if presented good naturedly, were none the less formidable. Parker was a shrewd man, with a total disbelief in the ability of womankind to use reason.

Nettie was the only daughter and the youngest child in a family of seven, and the old man, close-fisted as he was, spared no expense in educating her liberally. It was only natural, therefore, for him to object, especially as Nettie was only eighteen, and had only been out of school a few months.

He called on Jack one afternoon, not casually, as he usually called, on his way to or from town, but with a direct purpose. Jack lay on the sofa. I was reading to him when Parker walked in.

"How are you, Fleming? Laid up, are you? How are you, Faber? Warm, isn't it? Thanks, I will sit down for a minute."

And he sat down on the edge of a chair, and began tracing figures on the floor with his cane. He seemed nervous, and I rose to leave the room; but he waved his hand and said:

"Sit still, Wilson; sit still. I haven't got anything to say but what you may hear."

Here the old man stiffened up in his seat, and stated the object of his mission in a good-natured but thoroughly decided way, closing with:

"Now, Fleming, I haven't got any objection to him—not in the least. He's a tip-top good boy, and all that; but it isn't in reason that I'm going to spend all that money in educating a daughter, and then let her go and marry another youngster without any money. And that's what it'll come to."

Now, Parker's remarks were in the nature of a revelation to us. Of course, we knew Shorty had put in a good many evenings at the Parker domicile, but we had never guessed that his visits had any significance. A courtship, too, with six big brothers hanging round, is a difficult matter.

It is easy enough to fall — just fall — in love with a girl if there is no one to hinder. But with six young men, with whom one is on good terms, sitting round and occupying a large portion of one's attention, it is a matter of getting in love, which, accomplished, is rather more serious than a mere fall into the same.

Fleming sat up and ran his fingers through his hair gravely.

"I quite agree with you, Mr. Parker," he said. "I don't know what to say to Percy, but I will try a little strategy, and see if he can't be kept at home more. If that doesn't work, I must talk to him."

And here began my connection with Shorty's love affair.

That evening I was writing busily when someone opened the door of my den and walked in. It was Shorty. He sat down quietly and took up a paper, which he looked at for several minutes, while I scratched away at my work. Then he threw down the paper suddenly, and turned to me with: "Wilson, what was old Parker here for to-day?"

I tried to dissemble, but Shorty is no fool, and interrupted.

"Oh, nonsense," said he, "you think I'm a baby. Now, honestly, what was he here for?"

Finally, I told him about the conversation between his brother and Parker. He sat silent for a few minutes. I could see his face twitch. Then he turned his eyes to me and said slowly: "Wilson, I know I'm young and all that, but—I know my own mind. Jack's a good brother, and feels in duty bound to take care of me, but I fancy I can look after myself. I—I've made up my mind to marry that girl, if she'll have me, and all the Jacks and Parkers in the world can't stop me."

And Mr. Percival Fleming set his mouth hard, and walked out. He called at Parker's the next evening, despite Jack's strategy.

Digitized by Google

There was another caller at Parker's that evening in the person of Morris Cottrell, a wealthy merchant from a neighbouring town. Shorty, when he got home, mentioned the fact to me with some feeling in his tones. Cottrell was a man of forty, well read, and a gentleman, and the prospect of having him for a rival would have sent despair to the heart of any penniless young man less determined than Shorty Fleming.

One evening Shorty came to my room. He had seen Sam Parker that day, and the latter had told him, as gently as possible, some galling truths about his age and his penniless condition, concluding with the cheerful information that Nettie had almost decided to accept Cottrell.

Of course, Shorty was despondent, but he was none the less determined.

"Wilson, I am going to see her to-morrow afternoon, and—and ask her," he said.

The time and the hour favoured Shorty; but I hardly think Nettie knew her own mind. The boy who came riding slowly home through the shadows next evening was a very much downcast boy indeed.

He told me all about it later—how Nettie had wavered, and finally told him that she could give him no answer. She cared a great deal for him, she said, but she was not sure she cared enough for him. Besides, her father objected to him, and she could never cross her father's wishes, when he had done so much for her.

Sam Parker must have heard of this interview, and made up his mind to do something. Although he was usually so good-natured, he was as determined as a bull-dog, and I think he used some influence in deciding matters, for two weeks later he dropped in to tell Jack that Nettie and Cottrell would be married two months later.

Shorty must have seen news in my face, for after supper he drew me aside and asked me what I knew. I hated to tell him, but did so, the best way I could. The poor lad stood still as a stone for several seconds. Then, with a shuddering sob, he turned away. In the morning he was gone with his horse and clothes, leaving no word.

Jack and I talked it over during the day, and he expressed a great deal of regret, thinking, however, that Nettie had decided for herself, and that Shorty had no one to blame for his failure.

"If it had been different," he went on, "and Percy had persevered and won, I would, too, have given in, and I think Parker would as well, for next year Percy will come into a little money. You see, I have never told him of it because I wanted him to grow up on his own merits, and be self-reliant. I think it has been for the best. Joe never knew, until he was of age, that he had anything, and we didn't tell Percy of it then, because he was only seventeen. Joe put his money into the farm here, and kept quiet about it."

He sat silent for a minute, then continued.

"Of course, this is between ourselves. But—do you know, I wish the boy had won. He's a good deal of a man, and, now I come to think of it, the affair has hit him hard. They could have waited a couple of years, you know." And Jack walked off slowly, taking long whiffs at his pipe.

Weeks passed, during which I saw Nettie Parker several times. She seemed indifferent. Her laugh was not the jolly laugh I had been accustomed to hear, and she seemed pensive at times. Was it her approaching wedding, or—Shorty? I hoped it was Shorty. But somehow when people pine they seem to lose colour and get thin, and Nettie Parker did neither. And still no word from Shorty, and the day for the wedding only a week away.

The people for miles round were invited to the wedding, which old Sam Parker said would "make people talk." I rode into town on behalf of Jack and myself for something to present to the bride-elect. In the post-office some one tapped me on the shoulder. I turned. It was Shorty Fleming—Shorty, smiling quite happily.

"How long before you will be going out?" he asked.

"I'm ready now."

"All right! Wilson, go and borrow a horse until to-morrow—tell them yours is lame, and you'll have to lead him. Nobody has recognised me in this overcoat, hat, and false moustache, and I don't want them to. I'll walk out, and walk up the road. Hurry up with the horses!"

The half-hundred guests at Parker's had been enjoying themselves to the full. All of Mrs. Parker's good things had been stowed away where they would do the most good. The minister from town was getting ready for the ceremony, for a special license had actually been obtained, and the guests were bustling about, amid some confusion, trying to find the best points for observation. Nettie Parker, pale for once, stood near the front door, pulling her fingers nervously, waiting supposedly for her father.

Someone knocked at the door. Nettie pulled it open, gave a little cry, seized a man's hat from the back of a chair and an overcoat from a peg near by, and rushed out, slamming the door. Everybody who saw the performance stood still—dazed. Then, as we heard horses' hoofs clattering up the road, there was a rush for the outside.

Up the road, disappearing fast, were two horses, whose riders were evidently in a hurry. There was another rush—this time for the stables—led by old Sam Parker. But, somehow, the doors would not open. They had been nailed up very securely by a person who was at that moment making hypocritical efforts to get one of them open.

At this juncture, Cottrell, as cool as if he had never thought of attending his own wedding, came up and spoke quietly to old Parker, who was so dazed that he had not as yet opened his mouth.

The old man started and turned to those who were near. I missed what he said, for Cottrell spoke to me.

"I told the old gentleman that it was no use trying to stop them. If they mean to get married, they will."

Then in a tone that contained no trace of bitterness, he continued:

"It is far better to have happened now than—than later. And, as it is, I think there will be only one unhappy person instead of three."

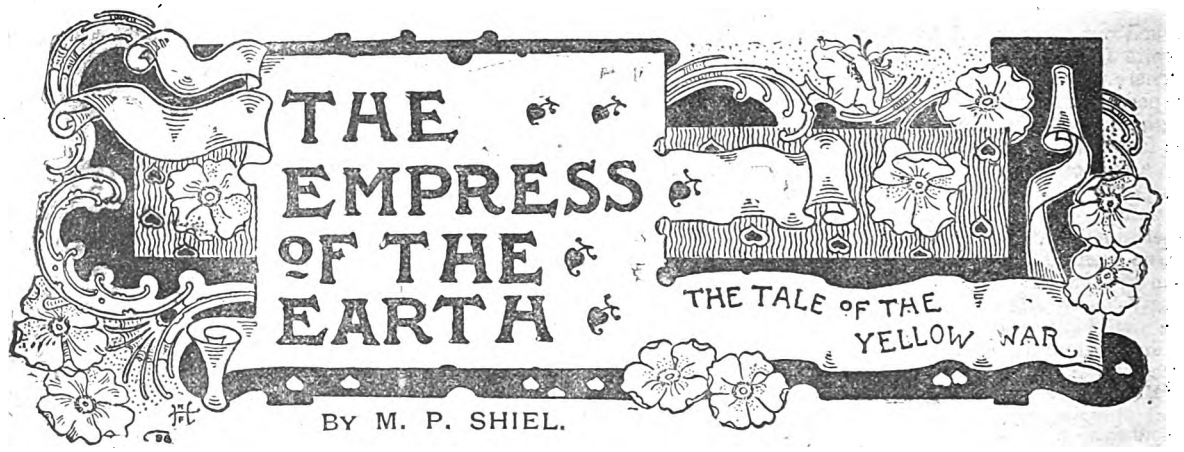
That was Morris Cottrell—philosopher and man.

Mr. and Mrs. Percival Fleming sent their address and were invited to return. When he saw them, Parker remarked: "You have got some nerve for a boy. Are you not both ashamed of yourselves?"

No, they were not; and after Nettie had had a good cry in her father's arms, the runaways were ready to receive the congratulations of their friends, foremost among whom was Morris Cottrell.

Holland Clark.

Digitized by Google



SUMMARY.

Yen How, a shrewd Chino-Japanese doctor, falls desperately in love with Ada Seward, an English nursemaid. His advances are rudely repulsed, however; but he leaves England with a fixed determination to win the object of his affections in spite of all opposition.

Yen How goes first to Japan as a Japanese, where he becomes intimate with the prime minister, Marquis Ito, to whom he proposes a league between the two races of China and Japan, and an immense scheme by which Europe may be reduced to a waste, and China become the Empress of the Earth with scarcely an effort of her own. He then goes to China and becomes virtual ruler of that nation. In the course of a conversation which he has with Li Hung Chang he unfolds his scheme for setting all the European Powers against Great Britain. After the slaughter China will step in and conquer the remnants of the armies.

War is declared between Great Britain and France and Germany and Russia. The British fleet meets the Allied ships in Mid-channel and a battle ensues. Although the British vessels are outnumbered by two to one, the superior tactics of the British, and of John Hardy, a consumptive midshipman and a genius for modern warfare (who escapes on the Jupiter from the fight, and rams all the transports some distance away), result in the destruction of the Allied fleet. Hardy is ill for a time, and on his recovery decides to go to China. Before going, however, he endeavours to obtain a promise of marriage from Miss Bosey Jay, a young lady artist, but is refused. He goes to the Palace Theatre of Varieties, and there meets Ada Seward, the nursemaid with whom Yen How is in love. She sends him home intoxicated, and a week later he is in Paris, where he has a row with Edropol, the Bulgarian duellist. John, however, does not fight, but goes to Berlin, and from thence to Petersburg. Here he sends a letter to Bobbie, his old servant in England, and starts out for China by the overland route. Yen How organises an army of 400,000,000 souls—men, women, and children—to overrun Europe when the time is ripe. He is sitting in his garden when the capture of John Hardy is announced to him.

CHAPTER XIII.

John and Yen.

John Hardy, having arrived at Vladivostok, had engaged an interpreter, and spent two whole days in trying to charter some sort of craft to take him to Nagasaki, where he hoped either to meet his ship, or hear about her locale.

His impatience was nothing less than fevered; for, through his interpreter, he heard that no rencontre had as yet taken place between the hostile fleets; but that, within a week or so, it was expected that the allied French, German and Russian vessels would meet the allied British and Japanese in battle. Such was the report brought by junks from Nagasaki and Fusan, and by caravan from Newchwang and Kin-chow.

An engagement had hitherto not occurred for the simple reason that the French, German and Russian fleets had practically been in hiding from the British; and the reason why they had been in hiding was the very simple one that they were finding extraordinary difficulties in the matter of coaling, the British and Japanese having, as a matter of fact, created a "corner" by buying up nearly all the coal to be obtained in the East some weeks previously; so that from Singapore to Vladivostok the cry had been coal! coal!

Now, however, as it seemed—so said the reports—the French, German, and Russian vessels had coal in plenty! Whence this supply had come, no one could conceive. It was a mystery—but a certainty.

The battle, therefore, so long delayed, must come soon.

John Hardy's pulses beat faster when this forecast reached him; and his chagrin was intense when, after anxious search, he found no compradore willing or able to secure him a passage to Nagasaki. The East was in suspense, waiting with panting heart for the future, without interest in the present. It turned a listless ear to John Hardy's pleadings.

Nothing remained for it but Port Arthur, where, as he was told, he would be sure to find a willing junk. But the journey was immense, slow, arduous. John Hardy almost gave up hope of being in time for the battle.

But with strong heart he set out. He anticipated no danger on entering Chinese territory. China was not formally at war with England. He did not know that, even in times of the most settled quietude, no traveller's life was worth a rush in Northern China—witness the case of Sir Harry Parks.

He had with him quite a little retinue; and he travelled in a palanquin borne between mules.

The northern Chinese were a hard, ferocious, and treacherous race—considerably more so than the southern. They were also very much larger and stronger men,—rascals tall, and lean, and brawny, their bony toughness being derived from the Tartar blood with which the northern Chinese tribes were infused. Their language, too, was very different to the southern dialects, and, above all, their walk. The southerners walked on the flat of their feet like Europeans; the northerners swung along on their heels, with a backward slant of the body, like a statue put to lean with its back against a wall.

At Hunshun John Hardy stopped to rest for a night at a little two-roomed inn; and here it was that, as soon as he was asleep, a consultation occurred between the whole body of villagers and John's retinue of five.

The next morning, suspecting nothing, he went forward, this time in a shaky jinricksha, or Chinese mule-cart. He could no longer bear the swinging between the palanquin-mules. It had reduced him to a state of weakness, and he was now spitting up phlegm streaked with blood.

At every village now that they came to they were surrounded by increasing crowds, and increasing clamours. But always John's servants spoke some words to the people, which had the effect of restraining them. As he set out afresh, a throng of those skeleton visages would be there to gape greedily after him: but still, he did set out.

A sickness of the heart—a sickness of the stomach—grew upon him.

Digitized by Google

Could Man—could Woman—be like this?

Every nerve in his gentle and loving nature rose in shuddering revolt against this race.

He saw the whisperings and confabulations between his men and the mobs, and, with his instinct for truth, suspected treachery. But he was now quite helpless.

Everywhere, as he advanced, his eye noted the drilling, drilling, to which the nation was being subjected.

But he was now very sick, and languid, and day by day sat propped against the side of the cart, staring wearily before him, under the growing heat of the sun. He was compelled to keep up his strength with sips of the deleterious Chinese spirit samshu; and the only food which he could procure for days was the sickening mess of rice and greens which forms the staple Chinese diet.

He descended the river Yalu in a gorgeously painted junk, drawn on each bank by a mule. Here he had some rest, lying in long dreams of quietude through the starlit nights of a Chinese spring on the deck of the junk. Never had the heavens and the earth seemed to him so lovely, and so enthralled in a mystery of peace, as in those vast sheeny nights of his descent of the Yalu. At Wigu he commenced the land-journey again, on mule-back this time, somewhat recovered in health.

He was given now to understand that he was being guided toward Port Arthur. Instead of this, he was being led northwards, toward Moukden.

At Moukden was a garrison of the old regular army; and the railway from thence to Tientsin, commenced some time before, had lately been completed.

At an inn at Moukden he was eating, when a Japanese officer, accompanied by an interpreter, entered the room, and bade John follow him. It was Yen How's decree that any white man found by chance in Northern China should be sent on to Pekin.

John Hardy was ineffably surprised, first, at finding himself in Moukden, and next in being hustled into a queer, low, dark railway-train, in the keeping of half-a-dozen gigantic pig-tails.

"But," he protested through his interpreter, "England is not at war with China!"

"No," said the Japanese with a grin, "but China is at war with England."

In the train, John's wrists were bound tight with a cord. His interpreter and servants had disappeared.

They reached Tientsin by train, and thence went on to the village of Tung-chow, five miles from Pekin, by junk up the Peiho. Just as the sun set they arrived at the mighty walls of Pekin, and had only time to rush between the gates, when the ponderous jaws of the city-portals clanged and roared behind them.

Pekin! multitudinous, unfathomable city, place of beauty and of horror, of romance, and of infamy! city of vast triple-boulevards, grand as the imagination of an architect, loathsome as the stench of a sewer, city of gauds and colours, vermilion, and emerald, and blue, and of temples, and avenues, of palaces and lakes and parks, immense, a world in itself, resembling in its tone and aspect no other of the cities of man!

Here only may the hoariness of our race on the earth, the vast age of the old world, be read even by the blind.

Whoever is a Dreamer, let him go and busy himself in Pekin. The city is itself a dream—an opium-dream.

It was necessary for John Hardy and his captors to pass through both the Tartar and the Chinese cities before reaching the Imperial City. Each of these three is inclosed within its own massive walls, independently of the great wall of the whole town. The Imperial City was sacred ground. Here resided the Supreme Power, and here also the Legations. The profane foot entered it on pain of death.

They passed through a number of thoroughfares, broad as three or four Holborns laid side by side, and long as vistas; streets thronging with camels, and jingling mules, and the booths of small merchants, and swaying pig-tails; and in an hour reached the Imperial Portal on mule-back.

The leader of the little band produced his brevet, and gained admittance. They proceeded slowly through a park, leading their animals now, and after traversing a number of secluded granite streets, and a long marble colonnade, entered the courtyard of a vast, low, white palace.

John Hardy, as they halted, leant wearily upon his mule. There was a hollow pain at his chest, and at the back of his shoulders. His lips were dry and cracked.

A door opened at the side of the courtyard, and a soft-footed official came to learn the reason of this intrusion.

A few words were spoken, and he turned away. In a quarter of an hour he was back again; and five minutes afterwards Yen How and John Hardy were face to face. For quite a minute Yen How continued to read his paper.

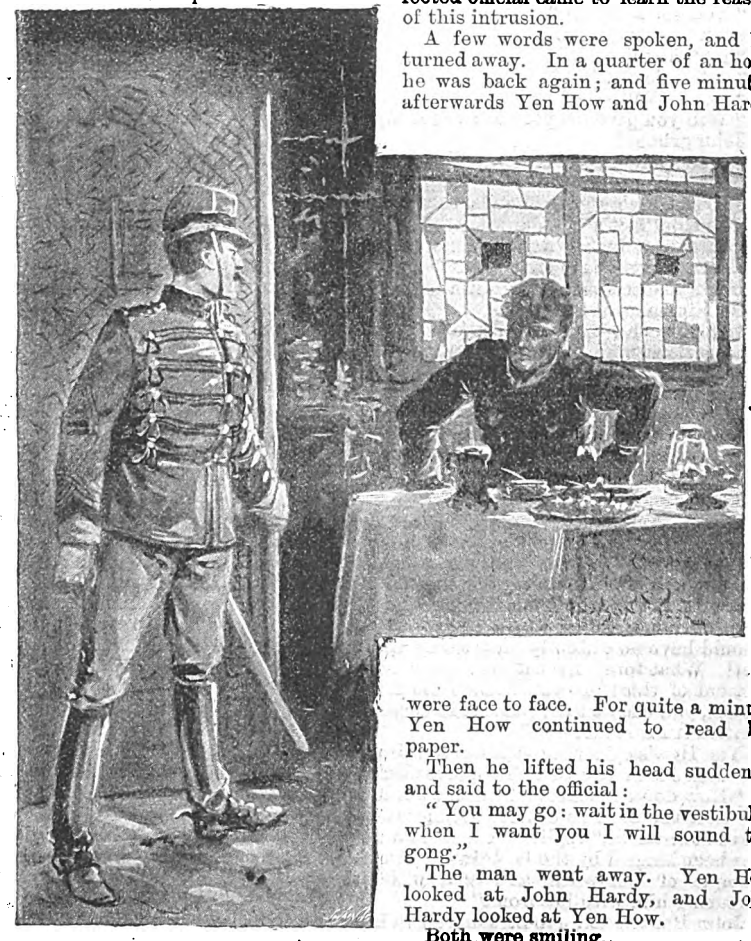
Then he lifted his head suddenly, and said to the official:

"You may go: wait in the vestibule: when I want you I will sound the gong."

The man went away. Yen How looked at John Hardy, and John Hardy looked at Yen How.

Both were smiling.

Yen How had still under his eye a slight scar where the fist of the



A Japanese officer entered the room.

Digitized by Google

English soldier, John Brabant, had struck him in London. John Hardy's hands were unbound. This had been done ever since he had reached Tungchow when it had been necessary for him to mount a mule. He had on his usual blue pea-jacket; and under this, in the breast pocket, his loaded revolver.

In the colloquy which followed, one of these two men spoke an English as perfectly grammatical as that used by Tennyson or Macaulay, though with an intensely foreign something in his way of speaking it; the other spoke broken English. It was Yen How who used the good, and John Hardy the bad English.

"Who are you, sir?" said Yen How.

"Me Englishman," said John, "name John Hardy."

Yen had heard of the Battle of Shoreham, and he never forgot a name. He said:

"Don't talk pigeon English. I can understand you. I have lived some years in England."

"Oh, veer goot. Me no knowee that. Me talk good English to Chinaman."

"As you please. What is it you have come to China for?"

"Me sailor. Me come from Russia to Vladivostok to joinee my ship. What for you no letee me join it? Englishman and Chinaman good friends."

"Since when?"

"For always."

"You got a sister?"

John was surprised.

"No," he said.

"A female cousin?"

"Yes. Well,——"

"Will you give me your cousin for my wife?"

John grinned.

"Why, you queer Chin-chin-Chinaman!" he cried out.

"Ah, you say no, you see. Englishman and Chinaman are not such very good friends, then."

The chief fact about John Hardy was that he had eyes which saw a fact. As these last words fell upon his ears, he looked keenly into the placid face before him; and at once he realised that he was in the presence, not so much of a Chinaman, as of a Mind.

Instantly the instinct to speak pigeon-English left him. Unconsciously he began to speak naturally. This was a great compliment to Yen How.

"But look here, Mr. Chinaman," he said, "what is all this for? Who are you?"

"Well, since you ask, I am called Yen How."

John started.

"Ah! You know my name, I see," said Yen How; "I know yours, too."

"Yes. Very good—I am glad that I find myself with you, since you are who you are. You are acquainted with European ideas, and certainly a man of sense. I wish to throw myself on your benevolence. I find myself in such a silly sort of scrape. I am a poor sailor trying to join my ship. Knowing China as a friendly country, I thought I should have no difficulty in passing through. Yet here I am! What for? Isn't it very absurd? Please help me to get out of this! If you cannot set me free of your own power, you can at least put me in communication with the British Ambassador——"

Yen How's eyes went small in a smile.

"There isn't any British Ambassador any more," he said.

"How do you mean, sir?" asked John.

"It is the Chinese custom to hang thieves by the heels, head downwards," replied Yen. "The British Ambassador has been hanged by the heels in the square before the Pekin Temple of Confucius, and died while the people were torturing him with hot irons."

John Hardy's left eye-lid lowered in intense menace.

"That is not really so, Mr. Chinaman?"

"It is, my son."

"And whose doing was that? Not the Government of China's?"

"It was my doing, my son."

"Yours, Yen How?"

"Mine."

Now the two men were really in contact. They looked into each other's eyes, searchingly, eye to eye.

"You shocking little devil!" said John Hardy.

"Call me what you like. I will repay your insult by a compliment: you are a brave fellow."

"You will be strangled like a frog for this, Mr. Chinaman!"

"Whom by? All the Englishmen in China are dead."

"All?"

"Every one."

"A massacre?"

"A regular sacrament of death."

"But the Chinese believe in a God above, I think?"

"Pooh! not much."

"You do not?"

"Not I."

"And the white men of other nations, were they massacred, too?"

"All—all."

"But with what motive?"

"It would take too long to tell you."

"Ah! I know."

"You do?"

"Yes! I know! I know! I had a queer, dim idea long ago. Now I know! I know!"

"You are shrewd then, as well as brave."

"Yes! I know!"

John Hardy was in an ecstasy of discovery. He saw the skies growing black, black over the earth.

"Well, will you give me your cousin for my wife now?" asked Yen How, all wrinkles.

John did not answer. His brows were knit. It was only after a minute's thought that he made two steps forward, and laid his right hand on Yen How's shoulder, the doctor looking up into his face as he began to speak.

"Now, look you, Yen How," John said, "I know now, as I tell you, what your idea is like. Let me put it in plain words: you mean to sweep with this Chinese nation over Europe when our war is over, and Europe is made ready for your coming. I was a fool not to see it quite before—but that is it. And this idea is yours, yours only, Yen How: I see that. You have the face of a devil, you toad, you have! Well, I have got an offer to make you—a challenge—if you are man enough to accept it. Get me out of this—put me on board my ship, and I will undertake to fight you, and beat you. I alone, Yen, against you alone. If you beat me, I give you not my cousin, but the Queen's daughters for your wives. If I beat you, I squeeze the life out of your throat, you frog. I promise you that I shall breathe not a word of this plan of yours to a living soul—no one shall know from me: and no one shall know from me about the massacre, and the drilling of the people. I make you that offer, Yen."

John Hardy had recognised the great Mind in Yen How; now it was Yen How's turn to recognise the same in John Hardy. Here was the world-big Thought, the sun-kindled Imagination.

Yen How answered:

"Take your hand from my shoulder, my son."

"Well, what do you say, Yen?"

"I say that your thought tickles me, boy!"

"Is that all?"

"And I say, that if I were to accept your offer, you could go back to your ship saying to yourself: 'The great Yen How has recognised me as one of the two kings of the world.'"

"Still, I wait for your answer."

"How am I to count upon the silence you promise?"

Digitized by Google

"Well, you know something of English life. I come of a family of English gentlemen. We never break our word."

"Well, come, we shall see. Your thought—what shall I say?—tickles me, my son. We shall see—come now. But first—do you know that I gave an order for your beheading? And then I said I would see you. Do you know why? I had a question to ask you."

"Well?"

"Have you lived in London?"

"Yes—sometimes."

"Ah, well—there is just a chance, then. Did you ever know a lillee girl called—what's her name?—Ah! Ada Seward?"

Yen How could destroy a world without the quivering of a nerve; but as he uttered this name in a whisper, he thrilled, and trembled.

John did not answer. The name sounded familiar. He hung his head with knit brow, thinking. Suddenly he blushed. He had remembered—the music-hall—the drunken night—Lottie Collins—Ada.

Yen saw the blush.

To this man, drunk with his passion, it was inconceivable that any other man could see this girl, and not straightway go mad for love. Men will sometimes get so intoxicated with wine, that the sober state becomes inconceivable to them; and they will say to a sober companion: "Oh, you are far gone, my boy!"

Yen saw the blush, and he noticed now that John Hardy's face was more than usually lovely, even for one of a lovely race. Would not Ada Seward love that face if she had ever seen it?

"You have seen her?" He half rose from his seat, and brought his mouth in an intense, secret, cunning whisper close to John's ear.

"I have," said John.

He had an instinct, even then, that he was running some frightful danger in making this avowal. But he was truthful in a very rigid, and rather old-fashioned sense. He had never told a falsehood.

"You have?—in real truth?" whispered Yen.

"I have."

"And—kissed her—eh, boy?"

The Chinaman's face worked. He hissed rather than spoke these words.

John grinned.

"Why, you queer Chinaman——!" he cried.

"You have!"

"What?"

"Kissed her—eh? eh, John Hardy?"

"Of course I have kissed her."

"Then you die!"

"What, for kissing Miss Seward?"

"You die, I say!"

"It was she who kissed me."

"You die! you die, you little white devil! you die! you die!"

Up went the fingers of Yen's right arm, twinkling in ecstatic wrath.

There was no mistaking Yen How. He meant this.

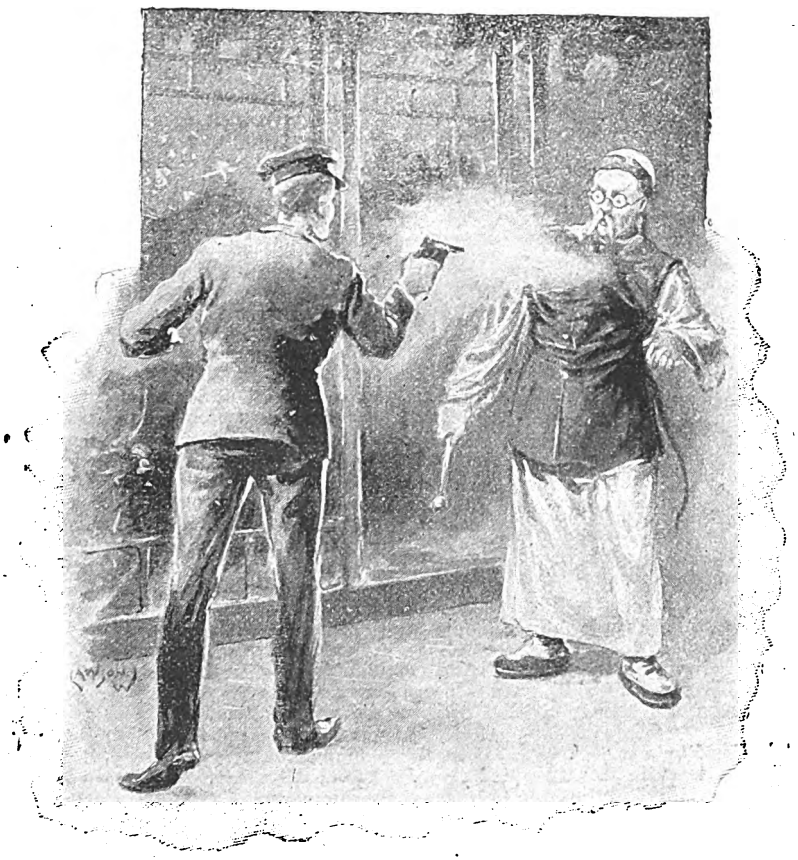
He pounded the gong twice with the hammer.

"In one half hour ——" he said, with a furious nod of the head at John.

John Hardy, perfectly cool, saw clearly that all hope for himself was lost. But he had no intention of leaving Yen How behind him to work his mischief in the world.

The second sound of the gong had hardly shivered and clanged, when John Hardy, with the revolver whipped from his breast-pocket, blew Yen How—passion, schemes, ambitions and all—out of existence.

In intention, that is—in absolute, cool unerringness of aim. The bullet struck Yen precisely over the centre of his heart. But it struck a plate of steel mail, and did not penetrate.



B ew Yen How out of existence.

John was about to fire a second shot at Yen's head, when suddenly the two men were locked in desperate conflict. Yen had flung himself upon John.

Yen's eye had long before noted the bulge of John's pea-jacket over the breast. He was half-prepared for what had happened.

The struggle was carried on with the entire physical force of the two combatants, the revolver being the aim of both efforts.

John, though below the middle height, was quite an inch or so taller than Yen; and he was able, with his left hand, to seize Yen's pig-tail, and draw it in a single coil tight round Yen's throat; while Yen inclosed the other's right hand and ribs in a grip of iron, squeezing with all his energy, and heaving and slanting his adversary in the effort to effect a throw.

Digitized by Google

The physical force of the tough little Chinaman was quite two or three times that of the frail English lad.

This contest of strengths was a foreboding—and a resemblance—of the larger national contest which was impending.

John Hardy was comparatively weak. But in his right hand was a revolver, representing the Science of Western Civilisation, which, however, Yen's grip was rendering ineffectual; and in John's left hand was Yen's pig-tail, representing the barbarism, the superstition, the repulsive Soul of the East.

Yen's face darkened. A gurgling sound came from his swollen lips. The rat was being suffocated by means of its own tail. The West was strangling the East.

Suddenly the revolver went off, and the bullet entered Yen How's left foot. The Science of the West had uttered a cry.

But the West was breathing its last gasps under the stringent ferocious grasp of the East.

He fell at once flat on his back.

The contest was short, and it ended suddenly. A little spout of blood welled and rolled from John Hardy's lips; and at once he lost power and fainted.

Before he could fall to the ground, an attendant had come up, and struck him a blow on the brow with a heavy bamboo. He fell at once flat on his back, his face covered with blood.

Almost immediately Yen How was cool.

"Take him away," he said. "He has attempted my life—he must not be killed."

"The torture, Your Excellency?"

"Yes. But I will direct it myself. Go away."

He sat again, as the attendant lifted John in his brawny arms. He commenced once more to read the Mercury.

He knew that there was a bullet in his foot. But he would not move: the racking pain was sweet to him.

The intensity of the Chinese instinct of Vengeance is a mystery. It is not human—it is not bestial—it may be demonic. To us, at all events, it is incomprehensible.

To them pain is joy, if, at the same time, they can gloat over the knowledge that it is in their power to take a thousandfold vengeance on the causer of the pain. They hug their pangs—they wantonly put off the hour of their revenge—they roll in a secret luxury of malice.

In the matter of Torture, the Chinese have excelled all nations in a devilish cunning. They have investigated the nerves of man, and adapted their plagues to them with a nice and minute ingenuity. And Yen was more ingenious than the most ingenious.

He intended to give his mind to this matter. Meantime, he went on reading.

CHAPTER XIV.

The Vanished Fleet.

It was about twenty hours before John Hardy, in some absolutely dark place, again opened his eyes. At about the same time, the battle at which he had hoped and striven to be present was going forward.

For over a year the question which had been agitating many an English mind was this: Is our weight of metal in Chinese waters enough? Is it commensurate with possible contingencies? Is it not too hopelessly small?

This anxiety had been somewhat allayed by the spectacle of ship after ship of the British navy—the Barfleur, the Bonaventure, the Hannibal, the Gibraltar—steaming away in mysterious haste to the East.

On the other hand, they had not steamed away alone: they had followed—they had been followed by—a host of the choicest, mightiest ships of Russia, France, and Germany, all hasting Eastward, Eastward, as if in the sweep of some Law of gravitation, all with the same secret urgency, the same suggestion of mystery, and flurry, and design.

Heavy Russian armaments like the Vladimir Monomach, had hurried after French craft like the Pascal, and German craft like the Gefion. An addition of some 30,000 tons to her Chinese navy was made by Russia alone in her ships the Rossiya, the Cissoi Veliki, the Navarin.

This Eastern fever had infected even other nations, not precisely in the running. Away in the sweep of the Chinese Current went battle-ships from Italy, from Austria, from America.

In a few months the seas of the Far East were gravid with the navies of the world.

China, herself, by way of pantomime, had been building cruisers at the Vulcan Dockyards at Stettin; and at that very time was promenading the boulevards of the seas, quite like one of the chic, with the new Hi-Chi, Hi-Tien, and Hai-Shen.

The Hi-Chi had a speed of twenty-four knots an hour, and was a cruiser carrying an armament as heavy as many vessels of twice her displacement.

The fleet of Japan was in prime fighting order, exquisitely modern, as smart as it was swift and strong. It was worth any two of the fleets in Chinese waters put together.

Was Britain's weight of metal sufficient? This was the question.

The fact was, that Britain had ceased to be acutely anxious when it was once known that her weight was greater than that of any two of the other European nations combined.

She had added 37,000 tons, in round numbers, to her former Chinese squadron; Russia 36,000; France 11,000. But, all told, she had concentrated 126,700 tons in those waters, whereas Russia's total was only 83,000, and France's 26,000. It followed, therefore, that Britain had a preponderance of some 17,700 tons over these two.

This had seemed enough, considering that some of Russia's terra-cotta coloured ships were rather old-fashioned.

It was hardly remembered that there was Germany, too, with a weight of 27,000 tons in Chinese waters. Russia, France, and Germany together had a preponderance over Britain of nearly 10,000 tons.

The fact was sufficiently impressive in itself; but it had not been terrifying, even to those who remembered the possibility of the German element being hostile to the British, when they also remembered the splendid fleet of—Japan.

Here was an additional element of 200,000 tons—all on the side of Britain.

For was not Japan the friend and ally of England? Were not their interests identical? The Britain of the East, and the Britain of the West—how natural that they should stand shoulder to shoulder!

But there was one question, in connection with this queer, outlandish, yellow ally of England, the correct answer to which would have sent as great a shock through England, could she have known it, as she had ever received in her history. The question was this: "Where on earth, during the early part of April, 1899, did the Allied Fleet in Eastern waters get their supplies of coal from?"

Digitized by Google

We have already stated that England and Japan, by a clever deal, had, some weeks before, effected a corner in nearly all the Welsh and other coal in the East.

Yet on the morning of the 19th of April, the whole Allied navy, which some little time before had been almost immobilised for lack of steam-fuel, and which had been hiding and dodging, each ship for herself, all about the Northern Chinese coasts, now steamed gallantly past Quelpart in search of the British fleet, supposed to be somewhere in the neighbourhood of Chemulpo.

They were steering north-west; Nagasaki lay south-east of them; they were therefore coming from the direction of Japan. Could it be that it was from Japan that they had obtained this coal?

And where was the fleet of Japan? For two days Vice-Admiral Sir Edward Seymour had been expecting it, by previous arrangement, to appear off Chemulpo. But as yet it gave no sign.

The Vice-Admiral was not at first precisely anxious; for his only ground of suspicion that anything was wrong in China was the fact, reported to him at Hong Kong six days before, that absolutely all communication between that island and the mainland had mysteriously ceased. Yen How had cunningly left the Englishmen on Hong Kong alive, having no desire to have every Chinese port shelled by British guns. Hence, when the Vice-Admiral coaled and started northward hurriedly on receipt of a telegram from Tokio, stating that the Allied fleet had managed to procure some coal, and were steaming eastward upon Japan, he had no suspicion of the massacre. His reply to Tokio was that he was starting northward at once, and would avoid an engagement, if possible, until the junction of the two fleets was effected; and he instructed the Japanese fleet to join him at Chemulpo.

But at Chemulpo he received a slight shock. There was no white man in the place.

All he could suppose was that there had been a rising in the town, and that the white men had been killed.

But he hardly attached any political importance to the fact. Such things were common in China.

At first he waited on with perfect confidence for the appearance of the Japanese fleet.

The next morning he received a cable dispatched from Nagasaki to Fusan, and brought on two hundred miles on mule-back to Chemulpo. It was as follows:

"The Allied fleets, plentifully supplied with coal, are about to steam eastward in search of you. Japanese fleet will follow."

"Steam eastward!" "Supplied with coal?" "Will follow?" Certainly, now, if ever man was puzzled, it was the British Vice-Admiral.

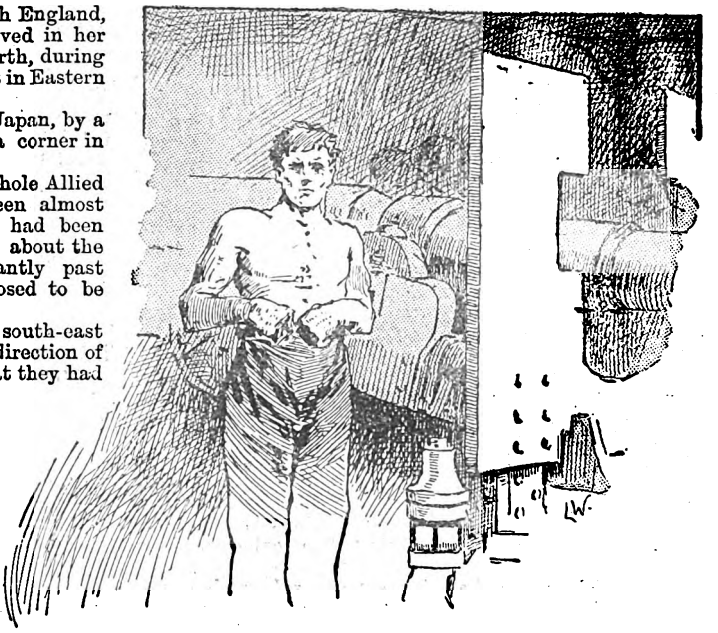
For if the enemy were steaming eastward supplied with coal, that meant Japanese treachery. But if Japan were treacherous, and had joined the Allies, why on earth did she take the pains to warn the British of their advance?

And why "will" follow? They should have set out, according to the Vice-Admiral's instructions, long before. If they had not already set out they were treacherous; but if they were treacherous, why did they give this warning of it, instead of taking the advantage of a surprise?

That they were not neutral, seemed proved by the fact that they were "following" at all.

The Vice-Admiral's brow was a heavy cloud of care. He decided that the cable was a hoax, and then that that was impossible, and then again that it was a hoax.

Suddenly he sent a small expedition of blue-jackets by road to Seoul to see who was there. They returned with the announcement that there were no white men in Seoul.



Belted his trousers with a determined snap.

The secret of Japan's action, though inscrutable, was this: She coaled the Allies in order that they might destroy the British; and she warned the British in order that they might destroy the Allies.

She helped both sides, being the enemy of both.

But this policy was too subtle for the British Commander to divine without an absolute clue.

The absence of white men at Seoul, as well as at Chemulpo, was merely an added shock. It brought no real light to the Vice-Admiral's mind.

Two days he spent in coaling the fleet out of four colliers which had accompanied him from Hong Kong, and in taking in stores from the store-ships. At the end of the second day, there was still no sign of the yellow ally of England.

The thing was so inexplicable, that wonderment could find no words. Japan was a nation among nations, civilised, responsible, presumably careful to keep her pledged word. What, then, could have happened?

"What, in Heaven's name, has happened?" said the Vice-Admiral to himself twenty times during the course of that terrible and sleepless night.

But he did not neglect the warning of Japan's cable. The next morning, immediately after the saluting of the colours, the fleet steamed from Chemulpo harbour, the flag-ship being the Barfleur, one of the only two line-of-battle-ships among the ships.

The Vice-Admiral had no intention of being caught at anchor without sea-room.

Up to the present, no hostile action had taken place in the far East. The approaches to Vladivostok harbour and Kiao-Chau were crowded with mines, and well defended by forts. The Vice-Admiral had preserved his fighting power from injury, till the first naval battle. After that, in the event of his victory, he would proceed to the capture of the hostile ports.

He went cruising south-eastward under half steam.

But what now is that, away yonder on the southern horizon? A long streak of grey mist, which has the property of growing swiftly broader and darker. The Japanese fleet at last, surely! No. It is the fleet of the Allied enemy. That is quickly determined by the look-outs.

Digitized by Google

They numbered twenty-nine, and occupied the whole region of the Southern hemi-horizon.

The British ships were thirty-three. Among them, however, was a very large number of smaller-tonnage craft, torpedo-boat destroyers, first-class gun-boats, second and third class cruisers, dispatch vessels, and sloops of war, of varying weight, from about 4,000 to as low as 260 tons. But there, too, on the other hand, were the great Terrible and her sister-cruiser (in whose books was the name of John Hardy, absent), the Powerful. These had each a tonnage of 14,200. There, too, were the Revenge with 14,150 tons, and the Gibraltar with 7,700.

The weight, on the whole, of the enemy was greater, but it was not much greater; and, even so, it was not the custom of Englishmen to count as a deterrent from battle a preponderance of the enemy in mere physical power. The Vice-Admiral banished from his mind for the time the mystery of the Japanese fleet, and sent forth his commands with a high heart, in which hope was uppermost.

Jack, below decks, belted his trousers with a determined snap, and prepared to sink, to fight, to swim, to die, to live.

Already from the conning-towers could be discerned the pea-soup colour of some of the Russian ships, though both fleets were pouring round the horizon two regions of dark smoke.

The British approached in a very wide wedge, the Barfleur leading at the apex of the formation, while the enemy maintained a double line, the whole of the first line being composed of Russian vessels, the ponderous Vladimir Monomach occupying the central post.

The barb, so to speak, of the British wedge was as strong as possible. On each side of the Barfleur, somewhat astern of her, came the Powerful and the Terrible. It was the intention of the Vice-Admiral to begin well, and to derive all the possible moral prestige which this fact might afford. At the moment when the Vladimir was two miles from the Barfleur, and three from the Terrible and the Powerful, the battle commenced on the British side. All the three British vessels had kept their forward barbettes trained upon the Vladimir, and they fired simultaneously. The result was just like magic. Before the smoke had cleared, the Russian ship was no longer on the surface of the waters. An instant afterwards the battle was general.

In the fury of warfare which now ensued, let the reader fix his eye upon a middle-sized, and comparatively unimportant ship, which stands far back in the starboard limb of the British wedge; she is called the Iphigenia—a second-class cruiser, tonnage, 3,600, horse-power, 7,000; not very wonderfully armoured, but capable of showing a clean pair of heels. On board of her is—Fate.

Yonder is the Gefion, engaged with the Terrible, and yonder, both the Pascal and the Majestueuse with the Revenge, and yonder again the Barfleur with the Invincible, and the Powerful with the Mendon. Wide is the war and various. The British wedge has penetrated the fleet of the Allies. The navies of the world are mixed together in a hotch-potch of combat.

There are instances, on one side and the other, of splendid manœuvring, of the right thing done at the right moment, of subtle skill. But these all are individual, between ship and ship, captain and captain. Neither on one side nor the other is there any wide plan, any grand plot, any omnipresent eye. On the whole, it is a question merely of weight of metal against weight of metal. The Great Man is not there.

* * * * *

Slowly, in his dark prison, the Chinese Iron is entering into the soul of John Hardy. He is being taught the meaning of Fear, and familiarity with the face of Pain. This, too, was necessary for him.

(To be continued.)

SHALL WE MAKE A MINIATURE FOR YOU?

With the enterprise born of repeated success, Short Stories makes an extraordinary offer to the whole of its readers for a limited time only. We will send a beautiful little miniature (about 2¼-inches by 1⅞-inches) in exquisite colouring, and completely framed in a dainty gold-plated oval frame, of any single portrait readers like to forward.

All you have to do is to send your photograph, together with the coupon, and seven shillings and sixpence. The miniatures may be also had in chased gold ornamental frames, the total cost being 10s. 6d.

Of course, the better the photograph you send, the better will be the reproduction.

Write your name and address on the back of the photograph, and mark your envelope "Miniature."

Specimens of the Miniatures can be seen at:

Manchester—Messrs. Abel Heywood, Oldham Street; and Mr. John Heywood, Deansgate.
Liverpool—F. A. Latarche, 63, Lime Street; and M. Partington, 9, Renshaw Street.
Edinburgh—H. Robinson, 111 and 115, Leith Street; and David Crawford, 75, South Clerk Street.
Glasgow—W. Love, 221, Argyle Street; and Mr. Barr, 88, Sauchiehall St.
Dundee—Mrs. Littlejohn, The Pillars.
Bradford—W. H. Clough, 28, Forster Square.
Bristol—T. Thatcher, 44, College Green.
Newcastle—Messrs. R. J. Porteus and Co., 19, Grainger Street West.
Leeds—Mr. H. Walker, 37, Briggate, Leeds.
West Bromwich—H. N. Ellison, 3 and 3a, Bull Street.
Cardiff—W. White, 1a, Severn Road, Canton.
London—Pearson's Weekly Offices.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Colour of eyes.....

„ „ hair.....

Complexion.....

Description of dress.....

.....

£ s. d.

Please send..... @ 7s. 6d.
„ „ ..... @ 10s. 6d.

Amount of Postal Orders inclosed... £ s. d.

THE WORLD OF DRESS.

Edited by Mrs. ARIA.

Published by C. Arthur Pearson Limited.

Monthly, 1s.; Subscription, 12s. a year, post free.

The World of Dress will contain the Latest Fashion News in Paris, Vienna, New York, and London. Theatrical Dress in these cities will be largely dealt with, for it is on the stage that the changes of Fashion are first noted. A special feature each month will be an Interview with a Leading Costumier in one of those cities, who will specially design for The World of Dress one of the Coloured Plates which will be presented with each copy every month.

NO. 1 READY ON MARCH 31ST.

Digitized by Google

AN OLD FRIEND BACK AGAIN.

In Mr. James Anthony Froude's book, "Oceana," published twelve years ago, the following passage occurs:

"What England would become was to be seen already in the enormously extended suburbs of London and our great manufacturing cities; miles upon miles of squalid lanes, each house the duplicate of its neighbour; the dirty street in front, the dirty yard behind, the fetid smell from the ill-made sewers, the public-house at the street corners.

"Here, with no sight of a green field, with no knowledge of flowers or forest, the blue heavens themselves dirtied with soot—amidst objects all mean and hideous, with no entertainment but the music hall, no pleasure but in the drink shop — hundreds of thousands of English children are now growing up into men and women. And were these scenes to be indefinitely multiplied? Was this to be the real condition of an ever-increasing portion of the English nation? And was it to be supposed that a race of men could be so reared who could carry on the great traditions of our country?

"I for one could not believe it. The native vigour of our temperament might defy the influence of such a life for a quarter or for half a century. Experience, even natural probability, declared that the grandchildren of the occupants of these dens must be sickly, poor, and stunted wretches, whom no school teaching, however excellent, could save from physical decrepitude."

Some five or six years after the publication of "Oceana," the Fresh Air Fund was started. Its object to an extent was to counteract the very evils of which Mr. Froude spoke. It is still going on. The number of children given a holiday in 1892 was 20,000; last summer that number had risen to 105,000.

Another summer approaches, and it is my pleasant duty to lay the programme before the readers of S.S.

But S.S. is always adding new readers, and, for the benefit of these, I will say here that the Fresh Air Fund was inaugurated for the purpose of giving poor children a day's holiday in the country, with plenty to eat and drink, at the small cost of 9d. each. This amount includes railway fare and two good meals. The only qualification is that the children are needy and in want of a holiday.

As before, the work of organisation is in the hands of the Ragged School Union, S.S. and its companion publications finding the money, and quite recently the Secretary of the Union, and a representative from this office, have visited each centre of population to which the F.A.F. has been extended, for the purpose of concluding arrangements for this year. The total number of places benefited now reaches twenty-five, including London. Gateshead and Dundee have this year been included in the list to the extent of 2,000 children each. Full particulars regarding the various committees and number of children in each town will probably appear next week.

The total number of children arranged for is 105,000. Of course, as many more than that will be given a treat as we receive money to pay for; but 105,000 is our minimum goal.

Each season is worked independently of another, the money received being used up entirely. But we have received £372 10s. during the winter months, so that we have a goodly sum with which to start operations.

To carry out the programme, £4,252 10s. will be required, so there is still a balance of £3,880 to be collected.

It remains for the generous-hearted readers of S.S. again to put their hands into their pockets and draw forth the "nimble ninepences." You can send nine stamps, and use another for the envelope—making tenpence in all. It will be nothing to you. But see what happiness you will give to a poor little boy or girl in one of our large cities! Remember every penny of the amount received in subscriptions is spent on the children, nothing being deducted for working expenses. These are borne equally by the R.S.U and "Pearson's."

I don't ask you to forward a large amount. I don't expect more from you than you can afford. I do expect that. It is in a manner your fund, and I want you to support it. The readers of S.S. are all one large family, with the editor at the head, and he pleads the cause of poor little outcast children who will have no holiday in the country unless the money comes to hand.

Don't withhold your mite because no excursions have been arranged in your town. At one time only London was dealt with. Then towns with populations of 250,000 were added. Now nearly every place with a population over 100,000 is included. So you see it may be the turn of your town sometime.

The Fresh Air Fund is a national institution, its ramifications extending every year.

Anyone who can help the movement by collecting amongst friends, can have a collecting sheet by applying for it at this office. These sheets set forth the objects of the collection, so that there is no need to explain the reason for asking for money. The sheet speaks for itself.

Now then, everyone of you see if you can't make this a record year. Every year since the Fund started the amount received has increased. Don't go back on what you have already done. We must not go back. The F.A.F. motto must be "Onward!"

All subscriptions will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly.

Digitized by Google

A Lucky Find.

Arthur Park, the artist, and I, had just had a good dinner at one of the best restaurants, and were buttoning our overcoats under our chins as we stepped out into the street, when a young fellow, bright enough as to appearance, but still wearing his summer clothes, almost ran into us.

"Why, hallo, Billy, old man!" exclaimed Park.

The other replied in a low tone, and Park drew him to one side. In a moment I heard my friend say. "Oh, that's all right, old man—any time, any time. Good night—look in at the studio some day."

He took my arm and we crossed the street to a waiting cab.

"Poor devil of an art student," he explained; "living on hope and faith in himself. Didn't ask for it, but I lent him a sovereign."

We stepped into the hansom and he added: "Have any troubles of your own when you first began to scribble?"

"I remember one morning fastening up my boots with bits of wire, not having the necessary capital to invest in a pair of laces," I replied.

The painter laughed.

"We have all eaten our share of mad cow, as they say in Paris," he returned. "Did I ever tell you of my little experience with certain neighbours once upon a time?"

"Never. Go ahead!"

"I can't make much of it, but I can give the facts. If you can fix it up into anything you're welcome to do so—story-telling is your business. Maybe my tale is a shade gruesome, and sometimes as I look back at it I think perhaps my action wasn't strictly honest, though I fancy it will pass muster in this world of sin. You see, it was this way:

"Bob Allan—he's in Florence now—read about his new picture the other day, didn't you?—Bob Allan and I were born in the same little Irish town. We both decided to be celebrated artists, so we went to Dublin to begin. Don't ever boast to me about your early poverty; we were poverty itself, personified, and stalking about like a pestilence. You may have wired up your shoes, but we didn't have any shoes to wire. At least, we had only a single pair between us, and when one went out the other had to stay in. In addition to that, they were too small for me and too big for Bob.

"Well, we found a place at the top of an old building which we thought would do for a studio. It was a big room, and we got it practically free because the owner couldn't rent it to anybody else. The building had been intended for business, not residential purposes, and our room had once been a printing office. The floor was deep in ink, grease, and general dirt; and the walls weren't much better. The printers had moved away because the building had got to be unsafe for their presses.

"We bought a second-hand bed, begged a chair, borrowed an oil-stove, and stole a soap box, and—there we were! Sometimes we had two meals, sometimes only one, but we kept at work."

"You had got along far enough in your art studies that you had work, then?" I observed.

"My dear boy, signs! Such work as that. And we weren't successful at them, either, because the regular sign painters could do better work. It was unsatisfactory business.

"We got on through the autumn pretty well, but when cold weather came, our quarters became rather cheerless. The windows were loose, the shutters banged, the skylight let in the snow, and the wind puffed up through the cracks and rat-holes in the floor. The rat-holes, by-the-way, were a great source of annoyance to us. I shall never forget how proud I was the day I bought a toothbrush. The very next morning Bob lost it down a rat-hole.

"What made it harder for us was the fact that there were a lot of fellows about our own age in the immediate neighbourhood who seemed to be enjoying all the luxuries of life. Right across the corridor from our door was another leading apparently into some suite of rooms where, strange to say, in the glimpses we caught of the interior, we saw heavy rugs on the floor, upholstered furniture, a well-stocked sideboard and all that sort of thing. We took it to be some peculiar club. The members didn't seem to come very much in the daytime, but used generally to drop in at about eight o'clock in the evening, and from then till midnight, or after, sounds of good cheer, not to say of conviviality, greeted our ears. We usually went to bed early to get warm, and left the wind which came up the rat-holes to fight it out with the snow which came down the skylight.

"Matters kept getting worse with us. We had great hopes of selling one of Bob's landscapes, but while he was carrying it to the probable purchaser, he got knocked down by a runaway horse and trap, and the picture was ruined.

"It was the day of the funeral of Paddy Laughlin, a famous policeman, and the horse had become frightened by the waving plumes on the hearse. We knew Paddy well enough.

"It was about two weeks after this that Bob and I were coming in together—having got another pair of shoes somehow—pretty well discouraged. It was near five o'clock in the afternoon, and the prospect for supper was about as poor as it could be. I had the key in my hand as we walked down the corridor. When we reached our door, on a sudden mad impulse, I inserted it in the door opposite. To my surprise the key turned and the door swung open. There was no one in sight so we stepped in.

"We found ourselves in a good-sized square room, furnished with a dozen easy chairs, three or four couches, a sideboard and a piano. There were rugs on the floor and pictures on the walls. In a small room on one side was a small safe containing chops, steaks, and other food, and in boxes was a lot of coal.

Digitized by Google

Beyond was a door leading into still another room. We were surprised to find this empty with the exception of a table and a long, queer box standing on carpenters' saw stools. The floor and walls were bare, and the only other article of furniture was a wash-stand.

"I walked over, raised the cover of the queer box and looked in. Then I put it down, rather hastily I think. Bob started to follow my example.

"'Old man,' I said, 'I don't think you want to look in there.'

"'What's the reason I don't,' inquired Bob.

"'Oh, nothing much; but you don't. Just take my word for it.'

"'I wouldn't take your word for anything' said Bob; and with that he lifted the cover and looked in. He put it down without any great delay. Then he turned to me and said:

"'Paddy Laughlin.'

"I nodded. 'Medical students,' I added.

"'Yes,' returned Bob, edging towards the door. 'There was a mystery about the complaint which caused his death, you remember. They are trying to clear it up.'

"'Yes.' An idea had struck me, and I was doing some hard thinking. We passed out into the other room.

"'Come on,' said Bob, pulling open the door leading into the corridor.

"'No hurry,' I replied carelessly. 'Just unlock our door and leave it open.'

"'What are you going to do?'

"'Nothing much. Just take hold and help move these things over into our place.'

"'What do you mean?'

"'We need the stuff more than they do.'

"'What are you driving at? We'll be arrested.'

"'Hardly. There isn't time to answer your questions now. Come, the chairs first,' and I hurried one of them across the passage.

"Bob saw that there was nothing else to do, so he took hold with a will, and in ten minutes we had the chairs and couches transferred. Then we rolled up the rugs and snatched down the pictures. The sideboard and meat safe were larger orders, but we made them ours at last, with their entire contents; and the piano followed. We even took the table and wash-stand in the unfurnished room. Then we tackled the coal. This was pretty hard work, but with a scuttle and a big market basket we finally got the last lumps of it shifted. Then we closed and locked the door and went to work arranging the things in our own room, first astonishing our cold and forbidding grate with a fire. Things fitted nicely, and in half-an-hour they seemed quite at home in their new quarters. We were by this time famished, so we broiled a steak, opened a bottle of claret and proceeded to nourish ourselves. Then we each ignited a good cigar and lay back in two of the biggest chairs before the fire, while I explained to Bob my plan of future operations.

"The clock on the mantel, also part of the plunder, had just struck eight, and our cigars were about half finished when we heard a quick, active step coming along the passage. There was a pause at the door and the sound of the key in the lock, one or two doubtful steps on the bare floor within, and the striking of a match. A long silence followed.

"'He takes it hard,' I observed to Bob.

"'Rather odd that he should,' returned Bob, helping himself to another glass of wine.

"We could soon hear him wandering about from room to room and scratching matches as he lit successive gas jets, apparently that more light might reveal the missing furniture. We started fresh cigars, and Bob helped himself to another glass of wine.

"In about five minutes we heard other footsteps coming. There proved to be two of the newcomers, and as they stepped into the room they stopped suddenly, and there was total silence for about thirty seconds.

"We puffed noiselessly at our cigars, and Bob blew some smoke rings. Then we heard some conversation across the hall, not loud but deep. Other members arrived in rapid succession, till we estimated that some twenty or twenty-five must be there. It seemed as if they would wear out the floors stamping about, and by this time the talk had grown into a loud and angry Babel of voices. Still a certain pair of young men who had resolved to be great artists smoked on and settled back at a more comfortable angle.

"Suddenly the uproar ceased, and there was a long whispered consultation. Then there came a loud rap at our door.

"'Come in!' I responded.

"The door opened, and a big football player of a fellow strode in, followed by the whole crowd. For a moment they stood aghast. We folded our hands and smoked on. When the leader in a voice like a bull said:

"'Look here, you infernal tramps, what do you mean by coming into our place and looting it?'

"'Let's get at 'em!' 'Throw 'em out of the window!' 'Smash 'em!' came from his followers in angry chorus.

"'Do I understand you to say that we have got some of your things?' I inquired sweetly.

"'Some! You miserable thieves, you've got everything!'

"'Everything?'

"'Yes!'

"'Are you sure?'

"'Sure? Now you try once more to be funny, and I'll take you up and pound the floor with you!'

"'You say we have taken everything, eh?'

"'I do.'

"'You are mistaken. There is one thing which we didn't take.'

"'Eh?'

"'We left you one thing.'

"He looked at us. He knew the penalty for keeping that one thing. We smoked on. He turned to his companions and observed that their jaws had dropped. Then he looked back at us and said:

"'Come to think of it, that's the most important thing after all. We don't care for this stuff, do we, fellows? Just keep it. Sorry we have disturbed you. Good night!' and they all filed out like lambs.

"Bob uncorked another bottle, and we drank to the memory of Paddy Laughlin.

"The next day the medical students subscribed amongst themselves and refurnished their rooms. Come on, here we are at the theatre!"

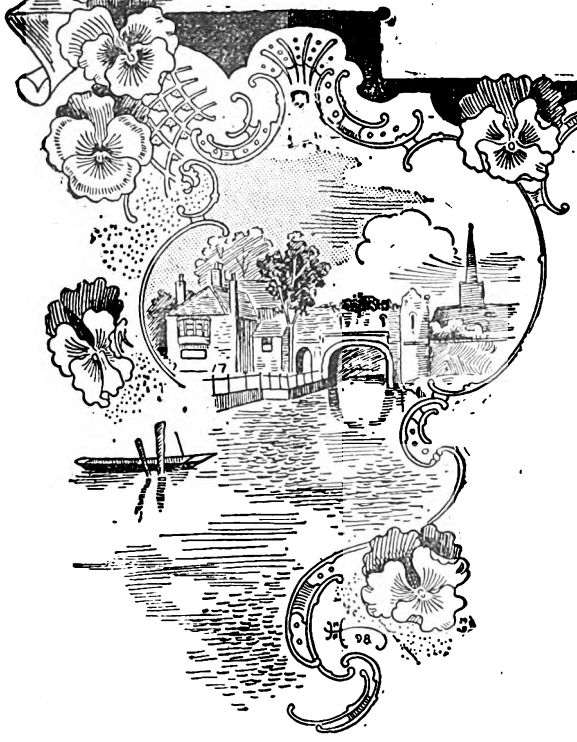
"You say it has occurred to you since, that it was a bit like stealing?" I observed.

"Vaguely—yes. Though when we came to London in the spring we left the things behind. All we wanted was to be comfortable during the winter. I tell you, old man, it was a relief to get some rugs over those rat-holes!"

H. T. P.

Digitized by Google

THE INVISIBLE PLAYER.



I COULD not resist lifting my eyes, with a twinkle of amused triumph in them, to Jack Belknap's face, as I gathered in the last trick and swept the cards together in a heap.

"Confound it!" exclaimed Jack, pushing his chair back, with a scowl on his handsome face; "that's the fifth game in succession you've beaten me, and you're the only man who ever did it, too. I don't understand it. But I'll whitewash you before long, you mark my words!" He rose, lit a cigar, and walked moodily out of the club.

Cards were Jack Belknap's passion—his weakness; the dear fellow had no other fault. Well might he be pardoned for loving a good game of skill—not of chance—with the mysterious pasteboards, and if it cut him to the heart to be beaten—well, what devotee of any honest sport cannot sympathise with him?

Although Jack is one of my best friends, I could not help feeling that he was desperately vexed with me when he went out of the club that night, smoking the only cigar I had seen him put to his lips for months. I ought not to have looked up with that mischievously exultant, self-congratulatory glance, I suppose. My triumph ought to have been accepted in the meekest, most carelessly undemonstrative manner. But then—Jack was such a famous card-player!

However, my friend was only vexed, and I knew his indignation, if he really felt any towards me, would soon wear off. So I went unconcernedly to the reading-room and sat down to read the papers until eight o'clock, when I was to take a train to Dover on business which would require my presence there early the next morning.

At a quarter past eight I hailed a cab, and was driven to the station. My train, an express, took less than two hours to do the run, and by half past ten I found myself in a cosy room at the M—— hotel, not a bit sleepy, and wishing that I had brought a good book to amuse myself until my customary bedtime, eleven o'clock.

I searched the room to see if there were not some discarded novel that I might dip into for an hour. But although I did not find what I was looking for, on opening one of the table drawers I was pleased and amused to discover a soiled pack of cards. Smiling to myself I drew them forth, counted them, and flung them down on the little toilet table.

"Now, Master Jack Belknap," I said, addressing my friend as an imaginary adversary, "if you aren't satisfied, we will sit down at this little table and play that series over again. I think that, if I play for you as well as myself, you will stand some chance of winning at least one of the games."

To complete the playful deception I placed a chair at the opposite side of the table, and dealt an equal number of cards to its imaginary occupant and myself.

"Now, Jack," said I, "if you will kindly excuse me, I will examine your hand first, and see what chance you have of doing something in this game."

Reaching over, I was about to gather up the cards of my imaginary opponent, when, to my utter amazement and terror, the little heap of pasteboards went up, precisely as if some invisible hand had grasped them; then, with deft rapidity, they were assorted in suits before my staring eyes!

For a moment, the chill of terror that had coursed down my spinal column when the cards were first lifted from the table fairly froze me to my chair, and I sat as one paralysed; then came an impulse to cry out, to flee from the room. I was on the point of making a dash for the door, when a card came jauntily and carelessly flying into the middle of the table. It was the invisible player's first move!

Then a new mood seized me. I felt a sudden, thrilling bravado, like that of a man who fancies there is a burglar in the house, and, lamp and revolver in hand, strides out to the passage, all pricking in his nerves, and walking as if on air. I would accept the invisible player's challenge, and fight out the game with him! It would be the experience of a lifetime, at any rate—a game of cards with a spirit!

Digitized by Google

Trembling with suppressed excitement and fear, yet with a firm grip on my nerves and with teeth clenched together like those of a man going into some fierce contest of strength or skill, I fixed my attention upon my unseen adversary's card and flung one from the same suit beside it.

Would the mysterious creature or power respond? I held my breath in expectancy. Yes; after a moment's pause, like the hesitation of a careful player, another card was detached from the hovering sheaf and cast upon the table. It was a good move, an intelligent move, as I perceived even in my excitement. There was surely a brain at the back of that invisible action. Unlike spiritual manifestations, there was nothing incoherent or disconnected about the "communication" this being had to make to me.

I gathered myself together and entered into the strange contest with all my mental powers alert. I determined that I would not think of the mystery confronting me—I would only think of the game and how I should play to win it. I bent my eyes upon the table and refrained from looking at the fan-shaped sheaf of cards suspended opposite.

Play followed play in rapid and determined succession. The game grew fascinating, absorbing. Hands were exhausted, tricks gathered, cards collected, shuffled, and dealt; and in all of these operations the invisible player did his part as promptly and as cleverly as I did mine. One—two—three games went to the ghost in relentless succession. I began to get vexed. Seldom had anybody taken three games from me in that fashion. I was determined it should not be four—but it was! Well, we would play the series out! I would win one out of the five. I glanced at my watch. It was one o'clock.

Grasping the scattered cards, I shuffled and dealt them again. The game began. It was the closest of all. Once the invisible player paused for a full half minute, after a play of mine had been made, and I studied his moves with equal care. At length, by a wonderfully brilliant and masterly play, after leading me upon an entirely false scent, my invisible adversary won!

I pushed back with an exclamation of anger, and in so doing overturned the little toilet table. It came to the floor with a bang, and the cards were scattered far and wide over the floor.

Getting down on my hands and knees, I gathered them up, and counted them. The pack was complete.

Then I righted the table, and replaced the cards upon it, saying: "Whoever you are, I challenge you to another series, the stakes to be as you please!"

There was no response. I dealt the cards. For five minutes I waited, watching the little heap of pasteboards opposite me. Then I rose, gathered up the cards, put them in the drawer where I had found them, and went to bed.

* * * * *

The next evening, having completed my business, I was back at my club again. Jack Belknap met me smilingly.

"Come, old boy," he said, "let's have another evening of euchre. I know I can beat you this time! I dreamt that I did it last night, and what's more, I dreamt just how I did it!"

"The deuce you did!" I exclaimed in amazement. "Well, come and show me how!"

Jack won the series in precisely the same manner, and exactly the same time as the invisible player who had vanquished me the night before. Then I told my experience to Jack. His cheeks glowed, and his eyes shone as he listened.

"Do you believe in the influence of the subjective mind over matter?" he asked.

"What nonsense is that you are talking?" I cried.

"I see you know nothing about it," he said, fingering his watch-chain thoughtfully. "But I have new faith in that wonderful theory. Whiteford, I was the invisible player!"

HORACE MANNS.

WHAT IS THE NEXT BOOK WE CAN SEND YOU?

Every week we shall give away half-a-dozen books.

All a competitor has to do is to send us one Book Coupon cut from The Sunday Reader, one from the Athletic Record, and one from Short Stories.

Send these to us in one envelope together with a request for any single book in the whole world of literature.

From the applications we receive we shall each week pick out six and send the books asked for.

All applications to be addressed to "BOOKS," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please let me have: S. S.

Book.....

Price.....

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Result of the "Book" Competition for the Week Ending March 5th.

F. Roberts, 8 Cricketfield Road, Clapton, N.E. "Lieder ohne Wörte," Mendelssohn. 7s. 6d.

Miss Mabel M. Forse, Englefield Green, Surrey. "We Two," by Edna Lyall. 6s.

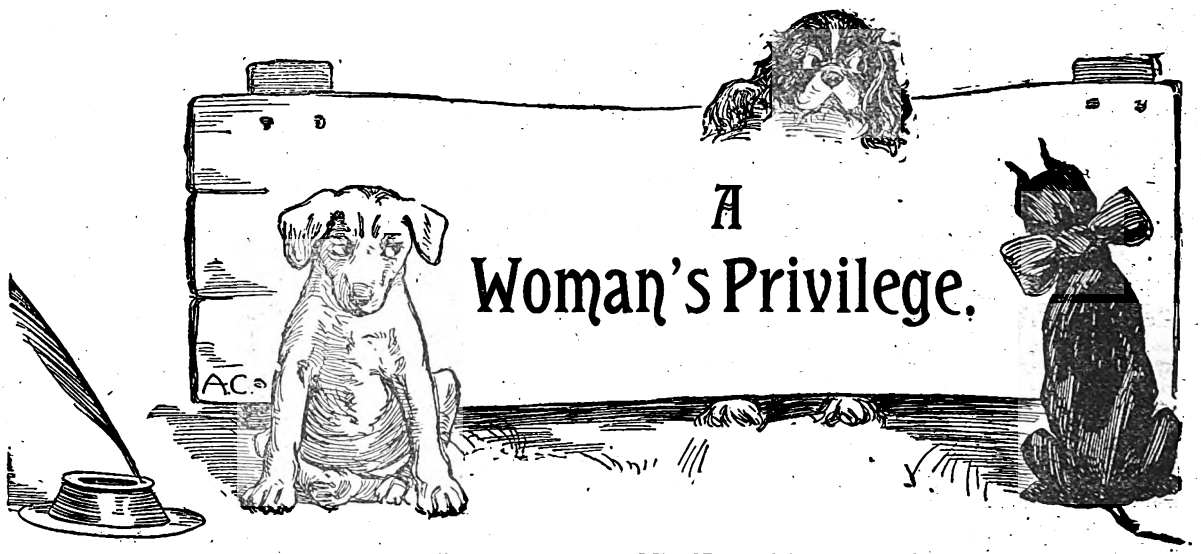
W. F. Campton, 49 Upper Townsend Street, Belfast. "Trilby," by Geo. du Maurier. 6s.

Miss Mary Compton, 9' Sanson Road, Leytonstone. "Thelma," by Marie Corelli. 6s.

A. R. Ward, 13 Maria Street, Neath. Spon's "Mechanic's Own Book." 6s.

W. Hunt, 127 Edgware Road, W. "Exercise for Health," by H. H. Hulbert and Luis J. Phelan. 3s. 6d.

Digitized by Google



A Woman's Privilege.

"Who was that young man with you?"

Miss Nancy Armstrong asked the question of her niece Margery. Her tone was sharp, and her eyes had an angry look in them.

"It was John Markham," answered Margery quietly enough, as she took off her hat; but the tone in which the question had been asked brought additional colour to her cheeks and a sparkle of resentment to her eyes.

"I thought so," responded Miss Nancy, in her most irritating way. "Margery Armstrong, I should think you'd be ashamed of yourself."

"What for?" asked Margery. "I'm not aware that I've done anything to be ashamed of."

"Oh, you needn't try to plead innocence," retorted Miss Nancy. "You ought to be ashamed of going with that Markham fellow, and you know it."

"I don't know any such thing," answered Margery, facing her aunt bravely. "John Markham is a respectable young man. You don't like him because there used to be trouble between the Markhams and the Armstrongs. That happened before either of us was born, and there's no reason why we should keep up the quarrel. If we see fit to like each other, I don't know who's going to prevent our doing so."

"I am," answered Miss Nancy grimly. "You needn't think—and John Markham needn't think—that a penny of my property will go into the hands of any one of that family!"

"You can do just as you see fit about your property, of course," said Margery. "I haven't anything to say about that, but if you think anything you can do will prevent John and me from liking each other, you're quite mistaken. He doesn't want your property, but"—with the prettiest little blush imaginable, and a softening of the voice at the import of the words—"He does want me."

"Margery Armstrong! I should like to know how far the matter has gone," cried Miss Nancy, in wrathful surprise. "To judge by the way you talk, one would suppose it is all settled between you!"

"It is," answered Margery, with eyes that never flinched before the angry ones of her aunt. "I promised John to-night, coming home from church, that I'd marry him as soon as he has a home for me."

Miss Nancy fairly gasped for breath.

"You're a silly," she said, as soon as she could command her voice, "to take up with that fellow when you might marry the squire's nephew!"

"I wouldn't marry the squire's nephew if he was the last man on earth," said Margery. "Compare him with John Markham, and I know that down in your heart you can't help owning that he is an insignificant apology for a man.

"All you can see to admire in him is his money, I'm sure, and if he had a thousand times more than he has, I'd have just as much contempt for him as I have now."

"You may see the day when you'll wish you had some of his money," said Miss Nancy. "Wait till you're John Markham's wife and poor as poverty, and things will look different. Of course, he thinks, and you think too, that I shall change my mind when I find out that I can't prevent your marrying him. But you were never more mistaken in your life. Marry that fellow and I'll see that not a penny of mine goes to you."

"Please yourself about that," answered Margery. "We don't want your money. We're both strong and willing to work, and we'll get along. Don't worry about that."

"That sounds well, but you will sing a different tune by-and-bye," said Miss Nancy. "Just remember what I say."

Margery went up to her room, not to think about what her aunt said, but about the things she had talked of with her lover as they walked home from church together.

One day Miss Nancy decided to go to town to do some shopping. She was always afraid of being too late for the train, and generally arrived at the station long before it was due. She did so on this occasion, and as the day was a very warm one, she sat down on the platform in the shade of some large boxes that had been unloaded there, thinking it more comfortable there than in the stuffy little waiting room.

Very soon she heard steps on the platform, and presently voices from the other side of the pile of boxes reached her ears.

"How is your matrimonial project getting on?" was asked by one of the unseen parties.

Digitized by Google

A voice which Miss Nancy recognised as belonging to the squire's nephew answered:

"It seems to hang fire just at present. The fact is, the girl's got another string to her bow, and the chances would be against me if it wasn't for the fact that her aunt favours my suit, because she thinks I shall get uncle's money, and she would like to unite the two properties. So I'm rather sweeter on the aunt at present than I am on the girl. If I get the girl at all it must be through the old lady's influence, you see.

"The girl's a little daisy, but the aunt—well, she isn't a daisy, you can be sure of that! It's a question if having her in the family wouldn't be paying a dear price for all her property, but, you see, there's a chance of being able to shake her off after a little.

"I happen to know that a new railway line is going through this place, and the company will have to buy a piece of land she owns, and this land she intends to give to the girl as a wedding present. Now as soon as the line is put through—and it's sure to come—this land will be worth more than all the rest of the old lady's property. If the girl gets a deed of it, and I get the girl, I can sell it to the railway company and make a good big sum of money out of it, and we shall be independent of the aunt, and when that happens, if it ever does, I'll tell her to look out for her own affairs and I'll look out for mine. I am taking care that she does not find out about the new railway scheme. I want to make sure of the girl and the land before I break the news to her."

Miss Nancy listened with ears and eyes very wide open.

"Yes, when it happens, if it ever does," she chuckled. "I don't believe you will ever get the chance you are looking for, my smart young man! I don't suppose I am a daisy—I never thought I was!—but I rather fancy I'm a match for you, since I know what to do. I don't believe you will have to shake me off. I think I'll do a little—or most of the shaking."

Just then the train came along, and Miss Nancy got in without being seen by the young men.

As luck would have it, she met the squire's nephew at the station.

"If you're going home you might walk along with me and help to carry some of my parcels," she said, in a very pleasant manner. "I'm tired out. I've been seeing to a good deal of business to-day. I have had a deed made out, giving Margery the south forty acres of the farm, and I've been pricing carpets and furniture and finding out how much it's going to cost to set up a young couple in housekeeping. Of course, they won't need the things just yet, but I thought I would get some idea of what the expense would be!"

"They—who do you mean?" asked the young man in bewilderment.

"Why, Margery and Mr. Markham, of course," answered Miss Nancy. "Who else should I mean?"

"You don't mean to say that you intend to let your niece marry that fellow!" cried the squire's nephew in surprise and consternation.

"Why, certainly," replied Miss Nancy, as if she had never had any other idea. "He is a nice young man. He's got brains, and when he gets Margery he will get money, for the new railway will make the land I've given to her worth a snug little fortune."

"I'd like to know how you heard about the new railway," cried the astonished young man.

"Oh, I keep myself posted on such matters," said Miss Nancy, looking very wise. "But here we are at my gate. Thank you for carrying my parcels. Won't you come in?"

"No, not to-night," was the gruff reply, and Miss Nancy chuckled as the young man went his way.

"I think I've got even with you," she said, nodding her head after his retreating figure. "I expect he was about as much surprised as Margery will be."

Her niece had seen her, and came out to meet her and help her with her parcels.

"Margery, I've got something to tell you," said Miss Nancy, anxious to have the matter disposed of. "I've thought it all over, and I don't know but you are right about John Markham. It is foolish to let an old grudge stand in the way of young folks' happiness. So I have changed my mind—that's a woman's privilege, you know—and I have concluded to let you do as you think best. I've had the south forty made over to you by deed. And when John gets you he will get that too, if you see fit to turn it over to him. It's yours to do just as you please with."

"Why, Aunt Nancy!" cried Margery, looking at her as if she felt sure she had gone crazy. "I thought you would never consent to our marraige!"

"Folks change their minds sometimes," said Miss Nancy. "There! there! Don't hug me so or I shall drop this parcel. I hear a whistle down the road that sounds like John's. You'd better go and tell him the news, and by-and-bye, after I've had a cup of tea, bring him in to see me."

KATE ROGERS.

W. T. STEAD INTERVIEWED.

The Greatest Living Journalist Speaks to the SUNDAY READER.

THERE are certain eminent people in this country to catch and interview whom is considered a triumph by the lynx-eyed interviewer. Mr. Gladstone, for instance, Anthony Hope, Mario Corelli, and Mr. William T. Stead.

Mr. Stead is sometimes described as the greatest living journalist. He is, also, one of the busiest men in London. He is a leader in thought; the political, social, and religious questions of the day are dealt with by his pen, and his opinions are studied by the world at large, and Mr. Stead is wily in avoiding the meshes of the interviewer.

However, he has succumbed at last, and the has gained his opinions on one of the most important of religious questions. The interview appears in this week's issue, published on Thursday, price one penny. Everyone should read it.

Sunday Reader

DO NOT MISS IT.

LOVE STORIES.

The Companion paper to Short Stories.

Costs one Halfpenny.

Each number consists of a complete illustrated novel, besides information on Love, Courtship, and Marriage by the Countess M.

Digitized by Google

THE RIVAL QUEENS.

A TALE OF OLD FRANCE RETOLD FROM THE FRENCH BY MARY FERMOR

SUMMARY.

Amaury Montruel, a knight, and Mahmoud-el-Reis, a Saracen, meet on the road to Paris. The former's mission is to kill the Queen of France; the latter's to kill the King. At the same time two children, Eric and Eve, are on their way to Paris to aid the Queen, and overhear the conversation of these two horsemen. Shortly afterwards a knight and his page give the children a lift on the road, and, on arriving at Paris, place them under the care of the Freemasons. Maître Samson, Montruel's secretary, tries to induce Tristan de Pamiers, king of the law students, to raise a rebellion in favour of Agnes de Méranie against Philip's consort, Queen Ingeburge. Albret, the King's page, takes Eve, alias Little Adam, to the King, and on the way confesses his love for her.

CHAPTER V.

The Captive Queen.

In the large, straggling garden which surrounded the Abbey St. Martin—with its smooth lawns, lofty trees, and countless flowering shrubs, with its quaintly-cut hedges and brilliant parterre—walked a woman, still young and beautiful, with a sweet, sad face, and slow step, followed at some few paces by two dark-robed, stern-featured nuns.

They had just emerged from the shade of the cloister, and were descending the moss-covered steps that led to an unfrequented part of the grounds, and while the veiled nuns walked with the unbending rigidity required by their order, their young companion seemed to gain fresh life and vigour from the sweet-scented evening air.

She might have been a few years older than Eve. Her beauty, though developed, had lost none of its freshness, and in spite of a certain resemblance between the two, this fair, pensive recluse had a Royal dignity of bearing wholly wanting in the simple grace of the younger girl.

Here in the shade of the ancient Abbey, with no sounds to break the stillness but the chanting of the monks and the sweet singing of the birds, Ingeburge of Denmark, the lawful wife of Philip Augustus, and the rightful Queen-Consort of France, was wearing out her young life in a hopeless sorrow—smitten by the hand of him she had already learnt to love so well, and spurned by the husband who had sworn to cherish her.

As she wandered on, her spirits revived somewhat; she smiled to herself, and drew in her breath as if even there it was good to be alive on that sunny evening, and at last her steps quickened into a run when she reached the soft, dewy grass.

The nuns coughed ominously, and Ingeburge checked her pace, remembering she was at once Queen and captive. Still the voice of awakening Nature brought a sense of comfort, almost a promise of better things.

Suddenly, she darted forward, giving a cry of joy, and as she ran, her long fair hair became loosened, and fell over her white dress far below her waist. The horrified nuns followed as best they might, exclaiming:

"Madame! Madame!" in tones of bitter remonstrance.

They found her kneeling on the grass, with a bunch of tiny blue flowers in her hand.

"See!" she said, with tears in her deep blue eyes, "see, my sisters! You must pardon me, but I could not help it when I saw that my 'vennen' were in flower."

"And what does that signify?" began one drily.

"What? do you ask me that? Do you not know that these are the first flowers that bloom on the Castle terrace Followed at some paces by two dark-robed, stern-faced nuns.

Digitized by Google

at home, in Copenhagen? It is the flower of remembrance, the flower of my native land! Ah, my poor blossoms," she murmured, pressing them to her lips, "you look frail and you hang your heads, for you are in exile, like me! France has not been kind to either of us!"

Half-an-hour later the Queen was sitting on a stone bench, talking to the aged Prior Anselm, a man of venerable appearance and kindly manner, while the two nuns waited at a respectful distance. The priest had just received her confession, and was now trying to console her with words of hope and comfort.

"Is there anything that I can do to lessen your sufferings, my daughter? Tell me, and I will do it if it lies in my power."

The Queen coloured slightly.

"They tell me that in a distant part of the Abbey you have a hospital for sick men, is it so?"

"Yes, they have told you rightly, my daughter."

"Then grant me your promise, father, and let me spend part of my useless life in helping to nurse the poor sufferers. I should not then waste my time in vain regrets."

"You, the Queen!"

"If I were the Queen in very deed, I should have power to help those who are in want and distress, but here I can do nothing but tend them with my own hands."

"But, my daughter, there are often contagious diseases among our sick folk."

"And if I died thus, should I not have cause to bless France, which, though denying me an earthly crown, gave me that of the Holy Saints?"

The prior looked at her with admiring reverence, and said, as he raised her hand to his lips:

"You shall have your will, my daughter, you shall tend our sick; but if Heaven hears my poor prayers, your brow shall wear the Crown of France before it is encircled by that of the Saints."

"Is there nothing else you desire?"

"Oh, yes," she replied quickly, and began to tell him how she longed for some one to talk to unreservedly, a girl near her own age, who could share her feelings, and not frown at her like those cold, grave women, whose hearts had been crushed under the load of unnatural discipline.

"The King's orders are absolute, my daughter. He would not allow it," said the old man sadly.

At this moment there was an unwonted stir in the great cloister, which was hidden from the prior and Ingeburge by thick clumps of trees, but neither of them paid any attention to the sound.

She continued to plead that he would use his influence with the King, and he listened with a heavy heart, for he knew how unbending Philip was in all that concerned his neglected wife. At last she ceased, and as he laid his fatherly hand upon her head, with an unspoken prayer, her tears fell thick and fast.

The noise increased, footsteps and angry voices came nearer, and the prior listened in wonderment. Then a clear young voice was heard above the rest, calling:

"Angel, my sister Angel, where are you?"

Ingeburge awoke as from a hideous dream and listened, not daring to believe her ears.

"Am I going mad?" she murmured.

The voice, still repeating the same words, seemed to be going farther away, when Ingeburge pressed her trembling hands to her eyes for a moment and then, as if yielding to some irresistible impulse, she cried:

"Here, Eve, my sister Eve!"

There was a rustling of leaves, the branches were thrust aside and a young girl, dressed in white like the Queen, sprang out from the shade and clasped the latter in her arms.

It was indeed little Eve, who had doffed her male attire and now stood laughing and crying in her speechless joy at the reunion with her beloved Princess.

Clasped the latter in her arms.

The Queen looked long and lovingly at her, holding both her hands as if fearful of her disappearing as suddenly as she had come.

"My little Eve, my sister, how is it that I see you again, and here?"

"It has cost me much to reach you," said Eve at last, in their native tongue, "but I bless Heaven for it all, now that I am with you once more, my Queen and sister."

The two nuns now came forward and one laid her hand on Eve's arm, saying harshly:

"What does this woman want? We have strict orders that no one is to speak to the Princess of Denmark."

Before the prior could speak, Ingeburge drew herself up to her full height, and said with chilling dignity:

"To the Queen of France, you mean."

"My daughter," gently interposed Anselm, "you know the King's orders."

"But," said Eve, pulling out a parchment from her dress, "I am here by order of the King."

The nuns smiled incredulously, and even the old prior looked doubtful, as Eve handed him the letter, which Ingeburge seized in passing, and kissed the royal signature even though she ignored its import.

"The girl says truly," he said when he had read the parchment. "His Majesty has appointed her to be the the Queen's attendant."

The nuns withdrew crestfallen, and the hostile body of monks, lay brothers, and servants who had sought to oppose Eve's entrance rapidly disappeared at a sign from the prior.

Before he left them the old man laid his hand in blessing on Eve's young head.

"You have a tender, faithful heart, my child, and I pray God you may bring comfort to our dear Queen."

He kissed Ingeburge's hand and moved slowly away.

"Eve, my dear child, how can I ever thank you for this? It is the first gleam of happiness that has come to me since I entered these gloomy walls, and it is you who bring it to me! How you have grown! I left you a mere child, and now you are nearly a woman, and beautiful, too, my little sister," she added caressingly.

Digitized by Google

"And you, Angel, are changed, you are pale and sad, but still my beautiful Princess! He must be blind not to love you!"

"He is my husband and my lord, and I love him, Eve, so speak of him as if he loved me, for my sake."

"And who dare say he does not love you? The gipsy Agnes has bewitched him, all Paris knows that, but the King said to me to-day: 'Queen Ingeburge is holy—Queen Ingeburge is beautiful!'"

"The King said that of the wife he has shut up here? Oh, Eve, do not cheer me with false words!" she said, trying to withdraw her hand from Eve's close clasp.

"I have so much to tell you, Angel, that I hardly know where to begin, but, believe me, that even to save you my lips could not utter a lie."

The Queen and her peasant foster-sister sat down on the old stone bench, and the latter related all that happened in the old home and on the long journey, up to that morning's ride with Albret. The Queen listened with deep interest and emotion, but the naïve recital of Eve's talk with the page brought a smile to the sad face and a word of warning to her lips, which, however, fell unheeded, as most such words do. The girl told how she had been taken to the Louvre and had recognised their benefactor, the knight "Dieudonné," in the powerful King of France.

"He was alone in the vast room, unarmed and bare-headed, walking up and down in deep thought. In my confusion I looked round for Albret, but he was not to be seen, so I was alone with the great Philip Augustus. For a minute or two he took no notice of me, then he stopped and signed to me to come nearer. My knees shook, but I managed to go down on them before him. He looked vexed and said:

"'Did Albret tell you anything?'

"I swore to him that nothing but my own instinct had told me his high rank, just as one realises the presence of God in church."

"Eve, Eve, that was almost blasphemy!"

"The King did not seem to think so, for he smiled, and I wanted to please him for your sake, Queen Angel, so I knelt on, forgetting my boy's dress, till he called me 'Maître Adam,' and then I started and got so red that he laughed outright and said:

"'I see you don't know how to tell lies yet!' I was trying to find an answer, when he added kindly: 'Come, child, it is no use trying to deceive me. The King knows all.' I felt so ashamed, for I had known him as a friend in trouble before I knew him as a king, and so I should have trusted him, for I had still his purse of gold in my vest. 'My daughter,' he went on gently, 'I guessed your secret the moment I saw you in your brother's arms, where you come from, what you have come for, and even that they say your brother carries a dagger for my breast, as well as his trowel; but, child, I do not heed such tales—one dagger more or less matters little to me.' He said this all so calmly; there was no boast in it, only courage. Surely his heart can know no fear!"

"Yes," cried Ingeburge gratefully, "there is no knight so brave as my lord!"

"Then he asked me: 'Should you be very happy if I told you to go and see this Princess Ingeburge, whom you love so dearly?'

"I told him how I had travelled on foot through all those weary months in the hope of obtaining such a boon, and when he asked if I were of noble birth I told him I was only fit to be a queen's waiting-maid."

"Ah," said Ingeburge reproachfully, "even you did not dare to say the queen."

"No, my sister, I dare not thwart the King when I wanted such a favour from him, so he smiled, and patting my cheek said, in a joking way: 'Well then, Maître Adam, you shall be your Queen's page and begin your duties to-day.' I forgot all fear and even proper respect, for I seized the King's hand and kissed it again and again. He did not seem at all offended, but went on to say: 'I see you are a good girl, and you do well to love that saintly and beautiful woman, who bears her unmerited sufferings with so much resignation.'"

Eve paused, for she saw that her last words had caused her companion's tears to flow, but they were tears of gratitude, not bitterness, so she continued:

"As I was leaving the room the King said: 'Your brother has nothing to fear from me. I am not suspicious of those who love Queen Ingeburge. And, as there are always evil tongues ready to talk, remember that if anyone tells Ingeburg of Denmark that I believe she has hired the Syrian assassin, tell her, from me, that I know it for a base lie.'"

This was the first whisper that had reached Ingeburge of her lord's danger, and all else became as nothing at the thought of it. She questioned Eve eagerly as to his guards and friends. Were they faithful and to be trusted? Eve thought of that "friend" she had heard bartering life for life on the road to Paris, and Montruel's words seemed to ring in her ears with fateful sound.

"Did the King say ought else?" inquired the Queen at last.

"The King?" said Eve starting out of her painful reverie. "Yes; he told me to announce to you that you would receive a visit from him to-night before sunset."

"Child, child, why did you not tell me that before anything? To think that I am to see him, my lord, my husband, this very night! I have never seen him since we were parted at the altar steps! But I must be ready for him. Come and help me, we will bind garlands of these blue flowers in my hair, for I must please Philip, my King."

The Queen's eyes were shining with loving anticipation, her face was flushed and her whole being instinct with life and longing; but Eve's eyes were dimmed with unshed tears, and her heart was heavy with a dark foreboding. There was one thing she had not told.

Just as she made her last obeisance to the King, the form of a dark, beautiful woman had entered the room and in a hard, haughty voice had said to Philip:

"You shall not go!"

CHAPTER VI.

A Visit to Notre-Dame.

The sun had set, and Ingeburge waited with the blue flowers fading in her sunny hair, and hope still struggling to live in her heart, but the King never came.

An hour earlier, a brilliant cavalcade of knights and noble dames had ridden from the Louvre along the right bank of the Seine towards the city. Madame Agnes had conceived a sudden desire to see the Cathedral, and she was now going there with her suite, accompanied by the proudest barons of France, including the Duke of Burgundy himself, all transformed into obsequious courtiers by the iron will and ready wit of Philip Augustus.

On one side of Agnes de Méranie rode Amaury Montruel, magnificently dressed and splendidly mounted on a spirited Cordovan jennet, which he managed with the perfect ease of an accomplished horseman.

Many a muttered curse followed them as the simple citizens saw this woman with her insolent beauty vaunt her ill-gotten splendour before the world, and there were those who whispered that the King was deceived both in the woman he had made his wife and the man he called his friend.

On her other side rode Herbert Melfast, Lord of Pevensey, whose jewels might have vied with those of the richest shrine; and, far behind in the crowd, was seen the tall form of Tristan de Pamiers bestriding an ancient war horse, in company with Maître Samson, whose shambling steed possessed ears long enough to point to a somewhat ignoble ancestry.

Digitized by Google

As they turned on to the great bridge, Amaury bent down and whispered to Agnes, pointing to a tall man with a mason's hammer on his shoulder:

"A smile for him, madame, if you please, he is the Master of the Freemasons, and his men follow him like sheep."

Madame Agnes smiled sweetly to order, and graciously waved her hand to the man in question. Maitre Honore blushed like a girl, and lifting his hammer above his head, raised a cheer for Queen Agnes!

"Thus easily do you gain all hearts!" sighed Montruel languishingly, but Agnes paid no attention to him. She knew he was her slave, and that she need waste no smiles to keep him in her toils, so she directed her blandishments to the apparently stolid Melfast, whom Montruel had advised her to captivate; but she went to work with such eagerness that it was not long before he regretted his disinterested counsel.

By a dexterous manœuvre Tristan now managed to bring himself into prominence, and as Montruel caught sight of him, he said:

"Another smile, madame, for that is the mighty King of the Basoche!"

She cast a quick, contemptuous glance at the pale, shabby youth, but her face was wreathed in smiles, and her dark eyes shot captivating gleams as she passed him a second later.

Tristan rose in his stirrups, waved his cap in the air, and made the air ring with his lusty cheers. The cry was taken up on all sides by masons and students alike, and Madame Agnes, flushed with victory, continued her triumphal progress, smiling as directed, and winning favour with every smile. She was too clever a woman to attach one iota more value to this cheap enthusiasm than it deserved, but it was only a means to an end. She was out on business, not pleasure, that fine spring evening. Her instinct had told her that during the last eight-and-forty hours an indefinable and, to her, dangerous change had come over Philip Augustus. She knew that, however strong her fascinations were, they would never entirely subjugate him, for his head was stronger than his heart, and his will stronger than his passions.

Agnes de Méranie was haunted by the thought of her rival, the rightful Queen, who rose before her mental vision day and night as an avenging angel, till she had sworn that Ingeburge should no longer live to torment her. The object of these smiles and some judiciously-distributed crowns, supplied by Montruel, was to range the mob on her side, so that they might with more vehemence denounce her unfortunate rival. Every cheer was a fresh blow aimed at poor Ingeburge, who was even now waiting for her faithless lord.

As the party neared the precincts of Nôtre-Dame the crowd became denser, as it was the workmen's supper-hour, and the usual horde of beggars increased at this time of day. All eyes were turned on the brilliant train, and jeers and jibes were soon heard directed against her, who, in their eyes, was no more than the King's favourite courtesan.

"She has stolen the King's money for herself and her gipsy kinsfolk!" shouted one.

"Jewess! Gipsy! Arab witch!" sounded on all sides.

"She has shut up our poor young Queen in a dungeon!"

"In a black dungeon guarded by priests!"

"What is the use of building churches, when we have to live and die like heathens because of that sorceress!"

Between these imprecations were heard cries of "Cheers for Queen Agnes!" but they were soon lost in the growing buzz of discontent, till Agnes herself turned pale and Montruel looked round in search of a way of escape. Their situation was getting desperate. They were separated from the rest of the company by the excited crowd, who were closing in upon them with threatening gestures and angry looks. Smiles and blandishments were of no use here. These men were terribly in earnest.

On one side of Agnes de Méranie rode Amaury Montruel.

Our friends Ezekiel and Tréfouilloux were among the most vociferous, and their sense of the unequal division of wealth in this life lent additional ardour to their moral protests.

Tréfouilloux suggested ducking Agnes in the river, and Ezekiel, catching up the idea, shouted with all his might:

"To the river with the hussey!"

"To the river! To the river!" yelled the mob.

"Madame!" gasped Montruel, "you are a prisoner here, you must pay ransom."

"Then empty your purse, my lord," she said tartly.

He had not expected this, but he obeyed, nevertheless, and the crowd fought for a few minutes over the contents of his purse. As usual, our two deserving sufferers were unfortunate, so Ezekiel pressed forward and shouted:

"A diamond, Agnes! Give me one of your diamonds!"

This was again taken up clamorously, and it seemed as if they would drag the woman from her saddle.

"In the name of Heaven, madame, do not refuse them, there is not a moment to be lost," urged Montruel.

Contrary to all his expectations, she showed no unwillingness, but proceeded to divest herself of every ornament she was wearing, and throwing them among the seething mass, said graciously:

"Take them all, my friends, I brought them for you."

But Amaury Montruel got nothing.

This unexpected largesse naturally caused a hand to hand fight among the crowd, and while this was going on Agnes and Amaury made their way to the Cathedral.

Digitized by Google

"Ugh!" she said, shrugging her shoulders. "That would have cost me thirty thousand crowns if I had not had the happy thought to leave my real jewels at the Louvre."

"What?" he asked incredulously.

"Those dirty wretches are quarrelling over bits of glass and tinsel not worth half a scu!"

When they entered the cathedral they were met by the Bishop and his attendant clergy. Madame Agnes nodded unceremoniously to Maurice de Sully, for she had not been told that he was of any use to her, and, in fact, the good man paid little heed either to the King's matrimonial difficulties or the Papal interference. His whole mind and thoughts were absorbed in the building of Nôtre-Dame, whose growth he watched with reverent tenderness. Every completed arch was, to him, a prayer granted; every sculptured saint a pledge of divine approval.

"These are for Dilah, your beloved."

There was one person present, however, upon whom Agnes was told to smile, and that was his eminence the Bishop of Orvietto, who was deputed by His Holiness to inquire into the marriage question once more.

She advanced towards him with well-feigned humility, and bent to kiss his hand, saying as she did so:

"I have heard so much of your exalted virtues, my father, that I have come here expressly to crave a blessing from one of earth's greatest saints."

The Legate's heart swelled with pride, though he spoke with lowered eyes and deprecating voice:

"Alas, my daughter, I am but a poor sinner!"

"Kneel to him and the man is ours!" whispered Montruel.

She knelt, and his white hands were extended above her bowed head; but surely, bestower and recipient alike, had little to do with the blessing.

This little episode served to raise her spirits, and she went through the unfinished nave making pretty speeches to the Bishop, though she thought the whole place looked an ugly mass of dirt and confusion.

At last she turned to the priests and said:

"Most reverent fathers, may I not be permitted to see the foreign sculptor who is at work on the figure of Blessed Mary?"

No one replied at first, and there was an embarrassing pause.

Since the day when Jean Cador rode to the Cathedral in majestic silence on his beautiful horse, followed by two negro slaves bearing his tools, and neither vouchsafing look nor word to the enthusiastic crowd who welcomed him, no one had dared to enter his temporary workshop.

He had been conducted to it by two deacons on his arrival, and had then expressed a desire that his privacy might be respected. As the sound of mighty blows were heard from the mysterious shed, men and women crossed themselves, and prayed that no harm might come to their church and city from this dark-skinned stranger and his uncanny black slaves.

Even the Bishop hesitated to disobey Jean Cador, for if he should throw up the work, who could be found to complete what the greatest sculptor of the time had begun?

However, Madame Agnes would take no refusal, and soon the Legate joined his entreaties to hers, so that the Bishop had to yield.

He pointed out the narrow staircase that led up to the place where the shed had been fixed over the great door where the statue was to stand in future, but gravely asked them to excuse his accompanying them. Agnes could hardly conceal her delight at this last stroke of fortune, and with a special smile of recognition to the Legate she hurried off with Montruel.

Mahmoud-el-Reis was sitting on a low stool with folded arms and bowed head. His thoughts were very far away, and the blows that the two negroes were dealing out to the, block of marble that was to become his masterpiece, failed to disturb them. On the rough wooden partition was an exquisite chalk sketch of a lovely woman in whom, perhaps, the earthly element overshadowed the divine, and whose beauty was that of the East, unchastened by the power of the Cross. It was very beautiful, but it was not Christian art.

The name of Dilah was hovering on the Syrian's lips, and it was Dilah's image he had transferred to the wall beside him.

For some seconds the two intruders stood unnoticed on the threshold, and Agnes looked admiringly at his picturesque form.

"His arms are strong," she said. "And has he promised?"

"He has promised."

"How are you going to pay him for it?"

"That is my secret," said Amaury, changing colour.

"But how will he get into the Abbey?"

"That is his secret."

"He neither sees nor hears us. But what is the name he keeps muttering?"

"The name of Dilah, whom he loves."

"Well, wake up your fine son of the desert; I have kept something from that rabble for him."

"Mahmoud!" said Montruel aloud.

The Syrian turned his head slowly, and let his eyes rest upon the two for a few seconds in silence, and the negroes ceased their work at the sound of a voice. Then he spoke:

"What do you want, and why do you bring that woman here?"

"She is the wife of the King of France," replied Montruel.

"The Queen?" he asked slowly.

"Yes, the Queen," put in Agnes in a firm voice.

The Moslem showed no sign of surprise, but rose quickly and whispered to Amaury:

"This is my house, and we never soil our dwellings. I will not kill this woman either at this time or in this place."

The possible consequences of this mistaken identity made Montruel feel sick at heart, so he answered hastily:

"This is not the one! I told you of Ingeburge of Denmark!"

"Ah, I understand! So this is her rival who has come to see if my eye is steady and my arm strong."

"Hush!" began Montruel, but Agnes interrupted him:

"I love the King, and this woman would steal his heart from me. You are right, Mahmoud-el-Reis, that is what I came here for!"

The Syrian turned from her with an air of revulsion, but her frankness pleased him better than duplicity would have done.

"So you love the King?" he asked with a strange intonation. With one of her most seductive smiles, she now drew out a string of pearls, and, extending her hand, said:

"These are for Dilah, your beloved."

His calmness seemed to forsake him for a moment, and there was almost an expression of fear in his eyes as he raised them to hers. His glance fell, and he held out his hand, into which she dropped the shining gems.

Digitized by Google

"I thank you," he murmured.

As they were making their way with some difficulty down the steep staircase, Agnes exclaimed triumphantly:

"Another conquest!"

"Ah, my Queen, you have but to wish, and the whole world would be at your feet!" was the passionate answer.

Mahmoud-el-Reis remained standing where they had left him, with the shimmering pearls in his bronzed palm. He sent his men away to fetch his horse, and turned, in the fading light, to Dilah's picture.

"That woman has looked at Dilah; her lips have spoken Dilah's name, and it sounded like sacrilege in my ears."

He moved to the window and examined the pearls.

"That woman is beautiful, and the pearls are costly. Why do I despise them so? And why do I hate her?"

He opened his hand, and the gleaming white pearls fell to the floor—and he slowly crushed them to powder with his heel.

"As she looked at Dilah, I seemed to see my dear one frown, and hear her voice say: 'Have nought to do with this woman and her gift.'"

He threw his rich mantle round his shoulders, and crossed the little room, treading under foot again as he did so the little heap of pure white dust—and such was Madame Agnes' latest "conquest."

Mahmoud-el-Reis left Notre-Dame, and, mounting his beautiful steed, rode away unattended out of the busy city.

(To be continued.)

It is a little more than three years since I received a letter from my most intimate friend and college chum George Clymer, inviting me to his nuptials, which were to take place in two weeks. Clymer was a promising young lawyer in London; I was practising medicine in Glasgow. We managed to meet at least once a year in one or the other of these places, and we corresponded vigorously meanwhile.

I said I had received a letter from Clymer. I have it before me as I write. I looked it up on his particular request that I should destroy it. But this is a digression.

I wrote my friend, in reply to his invitation, that it was impossible for me to be present on the interesting occasion (there was a serious epidemic in Glasgow at the time, and I could not afford to quit the field, even for a few days), and sending him my earnest congratulations on his approaching happiness. I felt convinced that the union between him and Miss Wandell would be a happy one, from all I had heard of the young lady, although I had never met her. She was an only child; her father was wealthy. It was known she had rejected suitors who, from a financial standpoint, would be regarded by the many more eligible than Clymer. He, on the other hand, was a "rising" young man, with a good practice, and considered by mammas as a desirable match for their daughters. Everything, therefore, seemed in accord.

Two days after the wedding was to take place I received the following note from my friend. It bore no date and no address within. These were the words:

"It is off—irretrievably off. Never allude to the subject to me, or to any human being by word, sign or correspondence, as you value our friendship. Destroy—George."

The note took my breath away. I did destroy it on the instant, but I have quoted it correctly, word for word.

When Clymer and I met again, we met as we had always met. I need not add that no allusion was made by either to what had happened. Our close intimacy continued as before, and I tried to fancy that my friend was the same fellow he had always been. But let that pass.

I have said this was something more than three years ago. It was early in June last that I received another letter from Clymer, which led to my looking up the first one I have alluded to. The letter was brief—I may say abrupt. It informed me of his marriage that very day, and contained a cordial invitation to come directly to his house on my next visit to London, which he knew was to be in the following month.

I confess I was taken a good deal aback by this announcement. I replied at once, and while declining the invitation to become his guest, I assured Clymer that he could count on me as a constant visitor. The fact is, I was curious first to understand the position of affairs which had so suddenly converted Clymer into a Benedict.

Digitized by Google

Well, I went to see him at once on my arrival. I was introduced to his wife. I was charmed with her. I was forced to stay to dinner that very day. Everything went off delightfully. Clymer was a connoisseur in the choice wines of Bordeaux and Burgundy, and I never drank finer than on that occasion.

As the conversation became prolonged, Mrs. Clymer left us to ourselves to continue it. I felt there was something wanting to give additional zest to the "finish." My eye, perhaps, glanced over the table with an inquiring look.

"You are wondering at the absence of the fragrant Havana?" said my friend.

"Frankly, that is so," I replied.

"We will now," said Clymer, "talk of the past. The interdiction is removed, and I will tell you why I have not touched a cigar for all these years, nor suffered one in my house.

"When my first engagement took place, there was but one thing in which my own tastes were not agreeable to my fiancée. I was very fond of a cigar. She detested it. I at once yielded, and declared that I would never touch a cigar again.

"Nothing could exceed the felicity which we enjoyed. The wedding-day was fixed, as you know. It was to be celebrated at the church. Then a wedding-breakfast at the house of the bride, after which we were to start upon our honeymoon.

"It was very late before I retired on the previous night; I had so many little things to arrange in my house. In fact, it was in the early hours of the morning before I got to bed, and then I was so much excited that I could not sleep. I arose early and finished all my little arrangements. My man, Somers, served a delicious breakfast at nine. I sat at the table, thinking over everything for an hour. I went to my library. On the top of a little bookstand was the empty cigar box that had stood there for many months. I took it down to throw it in the waste-basket. What devil prompted me to raise the lid I do not know, but I did raise it. There was just one cigar left.

"I had nearly two hours, and nothing with which to occupy myself. The same demon whispered: 'It is a pity to throw away that fine cigar! Smoke it.' And I did smoke it!

"I sat in my armchair enjoying its fragrance till it was finished, and carried away by a dreamy atmosphere of reverie, I fell into a profound slumber.

"I was roused by a knocking at my door. It was my faithful Somers, who said: 'I fear you may be late, sir; it is very near twelve!' I started, looked at my watch, and, great Heavens! it lacked but five minutes to the hour. Fortunately, the church was not very far off, but I could not reach it in five minutes on foot. I seized my hat and rushed into the street, not hearing the voice of Somers, who called emphatically after me. A cab was fortunately passing. I jumped into it and was driven with furious speed to the church. I had saved my distance, and as I got out the clock was striking twelve. My best man was waiting for me at the church door.

"'Good Heavens, Clymer!' he exclaimed, 'what is the matter?'

"'Don't stop here talking,' I replied. 'I am in time.'

"I took his arm to walk with him up the aisle. Our friends had mustered in force. Everybody had turned to look at us, and, as it seemed to me, with a curious significance. My best man, in fact, quietly disengaged his arm from mine and walked a little in the rear. As we reached the altar, several persons rose to their feet, and I could hear a little faint tittering from several parts of the building. I hastened towards my bride. She turned indignantly away. Her father came up.

"'What means this mummery?' he said.

"I was dumfounded, entirely incapable of utterance My best man whispered in my ear: 'Don't you know what you have on? Look at yourself.'

"I did look, and without a word rushed madly from the church and into the carriage destined for a different purpose, and was driven to my house. I locked myself in my room. I believe I swore and raved. When the paroxysm was over I became cool. I gave Somers some special orders, and I wrote that short note to you.

"I have still to give you the explanation. Before taking my breakfast I had dressed myself elaborately, so as to be quite ready for the ceremony. When that diabolical cigar caught my eye, and I had yielded to the temptation, I took off my wedding coat and hung it in my wardrobe, putting on at the same time my smoking jacket, a variegated garment, which had been in disuse for several months. When roused by my man, and when I discovered that I should be late at my wedding, my brain was on fire. I thought of nothing but how to reach the church in time. It may appear incredible to you that I did not observe what I was wearing, but I tell you the literal truth.

"I never made any attempt at explanation or apology. I knew it would be useless. My friends did undertake it, as I afterwards learnt, but in vain. Why should I have violated a solemn promise to my fiancée, and that on my wedding day? Why, indeed?

"The young lady and her father went abroad, and remained absent for more than two years. I took my summer vacation across the Atlantic; then came home and settled down to hard work. This is about the whole of it.

"And yet," said Clymer, after a pause, "perhaps you can guess who the lady is that sat at the head of the table?"

K. B. R.

SOME IDEAS WANTED.

Many thousands of our readers are regular readers of Pick-Me-Up.

Many thousands are not.

To both classes—but more particularly the latter—we wish to convey the intimation that in future Pick-Me-Up will be conducted by the organisation responsible for the paper you hold in your hand.

A very striking story by Mr. George Griffith began in its pages a week or two ago.

It is called "The Great Pirate Syndicate," and none who enjoyed "The Angel of the Revolution," "Olga Romanoff," and "The Gold Magnet," should miss it.

If you are not a reader of Pick-Me-Up oblige an old friend by buying a copy and seeing whether you care for it.

We make Short Stories a paper that you are glad to buy. Why shouldn't we be able to make Pick-Me-Up another?

Perhaps you have an idea which would be of service to a bright, smart, artistic, illustrated weekly.

If you have we want that idea.

Furthermore, we are prepared to pay for it.

We will send a guinea each to the five persons who forward us the best ideas for improving Pick-Me-Up.

Not more than half a sheet of note-paper must be used for idea and name and address of sender—you may send more than one idea if you like.

Look through Pick-Me-Up carefully and send your suggestion to reach the Editor of Short Stories on or before Monday, April 4th. Mark envelopes "Pick-Me-Up."

Presently we shall have a very startling and original scheme regarding Pick-Me-Up to tell you about.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.

Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.

A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious, Non-Alcoholic Wine. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger Lemon, Orange, Blackberry etc.

YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 42 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,
188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.
93 Seven Sisters Road, & 114 High Rd., Kilburn.

CYCLE DEPOTS

High-class Selection of GENTS', LADIES', & JUVENILE CYCLES.

From £3 Cash, or on Easy Terms 10/- Monthly.

Lists Post Free.

Head Depôt: 52 to 55 Blackfriars Road, London, S.E.

RIDING SCHOOLS

BEST IN LONDON.

Practical Tuition until Perfect, 10/6. Single Lesson, 2/-.

Purchasers Taught Free.

Open 9 till 9.

West End Branch: 124 King's Road, Sloane Square, S.W.

CYCLEDOM LTD.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (259 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

A. A sum of from 10/- to 20/- per week offered for spare time to either sex everywhere. Work can be done evenings. Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 89, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably"

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MR. CLAUDE CARTER, of Thorn House, Johnstone, N.B., says: "Your Tablets much reduced my weight and I have been waiting to see if it was permanent, and so it has proved."

MR. CANHAM, 87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, says: "Tablets cured my wife two years ago of extreme stoutness. It has never returned."

MARION TAYLOR, of Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "Have lost quite two stone."

A. PEEL, of Darley Hydro, Matlock, writes: "They have reduced and benefited me a good deal."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than one stone."

MR. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead. "I think them wonderful not only to reduce fat but as a medicine."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

WADE'S

WONDERFUL OFFER

A SOLID SILVER WATCH GIVEN AWAY.

SEND NO MONEY.

In order to introduce my name into every household in the Kingdom, I undertake and guarantee to give away one of my "World-Famed £2 Silver Watches," list price, Ladies' or Gentlemen's, to every reader who sends me the correct reading of the Rebus printed below. I am preparing to send out immediately 2,000 of these watches. This is a perfectly genuine competition, and the only thing you have to do is carry out the conditions, and if you succeed in guessing correctly you have the advantage of our truly wonderful offer.

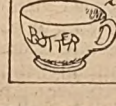
These pictures represent three well-known English Wild Flowers. The conditions of the Competition are that you find out what these flowers are, and if you are correct you undertake to purchase one of my inexpensive Solid Silver Chains. These chains are the best made, are marvellous value. Money returned if dissatisfied. Send at once, enclosing stamped and addressed envelope, so that I may inform you if correct.



W. W. WADE,

WATCH MANUFACTURER,

Dept. 35, GOLD EXCHANGE,

Hammersmith, London W.

Digitized by Google

ON THE BEST AUTHORITY.

Good-for-Nothing has received an invitation to a dance. Unfortunately, he does not dance, but as he says, "He would like to go just to see the fun," but he does not know whether he ought to accept the invitation under the circumstances.———— There is no reason why you should not accept the invitation, but you certainly should at the same time inform your hostess that you are not a dancer, in order that she may make her plans accordingly.

Camera.—There are three factories in the United States which together consume a total of nearly 2,000,000 eggs a year in the manufacture of the peculiar kind of paper known to photographers as albumen paper.

John K.—Your idea on the relative value of the crust and crumb of bread does not agree with the conclusions recently arrived at by a French scientist. For persons in good health, he says that the crust is greatly superior to the crumb. A similar statement was made by a scientist nearly a quarter of a century ago. For people troubled by their digestive organs, he says further, the crust should be eaten to the exclusion of the soft portion of the loaf.

Murphy.—The average annual value of the potato crop in the United Kingdom is £12,000,000.

Liber has some old books which he intends to put up for sale by auction. This makes him curious to learn when the first book auction took place in England, and he naturally comes to me to supply the information.———— The first book auction in this country of which there is any record was in 1676. Prefixed to the catalogue is an address to the reader saying: "Though it has been unusual in England to make sale of books by auction, yet it has been practised in other countries to advantage." The seller was Dr. Searman. For general purposes this method of sale was hardly known till 1700.

Lover of Fruit writes: "We have frozen meat; why can we not have frozen fruit?"————Fruit does not take kindly to freezing; the cells of the fruit are ruptured by refrigeration to the necessary extent, and decay sets in.

F. C. H. wants to know if gold is always the same colour.————No, indeed. An experienced man can always tell from what part of the world a piece of gold comes from by its colour. The Australian gold, for instance, is distinctly redder than that from California. Again, the gold obtained from the "placers" is more yellow than that which is taken directly from the quartz.

L. T. would like to know if Paris is really a cleaner city than London, as people sometimes say.———— It depends upon the point of view from which you regard the subject. The streets of Paris are swept every morning by 2,600 male and 600 female scavengers, divided into 149 brigades, and may be said to be cleaner than the London thoroughfares. But in the matter of general sanitation London is preferable.

Lex.—Yes, it is a curious fact that Freemasons are to be met with less frequently among lawyers than in any other profession.

Unbelieving says that a friend tells him that certain people live on clay; he would like to know whether this is so or not, if I can tell him.———— Yes, I can tell you; we keep information of every kind piled up in this office. In Alabama there are many persons whose daily food is clay dug up from the banks of the small mountain streams. They enjoy good health and live to a ripe old age, but they are thin and spiritless, and always look ill. That clay contains nourishment of some sort is clear, as they live almost entirely upon it. The most marked effect of the diet is the change in the complexion of the eater; the skin becomes sallow, then turns to an unwholesome yellow, almost the colour of the clay itself.

B. A.—The largest collection of coins is that in the possession of the Vienna Public Cabinet of Antiquities. There are 125,000 pieces of money in that collection.

P. W.—Clean water is a luxury in Venice. The inhabitants have to depend upon the rains for their supply. There is no company for supplying the city. The water for drinking and domestic uses is collected in subterranean reservoirs, where it is said to be filtered. It is doled out at the public wells, which are open one hour daily for that purpose and then are carefully locked up.

Alec intends to learn to play some musical instrument, and like a shrewd Scot he desires to operate on an instrument which will give him the best chance of earning money. "Everybody affects the cornet and violin," he writes, "so there is not a great opportunity of making money out of those. Can you tell me the name of an instrument, the players on which are scarce?" In brass bands, good trombone players are much in request; comparatively few persons learn to play it. In string bands, harp players are the most scarce.

Trotter.—If you care to make a pilgrimage to Valladolid in Spain, you may find the house in which Columbus died. Small respect is paid to this relic of the past, however, its present use being as a cow stable.

N. A. L. thinks of touring in Russia shortly, and asks me to give him particulars of the small things he should provide himself with in order to avoid inconvenience.———— That is too large an order for this page, but I may tell him that in most cases the small hotel proprietors do not furnish bed-clothes. They would as soon think of giving you a second-hand tooth-brush. They would not dream of giving you sheets and similar articles that had been used, even though washed, and they would not give the things you had slept in to a second party; consequently it would not pay to supply them. They do provide a bedstead, but the traveller often wishes he had brought his own, until he gets accustomed to the Russian bed.

C. C writes to ask if horses of any particular colour are stronger than others.————Grey horses are supposed to be capable of greater strength and endurance than those of any other colour. So much so, that only grey horses are used in the Russian artillery.

M. H. and P. T. wish me to settle a discussion between them as to whether physical or mental labour is the most exhaustive to the body.———— According to medical authorities, three hours of close study wear out the body more than a whole day of physical exercise.

A Would-be Reformer writes to complain of the ambiguity caused by the use of the same word "line" both for an entire railway and also for each separate track. He suggests that it would be a great improvement if the expression "track" were adopted in England as it has always been in America.————You are mistaken, W.B.R., in supposing that the English railway vocabulary is deficient in this respect. Although the ordinary man in the street might, in his ignorance, refer to a particular track as a "railway line," a railway man would call it neither a "line" nor a "track," but a "road."

M. P. B.—The original folio edition of Shakespeare (1623) is valued at £1,200. The Baroness Burdett-Coutts owns a copy, for which she paid £1,600.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A CHANCE OF A LIFETIME.

GIGANTIC CLEARANCE SALE.

£50,000 worth of Goods Offered at Half Price.

THE ENORMOUS STOCK OF CARPETS, CURTAINS, SHEETS, BLANKETS, QUILTS, &C., MUST BE CLEARED WITHOUT REGARD TO COST, OWING TO THE L.C.C. REQUIRING PRESENT PREMISES FOR STREET IMPROVEMENTS.

New Premises having to be acquired by us, this Sale is held in order to Clear Out Heavy Stocks previous to the removal. NEW GOODS have to be sacrificed, together with all Regular Stocks, as it would be almost impossible to remove the Valuable and Heavy Stocks to New Premises without great risk and loss by damage to the Goods in transit, and this renders AN ABSOLUTE CLEARANCE IMPERATIVE. The magnificent opportunity is therefore afforded the readers of Short Stories of buying the NEW SEASON'S GOODS that are just coming in fresh from the looms at prices lower than the cost of production; and in many cases the Goods are being offered at less than HALF PRICE.

This Offer Will Not be Repeated.

ALL GOODS WARRANTED ABSOLUTELY PERFECT IN EVERY WAY. Money Willingly Returned if not Approved

4s. Lace Curtains for 1s. 11d.

Lot 1.—4s. Lace Curtains for 1s. 11d. These beautiful Lace Curtains, containing about 6 yards in the pair, 48in. wide, shaded ground, taped edges, with handsome double borders. Undoubtedly the cheapest ever offered. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 5s. 6d. Satisfaction guaranteed.

7s. Lace Curtains for 3s. 11d.

Lot 2.—7s. Lace Curtains for 3s. 11d. per pair, measuring 3½yd. long, by 52in. wide, shaded ground, taped edges and handsome double borders; wash easily. 3 pairs for 11s. 3d. Money returned if not approved.

10s. 6d. Lace Curtains for 5s. 11d.

Lot 3.—Specially handsome Drawing-room Design, entirely new and most successful. In white or cream, with scolloped and taped edges, made from thoroughly sound cotton yarns; warranted to wear well. Sale price, 5s. 11d. per pair. Each Curtain measures 3½yd. long by 60in. wide. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 17s. Money returned if not approved.

Lot 7.—10,000 Special Extra Quality, Heavy Loom Kitchen Table Cloths, made from the heaviest and strongest Linen Yarns. Numerous artistic patterns. Specially recommended for hard wear. Warranted to give the best possible satisfaction, being very neat, inexpensive, and durable.

Size 54in. by 45in., price 1s. 2d. each, or 3 for 3s. 3d.
Size 56in. by 56in., price 1s. 5d. each, or 3 for 4s. 0d.
Size 62in. by 62in., price 1s. 11d. each, or 3 for 5s. 3d.
Size 68in. by 62in., price 2s. 2d. each, or 3 for 5s. 11d.

10s. 6d. White Scotch Blankets for 5s. 6d.

Lot 24.—10s. 6d. White Scotch Blankets for 5s. 9d. per pair, measuring about 56in. by 76in.; light, warm, and durable. Admittedly the cheapest blankets ever offered. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 15s. 6d. Satisfaction guaranteed or money returned.

25s. Special Heavy Blankets for 14s. 9d.

Lot 23.—25s. Special Heavy Witney Yorkshire Blankets for 14s. 9d., measuring 75in. by 90in. Manufactured entirely of pure long staple wool, bleached by the sun and beautifully white. Give endless wear, and are easily washed. For perfection of finish, durability, and economy, they are unequalled. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 42s. Money returned if not approved.

WITNEY BLANKETS.

EXCEPTIONAL VALUE.

Lot 24.—800 pairs of best quality Witney Blankets, with fancy borders, very soft, warm, of great durability. Made from the best wool, and warranted to give every satisfaction. Prices given below are little more than half the original cost.

Size	Weight.	Price per Pair.	3 Pairs for
53in. by 70in.	4lb.	6s. 3d.	18s.
60in. by 80in.	6lb.	7s. 9d.	22s.
70in. by 90in.	8lb.	11s. 6d.	33s.
75in. by 96in.	9lb.	13s. 0s.	37s.
80in. by 99in.	10lb.	15s. 3d.	43s.
86in. by 104in.	11lb.	16s. 9d.	48s.

9s. Twilled Sheets for 4s. 11d.

Lot 30.—9s. Bleached Twill Sheets for 4s. 11d., measuring 64in. by 84in. Made from the best cotton yarns, thoroughly shrunk, soft finish, and hemmed ready for use. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 14s. 3d. Satisfaction guaranteed.

15s. 6d. Sheets for 7s. 11d.

Lot 31.—15s. 6d. Bleached Twill Sheets for 7s. 11d., measuring 80in. by 100in. Made from the best cotton yarns, thoroughly shrunk, soft, finish, and hemmed ready for use. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 22s. Money returned if not approved.

3s. 6d. Best Quality Kidderminster Carpeting for 1s. 11d.

Lot 39.—1,500 yards of Best Quality Kidderminster Carpeting, 36 inches wide, at 1s. 11d. per yard; usual price 3s. 6d. per yard. Can be supplied in numerous handsome and effective designs and rich colourings to harmonise with all requirements. Impossible to repeat this offer. Money returned if not approved.

3s. Best Brussels Stair Carpet for 1s. 9d.

Lot 48.—3s. Brussels Carpeting for 1s. 9d. per yard, 22 inches wide. Handsomely bordered, superior quality, light and dark shades, magnificent design and colourings. Satisfaction guaranteed or money returned

10,000 RUGS

GIVEN AWAY.

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Lot 50.—THIS PHENOMENAL OFFER is made to the readers of Short Stories only. On receipt of Postal Order for 6s., or 74 stamps, we will forward DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, etc., handsomely bordered and woven in 30 different patterns and art colourings to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for the goods of the British Carpet Weaving Company BELOW THE ACTUAL COST OF PRODUCTION. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained Direct from our Looms, thus saving the Purchasers all Middle Profits.

GIVEN AWAY.—WITH EVERY CARPET WE SHALL ABSOLUTELY GIVE AWAY A VERY HANDSOME RUG TO MATCH; OR WE WILL SEND TWO CARPETS AND TWO RUGS FOR 10/6.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

THOUSANDS of REPEAT ORDERS & UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

BRUSSELETTE CARPETS.

ADMITTEDLY THE CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD.

Seamless, Woven, and Reversible, Rich Turkey Patterns and Colourings, Superior Quality, with Handsome Border to match; a Marvel of Excellence and Beauty.

Lot 60. No.	SIZES and PRICES. ft. in.	ft. in.	Sale Price.	Former Price.
1	9 0	by 6 0	5/6	9/0
2	9 0	by 7 6	7/0	11 9
3	9 0	by 9 0	8/6	13/6
4	10 6	by 7 6	8/9	13/9
5	10 6	by 9 0	10/0	15/6
6	12 0	by 9 0	11/6	18/0

Lot 60. No.	SIZES and PRICES. ft. in.	ft. in.	Sale Price.	Former Price.
7	12 0	by 10 6	13/6	20/6
8	13 6	by 10 6	15/3	24/0
9	12 0	by 12 0	15/3	24/0
10	13 6	by 12 0	17/0	27/0
11	15 0	by 12 0	19/0	32/0
12	18 0	by 12 0	22/9	36/0

These Carpets are splendid imitations of real Brussels Carpets, the designs having been carefully copied from the originals, both as regards colourings and patterns, so that when in use it is almost impossible, except by close scrutiny, to detect the difference. All designs are registered, and deservedly considered works of art. We can confidently recommend them for use in the dining and drawing rooms, or any rooms and landings where hard wear is a necessity.

GIVEN AWAY.

As an advertisement for the introduction of these goods to all readers of Short Stories we have decided to give away to every purchaser a very handsomely-woven Hearthrug, 6 feet long and 3 feet wide, to match carpets in colours, etc.

THOUSANDS of REPEAT ORDERS & UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

DEAR SIR,— 9 Bedford Row, High Wycombe, Bucks.

I have seen some of the Carpets and rugs sent by your firm, and think they are really a marvel. Please forward goods as follows, etc.—Yours faithfully, Rev. F. H. MAY

"SHORT STORIES" COUPON.
On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. for amount we guarantee to send any goods as above.
THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED OR MONEY WILLINGLY REFUNDED.

All Orders despatched same day as received. Cheques and Postal Orders should be made payable to J. HARGREAVES, and crossed UNION BANK. ADDRESS:

THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING COMPANY, Sale Dept., 31 OLD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

RECKITT'S BLUE.

Ask for it and See that you get it.

LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP

LONGEST ESTABLISHED. PUREST & BEST.

Invalids, as well as those in health, may enjoy drinking this Tea without the least fear of the injurious effects which so frequently result from using other Teas.

Fragrant, Refreshing, Delicious.

*

Price 2s., 2s. 3d., 3s., & 4s. per lb. 3lb. and upwards Carriage paid. Terms—Cash. Sample lb. 2s. 4d.

Invalids' Tea.

The Tea of the Future.

*

Entirely New Process.

G. WILLIAMS, Tea Merchant,
WAIN HOUSE, TONYPANDY.
ESTABLISHED 1875. Mention this Paper.

"GOLDEN SHRED"

A DELIGHTFUL APPETIZER

NO BREAKFAST OR TEA TABLE COMPLETE WITHOUT IT

MARMALADE

Unrivalled piquant stimulant for the delicate.

PREPARED BY JAMES ROBERTSON Paisley.

FREE SAMPLE ON RECEIPT OF 2d FOR POSTAGE.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 483. FOR WEEK ENDING APRIL 2ND, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

CADBURY'S

COCOA is COCOA,

and COCOA ONLY.

CADBURY'S is not a combination of drugs or a high-sounding alkalied article, it is A most sustainihg and PERFECT refreshing beverage, being a FOOD and a drink combined.

It is specially suitable FOR all times and all seasons.

It is most nourishing for the YOUNG building up the growing body.

For breakfast, supper AND all times.

The ideal drink for the OLD repairing the waste incidental to life.

"WE ARE GLAD TO GIVE IT THE HIGHEST PRAISE."
—Medical Magazine.

The Analyst says—"CADBURY'S is the TYPICAL COCOA of English Manufacture."

The Lancet says—"CADBURY'S represents the standard of HIGHEST PURITY."

The Medical Magazine says—"CADBURY'S, the most popular Cocoa of the day."

CADBURY'S ABSOLUTELY PURE COCOA

"Its food value is double that of Bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

will not only help to improve your digestion and consequently your health, but will also bring back that energetic and happy feeling of good health. Man does not live a natural life, so a good portion of a natural food, in the shape of HOVIS, at each meal will largely counteract the bad influence that modern life has upon the health and digestive organs. This is not an idle remark, but a proved statement, daily being verified.

HOVIS is baked and sold by all good class Bakers. No loaf genuine unless stamped HOVIS. 6d. and 1/- samples of Bread and Biscuits sent on receipt of stamps by

S. FITTON & SON, Millers, Macclesfield.

Every Economical Housewife

uses

Tower Tea.

Tower Coffee.

Tower Cocoa.

IN PACKETS AND TINS ONLY.

SOLD EVERYWHERE.

WHOLESALE:

TOWER TEA LTD.,

5, JEWRY STREET, LONDON, E.C.

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Ild. Guide (258 pages) 2d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

A. A sum of from 10/- to 20/- per week offered for spare time to either sex everywhere. Work can be done evenings. Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 89, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

SILVER QUEEN CYCLES!

Best Value on Earth. Immense stock of Ladies' and Gents' machines. New and Secondhand. Wonderful bargains. Carriage paid. Easy payments from 10s. monthly, or large cash discount. 1 year's guarantee. Illus. price lists post free on application. Old cycles exchanged The SILVER QUEEN CYCLE Co Ltd., 221 Tottenham Court Road, London.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 9 High Rd., Kilburn.

WADE'S

WONDERFUL OFFER

A SOLID SILVER WATCH GIVEN AWAY.

SEND NO MONEY.

In order to introduce my name into every household in the Kingdom, I undertake and guarantee to give away one of my "World-Famed £2 Silver Watches," list price, Ladies' or Gentlemen's, to every reader who sends me the correct reading of the Rebus printed below. I am preparing to send out immediately 2,000 of these watches. This is a perfectly genuine competition, and the only thing you have to do is carry out the conditions, and if you succeed in guessing correctly you have the advantage of our truly wonderful offer.

These pictures represent three well-known English Wild Flowers. The conditions of the Competition are that you find out what these flowers are, and if you are correct you undertake to purchase one of my inexpensive SoNd Silver Chains. These chains are the best made, are marvellous value. Money returned if dissatisfied. Send at once, enclosing stamped and addressed envelope, so that I may inform you if correct.

W. W. WADE,

WATCH MANUFACTURER,

Dept. 35, GOLD EXCHANGE,

Hammersmith, London W.

DR MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL SOAP

Prepared with Arsenic, Zinc, and other Ingredients as a beautifier of Skin and Complexion, 6d. and 1s.

Madame PATTI says: "Most Excellent."

Eradicates Spots and all Imperfections.

Of all Chemists, etc., or post free from S. HARVEY Ltd., 5 Denman Street, London Bridge, S.E.

CYCLE DEPOTS

High-class Selection of GENTS', LADIES', & JUVENILE CYCLES. From £3 Cash, or on Easy Terms 10/- Monthly. Head Depot: 52 to 55 Blackfriars Road, London, S.E.

BEST IN LONDON. Lists Post Free.

CYCLEDOM LTD.

RIDING SCHOOLS

Practical Tuition Until Perfect, 10/6. Single Lesson, 2/-. PURCHASERS TAUGHT FREE. Open 9 till 9. West End Branch: 124 King's Road, Sloane Square, S.W.

"JUNO" CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

DIAMONDS from £10. 16/8 monthly. JUNO Lady's or Gent's' Safety £12 12/- 21/- monthly. £14 14/-, 24/8 „ £16 16/-, 28/- „ Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories, sent post free to any part.

METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO. LTD., 75 and 76 Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.; and at Piccadilly Circus, exactly opposite the Criterion, London, W. N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. New JUNO Riding School, 1,700ft., now open.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

No. 483.] For the Week ending April 2nd, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

The Widow's Experience.

MRS. HANNAH BATES—Widow Bates, as she was generally designated—was one of the most prominent inhabitants of the straggling village of Hayling. She lived in a four-roomed cottage on the outskirts of the village—just off "the street"—and her orphan niece Susie, a young woman of twenty-one, resided with her.

There was probably no man or woman in the world who did more good in proportion to his or her means than Widow Bates; the poor of the district blessed her from the bottom of their hearts, and the inhabitants generally were loud in their praises of the good-natured woman.

Aunt and niece were seated in the narrow porch enjoying the cool of the evening and pleasantly occupied in discussing the weightier matters of the day.

"Did you hear that Sir Henry's new steward was to arrive to-day, aunt?" asked Susie.

"Yes, my dear," replied her aunt. "I wonder how long he will suit? The Baronet is very changeable and suspicious; why, he won't let anyone receive rents for him, but has everything paid over into his own hands! Oh, well, it's no business of ours!"

Susie was about to make a remark when her aunt uttered an exclamation.

"My!" And she leant forward to look down the road. "Who's this coming?"

Susie glanced along the dusty road, and saw the figure of a middle-aged man, dressed in black. The stranger quickened his steps as he caught sight of them; he was evidently coming to pay them a visit.

"Mrs. Bates?" asked the stranger as he reached the gate. He raised his hat and looked very affable.

"Yes, sir."

"My name is Welkin—Horatio Welkin."

"Oh!" inwardly ejaculated the widow. "What a name!"

"I have come to act as steward to Sir Henry Bence in Hayling," continued the new comer, "and I am anxious to find a suitable apartment until other provision is made for me. My tastes are simple and my wants few. I should like a bedroom in a house where I can be as one of the family. An elderly man, with a slight limp, told me that I should find what I wanted here."

"Ah, that was old Newsome," returned the widow. "Yes, sir, I have a room to let. Would you like to come and see it?"

Mr. Horatio Welkin said he would, and glanced approvingly at Susie as he followed Widow Bates into the house.

The room was suitable, as were the other arrangements proposed, and the inclusive terms came within the prescribed limits. The bargain was struck, and the new steward was quickly installed as lodger in the neat and homely residence of Widow Bates.

Mr. Horatio Welkin entered upon his duties on the following morning, and the good people of Hayling were rather surprised to find that he succeeded so well in pleasing the Squire. But he was the kind of man who pleases everybody. He had a bland, affable manner of dealing with those who came in contact with him that won golden opinions; before he had been in the village a month the inhabitants wondered how they had been able to get along without him.

He was the life and soul of the place, and such a good man. He was a regular attendant at church, took part in the organisation of cricket matches, started a fund for the better support of the village almshouses; in short, he was indispensable, and everyone sang his praises. Everyone? Well, there was one exception; old Newsome did not like him, and said so to Widow Bates.

"I don't like him," he said, shaking his grey head. "He's too short in the leg. Though," he added thoughtfully, "that don't interfere with his stewardin', I'll own."

"He's a good man," sighed the widow, "and I don't know what we should do without him. He's such a scholar! You should hear him explain the texts; he does it better than the minister. He knows Greek, too. You know that the Testament was written in Greek first, don't you? No? Well, you know it now."

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"I dunno as I'm altogether agin his platform," observed Newsome, who had lately attended a political meeting, and was using the set terms whenever he could, "but I can't quite take to him."

Uncle Nat was known to be stubborn in his opinions, so Widow Bates said no more on the subject. She thought it was time to bid the old man good-bye and make her way home, but Newsome continued:

"I don't like him, and I'd keep my eyes on Susie, if I was you. A gal like that'd turn the head of any man, 'specially a man like that, and he might turn hers."

An angry word rose to the widow's lips, but she restrained herself. Old Newsome was very well in his way, but what could anyone expect from him?

The widow's reflections as she pursued her homeward way were not quite pleasant.

"Why should he not have his eye on Susie? He is a good man, and I believe he would make a worthy husband for any woman."

But a pang went through her at the thought, and her eyes filled with tears. Why?

After that, in spite of herself, she kept on the watch for signs of attachment between her niece and the steward, but she was never able to detect anything to give colour to Uncle Nat's suspicion.

It was Tuesday morning, just a fortnight after the talk with Uncle Nat. Susie and the widow were preparing breakfast; Mr. Horatio Welkin had not yet descended.

Rat-tat!

"A letter! I wonder if it is for us or for Mr. Welkin?" cried Susie as she went into the passage.

She came hurrying back with a black-bordered envelope in her trembling hand.

"Oh, auntie, it's from Uncle John, and it's addressed to you!"

Widow Bates took it without a word, tore open the envelope, and read it. Her sister was dead. She had died on the previous day. She was to be buried on the Saturday. "I may tell you," the letter concluded, "that she has disposed of her own property by will, and that she has left you £2,000."

For a few seconds the widow remained silent, while Susie took the letter and read it. Mrs. Bates and her sister had not been good friends for years. Her sister had married well, and occupied a much higher position than the widow, who felt that she was slighted.

"And I have said such dreadful things about her," murmured the elder woman, "and now she is lying dead!" She burst into tears as she thought of the past. Perhaps it was her own fault, after all, that they had been estranged.

* * * * *

Two months passed away, and the villagers had an item of intelligence to discuss. Widow Bates was to be married to Mr. Horatio Welkin.

"So it's true, eh?" asked Newsome, the next time Mrs. Bates took him a few vegetables from her garden.

"Why shouldn't I marry him?" queried the widow. "I shall be a lonely woman when Susie gets married—she won't stop an old maid all her life, bless her!—and he is a good man. She's away; and now he has taken a house in the street—I am very dull."

"Have you told Susie yet?" asked the old man nervously.

"There will be time enough to do that when she comes home. But what has she to do with it?"

"Nothin' much. Only—only—she's in love with him herself!"

"Fiddlesticks!" snapped the widow. "You must have been drinking to tell me to my face that my niece has fallen in love with him an' I not know it. Whatever makes you say such a foolish thing?" she added with questionable logic.

"I seen him a-kissin' her in the porch one day just before your sister died. She saw me go by—he didn't—and she came to me a little while after and asked me not to tell you yet, as they didn't want it to be known for a time that they was to be engaged. Then your sister died, and then Susie went up to London to stay with her cousins awhile." And Uncle Nat looked the widow straight in the face.

Mrs. Bates remained silent. The only change in her face was that the mouth closed firmly.

"Thank you for speaking out, Uncle Nat," she said thoughtfully, after a long pause. "Perhaps you would like a bottle of ale next time I am passing?"

"Thank you kindly, Mrs. Bates; it would be a comfort." And they parted.

When Mr. Horatio Welkin next visited the cottage, his manner was particularly winning.

"I think it is time that you turned those two thousand pounds to better account than keeping it in the bank, Hannah," he remarked. "I have mentioned this matter before; but now, as your future husband, I think I may press it upon you."

"Certainly," returned the widow quietly. She knew nothing of financial matters, but she was evolving a little scheme in her mind. She would use him as a tool, as he had intended to use her. She would allow him to carry this thing through, with the idea that he was doing it for his own benefit; and when he had accomplished it, she would laugh at him and show him up publicly! How Hayling would ridicule him! He would be obliged to leave the village. Oh, what a difference between Horatio as he seemed to the people of Hayling and the rascal he was proving himself to be! But he had been found out!

"I know of a very profitable investment," he continued; "one that will yield much more interest than you now receive. See how many things you could obtain with the additional income!"

"We should be able to do so much more for the village with this extra income, eh?" said the widow innocently, inwardly chuckling at his coming downfall.

"Of course!" he exclaimed.

"Then I think it had better be carried out at once. We ought not to let an opportunity slip."

"Quite so," responded Welkin with alacrity. "I will bring the transfer to-morrow."

The next day the necessary transfer deed was brought. It was signed by the seller, and had the name of a London stockbroker on the back. On receipt of the cash or cheque, the deed would be lodged for registration in her name. She wrote the cheque, and left it open. "It will facilitate the transaction if it is not crossed," was the reason given; and the widow agreed.

"It seems all in order," said the widow.

"Quite" assured Welkin. "You can leave that to me! The broker has the certificate for this stock. When did you say that your niece was returning?"

"The day after to-morrow." And again the widow indulged in an inward chuckle.

"Exactly. I shall be going up to London to-morrow evening; I have business to transact for Sir Henry on the day after, and then I can conclude this matter. I may not return till the end of the week, but I will write to you so that you shall know that it has been carried through. I shall not be here, then, when your niece arrives."

Digitized by Google

"Very well," returned the widow. "But come back as soon as you can."

About noon on the following morning, old Newsome hobbled up to her door; he usually called if he were going past. Widow Bates made him comfortable with a glass of ale, and took him into her confidence concerning her plans for retaliating upon the steward. He laughed quietly and sipped the beverage handed to him by his hostess; then he asked a question or two and departed.

"I don't see through this yet," he muttered as he limped along towards his own dwelling. "Must think it over."

Uncle Nat seemed to find a great deal to think about that afternoon. He hobbled to the gate after dinner with a chair and a stool, he seated himself on the former and placed a glass and a bottle of good old ale on the latter, then he lighted his pipe. There he sat all through the afternoon apparently in deep thought. A sharp observer would, however, have noticed that he kept a watch on the road.

It was about seven o'clock when he espied Mr. Welkin, portmanteau in hand, coming down the road. Uncle Nat hastily pushed the things aside and opened the gate.

"Good evenin', sir," said Newsome respectfully as the other arrived in front of the cottage. "I should like to speak to you for a minute about my parish allowance."

"I am sorry, Newsome, that I really have not time just now. I have to catch the train."

"There ain't no train due for fifteen minutes, and this won't take long," replied the old man nervously. "I didn't think as you would refuse me a minute on that point. You know you promised yesterday." His fingers were twitching, and he was clearly in a state of great excitement.

Welkin hesitated, inwardly anathematising the man, but, knowing that he had time, finally consented. Newsome stifled a sigh of relief and half led, half dragged the other into the front room.

"Make haste, please," urged the unwilling visitor. "Why are you locking the door?" he asked as Uncle Nat turned the key and dropped it into his pocket.

"'Cos I've got somethin' to say. Look here!" Newsome took from a corner a long broom-handle to one end of which was tied a formidable carving-knife. "If you move, I'll dig this into you—understand? All right! Now listen.

"You've got a cheque out of Widow Bates on false pretences, as they call it. It ain't no good denyin' it; I can see it in your eyes, and I know it's in your black heart! Don't you come that game, now! I'm old and lame, but I've got strength enough to run this into you, and I'll do it!"

The steward retreated before the vicious flourish of the dangerous weapon.

"I don't understand much about these things, but I know that you can get that money because the cheque is open. Why didn't you have it crossed? Why are you going to London in such a hurry? Why are you running away from Susie? I'll tell you. Keep back, now! You've allowed the devil to get hold on you, and you're goin' to hook it with the widow's money! But I saw through it all, and I made up my mind to stop you. If you hadn't come in, I'd have hounded you down the street, but what I'd have stopped you!"

"You are mad! This is an outrage!" cried the entrapped man.

"I'm willin' to take the risk of what I'm doin'," returned the old man doggedly. "Give up that cheque!"

"I shall not!"

"Then I'll disable you with this, and hunt your things over till I find it," said Newsome fiercely. He was thoroughly in earnest, and he had Welkin in a corner of the room where there was no space for dodging. He deftly placed the point of the knife against the other's throat. "Give it up!"

Welkin tried to argue, and to insist that he could not get at the cheque unless the knife were taken away; but Newsome kept him pinned against the wall, and finally the rascal took out his pocket-book, felt for the paper, and tore it in pieces as his captor bade him.

Smiling grimly, Newsome backed to the door, unlocked it without turning round, and hastily ran—yes, ran—into the street, where he knew he was safe. The steward came out, glared at Uncle Nat (who waved his weapon warningly), and hurried down the street towards the station.

When the truth became known on the following day, Uncle Nat was the hero of the village, and everyone was filled with wonder at his daring, and at the rascality of the man whom they had all admired so much.

Widow Bates was so overwhelmed that she could only press his hand in thankfulness at having been saved by him from heavy loss.

Welkin was never seen again, thus proving the accuracy of the old man's suspicions.

Susie returned that day and learnt the truth from her aunt and from Newsome. It was not a merry party that evening at the cottage of Widow Bates, yet there was a goodly share of that quiet happiness which one feels at having escaped a great trouble.

"Suppose either of us had married him!" exclaimed Susie. And they both wept tears of mingled grief and gladness.

Uncle Nat will never want for the necessaries of life; the widow has settled upon him—despite his remonstrances—one quarter of the amount of the cheque that was torn up in his front room.

G. Merriam.

Digitized by Google

The Tale of the Yellow War.

BY M. P. SHIEL.

Author of "The Man-Stealers," "Prince Zaleski," "Shapes in the Fire," "The Rajah's Sapphire," etc.

CHAPTER XV.

But see what a mess the Terrible is making of the Gefion yonder in the very thick of things. Some of the ships are fighting at little more than pistol-shot distance; and the Terrible is well within half a knot of the dismantled Gefion, when Commander Madden, careering to starboard, trumpets forth through the uproar in a kind of German: "Haul down your flag, or I'll ram!" And half a minute later down sails the flag of the Gefion; and half a minute later still, down dives the Gefion herself, to her final harbour at the bottom of the Hwang Hai, which swallows with her all that part of her crew which a pinnace of the Terrible is unable to rescue.

The Revenge has not lodged a 12-inch shell in the fore-port magazine of the Majestueuse in vain. The French ship shudders,—then, a little forward of amidships, there is a red belch that spouts high above her mast, and curves outward in a lurid rain far over the sea—then there is a long reverberation of clattering thunder,—and the Majestueuse bursts, and sinks. But this row is mingled with another, caused by the ram of the foundering Pascal, which is working and ravening below the central armour-belt of the Revenge. The three vessels disappear from sight within a minute of each other.

There, on the far starboard edge of the British line of battle, the Iphigenia—on board of which is Fate—is levelling her whole port battery in one incessant roll of Gardners and Nordenfeldts, of six-pounders and three-pounders, upon a small approaching second-class torpedo-boat; growling harshly, is she, like a hound which bristles and snarls, retreating backward at the sudden apparition of an advancing lion.

The torpedo-boat lances one of her needles of steel, but it is caught by a wave, tossed upwards in a whiff of spray, and sent flying to starboard, where it explodes under the stern of the French first-class battery cruiser Aréthuse. As the tubes of the torpedo-boat sends forth another of the explosives, the ram of the Iphigenia passes into and over her small assailant; the torpedo explodes ten yards away, but tears a hole in the forward protective bulkhead of the Iphigenia. She commences to settle down by the starboard bow.

But what is this new phenomenon which now suddenly appals every eye that beholds it—the eyes of friend and of foe alike: something appalling by its mere novelty, not hitherto seen in sea or land warfare—something in the air—with all the properties and the powers of a spirit of evil?

It is a balloon—narrow, low, and long—French in origin. It can be steered backward and forward even in the teeth of a light wind; and its operators have the power of dropping dynamite shells with a steel casing, containing liquid oxygen and blasting gelatine, upon the hostile ships. It has come sailing with the light breath of the monsoon from a French ship, which has studiously kept far on the outskirts of the battle.

SUMMARY.

Yen How, a shrewd Chino-Japanese doctor, falls desperately in love with Ada Seward, an English nursemaid. His advances are rudely repulsed; however; but he leaves England with a fixed determination to win the object of his affections in spite of all opposition.

Yen How goes first to Japan as a Japanese, where he becomes intimate with the prime minister, Marquis Ito, to whom he proposes a league between the two races of China and Japan, and an immense scheme by which Europe may be reduced to a waste, and China become the Empress of the Earth with scarcely an effort of her own. He then goes to China and becomes virtual ruler of that nation. In the course of a conversation which he has with Li Hung Chang he unfolds his scheme for setting all the European Powers against Great Britain. After the slaughter China will step in and conquer the remnants of the armies.

War is declared between Great Britain and France and Germany and Russia. The British fleet meets the Allied ships in Mid-channel and a battle ensues. Although the British vessels are outnumbered by two to one, the superior tactics of the British, and of John Hardy, a consumptive midshipman and a genius for modern warfare (who escapes on the Jupiter from the fight, and rams all the transports some distance away), result in the destruction of the Allied fleet. Hardy is ill for a time, and on his recovery decides to go to China. Before going, however, he endeavours to obtain a promise of marriage from Miss Bosey Jay, a young lady artist, but is refused. He goes to the Palace Theatre of Varieties, and there meets Ada Seward, the nursemaid with whom Yen How is in love. She sends him home intoxicated, and a week later he is in Paris, where he has a row with Edropol, the Bulgarian duellist. John, however, does not fight, but goes to Berlin, and from thence to Petersburg. Here he sends a letter to Bobbie, his old servant in England, and starts out for China by the overland route. Yen How organises an army of 400,000,000 souls—men, women, and children—to overrun Europe when the time is ripe. He is sitting in his garden when the capture of John Hardy is announced to him.

John is brought before Yen and they quarrel. The former fires at the Chinaman, but the bullet strikes a breast-plate of steel and does no harm. Meanwhile, the British China squadron, failing to obtain the promised assistance from Japan, engages the Allied fleet.

Digitized by Google

It is not a toy; nor is it sent up as a curiosity for the amusement of the British ships. It becomes stationary high up over the Barfleur, a black dot is seen to disengage itself from it, and a moment or two afterwards, ninety-five British sailors are dead, and the engines of the Barfleur are no longer there. Then, sparing of its shells, it moves on in another direction, and then swiftly in another, and another, letting fall each time on the ships below, its deadly missiles. Except two, which fall into the sea, every shell destroys a ship. One bullet of a rifle would be sufficient to prove fatal to it, but it is high, its movements are swift and sudden, and when at last it tumbles, pierced, into the sea, the battle is all but over. It has done its work well.

This had been the wisdom of France in the times of peace: that she had not despised the ingenious man and his ingenuities; she had invited the thinker; she had welcomed the dreamer of dreams.

This was the second time since the beginning of this war that the British had come into contact with the Forges et Chantiers de la Méditerranée, and had shuddered intensely at the contact.

But we are an ocean-race! Every cock on his own dunghill—and England on the sea. Had it not been for the French balloon, the British would very likely have won the battle by five seaworthy ships, and one unseaworthy; as it was, they won by two seaworthy ships, and one unseaworthy.

The last shot fired was fired by the Iphigenia at a German third-class cruiser, which she sank. This was the last but two of the Allied vessels left afloat; the other two had some time since struck their flag, and were now sinking fast.

Besides the Iphigenia, which had engines, funnels, screws, and rudder intact, but a considerable crank bow-wards, there were afloat of the British craft the Daphne, a twin-screw sloop, which was practically uninjured, and the Barfleur, which was floating like a mere log unable to move a yard. There were only fifty-seven men left alive in her.

The Iphigenia had one boat, and the Daphne two, still capable of passing over the water; and these were soon out, two of them making toward the Barfleur to take off her crew, and one in the direction of one of the still floating two ships of the Allies, for the purpose of rescue.

The sea was oilily smooth; the breeze had died to a mere breath; the sun had climbed to noon.

All was still. Over four buried navies the water swung lazily—as a cradle which one has ceased to rock, of its own motion.

Weirdly sad is that vast and wandering grave of the sailor; and careless is the great heart of the sea.

So intent were all who still floated during this quiet noon-tide in the central ocean upon the humane work of rescue, that no one noticed the swift approach upon them of a growing cloud of smoke from the east, and it was only when a shraphel shell came screaming through the fore-armoured tube of the already shattered Barfleur, that the British sailors, to their consternation, discovered that yet another enemy was upon them.

Presently, as though the new arrivals had found an entire fleet to oppose them, the air was full of fire.

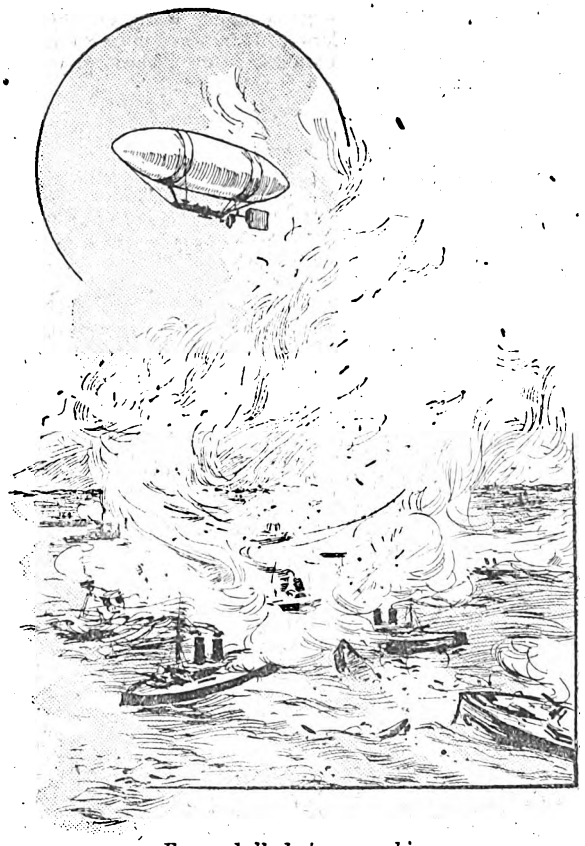
Five large cruisers were seen to be steaming at full speed upon the small remnants of the four fleets.

But cruisers of what nation? They carried no flag!

The two vessels of the Allies—small torpedo-boat destroyers—had long since struck their colours. And at once, as a precautionary measure, the three British vessels did the same.

But it made no difference! The rain of fire continued.

Happily, before the boat of the Iphigenia reached the Barfleur, the Barfleur dipped, and sank. So also did one of the Allied ships, and also one of the Daphne's boats with her crew. The other of the Daphne's boats, and the Iphigenia's boat, at once turned back to hurry to their ships



Every shell destroys a ship.

For the moment the Iphigenia was still out of effective range of the shells of this strange enemy; but one of the screws of the Daphne was shattered by a semi-submarine explosion.

At once, as their two boats reached them, the two British ships turned tail under forced draught, flying straight westward from this sudden, dread, mysterious foe.

Both were very swift; but the Daphne could now only move with half her speed. On board the Iphigenia men were working at the pumps.

The strange enemy, seeing that there was no longer any target for their shot, ceased fire, and slackened speed. Only the swiftest of the five cruisers was told off to continue the chase of the two fugitives.

She gained upon them both, especially upon the Daphne; but a stern chase is a long chase, and it was an hour beforethe first shell, shattering every gun in the Daphne's central battery, warned her that further flight was useless.

The Daphne had again hoisted her ensign, and now again she struck it; and again was surrender met by a hail of shot from this extraordinary adversary.

The Daphne at once re-hoisted her colours, spun sharply round to port, and bore straight down upon her pursuer.

Her commander was at least determined to sell the life of his ship dearly.

But he was met by such a cataract of shell and shot that he perceived that he must certainly founder before accomplishing the ram which he meditated.

He determined, far off as he was, to risk the launching of his last torpedo.

It proved a happy inspiration.

The little needle of disaster went hastening, in steadfast, headlong flight, in spite of sweeping wave and baffling spray, straight upon its victim. It fastened upon her beam at the level of her armoured deck a few inches below the water-line, and burst.

Digitized by Google

Those Italian Bersaglieri and Alpini.

The strange vessel started, and leapt, and, with a cough that rent her, threw her fragments over the sea. She was the Japanese cruiser Sado.

A minute later, while the Iphigenia was still hastening to the scene of the conflict, the Daphne sank with all hands.

The Iphigenia was now miles out of sight of the other four Japanese cruisers.

She continued her course eastward, very slowly sinking all the time.

About midnight of the next day she was beached on a sandy bottom close to Kiao-Chau.

She had on board a hundred and eighty men.

CHAPTER XVI.

The Suicide of Europe.

At the time of the battle in the Hwang-Hai all Europe was at war.

Very shortly after the defeat of the Allies at Shoreham, a burst of Homeric laughter was caused all over England and the Continent by the announcement that the Prince of Monaco (who was an independent sovereign, and possessed the magnificent army of about sixty body-guard carabineers), had declared war against England.

But this episode, though amusing in itself, was not without its significance.

The Prince was not a mere pantomimist. He had been compelled by some intricacy of the actual situation to act as he had acted, and his action only meant that so complex and finely-poised was the machinery of modern European policy, that it was no longer possible for any considerable portion of Europe to be at war without plunging into war the rest of it also.

With the sound of the first cannon a thousand slumbering passions of the peoples started into life. The hour had struck for the placing upon the stage of a thousand schemes of long-meditated revenge, avarice, and aggression.

Servia rejoiced. Her secret vow to settle her long-standing account with her Bulgarian victors might now be redeemed. Bulgaria rejoiced. Now at last would she be free of Tsar and of Sultan alike.

Spain rubbed her sleepy eyes! How if events so worked in this upheaval of the world, that Gibraltar should once again fall into her lucky lap? Sweden looked round with something of the aggressive enterprise of her old hero, Gustavus Adolphus, wondering if now, at last, she could not accomplish the deliverance of her former subjects, the Finns, from the oppressive hand of Russia.

The Cretans, certain now that the Sultan would have his hands full of matters far more important than their small selves, girt on the dirk and carbine of massacre. Austria turned her eyes toward Salonika with languishing, and her right hand crept out to steal.

Roumania dreamt that Russia's only motive for war was to furnish an excuse for her destruction, and rushed in arms to her frontiers. Italy had territories still "unredeemed": and was not this the time to "redeem" them?

Denmark had been nipped and curtailed, and her day was come for vengeance; Portugal was alert to stab in the back her British rival in Africa in the hour of his preoccupation.

At Athens, at Belgrade, at Sophia—from London to Batoum,—from St. Petersburg to Megalo-Kastro,—the sword leapt from its scabbard.

Mobil!

The Sultan pressed his fez tighter upon his head, sitting luxuriously among cushions; and the panic of the sinner in the day of his calamity gripped coldly at this man's heart. He had heard that the main body of the Servian army was moving eastward from its head-quarters at Knuzevatz, and were being massed upon Nisch and Vranja, while fresh levies were being made in order to form a strong reserve; and he had hardly heard it, when the further news arrived that a bloody battle between Servian and Bulgarian divisions of infantry had occurred near Vlassina, in which the Servians had been routed with heavy loss.

Digitized by Google

The messengers of evil followed fast one upon the other, like the messengers of Job.

The same night a considerable Austrian body crossed the Save, and quietly occupied Belgrade.

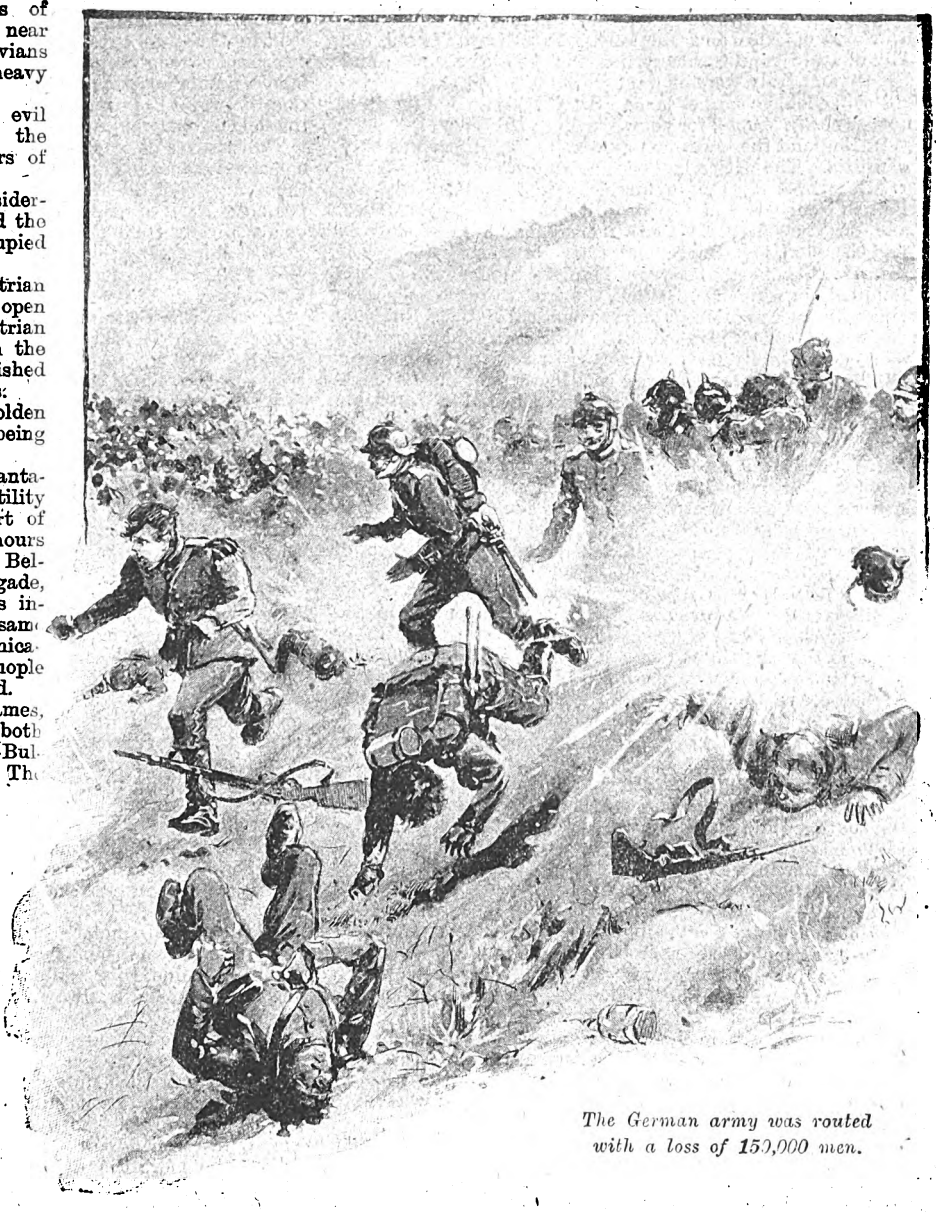
The next morning Austrian troops bivouacking in the open spaces of the city, and Austrian officers taking déjeûner on the boulevards, met the astonished eyes of the waking citizens.

It seemed as if the Golden Horn was in danger of being broken.

For this action was tantamount to an act of hostility against Russia on the part of Austria. Within a few hours after the occupation of Belgrade, another Austrian brigade, without firing a shot, was installed in Semendria. The same day telegraphic communication between Constantinople and Odessa was interrupted.

Macedonia was in flames, and a land of émeutes,—both Anti-Turkish and Anti-Bulgarian,—from end to end. The Vali of Salonika was assassinated and mutilated in the streets of his city.

The Porte had called out the last class of rediffs, and rediffs from Smyrna and the Tripolitaine, to the number of 70,000 were being transported, and massed at Salonika, with a view to the protection of the frontier line. Fifty thousand men, still left round Stamboul, were distributed along the chain of forts from Roumalie Kavak to the Golden Horn. A fleet of Turkish torpedo-boats without torpedoes, and ironclads without ammunition, steamed northward through the Bosphorus. But before they reached the latitude of Midia, a fleet of Russian Black-Sea battle-ships, torpedo-boats, and transports crowded with 90,000 troops from Odessa, had shelled and occupied Bourgas. (Bourgas is in direct railway communication with Constantinople.)



The German army was routed with a loss of 150,000 men.

The uncalled-for action of Austria in occupying the two Servian towns was Russia's defence for her occupation of the Bulgarian town.

Events followed one upon another with an ever increasing frightfulness of rapidity. Developments which at other times would have required weeks for their outcome, now required only hours. Europe was whirling in a delirium of haste. The next day half-a-dozen sotnias of irresponsible Cossacks pushed forward across the Galician frontier to Lubica; and without delay Austria declared formal war against Russia.

Here was a topsy-turvydom of things—brought about by the festering greed and the old malice of the nations. Germany was the pledged ally of Austria; Germany was the pledged ally of Russia against England; and Russia and Austria were at war!

Look, too, at those Italian Bersaglieri and Alpini, climbing like chamois over the Alps, with batteries borne on nimble-hoofed mules, by the Mont Cenis route. Italy means to get back, now or never, old Savoy—which is her Alsace-Lorraine—and is engaged in mountain warfare on the one hand with French Dragoons and Mountain-chasseurs among the Alps, and, on the other, is shelling with her fleet the batteries that defend the Riviera, preparatory to landing three Corps, her 2nd, 4th, and 6th, in the neighbourhood of Nice and Mentone. Yet Germany was the Ally of Italy; and Germany was the Ally of France; and France and Italy were at war!

Digitized by Google

Mobil, then, ye sons of men! Set briskly to it—for it is now or never. Mobil for your lives!

In England there was no longer a nation: there was only a Militia. The nation had become an army.

After three days of a terrific artillery battle between British ironclads and the forts de la Floride, de l'Heure, and de Tourneville, a British Army under Lord Roberts had occupied, first Havre, and then Harfleur. A series of disastrous battles, between Harfleur and Yvetot, had followed, in which the British, though outnumbered, were generally successful in claiming a nominal victory. But they made no decided advance. The hitherto unknown results of modern contrivances were found to make victory almost as fatal as defeat. The very small bullets of the Lee-Metfords and Lebel rifles—the enormous range of the magazine rifle—the use of smokeless powder—were found to be elements whose effects were, on the whole, ten times greater than had been anticipated. Division after Division hurried over from Britain to the support of the Havre Army; and Corps after Corps of the French massed upon Rouen, upon Harfleur, upon Confreville, and the neighbouring towns to oppose them. It became a question of men.

Five British ships, which were all that was left of the Mediterranean squadron after a great engagement in the Bay of Algeciras, were reducing Marseilles to a heap of ruins, at the very time when the Italian ships were engaged in an incessant artillery duel with the forts along the Riviera coast. Yet Italy and England were not formally allies.

North and south a dark cloud of tragedy widened over France. In less than six weeks after the commencement of the war her 7th, 14th, 15th and 16th Corps d'Armée had ceased to exist, in consequence of signal Italian victories in the south; while in the north a steady deluge of British regiments had accounted for seven more of her corps. Toulon, the impregnable, was in the hands of General Ricotti. Havre was a British base.

Already the territorial army was being detached to form part of the active army, and the reserve of the territorial army being mobilised for probable service.

France was shrinking under the intolerably harsh frown of Britain. The Joy of the whole earth was about to perish.

Britain herself, in her tough, silent way, was in the grip of bitter suffering. The Government had established public granaries all over the kingdom. But the price of bread was prohibitive. Whole villages and towns were perishing of hunger.

Singular as it now seems, she had had no separate cable connecting her telegraphically with South Africa, which was to a large extent her life. When she was disconnected with the Continent by her enemies, she found herself disconnected also with her most important colonies. It was necessary for her to adopt the slow method of sending out a small dispatch vessel round the Cape in order to recall the Australian and Pacific Squadrons home. The Suez Canal had long since been blown up by the French officials at Port Said.

At the Cape a naval battle had resulted, by some few ships, in a victory for the Allies, in consequence of overwhelming odds. Cape Town and all the British sea-board of South Africa had been shelled. Sierra Leone also was in the hands of the French.

But Australia and the sea-board of India were already comparatively safe. The enemy needed all their still floating navies nearer home.

On the strongly-fortified German coast England's success had been hardly less than marvellous. A small fleet of British war-ships and troopers had appeared at the entrance of the Kiel Canal, and captured Tronning.

Then the two great branches of the Teutonic race measured strengths. England had sent 100,000 men to fight a nation boasting the most exquisite military organisation the world has ever conceived, and capable of placing in the field an army approaching three millions.

The first result was mere disaster for the invaders,—but not moral defeat. They retained Tronning, and, by a coup, the remnants of the scattered army under Sir Evelyn Wood possessed itself of Stralsund. They did it under cover of a bombardment from the sea by a British fleet, among the British ships being the three Swedish cruisers Edfors, Unca, and Geft, which suddenly appeared, and joined in the action.

Nor was this Britain's last word to Germany.

It can never be that guns and swords alone can rule the world. The nation with the strongest heart, and the hardest brow, she is the mistress.

What happened at Havre, happened at Kiel and Stralsund. England with astonishing, steady pertinacity sent men to fight—only, here, the rigour of the thing was greater, the flame hotter.

In all that low-lying tract of land between Wismar, Neu Brandenburg, Anclam, and Stralsund, a series of murderous conflicts took place, Wilhelm himself directing the course of the campaign, and the British being entrenched for the most part behind a semi-circular line of earthworks stretching east and west, with Stralsund for base.

The three lines of railway, west to Lübeck and Hamburg, east to Stettin, and south to Berlin, were in the hands of the British, and after a day of fearful carnage in the neighbourhood of Neu Brandenburg, in which the German army was routed with a loss of 150,000 men, a successful rush was made for Stettin, which in the course of a night attack, fell into British hands.

The same night nearly the whole of Berlin was destroyed by fire, a catastrophe attributed to the action of the Socialists.

And ever England came to Germany—raw levies, meagre Cockney-born lads, boors from the Downs, Lancashire bodies, persons in kilts: not terrible to look at: terrible to meet as enemies.

Their chief characteristic is not that they are brave, and agile, and cool; but that by some unknown national quality of mind, they really contrive to do what they try to do. Their results always produce a certain effect of surprise.

Before these nimble invaders the tapfere Krieger of the Fatherland slowly receded.

From Thorn, that Metz of the East, from Königsberg, and Dantzig, and the great military depôts of the North-east, troops were drafted to repel this obstinate, rock-browed, small, unseasoned foe.

But the more the British poured their levies upon the German sea-board, and the greater the drafts by Wilhelm upon the as yet inactive corps, and the nearer the possibility of a call to be made upon the Teuton shopkeepers and burgers of the reserve, so the more Socialistic seemed to become the opinions of the German nation.

Socialism—with its absurdities—with its heavenly gospel of salvation for the world—had, for ultimate good, or ultimate ill, got into the blood of the nations during the latter half of the nineteenth century, to a far greater extent than anyone then supposed. Men who most hated the word, thought Socialism, and did not know it. It was bound to come out when the great moment for its birth arrived.

Wilhelm was walking above an abyss, and the ground beneath his feet was the thinnest parchment.

He had no sooner withdrawn a large portion of the Army of the Vistula, than Dantzig was sacked and taken by the Swedish fleet.

Digitized by Google

The most extraordinary phenomenon of this vast and complex war was the success of Sweden everywhere. Within three weeks, a division of her gallant little army, consisting of only three corps, had gained a permanent pied à terre as far south as Bromberg; she had wrought havoc with the north-eastern coast-defences of Germany; and she had turned West Prussia into a depopulated wilderness. Another division of her army, consisting of five corps, had in two great battles on the shores of Lake Ulea routed two Russian war-hosts, and then had pushed on to Helsingfors, which they captured from the land-side, and made their headquarters. Intoxicated by success, they turned their faces across the Gulf of Finland toward Petersburg.

The hands of Russia were full enough.

Immediately after the outbreak of war with Austria, she had concentrated as fast as her defective railway system would allow her, great masses of troops, consisting of the 4th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th and 12th Army Corps, in the direction of Lemberg. Behind these followed the more remote 13th, 16th, and 17th Corps.

Including the Corps d'Armée doing unsuccessful battle with the Swedes in Finland, by far the greater part of Russia's vast territorial power was now in the field, three additional army corps having advanced from Kars to the investment of Erzeroum, where a crushing defeat at the hands of a mixed army of Turks and British awaited them.

The eastern limb of the British Mediterranean fleet had steamed through the Bosphorus, conveying transports to Trebizonde, and then proceeded northwards, with the double object of a search for the Russian Black Sea Squadron, and the bombardment of Odessa and Sebastopol.

Austria had combined her forces into three armies: one in East Galicia, on the Dniester; another on the San with its back on Przenupl, the great bulwark of Middle Galicia; and the third on Cracow, the key of Western Galicia, on the Upper Vistula.

The Great White Tsar was pre-occupied. All round his sky were clouds and darkness. That mighty breadth of empire was already rocking to its fall.

The grey and green-coated soldiers of Russia were swarming round her borders, more on the defensive than the offensive. In the first fixed battle with the Austrians, General Gourko, the old Invincible, had been routed with such a horror of widespead massacre, that the brain of the aged general was unhinged. In a paroxysm of madness he shot himself.

And ever anew—after each orgy of blood—went forth the cry over Europe: Mobil! Mobil!

In a skirmish near Karatoya between two demi-regiments of Macedonians and Bulgarians, not a single man was left alive.

The fact was, that Europe was destroying herself. Everywhere, from Land's End to the Caucasus, the grin of a Spectre was perceived in the air—the Spectre of Hunger, of grim Scarcity, and raw-boned Want.

England had still America to supply her wants; but wants cannot be supplied save by the purchasing power of the party who wants. England's purchasing power had consisted in her commerce; and her commerce was near to death.

America, moreover, in this crisis, had no idea of small profits and quick returns. She had been thrown by the war into a state of financial collapse; and, with the blindness of selfishness, she raised her prices to prohibitive figures.

On paper, England remained rich enough. Her consols were taken up eagerly. The chief financiers and bankers of the world filled her war-chest. The security of by far the larger half of investments depended upon her success. As a matter of self-interest the Rothschilds, and Wall Street, and the kings of finance threw in their lot with her.

But the industry of the greater part of the world was at a standstill, and there is no real wealth which is not the direct offspring of industry.

In a paroxysm of madness he shot himself.

Germany, France, Italy, and Russia opened their ports to all comers, adopting the free trade policy of England—but too late. That, of course, which they were unable to buy was not brought to them to be sold.

Russian wheat, by Royal command, ceased to be exported. But it would quite certainly have ceased to be exported without the command.

The fields grew rich and oozy with a human sap, the blood of millions. But the hand of industry was palsied to sow the seed.

Mobil, then, ye children of Europe! Mobil all ye can! But know that in the end it shall bite like a serpent, and sting like an adder.

CHAPTER XVII.

The Love which Foo-Chee Bore to Ah-lin.

Foo-Chee was No. 13 of the 3rd squad of the 1st company of the 2nd battalion of the 11th regiment of the 2nd brigade of the 1st division of the 17th Army Corps of the great army of China.

Every morning and every night he lifted up both his hands, and he blessed the name of Yen How, the Illustrious, who by his might had changed the old flow and show of things. For why? Because Ah-lin was No. 15 of the same squad of the same company of the same battalion of the same regiment of the same brigade of the same division of the same Army Corps of the great army of China.

Every day, between four and a quarter to six o'clock in the afternoon, the company went through a certain drill on the plain to the south-east of the walls of Pekin, half a mile from the walls, between Pekin and Tunchow. The roll was called before drill commenced, and if any one were absent, he, or she, was hanged publicly, by his heels, the next morning in Pekin. So Ah-lin had to be there; and Foo-chee saw Ah-lin, and blessed Yen How the Illustrious.

Digitized by Google

Ah-lin was a girl of eighteen, very pretty, with the elongated face which the Chinese adore, and eyes so long, and narrow, and slanting. She was the daughter of a tiny silversmith, whose shop was on the fifth floor of a house in a gaudy Pekin main street.

Her father lived his life in a corner of the single room which was his shop and dwelling. His life was a dream, and his food rice-greens and opium. When he awoke from his paradises, he languidly took up a piece of silver, and looked at it, and put it down again.

Ah-lin's father and mother and herself lived happily upon fifteen tiaos, say twopence and the twelfth of a penny, per week. The father was exempt from service, because one of his legs was hopelessly incapable of walking. The mother served in a different company to that of Ah-lin.

But in spite of her poverty, Ah-lin had an elongated face, and peepy little bewitching eyes, and a pig-tail of incredible length. Her feet, of course, had not been cramped, and she walked with a fine free swing, slanting a wee bit backward, like the true Northerner that she was. Even a statue might move to worship her.

"Foo-chee," said Ni-ching-tang, who was the father of Foo-chee, "take your eyes from Ah lin, my son. Leave Ah-lin be. She is loved by Sin-wan, and Sin-wan is among the honourable ones in the days which are."

Ni-ching-tang knew what he was saying; for he was a very subordinate cook in the multitudinous kitchen of Yen How; and Sin-wan was a warder in the Imperial Prisons. Ni-ching-tang and Sin-wan were very good nodding acquaintances, as we should say.

That Sin-wan loved Ah-lin there could be no doubt. He had more than once risked his neck in leaving the Imperial precincts at unlawful hours to make signalling gestures in the street before the fifth-floor room of Ah-lin's parents.

But Sin-wan was of middle age, and unduly stout. His neck was thick and hard, and seemed made for hanging. And his countenance was as hideous as Rin-foi's, the chief of the devils, as it stands carved out in the ebon idols.

Moreover, Sin-wan was greatly addicted to secret orgies on the fiery spirit samshu, and the impress of these brutalising excesses was left on his already brutal face.

Ah-lin's eyes, though narrow, could see much; and in her secret meditations in the darkness of the room at night, she would think that Foo-chee was nice to look at, and Sin-wan was not.

Foo-chee was a young man of twenty, and a seller of Tibet incense-sticks in the next street to that in which Ah-lin lived. And these two units, among the tens of thousands of human beings that swarmed and sweltered round them, felt within them the stirrings of that force which made the world.

Ah-lin had noted the following eye of Foo-chee often, long before the strange drilling commenced; and when she found herself almost next to him in the 3rd squad, she had a presentiment, and a tremor. It was the doing of the upper gods.

"Ah-lin," said Ah-lin's mother, Nan-lin, "turn away your eyes from the eyes that turn to you. Foo-chee is nice to look at, but Sin-wan is among the honourable ones in the days that are. A child should love her father and her mother above herself, and do all for them."

But it was the doing of the upper gods, what happened. Ah-lin was near to Foo-chee every day in the new drill; and the drilling straightened Foo chee's back, so that his backward slant as he walked was increased, till a woman would have died for him.

But Sin-wan, one night, beckoned to Nan-lin from the street, and Nan-lin sent down Ah-lin, and Sin-wan took Ah-lin by the hand, and said:

"Ah-lin is well formed, both in face and figure. Therefore I, Sin-wan, will marry with Ah-lin."

At this directness Ah-lin hung her head. It was not difficult to perceive the sequence of cause and effect in this matter—and she was afraid of Sin-wan.

"Do you say yes, Ah-lin?" said Sin-wan. "If you say yes, I will take you now to a meal in Hing-Chang-Li's eating-house, with fresh tea to drink."

"I would say yes," replied Ah-lin, "but my father and mother—to whom all honour—do not wish me to marry now."

"That is a lie, Ah-lin. Your father and mother wish you to marry. And you wish to marry, too. But you do not wish to marry with me. You wish to marry with Foo-chee."

"Foo-chee?"—she started—"Where did you hear the name of Foo-chee?"

"Your mother told me his name, Ah-lin."

"It is strange. I know no one with such a name."

"It is a lie, Ah-lin. His name is written in green and red picture-letters over the booth where he sells incense-sticks. I have seen it, and I have seen him."

"And what do you say is his name?"

"Foo-chee."

"Well, it may be, Sin-wan. I know nothing of the matter."

"Foo-chee shall die, Ah-lin, if you do not marry with me."

"Oh! what for? Whom has Foo-chee hurt? He sells his incense-sticks, and hurts no one!"

"Now I have made you say that you wish to marry with him. For you do not wish me to kill him, Ah-lin."

"Kill him, if you wish."

"I will kill him."

"But why so?"

"Because you will not marry with me."

"I did not say I will not marry with you, Sin-wan."

"Then you will?"

"I must."

"When, Ah-lin?"

"When the new drilling is no more."

"Oh, that may be never. No. It shall be while this moon is big."

"I cannot, Sin-wan—I cannot."

"Why not, Ah-lin?"

"It is my father and mother,—to whom all——"

"It is that dog's gall, Foo-chee! Foo-chee shall die, Ah-lin."

"Oh, me! I am not feeling happy, Sin-wan!"

"No, nor am I feeling happy, till you say that it shall be this moon! Nor shall Foo-chee feel happy, when my knife is rankling in his liver! Say it, Ah-lin!"

"I say it, Sin-wan."

"While the moon is big?"

"Yes, Sin-wan."

"Then I will go. And I will come again to-morrow night at this hour."

"Did you not say that you would take me to the eating-house of Hing-Chang-Li for a meal, with fresh tea?"

"I cannot to-night, for I have no time, since I must return now to the Imperial Prison. But to-morrow night—or the night after—you shall feed at the eating-house of Hing-Chang-Li."

So Sin-wan turned abruptly on his heels, and walked away on them. And when he arrived at the portals of the Imperial City, after traversing a vast complexity of streets, he was already late, and his bulging neck was in danger.

(To be continued.)

Look out for Next Week's SHORT STORIES. It will be the Easter Number, and a Series of Stock Exchange Stories will begin.

Digitized by Google

A DANISH IDYLL.

There was once upon a time in Kraruper Inn a maiden named Karen. She attended to the serving of the guests herself, for the landlady lived among her pots and pans in the kitchen. And many people came to Kraruper Inn—neighbours who collected there when the autumn evenings began to darken, and sat in the warm room, and drank unlimited quantities of coffee punch. Travellers and wanderers, too, who came in blue with cold, stamping their feet and calling for something hot, that would enable them to reach the next station.

Karen went about silently, without haste, serving each in his turn. She was small and delicate, only a child, earnest and reserved, and the young fellows did not notice her. But she was very dear to the older customers, to whom a visit to the Inn was an event of importance. She prepared their coffee quickly, and served it seven times hot.

When she moved about among the guests with her waiter, the burly, coarsely-dressed men stood aside and made way for her, and every one looked admiringly after her. Karen had great, grey eyes that took in everything, and seemed to look far, far away, and her eyebrows were arched in surprise and wonder. Strangers thought she did not understand their orders; but Karen heard all, and made never a mistake. She had a way of her own, whether she gazed into the distance, or listened, or waited, or dreamt.

Some one stood near the window, and looking at the clock said: "The post is early to-night." The mail coach rattled over the pavement, the doors of the inn were thrown open and the wind blew the smoke from the stove.

Karen entered from the kitchen just as the conductor stepped into the door and greeted the company with a hearty "Good evening!"

He was a tall, handsome man, with dark eyes; a crisp brown beard framed his face, and curly brown hair covered his small head. His long, heavy mantle of beautiful red Danish cloth was trimmed with black fur and hung from his shoulders. The entire light of the two dim paraffin lamps that were suspended from the wall over the table centred itself on this spot of glorious crimson, as if it loved it and left all the grey and black of the room to grow still greyer and blacker. And the tall figure—with the fine, dark, curly head, and the long folds of the crimson cloak—shone like a very marvel of splendour and colour.

The hostess was in the deepest despair. Everything had gone wrong in her kitchen. She had lost her spectacles, and boundless confusion filled the inn. The travellers pounded the table with the bell loudly; the fish pedlars laughed until they were half dead over the hares spread before them; the bewildered farmer tapped the landlady on the shoulder with the candlestick and puffed himself out like a turkey cock.

And amid all this maddening confusion Karen had disappeared. The postillion Anders sat on the driver's seat; the stable boy stood ready to open the door; the travellers in the mail coach were impatient, and so were the horses, although they had nothing pleasant to look forward to, and the wind rattled and whistled through the stable.

At last the conductor, for whom they were waiting, came out. He carried his mantle over his arm as he stepped into the coach, and excused his delay with a few curt words. He laughed to himself as he drew his cloak about him and took his seat. The door was closed, the mail coach rolled on.

Anders let the horses trot gently, now there was no more need to haste. From time to time he glanced slyly at the conductor, who still laughed to himself, while the wind ruffled his hair. The postillion laughed, too. He suspected something. The wind followed the coach to a turn in the road, then threw itself again over the plain and sighed mysteriously through the heather bushes.

Digitized by Google

When Karen returned to the inn parlour there was a glimmer of a smile on her lip, and once when she raised her eyes their light was dazzling. When she felt the men's eyes following her, she went into the next room where the travellers sat, pretending that she wanted some teaspoons from the cupboard.

"Did you notice the conductor?" asked one of them.

"No; not till he went out. He left very quickly," answered the other with his mouth full of roast hare.

"A very handsome fellow. I attended his wedding."

"So—is he married?"

"Yes, indeed; his wife is the daughter of the landlord at Ulstrup, and I got there the night of the wedding. That was a jolly time, I assure you. They have two children, I believe."

Karen dropped the teaspoons and went out. She heard nothing that was called after her from the inn. She went across the court to her room and began mechanically to tidy it up. Her eyes stared into the darkness. She pressed her hands to her head, to her breast, she groaned. She could comprehend nothing—nothing!

She heard the landlady's complaining voice: "Karen, dear Karen!" it called. She ran out across the court, behind the inn, across the moor.

The winding strip of grass glimmered in the half light as if it were a path, but it was no path. No one dared to follow it, for it led abruptly to the brink of the great pond. The hare quickened his steps. He heard a rustling. He gave long jumps as if he were mad to escape; not knowing what he, feared he fled over the plain.

The fox stretched out his sharp nose and stared in surprise at the hare. He had heard nothing! According to the instincts of his kind he had crouched there in the hollow—he was conscious of no terror. He could not understand the action of the hare. He stood long with outstretched head and slinking body. His bushy tail was hidden by the heather bushes, and he began to wonder if foxes were getting duller or hares wiser.

But when the first wind had run its long course it turned into a north wind, and then into an east wind, and then into the south wind, and at last came back over the sea as the west wind again, threw itself upon the dunes and long, mysterious sighs moaned through the heather bushes.

But there were wanting in Kraruper Inn two wondering grey eyes, a little blue woollen gown that had grown too small, and the hostess complained more than ever. She could not understand it at all. No one could understand it, save the postillion Anders, and one other.

Alexander Killam.

THE TALKING PICTURE.

It was quite remarkable to hear a picture talking, but my famous oil painting, "Sylla, the Queen of the Sea," certainly was speaking.

"Do you really think me beautiful?" she asked again, and I answered her this time, "Yes!"

That was a rational question and a rational answer, for she had been in the last exhibition of the Royal Academy, and I had been offered an extravagant sum for her.

"Why do you think me beautiful?" she asked. And as she spoke she drew one foot out of the water, and to my surprise, a few drops fell on the desk, wetting my papers and a half burnt cigar laying on a tray.

Had the would-be purchaser known how realistic the water in my picture was, he would undoubtedly have offered me a fabulous price for it.

"Why do I think you beautiful?" I said; "why, because I made you, of course."

"Yes," she answered, "I owe my existence to you." She put a beautiful foot on my desk and stepped completely out of the frame, then jumped lightly to the floor.

"Why did you dress me in this stuff?" she asked petulantly, pulling at the seaweed that partly adorned her figure, and leaning so closely over my shoulder that I seemed to feel how damp she was, and smelt what might be termed the salty freshness of the ocean.

"Seaweed becomes you," I answered, "but if you would like something different, I'll adorn you in a new dress when you get back into the frame."

It occurred to me at this stage of the interview that my wife, who was in the library, poring over a volume of Macaulay, might at any moment enter.

"I don't intend going back to the frame," Sylla said, as she pressed a damp kiss on my cheek. "I'm going to stay here with you."

The kiss ignited the powder of my passion, so to speak, and I instantly wished my wife in the scene where Macaulay's lays are laid.

Sylla wound a piece of seaweed round my right hand. "Do you remember," she murmured, "how you wondered whether you would make my eyes blue or green? Aren't you glad you made then blue, now?"

I looked into her eyes as she finished speaking, and my soul went to them.

"Now kiss me!" she commanded, like a cherub giving orders, and I did so.

Sylla commenced to feel what can only be termed kittenish, and slipped a bit of seaweed down my neck. "I don't think your wife at all pretty," she said.

"Neither do I," I answered recklessly, though my wife was the belle of the town she came from, but I could not see now where her beauty came in.

"I have seen you look at me for hours and hours," she went on, "long after you finished me. What made you do that?"

"I do that with lots of my pictures," I said; "it's a habit of mine; and, besides, I made you such a beautiful siren."

Digitized by Google

"Oh! but I'm not a siren," she said, "because sirens have no feelings, and I have!" In proof of which she burst out crying. "Look!" she exclaimed, "I am weeping pearls!" and, true enough, she was, for in an instant I was on my hands and knees picking them up.

"How many are there?" she asked. She was smiling now, and her eyes shone brighter for having wept.

I counted them over, greedily, I confess. "Forty-two!" Sorrow's gems indeed! Often had I seen my wife weep, but who ever thought of counting tears before?

"Let those be a marriage dowry," Sylla said, pointing to the pearls glistening in my outstretched hand, "for of course we are going to be married!"

Oh! of course! But there was my wife in the library—I would tell Sylla, and I told her.

The Queen of the Sea laughed. Such a laugh! The music caused by a southern wind caressing the strings of an Æolian harp alone may be compared with it.

"What business is it of your wife's?" Her voice for the first time sounded sharp, but it became soft in an instant. "You have made me to love! I know your wife has not such pretty arms as I have, nor such dainty hands. Your wife has not such soft cheeks,"—her own were against mine as she spoke—"nor such hair,"—her tresses caressed my neck as she trilled in my ears—"nor such love!"

"Where shall we get married?" I queried, with a vague remembrance of having asked the question before—somewhere.

"Why, down at the bottom of the sea," laughed Sylla. "You ought to know, you painted it."

I looked at my painting; it looked rather blank without Sylla. It must have been lonely for her, I reflected, in the water all by herself. No wonder she wanted company.

"I'd like to say good-bye to my wife," I confessed to Sylla; "she's been a true little woman and a good wife." Something like tears came to my eyes—though they were not pearls—and I felt like relenting.

Sylla's arms were round my neck the next moment. "Don't ever speak of your wife again! You know she compares with me about as well as a daisy does with a rose! Just leave the pearls on your desk for her. You know if you want any more you've only got to make me feel unhappy, and I'll give them to you. Now follow me!"

She was on the desk and had one foot in the picture when I heard a tap at the door. It was my wife rapping. How unfortunate! In another quarter of a minute I would have been at the bottom of the sea! I looked into Sylla's blue eyes for directions; she pointed to the water, and, clasping my hand, commenced to pull me towards her.

I got a sudden notion that I didn't wish to go with Sylla to the bottom of the sea at all, and pulled the other way. She grew furious and shook me violently, while the sea grew blacker and blacker. I felt I was giving way, when my head was suddenly jerked upward, and I opened my eyes.

* * * * *

My wife, who had aroused me, had a cup in her hands. "The doctor said the next time you went to sleep suddenly in your study you should take this," she said, handing me the cup.

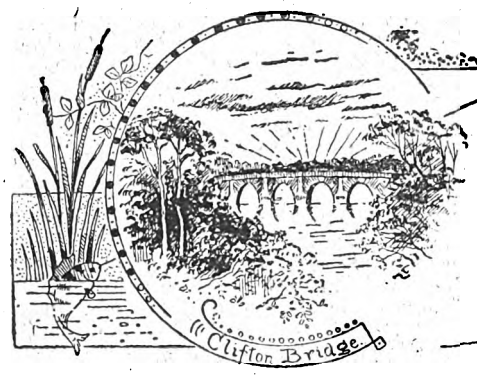
I had a better prescription than the doctor's. I sold my picture to the man who had so long begged to be its purchaser.

And I often wonder whether the Queen of the Sea has paid him a visit, or whether she intends doing so.

But then—he's a bachelor.

Arthur Lamb.

Digitized by Google



LITTLE JAN.

One night a man stopped me to ask for money to buy bread. There was such an earnestness in his voice and gestures that I questioned him. He was a man of fifty, ragged and pinched, and the story he told of looking for work in vain for weeks and weeks was no doubt true.

"The bread is not for me, but for little Jan," he explained when he saw that I was interested.

"And who is little Jan?"

"My little gal, sir—my gal Jan—the only one of the family left me. Wife dead—boy dead—only little Jan left, and she's sick and hungry. Poor dear!"

"And you and your daughter live alone, eh?"

"All alone—Jan and me. It's right down there, second turning on the right, and up six flights of stairs. Don't s'pose you'd care to come and see her, would you? It's hard climbing, but you'd see what poverty can do for a man when you get to the top of the house. Poor Jan—poor litt'e thing! It's hard to be ill and without food or medicine."

I took him to a grocer's, and we got bread and fruits and jellies and other things, and at every order he lifted up his hands and exclaimed:

"Good Lord, but to think of it! All this for dear little Jan—poor sick Jan! Why, sir, when she sees all these things she'll think Heaven has come down to her!"

It was a tenement of narrow passages and steep stairs and small rooms. There was the odour of sewer gas—the noisome smell of poverty whenever you find it. You felt the dampness, and you expected the faces peering at you to reflect the degradation of the place.

"You won't fail me, sir," whispered the man as we stood in the dimly-lighted doorway through which poverty had passed and repassed thousands of times.

"What do you mean?"

"You'll go up with me and see Jan and help me tell her all about it—poor gal!"

"Yes, I'll go up."

"And praise her, sir," he whispered as he put a hand on my arm, "and tell her she'll get well and better times will come. You'll find her sick and hungry, but you'll see a dear good gal, who'd die before she'd make a complaint."

At the third flight, where we halted for breath, he touched me again as if to make sure that I hadn't vanished, and whispered in my ear:

"Tell her that I'll soon find work, and things will go all right again. She's got a clean frock laid away in the chest, and perhaps you'll come some day and take her to the park. She knows how I love her, but you can say a word or two about that if you will. Poor little Jan—poor little gal!"

At his door, on the fourth floor, we waited for a moment, and he gripped my arm and put his mouth close to my ear to whisper:

"She's waiting for me to come home with a stale loaf, and here we've got all that a rich man would want for his dinner. She'll laugh and cry, and want to kiss you, and please don't mind it! Stand here in the door till I light the bit of candle."

He went in on tip-toe and struck a match and lighted the piece of candle standing in a broken cup on the table. Then he beckoned to me, and as I softly entered he picked up the light and said:

"Little Jan is asleep! Ain't she a brave gal not to cry at the darkness when left alone? Come over, and we'll wake her up and tell her the good news."

We went over to the bed of rags, and in the dim light of the candle I saw a skeleton form with ghostly face lying on the old pieces of quilt and carpet. Hands which had wasted away to mere claws were folded across the child's breast, and her sunken eyes were tightly closed.

"Jan! Jan!" whispered the father as he bent over her.

She made no move in response.

"Poor Jan—poor little gal! She is ill and hungry and does not hear me. Jan, father is home—open your eyes!"

There was not the slightest movement from the wasted form on the bed, and the man turned to me and said:

"Poor Jan—how sound she sleeps!"

"Jan is asleep in death," I answered.

"What! Jan dead—Jan dead here in the darkness and alone!" he almost shouted as he laid a hand on her head.

"Even so. See! She passed away without a struggle. Your Jan will never know sickness and hunger again."

It was so. Her body was growing cold to the touch. Lying there on that bed of rags, with the darkness shutting her in and no human being within call, she had welcomed the coming of death with a smile, and sang in the gladness of her heart as the angels bore her through the valley of the shadow to the eternal sunshine beyond.

"And she is dead—Jan is dead!" whispered the father.

"Yes, poor child!"

He sat down on a chair with his face to the wall, and rocked his body to and fro and moaned and wept. So I left him and stole quietly down the dark and narrow stairs and out into the night. It were better thus, for what could I say to comfort him?

Ashby. Rees.

Digitized by Google

A propos of the notice which appeared in last week's S.S., I now publish a letter from Mr. John Kirk, which gives full particulars regarding the Fund in the twenty-five centres which are included this year.

DEAR MR. PEARSON.—The success and development of the FRESH AIR FUND must be very gratifying to you and to your sympathetic readers. It says much also for the initial scheme projected six years ago, that it has required little or no alterations in its extension throughout the country.

We had in our minds, if you remember, primarily, the little East-enders of London. Now the Fund has become firmly rooted in most of the great cities of the United Kingdom.

Once again it has been my privilege to share with your good secretary, Mr. Kessell, in visiting or communicating with the different committees and friends responsible for the administration of the FRESH AIR FUND in the several localities.

We have found everywhere an increasing eagerness to share in the Fund, and a growing appreciation of its benefits. Further, we have been charged with grateful expressions of thanks to yourself, and your generous-minded contributors.

Acting on your authority, we have provisionally promised the numbers hereunder stated for the ensuing summer. Opposite each town is given the names of the secretaries or correspondents representing the various committees.

Assuredly your earnest intentions on behalf of the poorer little children of our great towns will be as heartily seconded by your readers as in past years.

This is the sincere wish of the voluntary workers in London and elsewhere, who will be only too glad, one and all, to co-operate with you for another season in making the youngsters supremely happy by at least one day's fresh air in the country.

Yours faithfully,

John Kirk

Here is a list of the 25 towns from which the children will be sent during the coming season:

ABERDEEN.—2,000 Children.
A. J. McConnochie, C.A., Sec. Children's Fresh Air Fortnight, 74 Union Street, Aberdeen.

BIRMINGHAM.—5,000 Children.
George Skipway, Sunday School Union, 2 Temperance Institute, Corporation Street.

BELFAST.—4,000 Children.
W. J. W. Roome, Whitehall Buildings, Ann Street.

BLACKBURN.—2,000 Children.
J. T. Walkden, Ragged School, Victoria Court, Ainsworth Street.

BRISTOL.—2,500 Children.
George Clayton, 59 Cromwell Road.

BRADFORD.—2,000 Children.
Thos. Newbould, Cinderella Club, 8 Rand Street.

BOLTON.—2,000 Children.
J. Popplewell, 9 Pool Street.

CARDIFF.—2,000 Children.
G. Percy Thomas, 72 Claude Road.

DUBLIN.—2,500 Children.
A. J. Nicholls, L.L.B., The Castle, Dublin.

DUNDEE.—2,000 Children.
R. C. Campbell, Free Breakfast Mission, 12 Victoria Chambers.

EDINBURGH.—2,000 Children.
Thos. Davidson, 18 Granville Terrace.

GATESHEAD.—2,000 Children.
J. H. Watson, Poor Children's Holiday Association, 140 Sidney Grove.

GLASGOW.—5,000 Children.
A. McCracken, 40 St. Vincent Place.

HULL.—2,000 Children.
J. B. Anderson, Poor Children's Holiday Association, 3 Junction Place, Queen's Dockside.

LEEDS.—3,000 Children.
John W. Hives, 6 Lyddon Terrace.

LEICESTER.—2,000 Children.
H. Lawrence, Ragged School Mission, Lynton, St. James's Road.

LIVERPOOL.—5,000 Children.
E. W. Cropper. Ragged School Union, 3 Harkins Hey.

LONDON.—40,000 Children.
John Kirk, Ragged School Union, 37 Norfolk Street, Strand.

MANCHESTER.—5,000 Children.
W. E. Rowcliffe, 30 Cross Street, and J. P. Reid, Hon Sec. Ragged School Union.

NOTTINGHAM.—2,000 Children.
F. W. Dobson, Queen's Road.

NEWCASTLE.—2,000 Children.
J. H. Watson, Poor Children's Holiday Association, 140 Sidney Grove.

OLDHAM.—2,000 Children.
R. Peacock, Poor Children's Holiday Fund, Chief Constable's Office.

PORTSMOUTH.—2,000 Children.
B. Tilly, Lonsdale, Cottage Grove, Southsea (Ragged School).

SHEFFIELD.—3,000 Children.
W. H. Totterdill, Poor Children's Holiday Association, 81 Douglas Road.

SUNDERLAND.—2,000 Children.
Mr., Alderman Bruce (Mayor), 64 Nile Street.

Digitized by Google

Serial Story.

A TALE OF OLD FRANCE.

By MARY FERMOR.

SUMMARY.

Amaury Montruel, a knight, and Mahmoud-el-Reis, a Saracen, meet on the road to Paris. The former's mission is to kill the Queen of France; the latter's to kill the King. At the same time two children, Eric and Eve, are on their way to Paris to aid the Queen, and overhear the conversation of these two horsemen. Shortly afterwards a knight and his page give the children a lift on the road, and, on arriving at Paris, place them under the care of the Freemasons. Maître Samson, Montruel's secretary, tries to induce Tristan de Pamiers, king of the law students, to raise a rebellion in favour of Agnes de Méranie against Philip's consort, Queen Ingeburge. Albret, the King's page, takes Eve, alias Little Adam, to the King, who gives her permission to visit Ingeburge in her captivity in the Abbey St. Martin. Meanwhile Agnes de Méranie pays a visit to Notre Dame with Amaury Montruel, and stills the ominous cries of the people by distributing among them her paste jewels. In the cathedral she meets Mahmoud-el-Reis, who is carving a figure of the Virgin, and tries to win his regard by presenting him with pearls, which he crushes under his feet when she has gone.

CHAPTER VII.

Captain Cadocu Bars the Way.

While Madame Agnes and Amaury Montruel were in the cathedral, noise and turmoil continued to reign outside. As the evening advanced the masons prepared to leave work, the stall-keepers and itinerant vendors packed up their goods, and the beggars crept off one by one either to haunt the dark alleys through the night in search of plunder, or to sleep in the fetid dens they called home.

Poor Eric returned to his lodgings with a heavy heart, full of anxiety for his sister, of whom he had seen and heard nothing since she had left him early that morning.

When Agnes de Méranie had regained her negligent escort (for, with the exception of Montruel, none of them had troubled themselves to come to her assistance in the crowd) they all started on their way back to the Louvre, but as they were riding across the top of the Rue de la Calandre, the Duke of Burgundy, who headed the cortége, found his way barred by a troop of armed men, who were shouting snatches of drinking-songs and waving their unlighted torches in the air.

"Give place, varlets!" cried the Duke, with his hand on his sword.

"Oh, oh!" said a jovial voice. "Here is one of my noble companions of the night before last! Welcome, my lord Duke, do you not recognise your fellow-guest?"

"Let us pass, or we'll ride you down!" and the Duke drove the spurs into his horse's sides. The next moment he felt the beast stagger and fall beneath him. It had been stabbed in the withers, and died instantaneously.

"I don't like killing good horses," said the same voice out of the growing darkness, "but I had not the conscience to kill you, my lord, for such an idle threat."

Burgundy was on the ground, struggling vainly to disentangle himself from the stirrups and trappings of his dead steed, but he shouted furiously:

"Charge those villains and cut them down to a man!"

A derisive laugh from the festive band greeted these wild words, but not a man moved to obey the Duke's command, for the whisper had gone round that seemingly gallant train:

"The Free-lances! The Free-lances!"

Montruel pressed close to Agnes and whispered:

"This man must be won at any cost. He is the Captain of the Free-lances. All the others are useless without him!"

The leader of the troop laughed louder than all the rest, but he was not malicious, for he bent down and gave the unlucky Duke a helping hand to rise, saying as he did so:

"Ouf! You are heavy, my lord Duke, and laughing makes me weak! So you wanted to cut me to pieces? Is that the way you pay your debts?"

"It's that scoundrel Cadocu!" cried one of the nobles. "And he's drunk to boot!"

In spite of their brave display, these haughty barons made no attempt to force a passage, and it was well they did not do so, for fresh contingents had emerged from the neighbouring taverns, and the air resounded with the clatter of swords and the clinking of spurs.

"How much would it take to buy this man?" asked Agnes, whose mind was running more on personal schemes than the present danger.

Montruel told her of the sum promised to Cadocu by the Legate, and that the King had doubled it.

"What? the King offered him two hundred thousand crowns?" she said angrily. "But that is our money; what is to become of me if the finances are squandered in this mad fashion?"

The Captain of the Free-lances now ordered the torches to be lighted, and his orders, unlike those of Burgundy, were obeyed immediately. The flaring, lurid light illumined a strange scene. There in the cross-roads stood that glittering throng of courtiers and nobles, each with a frown on his brow and an impotent oath in his heart, making a pretence of protecting fine ladies pale with fright, all held at bay by a handful of men, whose coarse, rugged features were mostly relaxed by a half-drunken smile.

Cadocu advanced holding a torch in his hand.

"Come, my lords, you've not forgotten our meeting the other night, and if my friend Jean de Nesle is here, I'm sure he will have a word for his comrade Antoine."

Digitized by Google

"Good evening, friend Antoine!" said Jean de Nesle promptly; "you have been supping freely I note, so I'm sure you will not have the heart to stop us any longer from doing likewise."

"If ever I catch you near Dijon, my man, you shall pay for this night's work!" hissed the Duke of Burgundy through his white, trembling lips.

"All right, my lord Duke; I'm glad to hear you talk of paying, for there is that little matter of thirty thousand crowns which the King taxed you with on my behalf, and, moreover, you owe me humble thanks for not having made myself Duke of Burgundy that night as I might have done, and then what would you have been to-day, eh?"

Agnes de Méranie was still counting the cost of Antoine Cadocu.

"If I sold all my castles and my jewels, I could not raise enough to buy this man," she said at last petulantly.

"I will help you, my Queen," said Montruel, and then he enumerated the various sources from which he could draw funds to assist her, but she barely heard him. She was thinking of another way to buy this costly adherent.

"My lord," she broke in suddenly, "I must see this man!"

"You, madame——?" he stammered.

"Yes, I. And I must see him to-night, at your house!"

"But, madame, it is unheard of—it is—still my presence will lessen the danger."

"And I must see him alone!" she added imperiously.

Montruel made no answer, he knew her mood too well to oppose it.

"Come along, my boys," cried Cadocu. "I've still a few coins in my purse, and the tavern keeper of St. Landry knows me well enough. I will give you credit, my lord Duke, till to-morrow, and Jean de Nesle shall go to his supper! Pass on, my good sirs, unless you will follow me to François Gauthier's and quaff a cup of good wine to your fair ladies' health?"

"Another time, friend Antoine," said Jean de Nesle, who was the only one who could speak civilly to this daring knave.

Cadocu jumped up on to a mile-stone at the corner of the street and gave an imperious sign to his men, who promptly drew up in single file in front of the houses, so that, save for the mocking jeers of the Free-lances, they might have been placed there as a guard of honour to the cavalcade.

"Oh, oh!" cried the Captain as he spied the ladies in the train, "the noble Duke did not tell us this!"

He was a fine, stalwart fellow, with a cheery, open countenance, and every woman's eye rested on him as they passed.

"Jean de Nesle," he called out, "is Madame Agnes among this fair bevy?"

Jean de Nesle was out of hearing, but Maître Samson, who believed in making powerful friends whenever he could, pointed her out to Cadocu, who rose on tiptoes to see her better.

"Umph! She's with that blackguard Montruel," he muttered. "I've heard something of that affair! They told me she was like that poor girl Agnes the Fair, whom that cur had put out of the way; and, pardieu, they spoke the truth—they're as like as two peas!"

At this moment Agnes de Méranie passed in front of him. She had heard his question, and her face was flushed—not in anger, but with pleasure at the promise of success afforded to her plans by his curiosity. She was bent on saving the two hundred thousand crowns, so she gave him a most radiant smile and a gracious little inclination of the head.

"Peste," he said to himself, for he was susceptible to feminine charms, "my little Agnes herself couldn't smile sweeter than that."

While he was reflecting on her attractions and condescension, she was whispering her imperative commands to Montruel, who fell back, and allowed the procession to go on without him.

"Now, mates, let us go and spend the night right merrily! Thank goodness, we've drunk enough to make that villain Gauthier's wine taste like nectar! En route!"

The men needed no second bidding, and soon the Captain was left, as he thought, alone in the deserted street, when he felt a hand on his arm. He turned round to find Amaury Montruel at his elbow.

"You here?" he said shortly. "Diable, you'd better go elsewhere, I can tell you! I was fond of that poor girl you had murdered yesterday, and I hate gentlemen rogues who Found his way barred by a troop of armed men.

Digitized by Google

pay poor men to do their dirty work while they themselves won't run the risk of fair fight."

"It doesn't matter in the least to me what you like or hate, Maître Antoine," replied Montruel coolly, for, like most of his contemporaries, he was not wanting in physical courage. "I am here to deliver a message to you. Will you listen to it?"

"And you'd give the eyes out of your head if I'd say no! You'd like to go back and say, 'I've done my part, but he won't listen.' But I'll hear what you've got to say in the tavern yonder, not here in the street, and you can drink a cup of wine on your own account if you like, but, by the Foul Fiend, I'll not stain my lips by drinking with such as you!"

"That is, as well; for Amaury Montruel would never stoop to touch glasses with Antoine Cadocu."

The Captain of the Free-lances started and laid his hand on his sword, but his companion merely shrugged his shoulders and faced him with folded arms.

"Pardieu! I'm playing the part of the Duke of Burgundy, for I touch the hilt and don't draw sword! But follow me, my lord Montruel, and when I've heard your message we can discuss other things."

The Free-lances had already begun their revels, and a noise that would have done justice to Pandemonium greeted the arrival of their chief and his unwilling guest.

The tavern of St. Landry was a large, low room, which was approached by descending several steps cut in the soft earth and kept in their place by some mouldy pieces of wood.

There was a torch fixed in the middle of the cellar, for it was little else, and a small boy was deputed to shake it from time to time when it burnt low, while a few rush-lights dotted about on the tables cast their flickering beams across the vault-like chamber, whose farther recesses concealed heaps of dirt and refuse both animate and inanimate. As soon as the well-known figure of the chief appeared at the top of the steps, a number of girls rushed towards him and gave him a boisterous welcome. One sweet voice dominated the rest, and its owner, a girl of remarkable beauty, was the first to reach Cadocu and throw her arms round his neck.

"Hola, you scoundrels! do you want all your heads breaking?"

"Good evening, Catherine, my beauty!" he said affectionately.

"Are you going to dance and sing now?" she asked eagerly.

"Not just yet, my lass; we must drink a little first, for I've got to talk business with this gentleman here, so, my dears, you must be quiet for a little while."

The wild troop dispersed into the other parts of the building, and though it could not be called quiet, still there was less noise than when first they had entered.

François Gauthier, the master of this unruly establishment, was a powerfully built, red-faced man between fifty and sixty.

He nodded to Cadocu and asked what wine he should bring.

"A flagon for me," said Antoine.

"Shall I bring two goblets?"

"One is enough," replied Montruel curtly.

"He doesn't drink much, then," grumbled the host to himself, then turning to Cadocu, he added meaningly:

"Look here, friend Antoine, the King has encouraged all sorts of lazy fellows and spies in the city, and everyone knows there are swarms of them about."

Montruel sat with his head erect, humming a drinking song to himself, and seeming to take no heed of the fellow's insolence.

"Never mind, François, you go and get my wine and leave this gentleman to manage his own affairs. Upon my soul, he was not far wrong either, my lord," he added when the host had left them. "However, I think a little less badly of you than I did, for I noticed you turned pale when you came into my den."

"If I did so it was because my nose is not used to such foul air and filthy smells. But let us get through our business as quickly as possible."

"If the King has chosen him, he must be worth something," thought Cadocu. "Ah! here comes the wine! Now I'm at your service, my lord."

CHAPTER VIII.

Madame Agnes Receives an Invitation.

Montruel was sitting with both his elbows on the table, and if he did not show fear, he certainly betrayed unmistakeable signs of embarrassment; in fact, he seemed quite at a loss how to begin his unpleasant task, but at last he jerked out:

"I have come to you from the Queen."

"Which Queen?"

"I speak of Madame Agnes, of course!"

"Oh, indeed! So you call her the Queen, do you? Well, the Council will set all that straight for us. I half suspected that you came from Madame Agnes. What does she want with me?"

"She wants to see you."

"Ah, she shows her good taste. I was just thinking I should like to see her myself."

Montruel's face became livid, and he drove his nails into the palms of his hands to prevent himself from doing violence to this man. The one ruling passion of his life was love for Agnes de Méranie. Anything that touched her cut him to the quick, and there was a contemptuous ring in Cadocu's voice that made his blood boil.

"Then it will not be difficult to arrange," he said in a hard, constrained tone.

"Probably not. You made a fool of yourself over the other Agnes because she was like Madame de Méranie, so you can understand that I have a fancy to see the Queen, as you call her, because she's like the poor dead girl I was fond of."

Digitized by Google

The noise at the other end of the room had become deafening, men were shouting, women shrieking, metal drinking cups were being flung upon the floor as soon as emptied, while ominous groans came from several who would gladly have quitted the scene if anyone could have been found to carry them.

"Hola, you scoundrels! do you all want your heads breaking? I told you to be quiet for a time, and the time's not up yet!" shouted Cadocu in his stentorian voice, enforced by the banging of his empty flagon on the table.

This little diversion gave Montruel time to recover from the last nasty remark, so he went on coldly:

"As the Queen wishes to see you, and you wish to see her, my task is done. She awaits you now at my house."

"At your house? Parbleu! then King Philip has not such sharp eyes as men give him credit for!" said Cadocu jeeringly.

"Answer me! Will you come?"

The Captain of the Free-lances bent forward and whispered a few words into Montruel's ear, which must have been of unparalleled insolence, for he started to his feet as if he had been stung, and strode towards the door without sign or sound.

Cadocu went off into a roar of laughter, and, holding his sides, rocked to and fro on his chair.

"I've hit him hard this time!" he chuckled. "I just touched his soft spot, the mean cur! Stop, my lord," he called to Montruel. "You've not given me your answer; but if you think better of it, you'll find me here till daybreak, getting more drunk every hour."

No answer was vouchsafed to him, so he turned to the girls, saying:

"Now, my beauties, the fun begins! You can dance, sing, drink, shout, fight, or make love if you like, so long as you're jolly. Here, Catherine, my sweetheart, fetch me another cup of wine."

Agnes de Méranie, the chosen wife of Philip Augustus, King of France, was alone in the house of Amaury Montruel, sitting in the very room where he had given audience to La Fontanelle, and where Agnes the Fair had betrayed the fatal knowledge that had proved her own undoing.

She had been waiting some time for Amaury's return, and her mobile features wore an expression of feverish impatience.

"What would the King say?" she murmured. "He is waiting for me, looking for me, and—perhaps already suspecting me!"

She shuddered at this last thought, but it was only for a second, and she went on with a complacent smile:

"What matter if he did? I could throw dust in his eyes easily enough! And even if he were jealous, he would only love me the more."

She was lying back in Amaury's favourite chair, with every nerve strained to catch the first sound of approaching footsteps. Her dark eyes shone dangerously in the dim lamp-light, and the strong, fierce passions, which she generally contrived to conceal under a mask of playful coquetry, were now having full play in face and figure. She was like a young lioness watching for her prey.

The church clocks struck nine. Her restlessness increased.

"He has not come yet, and the Porte St. Honoré will be closed. How shall I get back into the Louvre, or explain my absence? The fool! what can he be doing?"

She began to walk about the room, working her fingers convulsively, and muttering imprecations upon her tardy messenger. Suddenly she stopped, and, thinking someone was coming, she pushed aside a heavy curtain and entered a small, luxuriously appointed room, in which hung a large polished steel mirror. It was evident that Madame Agnes was no stranger in this house of Amaury Montruel.

Pushed aside a heavy curtain.

Taking up a small lamp, she began to arrange her somewhat disordered toilet, pausing now and then to study some pose of head or hand, some attitude which displayed her womanly charms to advantage; and the study of herself, now unadorned by any jewel, seemed to thrill her with pride and sensuous delight.

"He will not be able to resist me! This uncouth soldier shall succumb to my beauty, and leave this house as much my slave as is its master!"

Still no one came. And the mysterious fear of her rival's unseen power began to torment her.

"If Mahmoud dare not kill her, this Cadocu shall do it at my bidding. I will be Queen in spite of her, and all the thunders of the Church! And when I am once acknowledged, my hand shall fall heavily on those who have dared to slight me. Amaury Montruel has served me well, but—what shall I do with him then? I shall not want him any longer, and he might be inconvenient, he loses his head sometimes. Well, many a one has broken the ladder by which he has scaled the wall, and—they are wise to do so. They say he killed that girl because she knew his secret—he knows mine—what if I follow his example?"

A door banged, and hasty steps were heard coming towards the room.

"At last!" she said, "they are coming."

Montruel flung open the door and entered alone. He crossed to where she was sitting. His face was white and drawn, his eyes looked glassy, and though his lips moved, no sound came from them.

"Well?" she asked angrily. "Can't you speak? Speak! I tell you!" she almost shrieked, stamping her foot.

"Why have you come alone? By the saints! I believe you've dared to disobey me!"

At last the answer came in a low, strained voice:

"No, madame, I have seen him."

"And you told him I desired to see him?"

"I said the Queen desired his presence."

"And yet he is not here! Amaury, you are lying to me!" she exclaimed savagely. "I am a woman, and I saw the look he gave me. He would not refuse! You are lying, I tell you again."

Base and degraded as he was, Amaury Montruel blushed for this woman he loved so madly, and who was so lost to all sense of shame for herself. He turned from her almost in disgust.

"Answer me, sir; did he refuse or not?"

"For your sake, madame, I had rather a thousand times that he had refused."

Digitized by Google

"Then he has not refused after all? Why did you torture me so, Amaury? It was cruel of you," she added with a swift change of manner.

"But he is not coming."

Her brows contracted again, and her fingers plucked at the lace on her dress till she had torn it to shreds.

Montruel had not been afraid of Codocu, but he quailed before Agnes de Méranie.

"Listen, my Queen," he said pleadingly, "and you shall hear all, if you desire, but I would gladly have spared you the details of this hateful interview."

She made a sign of acquiescence, and he sat down opposite her. With manifest reluctance, he told her all that had happened since they had parted, even to Cadocu's insulting remarks about her being where she was at that minute. He told her of the man's insolent wish to see her, at which her eyes brightened, and then he hesitated. His lips would not utter the final insult with which he had been stung; but she interrupted him by:

"I guess what's coming."

Amaury looked at her in open-eyed wonderment. There was no trace of anger in her face, she was brimming over with merriment. Would he never know this woman?

"The saucy knave said he would not come to me, but I might go to him! Isn't that it?" she asked, rubbing her hands.

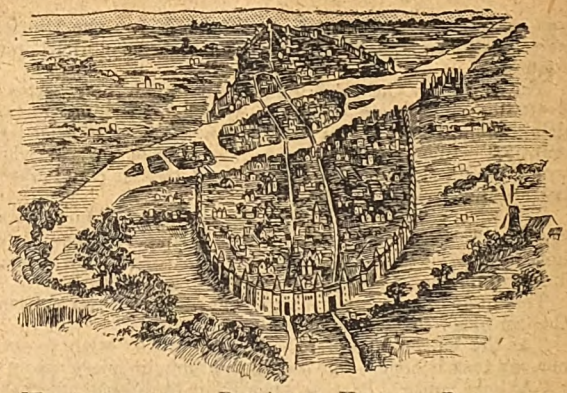
"That is not all, Madame, it is worse than that."

"Worse than that? Well, then, I give it up! Tell me quickly—I am sick of this suspense!"

"Madame," he resumed gravely, "I am sure you will share my anger when I tell you that Antoine does not await you in his own house—and that would have been bad enough, Heaven knows—but, at least, there would have been some privacy. No, he dare to ask the Queen of France to pollute her feet by crossing the threshold of the filthy den where he and his ribald crew hold their drunken revels!"

Agnes sprang to her feet and seized her ermine mantle.

His hands fell to his sides, and his breath came in quick, short gasps.



[The above is a Bird's-eye View of Paris under Philip Augustus during the period at which the events mentioned in this story take place.—Ed.]

Montruel continued, feeling thankful that at last her pride was roused:

"In that loathsome, reeking tavern of St. Landry, full of foul-mouthed wretches and the off-scourings of the earth."

She had fastened her mantle and was preparing to leave the house as he continued to dilate upon the horrors he had witnessed.

"Are you ready, my Queen?" he asked tenderly, with a proud glance at her resolute face. "May I have the honour of conducting you to the Louvre?"

She gave a short, hard laugh, and said mockingly:

"You may have the honour of conducting me to the St. Landry tavern, my lord!"

Amaury staggered back as if she had struck him. His hands fell to his sides, and his breath came in quick, short gasps.

"Come, come, Sir Amaury; we are losing time. You have painted the picture in such glowing colours that I am quite anxious to see it for myself. You shall take me there, and while I am amusing myself with Captain Cadocu, you shall keep watch for me outside the door, so your delicate senses will not be outraged by the foul sights and smells!"

She turned to the door, and he had no choice but to follow her. They traversed the narrow, filthy streets in silence, for her brain was busy weaving schemes of conquest, and his heart was heavy with shame and torn by conflicting pangs of jealousy and love for the woman he could not even yet wholly despise.

(To be continued.)

THE WORLD OF DRESS.

Edited by Mrs. ARIA.

Published by C. Arthur Pearson Limited.

Monthly, 1s.; Subscription, 12s. a year, post free.

The World of Dress will contain the Latest Fashion News in Paris, Vienna, New York, and London. Theatrical Dress in these cities will be largely dealt with, for it is on the stage that the changes of Fashion are first noted. A special feature each month will be an Interview with a Leading Costumier in one of those cities, who will specially design for The World of Dress one of the Coloured Plates which will be presented with each copy every month.

NO. 1 READY ON MARCH 31ST.

Digitized by Google

THE BARON'S LOVE STORY.

A True Tale of the Guiana Hinterland.

The incidents I am about to relate occurred in the year 1815. The strange disappearance of the young Baron von Halsbeck did not attract so much attention as it would have done under ordinary circumstances, because the colony was engaged at the time in speculating on European affairs; and the news of the Baron having been lost in the bush arrived in Georgetown on the very day on which a vessel from Barbados brought the news of the battle of Waterloo, and the breaking, once for all, of Napoleon's power.

The Baron was one of a party of orchid-hunters. He became separated from his companions during a terrible storm and was regarded as lost. The narrative of his adventures were set forth in a worm-eaten manuscript now in the possession of a member of the family.

After a long description of the storm, and his futile endeavours to find his companions, the narrative is continued in the following manner.

THE NARRATIVE OF BARON VON HALSBECK.

Worn out with hunger and fatigue, and disheartened by the knowledge that I was hopelessly separated from my party, I made a rough couch of dry leaves and forest tangle, and lay down to sleep. I was awakened by a small piece of wood striking me on the chest, and, on opening my eyes, I saw standing in front of me, about twenty paces distant, a short, thick-set Indian, who was watching me with the greatest interest.

He continued to stare at me as I rose and brushed away a few leaves that clung to my clothes, but on my trying to approach him he bounded away with great speed. Fortunately, I was more or less acquainted with several Indian dialects, and I was able to make myself understood.

"Do not be afraid," I said; "I am not come to hurt you; I am lost, and desire food."

"Whence come you?" he answered.

"For fifty days I have journeyed from the sea, and now I am lost, and am alone."

"What do you seek here?"

"I seek but to see your country and go my way again."

After saying this, I took off my belt to which were attached my pistols and threw it behind me, with the object of reassuring the man; but he took no notice of my action, and I concluded that he had never before seen firearms.

"Follow me," the man said.

I picked up my belt and made to catch up with him, but he waved me back, and so I kept about twenty paces behind him. We travelled thus for about three hours, the man continually looking behind him to see that I was not getting too close to him.

At length we came to a spot where a rocky plateau with precipitous sides barred further progress. The man faced me and told me to remain where I was until he returned.

He then skirted round the base of the plateau, and was soon out of sight.

I sat down on a fallen tree-trunk and waited. After about an hour the man returned, accompanied by two other men, one very old and the other a heavy, muscular fellow about thirty years of age. This last one was armed with a large wooden club. The three men were clothed alike, in a belt of some rough material woven out of grass.

On seeing me, the new-comers showed great signs of astonishment, and a short argument took place between them and my discoverer.

Presently my conductor addressed me.

"Say, will you come with us, or shall we give you food and let you depart? If you come with us there is no going back."

This strange offer excited my curiosity, and, depending on my ingenuity to extricate me from any position I might subsequently be placed in, I replied:

"Take me with you to your people. I am content."

They blindfolded me with leaves, and the muscular man took my hand and led me. We marched for about an hour by circuitous paths, and crossed two streams, the one coming up to our knees and the other up to our waists. At length, after making a sharp and difficult ascent, we walked for about ten minutes on level ground, and then the bandage was taken from my eyes.

Digitized by Google

A curious scene presented itself. I stood in the midst of a circle of small houses, about twenty in number, inclosing an open space free of all weeds and grass, and trodden quite smooth and hard. In the centre of this space was a large rock about ten feet high, in the form of a rude four-sided column; it was covered with curious figures and signs deeply cut into its surface.

I was led to a small house, and was given to understand that it was intended for my own use. Later on, food was brought me—roast flesh and cassava bread. During the course of the day I moved freely about the village, and found that the people spoke a dialect with which I was acquainted. Towards evening I felt inclined to walk in the woods, and, taking one of the two paths which led through the village, I followed it. Before I had gone a hundred yards I was met by a man who pointed to the village and told me to return. He would listen to no argument, but threatened to kill me if I did not go back. It was evident that I was a prisoner.

At night-time a lighted torch was brought into my house, and a young girl fetched me food and water. This girl was called Bian, and during the whole of my captivity she waited on me. She was always at hand, now silent, now full of interesting talk about her people.

I found out exactly how I was situated. The people among whom I had fallen were called Barawois, and were the remnant of a once powerful tribe. Many years before, the tribe, which at that time lived about a hundred miles south-east of its present station, had been set upon by strange Indians, and, with the exception of about forty persons, entirely destroyed. This remnant, after many hardships, had at length discovered the spot which was still its home, and had continued to live there entirely cut off from the world. They worshipped a graven image, and offered up human sacrifices to it.

Each year two virgins were set aside and confined in a special house. One of these were destined to be offered up as a sacrifice. The girls were set aside on the day following the annual ceremony, and were treated with the greatest care after their withdrawal from the rest of the tribe. Should either of the girls die during the year, the remaining one was sacrificed; if both were alive on the day preceding the sacrifice, the choice was made in a manner I will describe later. The one whose fortune it was to be rejected, resumed her ordinary life in the tribe.

The victim was offered up in the following way: She was given a bunch of brilliant flowers, and holding this in one hand, was led by the chief of the tribe to the side of the river. Arrived there, a tree trunk was thrown across to the small ledge where the burnt sacrifice was daily offered up, and along this the girl passed. She then walked out to the small point of rock at the edge of the chasm, and stood with her back to the statue while the preparations were being made.

The mode of sacrifice was very strange. A large stone was secured in a sling of grass-rope, the ends of the sling being fastened to tree stumps on either side of the river.

The centre of this sling was braced up by a rope, which was fastened round the beckoning hand of the statue. As the tree stumps were situated some distance further down stream than the statue, the stone, on being released, swung outward, with great force, and precipitated the victim into the awful abyss beyond.

The way of releasing this horrid messenger of death was also strange. A fire, consisting of twenty-four sticks, was lighted under the rope which held back the stone, and it was at the moment that the fire burnt through the rope sufficiently to allow the strain to tear it apart that the victim was hurled into the chasm. There was just a possibility that the fire would not burn through the rope. In the event of this occurring the girl was taken back into the tribe and given the curious privilege of choosing any man in the tribe for her husband, being treated moreover with the greatest consideration for the rest of her days.

That day I learnt that I should not be allowed to depart, lest I betrayed their hiding place; that I must become one of them and marry one of their maidens.

I settled down among these people with a conviction that I would be able to make my escape as soon as it no longer suited me to remain with them. But as the weeks passed it became evident to me that nothing short of a miracle would enable me to leave the tribe. Sentinels were posted at the only places where descent from the plateau was thought possible, and only on one occasion in the year—the evening of the great sacrifice—were these men ever absent from their posts, and then it was but for half an hour. To this must be added the fact that I was in an unknown country and unprovided with a guide or the necessary stock of food.

One evening, as I passed the house of the two girls chosen for the next sacrifice, I saw one of them. The girl was, I should judge, about seventeen years of age. Her form was of the most perfect symmetry, slender and graceful and full of the most delicate, tender lines, giving her whole figure an air of gentle, budding womanhood, charming beyond the power of words to express. Her face was not less pleasing than her form. Her eyes were large and set well apart, her forehead low and broad, her nose small and slightly aquiline. Her mouth was exquisitely shaped. Add to this, long, coarse, black hair, a skin of a rich golden-brown colour, and you have before you Opaie, the sacrifice.

That night I questioned Bian about the girl I had seen.

"She of whom you speak is my sister Opaie," she said. "She is a virgin set aside for sacrifice."

"My people," I said, "when they see a woman like that, reserve for her a better fate than that she should be offered up to please a graven image whose eyes are blind and who knows naught of the beauty of woman."

"Well, Kaboot, (white man) it may be that the other one, Malkoona, will be chosen."

"And then Opaie would be free?"

"She would be free, but the chief Petarie, would then take her for his wife. I know his heart in the matter."

"But I, Bian, have other plans for thy sister, and it shall be seen who is stronger, I or thy chief Petarie."

But Bian laughed at me and said: "Kaboot, thou art indeed a fool, for all thy fair skin and golden hair."

But a fixed determination had seized me. If I was indeed to remain all my life among these people, I would, at any cost, have Opaie for my wife.

From the day on which I saw Opaie I sought every opportunity of speaking with her. I had become fairly proficient in the language of the Barawois, and so by using great precautions I succeeded in establishing an understanding with Opaie. As the months passed I was fortunately able to win Bian over to my plans, and she promised to help me in any way she could when the time came.

Digitized by Google

Opaie was by no means so indifferent to her fate as her sister had represented her to be when I had first spoken on the subject to her. And at last, after much careful thought, we arranged a plan, the successful carrying out of which would set Opaie free and leave me master of the situation.

The plan which we eventually decided on was this: If Malkoona did not die (Opaie's death was never thought of, so far removed did death seem from such perfection of life), then the selection of victims would take place. If Malkoona were chosen, well and good. In that case, I was to shoot Petarie (I had powder and shot in my belt, which had not been taken from me) and rely on the effect produced by my pistol to insure my subsequent safety.

If, on the other hand, Opaie was chosen, the position would be far more serious. The Barawois were intensely superstitious, and no pistol-shots would save the victim from the sacrifice. Strategy was the only method which offered any hopes of success if Opaie were chosen as the victim.

There was the chance, of course, that the wood might not burn, but in the event of it showing signs of becoming consumed, we arranged with Bian that, at a signal from me, she was to cause a diversion from the business in hand by raising a great outcry on the other side of the village, calling out that strangers were attacking the place, and Opaie and I, profiting by the confusion that would ensue, were to make away to a spot fixed upon by Bian, who knew the country round the base of the plateau very well. Bian was to join us at this post as soon as possible, and we would then make the best of our way to the civilised country.

Slowly the months passed, and at length the time for the annual sacrifice drew near. On the day which was to see the selections of the victims, I was in a state of almost unendurable suspense, and it seemed to me that the evening would never come. However, about five in the afternoon, the loud blowing of conch shells told me that the time had arrived when I would have to begin the carrying out of my schemes. I will not enter into the details of the ceremony of choosing; I cannot bear to think of my feverish anxiety, even now.

Opaie was the chosen victim!

Sleep, of course, was impossible, and I lay awake thinking over the position. Up to that time I had been in a most excited state, but later on the position became terribly complicated by a succession of entirely unforeseen circumstances, and I have to thank that day for many a grey hair.

Nothing occurred during the early part of the day, and in the afternoon I went down to the river-side to watch the preparations. When I arrived on the scene the stone was being fixed in the sling. As I stood there, the only idle one among so many, I noticed something floating down the river.

When it came close to me I saw that it was a piece of newspaper! It passed so close to the bank that there was no chance of my being mistaken. I was so intensely surprised at the strange messenger of civilisation that I nearly cried out. No one else noticed the fragment, and in a moment it was swept over the fall.

There was only one explanation of the presence of this piece of printed paper, and that was the existence of some party of explorers, who must have made the ascent of the northern face of the plateau and were following the stream down. As the northern extremity of the plateau was considered unscalable by the Barawois, no sentinel was placed there; and if the party were engaged as I conjectured, they would be able to approach quite close to the village without being discovered, provided they were observing the ordinary precautions of bush travellers.

The question for me to consider was this: How far away was this party at the moment? They might be within a mile or two, or they might be half a day's journey off. In any case I must find means of communicating with them. Supposing anything went wrong with my plans, and Opaie and I were compelled to make a bolt for our lives, we should have a splendid chance of getting back to civilisation.

And now I was brought face to face with a very serious difficulty. I could easily write a note on a piece of rapulo (a kind of fine bark) and despatch Bian up the river with it, as she would not be stopped by the sentinels. But if I did this, and she did not return before the sacrifice, I should be in an extremely awkward position, as Bian would not be there to create a diversion while I rescued Opaie.

After thinking the matter over, I decided to risk it. The party of explorers, even if they did not arrive in time to stop the sacrifice, would at any rate hurry up, and might be counted on to put in an appearance within a few hours, and it was possible that I might delay the sacrifice, by some means or other, long enough to allow them time to get on the scene.

There was no time to be lost, so I went to my house and explained the matter to Bian. She at once grasped the situation and I sent her off with a note to the exploring party.

As the afternoon closed I was almost sick with the intense mental strain to which I was being subjected. When the time arrived, I armed myself with my pistols and hunting-knife and went down to the river-side, taking up my stand close to one of the stumps to which the sling was fastened.

Soon afterwards I heard the procession approaching, and in a few moments it came in sight. Petarie led the way, and a few paces behind came Opaie, bearing in her hand the brilliant flowers used on such occasions. She looked very troubled and anxious, and I took an opportunity, when no one was looking my way, to give her a smile of encouragement, though I was ill at ease. Opaie was led out immediately and stepped on to the ledge of the rock more firmly than I dared to hope. She stood there in that awful place, with the evening light playing about her exquisite form—a vision of loveliness.

The preparations went on. The stone was braced back and secured to the hand of the image. Then this thing happened:

The man who was carrying the bundle of sticks across to the base of the statue suddenly stumbled, and in righting himself dropped the whole of them into the water.

I was horror-struck, and waited breathlessly for the next move. Would they put off the sacrifice till the next day in order that a fresh set of sticks might be exposed in the usual way, or would they consider this as an indication that the victim was to be spared? There was a short consultation, and then a man left the crowd and made off in the direction of the village.

I determined to allow as much time as possible to pass before I took the affair into my own hands. Not until the fire was lighted would I give any sign. If it came to that point, I would cut my side of the sling, thus putting Opaie out of immediate danger, and then act as circumstances might direct.

Digitized by Google

I was engaged in trying to work out the situation when the man who had gone to the village returned, bringing with him a fresh bundle of sticks. So the sacrifice was to go on! I glanced round at Opaie. She was standing erect, it seemed from her bearing that she was gaining hope from the delay.

The bundle of sticks was laid, and the fire lighted, and the first little puff of smoke rose in the air. There was no danger for a couple of minutes longer. I determined to count fifty and then cut the rope.

I felt my pistols—forty, forty-one, forty-two, forty-three—my knife—forty-four, forty-five, forty-six—

At this moment I heard on the other side of the village a great shout and the din of fire-arms, and above all, Bian's shrill voice crying out for help.

The Barawois, struck with astonishment, rushed off at once in the direction of the outcries. In an instant I cut the sling, and, seeing the stone fall harmlessly in the stream, gave a shout of encouragement to Opaie, and then dashed off to the scene of action. The Barawois had no chance from the first, and, after a very short fight, the affair was at an end.

When everything quieted down and the Barawois were placed under guard, I returned to the river-side to fetch Opaie. She had walked to the foot of the statue, and then, overcome by the terrible mental strain of the ordeal, had fainted. She lay on her back, and so narrow was the place, that her feet were in the water on one side, and on the other her long hair was trailing in the stream.

We got her safely to the bank, and then I took her in my arms and carried her into my house, where Bian was waiting for us.

This is the end of the Baron's narrative, but the subsequent events were related by his nephew.

It appears that the Baron and his rescuers (a large party of English explorers) returned to the coast through Venezuela, and that the Baron left Opaie in charge of a certain lady in Caracas. Bian remained with her people.

This lady was of good family, and was the wife of a Spanish merchant named Luis de Gayangos. The Baron then returned to Europe, set his affairs in good order, and some months later returned to Caracas. Here a severe disappointment awaited him. No trace of Luis de Gayangos could be found. The family had gone to to La Guayra and the business of Luis de Gayangos had been finished some months before the Baron's arrival. After spending some time in vain endeavours to find Opaie the Baron finally returned to Europe a disappointed man.

Some years later, Opaie's fate became known. During the war which ended in the adoption of the constitution of Columbia, with Simon Boliver "El Liberador," as President, the Spanish merchant, Luis de Gayangos, fell under suspicion of being in active co-operation with the patriots, and, in order to save himself from being arrested by the royalist troops, he fled to the town of Tunja in Columbia. In June, 1819, the battle of that name was fought. After a severe fight Boliver was victorious, but not without the loss of many men.

When the engagement was at its height, Opaie, who had imprudently gone out into a narrow street parallel to the main thoroughfare, was struck by a stray bullet and killed. So she but escaped death at the hand of savages to meet it among civilised folk.

Erko Mann.

6D. . . THE . . 6D.

APRIL PEARSON'S

On Sale, THURSDAY, March 31st,

IS FULL OF

ENTERTAINING ARTICLES, EXCITING STORIES,
EXQUISITE ILLUSTRATIONS.

◆◆◆◆

CONTENTS:

ARTISTS AND THEIR WORK. (Illustrated.) In addition to a number of splendid full-page reproductions of beautiful pictures, this interesting feature comprises brightly written descriptive notes of the life and work of the only two women Royal Academicians ever elected, and of Mr. A. J. Elsley, one of the most popular of present day painters.

THE GORDON HIGHLANDERS. (Illustrated.) By Charles Lowe. In this finely illustrated article is told the romantic history of the enrolment of this famous regiment by the daring Duchess of Gordon, who offered a kiss to all who would accept service under her banner, and a thrilling account is given of the many magnificent feats accomplished by the "Gay Gordons" on the field of battle.

REAL GHOST STORIES. By E. and H. Heron. No. IV.—The Story of Baelbrow. (Illustrated by B. E. Minns.) A Complete Story.

THE AMEER OF AFGHANISTAN. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By Lillias Hamilton. This is the first authentic account which has ever appeared of the private life and personal characteristics of the Ameer of Afghanistan. As will be readily understood, the writer, for some time lady physician to the Ameer, had special facilities, which would not be open to the ordinary observer, for studying the peculiar traits in his character.

TO FRANCE BY AIR. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By George Griffith. This is perhaps the most interesting, out-of-the-way article which has ever appeared in a magazine. It is a description of the special balloon ascent made by Mr. Griffith from London with the idea of crossing the Channel. The journey was successfully accomplished, and Mr. Griffith now describes the remarkable sensations experienced on the trip. The article is profusely illustrated with photographs, both of and from the balloon.

CHINESE FAIRY TALES. No. 1.—The Water of Life and the Spirit Indri. (Illustrated by C. Lawson Wood.) By Annis Lennox. This is the first of a series of most charming fairy stories. They will be read with pleasure by young and old alike.

THE MATHEMATICS OF MARRIAGE. (Illustrated by Hunt.) By T. D. Denham. All the most interesting statistics with regard to the duration of married life, the ages at which people marry, where they get married, and which are the most popular periods of the year for marrying, are here collected and illustrated in a most picturesque way.

THE PRIZE OF H.M.S. "SPITFIRE." (Illustrated by H. Austin.) By Atriol Fordes. A very amusing Complete Story.

THE OLDEST OBSERVATORY IN THE WORLD. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By Thos. Child. This observatory is at Peking, and is more than a thousand years old. We have been fortunate in obtaining photographs of many of the instruments, which, though exposed to the air, are still in a good state of preservation.

THROUGH THE LIPS. (Illustrated by Sydney Cowell.) By Frederick Gordon. A Complete Story.

A ONE-MAN PLAY. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By Austin Fryers. Signor Pepi, the quick-change artiste and champion impersonator, is certainly the most wonderful actor that has ever appeared on the English stage. He acts a seven-character comedy, playing every part himself, but changing so quickly from one impersonation to another that the continuity of the performance is splendidly maintained. Remarkable photographs are reproduced of Signor Pepi in his various characters.

BIT O' MUSK. (Illustrated by Warwick Goble.) By Eden Phillpotts. This story is in Mr. Eden Phillpotts' best vein, and describes the marvellously clever escape of an Egyptian girl from the house of her father, who is trying to compel her to marry against her will.

STONES WITH STORIES. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By Marcus Tindal. Here are collected together photographs of all the most interesting stones to be found in various parts of the country, each one marking some notable event, or perhaps a spot well known in history. Many monuments little known to the public at large, but of very special interest to all, are included in this representative series.

THE ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN KETTLE. No. X.—Mr. Gedge's Cat-paw. (Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood.) By Cutcliffe Hyne. An exciting adventure.

OUR ONLY VINEYARD. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By H. C. Fyfe. The Marquis of Bute owns the only vineyard in the British Isles. Excellent photographs of it are given, as well as full particulars as to the annual yield and the price obtained for the wine, which, by the way, is pronounced by connoisseurs to resemble a first-class champagne.

LIFE'S LITTLE WORRIES. (Illustrated by A. Popini.) By W. L. Alden. Mice, flies, parrots, and boys are the little worries of life which are here dealt with by Mr. Alden in his most amusing manner.

Digitized by Google

Ya-Ling, The Willow-Tree, and The Golden Lilies.

Ya-Ling was the only son of his Mother, and he loved her dearly. He was Head Man of the village of Happy Flowers, and had many rice fields. His house was guarded with a screen of fruit-trees and behind it the Willow-trees kept away all bad fairies. Now his Mother was old and childish, and the time was come for him to be in sorrow and alone.

Her last words to him were:

"Dear son Ya-ling, seek the Willow-tree and the Golden Lilies."

And Ya-ling, though he was wise in the village, was not wise at home, so he did not understand her. But he was anxious to please her, so he promised to do as she said, and when the days of his mourning were ended, he thought of his promise. His rice was all planted, his fruit-trees were covered with beautiful flowers. The village was prosperous and the people were happy. So Ya-ling went to the hill top behind the fields where dwelt an old hermit. He could not have gone had not the village been in good order, because he was Head Man and had to look after it. As it was, his journey was a long one. But in three days he reached the top of Nan-ping, and he saw the Old Man of the Mountain sitting on a stone outside his cave. A willow waved its branches overhead, and by his side was a pool of water, on whose surface floated some beautiful lilies. How delighted Ya-ling was when he saw them!

He made reverence to the Old Man and said:

"Oh, Old Man of Nan-ping, be good enough to give me a branch of the Willow-tree and two Golden Lilies."

And the Old Man answered:

"When two men in your village both grown grain in one field and are contented; when the learned man shall know how little he knows; then you shall have a Willow-branch."

"And how about the lilies, sir?" said Ya-ling.

"One thing at one time," said the Old Man.

So Ya-ling went back to the village.

The day after he got home, he called two neighbours of his and said:

"Neighbours, I give you one of my rice fields; you are both to sow grain in it and be content. If you quarrel, you will have to give it to me back again."

The neighbours thanked him many times, and Ya-ling said to himself when they were gone:

"That is a good idea; they are not likely to quarrel over the ground they don't pay for."

Next day, as he passed through the village, he saw some children playing, and he watched the game. The trees hid him from the children, who were too intent on their game to notice him. One tall lad called two others, and said:

"I am the Head Man, and I give you a rice-field. As long as you do not quarrel, I will give it you."

All the other children laughed, for the boy spoke in a gruff voice, just as if he were a big man.

Then one of the boys to whom he had spoken said:

"Sir, please how can we both sow, and not quarrel? How shall we decide which is our part of the field?"

The pretended Head Man looked so puzzled, that the other children shouted with laughter.

Then the lad said:

"I did not bargain to answer hard questions. Our real Head Man was not asked anything of the sort, and I don't believe he could have answered if they had asked him."

"You are cross," said one of the boys; "but don't you think Ming-sa would know?"

"I'll go and ask her," said the other, and he ran off into a garden near by.

Soon he came back with a smile on his face. Calling the pretended neighbours before him, he said:

Digitized by Google

"Look you, friends, divide between yourselves the rice field. Let each take half, then you will be at peace. As for me, I am a fool, but I still am a worthy Head Man, for it takes Wisdom to know Folly!"

"Ming-sa is right!" shouted the children; and they were so pleased at this happy ending to their game that they never saw Ya-ling slip away.

He was delighted with what he had heard. And when next morning the two real neighbours came before him grumbling and quarrelling, he decided between them as Ming-sa advised. The children rather wondered when they heard, and Ming-sa, who lived by her father's rice field, with her younger brothers and sisters, was astonished. But as she said nothing about it, the villagers put the wise words down to the Head Man's credit, and thought more of him than ever.

So Ya-ling went to claim the Willow-branch, and the Old Man of the Mountain kept his word and gave it him. Then Ya-ling asked for the Lilies.

"Nay, my son," said the Old Man, "only the truthful tongue can own them; if I gave them to you they would fade."

"I don't see why," said Ya-ling.

The Old Man's voice grew very grave. He stooped and picked two of the Golden Blooms.

"Take them," he said; "but do not think they will be pleasant to your eyes till you own the cheat by which you gained the Willow-branch."

"What do you mean?" stammered Ya-ling in great confusion.

"I mean," said the Old Man, "the lie you told when you decided the quarrel between your neighbours. Did you not pretend that it was your wisdom, so that all the village might praise you? Shame on you, miserable man that you are! Do you let Ming-sa toil all day, and then must needs steal her wisdom too!"

Poor Ya-ling was terribly frightened at these words.

"What shall I do?" he cried. "I did not mean to do any harm, I never thought——"

"So I should suppose! Well, take the Lilies, but remember, until you see them with Ming-sa's eyes, the sight of them will be dreadful to you. And until then, do not dare to part with them, for if you do you shall die."

Ya-ling sorrowfully obeyed. He took the Lilies and the Branch, and went back to his village. There he planted the Branch, and it made a fine tree just by the gate of his house.

But the Lilies he hated; for every time he looked at them their colour looked different, and every night in his dreams they seemed close beside him.

At last the Lilies worried his stupid head so much that he became thin and worn-looking, and the villagers noticed it. The children heard their parents speak of it too. As the days went by Ya-ling grew worse, and could walk no farther than his garden gate.

One day, as he sat there in the shade of a mango tree, Ming-sa passed by with her baby sister. In the gateway stood a willow, and here they stopped to rest a bit. They did not see Ya-ling.

"Is this where the sick man is?" said the little one.

"Yes," said Ming-sa sorrowfully. "He is a good man. I wish I could make him well."

"Would you give him your eyes and your hands?" said her sister.

"What a funny child you are!" said Ming-sa. "It is time we went home now."

"But would you?" said the child earnestly.

Ming-sa thought a minute.

"Yes," she said, "if father and mother would let me; you see, he is

Ming-sa passed with her baby sister.

Digitized by Google

kind, if he is not very wise, and the people love him."

Ya-ling was glad when he heard that. If he was not very wise he knew what he wanted, so he sent in haste for Ming-sa's father and he said:

"Honoured neighbour, your daughter is wise and virtuous; let me have her for my wife."

And Ming-sa's father agreed.

Not long after, Ming-sa came to her new home.

And the first thing Ya-ling did was to tell her how he had learnt his wise speech to his neighbours. The next thing he did was to show her the Lilies. But he did not look himself. "They are on the shelf," he said. So Ming-sa went to see what they were like.

"Oh!" she cried, "how golden they are! Dear husband, look at them once again. They are so lovely."

And to please her, he did. Then a cry of joy broke from his lips.

"I can see them," he said, and he cried with delight.

Just then they heard some one knocking.

"Come in," cried Ming-sa-ling.

And in came the Old Man of the Mountain.

Ya-ling ran eagerly up to him,

"Sir," he cried, "I can see their beauty, but I don't understand why!"

"My son," said the Old Man, "I knew and loved your mother, and I bade her give you that last command. "You are stupid, but Ming-sa is wise. You have lied, but she is truthful. You are rich in goods and she in virtue. But you are willing to share and so is she. That makes things right and just. She gives you her hands and eyes; do you give her your trust?"

"Indeed I will," said Ya-ling.

"Her feet are Golden Lilies, her form is like the Willow. They are the things you need. Leave to the solitary the magic charms, content yourself with the real."

The Old Man vanished with these last words and the Lilies disappeared too. The Willow faded and soon died. But Ya-ling did not mind. His Ming-sa was Lilies and Willow to him and he never wanted any other.

WHAT IS THE NEXT BOOK WE CAN SEND YOU?

Every week we shall give away half-a-dozen books.

All a competitor has to do is to send us one Book Coupon cut from The Sunday Reader, one from the Athletic Record, and one from Short Stories.

Send these to us in one envelope together with a request for any single book in the whole world of literature.

From the applications we receive we shall each week pick out six and send the books asked for.

All applications to be addressed to "BOOKS," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please let me have: S. S.

Book.....

Price.....

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Result of the "Book" Competition for the Week Ending March 12th.

J. B. Corner, 8 Mathieson Road, Glasgow. "Keraban the Inflexible" (2nd vol.) in English. 7s. 6d.

G. J. Roberts, Dairy Supply, Museum Street, W.C. "Through the Buffer State." 6s.

J. Allan, 12 Sydney Street, Glasgow. "Morris' Earthly Paradise. 5s. 8d.

C. W. J. Bartlett, 27 Springfield Road, St. James, Exeter. "Simon Dale," by Antony Hope. 6s.

J. P. Endered, Evesham Road, Headless Cross, Redditch. "Within the Maze," by Mrs. Henry Wood. 3s. 6d.

O. H. Sharrott, Chestnut House, Tamworth. "Aids to the Final: A Guide to Self-Preparation for the Final Exams. of the Law Society." 4s.

SHALL WE MAKE A MINIATURE FOR YOU?

With the enterprise born of repeated success, Short Stories makes an extraordinary offer to the whole of its readers for a limited time only. We will send a beautiful little miniature (about 2¼-inches by 1¾-inches) in exquisite colouring, and completely framed in a dainty gold-plated oval frame, of any single portrait readers like to forward.

All you have to do is to send your photograph, together with the coupon, and seven shillings and sixpence. The miniatures may be also had in chased gold ornamental frames, the total cost being 10s. 6d.

Write your name and address on the back of the photograph, and mark your envelope "MINIATURE."

Specimens of the Miniatures can be seen at:

MANCHESTER—Messrs. Abel Heywood, Oldham Street; and Mr. John Heywood, Deansgate.
LIVERPOOL—F. A. Latarche, 63, Lime Street; and M. Partington, 9, Renshaw Street.
EDINBURGH—H. Robinson, 111 and 115, Leith Street; and David Crawford, 75, South Clerk Street.
GLASGOW—W. Love, 221, Argyle Street; and Mr. Barr, 88, Sauchiehall St.
DUNDEE—Mrs. Littlejohn, The Pillars.
BRADFORD—W. H. Clough, 28, Forster Square.
BRISTOL—T. Thatcher, 44, College Green.
NEWCASTLE—Messrs. R. J. Porteus and Co., 19, Grainger Street West.
LEEDS—Mr. H. Walker, 37, Briggate, Leeds.
WEST BROMWICH—H. N. Ellison, 3 and 3a, Bull Street.
CARDIFF—W. White, 1a, Severn Road, Canton.
LONDON—PEARSON'S WEEKLY Offices.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Colour of eyes.....

„ „ hair.....

Complexion.....

Description of dress.....

.....

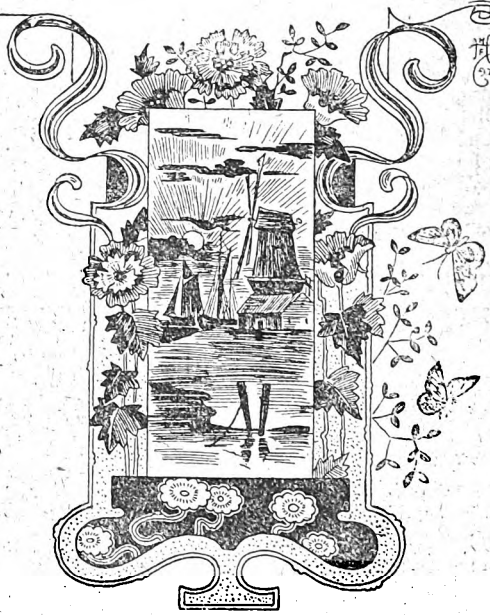
£ s. d.

Please send..... @ 7s. 6d.
„ „ ..... @ 10s. 6d.

Amount of Postal Orders inclosed... £ s. d.

Digitized by Google

James and John and Two Pretty Girls.



James Reade was sitting in the garden, ostensibly reading, but in reality turning over in his mind a serious matter which had worried him and his brother for some weeks, when suddenly an inspiration came to him.

It seemed so simple and promising, and withal so scientific, that he was sure it was just what they needed. In his haste to tell John about it he gathered his books up in his arms and fairly ran to the house. He thrust one book, open, under the nose of the astonished John, who was deep in the mysteries of his microscope.

"There!" said James, glowing with triumphant pleasure. "Read that! I think you will find that it contains a suggestion how we may find out what Miss Vail's feelings are towards you!"

John read the following, slowly, and with an occasional pause:

"'Just as a watch is influenced by an electric current, so is it acted upon by the nervous temperament of a human being. The demonstrations of this have generally been confined to the watches of women, not only owing to their greater degree of nervous force, but also because a man's watch does not come into such direct contact with it. Most women thrust their watches in front of their dresses where they are placed in close proximity to the heart. When the wearer is excited, the quickening of the nervous current communicates itself to the delicate mechanisms of the watch and produces similar quickening of the machinery, thereby causing the watch to gain time. In like manner, when a person is depressed, and her nervous current running sluggishly, it has a retarding effect upon the watch, and causes it to lose time in exact proportion to the amount of the wearer's depression. It is a fact well known even outside scientific circles, that a woman's watch is rarely correct.'"

John finished reading. Simultaneously he and James leant back, took off their glasses, which they began to polish, and beamed at each other.

"James," said John, "I always told you that you showed genius in applying your knowledge."

John Reade and James his younger brother were wealthy bachelors, who had never found it necessary to go into business. Ever since they had left college twenty years before, they had merely gratified their fondness for study and scientific research. They never became more than amateurs, for they were interested in too many branches to pursue any one experiment to its practical end.

Everyone liked the two brothers; they were gentle, kindly, and sympathetic, and if they chose to busy themselves with useless, unremunerative study, nobody cared.

Their lives had heretofore been peaceful and quiet, but recently a new element had entered, one which threatened great disturbance. John had made the most startling discovery of his life—that he was in love. It seemed to give him more importance in his own eyes and to invest him with a certain romantic charm. He polished his spectacles, patted his hair a little and looked in the glass. It seemed to him that his appearance was more youthful. He was only forty odd, but he had not noticed that his sister's children were growing up. The adored was over thirty, so that—well, they were both in the prime of life, neither too old nor too young.

Mr. Reade had confided all to his brother, and had been pleasantly excited by the awe with which it caused James to regard him. Such a thing was so foreign to their habits that it astounded these simple gentlemen. The fact that John was a victim of this strange malady made him quite a hero.

"But the question is, James," John had said uneasily, "having discovered I am in love, what is to be done next?"

It was indeed a question. How was John to find out the state of Miss Vail's feelings towards him?

"I am afraid," James had replied, after a long pause, "that perhaps we were wrong to neglect these things when we were younger. If we had only had a little experience now!"

"I had begun to fear so myself," said John. "Lucy's boys would find no such difficulty, I am sure. But, dear me, I don't think they had much experience."

"No, I've never observed anything," said James.

John continued.

"Still, it is strange, when you think of it, how many have married. It had never occurred to me before that they must have proposed."

Digitized by Google

"I wonder—do you think," began James, "these things in the comic papers say—about leap year?"

For just a second Mr. Reade's mild face lighted up with hope, but it was only a passing gleam.

"Of course, I don't know," he said, "but I should be inclined to doubt that a lady would really propose to a man. I never inquired whether these jokes were founded on fact. However, I scarcely think Miss Vail would do so; the next leap year is two years off. I should hardly like to wait so long on a chance.

"If I were quite sure that Miss Vail would look favourably upon my suit," he continued, "I think I could manage to put the question. But it would be most embarrassing to be refused, and I have no way of ascertaining her feelings."

Miss Vail and her sister Kitty were making a long visit to Mrs. Burton, née Reade. The ladies necessarily saw a good deal of Mr. Reade, and he had fallen in love with Miss Vail, while at the same time it looked as if one or both of Mrs. Burton's sons would become a victim to the charms of the younger sister before the summer was over.

Miss Vail enjoyed talking with Mr. Reade and hearing his opinions of the discoveries of the day. That much he could see, but his accustomed eyes could detect no difference in her treatment of him from that which she accorded her other friends, and further complications arose from his fear that his nephew would discover how things were, if he were to pay Miss Vail any little attention.

John was therefore in a frame of mind to seize upon any suggestion, and his brother was equally disturbed and most anxious to help him. So when the idea of the watch presented itself, it seemed to them Heaven-sent. John was filled with admiration for James's cleverness, and James glowed with pleasure at John's appreciation.

"We must be discreet," said James, after the first excitement had subsided. "I think we ought to have a watch made for the purpose, for, of course, the more delicate the works are, the more easily they will be affected."

"Precisely," said John. "I will go to the watch-maker's myself to-morrow and order a special one to be made."

The amount of talking and planning these two did that day! Not only all the afternoon, but in the evening again, until James found, to his astonishment, that it was after midnight, and betook himself to bed. But Mr. Reade feared that he was somewhat excited and would be unable to sleep, so he said he would read a little to rest his brain.

The very air of the study seemed charged with mystery and importance during the time necessary for the construction of the watch. John and James forsook their books for hours at a time to rehearse their plans. They had them carefully laid out, though one point caused them a temporary heartsinking. How were they to get her to wear the watch?

John could not well give it to her; that would be too open, and the boys—oh, no, not that! At length they hit upon an idea.

Miss Vail was interested in botany, and Mr. Reade arranged to take her one afternoon to see some curious plants which he had discovered. An hour before the appointed time he and James stole out of the house carrying the watch. They went for some distance along the path in the wood, and then, setting the hand of the watch half-an-hour ahead, they placed it on the ground where anyone who passed would see it. Then they stepped back and regarded it from different points to make sure that it was sufficiently comprehensive.

"Now," said James, "you go back for Miss Vail, and I will stay for awhile in case anyone should come along first."

And John went away in a state of tremendous excitement.

Miss Vail thought she had never known Mr. Reade to be so absent-minded. She tried to get his opinion upon certain fossil remains that had just been unearthed, but found him unresponsive. His mind was apparently concentrated upon botany.

"It is very important that we keep our eyes on the ground, Miss Vail, or we may overlook the plants," he said almost abruptly, while she was asking him to explain the difference between the various kinds of oaks. He was sorry to interrupt her, but he really could not have her staring up into the trees at this particular point in the road.

Miss Vail dutifully turned her eyes earthward. Presently she gave an exclamation of surprise as she came upon the watch, lying face up and ticking cheerfully. She picked it up and examined it closely.

"What a pity that someone should have lost such a beautiful watch!" she said. "There are no initials on it, either."

"'Finding is keeping,' then," quoted Mr. Reade.

"Oh, I shall advertise, of course," was the prompt reply, which did not disturb Mr. Reade, for he knew there would be no answer.

"It doesn't seem to keep very good time," he said, comparing it with his own. "You should let me regulate it for you."

"Indeed, I should be very glad if you would; and if we don't find the owner, I think I shall give it to Kitty—she hasn't one."

Mr. Reade stopped short. To have his plans upset in this simple manner dismayed him. It was not for Kitty he had had the match made, and her nervous temperament did not interest him. Miss Vail looked at him inquiringly.

"Surely," he stammered, "you do not intend to entrust so valuable a watch to her? She's too young; she would break it. Really, I should consider it most unwise."

"Well," said Miss Vail, laughing at his earnestness, "perhaps you are right. I will keep this and give her my old one."

Mr. Reade breathed again.

"A very sensible arrangement," he said.

His satisfaction increased as Miss Vail fixed the watch in the front of her dress. They continued their walk, and saw the rare plants. Mr. Reade became most lively and entertaining.

That evening John and James held a congratulatory meeting in the study. Their scheme was under way, at all events; the next thing was to reap the results.

John now began to be more specific in his attentions to Miss Vail.

"Elation," said he, "should cause the watch to gain time. If a lady finds herself the recipient of compliments from a gentleman of whom she is fond, it would be natural that she should be elated, would it not, James?"

James thought that it would.

"Therefore," John continued, "I spent this afternoon trying to gently insinuate my regards. If she is pleased it ought to be shown by the watch to-morrow."

Digitized by Google

It was with some trepidation that he took the watch on the following day, under pretext of regulating it. He studied it anxiously; it had gained three minutes.

Mr. Reade made a rapid mental calculation, and thought: "That is something, but it is not sufficient gain to warrant me in feeling particularly encouraged. I must wait."

He told James, who at once expressed the opinion that some more decisive step should be taken.

"Suppose you were to send her up some chocolate or some flowers," he suggested.

John rather recoiled, on account of his present fear of his nephews.

"The boys would think it so unusual for me to give anyone flowers," he objected. "If there were any reason for it—if there were something very rare, that anybody might be interested in, for instance—" a pause.

"We have not tried the effect of depression yet," James said.

"That will be much more complicated, I fear, James."

"Not at all. Suppose I undertake to talk with Miss Vail, and tell her that I believe you are exceedingly attracted by her sister. If she is fond of you, that should make her feel uneasy, and the watch would lose."

Personal feelings overcame scientific considerations, and Mr. Reade answered promptly:

"But I don't want her to feel uneasy!"

"Then there is nothing to do but to try elation once more. If you wish, I will try to make her see that your affections are directed towards her, and you can call in the evening and see the result."

"I wish you would propose for me at the same time," sighed Mr. Reade.

But on this point he met with a decided refusal. James said there were some things that a man must attend to himself. The rest of the mission he undertook, and started upon it early the next day.

He was gone most of the morning, but he was unable to give John much information when he got back.

"I flatter myself that I did it very delicately," he acknowledged, "but it is extremely difficult to tell what Miss Vail thinks. Of course, I did not say that you were in love with her, but I hinted it. She laughed and rather pooh-poohed the idea."

John felt uneasy; he had an impression that he was in for it now. He resolved not to wait for the evening, but to go and see Miss Vail in the afternoon. James applauded the determination, as the watch would have less opportunity of being influenced by other events which might arise in the meantime.

Mr. Reade thought that James's talk might have put new ideas into Miss Vail's head, and that she might in consequence treat him differently, but he was mistaken. She was precisely the same, and he saw that he should have to depend solely upon science. He seized the first opportunity to ask if he should look at the watch. Miss Vail handed it to him with a laugh.

"See," she said, "hasn't it been behaving shockingly? That is——"

But Mr. Reade was not listening. He was staring at the watch. It was an hour and three-quarters ahead of time!

Surely no one need desire more encouragement than that! She must have been very much overjoyed at what James had said for such an effect as this to have been produced. In view of such convincing proofs of her affection he would hesitate no longer.

"Then you do love me, Miss Margaret?" he exclaimed. "Will you marry me?"

It was much simpler to accomplish than he had expected. It is true Miss Vail was somewhat startled, but she recovered her composure with commendable promptitude and assented, with a decided twinkle in her eyes:

"Yes, I will, and I do, but however did you find it out?"

He did not tell her just that minute, but later he repeated the history of the watch to her, full of pride and pleasure in the success of his scientific courtship. He did not understand why the twinkle in Miss Vail's eyes increased until there was too much twinkle to be confined there, and it extended to her mouth as well, and made dimples that were out of all keeping with so learned a subject. When he had finished, she said:

"What a dear, stupid goose you are! I have been positively flinging myself at your head for the last month."

And then, with another burst of merriment which Mr. Reade found infectious even before he knew the cause:

"As for the watch, I only put it on when I saw you come in the gate. Kitty has been wearing it all the morning!"

That evening John and James held another congratulatory meeting in the study. The result of the wooing was so happy that neither was disposed to grumble because it was not accomplished exactly as they had expected it to be.

"There is only one thing that troubles me," said John.

"Yes?" said James questioningly.

"It is that when Margaret becomes my wife, I shall naturally have more demands upon my time."

"Of course, John."

"And I am afraid you will be left to yourself a good deal."

Mr. Reade looked seriously at his brother; there was something strange about James's expression. John could not make it out.

Then James spoke.

"John," he said mildly, "this morning, and again this afternoon while you were talking to Miss Vail, I was arranging things with Kitty, and we are going to be married at the same time that you are."

H. T. P.

Next Week's SHORT STORIES will be the

EASTER NUMBER, and will contain the first of a series of brilliant tales entitled

"STORIES OF THE STOCK EXCHANGE,"

By ROBERT MACHRAY.

Illustrated by ARTHUR JULES GOODMAN.

Digitized by Google

No Beauty Without White Teeth.

DR. EMY'S
ALBAZENE.

THE PUREST AND MOST ELEGANT DENTIFRICE IN THE WORLD.

TO KEEP YOUR TEETH SOUND KEEP THEM CLEAN.

Absolutely Uninjurious.

In boxes, 1s., of all Chemists, or Post Free from THE ALBAZENE COMPANY, 276 STRAND.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. Taylor, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

Deer Rectory, Mintlaw, Aberdeen,
From Rev. J. H. Burn. November 8th, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

Digitized by Google

YOU AND I.

We want one clean and perfect copy of each of the following numbers of Short Stories: 26, 28, 29, 30, 31, 124, 127, 128, 137, 140, 141, 151, 233, and will pay sixpence each for them. Copies should be addressed to the Publisher.

Eva—The hair of Italian women grows longer than that of any other nationality. On an average, English women have the shortest hair.

Insomnia.—You say that the old remedy of courting sleep has proved ineffectual. It may surprise you to hear, however, that sleep may be obtained by trying to keep the eyes open and fixed on some particular object, real or imaginary. This effort relieves the mind from thoughts that perplex it, and diverts the attention from oneself, and before you are aware of it the struggle will have ended, and sleep will be victorious.

Smoker asks: "Where did tobacco originally come from?"————It would be difficult to say, for the plant has never been found growing wild in any part of the world. It is believed, however, to be a native of tropical America.

Tramp wants to know if it is true that dummy windows in old houses are a sign that a murder has been committed in the room to which they belong.————Certainly not, although they are ugly enough to suggest almost anything. They are, however, only relics of the days when windows were taxed. A dummy window, of course, was not taxed, and was put in for the sake of preserving the symmetrical appearance of the house from the outside.

Young Bachelor was much alarmed the other day by a statement he saw in a certain paper to the effect that single men do not live so long as married men, and he nervously asks if this is true.————Without wishing to further alarm you, I am bound to say that, according to statistics, it is a fact. Seven married men in every thousand die between the ages of thirty and forty, but the rate of single men is twelve per thousand.

S. P.—A very simple and effective means to stop snoring is to touch the throat of the sleeper, pressing it very slightly.

M. H. S. puts the following question: "What is the reason that on going into a dark room suddenly from the daylight, one cannot for a few moments distinguish objects that eventually become quite clear?"————The reason is that while in the strong light of day the pupil of the eye has become contracted, and it cannot at once enlarge to admit sufficient rays of light to enable the individual to see clearly.

D. G. H.—It is the Queen that dissolves Parliament, not the Prime Minister, and her method of doing so is by proclamation. In the proclamation the date of the assembling of the new Parliament is also fixed. Of course, Her Majesty acts under the advice of her Ministers.

B. L. N. asks: "Has a dromedary two humps or one, or is a one-humped dromedary a camel?"————An African dromedary is a light, slimly-built camel with one hump; it is the Bactrian camel, from Asia Minor, that has two humps. The latter animal is becoming very scarce indeed.

Pigmy asks: "Which is the tallest race of people?"————The North American Indian stands higher than any other race of the world, but the Patagonian runs him very close; then come the inhabitants of Norway, Great Britain, British America, Sweden, Ireland, Denmark and Holland.

Scotty is anxious to know the origin of "Auld Lang Syne."————It is of uncertain origin, for there being several versions of it. One of the best is by Burns, but only the second and third stanzas are by this poet, the remainder being from the pen of Ramsay. One version is dated 1716; another is said to be dated from the sixteenth century.

F. A. C. seeks the explanation of the reason intoxicated people frequently see double.————Because the nerve centres are changed by the action of alcoholic poison. There is a want of harmony in the action of the muscles which move the eyeballs, and, consequently, instead of both eyes being focussed simultaneously on one object, one eye receives an impression independently of the other. The two impressions are communicated to the brain, and the object is therefore seen twice.

R. S.—There cannot possibly be 366 days in any year except in a leap year. It is possible, however by sailing eastwards round the world to split up the year into 366 periods, each consisting of a night and a day. On the other hand by sailing westwards the number of such periods becomes reduced to 364.

T. S.—The halfpenny stamp did not put in an appearance until thirty years after the penny one.

O. P.—Curiously enough, O. P. also has a question to put with regard to the human stature. He asks: "How is it that blonde nations are generally taller than their darker neighbours?"————It is due to the geological position of the blonde races. They are characteristic of the north, and on account of the lower degree of temperature are induced to take more exercise, which throws them more in the open air, and thereby increases the rate of their growth.

T. B. wants to know if, on meeting a lady of his aquaintance in the street, he should remove his glove before shaking hands with her.————No, it is not considered necessary nowadays. The older fashion—which many still consider the better of the two—was to remove the right-hand-glove when possible, or to apologise if unable to do so. The custom originated in the Middle Ages, when the knight's gauntlet would be apt to injure a lady's hand.

J. J. writes to say that a few weeks back he noticed we informed a correspondent, through these columns, of the amount of gold contained by the oceans of the world so far as it is possible to gauge it. He would like to know if the sea contains silver also, and, if so, what quantity.————Scientists declare that the water in the whole ocean contains in solution more than 2,000,000 tons of pure silver, not to speak of the untold wealth it must have reaped from wrecked vessels.

W. F. C.—Such a thing as a cigar was quite unknown until the beginning of the present century, so that the one which you say you have in your possession cannot be so old as you imagine.

T. D.—The disease you refer to is probably that which prevails in Senegal and along the western interior of Africa, the symptom of which is a gradually increasing torpor, until the victim can no longer keep awake, and falls into a deep slumber from which nothing can arouse him. In this case he remains, perhaps, for a long time, until death overtakes him.

Bachelor writes to ask whether I am of an opinion that plain girls make better wives than their more good-looking sisters.————Such an idea is absurd, to say the least of it. This is one of those matters upon which it is impossible to generalise. It does not follow that because a woman is beautiful she must of necessity be vain and frivolous and fonder of pleasure than attending to her domestic affairs. Good and bad wives are to be found among both classes, and no hard and fast lines can be drawn.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

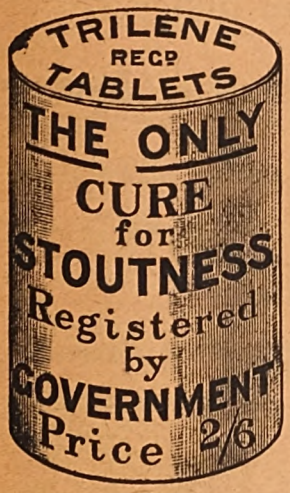
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, Oct. 19th, 1896.
"Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them—their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was for many years growing too stout; but although the disease was, I consider, chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks; and if I can do anything to promote your interests, I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.
"Yours faithfully, J. R. Canham."

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me directly your excellent Tablets."

Surgeon-Colonel E. S. Brander, M.D., writes from Ihansi, India: "September 12th, 1897. In my experience your Tablets form an efficient remedy for reducing weight."

Lady Conrad writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. Boston, of Clifford Street, South Wigston, Leicester, writes: "I am much thinner and lighter in myself since taking your Tablets."

W. G. Love, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead, N.B., says: "I finished Tablets a fortnight ago, and am reduced a great deal—never felt better in my life."

Convalescent Home, New Brighton, Cheshire.
Miss S. J. Pritchard says: "They have done me much good. I am 21lb. lighter already."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk either by means of severe dieting or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a case of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are guaranteed absolutely harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, or any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing Cure for Obesity. The Tablets are sold in boxes at 2s. 6d., and are obtainable from the Trilene Company, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London."

25, Windsor Terrace, Penarth, Cardiff.
Miss M. Flavell says: "I have lost 2st., and am much better in health."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.
Mr. J. Thomas writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17½st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.
Mr. Wm. Usher says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Mrs. Hutchinson, 46, Irwell Street, Widnes, Lancashire, writes: "I have taken three boxes and am reduced 2st."

A. D. Billings, Bell Inn, Aldershot, writes: "Have derived great benefit already. Less in size and weight, breathing greatly improved."

Miss Wells, Aldeburgh Hall, Saxmundham, writes: "I am pleased to say I receive great benefit from them."

Miss Duggleby, 16, New Road, Driffield, writes: "The girl who took your Tablets is reduced about 2½st."

Miss C. E. Singleton, 3, Courtenay Terrace, Teignmouth, says: "They have done me a great deal of good, and I will do my best to make them known. You may use this letter as you please."

Miss Macpherson, Balnagowan Lodge, Methuen, Perth, says: "I have taken one box, and am reduced 1st."

Mrs. Edmonds, Pontyguesta, Pontychin, Llantrissant, says: "I have lost more than a stone in a very short time."

Marian Taylor, Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "I have lost quite 2st. since taking your Tablets."

Miss Gillespie, 50, Chaucer Road, Forest Gate, Essex, says: "I have lost just 3st."

E. Nicholson, Crossfield, Staniland, Halifax, says: "I am pleased to say your Tablets are lessening my size very much, and my two sisters are going in for your pleasant treatment."

Countess G. Fürstenberg, of Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT LONDON.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

For all Bilious and Nervous Disorders, such as

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver and Female Ailments.

Prepared only by the Proprietor, THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere, in Boxes, 1s. 1½d. & 2s. 9d. each, with full Directions.

THE 1s. 1½d. BOX CONTAINS FIFTY-SIX PILLS.

The Sale now EXCEEDS SIX MILLION BOXES per Annum.

"PASS THE DULL HOUR AWAY" with

BEECHAM'S "NOVEL" SERIES.

A new issue of these unique publications now ready! The reading is good; the tales are all by popular authors, well chosen and carefully selected; the type is clear, and nearly every page is relieved by a special illustration, which adds considerable interest to the tale. No Advertisement of any Kind is Introduced into these Stories. The following are now on sale:

No. 5. "A Medal from the Royal Humane Society," "Pray, Sir, are you a Gentleman?" and "A Run for Life."

No. 6. "The Bold Dragoon—The Adventure of my Grandfather," "The Adventure of my Uncle," "The Adventure of my Aunt," and "Rip Van Winkle," by Washington Irving.

No. 7. "The Poisoned Mind," "The Alibi," and "Awake at Last."

No. 8. "The Last in the Lease," by Mrs. S. C. Hall, and "The White Horse of the Peppers," by Samuel Lover.

No. 9. "Buckthorne — Sowing Wild Oats," by Geoffrey Crayon.

No. 10. "George Hilson," by W. H. Maxwell, and "The Greek Slave," by Captain Marryat.

No. 11. "Markham's Revenge," "A Fatal Gift," "An Old Boy's Story," and "The Two Fingers."

No. 12. "Guests at the Red Lion," "Gentleman in Plum-Coloured Coat," and "Revenue Officer's Story."

Only a limited number of each of these Books will be issued, so you should order at once from your Newsagents, Price ONE PENNY EACH, or they will be sent post free on receipt of EIGHTPENCE, by

THE PROPRIETOR OF "BEECHAM'S PILLS," ST. HELENS, LANCASHIRE.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

BANK HOLIDAY NUMBER. "Stories of the Stock Exchange." By Robert Machray. How John Hardy Was Tortured. (See "The Empress of the Earth.")

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 484. FOR WEEK ENDING APRIL 9TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

"FROMMS"

"A COMPLETE FOOD" LANCET

FROMMS EXTRACT OF PURELY VEGETABLE ORIGIN

PHYSICIANS AND SCIENTISTS REPORT THAT

FROMMS EXTRACT IS A PERFECT FOOD FOR INFANTS AND INVALIDS AS WELL AS FOR THE STRONG AND HEALTHY.

HALF THE PRICE OF MEAT EXTRACTS.

SOLD BY CHEMISTS AND GROCERS

10/6 ALLEN FOSTER & CO., 10/6

SOLE MAKERS OF THE

'Alfosco' Costumes

These marvellous Costumes are acknowledged throughout the world to be far SUPERIOR IN VALUE, STYLE, AND FINISH to any Costumes ever yet offered to the public at anything approaching the same prices.

Design No. 847.—Ten and Sixpence.

The Chesterfield Costume is in great demand this season.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO. are offering a special line of extraordinary value. This charming Costume is made in the Specialite Serge, tailor made, and well-finished. Full size skirt.

PRICE ONLY 10/6

SKIRT ONLY 5/6

or in the new Venetian Cloth, only 13/6

This Costume also looks well in the pretty Edinboro' Tweed, price 18/6

PATTERNS FREE.

Design No. 750. Ten and Sixpence.

This is a very smart "Alfosco" Costume made in the Specialite Serge. It has the new Russian Blouse Style of Bodice shaped to the figure at back. It has prettily designed epaulettes, and the bodice is trimmed with rows of flat braid and large buttons. The bodice and sleeves are lined; the skirt is cut full and well made. ALLEN FOSTER & CO. have great confidence in recommending this Costume. It never fails to give the utmost satisfaction.

Design No. 847. 10/6 Design No. 750. 10/6

THOUSANDS OF TESTIMONIALS.

Costume Complete, 10/6. Skirt only, 5/6.

This Costume in our New Venetian Cloth, 13/6. It can also be ordered in our Edinboro' Tweed and Estémene, all wool serge. All particulars and PATTERNS POST FREE.

Regular Stock Sizes are 34, 36, and 38in. round bust (under arms); the Skirts being 38, 40, and 42in. long in front. Larger or Special Sizes made to measure, 1/6 ex. Each Costume securely packed and sent carr. paid, 9d. extra. Skirt only, 6d. extra.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., The London Manufacturers, 17 ROSCOE ST., GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"Its food value is double that of Bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

will not only help to improve your digestion and consequently your health, but will also bring back that energetic and happy feeling of good health. Man does not live a natural life, so a good portion of a natural food, in the shape of HOVIS, at each meal will largely counteract the bad influence that modern life has upon the health and digestive organs. This is not an idle remark, but a proved statement, daily being verified.

HOVIS is baked and sold by all good class Bakers. No loaf genuine unless stamped HOVIS. 6d. and 1/- samples of Bread and Biscuits sent on receipt of stamps by

S. FITTON & SON, Millers, Macclesfield.

REAL BARGAINS

A huge stock of Extra Fine quality Real Irish Handkerchiefs (made in Belfast), to be cleared at a startling reduction. For the convenience of the public we have made up the following special lots:

STERLING VALUE. (All full size.)

Lot 1. ½ doz. Ladies' Hemstitched Cambric usual price 7/6 doz., for 2/6
Lot 2. ½ doz. Ladies' Hemstitched Cambric " " 6/- " " 2/-
Lot 3. ½ doz. Ladies' Hemstitched Fine Lawn " " 5/3 " " 1/6
Lot 4. ½ doz. Gents' Guaranteed Pure Linen " " 9/6 " " 1/9

Any lot sent post free in United Kingdom on receipt of P.O. The quality of these certainly genuine goods at such low prices will astonish you. Send at once. Enormous demand. Orders executed in rotation.

VERY SPECIAL!

As a further inducement, in order to clear out above stock very quickly, all purchasers of any Lot (or Lots) can enter the following Skill Competition FREE. If you solve both sentences correctly

WE WILL SEND YOU £1;

and if only one sentence is correct you will receive a Beautiful Silk Handkerchief. We do not offer big cheques of £5 or £10 (which are seldom won), but only Prizes which we are prepared and willing to DISTRIBUTE BY THE THOUSAND!

1. TEGSA*EC*YCE.
2. A*DMTB*CDA*OE.

Each * represents a letter, and when filled in form two sentences regarding this advertisement. Those who wish to enter must enclose written copy of solutions with order, and at the same time state, in case you should not whether you prefer a LADIES' or GENTS' Silk Handkerchief. Also enclose stamped addressed envelope for results, which will be posted to all immediately this Special Sale terminates. As a guarantee of good faith, the proprietors have deposited the sealed solutions with Mr. F. OLDACRES, 52 Chancery Lane, W.C., which will be opened at his office.

WIN A SOVEREIGN,

JAMES ROBERTSON & CO.,
DEPT. K, 63 HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.
HUNDREDS OF PRIZES ALREADY WON!

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,
188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.
63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

CYCLE DEPOTS

High-class Selection of GENTS', LADIES', & JUVENILE CYCLES.

From £3 Cash, or on Easy Terms 10/- Monthly.

Lists Post Free.

Head Depôt: 52 to 55 Blackfriars Road, London, S.E.

RIDING SCHOOLS

BEST IN LONDON.

Practical Tuition until Perfect, 10/6. Single Lesson, 2/-.

Purchasers Taught Free.

Open 9 till 9.

West End Branch: 124 King's Road, Sloane Square, S.W.

CYCLEDOM LTD.

NOSE

A RADICAL PERMANENT CURE

Medically approved for Red Noses, 3/9, post free, under cover. Pamphlet, "Red Noses, Cause and Prevention," 1/-; Machines for Ugly Noses, particulars for stamp.

LEES RAY, Specialist, Wavertree, Liverpool.

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

WADE'S WONDERFUL OFFER

A SOLID SILVER WATCH GIVEN AWAY.

SEND NO MONEY.

In order to introduce my name into every household in the Kingdom, I undertake and guarantee to give away one of my "World-Famed £2 Silver Watches," list price, Ladies' or Gentlemen's, to every reader who sends me the correct reading of the Rebus printed below. I am preparing to send out immediately 2,000 of these watches. This is a perfectly genuine competition, and the only thing you have to do is carry out the conditions, and if you succeed in guessing correctly you have the advantage of our truly wonderful offer.

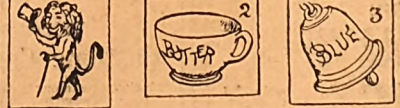
These pictures represent three well-known English Wild Flowers. The conditions of the Competition are that you find out what these flowers are, and if you are correct you undertake to purchase one of my inexpensive Solid Silver Chains. These chains are the best made, are marvellous value. Money returned if dissatisfied. Send at once, enclosing stamped and addressed envelope, so that I may inform you if correct.



W. W WADE,
WATCH MANUFACTURER,
Dept. 35, GOLD EXCHANGE,
Hammersmith, London W.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (259 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

Dr MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL SOAP

Prepared with Arsenic, Zinc, and other Ingredients as a beautifier of Skin and Complexion, 6d. and 1s.

Madame PATTI says: "Most Excellent."

Eradicates Spots and all Imperfections.

Of all Chemists, etc., or post free from S. HARVEY Ltd., 5 Denman Street, London Bridge, S.E.

"JUNO" CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

DIAMONDS from £10. 16/8 monthly. JUNO Lady's or Gents' Safety £12 12/- 21/- monthly. £14 14/-, 24/6, £16 16/-, 28/-. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories, sent post free to any part.

METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO. LTD., 75 and 76 Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.; and at Piccadilly Circus, exactly opposite the Criterion, London, W. N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. New JUNO Riding School, 1,700ft., now open.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

EASTER BANK HOLIDAY NUMBER.

No. 484.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending April 9th, 1898.

Out of the Snare.

THE summer's end was near, and a cold wind blowing off the sea made the men turn up their coat collars. A few more such evenings and the place would be dead. Even now it was an easy thing to secure a good table in the inclosure.

A hunchback, handsomely dressed, and with the air of a man of the world, sauntered along through the rows of chairs in search of a place out of the draught. His light coat caught in passing, and, without looking back he gave a little pull to loosen it, and there followed a faint exclamation of a girl's voice. He turned and raised his hat.

"Oh, I beg your pardon!"

The girl's face was very lovely, and he heard a few words of pity murmured half to herself, half to her companion:

"Poor fellow, isn't it a shame!"

The hunchback, finding the next table somewhat sheltered, sat down where he could watch her face. Being a philosopher he did not hate those who pitied him.

The girl was well worth looking at. She was cheaply dressed, with the abject insistence of prevailing fashion that characterises the woman ignorant of her good qualities, and there was the suggestion of the counter about her, but her figure was so supple, her face so youthfully sweet and delicately tinted, that a man looking at her must either have pitied her or have longed for her. The hunchback pitied her. Her companion, who was a tall, handsome man with bold blue eyes and an immobile face, evidently did the other thing.

The girl was restless, ill at ease, and seemed unaccustomed to her surroundings. She fidgeted with her gloves, pulling them off and on, and glanced timidly at her escort, only to drop her eyes when she met his gaze.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"My dear child—what did you say your name was? oh, yes, Florrie—don't you like your champagne? Isn't it sweet enough? Or shall I get you something else?"

"Oh, no, thank you," said Florrie nervously. "It's very nice." She lifted her glass to her lips and took a short sip.

The man laughed.

"It's not what you thought it would be, is it?" he said. "There's a lot of romance about champagne, after all. You'd better try a Vermouth."

"No, thank you," said Florrie. "This is lovely." And she put out her hand to stop him as he motioned to a waiter. He caught the hand in his for an instant, then leant forward his elbow on the table, and began to talk to her in low tones.

The hunchback watching her face from his more secluded seat, saw her cheeks flush, her eyes fill and droop; yet her expression was hardly that of blissful anticipation.

"Poor little thing," said the hunchback to himself.

Suddenly the girl's companion sprang up.

"Excuse me one moment, won't you?" he said hastily. "There's a man over there that—I'll be back directly."

He called a waiter and ordered some wine for the girl. "Au revoir, little one," he added, and he made his way across the space in front of the bandstand, his handsome figure pushing on without apology. Reaching a table opposite, he seemed to be exchanging greetings with a party of four or five men, and to be resisting invitations to be seated. At last, with a shrug and a backward glance, he sat down, turning his back upon the table he had left.

Florrie sat still as he had left her, looking more nervous than ever. Her wine stood untasted, and she kept her eyes cast down, while waves of colour came and went upon her soft cheeks.. The hunchback rose at length, and sat down at her table.

"I hope I didn't hurt you when I brushed by you a few moments ago," he said gently.

"Oh, no, sir," said Florrie timidly, with a frightened glance across the garden at the broad back of her companion. She gathered her little belongings together, and half rose as if to flee to him, but the hunchback stopped her.

"Don't mind me," he said kindly; "I only came because this is hardly the place for you to sit alone. Your—friend should not have left you."

"Oh, he'll be back soon," she said, and sat down reassured.

"Is this your first visit here?" he asked, after a pause.

"It—no, not exactly," she answered with a quick flush. "I've been here once before with a gentleman and a lady, Miss Lehman, and a friend of hers."

"And who is Miss Lehman?"

"She's a girl who's in the same house of business as I am, and is down here for a holiday,—like me," explained the girl, waxing communicative under the influence of a sympathetic listener.

"She's an awf'ly nice girl, and a perfect lady. Older than I am, she is too."

"And do you like this place?" said the hunchback, in a low tone. He was beginning to long to do something for this girl, to warn her, to hold her back—and at any moment that man might return—and he did not know how to begin. He longed to be able to tell her of her peril, but how could he do it? He was so interested in the girl's situation that he hardly heard her answer.

"No—I mean—not so very; it isn't so much fun as I thought it was."

"That is a pity," said the hunchback And you look tired," he continued in a low tone. "Wouldn't you like to go home?"

The girl started and blushed again, but did not reply. Her eyes sought for an instant a table on the other side of the garden. His back was still turned, and they were laughing. His shoulders shook as he sat leaning forward, his arm on the table. Florrie's eyes, returning, met those of the hunchback with a look that was an inquiry and almost an appeal.

"Oh, I'll make it all right," he said cheerfully; "I'll explain it to—what is his name?"

"Mr. Jones," murmured Florrie, "but I don't quite like to——"

"Have you known him long," persisted the hunchback.

She turned white, then crimson, and hung her head.

"Oh, I know it's awful of me," she stammered. "He spoke to me on my way to my lodgings and we had dinner, and he said I'd like to come up here for a little while, so I did—and—and"—the tears began to chase each other down her pretty cheeks—"he's been awf'ly kind, only—I wouldn't ever have done it, only it's so dull at the lodgings, and Miss Lehman's out most of the time, and I don't know anybody else to speak to—at home it's dreadful to have to be alone all the evening, and—and—oh, I don't know what to do!"

She began to sob drearily and silently. The hunchback laid his hand lightly upon hers.

"I'll tell you what to do," he said softly, his eyes on the table across the garden, where a breaking-up seemed to be in progress. "Let me take you out of this." His breath came quick and his disengaged hand beat his cane nervously against the table.

"Never mind Mr. Jones," he continued eagerly, "he isn't worth it. He'd no business to bring you here and no right to leave you alone. Do come," he urged; "I'll explain to him."

Digitized by Google

He rose with decision, and the frightened girl mechanically followed his example. He gathered up her possessions, and led her away, keeping as much in the shadow as possible.

Reaching the entrance, he looked back, his heart in his mouth. He saw the tall man making his way to the table he had left. "Maybe I'd better go back," whispered Florrie; "he may be angry, and he acted like a perfect gentleman."

"No, no," murmured the hunchback, "for goodness' sake—trust me." He hardly knew what he was saying, for a tall man with bold blue eyes was hurrying towards the entrance. He hurried Florrie along, and they pushed their way into the middle of a small crowd. They got away without being seen by Mr. Jones. The hunchback breathed more freely. He was able to make a poor jest on the outwitted escort of little Florrie. The girl did not respond. She was nervous, not certain of herself, perhaps even a little disappointed.

The girl's little hand lay upon the hunchback's arm; her pretty head was but little higher than his own. He had shunned the women of his own class, and this girl, winsome and temporarily dependent on him, was strange and pleasing. He did not speak, the silence was so pleasant. At last he was startled by the sound of sobbing beside him.

"Why, you poor child!" he cried, "what is the matter?"

He would have stopped, but she hurried him on.

"Oh! how good you are!" she cried; "I understand now—let us hurry! I'm so frightened!—Oh, I ought to thank you and I can't—I'll never forget—never—Oh, oh!"

She stopped, clutching his arm, her lips quivering, her tear-filled eyes gleaming in the bright light of a lamp. For the moment she was transfigured; there was a look of the woman's soul on her face brought there by the knowledge of her danger.

The hunchback fastened his eyes upon her, and drew a deep breath. His heart beat till he thought she must hear it. He looked at her cheap dress, her delicate face, from which the higher look was vanishing already; his head swam. Then he took the hand lying upon his arm and raised it to his lips.

"That is right," he said gently, "never forget—never!"

A fly was standing close to them and the hunchback led her to it. "Get in," he said. "Where shall I tell him? No, you shall tell him yourself; that will be better. Wait a moment, I had something to say to you'—what was it? Oh, I can't remember——"

"I want to thank you," panted the girl.

"No, dear, no. Good-night, good-night." He drew a half-crown from his pocket and thrust it into the hand of the driver.

"When she gives you the address, drive as fast as you can. Do you hear?"

And he pushed his hands into his pockets, and walked away as rapidly as he could.

A few yards further on he paused to listen to the lessening roll of the wheels. When he was out of hearing—"What an idiot I am!" he murmured. "I think the occasion demands that I get extremely intoxicated."

And he went back to the parade. It had grown very cold, and the lights glared, and the orchestra played out of tune. A withered leaf fluttered from one of the flower boxes and fell into the hunchback's tumbler. He fished it out and swore a little. There was no doubt that the end of the summer had come.

Wallace Wallis.

Digitized by Google

Unearthed and Re-Edited by Robert Machray.

The Narrative of Colonel John Ambler, formerly of Sabine's Brigade.

There hath been so much said, and so much more wickedly imagined against him whom I was long proud to call my master, to wit, John Churchill, the first Duke of Marlborough, that it hath entered into my mind to make public that which is within my own knowledge of the famous diamonds of the Duchess.

Not that the Duchess's diamonds were ever made the subject of unseemly debate, save once, when the "dubious means" by which they came into the possession of her Grace were not obscurely hinted at by a certain rascally pamphleteer of Harley's party.

But I have considered this:—

Here is one affair of which now I alone know the fact; and in it I can see naught with which the Duke, my Lord, could be charged.

So, were the truth set out in each case that hath been brought forward against him, I cannot conceive but that the genius and the many high qualities of him whom even his enemies called the greatest man of his age—and of such an age—would shine forth.

For in the instance which I here relate, it will appear that his Grace did great service to Her Majesty in obtaining money by means of which he procured "timely and good advices"—to copy the words his Grace himself used, when he refuted the slanderous statements which had been founded upon the words of Sir Solomon Medina, of whom more anon—of the movements of the French in the Low Countries.

He also outwitted a knave, as I esteem him, and at the same time gave an especial degree of pleasure to his lady, whose true lover he was so long as he lived.

As all the world knoweth, his Grace was born in Devonshire, and there, I too; so that when I entered upon my career in the Army I was commended to his favour by this circumstance. Thus it was that on several occasions I was sent by him on secret and even perilous adventures, the conduct of which, a fair and successful issue having come about, was not displeasing to him.

Often would his Grace lament in my hearing, for he ever treated me as a friend, and one in whom he might trust, which, God wot, was true, how he was hampered in the field by the cavils of the Dutch Deputies, and more also in general by the want of money which he might use as he deemed to be of advantage for private intelligence and secret service, without having to render account to the Parliament in London.

For none knew better than he that there were times when secret moneys often might be employed to good purpose both in spying upon the enemy in his camps, and also in defeating and bringing to nought the plans of the French King, who was ever meditating this treachery or that.

During the war it hath been a common practice with the generals of the Army to procure moneys by various devices for their private purposes. Now, it hath been by obtaining such and such a sum from the persons who contracted for the supply of bread and provisions for the soldiers, or even of fodder for the horses; and, again, by the deduction of a per-centum from the pay given by the Emperor or other of the Allies.

There accompanied his Grace in most or perhaps all of his campaigns, one whom no man liked and many hated. This was Sir Solomon Medina, a Hebrew of vast wealth, whose business it was to provide bread and bread waggons for the army. Often was the food scant and poor, and the soldiers put the blame of this on Medina. But it was a matter of rumour that the rich Jew was so much in the confidence of the Duke of Marlborough—it was even said, what was a shameful thing to say, that the Copyright, 1898, by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., in the United States of America.

Digitized by Google

Duke was so much in the pay of Sir Solomon—that Medina was able to send intelligence of the result of his Grace's victories to London, and that by a day or two before his Grace's couriers arrived with his dispatches for the Queen.

Being but a plain man of the West country, and a soldier to boot—the hand that acts, and not the mind that guides—I marvelled greatly wherein lay an advantage to Medina in the use of this knowledge so quickly communicated, as was said, to his friends in England. I was now destined to perceive the why and the wherefore.

It was past the middle of the year 1708, and the Army of the Netherlands, which had been greatly heartened by the arrival of the Prince Eugene, knew that it was the Duke's mind to force a great battle, and so put an end to the war. Vendôme, a skilful general and a yet more skilful plotter, had procured the surrender of Ghent and Bruges by treachery, and the French now threatened the fortress of Oudenarde—a name not to be forgotten while men live upon the earth.

The great victory of Oudenarde was won by the Duke and the Prince Eugene—my master ever placed the Prince's name before his own, but herein I take leave to depart from his Grace—on the 11th of July. On the night of the 9th, the Duke sent for me to go to his tent, where presently I found him with Mr. Cardonnel, his Grace's secretary, but in so great a fever that he told me they had been trying to persuade him to go to Brussels, a project which he by no means entertained, as he was resolved to fight the French as soon as an opportunity served.

His Grace also said that he was greatly vexed by letters he had received from England, where the envy and malice of his opponents were ever quick to work him ill. Then he declared he was heartily weary of the war, and longed for nothing so much as to be at home with the Duchess and their children. Next he desired me in especial to keep near him, as he was minded to send me to England with news of the first great battle we might be engaged in, and so desired me to have all things in readiness for the journey.

The next day his Grace was better, and with a rapidity of movement which was truly wonderful, but which was characteristic of the Duke's generalship when he so ordered it, the army marched from Asche with but a brief halt or two all that day, most of the night, and all the following morning, until the Scheldt was crossed and the two armies met, coming to blows first of all on the high ground above Oudenarde.

It was past four o'clock in the afternoon before the battle was general. What followed was marked by a confusion and disorder which showed how little the French generals, and especially the Duke of Burgundy, could make up their minds what to do in the presence of so a great a captain as my master. According to his Grace's direction I kept as near him as I could, and it was not difficult to see that he was satisfied with what was going forward.

It was about nine in the evening, and the daylight was nearly fled. Once more the star of my Lord, the Duke, was in the ascendant, and another great victory of the English upon the French had fallen to be chronicled. The Duke called me to him, and never did I see him, always a man of noble and graceful appearance—whether soldier most or courtier most I cannot tell—more tranquil or composed.

And yet his first words showed perhaps why his mien was not marked by a greater feeling of exultation.

"Oh, for two more hours of daylight," he said, "and we should have made an end of this war!"

Then he protested in a manner most solemn that he preferred before any personal concern the good of his Queen and his country, and that nothing would make the Queen's business go so well if but the battle had been utterly decisive. Next he spoke of the knavish politics and designs of certain people who were near the Queen's person and were no friends of his, and how they kept him from the procurement of moneys which were needed for carrying on the war, which he now predicted might even yet continue for some time. "But," said he, "I see a way."

As for me, I was in a great amazement that any man on the instant of his having won so great a victory, a new glory to the arms of England, should, as it

"You can tell her ladyship that she may have the diamonds."

Digitized by Google

were, take such calm and steady view of aught but the battle itself.

He gave me charge to get me to London as speedily as I might, giving me at the same time a letter for the Duchess, and the strange command to be to her an eye that should see, and an ear that should hear, and a tongue that should speak in no wise but as her Grace herself should bid me.

Above all, and this, it appeared, was the essence of the thing, I was straightly charged to be in London as soon as, or, if fortune might help so far, before the messengers of Medina. And if the chances of the way or of the wave were to prove themselves hostile to the adventure, it was to be my duty to strive to delay these riders of Medina. Then he gave me his hand and a private message for the ear of the Duchess only —the carriage of which to her Grace was a great honour to place upon me.

"You can tell her Ladyship," said he with a smile, as I was taking my leave, "that she may have the diamonds"—a speech the meaning of which I knew not at the time.

Men have said many harsh things against his Grace, but no man yet hath had the hardihood to make suggestion that the great Duke was not of all great men the most singular in this, that he was ever constant and faithful to his wife, the Duchess Sarah.

It so happened that the nearest road to Ostende, which was by way of Ghent, was in the hands of the enemy, and so I had to make my way in the night to Courtray, which lies to the south of Oudenarde, and then on to the highway, from which the port of Ostende is about eight leagues distant.

I told them a tale about myself.

I was mounted on my own beautiful horse, the equal of which for fidelity and swiftness I know not, and the ride was one that was within his powers; but there were many stragglers from the beaten army of Vendôme who would have liked nothing so much as cutting me off.

Being favoured by fortune, my journey proceeded without check or misadventure, and as the day broke I rode through a village, which I remembered in former years, of the name of Tourout, and I knew then that Ostende would be reached by me in safety, for it was but a few miles further on.

And here in the port I saw several vessels, and amongst them the White Swan, which I knew to belong to Sir Solomon Medina. And so I judged, the ship being all in readiness to set sail, that the messengers of the bread contractor had not yet arrived, but were expected. Then I went to an inn, where I was not unknown, and broke my fast, and inquired of mine host as to what time there would be a ship sailing for the Thames or some port as near London as could be reached at once. But I could hear of none, nor could I procure any.

While I was thus making no progress in the effort, two men entered the inn. It was easy to perceive that they were not soldiers, but, assuming an air of great importance, they called aside the keeper of the inn, and, after a time, they were good enough to devote to me a portion of their regard.

Then mine host approached me, and declared who they were: that they were about to sail for London in the White Swan, and that he had done his devoir to get passage for me along with them, and that they were not inclined to take me. However, he recommended me to speak to them myself.

Dropping his voice to a whisper, he thereupon asked me if I had heard the news of the Duke's defeat. I could scarce refrain from smiling, but I commanded myself, and asked him what he knew; to which he replied that the men whom I had seen talking to him had brought report that his Grace had been routed with great slaughter whilst he was crossing the Dender two days before.

I could not but make the observation to myself that these men must know—knowing the Duke's position so positively on the 10th—the exact time when the Duke had reached Lessines, and so had secured the passage of the Dender, and that it was most probable that they were also acquainted with what had followed, and so that it was most likely that they had come from Oudenarde itself. That they were Medina's men I hazarded a shrewd guess; for why else should they be sailing in the White Swan; but why was it, I could not but ask myself, that they were bruiting about a disaster to the Duke which was pure fiction.

So I kept my own counsel, and made bold to ask the two men further particulars of the battle. To which they, nothing loath, made response in an invention, complicated with many details, of how at last the most wonderful general of the time had been totally overthrown.

Digitized by Google

Calling for wine for their entertainment, I told them a tale about myself in return for their lies about the Duke of Marlborough.

I said I had been summoned to England to see my mother, who was on the point of death, but that I had encountered much difficulty in getting passage thither, and that I would be their servant to the extent of several broad pieces if they would take me with them on board the White Swan. But the senior of the two men, who seemed to be a person of authority, maintained that it was not possible, as their instructions forbade their doing anything of the sort.

However, I was resolved that go with them I should, and so, when they walked down to the ship from the inn, I went along with them, laughing and speaking to them as if I had given up all thought of going in their vessel, and, as I had nothing with me but my sword, they had no suspicions of me. Presently the ship was cast off, and as they were waving their adieux to me and I to them, it appeared no doubt to them that I stepped too far forward by mischance, and so fell into the water.

One of the crew threw me a rope which, being a fair swimmer, albeit very tired from my long ride, I was in no great hurry to take hold of. I made several feints, notwithstanding, to do so, until at last, perceiving how we were some distance from the shore, and fearing that after all they might not be too much inclined to have me on board the ship—which indeed I afterwards found to be the case—and so let me drown, I permitted myself to be drawn to the ship's side, and thence on to the deck, but in a very exhausted and almost dying condition. Indeed, I was so far spent that I swooned away.

When I came to myself, the master of the White Swan told me that there had been a great discussion and even some fierce words between the two men of Medina, but as the hours passed on without my making recovery, they at length agreed to leave me alone. Next morning we were in England, and having promised to pay them a hundred pieces when we arrived in London, we journeyed thither together, which was a great thing for me, as they had horses waiting for them. As they evinced some anxiety to finger my money, and in some sort, indeed, regarded me as their prisoner, held, as it were, for ransom, they procured horses for me also along the way.

Travelling with great diligence, we made London that night, and I had the happiness to deliver my Lord's letter to her Grace, and the private message with which he had charged me. The Duchess read over my Lord's letter once and then again, and then a third time. Dismissing me with many gracious words, after having asked how I had fared on the way, and particularly of the two men with whom I had travelled, she commanded me to wait upon her the following morning.

I had the happiness to deliver my Lord's letter to her Grace.

I had all but forgotten to give her Grace that last word of my master about the diamonds, but it came into mind in time, and I told her Grace of it. Whereupon she appeared highly delighted.

That night I slept as soundly as any other wearied wayfarer might do, yet in the morning I was up betimes, and I at once perceived, from the downcast looks of those I chanced to meet, that there was something evil or terrible in the air. Inquiring what the matter might be, I was near thrown into an ague on being told that the heavy news had come to the town that the Duke of Marlborough, hitherto the invincible captain of the age, had suffered a sore defeat at the hands of Vendôme and the Duke of Burgundy.

My mind is not of that sort which thinks or reasons quickly, but to connect this most infernal report with the two men of Medina, along with whom I had journeyed, would have been not difficult even for a child. Yet being but simple and unskilled in the meaning of so cruel an artifice, I did wonder.

Yea, for one brief space, the thought did come: "Could there be even a shred of truth in the story?" However, I dismissed this absurd notion the moment it came.

When I waited upon her Grace, I thought it within my duty to mention what was now the talk of the town; to which the Duchess replied, as one who was well pleased, and in possession of some key to the riddle I could not read—that the thing suited marvellously well.

Digitized by Google

Remembering the Duke's strange command of silence which he laid upon me, I had held my peace, saying never a word, good or bad, as to what I knew of the bloody battle of Oudenarde and the destruction of the French. And now, here was my Lady, who knew that there indeed had been a great victory, appearing well disposed to hear that the tidings of my Lord's overthrow should be shaking the hearts of all men in London.

"You shall know," she said with a sprightly movement, "this evening or to-morrow."

"The Queen?" I made bold to say.

Then her Grace said that she would take me to see the Queen that night, but that she had other business which she desired me to transact for her, and which would occupy me all that day. She gave me two letters, one having the address on it of Sir Francis Child, at "The Marygold," in Fleet Street, and the other that of Sir Charles Duncombe, at "The Grasshopper," in Lumbard Street, both of whom were goldsmiths and bankers of great reputation.

Her Grace likewise said, although I have since thought that she did intend to throw dust into my eyes, only the event turned out so pat, that Sir Charles Duncombe had for sale some diamond pendants with three brilliant drops to each, which she greatly admired, and which his Grace had promised to give her on his winning his first great battle of the campaign of that year. She added that if the matter should prove according to her expectations, I might have the pleasure of bringing them to her on my return from Lumbard Street in the afternoon.

We greeted each other.

So I hied me toward the City, and presently in Fleet Street came upon the sign of the Childs, "The Marygold," carved in oak, its ground painted green with a gilt border, and above it the rising sun; underneath was the motto of Sir Francis, "Ainsi mon âme." Having delivered the letter of her Grace, I was desired by Sir Francis himself to go with his partner to Lumbard Street to meet Sir Charles Duncombe, whither we accordingly went.

Here there is a great hive of busy goldsmiths and exchangers dealing in the national funds and stocks after methods which were invented in the time of the late King William, and there be many of these very rich merchants, each with his own device above his door, such as "The Black Horse," "The Grapes," "The Goat," "The Flower de Luce," "The Black Boy," and so forth.

But it was in Change Alley, at the Royal Exchange, which one hath called "a narrow sound, but deep as Hell, Change Alley, dreadful name!" that we met with Sir Charles Duncombe, who looked ill at ease and much depressed, as he said, over the news of the defeat of the Duke of Marlborough. On taking him aside and delivering to him the letter of her Grace, I perceived a sudden joyful change to express itself upon his countenance. Yet scarcely had this happiness shone forth from his eyes when it instantly disappeared, being replaced by his former dolorous air and habit of melancholy.

Then the two goldsmiths discussed in my hearing and in that of others who joined themselves to us, what would be the result upon the war of the disaster which had befallen the Duke in the Low Countries. One said this thing, and another that; but all declared with one accord that it was a grievous and heavy matter for the Queen and the country, and then they would shake their heads and sigh.

Yet, notwithstanding all their dejection, I did observe that they ceased not for a moment to carry on their business of buying and selling the Funds, although it certainly seemed to me that there were many people who sold and never bought, and others who bought and did not sell. There was much hubbub and a babble of voices, and, as I stood and gazed upon the Alley, which was now packed with people, and watched their aspect and gesture, and all the excitement and the turmoil of the place, I could not but think that here again I was looking on at what was in some sort a battle, and herein I was right, as I afterwards learnt.

I spent nearly all the day with these merchants, being requested in especial to do so by Sir Charles Duncombe, who said he would probably have an important message to send her Grace by me that afternoon. As I walked about, having excused myself to Sir Charles, I chanced to meet, just under the ensign of "The Angel and the Crown," another goldsmith's shop, one of the two men of Sir Solomon in close and earnest conversation with the Hebrew banker.

Digitized by Google

This was he who acted as the senior of the two, and who first told me of the defeat of the Duke when we had encountered each other in the tavern at Ostende. When he saw me advancing to speak to him, being desirous to ask him to what house I should send the hundred pieces which I had promised for my passage money, he looked at me with great surprise and wonder, and as one not too well pleased with the meeting. However, we greeted each other, and, after a few words about the money I had bargained to give him, he inquired of me if I ever took an adventure in the Funds—a manner of speaking which was as dark as night to me.

To him I replied, and that with some coldness, that I was a soldier and that fighting was my trade; as for money I liked it well enough, but knew no way of getting it save by the sword.

Being in no wise offended at my speech, he made answer that there were other ways of getting it and more certain. "Here," said he, "is a place where gold lies about the streets for them that know the secret of it." As I inquired more of the matter, he explained to me that on such a day as the present, when everyone was heavy and dejected by reason of the news of the Duke's defeat, that people sold out what sums they had in the Funds, and would be content to obtain well nigh any price offered provided it was in gold or silver.

"Then," continued he, "it may fall out that the Duke's defeat may be but a small affair, may be even no defeat at all; the same people who sold to-day thinking the world was about to end, will buy back to-morrow into the Funds, and be content to pay a much higher price than that at which they now sell."

Thanking him for his courtesy I left him, and as it was now nigh about four o'clock in the afternoon, I went on to "The Grasshopper," musing as I proceeded on what sort of strange business this was; and now it flashed upon me like a sudden light what was the plan of the Duke, and why silence had been enjoined upon me.

I now perceived that it had been Medina's purpose to spread abroad the report of the defeat, although he knew all the time that it was a great victory, and so to induce holders of the Funds, being thrown into a panic by the news, to sell out, when, doubtless, he would have his agents and brokers to buy for him. Then, when the tidings of the victory had arrived, and the spirits of men were raised thereat, he would be in readiness to supply back again to them the Funds, and that at his own price.

This had been his practice on other occasions, and my master, the Duke, must have been aware of it, and was now taking advantage of it for his own ends. As I afterwards discovered, Sir Charles Duncombe, with the support of Sir Francis Child, who was banker to my Lord, the Duke, had acted in such a manner that he stood in the place of Medina on behalf of the Duke.

It was easy to be seen that the goldsmiths were well satisfied, and when we three, Sir Charles, one of the Childs, and myself, were all closeted together in a private room, they threw off the cloak of sadness they had constrained themselves to wear, and shouted with glee like boys at school. To-morrow, they told me, the Duke's courier, Lord Stair, was expected to arrive in London, when the whole truth would be known in regard to the glorious field of Oudenarde.

It was now that Sir Charles went out of the room, and presently returning, handed to me a handsome case which he bade me open. In it were the diamonds of which the Duchess had spoken to me in the morning.

Sir Charles told me that the Duchess the winter before had desired my Lord to buy these diamonds for her, but he had put the matter off to a more convenient season, as he was short of money at the time. The Duke, knowing what a great sum he would be likely to obtain through the operation of the goldsmiths, had ordered Sir Charles to send the Duchess the diamonds, if there would be only a good probability of the successful issue of his plans.

They also gave me a letter for the Duchess, along with the case, and I afterwards learnt that the two bankers, who were reputed the richest men in the city, having made a large amount along with the Duke, had together made a present of these diamonds to her Grace.

As for me, I was not altogether satisfied with the part I had played in this affair, albeit a soldier's duty is to obey, until the Duke himself had told me that the money he had obtained by his campaign in Change Alley had been devoted to the secret service and private intelligence of the army, whereby throughout the rest of the summer of 1708 my Lord was able to receive the information which led to the capture of several of the great forts of the enemy.

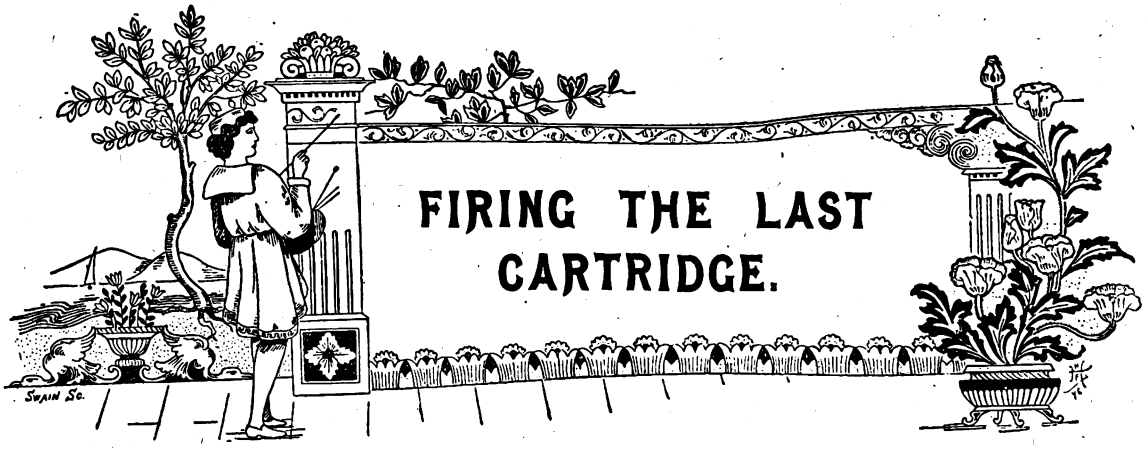
However, I was better pleased when the Duchess took me with her to see the Queen; and as I had been given leave to say what I knew, I told her Majesty of the great victory her Army had achieved.

It hath been customary to give the messenger bringing such tidings as I announced to the Queen, a reward of £500, but that in this case belonged by right to my Lord Stair, who was the Duke's courier by formal appointment. But the Queen would have it that I should be given the £500, which I begged leave upon my knees to be allowed to refuse; whereupon her Majesty commanded that I should be given her portrait set in precious stones.

Next day there was none in London but knew that Oudenarde had been fought and won; and, next to a victory itself, there is nothing that so stirs the souls of men as the report thereof.

(Next Week: "The First Black Friday.")

Digitized by Google



FIRING THE LAST CARTRIDGE.

It was the first of September, 1870. From four o'clock in the morning the formidable noise of the firing and the smoke filled Bazeilles, Balon, and the vicinity. Many times those two villages had been taken and retaken.

About seven o'clock the Germans were repulsed by the celebrated bayonet charge of the Second Regiment of Marine Infantry, and yielded on all sides and gave way. The main street of Bazeilles, the adjacent streets. the gardens, the ditches, were full of human bodies and Bavarian wounded. But the enemy energetically sustained themselves and attacked us with more troops, before which our exhausted and decimated soldiers were obliged to retire.

At this moment I heard the Colonel call Captain Bourgey, of the Thirteenth Company, and order him to occupy the large house facing the street, and commissioned him to defend and keep it, cost what it might. It was the house called "Bourgerie."

I was then an under-officer in the Thirteenth Company, which by the combat of the day before had been reduced to only sixty men.

Captain Bourgey took possession of the house and ordered the Fifth Company to follow him. This was the company of Delaury, in which also there were no more than sixty or seventy men.

The two lieutenants had been killed. The two under-lieutenants were Escombet and Saint Felix. M. Bourgey, the oldest by rank, was to conduct the defence.

A few minutes after we had been installed we saw our men in retreat, passing near the house. Two officers, Captains Aubert and Vicard, had only time to take refuge with us in order to avoid the firing which was threatening, and also at the same time we received Commander Lambert, wounded in the ankle and supported by two soldiers. It was eight o'clock.

Rapidly M. Bourgey distributed his forces, and soon we heard a continuous discharge coming from both floors, from the ground floor, and from the roof, gathering a rich harvest from the Saxon forces.

We suffered also from the fire of the enemy, because the projectiles fell heavily upon our open window; but as they were coming obliquely from below, the soldiers warned, could very easily, by stooping just a little, avoid a greater part of the shots. At any rate, we took good aim, resting our guns on any support, and every ball counted.

I recollect that Captain Bourgey, our former professor of shooting, and Captain Aubert, both very remarkable marksmen, slaughtered the Germans as if they were ordinary game. They were on the second floor, and from there M. Bourgey conducted the defence, while in the other parts of the house Delaury and Escombet conducted the firing of their followers.

About half-past eight an incident happened. We had not eaten for thirty-six hours, and hunger tormented our stomachs cruelly. In the cellar some soldiers discovered many barrels of wine and beer, and upon the shelves of the closet were large jars of butter.

One can guess the result of the discovery. Soon our sergeant came to warn Captain Bourgey that many soldiers had invaded the basement, had opened the barrels, and were drinking with avidity.

The Captain went downstairs immediately, and noticed that some soldiers were really very excited. The moment was badly chosen for such a banquet. How to prevent the consequences of such a bad example, and forbid thirsty soldiers access to the barrels to slake their thirsts! Captain Bourgey, thanks to his presence of mind, solved the situation.

"But don't you know," he said, "that the Bavarians slept here last night, and that they poisoned those barrels?"

The effect was like a thunderbolt. All the soldiers fled, asking for an antidote, which M. Bourgey promised them if they repulsed the enemy and opened the way to the drug store.

Being quieted by this, our officers remained alone in the cellars, where they could refresh themselves, quickly dividing among them some biscuits with butter, and drinking glasses of wine pretended to be poisoned. Then they went upstairs. However, the cartridges were nearly all used. An under-officer was placed as sentinel on the roof, to keep the Captain au courant of the disposition taken by the enemy. The Germans, after many fruitless efforts to take us in front, tried an attack from the rear, by which manœuvre we were completely isolated, and in the centre of the Bavarian army. Our position was a desperate one.

As we were obliged to succumb without any profit to our cause, our officers discussed the question of making a sortie which, perhaps, would permit us to join our troops, who were in retreat. But this sortie; is it possible? To leave the house by the door was such a perilous adventure that none of us could escape death. They decided to make the exit by the rear, by making a hole in the wall with a bar of iron found in the court-yard.

Digitized by Google

The wall was thick and solid; the work advanced very slowly—so slowly that after an hour the hole was only made large enough for one man to pass. Our minutes were numbered. We would be obliged to abandon the house, one by one, creeping along, and besides, we should be obliged to leave Commandant Lambert, which we would not do at any price. Notwithstanding the supplications of this brave officer, who desired us to go without him, saying that the interest of the Fatherland should take the place of personal interests, we renounced the retreat.

After getting the opinion of all our officers of both companies, our chief decided that we would defend ourselves as long as any means remained. Besides, we had hopes that our troops would get us out of this difficult situation.

Alas! about ten o'clock, General von de Tann, warned of our desperate resistance, succeeded in bringing near one battery of artillery. But scarcely was it in position than the soldiers were killed with our bullets. Others took their places, and were killed in their turn. Finally the guns were protected behind some obstacle. Now we were at their mercy. A cannon ball struck the right wing of the house, and destroyed it with a great noise. The second projectile fell upon the roof, which it demolished and set on fire. Many men were killed by the falling débris; the bullets succeeded one another without interruption—we were surrounded by flames.

In the meantime the Bavarian Infantry, reinforced, profited by our bad situation, and advanced to the walls, where our bullets could not reach them. The situation was most critical.

In fact, in looking about, at the risk of being killed, the sentinel above saw soldiers were digging below the walls of our improvised fortress for the purpose of blowing us up in the air. I confess that at this moment many of our men were entirely disconcerted. The alternative of being blown up by the explosion or crushed under the roof destroyed by the artillery, and in either case to be roasted alive among the ruins, had nothing particularly pleasant, and was enough to move the courage of the firmest.

At the same moment the hurrahs of the Bavarians, and their bugle calls, announced that we were about to be annihilated, and they rushed to the pillage.

I remember besides that, notwithstanding the noise, I heard distinctly the cries of the German officers: "Ergeben Sie sich! Ergeben Sie sich!" ("Surrender! surrender!") We answered by bullets.

We were sustained by the tenacity and cold blood of our officers, who, in this dramatic crisis, preserved an astonishing presence of mind. I still see Commandant Lambert, lying suffering from his horrible wound, who urged us on to the struggle; I still see Captain Bourgey in many places at once, facing the storm in every place and giving us encouragement to hold out until the reinforcements approached; I still see Captain Aubert, stimulating our energy by showing the bodies of enemies killed by our bullets; Lieutenant Escombet, intrepid and audacious, boldly risking his life.

I see, too, alas! our comrades killed or wounded lying upon the floor of the rooms. How many broken arms and legs, how many crushed chests, how many open skulls! What blood!

About half-past ten Captain Bourgey was struck on the leg by a piece of wall detached by a cannon ball, and fell down fainting. His wound gave him a momentary shock, but was without gravity, and fifteen minutes later he was able to renew the combat.

At eleven o'clock we had only eleven cartridges. Our officers vied with each other for the honour of firing them and killing the last Germans. After this we could do nothing. We only stoically waited for the explosion under our feet.

Our agony was horrible.

Suddenly the door of the house, which we had barricaded with furniture, was violently forced open, and a crowd of Bavarians invaded the ground floor with bayonets on their guns. The horrible butchery commenced in the midst of the clashing of steel. But we were overcome, three fourths of those still living were wounded and exhausted; the struggle was too unequal.

When even we repulsed the assailants and went into the court. We fell in the midst of the enemy, whose irritation was at its height.

They rushed upon us to disarm and massacre us. We would have passed a sad fifteen minutes had it not been for the intervention of the Bavarian captain, M. Lissiguano, who saved our lives in turning aside these furious ones. I heard the generous adversary say at this moment in very good French:

"The unhappiness of to-day is upon you; to-morrow perhaps it will be our turn. I was eight years in your foreign legion in Africa, and I esteem the chivalric character of your nation. Honour, then, the courage of the unhappy! You are prisoners of war, and you have the right to be protected by the conqueror."

Then, Escombet, desperate, tried to shoot himself because he did not want to support the humiliation of captivity. It was M. Bourgey himself who wrenched away his revolver, and told him to preserve his existence which, later, would be precious to his country.

We were disarmed. The officers, however, by the special favour of General von der Tann, and on account of our heroic defence, kept their arms.

Before the intervention of Captain Lissiguano, we were literally plucked by the Bavarians, who had emptied our pockets and taken all our possessions. Many of our men succeeded in concealing their most precious objects by slipping them into their boots, and in that way they were seriously impeded in marching to Kencourt, where they conducted us.

There the priest gave us dinner. He placed beds for the officers, and the encampment for the soldiers, in the church. It is from the church that we followed the last phases of the battle.

But we must return to relate the episode worthy of being known.

We were disarmed, and we abandoned the house of combat, when one shot from the first floor struck one of the Prussian officers mortally. It was our last cartridge. It was fired by an Alsatian, a soldier by the name of Tapfkeit, from the Thirteenth Company, who sent to the enemy his last souvenir.

Two Bavarians rushed to kill the offender. He let them come, and at the moment when they approached him, he seized the revolver of the officer who was near and fired two bullets upon the aggressors, who fell to the ground.

After turning his pistol against himself, he cried!

"A bas les Prussiens! Vive la France!"

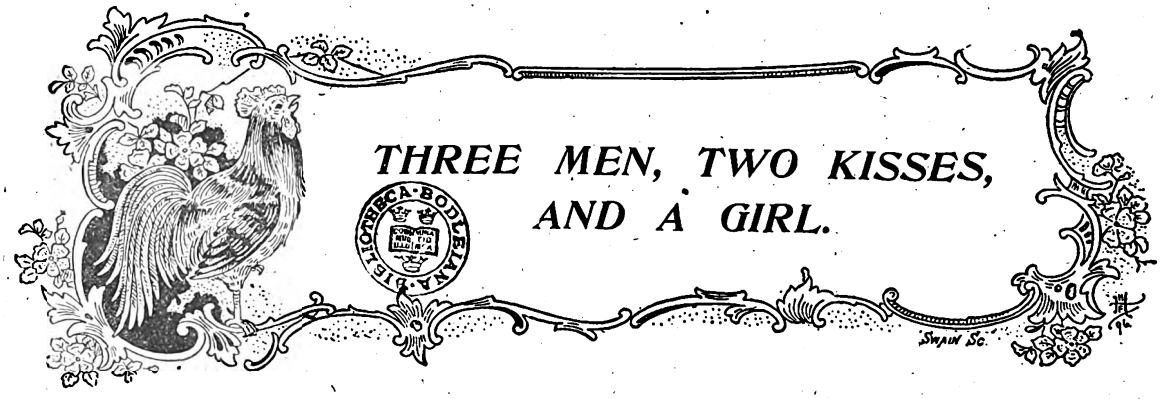
Then he shot himself. Honour this obscure hero.

LE VIER.

Digitized by Google



THREE MEN, TWO KISSES, AND A GIRL.

BIBLIOTECA-BODLEIANA

Major Penton,

To Miss Isabel Hobson Dr.

To One Kiss, delivered.....£1,000.

A prompt remittance will oblige.

This was the Major's Easter egg. Small wonder that he felt out of sorts, and that even three brandy-and-sodas utterly failed to restore his equanimity. This little bill epitomised a whole volume of incident. It was something like this:

A man named Harrington—who, by request of some member whose name no one has since been able to discover, had secured the privileges of the Major's club for a fortnight—was the cause of it all, and it happened on a certain "ladies' night," destined never to fade from the memory of poor Penton.

In the course of the evening there had entered a woman who was universally conceded to be a "poem of loveliness," and whom the Major characterised as a "dream." The Major, flattered by the reputation of being the most distinguished looking man in the club, was introduced, obtained the favour of a waltz, and afterwards retired to the card-room in a state of perspiration and tender sentiment.

By seeming chance—but, as the Major discovered later, by fell design—Harrington met him at one of the whist tables.

Harrington also had met and danced with the Major's "dream," and the Major, softened to temporary imbecility by his evening's experience, looked upon Harrington as a rival, and wondered what the effect would be if he quarrelled with a visiting member and called him out.

"How about a game, Major?" asked Harrington.

The Major looked round. They two were alone in the card-room.

"It would suit me exactly," replied the Major, "if we had two more to make out the hand."

"We need not play whist," said Harrington smoothly. "However, you probably prefer the society of Miss Hobson——"

"That is a matter, sir," replied the Major bluntly, "that lies entirely between Miss Hobson and myself. I am quite ready for any game you like."

The Major dropped into a chair, and Harrington smiled in an exasperating way as he placed the cards on a table, and remarked:

"I have an appointment with her myself towards the close of the evening. Delightful girl, charming."

The Major grunted as the cards were dealt. Such remarks by Harrington were highly distasteful to him. Without more ado they began to play, and, although the Major thought he played well, he was beaten easily, and soon relieved of his ready money.

Penton's animosity was expressed in his play. He would not have left the table at that stage for a cool thousand.

"I am out of money," he said, "but a cheque——"

"I don't want your money," interrupted Harrington, "but I have the honour to propose a wager worth while accepting—that is, if you dare accept it."

"Dare, sir, dare!" blustered the Major. "What is the wager, sir?"

"We will play one more game on this condition: that the loser pays the penalty by kissing Miss Hobson."

The Major was on his feet in an instant.

"How you can have the brazen impudence, sir, to suggest such a thing, passes my comprehension!" he exclaimed.

Harrington was not ruffled in the least.

"I admit," he said, "that the odds are greatly in my favour. If I lose, the great and plainly apparent esteem in which the lady holds me places me in a position to cancel my obligation without any great difficulty. You, on the contrary, should you lose, might have considerable trouble."

A red flush diffused itself over Penton's features.

"And do you presume to set yourself above me in the esteem of Miss Hobson?" he queried. "Egad! I'll play the game if for nothing else than to take the conceit out of you!"

And they did play it—and the Major lost. As he rose from the table he was well-nigh overwhelmed at the prospect before him.

"Difficult, almost impossible, as the task is for you, I shall yet insist upon your performing it," declared Harrington.

"I am a man of my word," replied the Major haughtily.

He was also a man of infinite resource, although he did not say it, and he did not think that to him anything was impossible, but he very shortly departed for his home to consider how best to proceed in the difficult matter before him.

To kiss a young lady, to do this deliberately and upon slight aquaintance—the task was herculean! The Major must be tactful, diplomatic. He must summon all his reserve forces and marshal them skilfully; even then he might meet his Waterloo. He could not go at this thing with dash and verve; he must be artful, courtly, and agreeable, and he must play a waiting game.

Digitized by Google

There was one point in his favour; he suddenly remembered that the elderly lady who accompanied Miss Hobson had invited him to call. He had attributed this invitation to his handsome appearance. Here undoubtedly was the Open Sesame.

On the following afternoon he availed himself of her invitation. Fortune favoured him; Mrs. Maitland was out, but Miss Hobson was at home and would be pleased to see him.

Miss Hobson received him with delightful unconventionality. As they conversed, the fair one in some bewitching way made it seem as though they had known each other for years.

They first became familiar, then confidential, and then—— Well, they were looking at some etchings. Suddenly the Major's cherished ideas of tact, diplomacy, and a waiting game were cast to the winds. By an impulse that was irresistible he bent forward, kissed the lady at his side and straightened up with an air of martial dignity, his thoughts seeking to evolve an explanation which somehow wouldn't come.

But no explanation was needed. Miss Hobson simply laughed and went on looking at the pictures.

The Major was greatly disturbed. Was it possible that he saw the shadow of impending evil already hovering above his devoted head? When he left, Miss Hobson bade him farewell with an air of proprietorship which he did not relish. A rough hand had suddenly sounded a discord on the harp of the Major's fancy. Of course Miss Hobson was beautiful, charming, but—well, there were others.

The Major was a little disgusted with himself when he went to bed that night. When he got up he was greeted with the bill whose single item is duly set forth at the beginning of this veracious chronicle.

After mature reflection, the Major sat down and wrote the following note:

Miss Isabel Hobson,

Madam,—Your bill came duly to hand. I have no recollection of having ordered the goods invoiced; but, be this as it may, is not your price a little high?—Very truly,

J. Thomas Penton.

The following afternoon the Major had the great pleasure of reading these lines:

Dear Sir:—It matters little whether or not you ordered the goods. You certainly received them, and the courts hold this to be a bona-fide expression of debt. To refresh your memory, I inclose a photograph taken at the time goods were delivered. As to my price being exorbitant, please reflect that I could have made it two thousand as well as one.—Hoping for an early remittance, I remain, yours truly,

Isabel Hobson.

A cabinet photograph of himself in the act of kissing Miss Hobson had dropped on the floor. He groaned as he picked it up and looked at it.

At this interesting point a servant announced Mr. Ralph Summers, a friend of the Major's.

"I can't see him now," said the Major. "I just simply can't! Tell him to call again."

"But he says he must see you," returned the servant; "he says it is a case of life and death."

The Major could not resist this appeal, and he hastily tucked Miss Hobson's letter and the photograph into a convenient drawer and arose to meet his friend.

Mr. Summers was round of form, bald and florid. He was pallid, extremely nervous, and there was a wild glare in his eyes.

"Major," he said hoarsely, sinking into a chair, "you see before you a desperate man. I am ruined, sir. My character is gone, and when a respectable member of Society finds his character gone, what relief is there but in the laudanum bottle? Where can——"

"That will do, Summers!" broke in the Major. "You seem to imagine that you're the only man in the country that can have trouble. Egad, sir, you have no monopoly of despair."

"But you don't know it all, Major. Why, it's simply awful! To think that I, at my time of life, should rashly bet that I could—could kiss a certain woman in within twenty-four hours, and——"

"Wait a minute!" cried the Major. "Let me understand you. You made a bet that you would kiss a certain woman within twenty-four hours?"

"I did," was the hollow rejoinder.

"What, here?"

"Yes, here!"

"When?"

"A month ago."

"Was there anything else? Don't hesitate, Summers. You are not the only fool in this broad land. Unbosom yourself."

"It is all a trap," went on Summers hotly. "The man with whom I made the bet was in the scheme: the woman I was to—to kiss had also a hand in the plot. I kissed her, they photographed me while I did it, and now—now she threatens to sue me for five hundred pounds. It's blackmailing, but for me there remains only death or disgrace, unless you lend me this five hundred. That's what I came to see you about."

"Have you the lady's letters?"

"Yes, all."

"Give them to me—and the photograph?"

"I have that also."

"Let me see it."

Tremulously Summers produced a small packet of letters and a photograph and handed them to his friend. The Major looked at the photo and, as he had surmised, the young lady in question was none other than Isabel Hobson.

"This is a very serious matter, Summers, very serious," remarked the Major, with a dry cough, "and it is well that you came to me in your trouble. You have been very foolish."

"Don't chaff me about it, don't!" wailed Summers. "Haven't I borne enough?"

"If I promise to get you out of this, will you promise never to make a fool of yourself again?"

"Of course! But can you do it?"

"I will do my best. Call to-morrow at this time and I will report."

Summers went away and the Major smiled broadly as he seated himself at his desk and wrote the following:

Miss Isabel Hobson.

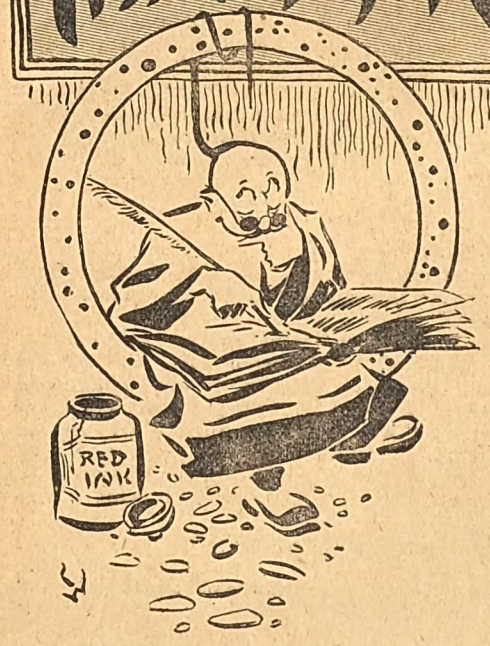
Madam,—Your letter is at hand, and the photograph is extremely natural; it exactly resembles another photograph which I have seen, and which was taken about a month ago. I inclose your bill against me, and also a bill against my friend. A comparison of the two bills shows that you are attempting to make us both pay for the same goods, and the courts hold that this is unlawful, to say the least. I, therefore, request that you return both bills to me receipted. If you do not, I shall be compelled to take the other horn of the dilemma. With you, however, it strikes me as being simply a case of Hobson's choice.—Truly yours, J. Thomas Penton.

It is needless to say that the bills came back receipted, and Summers never knew how his friend the Major had saved him. His friend the Major would never tell.

H. Blythe.

Digitized by Google

The Man Who was Left



This is the tale that was told by Lum Yu concerning the man Ching Ting.

It was New Year's Eve in Canton, and Ching Ting, the ivory carver in Curio Street, had cleaned up his shop, lighted his Joss sticks, and set up two little red tapers before the niche in the wall containing the tablet to the honour of the Earth God.

The front of his ten-foot establishment Ting had illuminated by hanging out a gay lantern, whereon was inscribed, in scarlet and gold, the words: "The favoured of Heaven."

An hour before midnight, having settled his accounts with the merchants, Ting had gone off as usual to the Temple of Longevity, in the Street of Accumulated Blessings, there to lay his offering at the feet of the great gilded Buddha, that watches over the life of every man, from the day of his birth till the day when, summoned to the World of Darkness, he leaves the World of Light.

Now Ting, you must know, was born in the fifth year of Kwong Si; and at the time of which we are speaking was the oldest man in the province of Twang Tung, being indeed no less than one hundred and eighty years old. Something over a century before Ting had opened the shop in Curio Street and married his fourth wife.

For more than a century and a half his name had appeared on the books of the Long Life Insurance Company as the annual subscriber of a silver dollar; and yet here he was on this New Year's Eve paying his devotions and presenting his offerings, just as he had been doing for a matter getting well on now for two hundred years. When Ting rounded the century, and showed no signs of migrating to the "family mausoleum," whither his sons, who had duly presented him on his sixty-first birthday with a very handsome piece of funereal furniture, specially designed for his own use, had already preceded him, his heir-at-law, distressed and dismayed, was advised to consult an astrologer.

"It was pretty evident," said the disinterested counsellors, "that the demons must be at work. It is quite possible, you know," said they, "for the evil spirits to keep the body living long after the soul has gone out of it, which is a dreadful thing for the poor soul, since it cannot get admittance at the gates of Yáma without its body, and must just roam about the Dark World, the prey of demons and devils, till its body is deposited in the Ancestral Hall."

The astrologer, however, couldn't complete his calculations, "owing," he said, "to disturbing influences;" and by-and-bye the heir died, and Ting, dressed in white, followed him, as he had followed many before him.

It was clear to the meanest intellect in Canton that Yáma, the Lord of Death, had forgotten the ivory carver, whose house in the Happy Valley had been waiting for him so long that it had cost fully as much to repair as it did to build.

The Long Life Insurance Company had certainly made a handsome penny out of Ching Ting.

Wives, children, neighbours, acquaintances, grandsons and great grandsons, Ting had seen them all depart for their new homes in the City of the Silent. Generation had succeeded generation, and he only was left—still hale, still hearty, feeling neither the weight of his years nor looking at one hundred and eighty, a day older than when he had just touched the half century.

Every morning, Ting entered his shop at the hour which had been his custom from his youth up, and, plying his tools with all the skill and dexterity which had made his name famous in every mansion and temple within a hundred miles, he worked all day at his trade of an ivory carver.

Ching Ting was a puzzle to himself. Sometimes he doubted whether it was right for him to be here after all his generation had gone—whether it wasn't, in fact, a scandal and a shame. That some people thought it most shockingly indecorus of him he knew.

Sometimes he wondered whether he hadn't better take the matter into his own hands and perform the happy dispatch.

But the thing that was past all understanding was that, whereas Ting had actually gone down to the "gates" twice before passing his fiftieth birthday, but, finding them shut, had returned, he had known neither ache nor pain since—and, from that day also, the man had never altered in appearance by a single hour. He was, in fact, invulnerable. Nothing harmed him. He walked scatheless through every danger. At the great earthquake the ivory carver came out unhurt, while his neighbours on either side were buried in the ruins. It was the same when the tornado swept away ten thousand houses—Wen and Yen were taken, but Ting was left. In the year of the Black Plague, this experience was repeated. No matter who suffered, no matter what happened, Ting lived on. And now, here was the New Year round again; and Ching Ting, to all appearances, as likely to see the next hundred as he certainly had seen the last. Why, it was a positive fact that Ting had actually announced himself that morning as being on the look-out for a new wife—the last Mrs. Ting, who was the twelfth in succession from the first, having left her disconsolate husband behind her six months previously. For, notwithstanding his weight of years, Ting, as we have said, was not perceptibly older on this New Year's Eve than on that other, which lay so far back, that one hundred and thirty years now rolled between. Fifty, he owned up to then; and to such as did not know his strange history, he was no more than fifty now.

Digitized by Google

The astrologer, however, couldn't complete his calculations.

Having settled his affairs then for the year, Ching went off with an easy mind to pay his devotions in the Temple of Longevity.

But on New Year's morning, the cup of cold water at the door of Ting's house told the passer-by that the ivory carver had been summoned, and had gone his last journey.

Ching Ting had fallen dead on his own threshold immediately after his return from the midnight service.

That was a busy day for the gossips.

By-and-bye, however, the truth leaked out; and sure enough, here again, there was a woman at the bottom of it.

The twelfth Mrs. Ting was a lady of an inquiring mind, and greatly was she exercised over the mystery surrounding her husband. Now it happened that about eleven months before she went from this wicked world, and left Ting a sorrowing widower, a very devout disciple of Buddha, a priest of the highest caste, had taken up his quarters in a monastery on the White Cloud Mountains, three hours' journey from the city. He brought with him a great reputation for learning and piety. It was even reported that Sam-Su, which was his name, could hold converse with the spirits in the Dark World. To him repaired the curious Mrs. Ting, eager to get his opinion of her husband's case. The holy man considered profoundly for a while, and delivered himself in these words:

"To every man who cometh into this world, is allotted a single page in the great Book of Account; and, when that is filled up, be it sooner or be it later, Yáma, the Lord of Death, turns it down, writes his name on the back, and sends for him. Why Ting's leaf has not been turned down my knowledge of the Sacred Books does not enable me to say. But, be it a thousand years hence until the leaf be turned down the man will continue to live. Yet, again, thou tellest me a strange thing—that on this man, Time leaves no imprint of its passage; whereby I know that, to the record of his years, Yáma has ceased to make the annual addition; but the wherefore I cannot tell."

Then the lady, whose curiosity was only stimulated by what the priest had told her, at once determined that, when her own leaf was turned down, she would lose no time in asking Yáma the reason why Ting's had been left; and, hinting to Sam-Su that she might probably have a communication to make subsequent to that event, she made a liberal offering to the pious purposes fund at the monastery, picked up her fan, and returned to the city.

Now, whether it was owing to anxiety to satisfy herself, or for any less praiseworthy reason, will perhaps never be known; but, very shortly after the interview with the learned priest on the White Cloud Mountains, Mrs. Ting's own leaf was turned down, and, for the twelfth time in his life, Ting was a widower.

Six months passed, yet no message came from the lady to enlighten the good man at the monastery. Sam-Su—for the story was told in the refectory whence it trickled out into the town—had decided that celestial occupations had left no room for earthly fancies—when lo! in a vision of the night, Mrs. Ting appeared to him, impatient to unburden herself of the news.

"There had been such a press at the 'gates,'" she said, "that she was kept waiting outside for weeks; and after getting through, the crowd in front was so great that she had only just succeeded in obtaining audience of Yáma."

Digitized by Google

"'Most dread One,' I cried, 'I am the wife of Ching Ting the ivory carver. Twelve wives has he carried to the 'house in the valley,' and I, who stand before thee, am the last.

"'Seven generations have ruled in the city since Ting opened his eyes, and, lo! an eighth is springing up, and of all men of his year Ting only is left. Tell me now, I pray thee, why Ching Ting, whose years go back to the fifth of Kwong Si, is living on the earth after all of his generation are with the spirits of their fathers.

The holy man considered profoundly for awhile.

"'Dear me!' exclaimed Yáma. 'Really! it's very forgetful of me. I remember now. One hundred and thirty years ago, I was extra busy; and, while turning over the leaves of my Book rather rapidly, one that was badly stitched fell out. It was nearly filled up; and having no time to paste it in then, I slipped it between the covers, and there it's been ever since. Now, I shouldn't wonder if that doesn't turn out to be Ting's!' —which sure enough it did.

"'Well,' said Yáma, pasting the leaf in its place. 'I'll finish this job now at once,' and filling up the page, he turned down the leaf."

"It was just at that moment," said Lum Yu, who told the tale, "that Ching Ting received his summons."

H. Hunter.

"The Daydream Library."

EDITED BY COUNTESS M.

ONE HALFPENNY, EVERY WEDNESDAY.

THE CHEAPEST AND BEST LADIES' PAPER PUBLISHED.

It contains among other attractive features "A Gossip with my Girls," by Countess M. This is a chatty, bright page where the Editress helps her readers in any troubles and worries, on all kinds of difficulties which creep into our lives.

A LONG COMPLETE ILLUSTRATED NOVEL.

These tales are specially written by popular writers for the "Daydream Library."

WHAT WILL THE FUTURE BRING FORTH?

A splendid series of articles on Fortune-telling.

THE SECRETS OF A BEAUTIFUL WOMAN.

By Mdlle. Lucille Belle-Fort, being a complete guide to the care of the health, and the secrets of an exquisite toilet.

A GRAND ABSORBING SERIAL.

By the author of "The Girl with the Eyelashes," etc.

A page of Fashions, Poetry, Cooking Hints, Competitions, etc., etc.

The "Daydream Library" is printed upon a delicate rose-pink paper, and is on sale every Wednesday. It is absolutely the daintiest ladies' paper published.

Don't take our word for it; buy a copy and see for yourself.

THE WORLD OF DRESS.

Edited by Mrs. ARIA.

Published by C. Arthur Pearson Limited.

Monthly, 1s.; Subscription, 12s. a year, post free.

The World of Dress will contain the Latest Fashion News in Paris, Vienna, New York, and London. Theatrical Dress in these cities will be largely dealt with, for it is on the stage that the changes of Fashion are first noted. A special feature each month will be an Interview with a Leading Costumier in one of those cities, who will specially design for The World of Dress one of the Coloured Plates which will be presented with each copy every month.

READY ON THE 1ST OF EVERY MONTH.

Digitized by Google

BY M. P. SHIEL.

SUMMARY.

YEN HOW, a shrewd Chino-Japanese doctor, falls desperately in love with Ada Seward, an English nursemaid. His advances are rudely repulsed, however; but he leaves England with a fixed determination to win the object of his affections in spite of all opposition.

Yen How goes first to Japan as a Japanese, where he becomes intimate with the prime minister, Marquis Ito, to whom he proposes a league between the two races of China and Japan, and an immense scheme by which Europe may be reduced to a waste, and China become the Empress of the Earth with scarcely an effort of her own. He then goes to China and becomes virtual ruler of that nation. In the course of a conversation which he has with Li Hung Chang he unfolds his scheme for setting all the European Powers against Great Britain. After the slaughter China will step in and conquer the remnants of the armies.

War is declared between Great Britain and France and Germany and Russia. The British fleet meets the Allied ships in Mid-channel and a battle ensues. Although the British vessels are outnumbered by two to one, the superior tactics of the British, and of John Hardy, a consumptive midshipman and a genius for modern warfare (who escapes on the Jupiter from the fight, and rams all the transports some distance away), result in the destruction of the Allied fleet. Hardy is ill for a time, and on his recovery decides to go to China. Before going, however, he endeavours to obtain a promise of marriage from Miss Bosey Jay, a young lady artist, but is refused. He goes to the Palace Theatre of Varieties, and there meets Ada Seward, the nursemaid with whom Yen How is in love. She sends him home intoxicated, and a week later he is in Paris, where he has a row with Edropol, the Bulgarian duellist. John, however, does not fight, but goes to Berlin, and from thence to Petersburg. Here he sends a letter to Bobbie, his old servant in England, and starts out for China by the overland route. Yen How organises an army of 400,000,000 souls—men, women, and children—to overrun Europe when the time is ripe. He is sitting in his garden when the capture of John Hardy is announced to him.

John is brought before Yen and they quarrel. The former fires at the Chinaman, but the bullet strikes a breast-plate of steel and does no harm. John is seized and thrown into prison. Meanwhile, the British China squadron, failing to obtain the promised assistance from Japan, engages the Allied fleet, and defeats it, but at a cost of all the ships but three, which are shortly afterwards chased and attacked by the Japanese fleet. Affairs now assume a serious aspect in Europe, and the British rout the Germans at New Brandenburg with a loss of 150,000 men. Foo-chee loves Ah-lin (who are in the same Chinese regimental company), but the latter is loved by Sin-wan, a warder of the Imperial Prison.

CHAPTER XVII. (continued).

THE Imperial prison stood—and stands still—in a great quadrangle of marble, fringed with stupendous avenues of long-haired trees of the banyan genus, being surrounded by a moat bridged by a number of marble bridges. The building itself is of marble, and of very great size. A stone's throw to the south stood the palace of the Austrian Ambassador, embedded in a bower of foliage; to the north, a hundred yards away, and separated from it by a lake overgrown with huge slumbering lilies and moon-leaved water-growths, stood the shaded palace of Yen How. The Imperial Palace itself was half a mile away by the broad avenue which stretched to its portals, but there was also a secret short-cut to it from the palace of Yen How.

It was the quiet hour of the evening-time, and the sumptuous landscape of the Imperial City seemed to faint and doze in a dream of lotus peace.

Leaning over one of the marble bridges that spanned the prison moat was an old man. It was Ni-ching-tang, the father of Foo-chee, one of the innumerable scullions who did duty in Yen How's kitchen. His day's work was over, and he was looking sleepily upon the dark and slumbrous water of the moat.

As he leant so, Sin-wan approached him hurriedly, passing across to his duties in the prison. Ni-ching-tang would not have heard the noiseless tread of the thick-felted slippers of Sin-wan; but Sin-wan spoke.

"Give good to you, Ni-ching-tang," he said. "Has his Might, the Governor, passed this way yet?"

"No, Sin-wan," the old man answered, and his eyes smiled, "fear nothing. He will not know."

"Know what, Ni-ching-tang?"

"That you are late—again."

Sin-wan leered.

"It comes of going to seek a little wife," he said.

"Pooh! it is nothing—if you are not seen. But a wife?"

"Ah-lin is her name, and she is the daughter of Lan-chaw-sing and Nan-lin, his wife. We will marry this moon. She is well formed both in face and body."

"What, with small feet too?"

"No small feet: but well formed in face and body."

"And she lives where?"

"In the third quarter, and the main street."

"Why, I have a son who lives near the main street of the third quarter."

"And what is your son's name, Ni-ching-tang?"

Sin-wan did not notice that Ni-ching-tang paused the merest fraction of a second before he answered.

"My son is called Cheng-lu," he said.

Then Sin-wan passed on, and entered the prison.

As he went in, descended some stairs, and walked along a dark corridor, he took from his bosom a small cylinder of ebony, round which clung a roll of silk-paper.

On the paper were six lines of writing, each starting from the top and going down to the bottom. Each line started with a date, and underneath the date came the instructions for that day.

This document had been painted by Yen How, with his own hands.

Yen How had stood over John Hardy, with watch and stethoscope in his hands. John had lain bound on his back on the marble floor.

Yen How had examined him from head to foot. He had felt the texture of his muscles, had palpated the calves of his legs, had held his pulse, watch in hand. He had applied the stethoscope to John's chest, and heard the wheeze; he had laid it over his heart, and made an estimate of the exact timbre of the beats, systole and diastole, veinous and arterial.

Digitized by Google

When it was all over, he knew the precise truth about John Hardy's vitality, its quantity, its intensity, its whole diathesis. He knew just how much mental and physical torture the lad could bear, and for how long, without an actual cessation of life.

He was not in a hurry. He waited—John was well fed and nourished. It was over a week before the torture began.

Now, when Sin-wan opened the door behind which John lay in sleep, Ada Seward would no longer have recognized the pretty boy who had sat beside her in the music-hall, nor Bosey Jay the gallant fellow who had made her throb in an alarm of self-retention.

Broad streaks of absolute white mingled with his long fair hair. His bony hands clutched and trembled in his sleep like the hands of some aged miser.

At the first faint sound of the key in the door, he sprang with a bound straight to his feet, wide awake. He had learnt to be afraid now.

Sin-wan, as he turned the key, muttered something to two men who were now with him. They went away up a narrow stairway into a room above. Sometimes Sin-wan could fulfil his instructions alone; sometimes he needed auxiliaries. To-day he needed them, but not in the same room with him.

He gave a final glance at the directions under Day IV. on the silken scroll, and with studious brow ran over the points on his fingers. This was the ninth scroll of the kind, all covering a space of six days, with which Sin-wan had been entrusted.

Having satisfied himself that all was ready, and his instructions well in his head, Sin-wan entered the chamber and closed the door behind him.

The sight of that face had become a pang and a sickness to the soul of John Hardy. To all his tortures it was an added torture. It grinned in his nightmares. It was the devil of his Hades.

He sank back in a corner, pale as death.

Sin-wan never brought him his food; so that Sin-wan's face was associated in his mind only with agony. Yen How, who knew the Mind, and its secrets, had willed it so.

The room was not very small, but it was of stone, and damp. However, in one corner was a bed which was nothing less than luxurious, the coverings being of fine, padded silk. John Hardy had not suffered from cold; still less from hunger or thirst.

These were tortures far and away too elementary and obvious to occur to such a mind as that of Yen How. The body, by itself, is capable of intense pangs; but never is torture exquisite when it is wholly divorced from the mind.

Yen How's profound knowledge of this fact was proved when he said to himself:

"One of his tortures shall consist in the daily sight of —a Face."

Beside the quilted bed, there were in the chamber a table, on which was water and wine; near it, a cushioned chair; and a stool made of a hard, greenish-coloured wood, provided with a straight upright back, and cross-pieces in the legs. It could not be moved. It was cramped by iron rivets to the flooring.

The room was lighted by three Chinese-lanterns which hung above John Hardy's reach, and were lighted through holes in the ceiling near them.

Sometimes one, or two, or even the three went out, through some carelessness of the attendants; and even when they all burnt, there was not much light from them. But John's eyes had long since grown accustomed to the obscurity. He saw everything clearly.

One of the ingenuities of pain to which he had been subjected consisted in the mere appearance of Sin-wan without any sort of subsequent action on the man's part. Once Sin-wan had entered, leered round the room, and retired. The next day he entered, leered round the room, and retired. Was the ordeal over, then? A heavenly hope leapt in John Hardy. The next day Sin-wan appeared with a brazier crowded with white-hot wires.

Several times lately Sin-wan had entered, leered round, and retired. With every new entrance now, John hoped that on this day no new sword would pierce him. For to-morrow he cared not—only for this day his spirit cried to Heaven. But on many a day Heaven turned her ear from him.

He breathed in an agony of Hope, in an Arctic hell of Fear.

In the course of weeks his great mind had quite collapsed. He was now utterly demoralised and craven.

He knew neither morning nor night. He had lost count of the days and the weeks.

He did not commit suicide, because, at first, the means were not ready at his hand. It is not an easy matter for a man to dash his brains out against a wall. Later, when he looked round for the means to kill himself, an intense cowardice seized him. He clung desperately to life—only to life. Just one little spark, too, of his innate stubbornness lingered within him. After a torture, he would pray aloud that Heaven would send its swift Messenger upon him; but his obstinate will to live returned, if a day of peace were granted him.

Now, as Sin-wan showed his face, he cringed close against the wall with staring eyes of expectancy.

Was this a day of torture? or a day of grace?

What added a touch of intensest horror to the relation between this boy and this man was the fact that they had never exchanged a word. They were as remote and divided as two creatures of different planets. Sin-wan did not know a word of English, nor John a word of Chinese.

A day of torture, or of grace? He had ceased to care for the morrow; but to-day . . . !

A wild hope stabbed his heart. Sin-wan had no sort of implement about him. He could not torture without an implement. It was a day of—grace, then?

No. The Chinaman walked to the corner in which lay the cords with which John was usually bound. And he lifted them on his forearm, and he came to where John, half standing, half falling, cowered.

John had long ceased to make any sort of resistance to the binding process to which he was subjected by the brawny arms of Sin-wan.

During the operation this time he fainted. But terror woke him. He was placed on the high-backed stool, his arms bound behind the back, and his chest, high up to the neck, upon it. Underneath, his shoeless feet were bound to the cross-pieces.

He could not move his head backward, for the chair-back prevented him; forward he could move it about fifteen degrees, and from side to side about thirty.

What was in store for him? He was wide awake now. With starting eye-balls he waited.

Five minutes passed.

Then Sin-wan put his hand into his bosom, and drew out something.

It was a leather strap, about three and a half inches broad, and about sixteen long. At the ends were clasps.

He put it round John Hardy's neck, and clasped it. And now John could move his head neither backward, forward, nor sideways.

He sat with elevated chin, staring—a gaze of horror into vacancy. Yet he felt no pain.

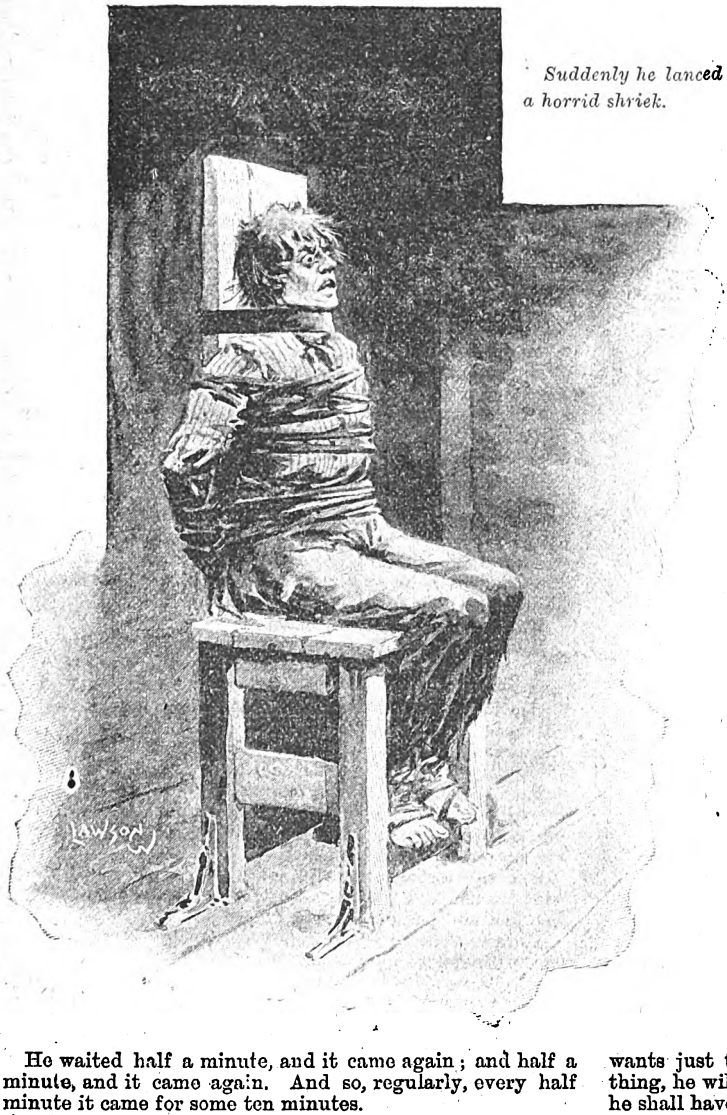
He waited five more minutes, and the dim thought that reeled within his brain in a vertigo of woe was this: How long, how long, O Lord?

Five minutes, and then five more: and then he felt—something.

Yet it gave him no pain.

It was a drop of fluid—water, in fact—which had fallen upon his head from above.

Digitized by Google



Suddenly he lanced a horrid shriek.

He waited half a minute, and it came again; and half a minute, and it came again. And so, regularly, every half minute it came for some ten minutes.

This, of itself, to an ordinary person, would be a misery. But by this time John Hardy was so familiarised with agony, that to him it was simply nothing. The slowly-dropping water collected on his head, and was trickling down his face, when he began to wonder, with a species of glad incredulity, whether this could be meant as a new torture.

He could have borne it all the night, and all the day, and thanked God for his clemency.

Suddenly he lanced a horrid shriek.

A drop of something else had fallen upon his head, and eaten into his scalp. It was a drop of strong oil of vitriol.

Would the falling of the vitriol continue? or the falling of the water?

The next drop was a drop of water.

But if it had been vitriol, and vitriol thenceforth regularly, John Hardy's agonies would have been far less acute than, in fact, they were.

In this was manifested the profundity of Yen How, that he knew how exquisitely to intensify the pangs of the body by means of the travail of the soul.

The next drop was water, and the next was water, and the next was water, and the next was—vitriol!

And now John Hardy cried out against Heaven, straining at his cords, and bawling like a bull.

But drop by drop from the ceiling fell the implacable fluid; not so many drops of water, and then a drop of vitriol, but with crafty variations, sometimes two drops of vitriol at a time, and then for minutes, not another.

Yen How, however, knew his craft too well to make such an ordeal last very long. Sin-wan had instructions that, as soon as the victim showed signs of madness or collapse, the torture should end.

Accordingly, when John Hardy ceased to cry aloud, and a red stream from his mouth trickled down his chin, his bands were undone, and Sin-wan cast his unconscious body on the bed.

* * * *

Just about the time that he did so, Ah-lin was standing before the incense-stick booth of Foo-Chee.

"It is not that I am bold, Foo-chee," she said, "that I come here to speak. But I must say what I have in my mind."

Here was blessedness, and a wringing of the hands, and an embarrassment of the pleased eyelids, and the favour of the upper gods, for Foo-chee.

"It is an incense-stick that you desire," he said, "and your name is Ah-lin, for I know it. And all the incense-sticks which I have are yours. For why? Because we stand and step together each day before sundown in the same company of the drilled—no other reason."

"It is a lie, Foo-chee," said Ah-lin, "there is another reason—though I cannot guess what it can be. But whatever the reason be, you must now throw it quite away. It was not for an incense-stick that I came—though incense-sticks are pleasant, and I have long desired one—but to tell you just that. You must throw it quite away."

"And for why?"

"Because another, who is greater than you, wants just the thing that you want. If you get that thing, he will kill you. In order that he may not kill you, he shall have the thing."

"Cruel, Ah-lin!"

"No, not I. You say what is not, not knowing, Foo-Chee. But he will kill you; therefore he shall have what you desire."

"Then I shall kill myself, not having what I desire."

"Cruel, Foo-chee!"

"You will feel happy if I live, Ah-lin?"

"Yes; and, therefore, I shall make myself feel unhappy by giving to another what you desire, in order that I may feel happy at the same time in knowing that you live."

"To feel happy and unhappy at the same time is mixed, Ah-lin."

"But it is better, Foo-chee, to feel happy and unhappy for a little hour, and then die."

Here was the practicality of the woman. Foo-chee pondered over it. Then he lifted his head and said:

"There is a riddle somewhere which I cannot solve, Ah-lin. Let us go, instead, to the eating-house of Hing-Chang-Li for a meal, with fresh tea. And with you take three of these incense-sticks."

Ah-lin hesitated, and was lost. Foo-chee drew down the flap over his booth, and carefully adjusted the ring to the staple; then together they walked off on their heels; and their swinging pig-tails met and touched, as it were, knowingly behind them.

Digitized by Google

And at the eating-house of Hing-Chang-Li they ate a hearty meal, with a whole mitin of fresh tea-leaves.

They were in the sweep of the force which underlies the world. It was the doing of the upper gods.

CHAPTER XVIII.

The Chinese Iron.

The next day John Hardy, at the hour of evening, sat in his corner watching his door with a kind of wild-beast sullenness.

His nerves had an instinct of the hour when Sin-wan was due to appear.

So sick was his soul with misery after the ordeal of the day before, that he had eaten nothing since. His food lay untasted on the table.

He ran now, with the stealthy feet of a man treading on hot embers.

He sat sprawling with extended limbs on the floor, watching the point of Sin-wan's expected entrance through the fierce and sullen corners of his eyes.

He had often had the thought of braining Sin-wan with one of the porcelain platters in which his food was left, or of strangling him with his pig-tail, or one of the ropes used to bind himself. As he sat there, the thought now recurred to him. His brain was in that condition in which thoughts are no longer semi-voluntary, but seem to come and go at random of their own motion, like the winds through the vacant heavens. He had, however, sufficient reason left to give no entertainment to this thought of attacking Sin-wan. His chance, if he ever had it, was long past. He was too hopelessly frail now.

He sat long, expecting. One of his lanterns went out; then another; in half-an-hour the third. He was in darkness.

Suddenly the lad started as though a sword had pierced him.

He looked eagerly towards the door; and then he said to himself: "No, no." It was too incredible; he must be mad.

"Mad, mad," he moaned, his head buried in his two arms, as he rocked himself slowly to and fro, with a regular motion like a pendulum. So he went on for about half-an-hour, his face hidden, with sometimes a moan, and sometimes a word. "What have I done?" he said wearily, in the thinnest whine: "What have I done—oh God, Father, God? . . . But now I am mad, mad . . ."

It had seemed to him as the third lantern went out, and left him in darkness, that at the edge of the door there was a long streak of semi-light—that the door was open!.

He had sense enough to know that the condition of his mind was one far and away removed from a state of ordinary sanity; and that his senses were, now, quite capable of playing him tricks. But when, after a long time, he lifted up his head, there, still before his eyes, was the streak of light.

He sprang to his feet, and his pallor of death assumed a hue of even more absolute wanness. Groping limpingly along the walls, he made toward the door. But, on the whole, it was rather to assure himself of the optical illusion which he supposed, than with the expectation of finding the door really open, that he proceeded.

But the door was really open.

What made his heart go bumping and bounding within his ribs was the look of Providence—the hint of God's finger—in the fact of the lanterns all going out at the same time, when, by some extraordinary means, the door had become unfastened.

But though one step meant salvation, and one instant's delay meant death, yet he could not take the step. The sudden shock of hope—the sudden suspicion of Heaven—all but killed him. He dropped back against the wall, panting, panting, trying with his right hand to force back the violent galloping of his heart.

But the instant that he could move, he moved. With wide mouth and gasping chest, he cautiously pushed back the door and passed through it.

Toward what? Toward certain capture? It must not be supposed that he was now in a mental condition to give the question even a single thought. He went through the open door precisely in the way in which a wild animal passes through the open door of its cage—instinctively toward liberty. He lived by moments. At this moment he was free; to the next moment he gave not a thought. He simply walked forward as a stream flows downwards—because it is a law of Nature.

He found himself in a long corridor; and yonder, halfway down the corridor was—a man.

The man's back was turned toward John; and he was bending down, cleaning a blue-glass lantern.

It was at this sight that the first notion of the impossibility of his ultimate escape occurred to John Hardy; and, with this appreciation of the impossibility, came also the ravenous Desire, the frenzied Hope. As he slid swiftly back behind the door, and drew it upon himself, he was no longer a mere wild creature of instinct. He looked forward—he reasoned.

He waited, fearing worse than death to stir the door. Then he had a sudden horror which pricked him like a goad to action—if Sin-wan came? It was his hour!

He very slightly pushed back the door, and peeped out. The corridor was empty.

He ran now, with the stealthy feet of a man treading on hot embers. His feet were bare, and made no sound. He had on a shirt and a pair of trousers. But the shirt was filthy, and the trousers flapped in long rags all down his legs. His hair reached to his shoulders.

Digitized by Google

At the end of the corridor was a door. He pushed it lightly. It did not move. He forced his shoulder against it. It was locked.

He was as much a prisoner as before, then? Immediately after the first intolerable sinking of the heart, he could not believe it. A vague, but real, faith was in him now. The mere fact that he was where he was proved Providence. He believed, dimly, that God, now, was willing him to be free, wild as the idea was, far off as the probability might be.

He looked swiftly round for some means of escape; and, there, sure enough, was a tall window in the side of the corridor, slightly open.

He ran to it, and looked down. It opened on to another corridor twenty feet below.

Twenty feet! The distance was infinite.

Underneath the flapping rags of his trousers one could see the red and livid patchwork of his flesh, where it had been nipped, and pinched, and burnt, and pricked, and bruised in half a hundred agonies. How could he leap twenty feet? It was as dreadful to him as to an infant. Like the very aged, he was afraid "of that which is high."

But as he looked again he saw a short rope hanging over the window-sill by which he could help himself down.

And now, at this sight, it is a wonder that some suspicion of the fact that all these happy chances were only part of another elaborate torture did not enter his head. But his brain was so pre-occupied with the idea of Providence, that nothing of the sort occurred to him.

With endless pains he managed, with the help of the rope, to reach the lower corridor, and at once, with the same stealthy trepidation, he set out, running, in the same direction in which he had so far come.

At the end of this corridor also was a door; and at his push it opened.

Now he was in yet another corridor, at right angles to the first and second. In which direction should he turn? He did not care. He would be guided right by the Hand that led him. Away to the right he went, with tottering gait, treading on embers, hugging the wall.

If only his heart would cease its awful thumping! Surely, surely, through all that vast building, through all Pekin, they would hear the echoes of that labouring bosom! So it seemed to him.

His white, wide lips were twisted awry in his effort to take in and expel his noisy breath.

As he ran along in this excess of agitation, he suddenly remembered the battle of Shoreham, how he had been cool in the midst of sounding cannon and angry war. Could he not still be so? Was he so much changed? He made a weak effort—a faint self-assertion of the old John Hardy. But in another instant he forgot the effort. It was far from him.

He reached the end of the corridor, and was about to turn to the left, when, there before, him, he saw two Chinamen, near to him, talking. They were standing in the middle of the passage which he had to pass.

Had they seen him? Had they heard the labour of his heart? Apparently not: they remained deep in talk.

Must he lurk still till they moved away? Would they not come his way?

Suddenly, behind him, down the length of the corridor in which he stood, he heard a faint sound. He looked and saw a man approaching him. He was between two dangers.

The man's eyes were bent meditatively upon the ground. He came swinging toward John Hardy.

The night had not yet come, though it was near. The corridor in which the two conversed was not dark, but it was much dimmer than that in which John stood. It was necessary for him to move—the third man was coming near.

He stole forward, inch by inch, sideways, with his chest against the wall, and his face twisted round, watching the two talkers. He came near them—he was opposite to them—by a stretched out arm they could touch him.

Stealthily he crept, slowly as the movement of a glacier; he was past them. And he was no sooner past them than, with incautious haste, eager only to be on—to be on—he sped away. During those instants of slow motion he had passed through all the terrors of the grave.

The man's eyes were bent meditatively upon the ground.

The two men calmly continued their talk; the third came up and joined them. John Hardy went onwards undisturbed.

For quite half-an-hour he stole forward, all fears and tremors, like a thief in the night, through three halls, over a courtyard, along two more corridors, without anywhere meeting anyone.

The slumbrous gloaming deepened. He began to think himself lost in this endless structure, without hope of finding an exit.

But at last he saw an oblong of distinctly lesser obscurity; he knew that this must be a door of exit from the prison.

Could it be true? Was he really about to escape into the open day—under the sky, the clouds? He leapt forward. And as he did so, a man stood in the doorway, and leant his back against the door-post.

It was far from light now, but John Hardy would have felt the presence of that form and face in the darkest midnight. It was Sin-wan.

John was still in full career to make for the door, when his eyes fell upon this man; and, like a shying horse, he bolted aside. A door, as he touched the wall, gave way before his pressure. He rushed through, mad to put a world of distance between him and that face. As he hastened forward, in the dark now, he stepped upon nothing, and tumbled headlong down a flight of stone stairs.

He had hardly time to pick himself up when he knew that someone was behind him, slowly descending the stairs, humming a tune. And he knew that it was Sin-wan.

Off he rushed again; and again, in five minutes there was light. He stood between two walls about five feet apart, about ten feet long; and, at the end of them, was a portal, painted green, half open; and beyond the portal, he saw—trees!

He was free! and yet he shuddered. Behind him was Sin-wan, coming, coming; and before him, the open gate; but the whole of the space between him and the gate, and between the two walls, was paved with broken glass.

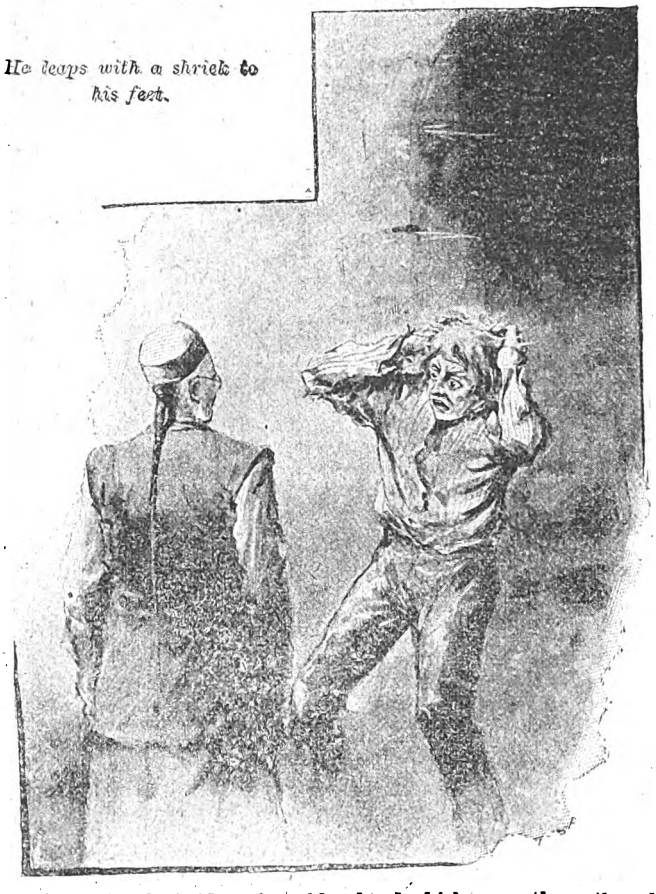
There was not an inch of harmless ground upon which to place his naked feet.

But Sin-wan was behind. He stepped forward, and reached the gate, and passed through it, running.

Every footprint which he left behind was a footprint of blood.

Still onward, panting heart! The hand with which He leads is surely rough—but still, is He not leading?

Digitized by Google



He leaps with a shriek to his feet.

And now for the bridge of marble ahead which spans the moat. He reaches it, and starts, and stops.

There, in the middle of the bridge, leaning over the parapet, looking at the water, is a man.

This gauntlet also John must run. Crouching against the opposite parapet, he crawls forward.

His lust to be free is now a thousand thousand times more intense than ever before. Every danger that he has so far escaped has added to his terror a deeper terror, and to his hope a wilder frenzy. Like a beast, he crawls forward on hands and knees, step by step, without a sound.

But just as he is exactly opposite the man, the man turns quite round. John Hardy leaps to his feet. They are face to face, and eye to eye.

All is over then. He has been seen.

But no! What means those groping hands, that hesitating step, as the man turns slowly away? Is he blind? Can those eyes see nothing? So John Hardy believes. Here at least, is Providence, and the leading hand.

Away, once more, toward the palace of Yen How, and then down the long avenues to the portal of the "Imperial City." This part of the way he remembers, having passed through it before. Onward, in the shade of the great trees he limps, leaving behind him his trail of blood. He meets no one. He is under the open sky, among the leaves sighs the evening wind.

He reaches the great portal, and, strange to say, there is no one there to bar his exit. He passes out. He is in an open space—beyond the Imperial walls—which properly belongs to the "Chinese City."

So far he has escaped. A strange feeling of security rushes upon him, and, with it, an overwhelming, speechless gratitude. He drops to his knees, his face turns upward in an ecstatic agony of love to the skies, washed in tears, out stretch his arms in adoration.

But between his eyes and the sky comes a face, and between his stretched-out arms comes a form. He leaps with a shriek to his feet, recognises the face of Yen How, and faints in Yen How's arms.

The slightest possible smile wrinkled the corners of Yen How's eyes.

"Pooh!" he said in English, "it is nothing. Why such a cry as that? It is your own fault, boy. You ought to have known that Providence—if there is such a thing—never works in these outright ways. Yen How's providence does—but Yen How is a smaller fellow altogether than the Big Ones above—if He is there at all. Is He there? Is He there? Ah!—may be, and may be not. But just now it is Yen How for you, and not He. The man cleaning the lanterns, and the two men talking together, and Sin-wan, and the blind man—they all saw you, you know, boy, because Yen How put them there to see you. And it is hard to escape from Yen How, whose Ada Seward you have kissed, and whom you have tried to shoot lillee white boy. And Yen How is not done with you yet—not yet—not yet. But those English!"—here he ceased to speak to the unconscious form in his arms, and continued his meditative soliloquy in Chinese—"those English! They are just like devils for fighting! Only 150 or 200 of them, they say, at Kiao-chau, and six weeks gone, and they not killed off yet. Stupid Japanese ship-captains to let them get away in that fashion. However—ah, lillee English kisser,"—he addressed John Hardy again—"wouldn't you like to be with the 200 white men at Kiao-chau now? I think you might be able to play some tricks with their help, too. But Yen How has you tight—Yen How the toad, the frog, eh? Stop, though, isn't there something in your Bible about a plague of frogs in the land of Egypt in the Pharaoh's time? Yes, surely,—yes. Well, now, how would you like a little plague of frogs in your land of England, eh? Ah, well, it is near. It is not far off now. . . . ."

At this point a man appeared; Yen How handed him the limp body of John Hardy, and walked up and down a long time that night under the shade of the trees of the Imperial avenues.

About this time there were two men outside the Imperial precincts who ought to have been within them. One was Sin-wan, and the other was the father of Foo-chee, Ni-ching-tang.

Ni-ching-tang went to the dwelling of his son Foo-chee, whom he loved, in order that he might see Foo-chee, and receive from him the reverences due to a father. And, lo! Foo-chee was not there; and Foo-chee's booth was deserted.

Said Ni-ching-tang:

"Now, where can Foo-chee be?"

Sin-wan went to the dwelling of his promised wife, Ah-lin, to see her, and receive from her the reverences due to a husband that is to be. And, lo! Ah-lin was not there.

So Sin-wan said:

"Now, where can Ah-lin be?"

Now, Ni-ching-tang was shrewd, and Sin-wan was shrewd. So Sin-wan said:

"Ah-lin is not far from the booth of Foo-chee."

And Ni-ching-tang said:

"He who knows how to find Ah-lin is far on the road to the discovery of Foo-chee."

Digitized by Google

And Sin-wan set out to go to the booth of Foo-chee, and Ni-ching-tang to go the dwelling of Ah-lin. And midway between the dwelling of Ah-lin and the booth of Foo-chee, these two men met in the street. It was Ni-ching-tang who spoke.

"Ho! ho!—late hours—late hours," he said (and he half hid his face behind a sportive hand)—"late hours, and a merry courting-time."

Sin-wan was struck dumb. Ni-ching-tang knew that Sin-wan had no right to be out of bounds at this time, but Sin-wan did not know that Ni-ching-tang had no right.

"A merry courting-time?" said Sin-wan at last; "but it is not so with me, Ni-ching-tang."

"Well, after all, pleasure is pleasant to feel," answered Ni-ching-tang, still harping on the same string; "and they will not know in the prison, Sin-wan, for who will tell them?"

"Pleasure is pleasant to feel, yes," said Sin-wan; "but it is not pleasure which I am feeling now, Ni-ching-tang."

"And why not, Sin-wan?"

"Because Ah-lin, of whom I told you, is away from her home; and my mind is telling me that she is making someone else happy instead of me."

"Ho! that is bad. And who is that someone, Sin-wan?"

"He is called Foo-chee."

"Soh! And you are now looking for Ah-lin?—I see."

"I am looking for Foo-chee."

"And for why?"

"To kill him."

"Soh! to kill Foo-chee. Well, that is the only way. But has Foo-chee no brother, no father, who will kill you back again?"

"I do not know."

"With keen tortures?"

"Poh! I do not think of that."

"With dreadful agonies of the brain and the liver, Sin-wan?"

"No! I do not think of that. He is a botherless dog, a seller of incense-sticks."

"Well—well, do your will, Sin-wan. It is the only way. As for me, I am not feeling happy, too. I have a son, who has an enemy. And I am going to look for my son now, that I may hear from him whether it will be necessary for me to kill his enemy or no."

"Well, then, may you do well, Ni-ching-tang."

"And you, may you do well, Sin-wan."

And so they parted. But they neither of them found Ah-lin and Foo-chee that night; for they did not think of looking into the eating-house of Hing-Chang-Li, where the two young people again were that night.

So Sin-wan and Ni-ching-tang hurried back, both of them, to the Imperial precincts, making an inward vow that on the next night they would procure more time, and do better. (To be continued.)

IF YOU WANT A BOOK WRITE AND TELL US.

Every week we give away half-a-dozen books.

All a competitor has to do is to send us one Book Coupon cut from The Sunday Reader, one from the Athletic Record, and one from Short Stories.

Send these to us in one envelope together with a request for any single book in the whole world of literature.

From the applications we receive we shall each week pick out six and send the books asked for.

All applications to be addressed to "BOOKS," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please let me have: S. S.

Book.....

Price.....

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Result of the "Book" Competition for the Week Ending March 19th.

C. Crosskill, 7 Oxford Street, Wellingborough. "Wright's Book of Poultry." 10s. 6d.

Miss Morice, 17 Edith Road, West Kensington. "Alice thro' the Looking Glass." By Lewis Carroll. 6s.

E. G. Snow, 53 Western Road, Brighton. "Who's Who—1898." 3s. 6d.

Mrs. Renouf, 17 Charing Cross, Jersey. "Trilby." By George du Maurier. 6s.

Chas. H. Kingdon, 41 Victoria Street, Newport, Barnstaple. "Strength." By Sandow. 2s. 6d.

Miss Maud Abbott, York Villa, Norbiton. "Blue Fairy Book." By Andrew Lang. 6s.

SHALL WE MAKE A MINIATURE FOR YOU?

We will send a beautiful little miniature (about $2\frac{1}{4}$-inches by $1\frac{7}{8}$-inches) in exquisite colouring, and completely framed in a dainty gold-plated oval frame, of any single portrait readers like to forward.

All you have to do is to send your photograph, together with the coupon, and seven shillings and sixpence. The miniatures may be also had in chased gold ornamental frames, the total cost being 10s. 6d.

Write your name and address on the back of the photograph, and mark your envelope "MINIATURE."

Specimens of the Miniatures can be seen at:

MANCHESTER—Messrs. Abel Heywood, Oldham Street; and Mr. John Heywood, Deansgate.
LIVERPOOL—F. A. Latarche, 63, Lime Street; and M. Partington, 9, Renshaw Street.
EDINBURGH—H. Robinson, 111 and 115, Leith Street; and David Crawford, 75, South Clerk Street.
GLASGOW—W. Love, 221, Argyle Street; and Mr. Barr, 88, Sauchiehall St.
DUNDEE—Mrs. Littlejohn, The Pillars.
BRADFORD—W. H. Clough, 28, Forster Square.
BRISTOL—T. Thatcher, 44, College Green.
NEWCASTLE—Messrs. R. J. Porteus and Co., 19, Grainger Street West.
LEEDS—Mr. H. Walker, 37, Briggate, Leeds.
WEST BROMWICH—H. N. Ellison, 3 and 3a, Bull Street.
CARDIFF—W. White, 1a, Severn Road, Canton.
LONDON—PEARSON'S WEEKLY Offices.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Colour of eyes.....

„ „ hair.....

Complexion.....

Description of dress.....

.....

£ s. d.

Please send..... @ 7s. 6d.
„ „ ..... @ 10s. 6d.

Amount of Postal Orders inclosed... £ s. d.

Digitized by Google

THE SECRET.

The room is in darkness save for the light of a shaded lamp. In the white bed lies a woman—a woman young and beautiful. Seated by the bedside are two men—the woman's husband and the doctor. The husband has watched there for three nights without sleep.

The doctor rises and feels the woman's pulse. While his hand is on her wrist the husband anxiously scans his face.

"Well, doctor?—Well?"

For answer the doctor shakes his head.

"No hope?"

"No hope."

"Heaven have mercy!"

"She may perhaps regain consciousness for a short time before the end; there may be—there often is—a final rally. Meanwhile, I fear I can do nothing. Perhaps you would rather that I left you?"

"No; stay."

The doctor walks to the end of the room and looks out of the window into the night.

The husband covers his face with his hands, and thinks. This young life that was now ebbing away—had it, so far as he was concerned, been happy? Had he anything to reproach himself with?—No. Thank Heaven! Everything that she had asked for, she had received. He had lavished riches on her—he had lost friends for her—he had given up his little ambition for her. He had lived for her—been her slave, and people had laughed at him for it. No man had loved her—could have loved her—as he had. Perhaps the fact that he had not gained her easily, had made him treasure her the more. For he had had to teach her to love him.

When first he had asked for her, she had said she could not love him. But gradually her feelings softened toward him. Trouble came upon her family. He allowed her poverty to make no difference to him. He asked for her once more, and this time she consented. Only a few months ago she had told him, what he had never known before, that she had, for the sake of marrying him, broken off a secret engagement to another. That drew him still closer to her. And now he and she, who loved one another so well, are to say good-bye for ever. He prays Heaven to grant him one little favour, and that is that she may speak to him just once more. It would at least make parting easier for him.

* * * * *

Suddenly a long-drawn sigh from the bed, and the woman sits up. He eyes slowly open, and she stares straight before her.

In a moment the husband is at her side, and he clasps her hand firmly within his, as though he would by force prevent her leaving him. Then he puts his arm gently round her neck and kisses her tenderly upon her forehead. But, as his lips touch her, she shudders through her whole frame with fearful quivering, and pushes him from her, as though he were something repulsive.

"Roy!" she cries, "Roy! Where are you?"

The man at the window starts as though shot, and clutches nervously at the curtain.

"Roy! my darling!"

At this the doctor slowly turns and moves towards the door.

"Should you require me," he says huskily, his eyes fixed strangely upon the slender figure upon the bed, "I am in the next room."

The husband bows, and the doctor passes unsteadily out—not into the next room, but into the street.

"Roy! Roy! Oh, why don't you come, Roy?"

The husband's name is not Roy.

"Loved one, here I am, your husband—darling, kiss me." And again he leans over her, and again she shudders, more fearfully than before, and again she pushes him from her.

The man is dumb now. Once more she speaks.

"Oh, Roy, do come! He is keeping you from me, I know he is! I am dying, Roy! Oh, come—come! I want you to say that you forgive me, Roy. We have met so often and you have never spoken about our—they forced me to marry him, Roy. Oh, dear, darling Roy, do come! For I have never loved him, Roy—never loved him." Then more loudly still, "Never loved him." And then there is another sigh, and she falls back and then there is silence.

* * * * *

Out in the darkness a man stumbles blindly along, and passers-by who know him wonder if it is possible that the usually grave and dignified Dr. Leroy Jennings is intoxicated.

* * * * *

The room is in darkness save for the light of a shaded lamp. In the white bed lies a woman—a woman young and beautiful, from whose tired body a soul, tired at last from its torturing burden, has winged its way into eternity. A sudden rush of air through the slightly raised window causes the light to flicker, gasp, expire. All is dark now. "Never loved me!" sobs the man at the bedside. "Never loved me!"

Frank Hillmore.

Digitized by Google

A Prize for Poets—Spring and Otherwise.

Here are a number of little verses with the last line in each missing. A Prize of One Guinea will be sent to the person who supplies the greatest number of what we consider to be the best.

All you have to do is to take a sheet of paper, put down the figure corresponding to the verse, and write alongside of it the line you think would be the most appropriate.

Then attach your name and address, inclose the slip in an envelope marked "Verselet," and post it to the Editor of Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, W.C., to arrive not later than Wednesday, April 13th.

A copy of any book the winner may care to name will be presented to each of the next best twenty-five.

1.

THERE was an old man of Rheims,
Who was troubled with horrible dreams,
So they fed him on cake
To keep him awake,
.....

2.

THERE was a young lady so gaily
Went off to see Barnum and Bailey,
But she gave a loud shriek
When she met the first freak,
.....

3.

A GIRL in a moment of pique
Gave her lover a slap on the chique.
Not a word did he say.
But he left her that day,
.....

4.

THERE was a young cook in a kitchen
Whose smile was so sweet and bewitchin'.
That policeman astray
Were proposing all day,
.....

5.

THERE was an old man from Peru
Who had nothing whatever to do;
So free from all care
In foul weather or fair,
.....

6.

THERE was a young scorcher of Ham,
Who full speed on his bike used to cram,
But he's no scorcher now,
For fate is to plough,
.....

7.

THERE was an old man who said naught
When people all stared at his wart;
But he grinned with such glee,
They grew frightened of he,
.....

8.

SAID the Reverend Henry Ward Beecher
To a hen: "You're a beautiful creature."
And the hen, pleased at that,
Laid an egg in his hat,
.....

9.

THERE was a young person of London,
Whose elegant shoe-string came undone;
But she said, with a smile,
Some men walk a mile,
.....

10.

THERE was a young lady of Troy,
Whom several large flies did annoy.
Some she drowned at the pump,
Some she killed with a thump,
.....

11.

There was an old maid of Havanner,
Who steadily thumped her pianner,
Till the neighbours with glee
Abolishèd she,
.....

12.

There was an old man of Vienna,
Who lived upon tincture of senna.
When that did not agree,
He took camomile tea,
.....

Digitized by Google

A TALE OF OLD FRANCE.

By MARY FERMOR.

SUMMARY.

Amaury Montruel, a knight, and Mahmoud-el-Reis, a Saracen, meet on the road to Paris. The former's mission is to kill the Queen of France; the latter's to kill the King. At the same time two children, Eric and Eve, are on their way to Paris to aid the Queen, and overhear the conversation of these two horsemen. Shortly afterwards a knight and his page give the children a lift on the road, and, on arriving at Paris, place them under the care of the Freemasons. Maître Samson, Montruel's secretary, tries to induce Tristan de Pamiers, king of the law students, to raise a rebellion in favour of Agnes de Méranie against Philip's consort, Queen Ingeburge. Albret, the King's page, takes Eve, alias Little Adam, to the King, who gives her permission to visit Ingeburge in her captivity in the Abbey St. Martin. Meanwhile Agnes de Méranie pays a visit to Notre Dame with Amaury Montruel, and stills the ominous cries of the people by distributing among them her paste jewels. In the cathedral she meets Mahmoud-el-Reis, who is carving a figure of the Virgin, and tries to win his regard by presenting him with pearls, which he crushes under his feet when she has gone. Returning from the visit to the cathedral, the members of the Royal party are intercepted by the Free-Lances, but are finally allowed to go on their way. Thinking this wild crew may be of future use to her, Agnes de Méranie determines to enlist the sympathies of their leader, Antoine Cadocu. To accomplish her object she visits him the same evening, accompanied by Montruel, in the low tavern in which he and his followers hold their nightly revels.

CHAPTER IX.

At the Saint-Landry Tavern.

The Rue de la Calandre was occupied, in the reign of Philip Augustus, exclusively by taverns of the lowest description, from which all sorts of horrible sights and sounds emerged at intervals from nightfall till dawn. Wantonness and Riot held high carnival, with Brute Force as King of Revels and all the basest of human passions as his attendant satellites.

It was in a scene of this description that Agnes de Méranie, the chosen wife of the King of France, elected to take part.

She arrived at the tavern when the orgie was in full swing; all restraint had been thrown off, and men, women, nay, even children were revelling madly in the wild carouse. Montruel remained outside as directed, and drew back into the darkest corner he could find as his only chance of safety from an assault that might easily prove fatal. Maître François Gauthier was sitting on an up-turned barrel half asleep. These nocturnal revels had long lost all charm for him, and he lazily opened one eye when an extra loud shriek told him some girl was in danger of having her head broken, or the clash of weapons promised the added excitement of blood-letting.

If Agnes de Méranie had gone in with her face uncovered, her entry would have evoked no curiosity, for the costliness of her dress was no uncommon thing among the women who frequented this place, but she had put on a small dark mask, and the first one who saw her called out:

"A mask! Who's that?"

In an instant she was surrounded by a crowd of excited, more or less intoxicated bacchantes, each one of whom looked ready to lynch the intruder.

But she was not to be daunted, so, raising her voice, she cried:

"Hola! Maître Antoine Cadocu! Will you not protect the guest you have yourself invited?"

"Let's take her to Catherine, and she'll soon scratch her eyes out," shrieked one of the infuriated girls.

Cadocu was still sitting where Montruel had left him, but the table was covered with flagons he had emptied, and his left arm was thrown round Catherine's waist. He had just kissed the girl in the middle of her song, and was praising her singing in amorous tones when Agnes's cry reached him. Catherine jumped up with blanched cheeks and a suspicious look in her eyes.

"Who have I promised to meet to-night?" he said in a thick voice.

"I don't know!"

"Well, then, if you don't know, sweetheart, it must be a rival! Now don't clench those pretty teeth. Oh, Cathos, you're just mad about me!"

"Now then, you others," he shouted, "let her come in if she says I've sent for her, and if she's lying you shall punish her, my dears."

He took another draught to clear his head a little. Agnes crossed the room, still wearing her mask and followed by the tittering, gibing crowd of envious women.

"A mask!" growled Cadocu, "how in the world am I to know who she is?" Then an idea seemed to dawn upon his clouded brain, and he welcomed her with a riotous laugh.

"She's come! Here's a game! Come along, my beauty, I was expecting you. I don't have a Queen to see me every night!"

The word Queen was taken up and repeated on all sides with various comments. Agnes advanced quickly, but Catherine was before her, and tried to get between her and Cadocu, who, however pushed the girl aside, saying roughly:

"Get out of the way, you've had your turn! Now it's hers!"

Catherine slunk back with tears brimming over through her long lashes, for she really loved her capricious master.

Digitized by Google

Agnes bent down and whispered something in his ear to which he assented with a vacant smile.

"All right. Don't be afraid. I won't tell any tales."

Catherine dried her tears and prepared to watch closely what this stranger was doing.

"It is the Queen, and I'll be revenged on her!"

Cadocu put his arm round Agnes and drew her down to the empty seat beside him, for he had reached that hazy, indiscriminating stage of intoxication in which one person was pretty much the same as another. An hour earlier Madame Agnes might have appealed to his ambition and gallantry to some purpose, but now he was too far gone to do more than nod with indifferent approval at her artful cajoleries. She tried to interest him in her plans, but though he seemed to grasp the sense of what she said he had not the energy to follow it up: "Let's enjoy ourselves!" he hiccoughed.

"Yes, yes, let's enjoy ourselves," she answered readily, for she still hoped to humour him into acquiescence.

"Ma foi! If I'd been certain you'd come, I'd have drunk a little more to make me jolly. Now, I can hardly keep awake." His head fell forward, and then he roused himself with a jerk, and François Gauthier brought a block of wood for him to rest his arm upon. This change of posture seemed to wake him up a little, and he turned to Agnes:

"What can you do to amuse me?"

"Anything you like."

"Can you sing?"

"They used to call me the nightingale in my father's land."

"Ah, your father was a brave man, a fine fellow Can you dance?"

"Like Terpsichore."

"Umph! Don't know her. Can you drink?"

"As much as you like, Maître Antoine," was the unblushing reply.

During this cross-questioning the men and women had been gathering round in a semi-circle, but they dared not come too near, for, drunk as he was, this man was still their master.

Cadocu struck his fist on the table and called out:

"Catherine, Alix and Jeanne, come here!"

Two pretty, saucy girls responded at once to his voice, but the third, Catherine, waited a few seconds, and when she did come her eyes were again wet with tears.

The one named Alix advanced to the table at a sign from Cadocu. She was a splendidly developed girl, with broad shoulders and strong frame, but with a face marred by signs of excess.

"Alix, here is one who boasts that she can drink."

"All right! then we'll drink together."

Agnes de Méranie had not boasted without some reason. In all the festivities at the Louvre she had been Queen of the revels, and from her earliest youth her jewelled drinking-cup had been emptied with a frequency and persistance that would have done credit to a trooper; but then her beverages had been of the rarest and choicest description.

She now seized the cup out of which Cadocu had been drinking and filled it up to the brim. The sickening smell of this strong decoction made expressly for Maître Gauthier's customers nearly choked her, but as she saw a frown gather on Cadocu's brows, she summoned all her determination and emptied it at a draught.

"Now you, my lass," he said, handing the cup to Alix.

"I shan't drink out of that thing!"

Agnes flattered herself that the cup was too large for her rival, but, to her infinite surprise, Alix chose the very largest she could find, and began to fill it with the one Agnes had used. It contained exactly twelve times as much. The girl lifted the huge vessel with both hands and set it to her lips. The veins stood out in her neck and her face grew purple, but she drank on to the very last drop before setting it down. With a gasp for breath she handed it to Agnes saying:

"Now it's your turn again!" Seeing that her rival hesitated, she laughed harshly:

"Oh! that's only the beginning! I can do better than that."

Agnes was too clever not to know when she was beaten, so she took a diamond clasp from her mantle and offered it to Alix, saying sweetly:

"I am afraid I must ask you to excuse me, I am not used to this wine."

She hoped to avoid unpleasantness by this generosity, but Cadocu snarled angrily:

"She can't drink a bit!" and Alix threw back the clasp disdainfully.

"I don't want your jewels! I saw what you gave away outside the Nôtre Dame this evening!"

"Jeanne, come here," called the Captain of the Free-lances.

The girl who obeyed his command was one of those in whom the poetry of motion is born, not made. She danced

"A mask! Who's that?"

as naturally as she breathed, and every movement was a fresh revelation of grace and beauty. Agnes had no scruple in showing off her prowess, and she danced well, with the suppleness and elasticity of her race. Flushed with wine and fired by her keen desire for conquest, she surpassed herself in one of the graceful classic dances then in vogue at the court, and which had been imported from the East by the Crusaders. Cadocu looked on carelessly, and yawning wearily, he turned to Jeanne:

Digitized by Google

"Come, child, show her how to dance, for she doesn't seem to know much about it."

Jeanne cleared the table with one light bound, and forthwith began one of those bewildering terpsichorean feats in which the exhilarating joyousness of the gipsy alternates with the seductive languor of the East.

"That's what I call dancing!" said Cadocu, when she had finished. "You don't dance well, madame!" He tried to drink again, but his hand was so unsteady that the contents of his cup found its way on to the floor rather than into his mouth, which was perhaps as well.

He fell on his knees before her.

"Now, Catherine, ma mie, it's your turn."

Catherine's spirits had risen in exact proportion to Agnes' discomfiture, and she now came forward with sparkling eyes and a heart confident of victory. She placed herself in a graceful pose in front of her lord and master and bided her time.

Philip Augustus was a great lover of the old romance songs of heroic deeds, and Agnes had wiled away many a weary hour for him by her sweet singing of the ballads of Roland and Arthur's Knights. She had a beautiful voice, and was complete mistress of the art of managing it, so she took the lute confidently and began a soft prelude to one of her favourite songs. Even that uncouth rabble listened spell-bound, for that which is really beautiful touches a soft spot in the most degraded minds; but one ear was deaf to the witchery of her music, for Cadocu seemed to become more and more irritated by it. At last he said impatiently:

"Enough of that! Do you think we want to listen to that miserable dirge, madame? We might as well be in church. Take the lute from her, Catherine! She can't sing, she can only wail."

This time Agnes realised that this man was not to be won by her, and she regretted her own folly in having exposed herself to this humiliation. Had she succeeded she would not have felt the slightest shame at the step she had taken; but, with the bitterness of failure, all the degradation of her position forced itself upon her mind with hideous reality.

Catherine snatched the lute away and struck up a stirring song of the Free-lances, which she sang with a dramatic power and thrilling sweetness that appealed strongly to her hearers. She concluded with a sneering allusion and a look of malignant triumph towards Agnes, who sat with bowed head and tightly locked fingers.

Cadocu woke up during the wild melody, with its swinging rhythm and haunting refrain, and now drew Catherine once more to his side and kissed her warmly. The girl's face beamed with delight, and she nestled closer to him as he leant on her shoulder and turned to Madame Agnes contemptuously:

"As for you, madame, you have entirely spoilt our evening. Look how quiet they all are! and at this hour I like to go to sleep to the tune of their wild frolics! I called you a queen when you came in, but you're not even that, for Ingeburge of Denmark was the King's wife before you, and no queen would have come to such a place as this, risking her good name and her crown."

"But who's to know?" gasped Agnes under her breath.

"The King knows all!" repeated Catherine maliciously.

The well known words struck terror to the wretched woman's heart.

"And if you're not the Queen," pursued Cadocu brutally, "you're no better than these girls here. Not so good in fact, for you're not as beautiful as the poor girl whom your lover, Amaury Montruel, had strangled yesterday morning, and you can't drink, dance, or sing as well as some of them can! So get along with you, for you're no good here!"

After this long speech, spoken at intervals and jerked out in disjointed phrases, Cadocu relapsed into his drunken stupor.

Catherine clapped her hands with a triumphant laugh, and the mad turmoil began anew. Agnes de Méranie fought her way to the door through the thronging, jeering mass of humanity, and escaped in a sorry plight from the scene of her shameful escapade.

CHAPTER X.

A Royal Eavesdropper.

As soon as she reached the street, Agnes de Méranie, choking with rage and mortification, looked round for Montruel, burning to vent her fury upon him. Not seeing him directly, she uttered his name in a low, hoarse whisper, which brought him from his hiding-place in a second.

"Ah!" she groaned, "why did I not take my dagger to that vile den! Sir!" she said turning upon him fiercely, "you lured me into an infamous trap!"

"I—did?" he stammered.

"Silence. You're a coward and a traitor!" she hissed as she took him by the shoulders and shook him violently to and fro in the strength of her passion. Then, as it reached a climax, she struck him sharply across the face with the gold tassel of her girdle. Having thus exhausted her fury the reaction set in, and she fell fainting at his feet in the gutter of the Rue de la Calandre.

The sight of her helplessness completely disarmed her lover's natural anger, and he lifted her inanimate form tenderly in his arms and bore her to his house.

Digitized by Google

Half an hour later they were on their way to the Louvre, Madame Agnes showing no external sign of the agitation she had undergone, save that she was a little paler than usual. Montruel's heart was still heavy and sore within him, first for her headstrong behaviour in going to Cadocu at the tavern, and then at the thought of her savage injustice to himself. When they had reached the Royal Avenue, she stopped suddenly and looked earnestly at him, then said coolly:

"Don't think any more about what happened to-night. I was mad at the time, I think, and I should not like to think that those few minutes had cost me the regard of an old and true friend."

"Madame——" he began tenderly, with a look of infinite love in his eyes.

"That's all right, then," she interrupted hastily. "I see you have forgiven me, and will not think any more about it. It makes my heart much lighter to think I still retain your faithful friendship."

She spoke without emotion, but gave him her hand and suffered him to hold it even after he had kissed it passionately.

"My Queen! I am yours till death! but tell me, shall I not punish that ruffian for his insolence? One word from you, and my archers shall surround the house and burn out these vermin in their hole. Not a man or woman shall live to breathe a word against the Queen's fair name!"

"Thank you. I understand; you think I am afraid and you are trying to reassure me; but, remember, there is the King to protect my good name, he would never believe a word against me. I need have no fear, my lord!"

Then her mood changed, with that swiftness that made her character such a bewildering enigma, and she drew nearer to him, trembling slightly.

"No, no, it's not those robbers and wantons that I fear. I want you to avenge me on her who stands between me and the Crown—who robs my life of all peace and security, and whose existence enabled that brute to tell me to my face that I was no Queen!"

"You have my solemn pledge, madame, that your rival shall soon cease to breathe."

"How can I believe you, when day after day nothing is done? As long as she is above ground my life is in danger, my rank is a mere sham. This council that is to be held may change my fate in an hour!" Her voice sank almost to a whisper as she continued:

"Amaury, do you know what a woman will do for the man who realises the dearest wish of her heart?"

Montruel's heart gave a sudden leap, and then seemed to stop beating as he looked down on her beautiful face, from which all trace of anger had vanished, and which was softened and idealised by the moonbeams that were playing lovingly on it. The pleading pathos in her voice and the emotion with which she seemed overcome, raised his blind infatuation to its fullest height, and a vista of possible delight opened before him. He fell on his knees before her and pressed both her hands to his lips again and again.

"I have said too much," faltered Agnes, whose rôle it was to play the part of alarmed innocence when his passion became too pronounced, "I must be more guarded, or our intercourse will be fraught with danger to me. We had better not meet again for the present, not till you have welcome news to give me."

Amaury began to protest that he could not live without a sight of her, but she was firm, and checked all further remonstrance by playfully laying her hand upon his lips and bidding him sound the horn, for they had reached the palace gates. The draw-bridge was lowered, and they entered the Louvre in silence.

In the large hall where Philip Augustus had received "Maître Adam" that morning, the rosy light of an Oriental lamp was illuminating the pale, emaciated face of Montruel's secretary and confidant, Maître Samson.

If Philip made it his boast that "the King knew all," it is certain that he knew a great deal, and, moreover, that he possessed a genius for acquiring knowledge that would not have come to him in an ordinary way. He was as subtle as Louis XI. and had the faculty of choosing his agents so that they were both secret and reliable.

Maître Samson was standing, cap in hand, before the King, who was reclining on a divan, shading his eyes with one hand from the light.

"Ah, ah," he was saying, "so Amaury Montruel had this girl killed, had he?"

"Yes, my Liege, three miles from Paris, on the way to Etampes."

"Because she knew his secret?"

"Yes, your Majesty, as well as you and I know it."

"And how did you find this out?"

"I met the men coming back from murdering poor Agnes."

"Oh, the poor girl was called Agnes, was she?"

"My Lord Amaury gave her that name," said Samson pointedly.

The King moved his hand so as to study more closely the crafty face before him.

"And when you met those men, what were you doing near Nôtre Dame with the King of the Basoche?"

Samson fidgeted about uneasily for a minute or two, and then, with an expression of undisguised admiration, he replied:

"I should like to know who could hide anything from the King! I was there on business about Madame Ingeburge."

"What about her?"

"Your august Majesty knows that better than I do, of course, but since you deign to ask me, it is my duty to reply. My Lord Amaury wishes to excite the Parisian mob in favour of Madame Agnes, who is still very jealous of Madame Ingeburge."

"Ah!" said the King, looking involuntarily at the door

The King opened a manuscript beside him.

Digitized by Google

through which Agnes had appeared just as Eve was leaving him that morning. "So you think that the Queen is jealous, Maître Samson?"

The man made no answer; but looked as if he had more to say and dared not begin it.

"Have you nothing more to tell me?"

"Nothing more," he repeated uncertainly, "no—I don't think——"

"Then you came here to-night expressly to tell me the story of that poor girl's death?" demanded Philip with a searching look.

She came towards him.

Still Samson shuffled his feet and made no answer.

The King opened a manuscript beside him and said curtly:

"Then if you have no more to tell me, you can go."

His visitor moved towards the door, but instead of opening it he stood still, and, turning his cap round and round in his hand, began:

"May I venture, without presumption, to ask your most gracious Majesty a question?"

"Oh, you've not gone yet? Ask as many questions as you like."

Samson's courage rose and he came back into the room.

"Is my Lord Amaury at the Louvre now?"

"He ought to be here."

"That's another matter," said the wily clerk with a smile, "and Madame Agnes——?" Here he stopped, till the King looked up inquiringly, which he took as permission to go on.

"Is she in her room?"

"Where else should she be at this hour, knave?"

"If your Majesty would deign to say, yes or no."

"Well then, yes, of course the Queen is there," said Philip petulantly.

"Is your Majesty quite sure?" persisted the spy.

"Quite sure."

"Your Majesty has seen her there?"

"Yes, I have seen her there, you impudent scoundrel!" cried the King, losing all patience.

"Then I have no more to say than humbly ask pardon for having trespassed on your Majesty's most valuable time," and bowing low he made for the door, intending to go out this time; but the King called out testily:

"Here, come back! You're not going to get off like that, you insolent varlet! How do you dare ask me such questions?"

"Because—because——"

"Speak out like a man, and tell me the truth, mind, or it shall be the worse for you!"

"Your Majesty shall hear the truth. If Agnes the Fair had been alive, I should not have thought twice about it, but she's dead, and there's no other woman so like the Queen in all Paris."

"Keep to the point, fool, I don't want to hear all this!"

"I made a mistake, sire, I must have done, that's all—" stammered Samson, for the King's eyes were blazing with anger.

"What mistake?"

"I thought, your Majesty must pardon such a wild idea, but I thought that I saw Madame Agnes walking alone with Sir Amaury Montruel down the Rue de la Calandre about ten o'clock to-night. They were close to the tavern where Cadocu and his men go and drink together."

The King burst out laughing, and Samson, with all his guile, could detect nothing forced in his merriment.

"Madame Agnes alone with Montruel, and on foot in such a place and at such an hour! Why, man, you must be mad or drunk! Go home and sleep the drink out of your addled brain!"

Samson made his way out of the room as best he could, feeling that he had made a fool of himself this time. His royal master's mood changed as soon as he was alone. The clock struck mid-night, and Philip repeated thoughtfully, even sadly to himself the words he had so mockingly thrown at Samson.

"Alone with Montruel in the Rue de la Calandre, and on foot at ten o'clock at night!"

He seemed surprised as well as perturbed, and after a moment's reflection he got up and crossed the room to where the heavy silken hangings concealed the door of the Queen's apartments. He pushed them noiselessly aside, and, stooping down, looked through the key-hole like any other jealous or suspicious husband.

"I wonder what she'll tell me, for she's not there, the knave was right so far! No doubt she'll try and persuade me that she never left the room, for she is a woman, and all women are liars in such a strait as that."

As he said this to himself, he heard the creaking of the iron draw-bridge outside, and muttered, as he resumed his seat:

"She has just come into the palace, and a few crowns to the guards will make it all right, so that I shall hear nothing."

He smiled bitterly, and Samson's words rang in his ears with haunting clearness, quickened by his own discoveries. He sat thus in moody cynicism, till he heard a sound in the adjoining room. Then there was a rustle of silk, the curtains were drawn back, and as he looked round, Agnes stood smiling on the threshold.

"Have I waited long enough, my Liege?" she asked, in a soft, caressing voice.

"Have you been waiting then, ma belle mie?" was the equally tender response.

She came towards him with a swift, light tread, and murmured:

"I am always afraid of stealing from France any of those precious hours which her beloved King devotes so willingly to her welfare."

She raised her face timidly to his, and he bent down and kissed her white brow, which was still cool with the night air.

"He knows nothing!" she thought triumphantly.

"Alone with him, on foot in the Rue de la Calandre, at ten o'clock to-night!" said Philip Augustus to himself.

But his features told no tales, and Agnes retired to rest calm and smiling in her fancied security.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

WHY ARE WE NOT ALL CORPULENT?

This is a question we find answered by the latest specialist in corpulence, a man who, in our opinion, has done more to cure this distressing incumbrance than all the other so-called adipose-therapeutists together. We have Mr. Russell's new edition before us, entitled "Corpulency, and the Cure," wherein he explains that many men can eat an abundance of everything and yet appear lean and hungry, while the next unfortunate cannot eat but scantily without building up a huge frame of unweildly bulk. Thin persons, the author explains, generally have a very strong liver, which vigorously separates from the blood any superfluity of its fatty constituents: per contra, the liver of the victim to obesity is constitutionally weak, hence it fails, without assistance, to throw off the carbonaceous and fat-forming foods. The book from which we derive this information is published by Mr. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, London, W.C., who has succeeded in manufacturing a purely vegetable compound which has an almost magical effect in the reduction of unhealthy fat. Experimentally it has been given in large doses to those who only carry an amount of fat conducive to the proper production of heat, and the result is that the decoction will not have the remotest effect—not the slightest reduction of weight takes place, while in the case of a superfluity of unhealthy adipose tissue the individual frequently loses 2lb., and much more in serious cases, in twenty-four hours. We should have liked to have pursued this matter further, for it is far more interesting in our opinion than experimenting upon bees, rats, cats, and such like, for what may appear startling in the results of certain foods given to the smaller animals may not be so conclusive or applicable in the case of human beings. We can with pleasure advise our readers to get this book and read for themselves, and, moreover, no one can complain of the price, as it only costs three penny stamps.—North Bucks Times.

HOW TO BECOME THIN.

We have received a careful treatise on obesity which we recommend to those who wish that their "too solid flesh would melt." A stout person may pant and groan and sweat under his or her burden for many a year without feeling the necessity of making his last will and testament; nevertheless, when the imperative time does come to make provision for the disposal of his worldly goods, it is very frequently found that the fatal disease is simply a development of corpulency, which checked in time might have added ten years to his life. That corpulency is a disease is very clear, and there is no reason why it should not be regarded in an equally serious light as consumption or any other disease. Yet it is made light of and ridiculed, and the unfortunate possessor of too much fat, instead of securing the sympathy of his fellow-men and women, gets the credit of being a person of gross and intemperate habits, a glutton in fact. Thus, when we see a picture of a fat monk or squire, there is almost invariably present also a big venison pasty, a fat capon, and a flagon of wine; so it is that, unconsciously, and as it seems unjustly, we always associate a big corporation with big feeding. In the treatise recently published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Bedford Square, London, whose treatment for the cure of corpulency has become so popular that "doing Russell" has become almost a household word, he clearly proves from his experience in a vast number of cases brought under his notice that stout persons are usually the most temperate. He also makes it very clear that corpulency is a disease, and a dangerous one, too, and while insisting that it should be treated as such, strongly disapproves of the system of attempting to remove superfluous fat by a course of emaciating drugs; pointing out with truth that even where it is possible to get rid of a few pounds of fat by this dangerous means, the reduction is only temporary, and the fat returns more rapidly than it left, and one does not want to be taking physic for ever. In contrast to this doubtful method of procedure, he attacks the disease, as it were, at the fountain head. The medicine he prescribes does not lower, but builds up and tones the system; in short, his aim is to eradicate, to cure the disease, and that his treatment is the true one seems beyond all doubt. It is beyond all doubt efficacious. It is perfectly harmless. It is agreeable to take. It does not necessitate semi-starvation. The effects are generally permanent. It is a most exhilarating and strengthening tonic. Send for his book; it is forwarded on receipt of three penny stamps, and well worth reading.—Ilkeston Pioneer.

A POSITIVE CURE FOR CORPULENCE.

Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. We have recently received a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled "Corpulency, and the Cure," and is the cheapest issue (only 3d.) published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Bedford Square, London. Our space will not do justice to his book; send for it yourself. People are wont to regard fatness as constitutional, and something to be laughed at rather than to be prescribed for seriously; but this is evidently an error, as persons whose mode of life has caused a certain excess of flesh require treatment for the cause of that excess, not by merely stopping further increase, but by removing the cause itself. It is astonishing how long we go on perpetuating error, and how difficult it is to make people disbelieve anything, no matter how palpably false the principal, if it has become at all firmly fixed in the public mind. These facts with regard to obesity, however, are so obvious, that there ought to be no difficulty about their acceptance when once they become known, and, as a matter of fact, the immense number of persons who have already acknowledged their truth by recording the benefits received from Mr. Russell's treatment is simply wonderful. In the case of corpulency, if a simple remedy undertake to reduce a person say 7lb. in a week, all that one has to do is to get weighed, and then prove it conclusively. So it is with Russell's compound, but he asks you to prove it in twenty-four hours only.—Cork Herald.

Digitized by Google

CONSULTATIONS FREE.

D O. B. wants to know if trains to which dining saloons are attached are licensed to sell intoxicating drinks. ———No, they are not. The only way in which a train could become licensed premises, as the law now stands, would be by getting as many licenses as the number of licensing districts it runs through. No licensing authority can license premises outside of the territory it has jurisdiction over.

Gunner writes: "I have often wondered about the total weight of the shell poured into Sebastopol during the long siege. Have you any idea of it?" ———It was estimated that the batteries of the allied forces threw 30,000 tons of shot and shell into the besieged city.

A. J. is left-handed. He is rather proud of it, for he believes that a tendency to the left is the sign of a strong mind.———It is quite true that such a statement was made years ago by a scientist, but no conclusive demonstration of the theory has been forthcoming. It may interest you to know that nearly all lions are "left-handed." Livingstone and others noticed this peculiarity. When a lion wants to strike a forcible blow he almost always uses the left paw.

James H.—There are more than one hundred and seventy known species of the fly. Think of this when the warm weather comes.

Unbelieving has seen it stated that the physician to the late Tsar began life in the humble capacity of a butcher's boy, and he supposes that Dr. Zakharin succeeded to such an extent because medicine is not much practised "in that benighted country," as he calls it.———You will be surprised to hear that there are some very clever doctors in Russia. As some proof that medicine is not neglected there, I may tell you that nearly forty medical journals are published in the country; there are twenty in Petersburg. The oldest of the medical journals was established twenty-three years ago, another is twenty-one years old, and a third has eighteen winters to its credit.

C. J. asks where fuller's earth comes from.———Chiefly from Bath and one or two places in Surrey. It is dug out in the form of soft stone and, if required as a powder, has to go through a process of manufacture. It is curious to note that large quantities of this substance are imported by the Americans from Bath; one would expect that within such a vast tract of territory sufficient could be obtained for home use.

Superstitious writes to ask if it is true that blood stains can never be removed?———Not from paper, and only with difficulty if they are old from cloth. There is no reason why you should be superstitious about it, the reason is because of the presence of iron in the blood.

D. L.—There are no fewer than sixty persons in Great Britain whose annual income reaches the respectable figure of £60,000. There are nearly two thousand more who receive amounts varying from that sum down to £10,000, while those in possession of £5,000 to £10,000, exceed three thousand in number. Some five thousand people are credited with incomes ranging from £2,000 to £3,000.

Nan.—It is a curious fact that some of our sweetest flowers are unavailable for purposes of perfumery; their scent cannot be extracted. Our chemists imitate these perfumes to meet the demand while they sigh for the discovery of some process which will make extraction possible. Sweetbriar is an instance.

A. L. K. has heard a story about snails which he refuses to believe. Some of these creatures were collected a few years ago off the coast of Lower California and shut up in a box. Six years later, on being placed in some moist earth, one of them began to move about. He thinks this story must be a "Californian."———Such a thing is not improbable at all. Snails are very tenacious of life, and instances of the kind you mention are recorded in many books of reference.

Mac.—The output of Scotch whisky last year showed an increase of 30 per cent. The increase in Irish and English whisky was respectively 13 and 10 per cent. So you are not likely to run short of your night-cap yet, Mac.

Careful.—The first "run" on banking institutions in London was in 1667. Many Lombard Street goldsmiths and bankers had lent out the money entrusted to them and, being called upon for payment, were unable to meet the demand. A crowd of creditors and others assembled and a riot followed in which four bankers were hanged at their own doors before order could be restored and the angry creditors persuaded that they were not being swindled.

Yank.—You are right. Specimens of every gem known to the lapidary have been found in the United States.

Operator.—The total length of the world's telegraph system is not much under 5,000,000 miles. This is exclusive of 1,814,000 miles of submarine cables. This mileage is apportioned as follows: Europe, 1,765,000; Asia, 311,000; Africa, 100,000; Australia, 218,000; America, 2,500,000.

Sawdust would like to know the loss in thickness caused by wood shrinking. ———This is rather vague, but perhaps the following information will satisfy you. Pitchpine beams will shrink from 18⅜in. to 18¼in., spruce from 8½in. to 8 3-8in., white pine from 12in. to 11 7-8in., yellow pine a trifle less, cedar beams from 14in. to 13½in., elm from 11in. to 10⅞in., oak from 12in. to 11 3-8in. Of course, there may be variations.

H. M.—"Fiasco" originally meant a bottle or a flask. When the Italian glassblowers detected flaws in the vases they were blowing, they made an ordinary bottle of the failure, and hence the name.

Slow, after admitting sorrowfully that he has great difficulty in grasping the significance of large numbers, continues: "I have read articles about the enormous number of soldiers which constitute the 'war footing' of Continental armies, and have tried to imagine what they would look like if assembled on a desert with their ammunition waggons, etc. But I can't do it. Can you give me a 'popular' illustration?"———Perhaps this will help you. If we could have all these men drawn up in single file, with their guns and their ammunition and baggage waggons, the length would be about 24,000 miles. Marching day and night, it would take nearly a year to pass a given point.

Traveller, whose business took him all over France some half-dozen years ago and who has just had another tour of the kind, says that he believes there are fewer foreigners in that country than there were. Is it so? ———Statistics show that there are now 74,000 less than the number stated five years ago. The estimated number of foreigners in France at the present time is 1,027,000.

Micky asks: "How is the age of whales ascertained? I have heard that it is by a similar process to that employed with trees—by rings or layers."———Something of that sort. The age of the whale is calculated according to the number of laminæ, or layers, of the whalebone, which increases yearly. From these indications, ages of 300 to 350 years have been assigned to whales.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

£2,000 in Prizes.

The Proprietors of "Jeunesse Dorée" Dentifrice are prepared to spend an enormous amount to obtain permanent customers. This, they consider, is best achieved by giving prizes to their Customers. The first 50,000 boxes of Dentifrice will be practically Given Away. In every other box will be found a Photograph, on the back of which is a coupon, entitling the holder to various articles, from a Box of Sweets to £100 in Cash. Two Bicycles (Ladies' or Gentleman's) and Six Sewing Machines will be Given Away. No Coupons to collect. One Coupon One Prize. Full List of Prizes in every box. Remember this offer is made only with the first 50,000 boxes.

LETTER ORDERS ONLY.

Dr. Griffiths, Ph.D., F.R.S.E., in his report on Jeunesse Dorée Dentifrice, says:

I hereby certify that I have examined the Jeunesse Dorée Tooth Powder, and find that it is an excellent and invaluable preparation for the teeth. It contains substances which not only whiten, beautify, and preserve the teeth, but sweeten the mouth. It possesses germicidal, antiseptic, and tonic properties, and cures caries. At the same time it has no injurious action on the teeth. As I always use this powder, I can conscientiously state that it is the best in the market.

(Signed) A. B. GRIFFITHS, Ph.D., F.R.S.E.

The sum of £500 will be paid by the Proprietors of Jeunesse Dorée Dentifrice to any charity named by Short Stories, if the above conditions are not faithfully carried out.

Jeunesse Dorée Dentifrice whitens, beautifies, preserves the teeth, and sweetens the mouth. Sold in boxes ONE SHILLING, POST FREE, by

The J.D. Company,
Ormond House, Great Trinity Lane, London, E.C.

PLEASE MENTION THIS PAPER.

PRESENTS SENT IN EXCHANGE FOR COUPONS BY RETURN.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.

Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.

A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious, Non-Alcoholic Wine. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger Lemon, Orange, Blackberry etc.

YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

A PURE VEGETABLE BUTTER.

FOR BAKED & BOILED PASTRY, FRYING, etc.

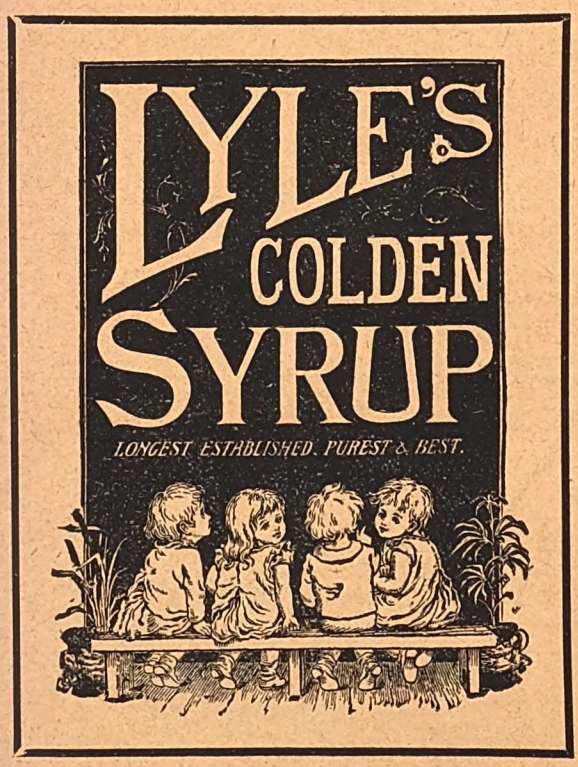
A PERFECT COOKING BUTTER.

NUTRITIVE, DIGESTIVE, ECONOMICAL. FIVE PRIZE MEDALS AWARDED.

Stocked by all London Stores, etc.

A SAMPLE TIN SENT POST FREE FOR THREE STAMPS. Write

NUCOLINE LTD., SILVERTOWN, LONDON, E.



MOTH PREVENTATIVES. In various forms, all equally efficacious. MIKADO MOTH PAPER, especially adapted for folded Clothes, closely-packed Articles, etc., 1/- per box. ALABASTRINE TABLETS, for placing in wardrobes. CRYSTALLISED CAMPHYLENE, for scattering under carpets, into crevices, etc., 1/- per tin.

Stimulating and invigorating. Refreshing and agreeable in odour. Cleanses the Hair. Promotes a Healthy and Velvety Skin. Immeasurably superior to any other preparation for the TOILET, BATH & NURSERY. An Antiseptic, Purifier & Cleanser. Price 1/3 pint bott. Miss Eilaline Terriss writes: "I find it most excellent. I shall always use it."

If any difficulty in obtaining at Chemists, Grocers, Stores, etc., will be sent post free direct, from Sole Manufacturers: Fleming's Oil & Chemical Co. Ld., 101 Leadenhall St., London, E.C.

"DOLLY" CREAM COLOUR

For tinting Curtains, Muslins, Laces, Silks, Blouses, &c., a Rich Cream Shade.

'DOLLY CREAM & TINTS.'

"DOLLY" TINTS.

Manufactured in six shades—Pink, Terra Cotta, Old Gold, Heliotrope, Sea Green, & Canary Yellow—for tinting Faded Ribbons, Lace, &c. Sold everywhere, 1d. per bag. Will wash out when required.

W. EDGE & SONS LTD., BOLTON, LANCS.

FACSIMILE OF "DOLLY" SPECIALITIES.

ZEBRA
Grate Polish.
In Packets or as a Paste in Tins.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY
C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 485. FOR WEEK ENDING APRIL 16TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

DR TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

The Struggle for Existence.

Where there is brain-fag and utter limpness, what is to be done? This is the time when Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa plays such an important part. It not only revives the exhausted nervous system, but it gives tone to what we may call the fountain of life and vigour.

The tired student, the exhausted professional man, the teacher, are revived, restored, and strengthened by Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, which brightens the eye, and stores up reserve power in the nervous system.

Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, 6d., 9d., and 1s. 6d. Dainty Sample Tin Post Free on application (a post-card will do) if when writing you name "Short Stories."

DR TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa Ltd.

60, 61, 62, BUNHILL ROW, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

"Its food value is double that of Bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

will not only help to improve your digestion and consequently your health, but will also bring back that energetic and happy feeling of good health. Man does not live a natural life, so a good portion of a natural food, in the shape of HOVIS, at each meal will largely counteract the bad influence that modern life has upon the health and digestive organs. This is not an idle remark, but a proved statement, daily being verified.

HOVIS is baked and sold by all good class Bakers. No loaf genuine unless stamped HOVIS. 6d. and 1/- samples of Bread and Biscuits sent on receipt of stamps by

S. FITTON & SON, Millers, Macclesfield.

Every Economical Housewife

uses

Tower Tea.

Tower Coffee.

Tower Cocoa.

IN PACKETS AND TINS ONLY.

SOLD EVERYWHERE.

WHOLESALE:

TOWER TEA LTD.,

5, JEWRY STREET, LONDON, E.C.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

SILVER QUEEN CYCLES!

Best Value on Earth. Immense stock of Ladies' and Gents' machines. New and Secondhand. Wonderful bargains. Carriage paid. Easy payments from 10s. monthly, or large cash discount. 1 year's guarantee. Illus. price lists post free on application. Old cycles exchanged The SILVER QUEEN CYCLE Co Ltd., 221 Tottenham Court Road, London.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road, [illegible]; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

WADE'S

WONDERFUL OFFER

A SOLID SILVER WATCH GIVEN AWAY.

SEND NO MONEY.

In order to introduce my name into every household in the Kingdom, I undertake and guarantee to give away one of my "World-Famed £2 Silver Watches," list price, Ladies' or Gentlemen's, to every reader who sends me the correct reading of the Rebus printed below. I am preparing to send out immediately 2,000 of these watches. This is a perfectly genuine competition, and the only thing you have to do is carry out the conditions, and if you succeed in guessing correctly you have the advantage of our truly wonderful offer.

These pictures represent three well-known English Wild Flowers. The conditions of the Competition are that you find out what these flowers are, and if you are correct you undertake to purchase one of my inexpensive Solid Silver Chains. These chains are the best made, are marvellous value. Money returned if dissatisfied. Send at once, enclosing stamped and addressed envelope, so that I may inform you if correct.

W. W. WADE,

WATCH MANUFACTURER,

Dept. 35, GOLD EXCHANGE,

Hammersmith, London W.

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

"JUNO" CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

DIAMONDS from £10. 16/8 monthly. JUNO Lady's or Gents' Safety £12 12/- 21/- monthly. £14 14/-, 24/6 „ £16 16/-, 28/- „ Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories, sent post free to any part.

METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO. LTD., 75 and 76 Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.; and at Piccadilly Circus, exactly opposite the Criterion, London, W. N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. New JUNO Riding School, 1,700ft., now open.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

KEATING'S POWDER IS USEFUL

in preserving blankets and furs from Moths. Sprinkle well with the Powder before putting away.

KILLS BLACKBEETLES & FLEAS.

Tins 3d., 6d. and 1/- each.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 485.] For the Week ending April 16th, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

The Story of La Guenca.

THE evening train was on the point of leaving Madrid for Seville, and I was congratulating myself on having secured an entire compartment for the night, when the door swung open once more, and a woman bounded in—I can find no other word to describe the almost panther-like agility of her movements—and seated herself opposite to me.

In another instant we were steaming out of the station. The quiet nonchalance with which the new arrival leant back against the cushions, the repose of her whole attitude, contrasting as it did with her somewhat energetic mode of entrance a moment since, roused in me a faint sense of curiosity. She was dressed in some clinging, soft material, and a large mantilla, draped low over her forehead, veiled her head, throat, and shoulders.

As my eyes became more accustomed to the dim light afforded by the solitary oil-lamp, I could trace the outline of a slender but exquisitely moulded figure, and catch swift glimpses of a cameo-like profile, of a full and somewhat sensuous scarlet mouth, and handsome, sombre, deep-lashed brows, that gave a look of energy which was yet inexpressively piquant to her face.

The train sped along swiftly and noisily. My companion was gazing steadfastly out into the night. I was gazing furtively at my companion. Suddenly she turned and looked full at me. Such a glance! In the densely dark pupils of her eyes there was a flash as of yellow flame. For a moment they looked almost phosphorescent. Involuntarily I closed my own eyes for an instant. When I reopened them her face was transformed, her long lashes were half drooped, her lips curved in a faint smile. The almost diabolical expression of a moment since was changed into one of half-conscious, feminine coquetry.

The swift metamorphosis startled me. It also aroused in me a decided feeling of interest. Who and what was she? The answer was not easy to find; for in no country in the world is it more difficult to gauge a woman's social status by her outward appearance than in Spain, where the liberty of manners and customs on the one hand and the national dignity and pride of bearing on the other, constantly lead a stranger into most awkward mistakes.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

It was still early in the evening, and sleep was far from me. I resolved to start a conversation.

"Will you permit me to smoke, señorita?"

"Si, senor, con mucho gusto" (Yes, señor, with great pleasure,) came the answer, accompanied by a charming smile.

As I was lighting my cigar, she drew from her pocket a dainty silver case, took out a cigarette, and asked me for a light as simply and as naïvely as though it were the most natural thing in the world that she should join me. Leaning forward to hold a match for her, I was astonished at the marvellous perfection of her features. But again I met that strange glance—a tawny gleam like that in the eye of a beast of the forest as it watches its prey.

"What an awfully handsome woman!" I thought, recalling with a shudder the old southern belief in the evil eye. She smoked with half-closed eyes and a dainty appearance of relish.

"We will soon be in Aragues," she said presently, "and then we go to Alcazar de San Juan, where we stop for supper. Do you know this route, señor? No? I have been over it any number of times."

"Aragues!" shouted the guard. "Five minutes' stop!"

We both alighted. I was longing for a breath of the cool night air. As I sauntered back towards my compartment, I saw my incognita in a low but eager conversation with a dark, picturesque-looking fellow. From the frequency with which they glanced towards me, it was easy to guess that I was the subject of their conversation. And from the malignant look in the man's eyes I inferred that he was probably a jealous lover.

As he assisted my companion into the carriage, two sentences caught my ear distinctly: "Sos les bengoros le ligueren," he growled with a side-look in my direction, and then he added in softer tone: "Stebe te garabe."

It was by the merest chance that I understood him. Some years before I had come across a little book on the dialect of the Spanish gipsies, and as I had become quite interested in it, I still remembered enough to catch the significance of his words. "May the devil take him!" was the amiable wish intended doubtless for myself; and the second, "God guard thee," was his adieu to my companion.

The mystery was partially solved. She evidently belonged to one of the numerous bands of Spanish gipsies; and judging from the deference with which the fellow had spoken to her, and attention of homage shown to her by a little group of swarthy nomads by whom I saw her surrounded in the station at Alcazar, where we stopped at midnight, I judged her to be a person of some rank and importance amongst them.

Being very fond of my creature comforts, I fell asleep on leaving Alcazar, and when I awoke the sun was shining brightly in at the carriage window.

"Have you slept well, señor?" asked my charming vis-à-vis amusedly.

"Delightfully, I must confess, although I should blush for having done so in such charming company."

"Leave flattery for Frenchmen and Spaniards," she answered with a touch of pretty disdain.

Seen in the clear light of the day, her beauty was simply dazzling. I was lost in admiration of her exquisite features. But there was a sort of uncanny fascination about her face, and her trick of smiling brilliantly with her lips, while the eyes remained sombre and threatening, gave one cause for reflection.

A beautiful woman and a dangerous one, who would be capable of any cruelty, and treachery, but alluring, subtle. Involuntarily the thought came to my mind: "God help any man who falls in love with her!"

"You seem to be travelling with quite a suite, señorita," I said presently. "I saw you surrounded by friends at Alcazar."

"Ah, yes, those are my people."

"And you are——"

"We are travelling artists returning to Seville. Flamencos, who"—with an enigmatical smile—"earn their living by dancing."

"You seem, also, to tell fortunes, as I perceived yesterday."

She grew very grave.

"It is quite true," she said slowly. "I can read men's past in their eyes, and their future in the lines of their hand."

"Will you not read my fortune?" I asked, laying my left hand, palm upwards, on hers, which was cold as ice.

There was a moment of perfect silence. Then her sombre eyes looked straight into mine.

"You will meet, unexpectedly, a friend in Cordova. If you love him you will do well to warn him not to attend our dances in Seville."

She ceased abruptly.

How had she guessed that it was my intention to stay in Cordova?

"What of myself," I asked. "Will you not tell me something of my future?"

The locomotive gave a shrill whistle. We were gliding into the station.

"Later, señor," she said, "in Seville."

"But how?—when?" I persisted, my curiosity being aroused. "I do not even know your name."

There was a little crowd of her people at the door of the coupé as the train stopped. Her truculent-looking admirer seemed to lead the band. A smile brightened his handsome, evil face as he helped her to alight. As they moved off, she paused, and glancing back over her shoulder with an infinitely graceful movement of her beautiful head, she called to me:

"Do not forget, señor; we will meet again in Seville."

II.

It was fair time at Cordova. The boulevards were lined with long rows of booths, laden with articles of every description. There were circuses, shooting-galleries, strolling players, merry-go-rounds, and even an improvised ball-room.

A little knot of people was gathered on one of the open plazas. Drawing nearer to see what was the attraction, I recognised, to my surprise, the central figure. A tall, handsome blonde young man, with a laughing, boyish face, who was amusing himself by scattering handfuls of small coppers among a crowd of swarthy, half naked children, scrambling, laughing, shouting, tumbling over one another in their eagerness to capture the coins.

I was no less delighted than surprised to see him. He was a young Russian, Ivan Kasanjew by name, who had lived in the same hotel with me for two winters in Paris. He was a bright, genial fellow, something of a dare-devil, a trifle eccentric, like all true Russians, and sufficiently well off to indulge in his passion for the collection of works of art of every description.

Digitized by Google

"Ivan!" I called to him, when I had been watching the fun for a few moments. "Ivan Kasanjew!"

His amazement and delight were equal to my own. Questions were asked; explanations of how, whence, and where soon made. He had been making a short trip through Spain; had stopped at Cordova for a day or two, and was going on to-morrow to Seville. On learning that that was also my destination, it was at once decided to travel together, and on the following morning we were en route for the Andalusian capital.

In my pleasure at meeting Ivan, La Guenca and her prophecy had completely faded from my mind.

One evening, as we sat sipping our after-dinner coffee, about a week after our arrival in Seville, Ivan, who usually planned our evening amusements, said to me:

"I've got something new for to-night, Harris—what you Englishmen would call awfully jolly. There is going to be a gipsy entertainment at Calle de Carbon—singing and dancing, I believe. They say the show is immense, and that some of the girls are bewilderingly handsome."

As he spoke, there came to me as a flash, the memory of my adventure in the train; of the dark, sombre face of the gipsy woman, and her prophecy of our meeting in Seville. I am not superstitious naturally, yet an odd feeling of dread came over me.

"Well?" said Ivan impatiently.

I glanced at his handsome, insouciant face. Should I tell him? The fear of being laughed at kept me silent.

"Do you want very much to go to this show," I stammered lamely.

"Why, are you ill. You look decidedly queer."

"No, not ill, but——"

"But me no 'buts,' Harris. Come along man. What is the matter with you?"

An hour later we were seated in a huge hall, amongst an immense audience, chiefly of the lower classes, with a sprinkling of young swells, drawn there, doubtless, by the clever dancing of the women.

Before us was a roughly constructed stage, on which the gipsy troupe, attired in gorgeous and fantastic costumes, were seated in a large semi-circle. The form of the entertainment was unique. One of the men would start a weird twanging on his guitar, and commence a sort of low, nasal chant, which was taken up, one by one, by the troupe, and then by the whole audience, while they all kept time with their feet and by a quick tapping of the palms of their hands. This noise, now rising, now falling was intended to arouse the highest point of nervous tension and excitement both in the audience and the performers. One after another the gipsies would rise and come forward, and go through some symbolic pantomime of love or hate, joy or sorrow, by dancing and gesture, to the accompaniment of the guitar, in whose principal player I recognised the man who had consigned me to the evil one in the station of Aragues. The lithe, almost snake-like movements of the dancers, the wild music, added to, ever and anon, by the banging of the tambourine or the rattle of castanets, seemed to my prosaic mind like an orgie in a madhouse.

Suddenly there was a lull, followed by the wild cries of "La Guenca! La Guenca!"

She glided from behind a heavy curtain and stood smiling before the audience, acknowledging their rapturous acclamations with regal grace.

A fantastic costume of orange and gold set off her form to perfection. Her bare throat and arms were glittering with golden baubels. She poised one arm above her head, rested her right hand lightly on her hip, and commenced to dance. Such dancing! Now soft, sensuous, undulating; now swaying languorously with half closed eyes; now whirling and bounding lightly and swiftly; now half crouching with flashing eyes, and then springing forward again, laughing radiantly. It was diabolical. A sudden grasp of my arm recalled me to myself. Ivan was breathless with excitement. His fair face was flushed with crimson.

"She is wonderful!" he gasped. "She is divine!"

"Say devilish, rather," I muttered.

He did not even hear me. He was watching again, with his whole soul in his eager blue eyes. When the performance was over, I could hardly drag him away.

"I must see her again," he kept repeating. "If I could only meet her, only speak to her!"

His wish was soon granted. As we passed out we saw her about to enter a neighbouring restaurant. She recognised me at once and came towards us.

"Welcome to Seville!" she exclaimed, holding out her brown, slender hand, and then added, a little maliciously, "I see that you have brought your friend."

Kasanjew looked bewildered.

"Why, Harris," he broke forth at last, "why didn't you tell me you knew the señorita?"

There was a world of reproach in his voice.

I did not know whether to laugh or to be angry. The danseuse relieved me from my embarrassment.

"Will not the gentleman join us?" she said invitingly.

Ivan accepted eagerly. I could only follow his example. We found the rest of the company already seated.

"If the cabaleros will deign to take supper with us," she said with a charming smile. "This is Pepe," introducing with a graceful gesture the dark-browed guitar player, who scowled at us fiercely. "And that is Juan, and there is Palma, and the nina (girl) is our Pepita."

The supper was a joyous one. All, with the exception of Pepe, relaxed under the quantities of wine which Ivan insisted on ordering. My friend was radiantly happy. But it was the smile of La Guenca, not the wine, that mounted to his head. Whether her capricious fancy had been caught by his blonde beauty or whether she was enticing him for some purpose of her own, I could not decide. If I was doubtful of her feelings, Pepe was more easily read. He frowned darkly, ate little, drank nothing, and when Ivan insisted on filling his glass, he struck it as though accidentally with his arm, sending it crashing to the floor; the broken glass seemed ominous.

All the way back to our hotel, Ivan simply rhapsodised on the charms of his new acquaintance. She had told him that her name was Gabriella, and boasted that she had Royal Moorish blood in her veins. He insisted on hearing the story of our meeting in all its details. Unconsciously I grew very earnest as I spoke of the warning which I had received.

"What nonsense, my dear fellow!" he exclaimed, laughing. "The only thing worth consideration in the matter is Pepe. He seems to be an ugly customer. But," he added, drawing a silver mounted revolver from the inner pocket of his coat, "if he proves troublesome, I have a plaything here which will perhaps influence him."

In vain I protested, entreated, warned. I doubt if ever he heard half of what I said, so lost was he in his rapturous dream.

Digitized by Google

"If Gabriella is the woman I take her to be, I will marry her," he concluded in his reckless, impetuous fashion, as he bade me good night. I knew how utterly useless it was to battle against any determination, however eccentric and capricious, in one of his nationality, one might as well try to break a block of granite as a Russian's will. I could only hope that his caprice would wear out with time.

From now on Ivan spent almost all his time among the gipsies. La Guenca seemed to have bewitched him. When away from her he was restless, irritable, and abstracted, taking no apparent interest in anything. He also spent a great deal of his money for very handsome presents. I pitied the fellow sincerely. He had fallen a victim to the diabolical fascinations of a woman without heart or conscience. One evening, wishing to see for myself how far things had gone between them, I proposed that I should accompany him.

The performance was the same as before. Afterwards we all assembled again in a restaurant. I was puzzled at first at the change in Pepe. He greeted us, if not graciously, at least with an outward show of civility. I soon understood. After supper he suggested a little game. My friend acquiesced at once. Ivan lost continuously. Watching the gipsy keenly, I discovered that he was playing with false cards.

When I was alone with Ivan, I had a long, earnest talk with him on the subject, and told him what I had seen.

"I knew it," he replied wearily. "But I am willing to lose a little money to keep him in good humour, and prevent him continually spying on Gabriella and myself."

"Did it never occur to you," I responded, "that she might be his accomplice?"

He sprang to his feet, livid with rage.

"How dare you!" he cried hoarsely.

For a moment I thought that he was going to strike me. I met his angry glance sadly but unflinchingly. His clenched hand dropped slowly to his side.

"Harris," he said, in a voice quivering with emotion, "you misjudge her on account of her surroundings. If you could only know her as I do! She is the bravest, noblest, truest woman I have ever met."

"Ivan!" I cried desperately, "you are mad! Throw off this spell. Be a man. Come away with me at once to Russia—Paris—anywhere; but come before it is too late. When once you have left this place, time and change will cure you of this folly."

For a moment a look of despair crossed his face.

"It is too late now," he replied, in a tone that permitted of no argument. "I love Gabriella more than my life."

"And she?"

"Harris, I fully believe that she returns my love. In a short time she hopes to be able to escape from her tribe and follow me to my own country. If I do not marry her," he added after a moment's pause, "I shall die!"

The next day I went with the lovers on a boating trip. We were drifting down the Guadalquivir at sundown. Gabriella was at the rudder; Ivan and I worked the oars. As La Guenca was free this evening, we did not think of returning until the silver light of the moon was streaming over the water. I persuaded my friend to let me manage the boat myself, and he, only too glad to be relieved, threw himself at his charmer's feet. They made a handsome picture. He strong and fair and radiant as a young sun-god, she dark, dreamy, mystical as fate.

"How beautiful is love," he murmured.

She stooped and pressed her lips passionately to his forehead.

"My beloved!"

We were slowly gliding past the golden tower which once held the treasures of the New World. At that moment a voice broke forth on the stillness of the night—low, thrilling, despairing like a warning of death. It was the lament of the fall of Granada.

"I am cold," murmured the gipsy, wrapping her shawl closer around her, as the last despairing notes died away on the evening air.

We, too, had been chilled by the song. We had all recognised the voice of Pepe, although no one spoke of it. Little more was said until we reached the landing. A false note had sounded in our gamut of pleasure. The harmony of our enjoyment had been disturbed.

A few days afterwards an important telegram called me to Paris. I parted from Ivan with a heavy heart. I could not conquer the feeling that our hands clasped for the last time. I think that he felt it also, for his blue eyes were clouded with a mist that looked like tears when the last moment came.

Six weeks later I read among the foreign news in a Paris paper the following:

SEVILLE, Sept 15th.—For some time past a troupe of gipsy dancers have been drawing large audiences to their entertainments in the Calle de Carbon of this city. The prima donna of the troupe is the famous Guenca, a woman of extraordinary beauty, but possessed of all the unscrupulousness of her tribe, and whose charms have ruined numbers of our young noblemen, who, blinded by her fascinations, have squandered large sums of money on her while her companions plundered them ruthlessly at cards.

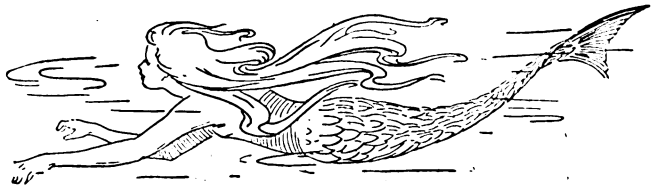
The latest victim was a wealthy Russian, Ivan Kasanjew, whose reckless passion for her has been a matter of much comment. Yesterday morning his dead body, stabbed in five places, was found lying in the Alameda de Capuchinos.

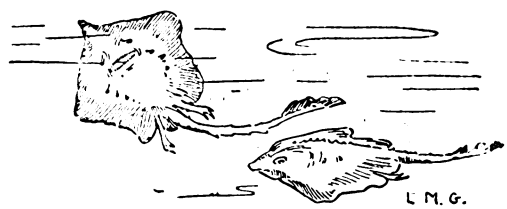
A short, pointed dagger, such as is customarily carried by gipsies, was found near the corpse, covered with blood. The murderer is supposed to be one Pepe Aranjo, a member of the same troupe and the lover of the prima ballerina. The motive of the crime is presumed to have been jealousy.

Pepe Aranjo and La Guenca have disappeared together. It is said that they embarked on a French steamer for Lisbon. The authorities are on their track, but it is possible that they have made good their escape from the country before they can be overtaken.

This was the tragic ending of Ivan Kasanjew's mad infatuation.

BASQUE.





Digitized by Google

Unearthed and Re-edited By Robert Machray.

Illustrated By Arthur Jules Goodman.

No. II.—THE FIRST BLACK FRIDAY.

Being a letter of one Mungo Murray, addressed to his grandson, Sir Oliver, of the City of London, banker, printed for the first time.

"My Dear Noll,

"You have frequently asked me to write down the story of that eventful day called Black Friday, and all that pertains to myself and to our family in connection therewith. Methinks it were best to comply with your request, and to set forth in writing a sort of history of the events of the '45 so far as they concern our own fortunes.

"My father, who was your great granddad, was of the well-known Highland house of Murray, and a man of some estate. I remember him not, for he died when I was a mere child, having succumbed to wounds which he had received fighting for King James — him whom the Whigs called the Pretender.

"Now that all these troublous times are past, and it is certain that no Stewart will ever again sit upon the throne, you will not be able to understand how it was that men such as he were well content to lose not only their property, but their lives as well, for that dearest of lost causes.

"Yet so it was.

"Even my mother, deprived of her husband by death, and of his estate by the Government of King George, never said one word in despite of the fallen dynasty, devotion to which had wrought her bitter woe.

"Then, when I was a little boy, she settled in the old grey city of Aberdeen, and, being in possession of some money of her own, was minded to make me a member of its famous Faculty of Advocates. But she died when I was a lad, and bade me choose whatever profession or calling I had a taste for.

"Now when I thought the matter over, I was ill content to stay in North Scotland—which, were it as rich as it is beautiful, would be the wealthiest country in the world. Being somewhat puffed up with the vanity and spirit of youth, nothing would suffice me but that I must come to London.

"Here, in the richest city on earth, I soon found that there were many persons who had no other occupation than the making of money, and that, not from the profits made in the trading in merchandise, but from their success in a game in which Chance played some part, but Wit more. I mean the buying and selling of stocks and shares of the debt of the nation, and of the Bank of England, and the like.

"Among the most prosperous of those who had dealings constantly on 'Change was Isaac Elnathan, the great Hebrew banker, who was, of course, no other than your grandmother's father. To his safe keeping I intrusted the money I had brought with me from Aberdeen, and after a time was lucky enough to be taken into his office. As the years went by, he gave me not a little of his confidence—the which I strove hard to gain ever more fully, and that for a reason which will presently appear.

Digitized by Google

"I lived in his house, as was then the fashion, and there I met Leah, his daughter. Your mother, dear Noll, was lovely to look upon, for she was like my Leah, who bore her; but, lad, lad, never was any woman so sweet and winsome and bonnie as your grandmother. God gives me sometimes to see her in my dreams, and then the longest day is short with happiness.

"I loved her, and she me.

"How simple it seems when 'tis said!

"Yet never was anything less likely than that we would ever be married. It was for that object that I toiled and slaved for Elnathan, giving years of service with all the strength of my mind and body—somewhat after the fashion of a patriarch who loved the sister of another Leah.

"'Twas presumption, indeed. The daughter of a king of finance, a monarch of money, and I no more than that great man's clerk, for I was no more than that then. But I hoped. She was much younger than I, and her father had promised her to nobody, but——. Then I would grow cold at heart with fear of some possible rival, to whom Elnathan might wish to betroth her.

"Elnathan would not have been the sharp and wonderful man he was, if he had not seen something of our affection for each other, but he made no sign of noticing what was going on under his eyes. So time sped along, and quickly enough, for had not each day its own excitements, surprises, and ups and downs in the ever varied conflicts of which 'Change Alley was the field.

"Now that is a business, Noll, in which one hath always to beware of the bolt from the blue sky.

"With the suddenness of a hurricane there fell upon the kingdom, and more especially on London, which is its very heart, the tidings that Prince Charles Stuart, the son of that James for whom my father had lost lands and life, had landed in Scotland. Then we heard that he had succeeded in raising an army among the clans of the Highlands, and was to make a bold try to regain for the Stuarts the throne of their fathers.

"As to the way the tidings affected us, we were not long in finding out. One day Elnathan sent for me—this was towards the middle of 1745. When I entered his room, he had a dark scowl upon his face, and when he spoke it was with a sneer.

"'See, here,' said he, and he tossed over a letter to me. 'What think you of that, now?'

"The letter proved to be from one of our customers, a gentleman of the town, who had the sum of £20,000 at deposit with us. He requested that the money should be repaid him at once, alleging that now the young Pretender was in the country everything was in danger, and that the only safe place for money was some secure and secret hidingplace in the ground—'where,' wrote he, 'I shall soon follow it in all probability, for I am so overwrought with fear in my mind, and so overset in body by reason of a fearful cold in my head and in my bones, that I fear me I have not long to live.'

"He concluded his letter by asking that the money should be sent him as speedily as possible, if we would not be the death of him, in notes of the bank of the value of £1000 apiece.

"'That is only the beginning of troubles,' said Elnathan. 'However great or small the hubbub which the Prince shall make, it will be sufficient to disturb the market, and money will be called in on every hand, and stowed away, for fear of what may happen. What say you?'

"'Tis but what is to be expected,' I replied. 'Yet will it work both ways, for there will be the flow as well as the ebb of the tide.'

"'Aye, there will be some golden opportunities,' quoth Elnathan, while his face lighted up. 'Now, Mungo, you will get from the bank twenty-one notes of £1000 each, that's one extra for interest, and 'twill fix in his mind how much better it is to have his money with me earning something for him, than to have it buried and hid away.'

"I turned to do his bidding.

"'Stay!' cried he, with a burst of hearty laughter, 'go, fetch me also a bottle of hartshorn.'

"'A bottle of hartshorn?' cried I, in amaze.

"'Aye, even so, the bank notes are a plaster for his poor mind, and the hartshorn is for the cure of that terrible cold of which he maketh pretence. For 'tis naught sure but a pretence that cold of his.'

"Much was I tickled with the humour of the thing, nor could I fail to see that there was a certain cunning diplomacy in the action of Elnathan. For it was plain that a small matter such as £20,000 disturbed him so little that he was even able to make a jest of its return.

"So out I went, and got the notes from the Bank of England, and the hartshorn from the apothecary. And I wrapped the notes round the bottle, and so made a parcel, which I dispatched to our customer by a trusty messenger.

"I tell you this, as it gives a specimen of what was going on at that time, and also exhibits how true a knowledge of human nature your ancestor possessed, for the parcel came back to us two or three days afterwards, minus the hartshorn, and plus an apology.

"Now, my master could see nothing very terrible in the rising of the Scottish clansmen—'savages,' he called them in my presence, just by way, I fancy, of indulging a grim sort of pleasantry, of which his Highland clerk, myself, to wit, was the butt.

"'Twill come to nought,' said he. 'When the regular troops of the army come upon these savages, they will scatter them as the wind does chaff.' Even when it was known that Johnny Cope had been very thoroughly thrashed at Prestonpans by the said savages, Elnathan still held to his own way of thinking.

"'Twon't last,' said he.

"There was a kindly twinkle in his eye as he continued: 'Now, Mungo, which is it to be with you?

Digitized by Google

Are you to continue to serve me, or are you going to turn your back on London, and become one of the young Prince's men?'

"I had told him something of my family history, and was therefore not unprepared for these questions of his. But, as far as I was concerned, I had no occasion to halt in mine answer. Had there been no Leah, it might, perhaps, have been different.

"'Surely, sir,' said I, 'you must know that your interests are next my heart. So long as you are satisfied with my efforts, I can have no wish to forsake your service.'

"But when Prince Charlie, after making himself master of the whole of Scotland, began his march into England, and had taken Carlisle, an event which fell out on the eighteenth of November, Elnathan's tune changed somewhat. Next we heard that the Prince was coming southward with his Highlanders in fine style, enlisting hundreds of recruits under his standard, and winning the hearts of men and women in Lancashire by his gay and courteous manners.

"Marching with great swiftness, the Prince and his clansmen reached Manchester on the twenty-seventh. This was news indeed, look upon it in any way that one cared to.

"Truly was it an evil time in 'Change Alley. Men of the highest standing, both as regards their integrity and their ability, looked at each other askance, wondering in their souls what was next to take place, and how far trust might be given. There was but little confidence either in each other or in the Government, and, therefore, it was that although there were but few transactions in the Funds, or, for the matter of that, in anything else, all securities began to sink in value, as people became more and more frightened.

"Elnathan, however, was not amongst those who took fright. He was amazed and disappointed at the success of the young Pretender, but stoutly maintained that there could be no doubt as to what the end would be. Even when everything seemed black enough, he still kept to this faith of his, albeit he could not but be influenced by the untoward state of the times.

"Now it is no longer a matter of report or rumour, but hath passed into the cold domain of history—all that happened to the Prince. Therefore proceed I to relate what befel me, and the house of Elnathan, in connection therewith.

"First of all, then—and it is a mysterious thing how works the strange hand of fate—the principal general, and by far the best soldier in Prince Charles's army, was no other than Lord George Murray, who was my father's cousin, as, of course, Noll, you know well. I had frequently pondered over Elnathan's remark about the 'golden opportunities,' and, as the news of the Prince's advance was confirmed, and appeared more and more terrifying, the idea came to me that in this relationship I might find just such a golden opportunity as my master had referred to.

"So, taking my courage in my hands, I made bold to submit a proposition to Elnathan. It was that I should journey northwards, join the Prince's army, make myself known to the general, my kinsman, and thus be in a position to be acquainted with their plans and movements. Two armies of the King were now in the field, not far from the Jacobite host, and it was on the cards that something decisive would occur ere long.

"If that were the case, and it all seemed very probable, I would be in an advantageous position for ascertaining the best or the worst, and would do my utmost endeavour to come with the information to London, so that Elnathan would know exactly how to act with respect to the market in 'Change Alley.

"Elnathan listened to what I had to say.

"'"'Tis well thought of,' said he. 'But have you considered that you are taking your life in your hands? There will be perils by the way, perhaps; there will be greater dangers to be encountered when you attach yourself to the Prince's troops, and who can say what may befal? 'Tis far safer here in London. Better think it over again, Mungo. And yet—you may do so great a stroke of business as to make the risk seem a trifle in comparison.'

"'"'Tis not,' said I, 'that I hold my life cheap, but there is that in my heart which urges me to attempt some great thing—a thing so great, indeed, that you will no longer regard me as your clerk, but as one who hath done you so vast a service that you will consider him rather in the light of an equal.'

"Elnathan glanced at me keenly, and yet not unkindly.

"'"Mungo,' said he, 'have I the name of a just man or not? You, who know most of my affairs, can best answer.'

"'There is that in my heart which urges me to attempt some great thing.'"

Digitized by Google

"I bowed my head. There was no juster man in all London than Elnathan, the Jew.

"'I take your meaning, Mungo, plain enough. 'Tis a partnership that is to be the reward of your success. Without more words, I agree. But what if you fail?'

"'Why, then,' said I, 'I will be no better and no worse than I am now.'

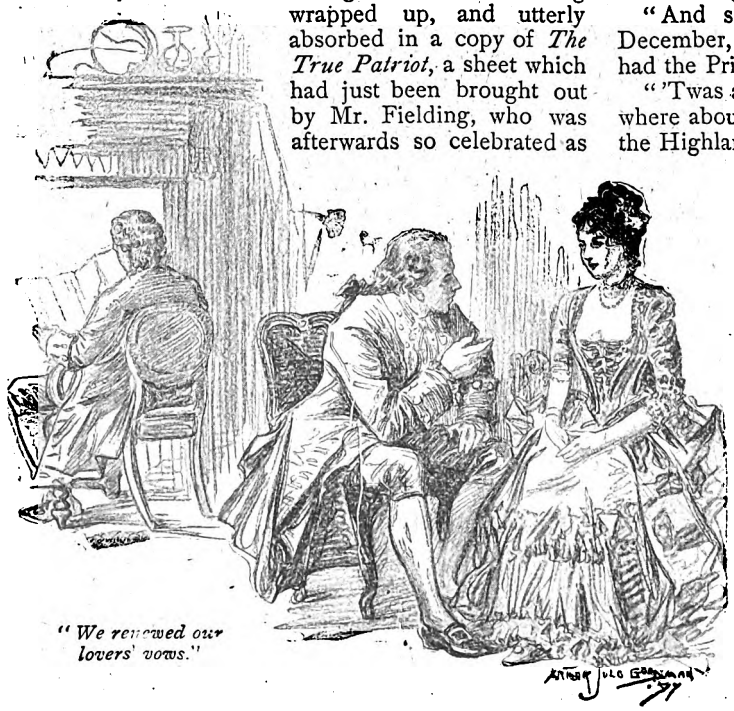
"'Surely better,' said he, with unusual gentleness. 'Tis not likely that any man would overlook and pass by the attempt even to do anything of this kind. Win or lose, I am not the one to forget it.' Then, with an abrupt change of manner, he went on: 'If you are resolved, I shall do this, as I think it may help us in the event of your success, and will not hurt us much should you fail.' To take advantage of such an opening in the market as you may be the means of making, it is necessary to have the command of a large amount of ready money. That I will get immediately.'

"I bowed again.

"'When do you start?' he asked, to which I replied that I would make ready at once, and depart with all possible speed. Thereupon he gave me letters to persons of importance at Dunstable, Northampton, and Leicester, who would be willing to be of any assistance I might need upon the way. Then he bade me not to stint myself as regards money, but to take what would furnish me forth handsomely.

"'Tis a time to spend,' quoth he.

"That evening, after supper, as I sat at a table exchanging glances and sometimes a sentence or two with Leah, Elnathan made a great show of being wrapped up, and utterly absorbed in a copy of The True Patriot, a sheet which had just been brought out by Mr. Fielding, who was afterwards so celebrated as the author of 'Tom Jones,' and which was devoted to the Whig interest.



"We renewed our lovers' vows."

"Seeing him occupied thus mightily with his paper, we drew our chairs together, and renewed our lovers' vows with many a fond and, perhaps, foolish word. I told her of the enterprise on which I was about to set out, and was greatly encouraged by her confidence that I would succeed,—as is the way of a loving woman.

"Next morning I was on horse early, fully armed, and, without more ado, rode out of town, making for St. Albans, and thence, by way of Dunstable, to Northampton, where I expected to hear of the whereabouts of Prince Charles and his Highland host.

"But when I arrived at Northampton, having made the journey in two days, the weather being favourable, by dint of hard riding, I could hear nothing with definiteness of the place where the Prince and his army were encamped.

"Procuring a fresh horse from the friend of Elnathan residing in that town, to whom he had given me a letter, I pushed on for Leicester. This place I discovered to be ablaze with rumours, but no certainties, and I was in some doubt as to what point I should next ride to. And here again Elnathan's correspondent was of service.

"For he had been informed that there was a small company of gentlemen, Jacobites, who were proceeding next day to join Prince Charles. Thinking that they might have more than an inkling of where he was, I offered to be of their party, which they readily agreed to when they knew that I was a kinsman of Lord George Murray.

"And so it came about that, on the fourth of December, we reached Derby, where the selfsame day had the Prince also arrived.

"'Twas a strange scene that met my eyes. Everywhere about the town were to be seen the tartans of the Highlanders, and my heart warmed towards them. The men were in high spirits, because they understood that they were to march upon London almost immediately. Inquiring of an officer for the head-quarters of Lord George, we were told that he was with His Highness at a house belonging to the Earl of Exeter, situated at the bottom of Full Street.

"It was now dark, and torches flamed along the street and in front of Lord Exeter's house, when, having made known my name and my business to the captain of the guard. I was shown into a waiting-room, where there were already many others. I was told that the Prince and Lord George and the other leaders were met in council, and that there was no saying how long a time might elapse before it would be over.

"Having found myself a seat in a corner, presently I was so overcome by the fatigue of my journey that

Digitized by Google

I dropped asleep, notwithstanding the buzz of conversation all about me. How long I slept I do not know, but at length I was awoke by the sound of two voices, which came to me at first as if they had been heard in a dream, and then more sharply as I gathered up my wakening senses. The room was dimly lit, but not to such a degree that I could not perceive the faces and forms of the speakers.

"I learnt afterwards that they were the Prince himself and my kinsman, Lord George Murray. Seeing that I was awake, the younger of the two, who was the Prince, came over to me, and asked who I was. Thus it was that I not only saw, but also spoke with bonnie Prince Charlie.

"When I told him that I was of the Murrays, being a cousin of his principal general, the other came forward and made himself known. Then they questioned me about London, inquiring what help the Prince might look for there—to which I was not able to give any hopeful response.

"'Did I not tell your Highness,' exclaimed Lord George, 'that this was the case? The English are strangely backward in your cause. 'Twere not well to advance further, for we be too small an army.'

"'Then will I to London alone, rather than go back,' cried the Prince, and left the chamber suddenly in a temper.

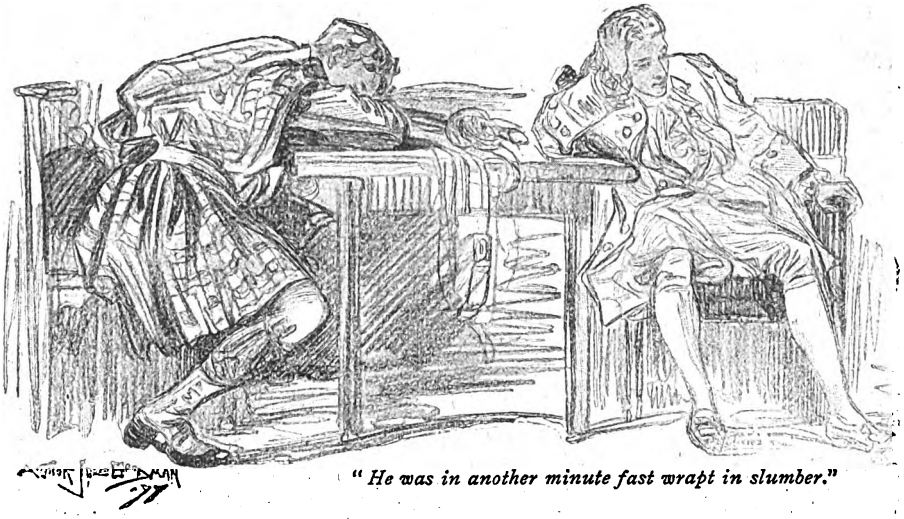
"''Tis a noble spirit, brave, courageous, kingly, but headstrong,' said Lord George. 'Those of us who are older in war must count the cost, for he will not. The odds are too great. Five thousand clansmen, though they be as the whelps of lions, how can they prevail against thirty thousand, most of whom are trained and hardened troops?'

"His gallant figure seemed to shrink with weariness, and the weight of their evil fortune, and I saw two great tears of a sudden in those brave eyes of his. Then he clutched his sword, threw it upon the table, where it fell with a crash, and swore by the Splendour of God that there were but two courses open to them. One was to go on to London, as the Prince wished—that would be to die with him. The other was to go back to Scotland, where there was some chance of making a stand—that, at the worst, would be to die for him.

"'Back to Scotland! Back to Scotland! 'tis our only hope,' cried he.

"Then he asked me about the fortunes of myself, and also told me that there was to be a council of war next morning to decide which course was to be followed, but that he and the other generals were determined on a retreat. Asking me where I was to sleep that night, I replied that I would stay where I was, seeing it was late, and I knew not the town.

"'Tis where I shall stay myself,' said he, and forthwith leaning his head upon a table, he was in another minute fast wrapt in slumber, as is the way of the veteran of war.



"He was in another minute fast wrapt in slumber."

"Here then was news indeed, and I saw at once how valuable to me was the information I had received. I knew that the people of London, when they heard how far the Stuart army had penetrated into the country—within a few days' easy march of the capital, would be sorely dismayed, and that the market of 'Change Alley would be in a fine flurry. They would know that the Prince was at Derby at least two days before they could hear of his retreat northwards.

"'Was this my opportunity?' I anxiously asked myself.

"Lord George was awake before daylight, and, rousing me none too gently with a shake—for I had fallen asleep again—said: 'Get thee back to London, Mungo. You may be of great use to us there. For myself, I am resolved upon the retreat of the army. Anything else is madness!'

"Then I asked him if it would not be better to wait till the issue of the council of war was announced. He replied that I should go at once, as the meeting of the council could have but the one result. Calling for an attendant, he bade him bring one of his own horses for my use. In another hour I had left Derby behind, and was well on my way to Leicester. That night I was in Northampton. On the morning of the day afterwards, that is, on Friday morning, I was in London, more dead than alive.

"Oh, that wild ride, in which fear and hope chased me on, and yet above them both I experienced a feeling of exaltation, the source of which was my love for Leah. For the success of my ride would be our opportunity also.

Digitized by Google

"A sorry sight was I, mud-bespattered, grimy, and dishevelled, as I drew up before Elnathan's door, but little did I think of that. The clatter of my horse's hoofs and my own shouts roused my master, and in another minute we were closeted together.

"Never had I seen Elnathan so agitated, whether it was because he was glad to see me again, or because of the terrible news that was shaking the town. While I had some refreshments he told me that messengers had reached London the night before, saying that Prince Charles was in Derby, that the road was open to London before him, and that he would reach the town in another week. There had fallen on everyone a great terror and dread of the Highlanders, and there was like to be such a panic as never was seen in 'Change Alley before.

"In came a servant with white face and trembling lips."

"Could anything have happened more seasonably for my special information to have its full effect? So I felt, as I narrated to Elnathan what had befallen me, and how that even now the dreaded Highland host was in full retreat for Scotland. Now, he was a wonderful man, that great grandfather of thine. In an instant he became calm, impassive, purposeful, with his plan mapped out. 'Twas just as if he had been a general, aye, a conqueror, tasting the certainty of victory before ever the battle was fought.

"While we were together, in came a servant with white face and trembling lips.

"'The Bank—the Bank!' he cried. 'Tis beset on all sides by a vast crowd, all clamouring for their money.'

"'A run on the Bank,' said Elnathan. 'Doth not fortune serve us well? We shall be able to buy the Funds at the price of a song this day.'

"Then he rushed away to 'Change Alley, to take command of his forces on that field of battle, bidding me to come also when I had rested somewhat. After a couple of hours, thither I went.

"In the Alley, and in the streets round about it, there were hundreds, nay, thousands, of men, and women also, stark mad with terror; they cried, they wept, they fought, they cursed, they shouted like demons, for rage and fear had changed them into yelling fiends. Talk of Highland savages! Here were savages enough and to spare, though many of them were the greatest merchants in London.

"Then came a rumour that the Bank of England had closed its doors, and the Funds went down to 50—some said to 49. Then 'twas reported the Bank was still open, but cashing its notes in sixpences, which, of course, was a pardonable ruse to gain time.

"Elnathan, almost alone in that frantic mob, kept composed, although his air was gloomy, as if he, too, felt how serious was the state of things. Buying, buying, buying, stood he there all day, putting every farthing he possessed upon this great stake, and even pledging his word for more, while people thought he was clean crazed. The day closed with 'Change Alley in ruins, as it were, with but few exceptions, amongst whom the greatest was the house of Elnathan, the Jew.

"For, by the beginning of the following week, everyone was well aware that Prince Charles, greatly against his will, had been forced by his generals, and particularly by that kinsman of mine, Lord George, to beat a retreat from Derby, and so northwards to Scotland.

"Now the panic passed away, the terror was forgotten, the fear was changed into joy, and the price of the Funds, as a natural consequence, rose quickly. Then Elnathan sold at an enormous profit, realising an immense fortune, and I became his partner, and what was better, his son-in-law.

"Mungo Murray."

Digitized by Google

THE WORK OF M. DE PARIS.

THE method of an execution in a foreign land probably few of us know much about. Generally speaking, we know that one country beheads with the sword, another with the guillotine, and that another strangles, but the processes of execution are very little known. The French use the guillotine in executing the death sentence. One hundred years ago it was a thing of life in its ferocity; in these latter decades of peace it does its work unnoted, but none the less with fearful accuracy and expedition. It is worth while to be put face to face with a picture of a French execution. Here is one, translated from the French. It is grim, deadly, realistic. The better to appreciate its details it should be borne in mind that the execution takes place in a square adjoining the prisons of La Roquette for juveniles; that the guillotine is painted red; and that the executioner, M. de Paris, is, from the nature of his business, detested by all.

THE GUILLOTINE.

1 A. M.—The air is cold, the sky grey-black. On the Place de la Roquette, stationed near their stacked arms, the municipal guards stamp their cold feet and talk under their breath. Under the leafless trees officers pace backwards and forwards. Now and then some passing journalist salutes them. It is early, but the adjacent streets are barred. The lights of the street lamps flicker on the helmets of the orderlies who reinforce the black lines of the police. Beyond the guards are night prowlers; men with their collars turned up over their ears, and bareheaded women.

"Tiens! There it is for this morning, Chouette!"

"You pay for drinks? Have you a countermark?"

"As for him, poor devil, he won't snuff much of anything, when his nose is in the basket!"

"He, Polyte! He, là bas—"

And coarse jests are exchanged.

In the wine shops men and women clamour and push each other. Among them are men of the world in fur-lined topcoats and silk hats. They drink standing at zinc counters cheek by jowl with thieves and cut-throats, whom they watch furtively. The small rooms are packed. The air is stifling. The waiters serve punch and coffee at all the tables. In a corner a woman, seated on a stool holding a child upon her knee, drinks hot wine.

2. A.M.—A policeman puts his head in at the door. "You must close, it is two o'clock."

"Oh, monsieur, just this once—just for to-day!"

"No. There has been no permission given. Close instantly; it is the order. You can open again at five o'clock. Allons, hurry up!"

Slowly the order is obeyed. Shutters are unwound, and the crowds pour out upon the pavement. The streets are dark. There are no lights but the flicker of the street lamps throwing lurid gleams into the raw mist.

"B—r—r! I give it up; we'll see nothing if we wait. Come on, Polyte!"

"Nom d'un chien! You think to draw me off? You know me better!"

"But we're freezing!"

"So much the better, it kills time!"

Carriages are arriving. Reporters get out of them, and showing their cards to the guards, pass into the inclosure. Then come men, close shaven; actors or singers, who have heard rumours of the execution as they come out of the theatre. They speak with the sergeant-de-ville on guard and bow low, with hats off, as they pass in.

On the Place de la Roquette, everyone talks to his neighbour. The people speak in low voices and stamp their feet on the frozen ground.

3. A.M.—La Petite Roquette, dark up to this moment, is awake. Shadows pass and repass on the lighted windows. "They begin there." A philosopher in the crowd points from Little Roquette to the other prison, looking black in the early morning, opposite. "They begin there to finish here!"

Digitized by Google

A rumbling of wheels comes from the distance, and the crowds peer towards the sound. Two black, heavy waggons roll down the Rue de la Roquette. The horses come at a trot. It is M. de Paris, the executioner, and his aids who bring the instrument of death. The carriages are drawn up in a side street. The crowds stop talking and press towards the black waggons. M. de Paris gets out first. He holds his umbrella in one hand; his silk hat is crushed down to his ears. He steps forward as if against his will. He is bent nearly double. He looks nervously to right and left and casts a frightened glance behind him; and, trembling on his rheumatic legs, he goes up to a policeman and whispers to him. He looks haggard and worried. He never likes to be watched at his work.

The policeman forces back the reporters. "Allons! gentlemen, step back a little, I beg of you! You annoy the executioner!"

The aids of the executioner have taken off their overcoats and are laying out the heavy beams of the guillotine on the frozen ground; and M. de Paris sees that his "accessories"—the box of sponges and buckets—are arranged in order on the borders of the walk. This is a line which must not be crowded, and he querulously calls to an orderly. "If anyone dares to cross that line," he whines, nearly whimpering, "I shall complain to the Ministry!"

4 A. M.—The heavy side-beams are standing upright. There has not been one stroke of the hammer! Each piece fits into its fellow. The sinister business is accomplished in the light of lanterns, and the moving lights bring into relief the copper worked into the wood. In the Rue de Merlin pale, curious faces are looking out. They see the lights dancing in the darkness. They have watched for days for these same precursory lights to come, heralding the spectacle. There are murmurs of a crowd of people pouring into the side streets from all directions. Now and then angry voices clamour out the name of the condemned. The soldiers draw in line still closer, and work back the crowd. Inside the cordon of the guard people have stopped walking to and fro. Each one presses nearer the deadly monster rearing its strong frame into the cold night of shadow. Each one plants his feet more firmly, prepared to see everything that there is to be seen by-and-bye, when the moment comes.

5. A.M.—On the summit of the side-beams the capital is set and the pulleys are in order. The magistrates have come. They walk slowly forward into the places reserved for them. They do not speak. Their faces are fixed and solemn. The immense razor is brought out; the aids of the executioner slide it into its groove and pull it into its place with a binding rope. Once—twice it rises and descends. It is heavy enough. A weight of seventy kilograms. It runs up to play its part and drops with a thud. It is perfect!

Someone laughs in the crowd. "We can have music; the instrument is in tune!" In front of the lunette the basket with the sawdust is ready for the bleeding head. M. de Paris throws a last scrutinising look upon his boxes; they are ready; and he goes away and hides himself behind one of the heavy waggons.

6. A.M.—"The Red Maiden" stands up waiting.

There is no more chattering in the crowd, which is increasing at every minute. It is bitterly cold. Now and then someone speaks to his neighbour in an undertone. People begin to think of the condemned for whom the pitiless machine is waiting. "Is he awake? Is he sleeping? Has he heard any of the sounds of preparation?—At what hour is the execution?"

"As usual, at half-past seven, at sunrise!"

People shiver. They begin to count the minutes. There is a slow clattering of horses' hoofs, and the rattling of sabres. The cocked hats of mounted soldiers pass, and people crane their necks to see them. "The gendarmes d'Ivry. The last escort. The escort of the dead!" They range themselves in line behind the guillotine. Mourners come out of the crowd; people push and struggle.

"Keep in your place! No partiality here. Don't push! No one sees any better than you do."

People are worn out and half frozen with waiting in the night. Each one tries to push aside the other—they struggle and exchange insults.

"Gentlemen, this noise is indecent. You will be heard from the prison. If you have any delicacy I beg of you!"

And the noise ceases. There is no more talking. If they speak at all it is as if they were speaking in the chamber of the dying.

7. A.M.—The six magistrates are going into the prison. The almoner of the prison follows them. He moves slowly with bowed head. He is nerving himself for his awful duty. In the grand court they halt. The finger of the great clock points to ten minutes after seven, and the order of the execution fixes the time at 7.30. The awakening of the condemned and the making of his toilet will take twelve minutes. They wait eight minutes in the grand court to adjust all things to the order of execution. The minutes seem like hours.

M. de Paris appears. He passes the magistrates with his dragging step. He salutes them with an unhappy air, and, followed by his aids, he goes into the clerk's office. After a moment the clerk of the prison enters upon his register, in the list of those who have left the prison—"Sortie" (gone out.)

"Delivered into the hands of the executor of capital sentences, in obedience to the instructions of the Procureur-General."

8 A.M.—It is dark yet, but day is breaking. The pale light flushes the east. The director of the prison moves forward.

"Now, gentlemen, if you will—"

The little procession moves forward, preceded by a guard. The locked and padlocked doors grind upon their hinges. There is a corridor; then a bare antechamber. One of the executioner's assistants brings a chair and places it in the centre of the room. In this room the last toilet will be made. Then come sombre offices. Very long they seem. Then the drying rooms. The stone slabs sound under the footfall. "Gentlemen, for mercy's sake! No noise, I beg of you!"

They have come to a cloister looking upon a field surrounded by high walls. There is a portion of the building set back from the front; there are three iron doors. The guard turns a key carefully, noiselessly, in the lock, and they go in. A puff of heated air strikes their faces. Two guards rise up in the room and stand waiting. In a corner of the room a man is sleeping on a camp bed. The little procession halts round the bed. They uncover, as if standing over an open grave when the first clod falls upon the coffin. There is an awful silence, a hesitating in mute anguish. The director gently puts his hand on the shoulder of the sleeper. The sleeping man springs up in his bed, awake, and looks about him with haggard, appealing eyes.

Digitized by Google

"Your appeal has been rejected and the President has refused to listen to your prayer. Be brave!"

The condemned man is stunned; his eye wanders. There is an awful pause, and then the almoner draws near and, embracing him, whispers to him: "Mon enfant" (my child).

And, while the trembling hands essay to draw on the poor vestments in which, for the last time, he is to appear on earth, the priest continues to whisper to him and to embrace him.

What an unending stretch it seems now to the salle de toilette (dressing room). The condemned crosses it, sustained on either side by a guard. The executioner approaches. He puts his hand upon the victim's shoulder and presses him gently into the chair. He takes possession of him. From this moment no earthly power can cheat him of his prey. It is his. He has given his receipt for it.

The shirt collar is cut off, and the feet are bound. The hands are tied behind the back. They tie a handkerchief round his neck, and they go out. He is livid. His steps falter like the steps of a child learning to walk. M. Paris leads the way. The door opens and the blinding light falls in upon them. It is broad day. Framed in the open door, the picture is grand and terrible. There are the gleaming helmets of the guards. There is a metallic clash of arms. The sabres flash. There is a tremendous movement as the sea of heads sways to right and left. A silence. Sharply set against the grey background of La Roquette the two great red arms suspend a razor ready to fall. The people bare their heads. In the leafless branches of the trees the sparrows chatter. From the adjoining streets the crowd, waiting and seeing nothing, growls. The whistle of a locomotive tears the air, and people shiver. It seems like a shrill cry for pity. A horse neighs. The prison clock knells the half hour. The aids of the executioner seize their victim. A cry gurgles through the livid lips: "Vive! A bas!"

They throw him upon the plank, and his head presses forward under the binder as his body turns. There is an instant of horrible delay. As usual, M. de Paris is too weak for his task. Then his trembling hand goes out; the button works; the knife falls; a bleeding head rolls in the sawdust in the basket.

Ca y est! (It is finished.)

There is a clash of arms, and the light gleams on the polished steel. The troops wheel and return to their quarters.

In the crowd the people laugh—half scared. Their faces are green from excitement and lack of sleep; they are nervous and impatient.

"Is that all?"

"Ma foi! What would you have?"

"My compliments, my neighbour! You are pale."

"Pale yourself! To the devil with you."

"Liar!"

"Brute!"

Women yawn aloud. Some of them take little dancing steps and hum airs from the café-concert.

"C'est ta poire, ta poire, ta poir—e C'est ta poire, qu'il nous faut."

The crowd babbles.

"Did you see how pale he was?"

"Eh, oui! He had an incurable headache!"

"How he threw himself back when he saw the knife!"

"He died pitiably!"

"On the contrary, he died well!"

There is a murmur—the cracking of a whip. Look out, there! It is the dead waggon going away, dragged at a gallop followed by its escort, the gendarmes d'Ivry, in the ugly hats. The almoner follows in his fiacre.*

There is an uproar in the crowd. A Cabot from some cafe-concert has dipped his handkerchief in the blood which Deibler's workmen are hurrying to sponge away. The crowd pursues him and hoots after him as he brandishes his bloody trophy.

Beyond the first barrier are people who have passed the entire night waiting, well aware of the fact that they can hope to see nothing—yet waiting still, held there by an inexplicable fascination of man for man when he is about to die, a drawing towards the wretched creature who stands upon the brink of the grave, not knowing it, ignorant of the hour of his death, while the crowd waits for it, knowing the hour to a minute.

Among the worn-out, haggard beings beyond the barrier someone cries out. He has recognised his neighbour—a woman with drawn features.

She was the wife of M., who finished on this very spot two years ago. She never misses an execution. She strains her eyes in an indefinable gaze after the black waggon which moves off in the distance, followed by the gendarmes d'Ivry and the curé. She climbs into a fiacre, and the crowd chases, howling.

The crowd disperses, and the clerk of the court goes up to the office of the registrar of the Eleventh Ward of Paris and sets down on the record the certificate of death:

"Died this morning, Place de la Roquette, at 7.30."

Ca y est!

---

* It is the custom immediately after an execution to carry the dead body under escort through the cemetery in semblance of burial. If the dead has friends, they may demand the body. If unclaimed, custom gives the body to the medical students of Paris. Pranzini, who was guillotined in the autumn of 1887, was phenomenal in physical development. His body was given to the medical students, and a scandal (presumably founded on fact), ran round Paris that souvenir pocket-books had been made from his skin. Owing to this outrage upon public manners it was for some time under discussion whether the medical students should be given the freedom of the bodies of dead criminals.

Digitized by Google

The Tale of the Yellow War.

BY M. P. SHIEL.

Author of "The Man-Stealers," "Prince Zaleski," "Shapes in the Fire," "The Rajah's Sapphire," etc.

SUMMARY.

Yen How, a shrewd Chino-Japanese doctor, falls desperately in love with Ada Seward, an English nursemaid. His advances are rudely repulsed, however; but he leaves England with a fixed determination to win the object of his affections in spite of all opposition.

Yen How goes first to Japan as a Japanese, where he becomes intimate with the prime minister, Marquis Ito, to whom he proposes a league between the two races of China and Japan, and an immense scheme by which Europe may be reduced to a waste, and China become the Empress of the Earth with scarcely an effort of her own. He then goes to China and becomes virtual ruler of that nation. In the course of a conversation which he has with Li Hung Chang he unfolds his scheme for setting all the European Powers against Great Britain. After the slaughter China will step in and conquer the remnants of the armies.

War is declared between Great Britain and France and Germany and Russia. The British fleet meets the Allied ships in Mid-channel and a battle ensues. Although the British vessels are outnumbered by two to one, the superior tactics of the British, and of John Hardy, a consumptive midshipman and a genius for modern warfare (who escapes on the Jupiter from the fight, and rams all the transports some distance away), result in the destruction of the Allied fleet. Hardy is ill for a time, and on his recovery decides to go to China. Before going, however, he endeavours to obtain a promise of marriage from Miss Bosey Jay, a young lady artist, but is refused. He goes to the Palace Theatre of Varieties, and there meets Ada Seward, the nursemaid with whom Yen How is in love. She sends him home intoxicated, and a week later he is in Paris, where he has a row with Edropol, the Bulgarian duellist. John, however, does not fight, but goes to Berlin, and from thence to Petersburg. Here he sends a letter to Bobbie, his old servant in England, and starts out for China by the overland route. Yen How organises an army of 400,000,000 souls—men, women, and children—to overrun Europe when the time is ripe. He is sitting in his garden when the capture of John Hardy is announced to him.

John is brought before Yen and they quarrel. The former fires at the Chinaman, but the bullet strikes a breast-plate of steel and does no harm. John is seized and thrown into prison. Meanwhile, the British China squadron, failing to obtain the promised assistance from Japan, engages the Allied fleet, and defeats it, but at a cost of all the ships but three, which are shortly afterwards chased and attacked by the Japanese fleet. Affairs now assume a serious aspect in Europe, and the British rout the Germans at New Brandenburg with a loss of 150,000 men. Foo-chee loves Ah-lin (they are in the same Chinese regimental company), but the latter is loved by Sin-wan, a warder of the Imperial Prison. Ni-ching-tang is Foo-chee's father (although Sin-wan does not know this), and one of the scullions of Yen How's kitchen. John Hardy is cruelly tortured by Sin-wan, acting under Yen How's instructions. Foo-chee and Ah-lin go clandestinely to an eating house. Sin-wan suspects, but cannot track them. He vows to kill Foo-chee.

CHAPTER XIX.

Sin-wan.

The next evening, at about six, John Hardy lay on his back on the bed of his prison.

He was conscious that it was near the hour when Sin-wan would appear.

His feet were so gashed and raw from his run over the glass, that he had not stood since he had been thrown the previous night upon the bed. For two days he had eaten nothing, being sick of his long woe. He was not far from death now.

"How long, O Lord? How long?" This was the burden of his feeble thought.

But he retained an intense interest in the nature of the added pangs which this day had in store to bring him.

When the key turned, he sprang upright, though, at the effort, the wounds in his feet broke forth into fresh bleeding.

Sin-wan entered, and at his entrance this time John Hardy's flesh writhed like a twisting serpent from his feet to the roots of his hair.

Fire was the instrument of torture at which he felt the most horror. And Sin-wan had now with him a brazier, which swung from his fingers by a handle.

In the brazier glowed and flashed the living coals of flame.

He had in his hand no other instrument that John could see. But John, by this time, had learnt to know that when the instruments were at first invisible, then, in general, the agony was the most relentless.

And now, at the sight of the flame, feeling himself too hopelessly feeble to pass through any further torture that day, John Hardy, by an impulse, did what he had never done before. He fell upon his knees, and stretched out his clasped hands in an attitude of meek supplication to the Chinaman.

Sin-wan was a man; he had the limbs and bodily structure of the human being. Who could say whether if within him, too, some trace of the divine origin of man might not linger, some throe of love, some sob of pity? In John's eyes, as he knelt, welled a world of mute pleadings.

Digitized by Google

But the Chinaman showed no sign of having seen him. He deposited the brazier in a further corner, took some small metal objects from a fold of his robe, dropped them on the floor, and approached the kneeling-form. He proceeded to bind him as before, hands and feet, to the chair. But this time, first of all, he took off John's shirt from the upper part of his body, leaving it to hang downward from the waist.

When this was done, he went back towards the fire, took up two of the six small metal objects, which he had dropped, and put them on the fire to heat.

The six metal objects consisted of four tiny Latin capital-letters in iron. They were the letters: A, S, Y, H,—the initials of Ada Seward and Yen How; there were also a roll of iron wire and a pair of pincers.

It was the intention of Yen How to print the four letters all over the body of John Hardy—on his breast, on his two arms, on his thighs, on his back: two at a time; two each day.

And the letters of the first day, as Yen How had ordained in compliment to his queen, were to be A and S.

But, as usual, Yen How had no idea of inflicting the mere brutal pang of a burn upon his victim; some mental refinement of pain must mix with the scream of the physical nerves.

Sin-wan took one of the two iron letters from the fire with the pincers, and holding it off from him approached John Hardy. The iron emitted a red glow, and seemed to burn into the eye-sight of the staring eyes of the victim.

When his bare chest could feel the radiated heat of the iron, his torturer stood, and held the metal steadily still. And so, for a few minutes he remained; and then returned and replaced the iron in the fire, without having touched John with it.

And now he climbed and stood upon the table, the roll of wire in his hand. The three lanterns hung from the ceiling by three hooks near to open spaces in the boarding of the ceiling, through which the candles were placed in the lanterns. Over one of these hooks Sin-wan threw a length of wire; and over another another length of wire. The three hooks were very near to each other.

With one end of each of the two pieces of wire he made a half-loop; and at once hurried to the fire, snatched up the red hot letter A with the pincers, and hung it upon one of the loops; then the S, and hung it upon the other. Their weight was sufficient to make the wires run through their supporting hooks; and they fell upon the marble floor.

Sin-wan now gathered the other two ends of the pieces of wire, and secured them to a point in the wall, having drawn the two letters some inches from the ground. In his hand he held a piece of bamboo, and with this, standing by the side of the wires, he struck first one of the letters, and then the other gently forward.

The two letters began to swing to and fro through the chamber, with uneven motions, one this way, one that. And right in the line of their movement sat John Hardy.

It depended entirely on the force of the propulsions which Sin-wan imparted to the letters with the bamboo, whether or no they touched the chest of the bound victim.

Sometimes they touched, and left behind them, as they swung back, a whiff of smoke. Sometimes they touched twice in succession, one, or both. Sometimes they were only expected—with shrinking horror, and suspended breath,—and did not touch at all.

It was a monstrous torture—the worst he had yet suffered—this coquetry of pain—these fleeting, incalculable kisses of the hot and dancing letters. For every kiss—a whiff of smoke.

Let us draw a veil over his agonies. His mouth was wide, bawling—his eyes straining from their sockets; and at the tension of every fibre of his soul and body, his hair whitened—his skin grew sore—he lived through centuries—he became an old man.

It was some twenty minutes before the see-saw of the swinging wires ceased. Sin-wan hurriedly left his post, ran toward John, and bound his eyes with a cloth. What happened within the next five minutes John did not know. He strained his ear to detect a sound, though he kept on mechanically bawling in a lower key. But he heard nothing. In reality, Sin-wan was reheating the metals to redness; and his noiselessness had for its motive the fact that he wished to take John by surprise.

When the two bits of metals were of a bright glowing red, he passed one limb of the pincers inside the top of the A, and the other limb inside the upper curve of the S, and, holding them so together, at once trotted eagerly and silently upon John.

An appalling scream broke forth, wondrously like the cry of a cat in the extreme of physical anguish. Sin-wan had suddenly clapped the hot pieces upon the middle of Hardy's chest, and held them there. The metal sank, as into a bed of soft luxury, into the flesh, frizzling forth a steaming smoke and reeking stench.

* * * * *

At the exact moment when John Hardy's spirit fainted, and he lost the sense of pain, Foo-chee and Ah-lin met in one long embrace of love.

Toward this they had been drawn and swept for days, and now the two trembling dewdrops had trembled into one.

It was outside the walls of Pekin, and every single member of Foo-chee's and Ah-lin's company had swarmed back into the town; for the drilling of the drilled was over. And only these two were left.

And Foo-chee said:

"Ah-lin."

And Ah-lin said:

"Foo-chee."

And Foo-chee said:

"I am feeling happy, Ah-lin; for we are here where none can see us, and the moon which is rising there is pleasant to see, though her face is round."

And Ah-lin said:

"Her face is broad in a laugh of joy, Foo-chee! And do you like a woman with a broad face, Foo-chee, or with a long?"

"I like a woman with a long face, Ah-lin," said Foo-chee, "like yours, Ah-lin."

And Ah-lin replied:

"I am not feeling at all unhappy, Foo-chee."

And it was then that the two dewdrops trembled into one in a long embrace.

A really long one: for it began a minute before the closing of the gates of Pekin, and it lasted a minute after it. And had they had any idea of the real state of affairs, they would have felt like two very shattered and dislocated dewdrops indeed.

It was Ah-lin who woke first from her trance, and she woke from it with a start that made her pigtail wriggle, and she whispered an awful pallid word into the ear of Foo-chee, and together they started toward the gates.

They were shut out, they were hopelessly late. Pekin refused them. They must spend the long night without.

Ah-lin had an instinct that this meant death for her beloved, perhaps for herself also.

They stood hand in hand, and the upper corners of their slanting eyes went very high indeed.

Still, a whole night hand in hand with the beloved is not nothing. They walked away with a happiness troubled, but not destroyed.

An hour later Sin-wan and Ni-ching-tang were ransacking a certain area of Pekin, one for his son, the other for Ah-lin and her lover, but separately, unsuspected by each other. As for Sin-wan, his knife was bright and white.

"Oh, where is Foo-chee?" said Ni-ching-tang to himself. "Is my son dead?"

The suspicion grew upon him, it became a certainty. He hurried back to the Imperial City, and made inquiries for Sin-wan at the prison. Sin-wan, he was told, had obtained a scroll to pass in and out of the sacred precincts, at any hour of that night that he chose.

Digitized by Google

Soh! Sin-wan was abroad then, and if Sin-wan was abroad, then it must be that Foo-chee was dead.

Ni ching-tang went from the prison straight to the palace of Yen How, and he descended into the vaults wherein was his sleeping-room, and he held the reeking flame of a saucer-lamp of earthenware over a box, and into the depths of the box he dived. He brought up two blue phials, and a broken joss-stick, one of the phials contained a poison, and the other a non-poisonous drug, and this last he put into his bosom.

Then he re-clasped the box; and at once he fell upon his knees, bowing his body and folded hands up and down, touching the cold plaster with his forehead. And from his lips came groans of prayer. And he burnt incense to the gods.

Then he went up again, and out from the Imperial precincts. He, too, was provided that night with a scroll of permit.

Onwards he went, walking very fast. And as he treaded the intricacies of Pekin, he was engaged in a strange continuous effort of mind; the effort to recall all the English words he had ever known.

Once, long ago, he had served in the kitchen of an English family in Canton, and had then been quite a master of pigeon English. But now he found his vocabulary wondrously small. On he went, cudgelling his brains, through the dark and swarming vastness of the city.

Ni-ching-tang was a great man, if patience alone can make a man great, for he searched all that night for Sin-wan, and did not find him. So was Sin-wan a great man, if patience can make a man great, for he searched all the night for Foo-chee, and did not find him. But towards the break of day, as he sat drinking samshu in a den, Sin-wan had an idea. He was a drunkard, and could be inspired by drink; nor was he now sober. His idea was that Ah-lin and Foo-chee were not in the city at all, but without it.

He went back once more to the dwelling of Ah-lin to inquire if she had not yet come home. And then, hearing that she had not, he said:

"Fearing me, they have fled from the city together, and are now at Tungchow. To Tungchow, therefore, I will go. For the edge of my knife has the itch this night, till Foo-chee scratch it for me."

But it happened that while Sin-wan was crying aloud from the street to inquire for Ah-lin, Ni-ching-tang had come to inquire also whether one Ah-lin was there. And as the day was prone to break, Ni-ching-tang, far behind Sin-wan, was cautiously shadowing him toward the city-gate which leads out upon the Tungchow road.

Sin-wan waited there twenty minutes, and when the gates opened, he passed swiftly through under the crowding camels, the gall of malice and yellow jealousy rankling bitterly in his jaundiced soul.

To kill—to hew, and slice, and stab—a ravening hunger for this red breakfast was upon Sin-wan. He had had a comfortless night, a night of dark thought and impulse, and the hot samshu was talking hot things to his head.

And surely the gods were on his side—anxious for nothing that morning were they but how to provide a red breakfast for Sin-wan! See how they draw up the curtains of night for him; and now the day has that very-early-morning greyness for which one can find no adjective to express its utter yawniness; and now, just as it is light enough, something makes Sin-wan turn his head to the left—and he sees.

But poor Ni-ching-tang is struggling frantically among the mules and camels, which press inwards and outwards through the just-opened gate-way; and he has got jammed there, and the man is nearly mad in his agonised struggle to get free; for Sin-wan has passsed through, and he has lost him.

Foo-chee, together with Ah-lin, was fast asleep, as was also Ah-lin, they sitting with their backs propped against the outer surface of the wall, between two buttresses, not very far from the gates.

Sin-wan walked up to them, smiling, lest one or the other should be awake, and see him; and the knife-handle was in his palm, and the blade up his wide sleeves. And when he was right over them, and saw how they breathed heavily, and how the confidence of old love was in their careless embrace, he drove the knife first into Ah-lin with a loud breath, and she sighed, and died.

Saw how they breathed heavily, and how the confidence of old love was in their careless embrace.

Digitized by Google

And then, with loud breaths, he drove it several times into Foo-chee, and he sighed, and died. And then into Ah-lin again, and then into Foo-chee again, he drove his knife.

"Dog's gall," he said, as he turned away, and found himself face to face with Ni-ching-tang.

"What, Sin-wan, is that you?" said Ni-ching-tang—"oh, I can see what you have been after. Ho! ho!"

"Those are they I told you of," said Sin-wan. "I have done what I said I would do, Ni-ching-tang."

"So I see, Sin-wan! Well, it is the only way—the only way."

"As for you, you will tell no one, Ni-ching-tang?"

"Poh! not I. For why should I? I who have known you these eight months, and the two dead not at all. Poh! see how they lie—still embraced. Are you sure they are well dead, Sin-wan?"

"Oh, well dead."

"They should be. The man—he has one, two, three, four, five stabs—yes, five—ugly wounds, too. The knife went deep each time. What was his name—Foo-chee? Ah, well, no more Foo-chee now—no more Foo-chee."

"Let us be going, Ni-ching-tang. For watching dead dogs is not pleasant to the corners of the eye-balls."

"But I feel pleasure while looking upon them, Sin-wan; and the middle of the eye is not offended by the sight of them sitting together—young things, too. But you leer obliquely upon them, Sin-wan, having slain them, through the corners of your eye-balls, and so receive disagreeable feelings from their sight."

"Still, let us be going—let us be moving away, Ni-ching-tang."

"Well, as you wish it, Sin-wan, let us be moving. But they look very well together, Foo-chee and Ah-lin—Foo-chee, with his five gashed wounds and her arm behind his neck. A young man, too, he seems to me—a seller of incense-sticks, I think you said. No more incense-sticks now for Foo-chee—and no more Foo-chee now at all, Sin-wan. Well, well—well, well. It was Foo-chee and Ah-lin: and now it is no Ah-lin any more, and no Foo-chee at all. Five stabs, too, and ugly wounds all. One would have done the work, but he got five, well home. Oh, they are well dead, Sin-wan!—have no fear. But Foo-chee has no brother, I hope, no brother to avenge his death, Sin-wan?"

"I care not."

"With horrid torture, Sin-wan?"

"Poh! he was a brotherless dog."

"Well, if that is so. . . . But your walk is staggering, and your eye wanders. We will have a morning drink together in a drink-place which I know. And then to the day's work. . . ."

They re-entered the gates. A reaction had come now upon Sin-wan; his nerves were unstrung from their high tension, and the sam shu swam stalely in his turgid brain. He followed Ni-ching-tang as a lamb to the slaughter.

Ni-ching-tang led him down into a foul, dark cellar, where drink was placed before them. And into one of the two calabash-cups Ni-ching-tang poured a liquid from a blue phial.

Sin-wan had thrown himself sullenly upon a plank projection near the black earthen floor; and Ni-ching-tang handed him the draught.

CHAPTER XX.

"The Hundred and Eighty."

The draught was non-poisonous; but Sin-wan had hardly drunk half the contents of the cup when he fell back, fast asleep.

And now, when no eye but God's could see him, the malice of a fiend worked and twisted in the face of Ni-ching-tang. He took Sin-wan's knife, and he ran the edge of the blade gently, almost playfully, along Sin-wan's throat, and over his face, and round the roots of his pig-tail, revelling in his sense of power, wallowing in that sweet lust of cruelty which brings to the Chinaman the same keen delight which bodily forms of enjoyment bring to the Western.

Then he sallied forth.

He ran the knife-edge along Sin-wan's skin; but he had not the least intention of hurting him. The pleasure of self-restraint with which he kept his itching fingers from violence was exquisite.

The Chinese theory of vengeance is not, like the Hebrew, "an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth"; it is, "two eyes for an eye, and thirty-two teeth for a tooth."

Ni-ching-tang could easily have killed Sin-wan, as he slept there; but, had he done so, he would have despised himself as a weak and bungling boor.

For vengeance to be complete and satisfying, the victim must know who it is that is taking vengeance upon him, and why he is doing it; and the avenger must know that the victim knows.

Under these conditions, the longer the period which the vengeance occupies in its accomplishment, the sweeter the cud of satisfaction which the avenger chews.

Ni-ching-tang intended that, for the murder of his son, Sin-wan should suffer weeks of torture before death. And although it was beyond his power to inflict these tortures with his own hands (as he would have wished), yet he knew that it was easy for him to cause them to be inflicted by hands stronger than his own.

He did not lose much time in the self-indulgence of running the knife-edge over Sin-wan's throat and face. Presently, he put down the knife, and he dived his hand into Sin-wan's bosom. From thence he took out Sin-wan's permit to pass in and out of the Imperial gates, and also an Imperial mandate authorising the Keeper of the Prison Keys to deliver a certain key to Sin-wan.

Digitized by Google

With these two rolls of paper in his own bosom, Ni-ching-tang ascended the narrow earthen steps, and at the entrance above met the keeper of the drink place yawning his eyes into invisibility against the door. Ni-ching-tang told him that a man, holding position in the Imperial precincts, was asleep below, and did not wish to be roused.

"Let him sleep: he will wake himself," said Ni-ching-tang.

Then he sallied forth. He twisted at a steady trot among a number of alleys, and stopped at a gaudy bamboo-umbrella booth, where an early-morning merchant was lounging desolately. Ni-ching-tang spoke some hurried words low in the merchant's ear, and the merchant nodded, listening; then disappeared down a court; and in three minutes returned, leading a mule by a rope.

Ni-ching-tang scrambled on to the back of the mule; tossed his hand in token of thanks; drove his heels into the outstanding ribs of the mule, and went galloping away.

He traversed in this way two lengths of intervening street, and, still galloping, passed through the city gate which he had lately entered with Sin-wan. He turned the mule's head eastward toward Tungchow.

Tungchow, as we have said, is a small village about four, or possibly five, miles from Pekin. It is, as it were, the "port" of Pekin, for it stands on the Peiho, Pekin itself not being a river-city, as the geography-books wrongly assert.

At Tungchow, Ni-ching-tang had a nephew. And this nephew was the owner of three river boats, two of them fitted with junk-sails, the third a mule-boat, all three traders, down the Peiho with Tientsin, in millet, rice, and rape. In twenty minutes Ni-ching-tang, at the river side, was talking to his nephew from the mule's back. And Ni-ching-tang said:

"Which of the three boats are here, Li-kien?"

And Li-kien replied:

"The mule-boat is here, and also the Taku, which lies there where you see."

"The Taku has a junk-sail, Li-kién?"

"Yes."

"Then I will buy the Taku from you."

"I cannot sell the Taku, Ni-ching-tang."

"It is a lie, Li-kien, for you can, and you will. At the waning of the next moon I will pay you for her three hundred tael, which is a good reward, in silver pieces. For your cousin, Foo-chee, is dead—and there will be no more Foo-chee any more now at all, Li-kien; for he has been murdered by five stabs, and ugly wounds all. And it is necessary, in order that his slayer should die with horrid tortures, that you sell me your boat, the Taku, without much talking. And now you see that you told a lie in saying that you could not, Li-kien."

"It was a lie," admitted Li-kien.

"And the part which you shall take in avenging your kinsman," went on Ni-ching-tang, "shall be this, Li-kien. You will put on board the Taku rice, and spirit, and water, and fuel, and a rudder-oar, and everything which a man may want for a voyage down the Peiho, and a voyage over the sea, during a week, or more. This you will do. And this also; you will wait here near the Taku, all the forenoon if it is to be so, till you see a young man come riding on a mule; he will be wrapped up from head to foot in a great mantle, so that not much of his face and nothing of his head shall be seen. His face shall be yellow like a Chinaman's, but give a keen look into his eyes, and you will see that he is no Chinaman, but an English dog. You will put him on board the Taku, Li-kien, and you will hoist the sail for him, for he is without strength, and you will send him on his way alone. And, as you send him on his way, burn an incense, that he may go to his journey's end in safety; for, if he be re-captured, Sin-wan, who slew your cousin, will be tortured, but not killed; but, if he escapes wholly, then Sin-wan will be killed after he has been horribly tortured."

Li-kien pondered, and then objected.

"But one man in the Taku, he must needs be cast away, unless he be——"

"He is a sailor, Li-kien, and do not fear. And be sure you place in the Taku a drawing of China, and instruments such as are used by sea-faring men as the signposts of the ocean. For he can doubtless read such things; and it is necessary for him to arrive at Kiao-chau, where he will meet with his countrymen, and be slain with them when they are slain: but none will know that it is he; and Sin-wan will die. The mule you will keep till I send for it."

Immediately the old Chinaman turned the mule's head, and galloped back to Pekin.

All his movements now were characterised with an intense haste, and yet with a certain calm which did not forsake him.

He had much to do, and yet he did not stop to think of anything; he did not forget anything; everything seemed pre-arranged.

Within the prison he was unknown, but he had the Imperial stamp, which opens every door, in the form of Sin-wan's papers.

When he presented himself before John Hardy he had in his hands pigments, costume, and everything ready for the necessary disguise.

At a new face John Hardy started. He anticipated now some new torture, to be carried out by a still more subtle agent than Sin-wan.

As for Ni-ching-tang, he spoke not a word, simply doing his will swiftly on the impotent captive. He painted his face, he dressed him. And all the time he was cudgelling his brains to remember all the English words he needed to tell John Hardy what he was to do.

He found, however, that there was one fact of the situation which all but baulked his plans. John Hardy was weaker than Ni-ching-tang had counted upon. If Hardy's mind was in as feeble a state as his body, it seemed certain that Sin-wan would not die.

He took the dazed captive of Yen How under the arms, supporting him, and half-dragged him forth. And while John Hardy was still wondering to what new experience of pain he was being hurried, he was in the open air. And still Ni-ching-tang spoke no word.

With Ni-ching-tang's own permit, and with Sin-wan's, the two passed beyond the Imperial precincts, Ni-ching-tang lifting after him the lagging steps of Hardy. What was happening to him, John could not dream, but yonder, beyond doubt, was the sky, and there the sailing clouds, and under them a breeze of heaven which went blowing gladly toward the sea.

It was not possible that he was free. He did not believe it. In his profound distrust of Heaven and of earth, he denied it. He was mad again—it was a new torture—the most fiendish of all.

But when he found himself beyond the gates—and there around him spread the wide plain—and there, tethered to a tree drowsed the waiting mule—and there above him was the vast vault, and the free and gadding airs—what could he think? A strange low, whimpering sound—as feeble as can be imagined—as thin as the plaintive whine of a very old and senile man—came from his lips, and two forbidden tears rolled down his cheeks.

He was wrapped in a long robe of soiled silk, which covered the hat of straw on his head and descended to his feet, hiding his rags beneath; and on his feet Ni-ching-tang had put felt slippers. Thus attired he was pushed and manœuvred by the Chinaman to the back of the mule. The rope was put into his hand; and it was then that, for the first time, Ni-ching-tang spoke a word.

Digitized by Google

Ni-ching-tang had need of his whole English vocabulary to express now all he had to say. For quite half-an-hour he went on talking, and it was evident that the scheme which he was now putting into execution must have been long meditated; for his instructions to John Hardy how to secure his safe arrival at Kiao-chau were as minute as possible. In his uncouth and tentative English he gave some idea of the formation of the harbour; and he also spoke of the position in which the stranded Iphigenia lay, pointing out to Hardy that the cruiser would serve as the chief landmark to warn him when he arrived at his destination. He gave John his own name and that of his nephew. Finally, he handed John a sharp knife with which to commit suicide in case of sudden recapture; and ended up by saying:

"Am got you anything to question me?"

"Am got you anything to question me?"

Yes; John had something to ask. He said:

"Yes—One Question."

And he waited a minute before he asked it.

"I owe nothing to Yen How, do I, for my present freedom?"

He repeated the question thrice, and no sooner had Ni-ching-tang gathered its meaning, than instantly his head went shaking in a series of vigorous "No's."

"No, no, no," he went; "you no goee believe that, mind! You getee catch—getee catch! Yen How catchee you—sharp—killee you!"

Good; all this, then, was not due to any clemency of Yen How's. Even then, at that moment of feebleness, when he was still hardly beyond his prison-walls—John Hardy shrunk from hearing that there existed anything good, or human, or redeeming in the Chinese character. He was desperately and clandestinely unwilling to hear it. Some dim and far-off instinct even then told him that it would be necessary for him to go on believing this bad race to be wholly bad, wholly sinful; and that it was in order that he might so believe it, that the Chinese Iron had been ordained to enter into his soul.

But, with a certain reluctance, he ventured upon yet another question. He said:

"And you, sir—what is your motive for setting me free?—Mercy?—Is your only motive a motive of mercy? You want poor Englishman goee free?—Or you havee some other reason?"

Ni-ching-tang smiled at this simplicity of the little foreign devil, when the meaning of the question entered his head. He said:

"Poh! you no troublee head for that. Me havee other reasons. But that nothing for you."

Good again! he owed nothing to them. This man was liberating him for his own private ends.

Ni-ching-tang pointed along a road, and the mule moved. The Chinaman, whose presence in the Imperial precincts was nearly due, stood a little while and looked after the drooping figure on the mule's back. Then he re-entered the city to arrange for the burial of his son.

John occupied two hours in accomplishing the four miles to Tung-chow, and, during this time, thrice fainted from sheer powerlessness.

But on the banks of the Peiho, Li-kien was duly waiting, and the Taku was in perfect readiness to receive her strange white master. By the time the alarm had spread through the Imperial precincts that, by the carelessness of his gaoler, the white prisoner had escaped, John Hardy was in the middle of Peiho, already some miles below Tung-chow.

Digitized by Google

In a wondrously short time, as the boat glided down the river he began to lift his head, to observe, to reason, to purpose. How large was the world to him! His wan eye turned whitely upward, and dwelt upon the sky; one great sob thronged in his bosom for exit from his choking throat; his face worked.

The boat was a bluff craft with an erection aft, making her there a kind of house-boat, and with stones laid round a slab of iron, for cooking, for'ard. The junk sail could quite easily be hoisted and adjusted by a single man, and gave to the boat, with a fair wind and stream, a speed of some seven knots. In a land where carts are driven over land by means of wind and sail, as in China, the navigation of the seas and rivers is in a condition far from elementary. John found his craft pliant and ready, and the bulge of the upward-tapering big sail was fine to his eyes. An exhilaration of mood, ecstatic, high, grew upon him. The day was broad and clear, and busy with breezes. On either hand of him spread endless flat-lands, already sprouting with the tender green of barley, rice, and millet. The river was all but deserted.

There was an aspect, not of earth, but of Paradise, in the bright and balmy world. Henceforth—and he knew it—he would have little to do with joy and soft emotion, and the throe of genial feeling; for the gentle heart within him was turned to stone, or something resembling stone. But for the present he was too weak in body and mind to resist the charm of the wide and placid landscape, and the feeling of freedom which it brought. His heart was still not quite a dead thing.

Yet, let us record two facts. Firstly, that John Hardy, from boyhood, had been of an intensely religious nature; that he had always had a somewhat crabbed habit of reading methodically one chapter each morning from the Bible; and that this affectionate soul had overflowed in affection for his Maker also. And secondly, let us state, that on this morning of his deliverance he several times resisted and repelled the impulse which rose in him to give thanks to God. He refused. So much had Yen How changed him. The boy had hardened into something more (or something less) than a man.

Midway between Tungchow and Tientsin, he left the rudder-oar and searched the boat. Li-kien, apparently, had forgotten nothing; there was food and drink in plenty, a pot, a compass of Western make, and a curious instrument, which he assumed to be a contrivance for taking the sun's altitude, but which he could not at once understand.

He made a fire, for which the materials were at hand, put on some rice to boil, and resumed his place at the oar.

Now and again a painted junk passed him, toiling up the river; but he was not even at the pains to hide himself, as Ni-ching-tang had warned him, so sure was he of safety.

At sun-down he glided between the central space, then open, of the bridge of boats across the Peiho at Tientsin. At eleven o'clock, under a calm and radiant night, he had Taku on his starboard beam; and soon he was in the open sea of the Gulf of Pechili.

Feeling drowsy, about fifteen miles from land, he shipped his oar, lowered his sail, and went to sleep.

The point of his destination was Kiao-chau, once German, then very much English.

Here, seven weeks before, one dark midnight, a hundred and eighty English sailors had beached the battered second-class cruiser Iphigenia, and landed.

The subsequent adventures of these men, when properly written, would fill volumes. At present we can merely glance at them.

At the moment of landing, the Englishmen were no longer wholly in the dark as to the real state of things in China. The absence of all white men both at Chemulpo and Seoul, of which they knew, if not very suggestive in itself, was very suggestive when no explanation could be found of the flagless ships which had chased them, except the one that these ships were Japanese.

Killing the unsuspecting sentries.

The possibility, therefore, that they would be massacred on Chinese territory occurred to them; and their object in coming to Kiao-chau, which was not very remote from the sinking ship, was to throw themselves upon the protection of the Germans, who, as they supposed, occupied the fort of Kiao-chau.

Previous to this, the Germans had very strongly fortified the harbour and its approaches. Its waters were thick with submarine mines, and two strong forts at each of the claws of land which formed the entrance, together with one on the low-lying island of Kinshan in the basin of the harbour, made the position one of considerable strength.

The harbour is about six miles long, and lies N. by W., and S. by E. Around it, in general, is high ground, save at the north-eastern entrance, when an area of sloping meadow-land, rises gradually to the higher levels of the inner entourage of the basin. And it was here that the Iphigenia, then on the point of sinking, was beached.

Fifty yards away, on the brow of a slope stood the N. E. fort. Though the night was dark, and rain fell heavily, its outlines could be made out.

Digitized by Google

The blue-jackets held a sort of informal synod on the sands. There was among them only one staff officer, a lieutenant called Edwards, who, however, was wounded in the breast, and in a kind of daze. Happily, all the special hands were in evidence, except the surgeon, these including the chief engineer, engineer, and assistant engineer, the gunner, the boatswain, the carpenter, with the stokers, and all engine-room hands. Beside these there were about a hundred and fifty blue-jackets.

It was decided to make straight for the N.E. fort, and though no one present could talk German, a volunteer committee of ten, men headed by the chief engineer, a Mr. Murray, set off toward the rising ground.

But these were careless watchman, these Germans! Where was the sentry, and the challenge, and the soldier's stalk, and the rattle of the butt-end? Nowhere was there a light to be seen through all the dripping and desolate night.

The ten men reached the fort to find it as solitary as a desert. They called, and the hills echoed their voice, and through the open portal the night-bird fled and screamed. They passed within the gateway between the two outer bastions, and into the courtyard, and thence onward through every open door. They saw one dead Chinaman sitting in the embrasure of a window, grinning in old decay. But otherwise there was no sign of any struggle. At all events, there were no Germans there. Only the guns remained, and some ammunition and some stores, but not a single small arm.

What to do now? It only remained to visit the S.W. fort, and the fort on the island of Kinshan. And these they found in the same condition.

The Chinese had gained possession of them by killing the unsuspecting sentries in the middle of the night, and seizing, almost bloodlessly, the rest of the garrison, so to speak, as they slept in their beds. The captive soldiers were distributed over China for the celebration of Yen How's Sabbath of Blood; and the forts had then, for the time being, been deserted.

There remained now no further doubt in the minds of the British bluejackets as to their own fate. But they were resolved to sell their lives dearly.

The Iphigenia had still a steam pinnace uninjured, and in this they took turns in flying backwards and forwards between the ship and the island all the night, landing everything, in the way of stores, small arms, and ammunition, which might prove useful to them.

The gunner, Shillitoe, counselled the occupation of all the three forts; but Murray and the rest, fearing the result of a division of the little army gave their voice for a concentration of forces upon the island-fort, on account not only of its disconnection with the mainland, but also of the fact that it appeared to be the most powerful.

This plan was somewhat unfortunate, because the island was uncultivated, and furnished no other food than a scanty supply of wild orris and cassava roots, though there were three springs of rather brackish water. Moreover, at about sun-rise, the movements of the pinnace were observed by some peasants on the mainland, and very shortly afterwards there was a considerable commotion to the east and north of the bay. Though the work of the pinnace was not yet half completed, it was seen that no further voyage must be attempted, nor had any effort, as yet been made to spike the guns of the other two forts. At about seven, these two opened fire simultaneously upon the island fort.

At this period China was awake, or at least had opened her early-morning eye-lids; she had tasted blood, and every Chinaman was feeling the thrill of that electrical cob-web spreading over the land, of which the brain of Yen How was the centre. The artillery combat which now commenced between the island-fort and the others was fought not more obstinately on one side than on the other.

But the two outer posts had not been constructed in the main for inward attack, while the inner one had been constructed for outward attack. By noon, the two outer fortresses were in ruins. But the poor Iphigenia, also, by which the castaways set much store, had been broken by the wanton Chinese almost into nothingness.

And now commenced a series of strenuous and adventurous days and nights for these one hundred and eighty men—or rather one hundred and seventy-nine, for on the next day Edwards died. They had hardly any food; it was necessary to get it, and to get it in the teeth of the armed Chinese, directed by Japanese. And they got it.

Each night had its own tale of brilliant sortie, or crafty ruse, or daring enterprise, or cautiously premeditated plan. One by one their numbers lessened—they became a hundred and seventy—a hundred and sixty. But those who remained went on furnishing materials for a new Odyssey; in two weeks they were the most exquisitely-trained body of men in the world; every day added to them a new supremacy of discipline and culture; eye, and hand, and brain were in it; they could twist through the grass like snakes; could climb like Alpini; could see in the dark; could shoot like machines; could plan in deliberative council like statesmen. In seven weeks they were a living monument of the adaptability to every possible condition of life of the nimble English race.

But this Odyssey lacked Odysseus. It was Hamlet without the hero.

To do anything of much greater importance than the procuring of their food, they needed a leader, and a very decent leader indeed was on the way to join them.

(To be continued.)

IF YOU WANT A BOOK WRITE AND TELL US.

Every week we give away half-a-dozen books.

All a competitor has to do is to send us one Book Coupon cut from The Sunday Reader, one from the Athletic Record, and one from Short Stories.

Send these to us in one envelope together with a request for any single book in the whole world of literature.

From the applications we receive we shall each week pick out six and send the books asked for.

All applications to be addressed to "BOOKS," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please let me have: S. S.

Book.....

Price.....

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Result of the "Book" Competition for the Week Ending March 26th.

John Abel, Onecote School, Leek, Staffs. "Cruden's Complete Concordance." 7s. 6d.

H. Pearson, 58 Princess Street, Hurst, Ashton-under-Lyne. Pearson's Magazine (Vol. I.). 6s.

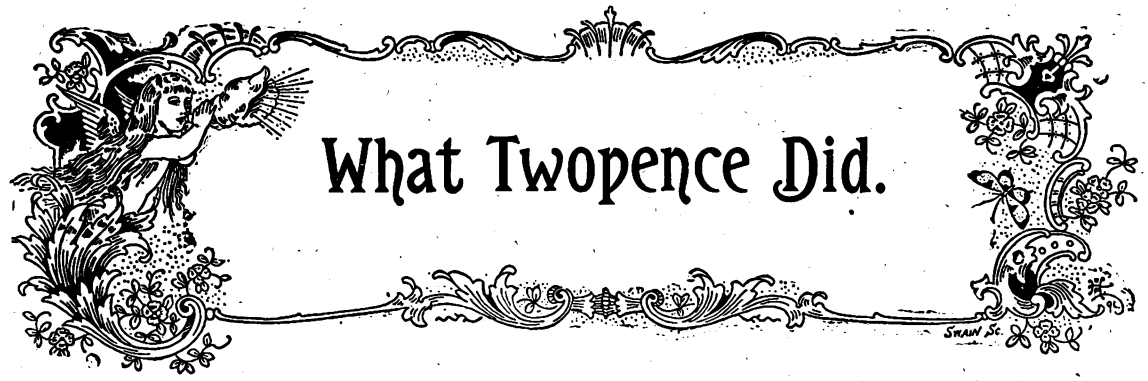
Sam Stork, 47 Eldon Street, Sunderland. "Wayfaring Men," by Edna Lyall. 4s. 6d.

A. D. Allan, 458 Gallowgate, Glasgow. Cassell's "Sunlight and Shade." 5s. 8d.

Mrs. F. Venning, 75 Lady Margaret Road, N.W. "The Christian," by Hall Caine. 4s. 6d.

W. L. Lemon, Uffculme, Devon. "Springhaven." 7s. 6d.

Digitized by Google



What Twopence Did.

When Mr. Worthington Quish opened his eyes that morning, after an unusually late session at his club, it was to see a noonday sunshine streaming in at his windows, and to hear the little gilded French clock on the cabinet opposite his bed striking twelve musical strokes.

As Mr. Quish had an engagement in town at precisely that hour, his toilet was of necessity hasty, which will account for the fact that he neglected to place in his pockets the money he had taken therefrom the night before.

The discovery that he was absolutely penniless was made five minutes later, when, having entered a 'bus he engaged to pay his fare.

The look of helplessness that overcame his handsome features as he searched in vain for the necessary twopence aroused the sympathy of the only other passenger, who sat opposite him, and by whose ripe beauty he had, on taking his seat, been not a little attracted.

She was more than an ordinarily handsome woman, of fair complexion, and with a figure remarkably well-rounded, the gracefully curved outline of which was enhanced by a close-fitting tailor-made gown of snuff colour.

There was a mischievous twinkle in her great blue eyes, and just the suggestion of a smile about the corners of her full, red-lipped mouth as she observed Mr. Quish's evident embarrassment.

Mr. Quish noted this and it put him in a better humour. There was something friendly in the expression, and he forgave the look of amusement for that reason.

"How annoying!" he said to himself. "I should have enjoyed the ride down with her to look at all the way."

The ride without paying his fare was, however, out of the question; and he reached for the strap in order to stop the 'bus.

As he did so his vis-à-vis spoke.

"Pardon me," she said, and her voice was as delicious as her pink-and-white face. "If you will permit it, I shall be glad to lend you your fare!"

Mr. Quish could scarcely believe he heard aright.

"Thank you very much," he replied. "It would be a great service to me. It seems I have forgotten my money, and I have an important appointment in town for which I am already late."

The lady opened the dainty little purse that she carried, and her neatly-gloved fingers extracted the requisite coppers which she passed over to him, and which he in turn passed to the conductor.

"You are very kind," Mr. Quish went on. "If I may be so bold as to ask you for your address, I shall have pleasure in returning the loan."

The lady smiled.

"It is scarcely worth speaking of," she answered.

"And yet," returned Mr. Quish, "twopence, as we have just seen, is of considerable more value sometimes than we have any idea of. I hope you will allow me to repay you. I should not have accepted it had I not looked upon it in the light of a loan merely."

It was now the feminine passenger that was embarrassed. To give her address to an utter stranger did not appear to her quite the correct thing, and yet she could scarcely expect a strange gentleman to accept from her even such a trifle as twopence as a gift.

After a second's mental debate with herself, she handed him a card, upon which was engraved:

Mrs. Edgar Lawrence Mandeville,
West Street,
Hyde Park,
W.

"And may I call, Mrs. Mandeville, and return the loan in person?" Mr. Quish asked emboldened by the knowledge that he had gained a point.

Mrs. Mandeville rose and motioned to the conductor. "If you care to," she replied, and the next moment she had alighted, and the 'bus with Mr. Worthington Quish, its only occupant, was rumbling on down the roadway.

* * * * *

It was a few minutes past five o'clock on the same afternoon that Mr. Quish, his exchequer replenished, mounted the steps of the house indicated on the card, which he had carefully preserved, and rang the bell.

Of the servant who answered the summons he inquired for Mrs. Mandeville, and was ushered into a reception room on the left of the hall. Already the dusk had begun to close in and the apartment, curtained as it was with heavy tapestries, was in something more than semi-gloom.

For ten minutes Mr. Quish sat still and waited. Then the unmistakable frou-frou of skirts came to his ears, and the next moment he was on his feet, exclaiming:

"Am I not prompt, my dear Mrs. Mandeville? Here I am, within six hours, prepared to refund every penny of the sum you were good enough to supply me with."

The lady made no reply.

"And I trust," he went on, thrusting his hand into his trousers pocket for the coin, "that my honesty plead for me when I ask that with this satisfaction of all your claims against me, our acquaintance, made under such novel circumstances in a 'bus, shall not end. Do you know, my dear Mrs Mandeville, I feel already that I have known you for years, and I am sure that when you know me better, you—"

Digitized by Google

At this point Mr. Quish came to a sudden halt.

There was a movement behind him, and turning, he distinguished in the gloom the figure of a man slowly rising from a sofa, where he had evidently been dozing.

The next moment the man had struck a match and lighted the gas, revealing to Mr. Quish's astonished gaze a woman several years older than his benefactress, and an elderly, nervous little fellow with grey beard, who was virtually fuming with rage.

"Who are you, sir?" he exclaimed, "and what is your business?"

Mr. Quish could not on the moment find words to reply. He realised that his position was a most awkward one, the fact having dawned suddenly upon him that his beautiful chance acquaintance had been guilty of making him the butt of a heartless practical joke.

"Your words to my wife, sir," went on the little bearded man, "require an explanation. By what right, sir, do you——"

"I beg your pardon," put in Quish, having by this time, in a measure, pulled himself together. "I beg your pardon most sincerely. I have made a mistake. I never saw your wife until this moment. I—I—I——"

The lady hastened to confirm the story.

"I am sure, my dear," she said, addressing her husband "that the gentleman will be able to explain everything. I have no more knowledge of him than you have. I have never seen him in my life before. I——"

The husband gave evidence of increasing irritation.

"Tut! Tut!" he interposed, "you cannot deceive me. I know better. Do you think I did not hear your conversation?"

"But I did not speak a word," pleaded the wife, who Quish now observed was quite pretty, and well calculated to fill an elderly husband's heart with jealous misgivings.

"Do not dispute with me," returned her lord; "I am not so old but that I can hear, and I am not so old but that I can see. Yes, madam, see. Did I not hear him call you Mrs. Mandeville? Did I not see you here standing before him while he talked to you about knowing him better? Ah! yes; it is quite clear to me now. I need no explanation; I will accept none. It is a flirtation you have been having, and you dared to receive the object of it under my roof."

The gentleman was shaking his fist so violently that his cuff had crept out and over the edge of his coat sleeve.

At this juncture Mrs. Mandeville fell to weeping, and Mr. Quish once more began an explanation.

"Not a word, sir," Mr. Mandeville interrupted. "I do not know that I can blame you, especially. You would not be human did you not accept encouragement given by a pretty woman. Ah! How different was my first wife! How different is my daughter! Modest and good, they would have repelled the advances of a stranger."

Mrs. Mandeville gave signs of hysterics, and Mr. Quish moved towards the door.

"If you will excuse me," he said. "I will withdraw. Since I cannot make you believe me, it is useless for me to attempt further to disabuse your mind."

As he spoke the door bell rang.

"Ah!" went on the husband and father, "that is she now. My little girl, I will let her in myself. I want her so badly at this moment. She is all I have left me," and there was an indication of tears in his voice as he spoke.

Mr. Quish had just turned to Mrs. Mandeville with a request for pardon on his lips when the sound of a familiar voice coming to his ears from the hall, caused him to stop and listen.

"Oh, papa dear," he heard, "how excited you are! Why, you're actually crying."

"Yes, my pet," came in broken tones from the old gentleman, "your stepmother has grossly deceived me, and you—you, my dear—are now my only comfort."

"I'm sure there must be some mistake—" Mr. Quish heard and waited for no more.

"There is! There is!" he fairly shouted, darting out to meet them, "and you can and will explain it all."

Miss Mandeville—the heroine of the 'bus ride—burst into laughter.

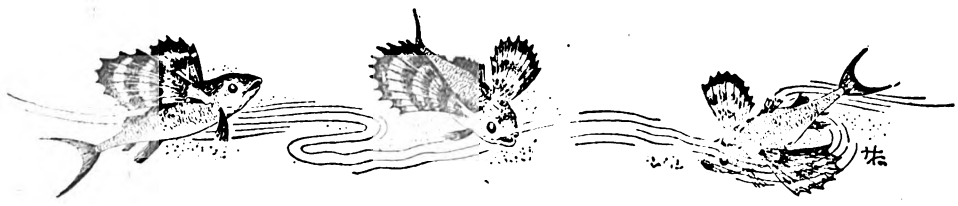
"How odd!" she exclaimed, "how very odd! Now I remember I gave you one of my mamma's cards instead of my own."

"You—you—" gasped the old gentleman, "do you mean to say you give cards to strange gentlemen whom you meet in 'buses and invite them to call on you? O, this is worse than ever, and I thought—I thought that you——"

"Now don't excite yourself, papa dear," Miss Mandeville urged, "I did nothing wrong, I am sure. The gentleman, you see, has merely come to return twopence which I was good enough to lend him this morning to pay his fare. He will, I am quite sure, having cancelled the debt, go, and never presume to call again. Am I not right?"

And Mr. Quish under the circumstances had no alternative but to agree that she was.

T. Sawdby.



Digitized by Google

For Safe Custody.

An Ex-Bank Clerk's Tale.

We were sitting round the fire in my diggings, when the conversation turned upon burglars.

"Talking of burglars," said Dick Chester, from the depths of his hammock chair, "do you remember a few years ago when the Metropolitan and Western Bank paid a much smaller dividend than usual, to the great surprise and dismay of the shareholders? You would recollect, Warham, I'm sure."

I nodded in reply. My father had been a shareholder in that respectable establishment, and some of his comments at the time had lived in my memory; in fact, I have utilised them myself on one or two occasions.

"Well," said Dick, "I was a clerk at the time, and was one of the few who knew the real reason of the diminished profits. It was kept very dark at the time; but as the bank has amalgamated with several others now, and I am no longer in its service, I don't mind spinning you the yarn if you care to hear it."

We conferred together and told him he might tell the tale if it was proper.

"When I was in the Metropolitan and Western Bank West-end Branch," he began, "there were two other men in the office who seemed to stand out above their fellow clerks—seemed to attract more attention as it were.

"One was Nathaniel Fipps, our chief clerk—about the finest specimen of a blithering idiot that ever stepped. How he ever got his responsible post beats me. Without brains, without common sense, and utterly without aspirates, he spent the day sitting in his box and gazing down the office with a smug look of self-satisfaction on his face that was a treat to see. He looked just as if he fancied that he was the controlling lever that manipulated the working of the bank.

"Of course his proper duties of arranging the work and the holidays were left to take care of themselves. If you asked him a question relating to the work, he generally made some remark that had no bearing at all on the subject, or else he tried to be facetious, which was more riling still. Oh! we did love him, I can tell you.

"The other man was a young chap of about two years my senior. Jim Stevens his name was, and he was a rattling good man. Very smart about his work and used his head over it; didn't do it like a machine as most bank clerks do. I didn't fancy him altogether, as he never seemed quite straight and he had a devil of a temper, but I was more friendly with him than any of the other men were.

"It was his temper that dished him finally. He had a furious row with Fipps one day about something in the work, and that silly old idiot, instead of ordering him back to his desk to cool down, tried to be funny. Stevens, being in a towering rage, construed the remark as an insult and smacked Fipps in the mouth. The inevitable followed; he was had up before the directors and promptly sacked, and we never saw him again. Smart men generally go off like that, only old fools like Fipps hang on for ever. We missed Jim after he'd gone, I can tell you.

"About three months after this we opened a current account in the name of Haigh and Co.—commission agents they styled themselves. They were regularly introduced, and commenced their account with a respectable amount. Only one member of the firm ever came into the bank, and he was a gentlemanly-looking chap with a black beard and blue spectacles. I had to speak to him one day and he seemed a very decent sort.

"Now you must know that a great many of our customers used to send us plate chests and deed boxes for safe custody, which we stowed away downstairs in the strong rooms. The position of these strong rooms was as follows: They lay underneath the bank and were guarded first by a huge steel door, a clutch bolt I think the name is, which was locked in two places with different keys. The manager kept one key and the chief clerk the other, so that both had to be present to open the door.

Digitized by Google

"Just inside this first door was another, which was more like a grating, a grille I believe they call it. These two doors led to the room where we kept all the boxes; to get at the money one had to open two more similar doors at the end of this first room. However the box room is the one we have to deal with.

"Soon after Haigh and Company opened their account they sent round to the manager saying that a large chest of plate was passing through their hands, and could they be allowed to deposit it at the bank for a night 'for safe custody.' Of course permission was granted, and soon after the chest arrived—a huge thing and fairly heavy.

"It was stowed away downstairs, and the next morning was fetched out again—to be forwarded to a country bank, so Haigh and Company said. Curiously enough, Haigh drew all the money off their current account, the same day, excepting five pounds.

"For six weeks work went on as usual, and then one day one of the customers came in to see his deed box, which was brought up for him, and he opened it in the manager's room.

"Then came a row. His box, which contained his securities, had been opened, and all the bearer bonds had been stolen—nearly two thousand pounds worth altogether.

"The old man was furious. The manager thought there must be some mistake—that he had never had those bonds in his box at all, but when we came to examine downstairs we soon discarded that theory. About twenty boxes had their seals broken and looked very much as if someone had been tampering with the locks.

"We communicated with those customers whose boxes had been tampered with, and they came in to examine their property. And the property, left for 'safe custody,' had been despoiled to the extent of nearly £30,000 in bearer bonds and diamonds a lady customer had sent in.

"The bank had to make good the loss in order to keep the matter quiet; it would never have done to let it be known our strong rooms were accessible to burglars; why, we shouldn't have had an account left.

"How the robbery was effected no one could make out. No one ever visited the strong rooms by himself—the grille was always locked all day, and if any boxes were wanted the chief clerk went down with a messenger to fetch them up. At night the manager took one key of the door to his house over the bank and the chief clerk took the other home with him. In addition to this a messenger slept in the office just in front of the door leading down to the strong rooms.

"The stolen bonds were found to have been all sold, and though they had passed through several hands, were traced back to a 'young man.' As there were several young men in London at the time the description was rather vague. It generally is a young man who does these sort of things, older men don't seem to care about running the risk. This particular gentleman, however, was never traced. He was absolutely unknown, and the mystery of the robbery seemed as if it would never be solved.

"About eighteen months after, I received a letter from West Australia. I recognised the writing as Jim Stevens' at once. Wondering what he was writing about, and hoping it wasn't for a loan, I opened it, and read a follows:

"Dear Dick,—No doubt by this time various discoveries have been made in your office, and as very likely suspicion may be resting on some of you, I think I had better set your minds at rest by explaining matters.

"Do you remember an account of Haigh & Co. and a certain plate-chest sent by them to you for safe custody? Well, that chest, when you received it, contained nothing more valuable than myself and some peculiar tools admirably adapted for lock picking. You see I was a partner in the firm of Haigh & Co. I made such good use of my night in the box room, owing to my knowledge of the customers and their investments, that the chest was of far more value when it was fetched away from the bank. We have, my two pals and myself, cleared about £9,000 apiece, and are here in Coolgardie enjoying it. Don't let anyone trouble to catch us. I would defy the smartest 'tec in the world to pot us now. Love to all in the office, and kick old Fipps for me.—Yours fraternally, "(Signed) Jim Stevens.

"Directly I read this letter I tumbled to the whole thing. Jim had remained concealed in his box until the strong rooms had been locked up for the night, and then he had come out with a good fourteen hours before him in which to do his deeds of darkness. His knowledge of the customers and their investments had enabled him to pick out the best boxes.

"It was a fine stroke of judgment that made him choose the latter part of August for his venture, as very few people are in town then, and not likely to come for their boxes. So he could reasonably expect a fair start before anything was found out.

"Well, I handed Jim's letter to our manager, and his face when he read it was a picture, though his rage was nothing compared to old Fipps'. That message re the kicking nearly made him mad. I was ordered to say nothing about the matter, but though everything was kept very quiet I managed to get hold of one or two facts. Of course they tried to trace the individual who sent the letter from Perth, W.A., and did actually succeed in finding that out by the merest chance.

"One of our detectives was spending the evening at a friend's house in Perth and he met a manager from a bank there.

"This manager, during the evening, told them a yarn about a letter he had received some time back, asking him to post an inclosed letter as soon as he conveniently could, as the writer had a bet about the time it took to get out to West Australia and back. Like a good sportsman, he posted the inclosure and thought no more of it. Our detective, never thinking about its being anything to do with his mission, asked the manager where the inclosed letter was addressed to. It made him sit up though when he heard it was sent to a man called Chester in the Metropolitan and Western Bank.

"Well that fairly upset all their calculations. It was pretty evident that Jim had sent this letter out to be posted in Australia as a blind, while he and his pals cleared out to some other part of the world. Of course he never thought that the business of the letter would come to light, so doubtless he was chuckling to himself over the thought of the detectives searching all over Coolgardie for him.

"To cut a long story short, old Jim has never been heard of from that day to this. Personally, I expect he's living like a duke somewhere in South America. And, scoundrel though he is, I should be sorry if he were to be caught, for though he deserves a long spell in the jug, yet I could forgive him everything for the clout on the head he once gave that old Fipps."

Howard Warham.

Digitized by Google

SUMMARY.

Amaury Montruel, a knight, and Mahmoud-el-Reis, a Saracen, meet on the road to Paris. The former's mission is to kill the Queen of France; the latter's to kill the King. At the same time two children, Eric and Eve, are on their way to Paris to aid the Queen, and overhear the conversation of these two horsemen. Shortly afterwards a knight and his page give the children a lift on the road, and, on arriving at Paris, place them under the care of the Freemasons. Maître Samson, Montruel's secretary, tries to induce Tristan de Pamiers, king of the law students, to raise a rebellion in favour of Agnes de Méranie against Philip's consort, Queen Ingeburge. Albret, the King's page, takes Eve, alias Little Adam, to the King, who gives her permission to visit Ingeburge in her captivity in the Abbey St. Martin. Meanwhile Agnes de Méranie pays a visit to Notre Dame with Amaury Montruel, and stills the ominous cries of the people by distributing among them her paste jewels. In the cathedral she meets Mahmoud-el-Reis, who is carving a figure of the Virgin, and tries to win his regard by presenting him with pearls, which he crushes under his feet when she has gone. Returning from the visit to the cathedral, the members of the Royal party are intercepted by the Free-Lances, but are finally allowed to go on their way. Thinking this wild crew may be of future use to her, Agnes de Méranie determines to enlist the sympathies of their leader, Antoine Cadocu. To accomplish her object she visits him the same evening, accompanied by Montruel, in the low tavern in which he and his followers hold their nightly revels. She is very rudely treated, and returns with Montruel without having attained her object of enlisting the sympathies of Cadocu. Montruel's secretary, Samson, hints to the King that Agnes has been seen out late at night, and, although he confirms his suspicions, he does not allow Agnes to suspect his knowledge.

CHAPTER XI.

The Opening of the Council.

Every bell in Paris, whether from church tower or convent turret, was ringing its loudest, merriest peal, and the varied tones, from the low, clear note of the Angelus to the harsh clang of the tocsin, rent the morning air with deafening noise. At a very early hour the principal streets were thronged by eager, chattering crowds of small citizens and artisans, while the more important merchants solemnly occupied their own thresholds. Every street corner was marked by expectant groups, every window was filled by eager faces of women and children, and as the gutter urchin of that time was but little behind his modern representative in cheek and ubiquity, every available projection was adorned by festoons of arms and legs, twined ingeniously round wherever their owners could insinuate them.

It was one of those days when the heart of Paris is stirred as that of one man, whether for joy or sorrow, for a fête or for the news of a battle, for a marriage or for a funeral, for a display of fireworks or for a revolution, and the cause of all this interest was the opening of the famous council under the presidency of Gratien Florent, Bishop of Orvietto and Papal Legate, to inquire into the second marriage of King Philip Augustus, whom the Pope had summoned to appear in person before the Tribunal.

The bare fact of their powerful and victorious monarch being called to account in their midst would have been enough to rouse the people of Paris; but the point now at issue had a deep personal significance for every man and woman in the city, inasmuch as the decision of the Council meant the continuance or the removal of that merciless interdict which was striking terror to the heart of every subject of the French Crown.

From time to time a nobleman, dressed in the brave attire of the day, and followed by his gay and saucy page, passed by the waiting thousands, and a goodly array of priests, abbots, bishops and high dignitaries of the church made their way in solemn state to the chapel of the New Palace in the heart of the city, where High Mass was to be celebrated with stately pomp and gorgeous ritual.

The ceremony lasted three hours, during which time the bells pealed forth unweariedly, but as the last words of blessing fell from the lips of the Archbishop inside the chapel, every bell was hushed and, while the last vibrations still lingered in the air, the long procession of magnificently robed ecclesiastics, preceded by sacred banners, smoking censers, and burning tapers, descended the chapel steps singing the psalm Quare fremuerunt gentes to a grand old plain-song chant, and crossed the open court-yard to where another flight of steps led up to the ancient throne room in which the Council was to hold its sittings.

The vast crowd stood in breathless silence to watch the imposing spectacle. Every head was bared, every breast was marked by the Holy Sign, the more devout knelt in lowly adoration, and not even Ezekiel or Tréfouilloux dared to raise a mocking cry, so mighty was the hold that the Church's ceremonial had upon the minds of men in the Middle Ages.

As the last of the procession passed out of sight a new excitement arose, and wild sounds of jubilation rang through the air. Caps were thrown up, handkerchiefs and gaily coloured sashes were waved from the windows, and hearty cheers rang from every throat as the King appeared in the Rue St. Honoré on his way to answer the Papal summons.

His people loved Philip Augustus, for he was brave and strong, and a man of right royal mien. As to his matrimonial affairs, Paris had always judged a man leniently in such matters, and so they excused their monarch, even while their hatred increased daily and hourly of Agnes de Méranie, as the cause of all their troubles.

The King was a goodly sight on this memorable morning. He always looked his best on horseback, and now he was clad in full battle array, with the crown encircling his helmet, as if to remind his judges of his royal rank. He rode with raised visor, surrounded by all the great vassals of the crown, with their glittering suites, and protected by his imposing bodyguard.

"With all those fine lances," said one to another in the crowd between the shouts of "Vive le Roi," "with all those men, the King could easily have made the council come to him at the Louvre, instead of his going to them in the city."

Everyone felt sure that the King would never yield if the decision went against his marriage with Agnes, and in spite of all that his obstinacy would entail upon themselves, his loyal subjects could not suppress a certain thrill of pride as they thought of the iron will and resolute independence of their ruler, for patriotism had only been stifled by self-interest among the intriguing clique of the haute noblesse.

Digitized by Google

When the King disappeared within the palace, one of his attendant nobles turned aside his horse and began to force his way through the crowd in the direction of Nôtre-Dame. Though he rode with closed visor everyone knew it was Amaury Montruel, Lord of Anet and Friend of the King, and all who could, got out of his way as fast as possible, for they knew that he had no scruple in riding down any who stood in his path. All did not escape free from injury, however, many a one cringed and fell under the sharp blows he dealt to right and left on the hapless wretches who chanced to be within his reach. Montruel was in a savage mood, and was glad to vent his rage on those who were too weak to do more than revile him. He rode on recklessly till he got clear of the crowd and turned into the quiet side streets leading to the cathedral.

Here all was silent and deserted, only at the corner of the Rue de la Calandre three men stood, cup in hand, at the door of one of the taverns. These men were Maître Samson, Maître Honoré the Freemason, and Tristan de Pamiers, King of the Basoche. As he passed these men Amaury Montruel stooped down a little and called out: "To-night!" with a significant glance at Samson, but he never drew rein.

"My lord Amaury seems in so great a hurry that he has forgotten his manners," said Tristan in his calm, cynical tones. "He might at least have stopped and greeted me as becomes a gentleman."

"You heard him, comrades," asked Samson, not vouchsafing to notice the last remark, "he said 'to-night.' Now, are we ready?"

"I have undertaken," said Tristan, "to lead your rabble, and to supply them with trappings that will give them the appearance of students. I have the trappings, and when you bring me the rabble we can soon rig them out."

"I have promised," said Maître Honoré, "to provide three or four hundred loafers, masons' labourers they call themselves, with good lungs to shout and good fists to fight.

The long procession of magnificently-robed ecclesiastics.

It is the very least one can do for so gracious a Queen who scatters sweet smiles wherever her fair presence shows itself. It's no use to think of taking any of the regular masons, for men who really work never meddle in a riot."

"Then all promises well," chuckled Samson, rubbing his lean, bony hands, "Maître Honoré brings the men, and Tristan the costumes. You provide the viands and I will add the sauce in the shape of a horde of cut-throats and thieves, who'll shout louder than all the rest if they think there's a drink to be got by it."

Montruel pursued his headlong course through the empty alleys, and across the deserted inclosure, which presented a striking contrast to the lively scene he had just quitted, and indeed to its own usual appearance. Only two or three men were to be seen working on the hugh edifice, all the loiterers were swelling the crowd in the city and, having tied up his horse, he entered the building unperceived and went straight to where the wonderful image was being fashioned.

Several days had passed since that eventful evening when Madame Agnes had braved the horrors of Cadocu's den, and in the short interval Montruel seemed to have aged ten years. His face was drawn, furrowed by deep lines, and was pale as death, while out of their dark-rimmed sockets his eyes shone with feverish brilliancy, and glanced hither and thither with uncontrollable restlessness. Each sleepless night and every hour of anguish had left its mark upon the man's face.

Madame Agnes had been obdurate, and had banished him from her presence till he should have struck the decisive blow and freed her from her rival.

When he entered the shed the two negroes were sitting crossed-legged, one on either side of the statue which, though not yet polished, had evidently received its last touch from the master's chisel.

"Where is Jean Cador?" he asked, looking round in search of the Syrian; but neither of the slaves attempted to answer him.

"Oh, of course, they don't know him by that name!" he said to himself.

"Where is Mahmoud-el-Reis?" he repeated.

The bright, glassy eyes flashed a look of recognition, but still no answer was forthcoming. Amaury walked to the middle of the room and for the first time took notice of the finished statue.

"What?" he murmured incredulously. "Can he have done that in a week? Impossible!"

Digitized by Google

The idea of demoniacal assistance immediately presented itself to his mind, but a second surprise of even more significance was awaiting him. He looked at the statue intently as if he could not believe his own eyes, then exclaimed:

"It is! It is the Queen herself! Where can he have seen her? Or is it only a chance resemblance?"

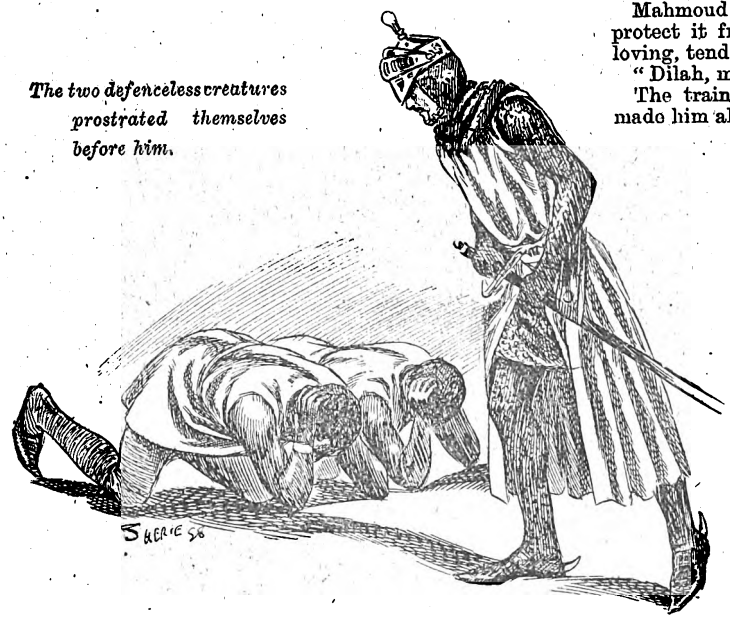
He stepped back and looked at it from all points of view, then walked round it and examined every detail closely, while the two slaves remained as dusky foils to its dazzling purity.

"Yes, yes," he muttered, "it is Ingeburge and no other! I could not be deceived, but how has he done it?"

Turning quickly to the slaves, he asked imperiously:

"Has any woman been here to visit your master?"

Still the same impassive silence. Amaury, whose every



The two defenceless creatures prostrated themselves before him.

nerve was strained almost beyond endurance, could ill brook this sullen defiance. He laid his hand threateningly on his sword, and the two defenceless creatures prostrated themselves before him in an agony of fear. Seeing that his anger was by no means appeased, they slowly opened their mouths and thus pleaded their own cause most effectually. He saw that their tongues had been torn out, and so could tell no tales. In justice to Mahmoud-el-Reis, it must be said that he had borne no part in this brutality, for the slaves had been sold to him in this condition.

Montruel shrugged his shoulders saying:

"Diable! So that's the way he keeps his secrets, is it? I shall never know the truth, and I don't feel inclined to trust that infidel too blindly," said Montruel aloud.

A slight noise at the other end of the room caused him to turn round, and he saw Mahmoud standing in his customary attitude, with his arms folded across his breast before the curtain which shut off part of the shed. The Syrian had doffed his costly Oriental dress, and was wearing the simple clothes of a French mason.

"He whom you call 'infidel,' has never yet broken faith with any man. It were well if the same could be said of you, Amaury Montruel!"

The words fell unheeded on the ears for which they were meant, and the Frenchman seized his arm convulsively, saying:

"Is that a portrait? Tell me quickly!"

The Moslem bowed his head in acquiescence.

"Of whom? I must know!"

Mahmoud pointed to the half effaced sketch on the woodwork, but Montruel shook his head impatiently.

"Yes, yes, I know that! But it's very strange——"

The Syrian was watching him closely, and now asked:

"Do you know a woman who is very like that?"

As he got no answer he continued:

"It is not the one you brought here the other day, though you called her the Queen also?"

"No, I know that," was the curt reply.

"Then do you Christians sometimes love two women as well as we?"

Montruel's lips curled and showed his teeth unpleasantly:

"I don't love that woman, I hate her!"

Mahmoud drew near to the beautiful statue as if he would protect it from any violence, and as his eyes rested with loving, tender care upon it, he murmured:

"Dilah, my beloved!"

The train of thought always awakened by this name made him almost forget the presence of Montruel, but as an impatient cough brought him back to the disagreeable present he whispered to his handiwork:

"Every soul has its twin. The woman who he says is so like Dilah, must be her twin soul, and whoever she may be, I shall love her!"

Mahmoud-el-Reis resumed his grave, somewhat haughty manner, and peremptorily dismissed the slaves. Then he turned again to his visitor and requested him to be seated.

Amaury's restlessness hardly permitted him to keep in the same position for two seconds together, and he visibly chafed under the slow, deliberate movements of the Syrian.

"It is time that we settled this business," he began.

Mahmoud bowed his head:

"The Will of Allah be done! You must first hear what I have to say to you, Amaury Montruel, for I know you do not trust the 'infidel' yet."

CHAPTER XII.

The Moslem Speaks.

"Whichever of us," began Mahmoud-el-Reis in his solemn, impressive manner, "hesitates to sacrifice his own life, if needful, in the accomplishment of his master's orders, commits a sin; but equally he who risks his life uselessly, even while obeying his master's orders, commits a crime which can only be expiated by the seventh penance."

"You don't seem to have understood me," interrupted Montruel. "We have no time to lose in talking, it must be done to-day, this very day!"

"Yes, I understand you, but you must now try and understand me. In my country we speak no useless words. The King wears steel armour, and is guarded by valiant and faithful guards. I will not attack him either while wearing that armour or when guarded by his troops."

Montruel had taken off his helmet and was sitting with his head between his hands. When the Syrian paused he murmured, almost mechanically:

"The King knows all! The King knows too much! It is no use to think of going back now!"

Mahmoud had moved to the window, and was gazing down on the arm of the Seine which wound round the cathedral, its banks fringed by the quaint, picturesque buildings with their painted roofs, gables and turrets; but ever and anon his eyes wandered back to the beautiful statue. He hardly heard Amaury's words, for his mind was full of his approaching return to Dilah and the land of his birth. Part of his task was completed, and if this man abided by his promise, the rest could soon be accomplished. At present he was the only channel open by which the King could be reached with safety. Suddenly he began again in a seemingly irrelevant strain:

Digitized by Google

"Salim, too, was guarded by men and armour, and he was as far above your King as the Sun is greater than the stars—Salim, the friend of God, the Commander of the Faithful. He had five hundred black eunuchs, armed with scimitars of the most finely tempered steel, who never spared any who dared to look upon their master. To see him was to die—his name alone made men tremble from Bagdad to the far East.

"Mohammed, the Holy and Strong, the Vicegerent of Heaven upon earth, told me to go to Bagdad and kill Salim the Commander of the Faithful. Twelve Fédavi had already gone forth on this errand, but none had returned, and their bones were rotting in the sewers of Bagdad. I knew this: I was not yet sixteen: but I started with gold in my belt, and the crystal poniard hidden for the first time in my vest. In the streets of Bagdad there were twelve blocks of marble which they told me marked the spots where those who had tried to assassinate the Caliph had perished, and I went to the front of the palace and plunged my poniard in the ground, saying: 'Here shall perish either Salim or myself!'"

Montruel, who had been listening with unconcealed impatience now got up exclaiming:

"What does all this matter to me? You promised to kill the Queen!"

"And you promised to deliver the King into my hands," was the grave reply.

"Well, have I refused?"

Mahmoud leant against the window frame, looking critically upon the man before him.

"Then if you do not refuse, listen again, so that you may know what I require of you. In the place where I struck my poniard there was nothing but a group of palm trees, so I dressed up as a beggar, dragged a stone to the spot for my seat, and waited for the coming of the Commander of the Faithful. For more than a year I sat there day by day, without success, till at last the Caliph appeared, surrounded by his black guards. I sprang forward, but before I could reach him, a scimitar pierced my breast and I remembered no more. Another year had passed before I could drag myself from my couch of suffering to visit the fated spot. I found that the palm trees had been uprooted and a large hole dug, which they told me was for the foundations of a new Mosque that Salim was building as a thank-offering for his deliverance.

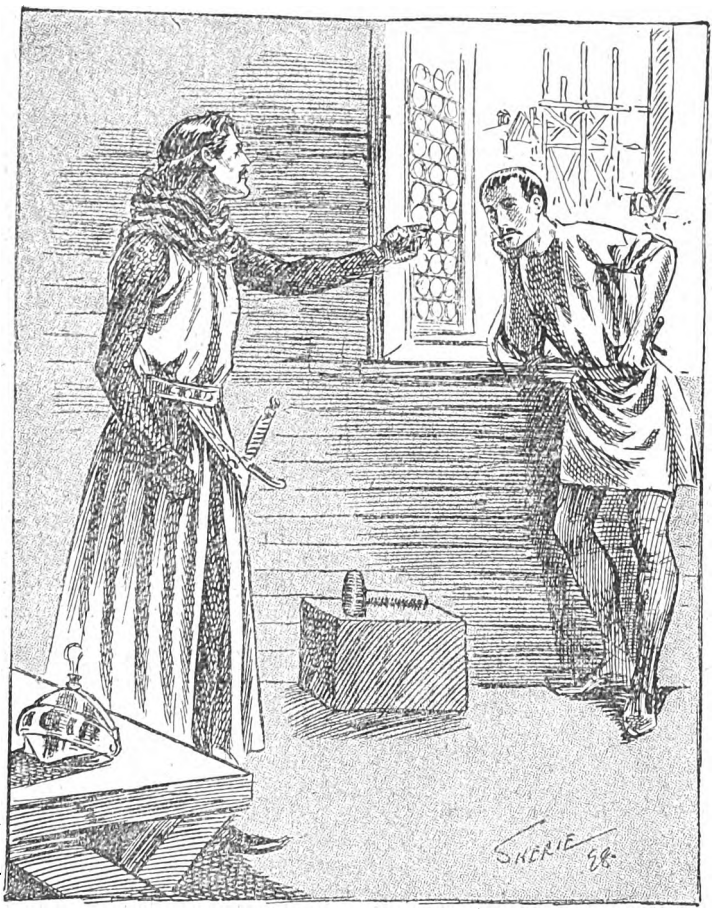
"I went down on my hands and knees and crawled about searching for the place I had marked with my poniard, and at last by the mercy of Allah, I found it untouched in the midst of the space left for the main entrance. All round me men were working at delicate scroll work for the decoration of the Mosque, and carving of every description was being carried out by artists of great cunning.

"The prophet inspired me to learn their craft, and for four long years I worked amongst them, and lived in the growing temple till I knew every stone of it. I had mastered all the branches of the art, and my teachers mentioned my skill to the Caliph, who took me into his employ under the following circumstances:

"Above the spot I had chosen, the stately arch had risen to its appointed height, and only the carved keystone was wanted to complete it, but twenty times that stone had been cut and carved only to fly to pieces through the agency of some evil spirit, as men said, before it could be raised to its place."

"Parbleu!" exclaimed Montruel in exasperation at the long-winded deliberation of the man he dared not offend, "do you think I can stay here all day while you meander on in these waking dreams, Maître Jean Cador?"

"I waited seven years to kill the Caliph," replied the Moslem, unmoved, "and I have only been seven days in Paris. If you cannot serve me as I wish to be served, let us part. I can bide my time."



"What does all this matter to me? You promised to kill the Queen!"

"Go on," sighed his hearer hopelessly, gnawing his nails in nervous irritation.

"I was the cause of those twenty stones flying to pieces, for I had learnt in Kathay the secret of making that mysterious powder which explodes when brought into contact with fire and bursts every barrier that confines it. I spent my nights in manufacturing this powder with sulphur and saltpetre, then a few hours before the stone was to be placed I bored a hole, inserted some of the powder and applied a fuse.

"The Caliph said to me: 'Mahmoud-el-Reis, you are skilful and love your work, will you undertake to cut and carve me a stone that can be fixed in its place without accident? If you succeed I will give you 20,000 sequins: if you fail, you shall be flogged to death on the spot.'

"'I undertake to cut and carve the stone,' I replied, 'if the King of Kings, the sight of whose splendour dazzles like the rays of six suns, will accord one favour to his poor slave.'

Digitized by Google

"'There is but one God and Mahomet is His Prophet! The favour that I ask is that the Kings of Kings will shed the light of his presence on the scene of my labours and occupy the place I shall assign to him when the stone is fixed.'

"I took a year to cut and carve the stone, which was nearly half the size of this shed, and when it was finished, I passed the night beside it with a drawn scimitar in my hand. On the following day Salim greeted me with gracious approval, and asked where he should stand in order to fulfil his promise. I indicated to him the exact spot which my poniard had pierced seven years before, and he took up his position there under a silken canopy upheld by sixteen slaves.

"At a sign from me the pulleys began to work, and the gigantic stone was lifted from the ground and swung in mid air. I was on the top of the framework supporting the arch, with my dagger concealed in my breast. When the huge mass hung directly over the silken canopy, I drew my dagger, cut the ropes and shouted the dreaded name of Mohammed, Lord of the Mountain, while the great stone thundered to the ground, crushing all beneath it.

"I tell you all this, because I feel here in Paris as I did in Bagdad, too weak to cope with a monarch surrounded by his guards, and because I wish to know if you will bring Philip Augustus here, and place him in the doorway of Nôtre-Dame at the day and hour I shall indicate to you?"

"A brilliant idea, a splendid way out of the difficulty, comrade! I cannot promise to bring the King here at any hour you may assign, but I can give you notice of the time when I know he will have to pass through the door, and that comes to the same thing."

"Yes, that comes to the same thing."

"Well then, that is settled most satisfactorily," said Montruel briskly, "now for your share of the bargain. You don't know what I suffer, what tortures I endure till that deed is accomplished. I may not see her whom my soul adores while that woman lives. I am parted from my heart's desire, from the one for whom alone I live, and every moment away from her is an eternity of suffering. You who love, ought to sympathise with me, for I adore this woman as you adore Dilah——"

"Do not dare to let that name pass your lips, nor venture to sully it by comparison with the one you think you love."

Montruel felt he could have flown at the man's throat, but he controlled his fury, though he bit his lips till they bled in the attempt. Mahmoud was again standing in front of the statue, saying in a voice of deep self-reproach:

"It is my fault that they are able to profane thy name, for I betrayed it to them, and I have even dared to show them thine image, which the Prophet has forbidden to his followers. Pardon me, Dilah, my beloved; They shall never again profane thy name, and I call Allah to witness that they shall not have thine image!"

The last two sentences were spoken so low that they escaped Montruel's ear, and he was so used to the Moslem's murmured utterances of the names "Allah" and "Dilah" that he paid little attention.

The Syrian drew a curtain round the statue, and closed it with loving care.

"You've not told me yet how you propose to gain access to the Princess Ingeburge!" said Montruel.

At the name of Ingeburge a creaking sound was heard behind the partition which faced outside and overlooked the great doorway. Mahmoud listently intently, but without losing his presence of mind, but Montruel started violently and made for the window, saying nervously:

"Is it possible that anyone can have overheard us?"

"Look out, and satisfy yourself."

Montruel stretched half his body, with great difficulty, through the window and carefully looked about him. There was not a human being nearer than the occasional passers-by in the streets far beneath them, for the precincts of the cathedral were still deserted, and on the scaffolding

Lay as one dead at the feet of the veiled statue.

immediately below there lay only the many-shaped stones, some waiting to be carved and others ready to be fitted into their resting places.

"There's no one up here, so far as I can see," he said, drawing his head in and carefully closing the rickety shutters.

"And is it difficult to get into the Abbey where Queen Ingeburge is confined?" asked the Moslem meditatively.

"Almost impossible."

"Even for you, the King's favourite?"

"Even for me."

"They tell me there is a hospital attached to the Abbey?"

"So there is," replied Montruel, eagerly catching at the idea. Then his face clouded again as he added:

"But you are not ill."

"No, but I can fall ill."

"It's no use pretending—" began Montruel.

"I said nothing about pretending," replied Mahmoud drily; "I said fall ill. Now, listen carefully to me and don't miss a word that I speak. In another moment I shall be lying there, at your feet, in a state of unconsciousness, without speech, sight, or movement. You will fetch the first masons you can find and tell them to put me on a stretcher, then, I think," he added with a sardonic smile, "your powerful influence will be able to gain admittance to the hospital for a dying man?"

Montruel looked at him in speechless wonder, and before he could find words to reply, the Syrian had drawn a small phial from his vest and had placed it to his lips. In a moment his words were fulfilled, and after a slight convulsive movement he lay as one dead at the foot of the veiled statue.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

You Can't Afford

to be without

Antiseptic.
Pure.
Preserves Food and Milk.
Stops Smells.
Arrests Decay.
Purifies everything.
Invaluable for the Bath and Toilet.
For Rinsing and Cleansing.

By Special Appointment — Makers to Her Majesty.

THE PATENT BORAX CO. LTD., LADYWOOD, BIRMINGHAM.
LONDON DEPOT: 129 HIGH HOLBORN.
Grocers, Oilmen, and Stores keep it

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

Devonshire Cream

(REALLY GENUINE.

In Patent Air-tight Tins.

Quarter Pound 10d.
Half Pound... 1s. 4d.
One Pound ... 2s. 4d.

(including Tin and Postage).

MRS. CONYERS, MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

£20 Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (250 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

DR MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL SOAP

Prepared with Arsenic, Zinc, and other Ingredients as a beautifier of Skin and Complexion

Madame PATTI says: "Most Excellent."

6d. and 1s.

Eradicates Spots and all Imperfections.

Of all Chemists, etc., or post free from S. HARVEY Ltd., 5 Denman Street, London Bridge, S.E.

CYCLE DEPOTS

High-class Selection of GENTS', LADIES', & JUVENILE CYCLES.

From £3 Cash, or on Easy Terms 10/- Monthly.

Lists Post Free.

Head Depôt: 52 to 55 Blackfriars Road, London, S.E.

RIDING SCHOOLS
BEST IN LONDON.
Practical Tuition until Perfect, 10/6. Single Lesson, 2/-.

Purchasers Taught Free.

Open 9 till 9.

West End Branch: 124 King's Road, Sloane Square, S.W.

CYCLEDOM LTD.

No Beauty Without White Teeth.

DR. EMY'S ALBAZENE.

THE PUREST AND MOST ELEGANT DENTIFRICE IN THE WORLD.

TO KEEP YOUR TEETH SOUND KEEP THEM CLEAN.

Absolutely Uninjurious.

In boxes, 1s., of all Chemists, or Post Free from THE ALBAZENE COMPANY, 276 STRAND.

Digitized by Google

Your Esteemed Inquiry Duly to Hand.

I hope my readers have taken to heart the appeal made to them on behalf of the Fresh Air Fund. I remember last year Short Stories contributed quite a large sum to the F.A.F., and was responsible for the happiness of several thousand children. This year I hope my readers will respond in the same generous-hearted manner. If you have not any spare cash by you, grub around and dig up some old toys, mail carts, bicycles or anything of that sort which might be either utilised by the children, or turned into cash.

P. T. E.—At the present moment there are 875 commissioned officers in the Army who have risen from the ranks.

Adam writes: "Are reptiles unknown in any country?"———Newfoundland is quite without reptiles; no snake, frog, toad, or lizard has ever been seen there.

Dissatisfied. — Perhaps a certain garden in China would suit you. It embraces an area of 50,000 square miles; is all meadowland, and filled with lakes, ponds, and canals.

C. T.—No, "odd or even" cannot be regarded as a modern game in any sense. We read that on one occasion during the Roman festivals of Quinquatria, Augustus sent his daughter 250 denarii so that she could play at "odd or even" and thus while away the weary hours. Which also proves that feminine gamblers are not peculiar to this fin de siècle.

Caterer.—The Sultan of Turkey spends more for his table than any other human being of either modern or ancient times, namely, £1,000 daily.

Q. A. would be glad to know if the use of artificial limbs was known to our ancestors———Yes, indeed, as far back as B.C. 700, when they were made use of by the Egyptians. They were made by the priests, who were the physicians of that early time.

D. D.—The chloride, bromide, and iodide of nitrogen are the most powerful explosives known, but their instability is so marked that they are useless. A mere jar will send off the chloride of nitrogen with fearful violence.

L. L.—Barristers' wigs are made from horsehair, most of which is imported from China and South America. The discomfort of wearing these wigs during hot weather is not so great as you would imagine, for they are quite light. A junior's wig weighs but two and a quarter ounces, and the price has always been six guineas; the wig of the Lord Chief Justice, however, turns the scale at five ounces, and costs twelve guineas.

B. Haslan.—The annual cost of clothing the Life Guards is given as £7 9s. 3d. for each man. The infantry of the line are turned out at £2 17s. 2d.; and the Highlander, with his feathery cap and tartan kilt, costs £3 16s. 5d.

Abstainer.—Hot milk is a recognised drink in some of the German cafés. It is served in a cup with a saucer, and two pieces of sugar always accompany it.

Curious writes: "I have seen it stated that a single fox skin has fetched as much as £200. This must be a mistake."———It is not the Reynard of our nursery days that is meant, Curious; it is the black fox of Kamschatka. The skin of this animal, when dressed, becomes an attractive blue, and a single skin has been known to sell for the figure you mention. A pelisse worn by the Emperor Nicholas I., which was lined with the fur of the black fox, cost £2,000.

Tommy A.—The youngest Colonel in the British army is Colonel Wingate, R.A., who has not yet completed his thirty-seventh year.

Bee-keeper has hit upon what he considers a really good idea. He writes: "Why not train the honey bee to carry messages like the carrier pigeon? I have not worked the thing out thoroughly yet, but I am sure it can be done well."———Your idea is not new. Four or five years ago an English bee-keeper set to work to train bees for that purpose, but I have not heard that he was successful. His notion was to take the creature from the hive, stick to its little back a scrap of paper bearing a message in microscopic characters, and throw it into the air. Home it was to go, like the pigeon, but it would have this advantage over the bird, that it would probably not be seen in time of war, or if seen, would be very difficult to shoot.

B. T.—When the telephone wires are overland the rate of transmission is said to be about 16,000 miles a second; where the wires are through cables under the sea the speed is much less.

Glossy.—Yes, in spite of the unqualified condemnation of the mole by most of our farmers, it is a noteworthy fact that sheep thrive best in a pasture infested with these smooth-coated creatures. This is due to the better drainage of the land.

Pat.—During the past year nearly 60,000 acres have been reclaimed in Ireland from bog and marsh lands.

Carat.—The ruby in the centre of the Maltese Cross on the top of the British Crown is the stone given to the Black Prince by King Pedro of Castille after the battle of Najara. At the battle of Agincourt, King Henry V. of England wore it in his helmet.

Freedom wishes to know if negroes were ever sold as slaves in this country; and, if so, when the last sale occurred.———An extract from the Stamford Mercury of the 30th November, 1771, will answer both your questions. It runs: "At the sale of a gentleman's effects at Richmond, a negro boy was put up and sold for £32." That was probably the last sale of the kind in this country, for, in the following year, a judgment of the Court of King's Bench decided that slavery could not exist in England.

Milky.—The milk production of the chief European countries is estimated by a German statistician as follows, the figures representing millions of gallons: Germany, 2,843,600; France 2,023,400; Great Britain, 1,785,000; Austria, 1,661,400; Sweden, 441,550; Netherlands, 264,350; Denmark, 225,000; Belgium, 215,500; Switzerland, 211,800.

A. M.—A steeple is an odd place for a statue, but your friend is right in saying that a statue of one of our kings was placed upon the steeple of a London church. Mr. Hucker, a local brewer, presented to the Church of St. George's, Bloomsbury, an effigy of King George II., and it was placed in position on the steeple. That was about 165 years ago. This building is regarded, as far as its exterior is concerned, as the ugliest of its kind in the metropolis; the plan is said to have been suggested by Pliny's description of the tomb of Mausolus.

A. R. C. finds it difficult to imagine a poor peer; he thinks that when a nobleman is overtaken by poverty, he should drop the the title and settle down as a commoner.———This might be considered a great injustice to his children in the event of fortune smiling upon the family again. But in olden times poverty disqualified a peer from holding his position. In the reign of Edward IV. a Duke of Bedford was degraded on this account. The reason is set forth in the preamble of the Act: "Because it (poverty) causeth great extortion' etc., to the great trouble of all such places where the estate (of the impoverished peer) happens to be." There was a comparatively easy way of getting rich in those days.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vesicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. Taylor, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

From Rev. J. H. Burn. Deer Rectory, Mintlaw, Aberdeen, November 8th, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.

Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.

A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious, Non-Alcoholic Wine. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger Lemon, Orange, Blackberry etc.

YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

UPS AND DOWNS OF THE BAROMETER.

Whatever the cause may be, there is no doubt that the average output of human nature varies with the weather. When the barometer is high the community is cheerful. Old chronic maladies let up a little on the sufferers, as an obliging stranger might stoop and loosen one's overtight shoestring. Even pickpockets and politicians think seriously of earning an honest living. People who carry rusty old grudges in their hearts for years on end, are apt to think on bright days whether it wouldn't be better to patch things up and get on more endurable terms with their enemies. The city banker feels moved to give a halfpenny more to his bootblack, and the habitually courteous Englishman may gild his politeness with the ghost of a smile.

On the other hand, when the barometer goes down, the spirits of the people go down with it. Melancholia, like a black fog, begins to spread about, making those who are usually sad feel that the earth is but a graveyard, and turning the quips and quidities of the joker into verbal idiocies that make his friends want to kick him downstairs. It is nearly always during the prevalence of low barometer that the man with murder in his heart makes up his mind to do the dastardly deed, and the poor unfortunates who are tired of life conclude to make an end of it. And as to the influence of the weather on disease (almost any disease), it is very distinct and decided. It is the cold rainstorms that develop one's latent rheumatism, and make him feel like setting the house on fire, or blowing somebody up with dynamite.

Now, if the weather in the neighbourhood of Bury St. Edmunds had always been fine and dry and warm, Mr. George Garwood would never have had an attack of influenza. Not that influenza is really caused by bad weather, but it is brought out by it, just as rheumatism is, and pneumonia, and bronchitis, and consumption, and a lot of other ills which seem to lie inside of us waiting for some power to stir them up. But in the early part of 1891 there was plenty of bad weather, and hence it came to pass that Mr. Garwood had an experience of which he writes as follows:

"In the early part of 1891 I had an attack of influenza. After this I was never properly strong. I felt very languid and weakly, my breathing being short. I had a poor appetite, and the food I took gave me no strength.

"My legs were swollen, and I could barely get about, often being confined to bed. As time went on I gradually wasted away to a shadow. I had no pain, but a dreadful sinking, all-gone feeling. Friends who saw me thought I should never recover. I had a doctor, but his medicine did not help me. For over three years I continued in this weak state, when a friend told me how he had benefited by Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. I got a bottle of this medicine from Mr. Nice, grocer, Bury St. Edmunds, and after taking it felt stronger.

"I continued with it and gradually improved, and was able to get about. Since then, by taking an occasional dose, I keep in good health. You can make use of this statement as you like. (Signed) George Garwood, Horringer, near Bury St. Edmunds, May 13th, 1897."

Influenza has been epidemic often enough of late years in England to make its character familiar to a great number of people. It prevails nearly always in autumn, winter, or early spring, but never in summer. It is often followed by lingering bad health, which the sufferer is apt to attribute to influenza as a radical cause, as Mr. Garwood seems to have done. However, influenza is itself caused by a certain impurity in the blood, called by the medical writers a micro-organism, a term which means simply a ferment so minute as to be discernible only by the microscope.

As a matter of cold, plain fact, the actual cause of influenza, as of a majority of our best known diseases, is an impure state of the blood produced by fermented or partially digested food in the stomach and intestines, or, in other words, by indigestion, or dyspepsia continued for a considerable length of time. Dyspepsia and some of its frightful consequences, in Mr. Garwood's case, followed the attack of influenza, as he relates. But if he will cast his memory back, he will doubtless recall having been troubled with indigestion before the influenza, for Nature never reverses her processes. Mother Seigel's Syrup cured him by setting the digestive system in order, and driving the poison out of his blood. And if I were asked what is the best possible way of fortifying oneself against the mischievous effects of a low barometer, I should say, Keep your stomach strong and your blood clean by taking a dose of Mother Seigel's Syrup every time you don't feel quite right.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

GET A COPY OF "THE DAYDREAM LIBRARY." IT COSTS 2½d

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 486. FOR WEEK ENDING APRIL 23RD, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

"FROMMS"

"A COMPLETE FOOD" LANCET

FROMMS EXTRACT OF PURELY VEGETABLE ORIGIN

PHYSICIANS AND SCIENTISTS REPORT THAT

FROMMS EXTRACT IS A PERFECT FOOD FOR INFANTS AND INVALIDS AS WELL AS FOR THE STRONG AND HEALTHY.

HALF THE PRICE OF MEAT EXTRACTS.

SOLD BY CHEMISTS AND GROCERS

10/6 Allen Foster & Co 10/6

SOLE MAKERS OF THE 'ALFOSCO' COSTUMES

These charming costumes are recommended by thousands of delighted customers who acknowledge them to be GREATLY SUPERIOR in make, style, and value to any costumes they have ever seen at anything approaching the same prices.

Design No. 847. TEN-AND-SIXPENCE.

Design No. 340. TEN-AND-SIXPENCE.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO. have gained their pre-eminence among the costumiers of the world by combining the Highest Standard of Excellence with the lowest possible prices.

Design No. 340. 10/6. Design No. 340 consists of a Fashionable open-fronted jacket with velvet collar, and full well-made skirt; it is made in the ALLEN FOSTER Specialité Serge, unsurpassed for wear and durability. Costume complete, 10/6. Skirt only, 5/6.

This costume made in the new Venetian Cloth will be 13/6, or in the pretty Edinboro' Tweed, 18/6. This design made in White or Coloured Piqué, or Drill, 10/6; Skirt only, 5/6.

All Patterns and Particulars Post Free.

Design No. 847. Design No. 847 is in the Chesterfield shape; a splendid costume for 10/6, made in the Specialité Serge. This design made in White Pique, or Drill, will be 12/6. Patterns and Sketches Post Free.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO. are offering some very good bargains in Costume Skirts, in Tweeds, plain and fancy Alpacas, Mohairs, Serges, etc.; also some good lines in Ladies' Knickers. Regular stock sizes of Costumes are 34, 36, and 38in round bust under arms, the skirts being 38, 40, and 42in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra. Each Costume securely packed and sent carriage paid, 9d. extra; skirt only, 6d. extra. Please mention Short Stories.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., The London Manufacturers,
17 ROSCOE ST., GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

"Its food value is double that of Bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

will not only help to improve your digestion and consequently your health, but will also bring back that energetic and happy feeling of good health. Man does not live a natural life, so a good portion of a natural food, in the shape of HOVIS, at each meal will largely counteract the bad influence that modern life has upon the health and digestive organs. This is not an idle remark, but a proved statement, daily being verified.

HOVIS is baked and sold by all good class Bakers. No loaf genuine unless stamped HOVIS. 6d. and 1/- samples of Bread and Biscuits sent on receipt of stamps by

S. FITTON & SON, Millers, Macclesfield.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps.

ALEX. ROSS,
62, Theobald's Road, London.

Opposite Bedford Row.
(Est. 1850.)
Parcel free from observation

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates Free. Tobacconists Commencing. See Illustrated Guide (259 pages), 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000. Tobacconists Outfitting Company, 186 Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years' reputation). Mgr., H. Myers.

THE NEW LEMONADE
2 Gallons for 4½d.

Many people suffer from extreme thirst during the hot weather. Messrs. Foster Clark & Co. have supplied the want that has so long been felt by making a concentrated lemonade, which is far more economical than the ordinary lemonade. It is made from the finest lemons, and the great advantage is that it is partly manufactured in Italy, in the midst of the lemon orchards. The lemons are taken direct from the trees to the factory to commence their transformation into the Eiffel Tower Lemonade. You can get thirty-two tumblers (or two gallons) for fourpence halfpenny. If you cannot get it from your grocer, send sixpence to G. Foster Clark & Co., No. 115 Eiffel Tower Factory, Maidstone, Sole manufacturers of "Eiffel Tower Lemonade."

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,
188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.
63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

Bilious & Nervous Disorders,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.

Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.

A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious, Non-Alcoholic Wine.
Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

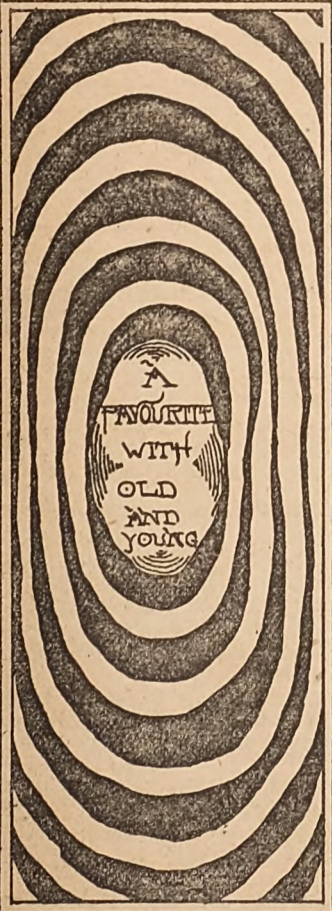
MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger Lemon, Orange, Blackberry etc.

YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON



No. 486.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending April 23rd, 1898.

ONLY A HYDRO FRIENDSHIP.

HARRY MELVILLE'S first opinion of English girls was not very flattering. He said they were either too familiar or to stand-offish. They either giggled and simpered and flirted, or else they were guarded and distant. He liked a girl who could be jolly and natural, and he said, for these qualities, there were none to equal the Australian girls.

He had come over on a pleasure trip, and, after staying a month in London, went to a Hydropathic Establishment in Yorkshire by way of a change.

It was the holiday season, and the place was very full of visitors, dancing and festivities being the order of the hour. The first evening he kept to himself and took stock generally.

He was a bit of a philosopher in his way, and fond of watching his fellow-creatures from his own standpoint, and drawing certain conclusions and theories from what he saw. And as he had lived thirty-six years, he had sifted the human race pretty thoroughly, and flattered himself that he understood it, and could generally read his companions like a book.

When dinner was over, he went at once to the billiard room, and settled himself in one of the most comfortable easy chairs with his pipe, and lazily "took in" the men of the house.

There was, of course, the usual collection one meets at these gatherings, but this was Harry Melville's first

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

experience of an English Hydro, and he was rather interested. He noted the two or three frivolous young men who made perpetual efforts to be funny; the middle-aged ones who were more impressed with their own importance than anything else in the world; the old ones who thought all the young ones foolish; and the bores who talked incessantly of their gout and their doctor's directions. He was not particularly impressed with anyone, but he liked best a trio of young men who had evidently come to have a spree and made no secret of it.

They were seated on a window-ledge, swinging their feet just before him, and now and then one or other convulsed his two companions by a lively sally. Harry could not help smiling secretly himself, for their laughter had such a genuine ring in it, and their high spirits were so palpable, that he found them infectious.

They did not appear disposed to bother their heads about any of the other men, but passed remarks on the players and audience, which were certainly humourous, if not flattering.

Presently he heard one of them remark:

"Let's go to the drawing-room."

"What! getting impatient already," said another. "My dear fellow, it isn't ten minutes since you parted!"

"It's a lifetime," said the first speaker, with a deep-drawn sigh, "and then she only looked at me across a sea of serviettes and glasses, half round a mulberry bush."

"Rats, man! she was looking at me," said the third man. "I caught her eye under the lower branch."

"That was the other eye," said the second speaker, "Chip was gazing into the left orb."

"Well, let's go and see who she looks at now," said the one designated Chip. "She's sure to be in the winter garden, and it'll soon be time to dance," whereupon they all three got up and sauntered away.

At their respective offices they were known as Tom Walton, Frank Deed, and Philip James, but to each other they were Chum and Chappie and Chip.

Chum was the eldest, and sometimes he endeavoured to keep the others in order, but his success was not striking. Chip was the youngest, and he was very boyish. His fund of spirits was unlimited, and he was everybody's favourite. Chappie was the best-looking and the lady's man. He was always in love with somebody, but as he fell out as easily as he fell in, his two friends never thought anything of it. However, he was always the first to discover all about the fair ladies of the Hydro, and before dinner was half over the first night he was lost in admiration of a merry blue-eyed girl at an opposite table.

His subsequent behaviour had been a source of great amusement to the other two, who had promptly made a point of requiring his attention every time the blue eyes looked their way.

Moreover, Chip was absolutely certain she only looked at him, while Chum declared he had had an actual smile all to himself.

Harry Melville watched them go, then he dragged himself up and prepared to follow.

He was a very tall man, and as he drew himself to his full height, and stood astride on the hearth, many curious eyes glanced at him. He had the colonial air of careless indifference about him, and rather the appearance of a distinguished stranger. His complexion was very dark, and his eyes bright and penetrating like a bird's, while he had a habit of half closing them, while watching anything closely.

"Have a fifty up?" asked one of the frivolous young men, rather familiarly.

"Thank you, no," replied Melville coolly, and took a long whiff at his cigar; then he sauntered to the door.

In the hall he stood on the doorstep, and looked out into the night.

When he sauntered into the ball-room twenty minutes later, after a passing glance into the drawing-room, he first of all looked round for the trio. He was amused to find them all three, lolling in various postures, about the owner of the blue eyes, who was leaning back in a large armchair, looking considerably amused.

She had evidently been dancing with one of the three, but was nothing loth to do the sitting out with the whole trio.

Melville took a seat near the group, and, as usual, indulged in a little quiet observation.

"My programme for to morrow," he heard her say, "is golf, 10.0 to 1.0; lunch, 1.30; cycling 2.30 to 4.30, frivolling, 4.30 to 5.30; then dress, then dinner, then dance, then sleep."

"What energy!" gasped Chappie.

"Sounds like an automatic machine," said Chip. "Do you permit anyone to follow you through the programme?"

"Oh, dear no! No followers allowed," and she laughed merrily.

"Oh, come," said Chum, "you must at least let us watch the golf."

"Well, I'll perhaps consider it. I'm going to hunt up my brother now; he's been in the smoke-room quite long enough, and he ought to come and dance. Can I get any of you any partners?"

"Thanks awfully. I should like to be introduced to that girl in black," said Chum.

"Come along, then," and she led the way. As she passed Melville's chair, she glanced at him casually, while still talking to her companion.

The indifference of her glance pleased him. She evidently was no more interested in him than the rest of the community, in spite of his prepossessing appearance, and while it did not flatter his vanity, it pleased his taste.

"No followers allowed," he repeated to himself, with inward amusement, and turned his head to watch the dancers.

He could not see them very well, so he changed his seat to one in a dim corner of the winter garden, which had just been vacated by another tall dark man. He had his back to a side entrance, and presently he heard the door swung open, and the ringing voice he was already familiar with, say: "He can't be in here."

"Yes, in that corner, I saw him five minutes ago," said another voice. "See, there he is."

Immediately the door swung to, a quick footstep sounded behind him, and before he had time to turn, a pair of cool, soft hands, were over his eyes and a voice said:

"Who is it, you bad boy? I've been hunting for you everywhere. How dare you be so lazy!"

"Allow me," he remarked politely, and the hands were suddenly withdrawn, with an exclamation of horror.

"Goodness!" she gasped, and then began to laugh.

"I thought you were my brother," she said. "I'm so sorry. He was sitting here a moment ago, and you looked exactly like him. Whatever will you think of me?"

Digitized by Google

"Nothing very dreadful, I can assure you," he replied in his slightly drawling fashion. "Perhaps I can understudy your brother still further."

"I was going to fetch him to dance," she said, in her straight way.

Melville was, as a rule, too lazy to dance, but he thought he should like to have a turn with her, because she reminded him of the Australian girls, so he got up at once.

"I think I can manage that part of the programme," he said.

"Yes, do. Come along. I'll introduce you to a very good dancer."

"But I thought you were to be the partner?"

"I? Oh, I'm engaged for the next two," and without giving him a chance to remonstrate, she walked him off to another young lady.

Melville felt victimised, and was very disgusted, but he was too true a gentleman to show it. However, he did not risk any further encounters, but went off to the smoke-room, where he was joined at a late hour by the trio. They appeared to be in higher spirits than ever, and began talking everybody over. Most of their remarks were more candid than flattering, but it was very evident one fair lady was in high favour.

"I call her A 1," said Chip, taking a deliberate aim at a bronze ornament with a penwiper.

"Well you needn't throw the furniture about if she is," replied Chum.

"The latest fashion in emphasising" was the laughing reply; "didn't you know a fashionable preacher threw his glass of water at the congregation the other day, to impress his remarks?"

"Ask old Chappie what he thinks about her. I say, Chappie, you've got it pretty badly this time, I believe," and his blue eyes sparkled mischievously. "Better try Beecham's Pills at once. They're for all ills, and prevention is better than cure."

"Chuck it!" ejaculated Chappie; and sank further down into his roomy armchair.

"What! is it as bad as all that?" continued the incorrigible Chip. "Well, I admire your taste, if that's any consolation. I'm a bit hard hit myself, and old Chum hasn't got off scot free."

"I like that little girl in black," remarked Chum.

"So do I," answered Chip, "but, at the same time, we all know she isn't a patch on Miss Willard. I say, Chappie, old boy, cheer up! I saw her admiring your back hair."

"I expect she discovered how thin it was getting," said Chappie, from the depths of the chair.

"Then I've no doubt she'd think you wanted someone to look after you. Never say die; you'll be all right in a day or two, and Chum and I will help you through the wedding."

At this point Melville got up and stretched himself, and Chip immediately offered him a cigarette. He took it and afterwards came down from his pedestal and joined in their conversation.

The following morning he arrived downstairs early and sauntered into the billiard-room.

He was rather surprised to hear the balls going, and still more so when he found one of the players was Miss Willard, the heroine of the previous evening's conversation and his own little adventure.

She greeted him frankly across the table and then ran up a break of sixteen. He offered himself as marker and was astonished at her skill. He was also particularly struck by the quiet, matter-of-fact way in which she played, and her power of thorough concentration upon the matter she happened to have in hand.

Just as the game concluded the trio strolled in, and in two minutes she was sitting in a window seat with them, entertaining them hugely and being hugely entertained in return.

He watched them lazily, and came to the conclusion that one of the three meant winning her, but he was undecided which. He thought Chip was too young, Chum not quite smart enough, and Chappie a bit too dandified. However, the idea amused him, so he mentally backed Chip, and prepared to get three days' good entertainment out of them.

He did not see much of them during the day, but, in the interval between tea and dinner, he discovered them all four in the winter garden, amusing themselves with tricks. He wondered if any of the trio had managed to dispense with the other two yet, and how it was the three butterflies still kept to the same flower.

Later on he asked her to dance and was well pleased with her performance.

"Once more you remind me of the Australian girls," he said calmly; "they are beautiful dancers."

She looked up at him frankly.

"How else do I remind you of them?" she asked.

"Oh, in various ways."

"For instance?"

"You are very lively and fresh and free."

"Are Australian girls always like that?"

"Very nearly. They don't meet troubles half way. They enjoy life."

"Ah!" and she paused.

Suddenly she turned to him.

"Do Australian men generally amuse themselves by taking stock of their fellow-creatures all day long?"

"Is that meant for a rebuke?"

"Not exactly, but you rather amuse me by doing nothing but look on, and measure the rest of us."

"Human nature is the most interesting study of all."

"Yes? Are you proficient at it?"

"I think so. I have made it a speciality."

"Tell me something about myself. Anything you like; I won't be offended."

"You are very light-hearted."

She smiled a little.

"Is that because I laugh?" she questioned.

"It is the sound of your laugh chiefly."

"Yes, go on."

"Perhaps you would rather I didn't. I never flatter."

"I don't mind. I prefer candour infinitely."

"Well, then, you are rather thoughtless and perhaps a little hasty. A little down on other people who do not reach your standard. You have not had much trouble, therefore you are not a very good sympathiser."

A strange expression flitted across her eyes, but she only said: "How interesting. Tell me some more to-morrow. I must go for the next dance now."

He watched her, and somehow, a new sensation of distrust crossed his mind, but he thrust it aside and went back to the smoke-room.

The next day he observed with interest that Chip was gaining ground and Chappie growing despondent.

Digitized by Google

Chum had evidentally given up and wisely transferred his attentions to the little dark girl. Miss Willard, he observed, played tennis with Chip all the morning and afterwards sat in a shady arbour with him. They seemed so happy together that he believed his money was as good as won, and he wondered if she would find time to continue their interrupted conversation again.

In the afternoon a char-a-banc drive was arranged, and, on the return journey, a mere coincidence placed him beside her. She talked to him of many things in her usual bright fashion, and made him tell her a lot about Australia. Her depth of thought and insight surprised him, and he felt still further persuaded that Chip was too young and frivolous for her.

The latter came to help her down at the door, and acted with a certain air of possession, which she did not appear to resent, and Melville half-decided it was a foregone conclusion.

Before she vanished, however, she turned to him again, and said with a bright smile. "You will be able to tell me a lot more to-night Mr. Melville, as you know me still better now. I am quite looking forward to it."

He stood still and watched her walk away feeling a little puzzled.

Did he know her, or did he not?

Anyhow he was sorry she had taken to Chip, for he felt convinced they were unsuited to each other. He was sorry she had gone off with him, too, for there was no one else he cared to talk to much, and somehow he always felt more contented when she was near.

He was glad when the time came for their conversation, and as they strolled out on to the terrace together, he regarded her with quiet criticism.

She was looking extremely well, and as bright and merry as ever. There was a little change about her mouth however, only he did not see it.

"I feel as if you were my father confessor," she said, laughing. "I wonder what you are going to tell me to-night, about my sins and shortcomings."

He smiled, too.

"That isn't a fair way to put it," he said. "You know you asked me."

"Of course I did, and I am most interested. I want you to tell me exactly what you think. You finished last night by saying I had not had much trouble. Suppose you define that a little more clearly. What sort of a life do you think I have led?"

"A very sunny, happy one," he answered at once. "There has been little enough in it to keep you awake at nights. I do not mean that you are frivolous, only gay and happy. I think if trouble came you would face it bravely and fearlessly."

"Do you think I could hide it?" she asked, looking across the garden.

"I doubt it. You have such high spirits, that anything to damp them would be bound to shew itself."

"You don't think I could act?"

"Hardly. I question if you are thoughtful enough. The only thing is, I have noticed you have the power of concentrating your whole mind on the question of the moment."

A slow smile played about her features, and again that sudden self-distrust moved him.

"Sometimes I am accused of being bitter and sarcastic," she said; "how do you account for that?"

"Possibly through the books you have read."

"I see."

There was a long pause and still she looked across the garden. He watched her, and something in her quiet pose and steady gaze attracted him strangely. She seemed to have changed suddenly, and to have the look of a woman who had felt deeply, but learnt the folly of showing it.

He felt as if he could have gone on looking at her indefinitely.

And still she was silent, and still he watched her; and a strong desire grew up in him to tell her that Chip wasn't good enough for her.

He wanted to explain that he was a real good fellow, but not the man to satisfy her.

Then he laughed at himself.

"What had it to do with him?" he asked, and shrugged his shoulders carelessly. "Love was mostly a farce and marriage a lottery, and she was sure to find it out some day, sooner or later."

"Am I right?" he asked at last, with a smile.

She turned and looked at him critically, as if reading how far she might trust him.

Evidently what she saw satisfied her, for she replied very quietly, as she looked away again.

"No; quite wrong."

He looked surprised, but waited for her to speak again.

"Are you leaving to-morrow?" she asked.

"Yes; I think so."

"Then, in all probability, we shall never meet again."

He hesitated a moment, he had scarcely thought about it before.

"I suppose so," he said at last.

"Then I don't know that I need mind telling you why you are wrong. I feel sure I can trust you to guard my confidence."

"You can," he answered simply.

"It will perhaps help you to judge better in future," she went on, then paused a few moments.

"It isn't much," she said at last, "at least it won't seem much to anyone else. It began seven years ago, when I was nineteen. I mean my troubles began then; just at the time when a girl usually expects to have some of her best years. Three months after I left school my mother broke a blood vessel and went out of her mind. I nursed her for two years, during which time she could never be left, night or day. I don't know if you know anything about these cases, but they are among the most pitiful things in life. It broke my father's heart, and I worshipped him. The invalid turns against her nearest and dearest, and he was not strong and well enough to cope with the bitterness of it. When she died, and I was free, I thought to devote every hour to making up to him a little for the past two years, but he was killed in a railway accident four months afterwards."

She paused, and he thought she caught her breath to steady her voice.

Presently she went on quietly: "We were left very poor, and I had to go out as a governess. I won't pretend that I liked it, because I didn't; I hated it. I had to be in London, and I love the country with all my heart. But I stuck to it for four years, and then Phil managed to offer me a home."

She paused again, then added: "If you did not know it before, you know now, that there are some people who have seen so much real trouble that they can take the little inevitable cares too lightly to seem to notice them at all."

Digitized by Google

He looked at her with a new admiration in his keen eyes. The moon came out from behind a cloud, and lit up her face. In the pale light she looked strangely beautiful to him, and there was that in her expression which moved him as no woman's face had ever moved him before. He had never been really in love in his life, but in that deep moment he knew that he wanted to fold her to his heart.

Yet he only said simply: "You are very plucky and you have taught me a lesson."

She laughed softly, though the conversation had brought a shadow into her eyes that he had not seen there before.

"And you have encouraged me," she said, "by paying such a tribute, however unintentional, to my success; for I would not like anything there may be in my life ever to damp anyone else's for a moment. We part to-morrow as mutual benefactors, which is as it should be."

Harry Melville looked across the garden in his turn, and there was a long pause.

"We part to-morrow," she had said, and the words seemed to ring in his ears.

"Why should they part?" he asked. "Why should not he be the one to make up to her for those sad years?"

He looked into her face, and the longing strengthened within him to take her in his arms.

He was about to speak, when she intercepted him by saying with a little smile: "My clouds have not all blown by yet, but I hope they will eventually."

"I hope so, too," he said, with an earnestness that made her start, for hitherto he had been usually flippant or callous with her.

She looked at him, and something in his eyes made her turn a little pale.

He saw it, and asked suddenly, in a voice that was new to him. "Is there anything now?"

"Yes; I have a lover and we are separated," she said, simply; and there was a long silence between them.

"I don't know why I should confide in you like this," she continued presently; "but somehow you draw me out whether I wish or not. I suppose it is because there is something so strong and sure about you."

He sat with his face half-turned from her, looking straight before him, and did not reply.

"He is a great friend of Chip's," she went on; "we found it out the day after he came, and that is why we have been so friendly together. He is in Australia now."

"You are not wearing a ring," he said questioningly, in a forced voice.

"No. It is because his people won't acknowledge it, nor mine, so we can't be engaged openly, but it doesn't make much difference. He is very poor, you know, but I don't mind. I shall go out to him as soon as he is able to have me."

"Have you been engaged long?"

"Five years!"

"Five years?" he repeated incredulously.

"Yes;" and she smiled softly. "We may have to wait another five, but if it were ten or fifteen, I should still wait. I know you don't believe much in love, and that kind of thing, but I don't like you any the less. Probably it is not your fault, and I always feel sorry for people who think like that, because of what they miss. Don't be alarmed, I'm not going to give you a lengthy, sentimental description of what Tom and I feel, only I can assure you it's something that more than makes up for every year of weary waiting."

He turned to her again and saw her with the love-light shining in her eyes; and his face was very white.

Then he looked into the night, and a sudden awakening came to him. His past life flashed through his mind, and in that brief space he probed into it corners, and realised, as he had never done before, how empty and hollow and unreal it had been.

With all his theorising and philosophising, what did he actually know of the passions of the human heart, compared to this girl beside him?

With all his time and opportunities, what memories had he, either of joys or sorrows, to keep his heart warm in the winter of his years?

He had been content with a cut and dried definition of Love and scoffed at anything that outstepped the limits he assigned.

And now? . . . .

Now he knew, what no amount of reasoning could have taught him. He knew that love is not a formula nor a theory, nor anything that can be understood by thinking about it, but something to be truly known by experience only—a good thing that comes into some lives and makes them beautiful.

A step on the terrace disturbed them and Yetta turned quickly.

"It is Chip looking for me," she said, "I must go."

Then she rested her hand for a moment on his arm.

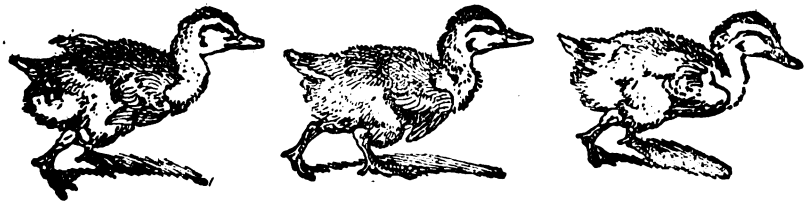
"I have enjoyed our conversation very much," she said. "Thank you for being so sympathetic. I am sorry we must lose sight of each other so soon, but it is generally the way with Hydro friendships.

"I hope some day soon you'll prove for yourself that there is a love that is worth waiting years for."

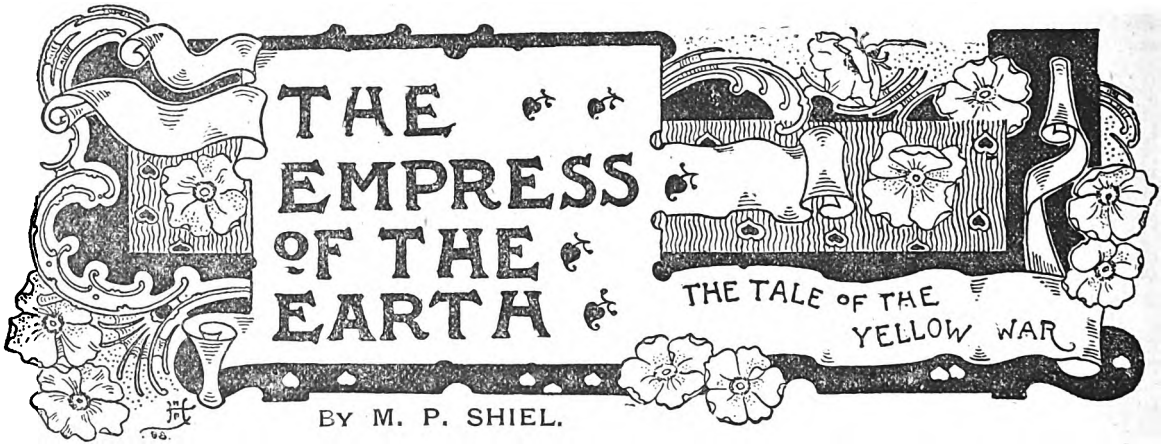
"I have proved it," he said, half to himself, and Yetta wondered as she turned away.

She did not know that that proving had been in the last half-hour.

GERTRUDE PAGE.



Digitized by Google



By M. P. SHIEL.

SUMMARY.

Yen How, a shrewd Chino-Japanese doctor, falls desperately in love with Ada Seward, an English nursemaid. His advances are rudely repulsed, however; but he leaves England with a fixed determination to win the object of his affections in spite of all opposition.

Yen How goes first to Japan as a Japanese, where he becomes intimate with the prime minister, Marquis Ito, to whom he proposes a league between the two races of China and Japan, and an immense scheme by which Europe may be reduced to a waste, and China become the Empress of the Earth with scarcely an effort of her own. He then goes to China and becomes virtual ruler of that nation. In the course of a conversation which he has with Li Hung Chang he unfolds his scheme for setting all the European Powers against Great Britain. After the slaughter China will step in and conquer the remnants of the armies.

War is declared between Great Britain and France and Germany and Russia. The British fleet meets the Allied ships in Mid-channel and a battle ensues. Although the British vessels are outnumbered by two to one, the superior tactics of the British, and of John Hardy, a consumptive midshipman and a genius for modern warfare (who escapes on the Jupiter from the fight, and rams all the transports some distance away), result in the destruction of the Allied fleet. Hardy is ill for a time, and on his recovery decides to go to China. Before going, however, he endeavours to obtain a promise of marriage from Miss Bosey Jay, a young lady artist, but is refused. He goes to the Palace Theatre of Varieties, and there meets Ada Seward, the nursemaid with whom Yen How is in love. She sends him home intoxicated, and a week later he is in Paris, where he has a row with Edropol, the Bulgarian duellist. John, however, does not fight, but goes to Berlin, and from thence to Petersburg. Here he sends a letter to Bobbie, his old servant in England, and starts out for China by the overland route. Yen How organises an army of 400,000,000 souls—men, women, and children—to overrun Europe when the time is ripe. He is sitting in his garden when the capture of John Hardy is announced to him.

John is brought before Yen and they quarrel. The former fires at the Chinaman, but the bullet strikes a breast-plate of steel and does no harm. John is seized and thrown into prison. Meanwhile, the British China squadron, failing to obtain the promised assistance from Japan, engages the Allied fleet, and defeats it, but at a cost of all the ships but three, which are shortly afterwards chased and attacked by the Japanese fleet. Affairs now assume a serious aspect in Europe, and the British rout the Germans at New Brandenburg with a loss of 150,000 men. Foo-chee loves Ah-lin (they are in the same Chinese regimental company), but the latter is loved by Sin-wan, a warder of the Imperial Prison. Ni-ching-tang is Foo-chee's father (although Sin-wan does not know this), and one of the scullions of Yen How's kitchen. John Hardy is cruelly tortured by Sin-wan, acting under Yen How's instructions. Ni-ching-tang, Foo-chee's father, discovers that Sin-wan has murdered his son and Ah-lin. He then goes in revenge and drugs Sin-wan, and enables John Hardy to escape in a boat to Kiao-Chau. The British warship Iphigenia, which escaped from the Japanese ships in the last battle, is run ashore at Kiao-Chau, now occupied by the Chinese. The British take possession of the fort and hold it against the Celestials.

CHAPTER XXI.

"What a Face!"

During the afternoon of the seventh day after leaving Tungchow, John Hardy, hugging the coast, arrived in the locality of Kiao-chau harbour. The solitary helmsman had made a good voyage, being familiar with the ocean-winds and their moods, and having an old comradeship with the brine and spray. However, he had several times got wet, and every few minutes now was shaken by a moist cough, which was alternated by rather frequent vomitings due to a constant sickness of the stomach.

He was being wafted along by a gentle breeze, when he spied a portion of a ship's bow above the thin, inaudible fringe of foam which lined the coast afar. And at once, noting its course, he put out further to sea, and lay to ten miles from land.

He guessed at once from the fragmentary look of the wreck that the Chinese had been busy with the English sailors, of whom he had been told. At eleven o'clock, taking advantage of the night wind, he turned eastward, and ran in for the harbour. Unfortunately, all he knew about it was its locality, as the map with which he was provided gave him no details of its features. Ni-ching-tang, indeed, had told him that the Englishmen were upon an island in the harbour; but when he entered the basin he saw no island, for in the darkness and distance the contours of the island, which, on the east, is near to the mainland, seemed part of it.

The moon was young, and only just rising; it was a night of stars; things near were visible, things remote lay in a mystery of shadow.

John Hardy ran his bow gently upon a gravelly bottom near the east entrance of the harbour, intending to mount the rising ground and search for the island. For what he knew he might be already on it.

In this way, he came to the east fort, now mostly in ruins. He passed through a broken arch, and saw guns lying at random in the court. He examined the battlemented square, and entered what remained of the heavily-armed works. But there was nowhere any sign of a human being.

His search was conducted with extreme caution. With the same care he descended once more to his boat, pushed her off, and made for the opposite side, where he saw a stone-work outline against the sky. Here the ascent was steeper; he scrambled up a pebbly footpath, scraped through some scrub, and entered the fortification. There was less marked destruction on this than at the east fort. He examined scarp, and counterscarp, glacis, and donjon, and saw no one. Then he entered an inner court, where there was a low building with small, barred windows, the barracks and mess-room of the former garrison. And in three of the windows near the ground he saw light.

He fell to his hands and knees, and crept toward one of the openings. As he drew nearer he could hear a sound of laughter, and someone protesting in harsh gibberish. He knew now that he was among Chinese. But he continued to advance, eager to acquire some sort of knowledge of the facts of his situation. He reached the window, lifted his head, and peeped in.

The room which he saw was long, and surrounded by beds at regular intervals. On most of these lay Chinamen asleep, three only were intently playing some sort of dice-game at a table on which was a lantern.

Digitized by Google

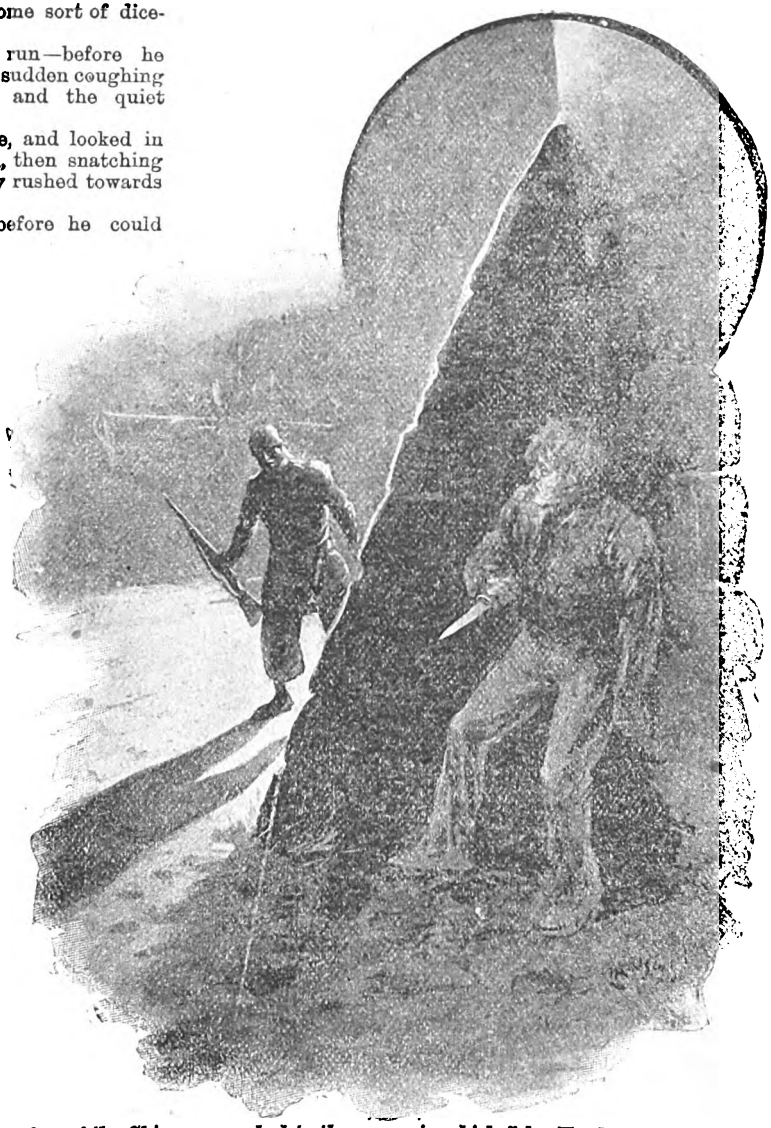
As Hardy looked—before he could run—before he could cover his mouth—he was seized by a sudden coughing which sounded through the still night and the quiet room.

The three Chinamen sprang up at once, and looked in amazement in the direction of the sound, then snatching three rifles, and making a great noise, they rushed towards the door.

Hardy, too, was off, running; but before he could cross the breadth of the yard, the three men were out of the door. At the moment, he was in the shadow of the buttress of a barbacan, and he knew that if he left it to cross the strip of moonlight which lay along the exit from the yard, he must be seen. He stood still, therefore, crouching in the deepest shade.

The three, in a state of great excitement, ran towards the spot which he had just left, and finding nothing, scattered through the small yard in flurried search about the deep embrasures of arches, and the black shade of turret or buttress. Their eager examination was disorganised, the second again scrutinising a spot which the first had just searched, and the third, perhaps, following suit.

It was all over in the space of certainly not more than a minute. One of the Chinamen rushed to the corner in which John Hardy crouched, his hands out groping, and in a few seconds he was followed by the second, and in a few seconds more by the third. And they dropped like a line of little wooden soldiers, upon which one blows obliquely, one after the other, stiffly, at full length. The knife which Ni-ching-tang had given to John Hardy was no sooner out of the first than it was in the second, and instantly afterwards in the third. Before the startled sleepers within had rubbed their eyes, sprung to their feet, and snatched their weapons, he had diminished the population of China by three. It was the first-fruits of his vengeance.



One of the Chinamen rushed to the corner in which John Hardy crouched.

Now, meantime, was his chance to run, and he ran. Thirty Chinese soldiers, however, were after him, and one saw him as he slipped through the exit from the inner to the outer court-yard. This man raised the hue and cry, and it became a question of running, first towards the outer exit, and secondly through the scrub, and down the steep hill-side, guns popping all the while, and the Chinamen screaming in an ecstasy of excitement.

Behind the rising ground, on the general level of the mainland, there was a camp of a half-regiment of the old regular army of China under the command of a Japanese lieutenant; and these, hearing the firing, quickly set off at the double up the gentle incline at the back of the fort.

John Hardy was saved from the shots of the thirty on the top of the plateau by doubling and bending among the scrub, but by the time he had plunged and scrambled to the bottom of the steep path, bullets were whistling round him. The moon, however, had now become obscured, and the riflemen, as they ran, shot at random.

There lay his boat, her prow just touching and swaying in the gravel. If he could push her off, and gain the shelter of the house-deck, he would be safe. Two of the Chinamen, however, who had not slackened their speed in order to shoot, were near upon him; and when he leapt to his bow, and put out the oar to shove off, one of them, and immediately the other, took hold of it. A short struggle ensued. One of the Chinamen, struck by a flying bullet in the nape, relaxed his hold and dropped; at the same time John Hardy's power of grasp failed, and the oar slipped from his grasp; but so suddenly that the pulling Chinaman slid on his heels, and fell backward into the surf. Hardy was quick to leap upon him, buried his knife in his bosom, regained the oar, and the next moment had the Taku afloat.

He hurried astern, trimmed the sail, and half sheltering himself under the deck, contrived to steer, making further up the harbour, where he now knew the island must be.

In a minute or two the boat became the aim of the three hundred or more additional rifles which had now arrived from the plain. They riddled her hull and sail, but she kept on her way till there came a tremendous boom of big

Digitized by Google

Two men had him by the throat.

cannon from a quite unexpected quarter, and suddenly the splintered Taku dipped her bow, and disappeared in five fathoms of water.

The Chinese, apparently, had no heavy guns mounted ready for use at the fort, for they fired none; but the English had: and when the sentries reported a daring Chinese junk approaching the island, she was fired at; and she promptly sank, riddled by her foes, shattered by her friends.

In all the harbour of Kaio-Chau no Chinese craft had dared for weeks to appear.

Happily the outward bulge of the island was discernible at the moment when the Taku went down, and not more than 500 yards distant at its nearest point. John Hardy began to swim: The Chinese, astonished at the sinking by the white men of a boat containing a white man, ceased firing, though a wanton shot or two dropped about the swimmer.

Panting hard, he reached the rear point of the island, where a sparse growth of thin-trunked plane trees made a wood to the water's edge. And he had hardly trailed his dripping form out of the surf, when two men, springing from nowhere, had him by the throat, and he was on his back with a pistol at his temple.

John Hardy said to himself:

"They will do well."

And he added aloud:

"I am an Englishman."

There was a close scrutiny of his face, a chuckle, a few exclamations, and he was on his feet.

The search-light apparatus of the fort was out of order. Till he spoke, no one on the island had had the faintest suspicion of the truth.

In ten minutes he was in a lighted room, with nearly all the hundred and fifty gathered round him, hands on knees. There were far more questions than answers. Chatter, chatter went the tongue of Jack.

"But you have not told us, sir, who you are," said Murray.

"My name is John Hardy," he replied, "and I am come to China in search of my ship, the Powerful. Can you give me any news of her whereabouts?"

"Oh, Lord!" cried a young blue-jacket, George Liversey, "just hark at that! Powerful, is it? Why, sir, if you'd as much water in your inside to-night as the Powerful's got, you wouldn't be thinking about Powerfuls, I don't think."

"There has been a battle?"

"That there has, sir."

"Who won?"

"We did."

"By how many ships?"

"The one we came here in, and two the Japs sunk."

"The Japs?"

"Aye."

"They sunk some ships?"

"They did that."

"But they were our allies, were they not?"

"Funny allies at that."

"They gave you no warning of their real intentions, I'll be bound," said John Hardy.

"Not they," someone replied, "it was bash-into-'em, take-me-as-you-find-me-boys, and no mistake. They didn't even carry a flag."

"They have broken the law of nations," said Hardy, looking on the ground. Then, after a few seconds, as if musing, he added: "They have violated the Law of Man."

And the words, taken in conjunction with the most strange, grave face from which they came, had in them something so solemn, and judicial, and meaningful, that, for a minute or two, silence fell upon the men; and they looked at his bent form, somehow expecting him to utter something further of singular and momentous purport.

But he gazed on the ground and said nothing.

Already this grey-haired youth, this venerable stripling, had produced a profound impression upon them.

Somebody on the outskirts of the crowd whispered to somebody else:

"What a face he's got!"

And the whisper went round. And now it was: "Just look at the phiz of him;" and now it was: "I don't think he's all there;" and now it was: "Lor'! look at his face."

It was a face in which there was something thrillingly wild; the face not merely of a judge and an avenger; but of a judge and an avenger come back from the grave, with just that hint of the Ineffable which makes us shudder.

Yet he sat there simply enough, looking on the ground, with one elbow on his wet knee.

CHAPTER XXII.

Murray's Diary.

Mr. Murray, the nominal head of the crew at the fort—though in reality he was only the first among equals—on opening one of the chests brought from the Iphigenia in the pinnace, found a quantity of notepaper, and as there were pens and ink in the fort, he bound the notepaper in some brown paper, and sewed them together, wisely determining to keep a record of the varied days of this strangely-fated crew.

Under date June 8th we find as follows:

"June 8th.—Last night, near twelve, a strange thing happened. We sank a Chinese boat in the harbour with No. 3 south-bastion three-incher, thinking it an enemy. It proved to have contained an Englishman, named John Hardy, ship Powerful (as he says). He reports himself as from Pekin in search of ship. That's about all we can get from him at present. No explanation so far as to how he escaped death in long voyage through China. Something strange about him somewhere, and men pass astonished remarks.

Digitized by Google

"Still two sacks of rice left, last of third being used at dinner to-day. Also two hind legs of camel with quarters, three small sacks roots, two jars Chinese spirit from the millet-farm, and about a pound of tobacco. The sow, Joyce says, is near her confinement, and a day or two should bring us great things from her. Harris, Tom Brown, and Daly complain of fever, and Machen of violent headache. Otherwise all well. Tom Newton to be buried presently.

"June 9th.—Tom Newton buried last night at ten. For last message to his wife see under June 6. This morning noticed a considerable body of Chinese (guessed 500) march past on brow of hill east of island. Big dust-cloud ahead, looking like horse-artillery. Brassey says they mean to give us fight. But I disagree. Their game is to starve us out—if they can.

"This noon, Council. Resolved: that at midnight thirty hands should swim to mainland at different points, taking Sniders in waterproof bags, and ammunition. To meet near lake to N.E., and make a dash for probable mules on tea-farm, N. of lake. Long discussion of ways and means. Resolved: first volunteer to be leader. To surprise of all, the stranger, Hardy, volunteered first. Had listened to discussion without a word, turning from speaker to speaker. Is small and seems weak in chest. Sow doing well.

"June 10th.—This day cook, to surprise of all, produced pudding made of roots and honey, found, he says, near west stream in valley on island. First we heard of honey here, lads all wild with excitement, and everybody clapping cook on back. Am now smoking last pipe. Tobacco done. Also last of German coffee, and yesterday no more sugar. Lads hope for unlimited supplies of honey, but I rather doubtful. Not the right place even for the wild kind.

"Expedition last night very successful. Two mules (all there were on farm), also sack rice (brought over by pinnace), also a skin containing some sort of oil, and no one injured. Joyce says it is good for food, but Brassey denies, and the two came to blows. Lads came back speaking well of Hardy, some saying that he means more than he says.

"Most of day spent in washing shirts and sheets by hands. Harris and Brown still bad with fever, and now also Collins, but Daly better.

"He is an original, this man (I mean Hardy). To-day, while washing clothes, great discussion between Brassey and Davis, which nearly came to blows. Says Brassey, 'Why, the man is fifty-five,' he says, 'if he's a day.' Davis answers that he will lay to it that he is a lad of twenty-five, and not a day older. Then other hands join in, one saying this, and another that, and the lads getting warm. Hardy sitting a good way off, washing sheets. One says: 'Why not ask him, and settle the question?' But no one volunteers to do that. Everybody going to have a look at sow this afternoon, and plenty of bets. But nothing yet to report.

"June 11th.—Great excitement this morning, and all the Chinese liquor finished. Sow littered with four, and beauties all: one pinky-white, two pinky-white and black, and one pure black. The lads all ready for fun, and everybody determined to make a day of it. Hardy alone drank nothing. Brassey very rowdy, but afterwards got to sleep. One of mules refused to eat roots, and was killed in afternoon. A detachment of lads down by sea-shore cutting down trees for fire-wood with swords, and one hatchet. Not an adze in fort. Very slow business. Hardy recommended blasting, and this tried with success. But fearful anxiety beginning to be felt about powder and shot. Only three rounds of ammunition left to some of big guns, and no possibility apparently of making powder for ourselves. At six o'clock, Council. Resolved: to make a dash in small hours of morning for west fort in order to seize possible stores and ammunition, Hardy leading. Pinnace to take two detachments of twenty-five each. A desperate piece of business, in my opinion not yet necessary, but proposed by Hardy, who has seen fort, and seconded by lads. Search this afternoon for more honey, but without success. Men walking about with hands in pockets, without tobacco.

"June 12th.—Lovel, William Brown, and Jackson dead, and not less than thirty Chinese. I with bullet hole in my left hand, very painful. Result: two barrels of powder, and a green tea box half full of Lee-Metford magazine rifle cartridges. Half of us, in retreat, swam across harbour-mouth from west fort to east, Hardy among us. Then along east side of harbour by land, pursued by Chinese, and then, swimming again, to island. The toughest job we have done yet. Our guns, ammunition, and some of our clothes, meanwhile, in boat, with captured things, and we swimming with swords in our teeth.

"But the curious thing is this. As we walked toward our fort, the day began to break, and Hardy having on no shirt, we saw all his body in a queer bruised sort of mess, and two letters, quite distinct, an A, and an S, looking as if they had been branded into his right breast. He throws no light upon himself, and not one of us has pluck to ask him. It is clear that he is a gentleman, and it is 'sir this' and 'sir that' from all the lads to him.

"June 13th.—Says Brassey to me this noon, 'Wasn't there,' says he, 'something about a John Hardy in the battle of Shoreham that that collier from Perim reported to us at Hong Kong before we sailed north?' 'Yes,' I said, 'there was.' 'Then this,' says he, 'is the man.' 'There are many John Hardy's,' I said. 'But this,' says he, 'is the man.' 'What makes you think that?' I said. 'Everything,' says he. And he was so certain of it, that he partly made me so as well. He has gone whispering it, too, to all the lads, and they are talking it over amongst themselves. Nobody asks Hardy, but before this day is out, I mean to put the question straight before him. Gun cleaning pretty nearly all day, and Walters, who has been down to the water's edge on east side, reports that Chinese are heaping a lot of stones on edge of cliff, probably with intention of building. Let them build away. The four piggies doing well, and the old girl as pleased as punch. We shall never have the heart to kill them. Not a scrap of baccy, and no more honey.

"June 14th.—It is to be hoped that this Hardy is not come here to lead us all to the devil, but that is about what I suspect it is going to amount to. Time will show. He has a strong influence over lads, and is all for wild schemes and adventures. Says he last night, most of us sitting about in the north mess-room, 'But what,' says he, suddenly, 'are your ultimate aims?' 'Ultimate aims, sir?' says Brassey. 'You don't mean to live here always, I suppose?' says Hardy. 'It's enough for us to think of getting food to eat, without looking so far ahead,' says Martin Hall. 'Don't be a fool, Hall,' says Tom Brown; 'listen to what the gentleman says.' 'I have not said anything,' says Hardy, 'I merely ask a question, which I leave to your reflection. If you will think it over, I believe you will be wise. And if you cannot find an answer, come to me, and perhaps I may be able to help you.' He very seldom speaks, this Hardy, and when he does, the lads listen wonderfully to him. For quite five or six minutes, I suppose, not one spoke a word after he had said this. And now they are all saying that he's got some fine scheme in his head. This afternoon at five, Council. Resolved: That the Chinese preparations for building on cliff be investigated and destroyed, if necessary, between twelve and one to-night. Hardy proposed as an amendment: That an attack be at once made on Chinese village, three miles to S.E., for purpose of getting in large store of provisions in event of contingencies. But his voice overborne by seventy-five to seventy-three votes. This afternoon Day sent to wind octagonal clock in B bastion, and broke main-spring. Have not asked Hardy anything about battle of Shoreham, or marks on chest, but mean to, sooner or later.

Digitized by Google

"June 15th.—This day extraordinary scene at Council. It seems that Brassey, with five or six others, came to Hardy about noon, a sort of deputation, telling him that the men had been thinking over his words of two nights before, and were wanting him to summon a council and say what was on his mind. Hardy says yes, he would, as they wanted it. So about four, Council. Hardy stands up, the lads sprawling all about, on benches, on the floor, looking at him. Hardy has in his hand one of the three Bibles from the Iphigenia third chest. Well, everybody waits, wondering now what is coming. Hardy begins to talk, and keeps on talking for half-an-hour. All about himself first; his family, where he was born, everything; then about his coming to China to seek Powerful, and his capture by the Chinese at Pekin. Suddenly off he tears his shirt, and shows wounds and scars all over body; and he points to the grey patches in his head: Chinese torture, he says; some of the men wiped their eyes, so movingly he spoke.

"Sometimes when his face is animated, I declare he looks like a lad of nineteen, and it is hard not to love this man somehow. Then he went on to speak of the Japs and their treachery to the British ships; then he said that all the white men in China had been massacred by the Chinese; and last of all, he came out with the announcement that the Chinese and Japanese combined are about to attack Europe. Everyone held his breath at this, and we were all pretty excited by now. 'Well, what are we to say of such a race, men?' says Hardy. 'Do you not agree with me that the earth would be well rid of such a people?' 'Yes!' we cry, 'yes! yes!' we all shout out. 'As for me,' he says, 'I, here and now, before you all, and before Almighty God, devote my entire life henceforth to their destruction; and I invite you all to take that oath with me.' And so saying he lifts the Book, and kisses it. The men leapt round him at once.

"One cries out: 'You are the John Hardy of the Shoreham battle, aren't you?' Hardy says, 'Yes.' Then Brassey roars out: 'Will you be our leader?' and every man jack of us cheers this to the echo; and then Hardy hands the Book to each of us, and as we kiss it, we each of us grips his hand in token of obedience to his orders. And as the last of us grips his hand (that was Paddy Burke), Hardy, turning away from us, goes leaning out of window, and Brassey says a tear was rolling down his cheek which he wanted to hide. I suppose there never was such a scene in the world; it was just as if we were all mesmerised by him, some of us wanting to cry, and I as moved by his influence as the rest. The lads are swearing to follow Hardy through thick and thin.

"The expedition last night did nothing, and discovered little. There were merely some piles of stone and two carts, but without mules. In one of the carts a hard-backed land-turtle, which lads brought back. But their climb up that steep hill as good as useless. From their report it is probable that the regular Chinese force in the neighbourhood is being increased. Happily, perhaps, for us, this is a thinly populated part of the country. Something will have to be done for food, and that soon. It remains to be seen what sort of stuff this Hardy is made of. No one can deny that we got on pretty fairly before he came. Heat fearful to-day, but rain now pouring in torrents outside.

"June 16th.—At midday-mess Hardy says to lads: 'don't scatter, men. I wish to talk with you at once;' so immediately after meal, Council. Hardy at head of table, I on right, Brassey on left, Tom Brown, Davis and Joyce sitting near. Says Hardy: 'You have been good enough,' he says, 'to choose me for your leader. I hope to prove myself worthy of your favour, but for the present I prefer to consult with you, rather than to give you orders. Here we are, a splendidly trained set of fellows, and Britons — 148 of us.

"'I believe we might be able to do something more for our country and ourselves than killing a few Chinamen now and then. The thing is to know what we want to do, and to set about it in the right way; and, as a rule the right way is sure to be the simplest way.' 'Hear, hear,' says Brassey, who is a regular champion of Hardy's, and everybody gives a nod at somebody else. 'Well, then,' says Hardy, 'but no man can work without Tools, and every workman should stick to his own Tool, the carpenter to his chisel, and the blacksmith to his sledge. We, men, are Sailors; and the Tool of a Sailor is a Ship. What we have got to do, then, is to get a Ship.'

"This went straight to the lads—he spoke so sweetly and simply to the understanding of everybody. We cheered, every man, though not a soul could guess where this ship was to come from, or what we were to do with it when we got it. But the mere fact of his saying it made the thing seem possible.

"'A ship, then,' goes on Hardy; 'any sort of ship, so long as we've got our Tool to work with. And you mustn't think that I am child enough to propose to you anything that is impossible for you to do. I have studied you carefully since I have been among you, and I know what each of you can do, and what the whole of you together can do, and what you cannot do. As for ships, they are lying round you in plenty, only waiting for you to go and take one.'

"Everybody looked at him in surprise at this.

"'Ships, sir,' said Brassey, 'whereabouts?'

"'All round the Chinese coasts,' says Hardy. 'I told you, didn't I, that the Chinese have seized and massacred in a body all the Europeans they could find in China. Well, at the time of the massacre, there were, of course, merchant ships of all nations in every Chinese port, and you may be sure that the Chinese took special care to overpower and secure the sailors on board these ships, lest they should escape home and tell what the Chinese were up to. Meanwhile, the ships themselves remain, probably quite empty, or perhaps with a few Chinese on board in charge. I myself saw five in Tientsin harbour when I sailed down the Peiho to come here, and there did not seem to be anybody on board. So you see we have plenty of ships, and to spare.'

"'But,' said I, 'how are you to get to them?'

"'In the pinnace,' says Hardy.

"'The pinnace can't carry even a quarter of us,' said I.

"'Then she shall carry half a quarter of us,' said he; 'and the rest of you will remain here till we come for you in the ship.'

"'But how are the rest of us to live without the pinnace?' said I. 'We can't carry bags of rice on our backs across the harbour, sir.'

"'I know that very well,' says he, 'and that is why I proposed to you the day before yesterday to make a raid on a village, instead of going to search into what the Chinese are building, which does not immediately concern us. What we have to do, in the first place, is to get in a good stock of provisions by means of a series of bold and well-planned raids into the thinly-populated country round, first crushing the small Chinese battalion, if necessary; and when we have enough stores both for us who go, and you who remain, then, and not before, some of us will set off in the pinnace. That seems to me good sense.'

"'And to me!' cries Brassey, with a wave of the hand, 'and to me,' goes the cry down the benches.

"'But,' said I, 'when we have got our ship, what do we do with her—go home?'

"'No—that is not precisely what we swore to do,' says Hardy. 'As to what we will do with our ship, I have got a plan which I feel confident you will approve when I lay it before you. But there is a good deal to be done first, and I won't trouble you with that now. The first thing I want every man here to set his mind upon is to bring me into the fort here a live Chinaman with two sound legs. Without that nothing can be done.'

Digitized by Google

"At this our astonishment knew no bounds. A live Chinaman!

"'And may I ask, sir,' said I, 'what it is you want a live Chinaman for?'

"'To send him on a message,' says he. 'It is the answer which he will bring back which will make our ship of any use to us.'

"'He won't come back,' said I.

"'He will,' says he.

"'Right you are, sir!' cries Brassey.

"'I will not keep you any longer now,' says Hardy. 'But later in the day, I will select a hundred of you to come with me to-night; and I recommend you to look to your swords and your rifles.'

"And with that we broke up, everyone forming part of a group to discuss our new man. The second mule killed to-day, and two more of our men complaining of fever trouble. Joyce talking of blowing up tortoise with gunpowder, and saying that they are good food in South Seas. Lads conversing about different brands of tobacco, and smelling keg."

CHAPTER XXIII.

Murray's Diary (continued).

"June 17th.—Harvey, Lane, Yates and Tom Joyce dead, Brassy wounded in leg, Harry Jones in leg, Field in shoulder, Burke in forearm, Mackay in forearm, Wright in groin, and I again in left hand near the old place—my bad luck. One or two wounds look ugly, but the rest not much. Bodies of Harvey, Yates, and Joyce with Chinese, but Lane brought back, and died in fort. Burial to-day at 3. 'Not less than fifty Chinese done for,' says Brassey. Result: splendid haul of three camels (one killed in battle, and carcase left behind), seven mules, twelve small animals like sheep, two sacks millet, and five rice. Returning loaded from village, met Chinese battalion cutting us off. Made quick charge, and thought they would turn tail, but didn't. Sharp fight. Literally forced our way through them. But our powder getting very low. What shall we do? Lads very well pleased with expedition, and speak well of Hardy. He proposes that one of mules be set aside for drawing one of Chinese carts on top of hill, to bring home hawl on next expedition. But mules won't eat roots, have to be fed on rice, and grass on island scanty. Hardy says salted mule-meat. Weather is very hot for this. But will be tried. No live Chinaman to be got. They know how to run, these Chinese. At four, Council. Resolved: to repeat raid this night on village, N.W. by N., six miles off, according to report of Fraser and Brassey. Hardy looking far from well."

"The lasso falls clean over Chinaman's head."

[Here follows Murray's account of three fresh raids, too minutely described to be reproduced here, and conducted with varying success. In the last of the three Hardy did not join, being ill.]

"June 21st.—At last, live Chinaman. Captured at high noon. Five lads, among them Hardy, swam one by one to east side, diving most of time. On cliff some Chinamen pouring stones out of carts for building. Men, hiding in scrub, climb up cliff-side, no very easy matter with weapons and other things in hands. Peep over cliff-edge, and decide which Chinaman it is to be. Then rush out. Chinese off in their mule-carts, and a squad of soldiers, some distance off, give fire, but at random, being taken unawares. As marked Chinaman turns to gallop off in mule-cart, Brassey, who has lasso, throws; and lasso falls clean over Chinaman's head, dragging him from cart, which gallops off alone. Splendid feat for Brassey, for Chinaman was not near, and Brassey has wounded leg. Chinaman quickly bound, and hustled down hill-side. Pinnace waiting at shore to bring lads and Chinaman, and Chinamen a-top still banging away. But no one hurt. Lads say that Hardy gripped Brassey's hand, and gave it a squeeze. It's like Hardy's decent way. Chinaman being very kindly treated by Hardy's orders. A brawny, raw-boned brute, and seems not to know what to make of treatment.

"June 22nd.—To-day at one, Council. Resolved: That sufficient stores now in fort to last all two weeks, and that pinnace starts as soon as Chinaman is sent on message. Resolved: That Chinaman be sent to-morrow, Hardy wishing him to grow accustomed to kind treatment before starting. Hardy has chosen to accompany him on voyage the following: — Brassey, Tom Brown, Fraser, Burke, Knollys, Leaf, Pawsons, John Jones, Maitland, Samuels, Clayton, Rogers, Machen, Gibbs, John Pound, Maunder, Chapman, and Glyn. I remain in charge. Practically no powder will be left when lads set out. To-day overhawling of pinnace, and preparations. Lads found some opium on Chinaman, which they smoked, and some of them still very queer.

"June 23rd.—To-day great fun, and lads talking of sagacity of Hardy. But no one understands meaning of message. Chinaman brought before Hardy after mid-day meal. Hardy at table, with pen, ink, and paper. We all standing round, Chinaman looking queer. Hardy looks at him and says: 'You talkee English?' Chinaman makes no sign. 'Can you talkee English?' No sign. Up jumps Hardy on a sudden, a razor in his hand, and he seizes hold of Chinaman's pig-tail, as if to cut it off. 'Oh, savee, savee,' cries Chinaman. 'Very good,' says Hardy, 'you talk English, then.' Hardy had guessed beforehand that he could, because Chinaman, on day of capture, had on European felt hat like those some of the Chinese boatmen wear at Shanghai; and that was why Hardy had singled out this particular Chinaman for capture. 'Well,' Hardy says: 'You poor man?' 'Me very poor,' says Chinaman. 'How much you give for one silk pig-tail?' says Hardy. 'Fifty tael,' says Chinaman. 'You got fifty tael to buy one pig-tail?' says Hardy. Chinaman looks scared. 'Fifty tael?' says he, 'no, no.' 'All right,' says Hardy, 'me going to cut off your pig-tail, and me going to give you letter to carry Pekin. You carry letter well, and bring back true answer soon, me promise to give you back pig-tail, and no do you any harm. You understand?' Chinaman trembling like a sail in the wind. But he says 'yes.' Hardy says: 'Very good.' Then he turns round to paper, tears half a sheet, and begins to write, lads looking over his shoulder. He writes:

Digitized by Google

"'To Ni-ching-tang, Imperial City, Pekin.

"'You tell me quick where Japanese navy is, or me very likely get caught, and then me tell Yen How who set me free. If you can write, you write name of place where navy is on this paper, and also name of your nephew at Tungchow, so that me may be sure the answer comes from you. If you no can write, you tell this man name of place, and name of nephew. Be quick, or me get caught, and tell Yen How about you.—John Hardy.'

Chinaman spied on east shore of mainland, making signals.

"When Hardy had finished this letter, he read it aloud to Chinaman, and gave it to Chinaman. He said 'If you no be back in nine days from now, me burn your pigtail in fire, and you no have pigtail no more.' And with that, up he jumped to his feet, and wrapping pigtail round left hand, with two sweeps of razor he had it off about three inches from the root, leaving just enough for the man to plait it on to again. Chinaman curled and shivered, as though razor was in his flesh, and a fine long pigtail it is, too. Hardy then wrote name of Ni-ching-tang's nephew, by which I am to verify that Chinaman really has been to Ni-ching-tang, and handed paper to me to keep. Nephew's name is Li-kien. If Ni-ching-tang cannot read, Chinaman will deliver message verbally. It is clear that this man Ni-ching-tang has some strong motive for telling real truth to Hardy, but we none of us know what motive is, nor why Hardy is anxious about station of Japanese fleet. However, we have much confidence in his views. Chinaman was let free, and taken to mainland, and much fun we all had. Pinnace now ready, and the nineteen men to start at midnight Nearest treaty-port, according to map, is Chefoo. And to Chefoo they mean to go. Pinnace loaded with last coal in fort. Compass, sextant, chronometer, stores, and everything we can think of on board. Weather stifling hot, but lads in good spirits.

"June 24th.—Lads, apparently, got out of harbour all right last night. For us here the game is a waiting one. After to-morrow, by Hardy's orders, a man to be always on the look-out near the east fort during night. If lads get a ship she will show three lights in a triangle to let us know when she comes. They will send boats ashore to east headland, to take us off, we swimming to east side of harbour, and taking all live stock still left. If Chinaman not come back by the time Hardy returns, nothing to be done, and red light to be shown by sentry to ship. This day killed the sow. The lads yawning, and spoiling for a fight."

[Six days of the diary follow, containing nothing but trivial details of the life of the fort, and the account of a massing of some two thousand Chinese in the locality. The next entry of importance is on the 1st July.]

"July 1st.—This day at noon, Chinaman spied on east shore of mainland, making signals. Great excitement among lads, who have been dull. Sent two men to fetch Chinaman over, and the fuss that beggar made about coming into water lasted nearly an hour. At last lads managed to bring him over between them. Chinaman handed me Hardy's note to Ni-ching-tang, and underneath, in English characters, just legible, were the words 'Nagasaki' and 'Li-kien.' It is clear, then, that Chinaman did his work well, and the only thing open to doubt is whether Ni-ching-tang has told the truth in saying that Jap navy is at Nagasaki. Chinaman trembling with eagerness to get back pig-tail, doubting apparently that we would keep our word, and the lads having great sport in making him think that we wouldn't. Pig-tail produced at last, and lads lashing one another with it all over the place, to Chinaman's agony. Then pig-tail given to Chinaman to his great joy. But I don't think it prudent to let him go free, and am keeping him prisoner for some time.

"July 2nd.—Some lads sent out to scout report continued massing of Chinese tents on plain to S. W., 1,500 counted, and we here without the power of firing three rounds of shot. Heaven only grant that Hardy turns up trumps. The men seem to take him with perfect confidence, and the lapse of time makes no difference to them. It is wonderful to me how thoroughly Hardy has got over them. I never saw anything like it. The two hind quarters of sow completely spoiled owing to heat, and the men all saying it is head cook's fault, and he very sulky."

[On July 3rd there is no entry.]

(To be continued.)

"Pick-Me-Up."

The Most Artistic Penny Paper Published.

Drawings by Phil May, Oscar Wilson, and other clever black and white artists.

Serial Story by George Griffith, author of "The Angel of the Revolution," etc., etc., entitled: "THE GREAT PIRATE SYNDICATE," a splendid tale of War and Finance.

Complete Short Story Every Week.

Every Line Absolutely Original.

If you have not seen a copy lately, please buy one next Tuesday,

And notice how greatly the paper has been improved.

It gets better every week.

And you can take it home and please everyone.

Digitized by Google

The Man Who Kills.

On a plain white slab in the dreary little cemetery of St. Jeane de Dieu, at Longue Pointe, Canada, are chisled these words: "L'homme qui tue."

There are many resting there whose life was more eventful than his, but only numbers mark their graves, and they share the one big wooden cross, near the fence, in common.

Look at number twenty-three, for instance. It contains the remains of the beautiful Madame Réal, who kept the fashionable millinery shop in the Rue Ste. Catherine. She was wealthy, but had only enough left when her husband died to stock her establishment. One day she fell in love with Beaulieu, the rich hardware man, whose wife was plain and insipid, but rich. For three short years she was as happy as she could be, and then he became tired of her, and one Friday evening told her that he would see her no more. On Saturday morning she was violently insane.

Number fourteen was a distinguished officer in His Holiness's Foreign Legion during the Italian war for independence from religious power. He learnt the opium habit at Vancouver and cut his throat.

Number forty-five was a high Government official, who murdered his wife and three daughters during an attack of jealousy brought on by paresis—at that time not the fashionable disease it is at present. And so on.

Yet he is the only one that has a stone to cover him, and I had it put there myself and had the inscription cut at his own request.

Did he ever kill anyone? No, but he imagined he did, and to me, like him, that is pretty much the same thing.

He was a bright fellow. I know this because I went to school with him, and he loved the daughter of his uncle, the rich wholesale liquor merchant, Laframboise. Indirectly she was the cause of the whole sad history. His parents were dead and Laframboise brought him up. He was good to the boy, better than most uncles in similar circumstances, but later on he aspired to the Council Législatif, that strange mixture of modern politics and Louis XVI. manners, with hopes of Ottawa and the Senate. In such cases a man that would not sacrifice a cousin or nephew cannot expect to possess the confidence of a paternal Government. But I am running ahead of my story.

His name was Calixe, hers Louise. Her pet name was "Mouton" on account of her big, brown eyes and her easy temper—too easy and soft for the good of either of them. He had hair like that of an Indian, but softer and wavy, and a spirit to match. They were always together, and their callow love as children gradually transformed itself into the more presumptuous passion of young manhood and womanhood. French-Canadian children are very precocious in matters of that kind. Laframboise père never seemed to notice this, but when "Mouton" was sixteen, he decided that a certain red-cushioned arm-chair in the Legislative Council Chamber would be just the thing for him, and, as it was a Castor Government, it might be well to have a relative in the ranks of the clergy. So Calixe was told that as his uncle could not afford the expenses of the legal education first thought of, he had better go to the Grand Seminary, unless he wished to shift for himself.

Calixe was not a fool. He knew his uncle, and prepared to obey. The next time Louise came home from the convent he told her.

"Uncle wants me to be a crow," he said.

Strange how fast Catholic children in those days lost their reverence for the cloth.

"A crow!" exclaimed Louise, aghast, as she thought of fat Père Gonzaque, one of the confessors to the convent, who, she sometimes thought, tried to flirt with the bigger girls. "And what will become of me?"

"Don't fret, ma petite Louise," said Calixe, in the tone of authority he often assumed with her, and that made her think him so grand and wise. "You and I will get married after all."

"But crows cannot marry." Louise said tearfully.

"Of course not, silly; but I am not going to be one. My plans are not quite matured, but to please uncle I'll go to the seminary for a year or so, and then cut for the United States, and when I'm earning enough I will send for you, and you'll come. Won't you?"

"I will," said Louise, and they kissed one another and everything was settled. But children propose and guardians dispose, and Calixe had only been about a month at the seminary when his uncle told Louise to prepare herself for a visit to her aunt in Paris. When Calixe's next half-day off came, there was another consultation. The old gentleman never interfered with these. He knew better.

This time it was Louise that spoke first. "I am going to Paris," she said.

"Why?" he asked; "are not Canada and I good enough for you?"

"Oh, yes, too good, but papa wants me to go. There are social advantages in a trip like that, he says, that I must not miss."

Digitized by Google

Calixe thought for awhile. He knew that Louise's soft nature would never summon courage enough to oppose her father's wishes. So he just pulled her down upon the sofa alongside of him. "Louise, chérie," he said, putting his arm round her, "it seems that we must part, but, at any rate, we can swear to be true to one another."

"Do you doubt me?" Louise asked, in an injured tone.

"No, chérie," he replied; "but it would please me to hear you swear it. All you have to do is to put your hand on the big crucifix and to repeat what I say, and then kiss the crucifix."

"All right," she said, "if it pleases you." So they swore. It did not seem such a terrible oath after all. He said: "I promise to love none but you, and marry none but you, or you may kill me." And she repeated it after him, only she felt a little shiver when she came to the killing part. They both kissed the crucifix on the same spot.

"Now, nothing can part us," he said. He repeated this when he kissed her good-bye on the steamer. They arranged that he should write her once a week, and that she should answer all his letters promptly. When he left the seminary and obtained work that would pay sufficiently, she would come to him, no matter what happened. He carried out his part of the programme well enough, but after writing once a week for two or three months without a single reply, he became disheartened. His next day off he spoke to his uncle about having written her—he did not say how often—without receiving any reply.

"She is too busy, my boy, with balls and parties and cavaliers," Laframboise père had replied. The last expression hurt Calixe deeply, but his uncle was too busy to think about such little things. Calixe waited for a whole year. He did not know that his letters never reached Louise.

He did some very disreputable things for a theological student. He used bad language, when alone, and finally turned to revenge for consolation. Nothing mean or petty, but a noble reckoning up of grievances was his aim! He would be a celebrated preacher, and from the pulpit he would denounce the women who by breaking their vows imperilled the souls of men.

He worked as only a young man possessing his iron constitution could. Gradually he managed to cast her from his thoughts, and even the announcement of her engagement to the rich Vicomte de Bergère left him comparatively unmoved. When they were married he became a priest, and when Madame de Bergère and her husband, who intended to risk some of his money in an attempt to make sugar out of Canadian beets, set foot on Madame's native soil, his reputation as a preacher was established.

It was at Nôtre Dame de Lourdes that the couple first attended mass after their arrival.

It was as much of a surprise to Calixe to find, when he mounted the pulpit, that they were among the congregation, as it was to Madame de Bergère to hear his voice. The interior of the church was dim, and at first she did not recognise him, but when he spoke she felt a cold thrill go through her, and if her husband had not been listening so intently he would have noticed her cheek pale. Calixe spoke from the Book of Judges. His text was from the story of Samson's fall: "She made him sleep upon her knees, and she called a man, and she caused him to shave off the seven locks of his head, and she began to afflict him, and his strength went from him." He had his sermon well prepared in his mind, but the sight of her aroused him and crowded the first thought out, and he preached such a stirring extemporaneous sermon as that congregation had never heard.

It ended thus: "Women beware! The souls of men are priceless things. The number of souls of women lost through the perfidy of men does not begin to compare with the number of men's souls cast frivolously into the eternal, hopeless darkness of the bottomless pit, by the capricious faithlessness of women.

"Not the outcast creatures of the street, but the women to whom we daily doff our hat—the women that grace our salons—the fond mothers, the loving wives. Like Delilah, they captivate him with their smiles, enslave him with their eyes, intoxicate him with a pressure of the hand, and make him lose his senses through a kiss. And all this only to surrender to his enemies, despair and recklessness, that quickly drive him to the torments of Hades."

He spoke directly at her and she felt it, and when mass was over she had to be driven home, for her husband saw she was ill.

For a week that sermon was in everyone's mouth, and afterwards it was forgotten, for the next Sunday he preached one stronger and more eloquent. This time his text was: "And of Jezebel also spake the Lord, saying the dogs shall eat Jezebel by the wall of Jezreel." He saw that Madame de Bergère was not there, and he did not care, for he knew that people would tell her about it.

Thus he kept on for a month, when a celebrated Franciscan took his place. Every Sunday the attendance in the church had increased, but when the Franciscan had preached twice it fell off again and Calixe came back to the pulpit.

After that first sermon Madame de Bergère had been attacked by nervous prostration, which seemed to grow worse while Calixe preached, and Dr. Malo ordered a change of air. The trip did her good, and in her absence Calixe paid a formal visit to her husband.

When she came back he was preaching again, and she began to grow worse. Though fearing to hear, she had a sort of fatal desire to know what he said, and always managed to find someone among her many visitors that was only too glad to talk about the magnificent sermons of the young preacher, who kept himself so quiet and secluded. She knew they were meant for her alone, and she became no better.

In the meantime Calixe's fame grew. The women idolised and the men admired him. Laframboise père was pleased. He was aware also that his daughter was ill, but the duties of the Legislative Councillor are many and heavy, and he had given her husband the address of the best doctor in town.

One day, however, there was straw in front of the fine house in the Rue Ste. Marie, and the bell had been taken off. Madame de Bergère was dangerously ill. She had been delirious, and in her delirium she had repeated parts of the Bible over and over again. Sometimes she had mumbled about an oath and about someone that was coming to kill her. But they had only given her a soothing drink and waited for the doctor. The Legislative Councillor had for the moment become the father again and hovered anxiously about the sick-room. In the evening Dr. Malo put in an appearance. He was an advanced sort of a physician. He did not feel her pulse, but took out a little thermometer and put it into her mouth. Then he took it out again, looked at it, carefully wiped it with his pocket-handkerchief and replaced it in his leather étui. Everything was still in the room except the beautiful woman in the bed, who, half-unconscious, moved about recklessly.

Digitized by Google

The doctor spoke. "This is the crisis," he said.

"Will she live?" father and husband asked as with one subdued voice.

"She may," said the doctor; "she is young and strong."

"Better send for a priest," murmured the nun that acted as nurse.

The father looked at the doctor.

"I would not advise it," said Dr. Malo, in reply to the look. "The excitement might rob her of her only chance of life. I do not look for her death so soon as to prevent that being done later on." Doctor Malo was a good Christian as doctors go nowadays, and a good churchman; but he believed a live Catholic worth a thousand dead ones.

"But suppose she were to die," whispered the nun again.

"It would be horrible." The husband seemed to side with the doctor, but the Legislative Councillor asserted himself again over the father. It would be horrible. It would surely wreck his prospects. "We must be prepared for the worst," he said. "Let us have a priest by all means. Send for Calixe."

Dr. Malo shrugged his shoulders and walked into the next room. He had done all he could do. They were good clients and could afford to await developments. Had they asked his opinion then, he would have made a wager of a hundred to one that she was going to die.

Calixe was sent for! When the message reached him he said nothing, but put on his hat and coat, gave the host in its black bag to the messenger to carry, and went out.

They had washed her hands and feet for the anointment and were just preparing a little table near the bed, when the door creaked and Calixe entered. He had left his hat and coat in the hall. His face was terribly pale, and his hair seemed twice as black as usual. As he approached the bed firmly and solemnly the sick woman looked up. The noise of the door opening must have roused her from her stupor. As she saw the young priest approaching, she threw up her arms as if to ward him off. "Take him away," she cried, "take him away. He has come to kill me," and she fell back on her pillows. Calixe paused, trembling from head to foot, but it was only a momentary tremor. Dr. Malo rushed out of the next room past him to the bed. He regarded her critically.

"She is going to die," he said; "I can do nothing more," and he left the house.

Calixe, paler than before, administered the last sacrament.

It is a grandly solemn ceremony in the abstract. To me it has always appeared horrible in reality. It seems like the irrevocable avowal that all hope is gone, the signing of the death-warrant, the preparation of a condemned prisoner for the scaffold.

Three days afterwards the interior of the church of Nôtre Dame de Lourdes was hung with yellow and black. Calixe officiated at the service of the dead.

The next afternoon he walked into my house and told my housekeeper he was going to dine with me. He hung his hat and coat in the hall and then began to unbutton his soutane, and would have taken that off also if she had not stopped him.

"All right," he said, and went into the parlour to look at the flowers. The housekeeper was afraid of her life, but fortunately I came home soon after. She told me of his strange actions, and I went into the parlour. When I shook hands with him, he said: "I am hungry and want some dinner." As it was about ready we sat down, and though he would not take anything but bread-and-water, he talked very sensibly. Once he stopped.

"I want that dinner all over again," he said, "and I want to begin with chicken soup." I asked him to wait until supper time, as the cook was very busy, and he said: "All right, I will take a bath instead." That settled it. I sent the girl for Dr. Malo. When he arrived, he looked at Calixe and made a motion with his lips that meant "Crazy!" As he went up to my friend, Calixe warned him off, and said, like a man that tells you that a door is newly painted:

"Take care. I am the man who kills."

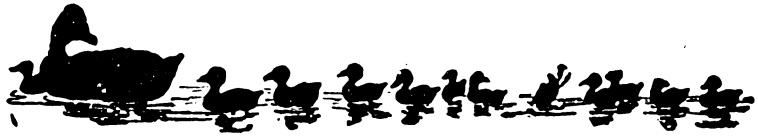
That remained his idée fixe all through his stay at the asylum. I was about the only one he allowed near him.

One day when I visited him he took me aside. "When I am dead and buried," he said, pointing to the floor, "I don't want people to come near me, I might hurt them. Put a stone over me, and cut on the stone in black letters, 'L'homme qui tue'; it will be a warning."

He has been dead seven years.

The Vicomte de Bergère, after having lost half his fortune in the beetroot sugar industry, has married again. At least, Senator Laframboise, with whom I dined yesterday, told me so.

PETER PARE.



Digitized by Google

A TALE OF OLD FRANCE.

By MARY FERMOR.

SUMMARY.

Amaury Montruel, a knight, and Mahmoud-el-Reis, a Saracen, meet on the road to Paris. The former's mission is to kill the Queen of France; the latter's to kill the King. At the same time two children, Eric and Eve, are on their way to Paris to aid the Queen, and overhear the conversation of these two horsemen. Shortly afterwards a knight and his page give the children a lift on the road, and, on arriving at Paris, place them under the care of the Freemasons. Maître Samson, Montruel's secretary, tries to induce Tristan de Pamiers, king of the law students, to raise a rebellion in favour of Agnes de Méranie against Philip's consort, Queen Ingeburge. Albret, the King's page, takes Eve, alias Little Adam, to the King, who gives her permission to visit Ingeburge in her captivity in the Abbey St. Martin. Meanwhile Agnes de Méranie pays a visit to Notre Dame with Amaury Montruel, and stills the ominous cries of the people by distributing among them her paste jewels. In the cathedral she meets Mahmoud-el-Reis, who is carving a figure of the Virgin, and tries to win his regard by presenting him with pearls, which he crushes under his feet when she has gone. Returning from the visit to the cathedral, the members of the Royal party are intercepted by the Free-Lances, but are finally allowed to go on their way. Thinking this wild crew may be of future use to her, Agnes de Méranie determines to enlist the sympathies of their leader, Antoine Cadocu. To accomplish her object she visits him the same evening, accompanied by Montruel, in the low tavern in which he and his followers hold their nightly revels. She is very rudely treated, and returns with Montruel without having attained her object of enlisting the sympathies of Cadocu. Montruel's secretary, Samson, hints to the King that Agnes has been seen out late at night, and, although he confirms his suspicions, he does not allow Agnes to suspect his knowledge. During the sitting of a council appointed by the Pope to decide which of the King's two wives is his lawful consort, Montruel visits Mahmoud-el-Reis to urge him to fulfil his promise to murder Ingeburge without delay. In order to gain access to the Queen's presence, the two men arrange that Mahmoud shall feign sickness and be taken to the hospital attached to the Abbey, where the Queen is confined.

CHAPTER XIII.

A Patient for Prior Anselm.

Paris continued in a state of wild excitement during the first day of the great Ecclesiastical Council, and the crowds increased rather than diminished as the day wore on. Everyone thronged to the Palace Square, and there were many who had travelled all night from their country homes in order to glean the earliest intelligence of the all-important verdict.

The vast crowd waited patiently through the long weary hours, whose flight was only marked by the chiming bells from the neighbouring belfries, and still the great door remained closed. Human nature does not alter very much, and there were then, as there are to-day, fertile brains ready to divert the mob and gain a fleeting glory for themselves by the manufacture of startling items of information as to what was going on behind those closed doors. These romancers coloured their pictures according to their own fancy, but in no case was a single detail wanting as to the exact nature of those secret proceedings. The very words spoken in the recesses of the Council Chamber were repeated glibly by those who had never been within a hundred yards of the Palace steps. Some said the King had defied the Holy Father, and bidden his minions do their worst. Others, that the craven churchmen had been terrorized by the King's valiant body-guard; while the more pacific newsmongers had described Philip Augustus kneeling humbly before the assembled prelates, and assuring them of his penitent resolve to abide by the decision of Holy Church, whatever it should cost him. So the tongues wagged, and the crowd listened more or less incredulously, amused, horrified, incensed, as the case might be; but one and all deeply interested.

So absorbing were these contradictory and ever-recurring reports, that the crowd had little time to notice the fact that a litter was being carried, with considerable difficulty, through the thronged streets by four masons, followed by a knight on horseback, who seemed to direct their movements.

Those who recognised Amaury Montruel in the horseman suspected foul play as a matter of course; but it seemed only too probable that the litter contained some poor man who had fallen from the scaffolding of Nôtre Dame. One circumstance, however, would certainly have attracted attention had the lookers-on been less preoccupied, and that was the fact that, whenever the bearers prepared to halt before the door of a monastery or lazare-house, the knight motioned them to proceed, saying peremptorily:

"I will stop you at the right time and place."

The last orders of Jean Cador had been fulfilled to the letter. Montruel had called the first masons he could find, and had asked four of them to assist him. Three of the men shook their heads gravely on entering the shed where lay the apparently lifeless form of the famous sculptor.

"It's no good taking him to a hospital," said one of them; "the poor chap wants a coffin, not a bed, to lie in."

The fourth man knelt down beside the body and gazed at it with an agonised expression of doubt and fear upon his face, but he rose without saying a word, and was the first to bring a stretcher in obedience to Montruel's order.

When they were once fairly on the way, the three men relapsed into that subdued state of semi-indifferent sorrow which marks those who are brought face to face with a tragic occurrence that does not personally concern them, but the fourth bearer was still pale, and his eyes wandered restlessly through the crowd, as if seeking one whom they could not find. He looked like a man oppressed by a weighty secret which he yearned to confide to one who was not forthcoming.

Digitized by Google

Just before they reached the densest part of the crowd near the Palace, where the chattering groups were excitedly repeating the latest rumour to each other and jostling shoulder to shoulder in good-humoured idleness, this pale youth with the strained, anxious look in his eyes, caught sight of a white-haired old man, standing on the outskirts of the crowd, listening to the gossip.

The young man's face cleared and he called out.

"Christian, mon père Christian, come here a minute!" The old man turned round at the evidently familiar voice, and came towards the litter. Amaury Montruel saw the greeting, though he was too far off to catch the words, and felt instinctively that danger threatened his plans. He tried to spur his horse forward so as to intercept the meeting, but the throng was too great, and he only arrived in time to see the old man disappear in the crowd.

The young man had whispered hurriedly to his friend:

"The man in this litter is going to assassinate Queen Angel!" but as the words were spoken in the Norse tongue they conveyed no meaning to the bystanders.

This fourth bearer was Eric, the Dane, who had come from his northern home to save the life of Queen Ingeburge. He had never forgotten Imila's prophecy, nor the strange events of the night he and his sister had arrived in Paris. Ever since he had begun work at Nôtre Dame he had set a strict watch on the man so clearly defined by the prophecy, the man who bore the dual character of the Moslem, Mahmoud-el-Reis, and the Christian sculptor, Jean Cador, employed to carve the statue of the Holy Virgin.

The noise which had caused Montruel to rush to the window, during the last conversation with the Syrian that morning, had been made by Eric, who had climbed up the scaffolding, and was crouching under the window, so that he had heard every word spoken by the two men inside the shed. At the name of his beloved princess he had started so violently as to loosen a small piece of stone with his foot, and he had only just time to slide down one of the poles before Montruel's head was thrust out of the window above him.

Long and earnestly did the two men talk.

The awful knowledge that he now possessed stunned him, for his will was better than his brain, and he felt powerless to act alone in this terrible emergency. He would have given ten years of his life to have had Eve beside him, for her quick wit and ready intelligence had helped them out of many a dilemma on their memorable journey. It was she who had cheered, consoled, and planned, while he bore the physical discomforts so far as he could in her stead. She had the mind, he had the muscle.

It was now the eighth day since she had been taken away from him. Every moment he could spare from his work had been spent in anxious and, so far, fruitless search for some trace of her whereabouts, but he had not obtained the slightest clue to her fate, and even had failed to come across the page Albret, who alone could have given him tidings. His heart had been daily growing heavier with the protracted suspense, and his fears for her safety were becoming more and more confirmed as no word of her reached him.

Now, when death seemed hanging over the head of the one they were both pledged to serve, his longing for his sister became almost unbearable.

When they had borne the litter over the great bridge which led to the palace, they made no halt till they reached the Porte-aux-Peintres, where Montruel, raising his visor, bade the guards open "In the King's name."

Montruel, raising his visor, bade the guards open "In the King's name."

Digitized by Google

As soon as they were outside the walls, he rode ahead, and stopping before the heavy gate of the Abbey St. Martin, rang the great bell, and demanded audience with the Prior.

When Anselm came out, his haughty visitor requested that a private cell should be given to the celebrated sculptor, Maître Jean Cador, who had had the misfortune to be taken ill while carving the image of the Holy Virgin. It was the King's pleasure that the sick man should be tended in the Abbey St. Martin.

The venerable Prior bowed in acquiescence, and calling four of the lay brethren, bade them take the litter into the hospital.

Montruel waited till the doors had closed upon Mahmoud-el-Reis, and then, setting spurs to his horse, galloped back to the city.

Three of the bearers returned, unthinkingly, to their work at Nôtre Dame, wondering what ailed the man they had carried to the Abbey, but the dark-skinned sculptor was not popular among his fellow-craftsmen, and they soon dismissed the matter from their minds.

Eric followed them for a few yards, then lagged behind, and, as he saw them walk on, unmindful of his movements, he sat down behind a thick bush and waited till old Christian should have made his way out of the city, as arranged between them.

Long and earnestly did the two men talk and consider how to avert this terrible fate from the fair Ingeburge, who was now under the same roof as the man who had sworn to take her life, while her two faithful friends were almost within sound of her voice, yet powerless to save her.

The afternoon wore on, and as the last rays of the setting sun were glancing across the road, they were also struggling to penetrate the narrow cell where Mahmoud-el-Reis lay in his death-like stupor. The white-washed walls were bare, save for a crucifix that hung over the small prie dieu at the foot of the pallet-bed, which, with a low, wooden stool, completed the furniture of the tiny room.

His face was a shade paler than usual, and had a deathly hue, in spite of the bronze tone of the skin; his eyes were closed, his sinewy, supple limbs were rigid and motionless.

By his side sat an old monk, with a good-natured, expressionless face, who held in his limp, nerveless hands a rosary, over which he mechanically mumbled the Office, taking no notice of the sick man in his charge. To the good brother's eyes the Syrian was as good as dead, so, as he could do nothing to help the body, he was doing his best, in his own lazy way, to pave an entrance into the future state for the soul that must soon leave its earthly tenement.

The patient had not moved or given the least sign of life since he had been carried in that morning; and the old monk's rosary was a long one, so every now and then he dozed over his prayers in that silent cell, and woke up again refreshed, to find all as it had been an hour ago. If anyone could have gone in, unperceived, during one of these little naps, he would have been forcibly struck by the contrast between the two faces in repose before him.

The good monk was plump and ruddy, with shaven tonsure and three well-developed chins. His face spoke of an amiable character weakened by habitual indolence, and, even if one could swear that he had never done much good in the world, it was equally certain he had never, consciously, done any harm.

The face on the pillow, with its sharply-defined features, its energy, its pride and its passion, was that of a man whose very life was action, and whose force was wielded for good or ill with irresistible intensity.

The life of the monk had been as a dreamless sleep, untroubled by remorse, ungilded by love, unmoved by aspiration.

That of the Moslem had been as a whirlwind, a tempest, in which every passion had played its part, and the dusky pallor of his cheek seemed a mystic revelation of the volcano that slumbered in his heart.

A ray of sunlight fell upon the two faces, and with its warmth there appeared a healthier glow on the Syrian's forehead—signs of returning consciousness gradually developed, and a faint smile played for a second on the discoloured lips.

The monk's rubicund face became yet more rosy in the light, and he slept on peacefully, like a child, with his white, flaccid hands folded over the long rosary, and his round head cushioned on the three chins.

At last there was a slight quiver in the Syrian's eyelids, and they were slowly raised till the eyes were half-open; but the glance that came from beneath them was weak and weary, not to be recognised as the bright, flashing eagle-eyes of Mahmoud-el-Reis. This man never did anything by halves, and the potion he had swallowed had not only given him the appearance of illness, but had produced symptoms of the gravest character.

The cleverest physician that even modern medical science could produce would have unhesitatingly declared Mahmoud's life to be in the greatest danger.

His swoon had lasted many hours, and now that he was regaining his faculties his physical exhaustion was such as to prevent him from using them. For the flame of life was flickering very low in the breast of Mahmoud-el-Reis at this moment.

Some minutes elapsed before the half-open eyes could distinguish any object in his strange surroundings, and a terrible fear seized him.

"Am I blind?" he thought, "or is it the dead of night that makes all look so black?"

He tried to raise his hand to sweep away, if might be, the mist which obscured his eyes; but the arm refused to obey the brain—it lay beside him as a useless thing over which he had no control.

The tired eye-lids drooped again, and he thought, almost with indifference, so great was his weakness:

"The dose was strong. Allah grant that it may not have been too strong!"

CHAPTER XIV.

The Assassin's Nurse.

Ten minutes or more elapsed before Mahmoud-el-Reis opened his eyes again. It never occurred to him to ask for help; the man was self-reliant even in his weakness; moreover, he felt that the deadly effects of the drug were passing off, and his superb constitution was asserting itself in his favour. He gradually became able to distinguish the form of the sleeping monk sitting facing him at his bedside, and with the return of power came also the memory of his mission. He half raised himself on his elbow, and so brought his eyes upon a level with the face of his unconscious companion. After a close scrutiny of the good man's features, the Syrian shook his head, sank back exhausted on the pillow, and thought within himself:

"I shall get nothing out of that man! He has no passions to appeal to!"

The slight exertion caused a return of faintness, all became dark again before his eyes, and he lapsed into a heavy, dreamless sleep. Brother Martin woke with a start and sprang to his feet as quickly as his weight and years would allow of. It seemed to him that he had heard a sound like the creaking of a bedstead in his dreams, and, as he crossed himself piously, he looked towards the silent figure and recognised that the posture had been changed.

"Holy Saints protect us! The dead man has moved!"

His trembling fingers sought in vain for the rosary which had fallen to the ground; his teeth chattered, his blood ran cold, and to his terrified mind the cell seemed peopled with ghostly visitants. He dare not leave his post; he was too paralysed to call for help, too bewildered even to pray. To his infinite relief, however, steps and voices were heard in the corridor, and in another moment the door opened to admit the Prior, followed by a closely-veiled woman.

Digitized by Google

"You have done enough for to-day, Brother Martin," said Anselm kindly. "Go and take your well-earned rest."

Instead of obeying the old monk stood, as if dazed, fumbling for his rosary.

"Go in peace, my brother!" repeated the Prior.

"My father," stammered Martin, "I have committed the deadly sin of sloth, I fell asleep over my Office, I neglected my charge, and when I woke I thought the dead had moved!"

"The dead?" exclaimed the Prior and his companion in one breath, and the former bent down to feel if the Syrian's pulse still beat.

"Go, my brother, and sin no more, God will pardon thine offence, for thou art old and weak."

Brother Martin found his rosary at last, and resumed his mumbled prayers as he slowly made his way out of the cell. When the last sound of his heavy footsteps had died away the Prior led the veiled figure to the low stool whereon the monk had slumbered and prayed, and, in a low tone, resumed an evidently interrupted narrative.

"Yes, my dear daughter, the King has obeyed the command of Holy Church and appeared this morning before the Council appointed by His Holiness to enquire into this matter of his marriage. One who was there told me that his Majesty comported himself as became a Christian monarch."

"May God be with him and guide him now and ever;" prayed the veiled figure in a voice of emotion.

"The Council has not arrived at a decision, but it is easy to foretell that it will be in your favour. Justice will at last be done to you, my dear daughter. You, and you alone, will be Queen of France!"

The old monk stood, as if dazed, fumbling for his rosary.

Ingeburge raised her veil, and the tears gathered in her eyes as she murmured:

"Queen of France! Say rather, the wife of Philip Augustus! The throne has no charms for me save when shared with my lord and King."

Prior Anselm smiled wonderingly. He could not fathom the love of this gentle heart, which no cruelty or neglect had been able to crush.

"You remember, my daughter, that you asked permission to help in nursing our poor sick folk, and for a whole week I have hesitated to fulfil my promise to you, but, when this man was brought here by the King's command——"

"By the King's command?" interrupted Ingeburge.

"I said to myself," quietly pursued the Prior, "that he should be the first patient to be tended by the Queen. God be with you, my daughter!" and after a few whispered injunctions Anselm quitted the cell.

The sun set, the after-glow faded, and evening deepened into night. The narrow cell was in darkness, save for a pale ray of moonlight which cast a shadowy haze over the figure of the sick man, who still slept on while the white-robed Queen knelt beneath the Crucifix.

At last there came a sigh out of the ghostly silence, and before Ingeburge could rise from her knees, a faint voice cried:

"Am I alone?"

Mahmoud-el-Reis thought he was dreaming, when, instead of the monotonous drone of the old monk, he heard the sweetest tones that had fallen on his ear for many a long day, answer gently:

"No, my brother, you are not alone. There is one here who watches over you and prays for you."

The words seemed to give fresh life to his weak spirit, and he thought: "If I were a thousand leagues from here, in the scented forests where the rose trees hang their flower-laden branches over the ancient bed of a mountain torrent, I should say: 'I have heard the voice of Dilah, my beloved!'"

His long sleep had strengthened and refreshed him, so that he could now raise himself in bed with comparative ease. His eyes sought eagerly to pierce the darkness and look upon the owner of this sweet voice.

"Where are you?" he asked.

There was no answer, but he heard the friction of flint and steel and saw one or two sparks emitted. Then came silence and darkness again. She was evidently a novice and unskilled in such matters.

"Give it to me," he said. "My chest burns like fire and my throat is parched. I could bear it better if I might see the light."

What he really wanted was to see the face of the woman who had spoken so gently to him. He was not a man to waste time, and he said to Montruel that morning: "If there are only men about the Queen it may take me a day, but if there is one woman, I can do it in an hour."

He held out his hand, and heard a light step cross the cell, then felt the contact of cool, soft fingers with his own fevered ones, which tried to press the little hand in his, but it escaped him and he only held the flint and steel.

In a few seconds the lamp which hung above the bed was lighted, and the Syrian saw the slight, youthful form of a woman dressed in white, whose features were concealed by a long gauze veil.

Ingeburge watched with deep interest the awakening faculties of this strange man who had laid so long in his deathlike sleep. His dark, piercing eyes had regained much of their wonted brilliancy, and were fixed upon her with an intensity which both fascinated and repelled her. She felt a strange power in this man, who was so different from any she had ever seen before, even while his bodily weakness appealed to her womanly sympathy. Mindful of her self-chosen task, she poured the contents of a small phial into a cup which stood beside his pillow and handed it to him.

Digitized by Google

He pushed it away with a gesture of repugnance, saying:

"Water! give me a draught of cold, pure water!"

"But this is a healthful remedy," she protested gently.

Mahmoud was still looking at her with his glittering eyes, now brightened by returning fever and excitement, and his voice sounded low and strange as he asked:

"How long have Christian maidens hidden their faces like the slaves of the East?"

"Drink this cooling draught, my brother," was the only response; but the voice sounded as if the speaker was smiling.

She shrank from the Syrian.

He refused the drug, however, and would drink only cool water. As he handed her back the cup all signs of remaining weakness vanished as if by a miracle.

"Thank you, maiden," he said, in a voice so deep and melodious that it was to Ingeburge as if someone else must have entered the cell. She started, and took the empty cup he was holding out to her. He then turned so that the light did not fall upon his own features, and prepared for conquest.

"Maiden," he began gently, "you are kind and helpful, and the Almighty ever rewards mercy and virtue. The sacred poets say that the Prophet gave the rich dates of Aroen to Sidda, the wife of Moses, in return for a cup of water. I am Jean Cador, the carver of images, to whom princes speak with deference. The chief of your priests in Paris will pay me for my statue with its weight in gold. I am willing to share that gold with you, maiden. What think you?"

Ingeburge made him no answer, not because she was offended at his offer, but because she was trying to remember when and where she had heard the name of Jean Cador. It seemed familiar, and after a time it dawned upon her that Eve had mentioned it in her long story of men and things, but no clear idea was connected with it in the Queen's mind.

"Do you not care to be rich, maiden?" persisted the Syrian, turning his head so as to try and see her face in the light of the lamp.

She was still very young, and had her share of that curiosity with which her sex is accredited, so, as this adventure appeared interesting, she determined to lead the stranger on to say more.

"Oh, yes, my brother. I should like to be rich, of course!"

Mahmoud-el-Reis began to think that an hour would be too long to win this woman, and he continued eloquently:

"Riches, riches are like the costly varnish that a cunning painter puts upon his work to bring out the depth and wealth of his colouring—riches can procure that which can enhance even beauty itself!"

"With riches, my brother, one can comfort many sorrows and heal many wounds," said Ingeburge gently.

The Moslem stopped, and for a moment he hesitated before spreading anew the net he had prepared to catch this young girl. A feeling of respect for her simple kindliness, for her purity, her innocence, chained his tongue for a while, but he might not go back, so he changed his tactics; for human nature can be led astray by the hope of doing good as well as by the grosser forms of evil.

"And there is so much suffering in the world," he resumed; "so many who languish in want and misery in this great city of Paris! Thank God, my gifts would not be wasted on selfish pleasures! Instead of decking your brow with costly jewels you would adorn your soul with deeds of mercy."

Ingeburge was still abstracted, struggling to remember what Eve had told her about this Jean Cador, for he seemed to have a kindly heart, though he spoke like one who was in ignorance of Christian faith and practice.

"Did you think, my brother, that you would find women in this holy retreat who were addicted to the vanities of this world?"

Mahmoud felt he was losing time, so he drew from his vest a richly-embroidered silk purse full of gold, and held it out to her, quite expecting to see some sign of a desire to possess the handsome gift, in spite of her pious words. She was too absorbed in her own tormenting thoughts to take much notice of it, and, cynic as he was, he attributed her indifference to dissimulation. Changing his tone, he said:

"I have heard that the King's first wife is confined in this Abbey; is it so, maiden?"

"Yes, they have told you truly," replied Ingeburge with now fully awakened interest.

"Do you happen to know anything of her?"

"Oh, yes, I know her."

"And perhaps you love her?"

"Yes, I—love—her," was the uncertain answer, for it had just flashed across Ingeburge's mind that the name of Jean Cador was coupled with another of fearful significance.

She shrank from the Syrian, as if the purse he still held out to her had been a poisoned dagger, and with faltering voice and strained eyes she cried:

"You have another name?"

"Yes, I have," was the calm reply.

Ingeburge's knees gave way beneath her, and a deadly fear seized her heart.

"God in Heaven! if this is my last hour, have pity on Thy child, and pardon my sinful soul!"

She believed that Jean Cador was the same as Mahmoud-el-Reis, who had come to Paris to kill the Queen, and this mixture of truth and error had brought yet another thought, which pierced her heart with unspeakable anguish—he had been sent by the King.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

THE TOY DOG.

THERE is nothing so pathetic as a little stuffed canton flannel dog, standing on a mantel where it was put by a little hand now quiet in the grave. The wee toddler is dead and gone, but still the little toy dog keeps watch day by day for the coming of its baby master. It seems to gaze out of its shoe-button eyes with a longing for its little playmate, and the heart-sick parents gently dust the treasured toy and sigh for the bright-eyed lad who will no more try to pat the sawdust stuffing out of the home-made pup with a tin horn. But if the baby boy continues to eat three meals a day as usual, the little toy dog is not such a pathetic animal.

My boy shows no signs of quick consumption, appendicitis, or even colic. I don't believe he would die by special request. He seems destined to live to be as great and good as his father one of these days.

When my wife constructed the canton flannel dog, we viewed it with unalloyed satisfaction. It was a bright-red dog of a hitherto unknown breed. It was plumper in the legs than any dog I had ever seen. In fact, it seemed to have started with the idea of being a particularly robust elephant, then humped itself into a camel, and ended by donning a snout like a hog.

When we gave it to our boy on Christmas morning with the somewhat untruthful assertion that it had been left by Santa Claus, it required a great deal of persuasion to make the boy believe it was a dog. He had come to know a dog by name when he saw one, and he was sceptical. I cannot blame him. Even to this day I wonder at the boundless faith he evinced when he at last accepted his mother's assertion that it was "a nice 'ittle doggie." If she had told him it was a nice 'ittle hippopotamus, or a nice 'ittle Agathaumas sphenocerus, reconstructed from remains found in the cretaceous deposits, his faith would have been less remarkable.

As it was, he folded the thing to his youthful bosom, and repeated the statement that it was a "nice 'ittle doggie." It was his first lie.

Then he played with it. With a glad cry he threw it on to the piano, and knocked a costly vase I had given my wife into ten thousand pieces. For a moment he mourned for the dog, and then he began eating sections of vase under the impressions that they were French confections. It took the combined efforts of my wife and two doctors to extract the sections of vase from our boy's throat. Then we gave him a picture book, and put the dog safely away on the mantelpiece.

Shortly after we heard the eight day clock fall to the floor with a crash. Also fell: two Dresden china shepherds, a glass jar containing chrysanthemums, a bronze Mercury, and several pieces of bric-a-brac that were broken into such small fragments that they were beyond identification. But our boy had the red dog, and he was happy.

"Me dot nice 'ittle doggie," he remarked calmly.

After that we removed everything breakable, and let our boy and the dog do their worst. Their worst was two panes of glass.

That evening when the boy was tucked in his little bed I calculated the damage he and his pet were responsible for, and I was ready to write something pathetic about canton flannel dogs. But I did not. Instead, I read a few chapters in a book my wife had given me. Then we were ready for bed.

I took the water jug, and started up stairs followed by my wife bearing the lamp. It was a big lamp, and she needed both hands to carry it. When I reached the step next the last my foot alighted squarely on something soft and rolly. It was the red dog. First I said something, and then I did a back somersault with great rapidity and considerable abandonment. On my way down I met my wife coming up. She seemed to change her mind suddenly, and decided to go down with me. It was very kind and thoughtful of her, but I really did not appreciate the kindness of her act when she carelessly hit me on the head with the lamp. Afterwards she claimed that it was I who hit her on the head with the water jug. It is still an unsettled question.

When we reached the bottom she was sitting on my head with the lamp jammed into my neck, down which the oil was running in a warm stream.

We were both badly damaged, but when we recovered sufficient sense to see clearly, we beheld the red dog smiling down upon us from the step next to the top.

Without a word I crawled up the stairs, and grasping that unearthly canine by the head I ripped it open from stem to stern with my knife, while his sawdust filler trickled out upon the stair.

The dog had an existence of one day, and he doesn't stand on the mantel. He is a dead dog, and before I let my boy have another such dangerous beast I would rather present him with a full-blooded bull dog, for that style of dog can at least be chained to the leg of the piano. Don't talk to me about little toy dogs and pathos. If you must read tales of stuffed pups and departed kids, please wait until the scent of embrocation disappears from the atmosphere of our humble home.

E. S.

If You Want a Book Write and Tell Us.

Every week we give away half-a-dozen books.

All a competitor has to do is to send us one Book Coupon cut from The Sunday Reader, one from the Athletic Record, and one from Short Stories.

All applications to be addressed to "BOOKS," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please let me have: S. S.

Book.....

Price.....

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Result of the "Book" Competition for the Week Ending April 2nd.

Miss Ada E. Gilmour, 35 Helix Gardens, Brixton Hill, S.W. "Darkness and Dawn." By Farrar. 7s. 6d.

Leo. W. Judd, 2 Alfred Villas, Stanton Road, Barnes. "Exercises for Health." By H. H. Hulbert and Luis J. Phelan. 3s. 6d.

F. T. Gibson, 24 Elmwood Street, Sunderland. "Marcella." By Mrs. Humphrey Ward. 6s.

Albert G. Pope, 64 Constance Street, Silvertown, E. "The Soul of Lilith." By Marie Corelli. 6s.

R. T. Muir, 43 Arlingford Road, Brixton, S.W. "More Tramps Abroad." By Mark Twain. 6s.

W. Rees, 16 Alexandra Road, Broadstairs. "The Moonstone." By Wilkie Collins. 3s. 6d.

Digitized by Google

Stories of the Stock Exchange.

3 The Great Conspiracy

Unearthed and Re-Edited by Robert Machray.

There was sore discontent in the City. Something like settled gloom rested upon the great majority of the brokers, jobbers, and other operators on 'Change.

And yet there was no specially bad news. There was no rumour current at the moment of any tremendous defeat at the hands of Napoleon, although there were tales of dark doings in Spain. But it was undoubtedly the case that there was something ominous, something threatening, something even deadly in the air of the Stock Exchange.

There was nothing on the surface, however, that seemed to account for it. As a matter of fact, a great transaction had just been completed with extraordinary success. The Government had come into the market by means of its accredited agents, and had borrowed a large sum with as much ease as one man might have in borrowing half-a-crown from another. In former years, and these not so long ago, the raising of a loan, even with the nation as security, would have been a matter for long and protracted negotiation.

Indeed, there were men who had made it their chief business to raise difficulties, real or imaginary, in the way of the Government on such occasions. In other words, they would have endeavoured to have made the nation pay as high a price as possible for the money it borrowed. The result of these tactics was that there were plenty of splendid pickings for all and sundry on the Stock Exchange.

Here was a change indeed. For, with the exception of two or three people, no one had benefited by the Government loan which had been placed on the market. True, the Treasury had obtained the supplies it required both cheaply and quickly, and the country, as a whole, was so much the better for it.

What had that to do with the thing, asked the disgusted brokers. What were the Government or the country, forsooth, but pieces—big pieces, of course, but still pieces—on the board of the great game played week in, week out, of speculation? And if this were so, why should not everybody have a hand in it? Why should it be reserved for a select few?

So the situation was summed up by Mr. Joel Rosenthal, as he sat in a room in the "City of London Tavern." He was the centre of a little group of men, upon whose faces were looks of determination, of bitter resentment, and even of fierceness. They were brokers, jobbers, dealers, intermediaries of one sort or another between those who bought and those who sold on the Stock Exchange.

It was after business hours, and on the table in front of them stood glasses of punch, which, however, appeared to have been touched but little, so earnest and absorbing had been their conversation. Now, as that May day of 1810 drew to its close, and the candles were lit by the attentive Perkins, who had so long been head-waiter at the well-known inn, they drew their seats more closely together, and their talk proceeded in somewhat stealthy whisperings.

"It's a shame, an infernal shame! that's what it is," said one.

"'Tis more than a shame," said Rosenthal. "'Tis taking the bread out of all our mouths, and putting it into the mouth of a single man. If it continues we shall not be able to live. There will be nothing

Copyright, 1898, by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., in the United States of America.

Digitized by Google

left for us to do. There must be a change, and that speedily, or we shall all starve."

"Aye, but what is to be done?" asked a third. "He has grown so great, he has waxed so fat, he has become so monstrous rich, that he carries everything before him."

"He must be put an end to somehow," said Rosenthal.

Here one of the party looked at the last speaker somewhat strangely across the table.

"Yet everybody knows that you, yourself, are related to him. Will he do nothing for you?" he asked.

these Goldsmids came over from Holland to London some forty years ago. He was not exactly a rich man when he began business, but he was of that nature to which money-making is an instinct. He was of the sort who grow rich where most others would have remained poor. To him were born sons and daughters—the sons inherited his ability in finance. His daughters married diamond merchants, but the sons—this one amongst them, inherited something more than their father's skill in business, something more than the money which he left them."

Rosenthal stopped—impressively, as one about to make a startling statement. Those who listened to

The situation was summed up by Mr. Joel Rosenthal, as he sat in a room in the "City of London Tavern."

"No, confound him," said Rosenthal. "I hate him with all my heart, and I, for one, would be prepared to do anything almost to bring him to ruin."

"But how? It will be no slight affair, no ordinary combination that will bring that about."

"I think it can be done. His firm has no friends left on the Stock Exchange. He has purchased his success at everybody's expense. Just let the opportunity be given, and you shall see how his enemies will rejoice. Nay, I will tell you more than this."

He paused for a moment. Then, his gaze having swept slowly and almost solemnly round the table, he told them one of the strangest stories ever listened to by mortal ears.

"You all know, or have heard, that the father of him wondered what could be coming. To them it seemed as if there was well-nigh nothing left for the Goldsmids to be possessed of, either by inheritance or by any other way.

"They inherited—a curse." Rosenthal's voice, sibilant, menacing, had a curious thrill in it.

The men whom he addressed were hard, unsentimental, incredulous.

"A curse!" said one, with a laugh. "A curse! his is the talk of children. Do you mean to say, Joel Rosenthal, that you believe in such stuff as that? A curse! Drivel!" and again he laughed harshly.

"I say 'tis no childish nonsense this. Do we not all know that there are things," replied Rosenthal, "that——. But listen first to my story. None of you perhaps knew Israel, the Wizard. Wizard—that's the nearest I can come to it in your tongue. In Hebrew we called him Baal Shem—a sooth-sayer, diviner, seer—a man who could foretell what was in the future."

Digitized by Google

Rosenthal's manner was that of one so convinced of the truth of what he was speaking about that the others forgot their unbelief for the moment, and were all attention.

"Israel was the greatest friend that Aaron Goldsmid had. They were the closest intimates. A great part of Aaron's success was no doubt due to the advice given him by the Baal Shem. But Israel had no spells which would prevent his own death, and in course of time he died. While he lay upon his death-bed he confided to Goldsmid a sealed package.

"He gave Aaron a message at the same time, even as he drew his last breath. It was to the effect that so long as that mysterious package was in the possession of the Goldsmid family they would have such prosperity as was beyond all dreams of avarice. 'A time will come,' said the dying man, 'when the package must be opened, wait for it. You will know the season by'—then the death rattle took him, choked him, and silenced him for ever."

"He gave Aaron a message at the same time, even as he drew his last breath."

There was another pause.

"What has all this to do with us? How can it help us to come by our rights, for such they are, and to overthrow this leviathan who swallows up everything?" asked one man, less moved than the others.

"I have not yet finished my story," said Rosenthal. "Aaron Goldsmid knew that the dying lips of the seer could not utter a falsehood, but the message he had left was incomplete. When was the time to arrive at which the package was to be opened? He had been told to wait for it, but till when? That weighed upon his mind so much that he became restless and troubled. Perhaps you will say that it was merely superstition, but he believed in what the wizard had said.

"Aaron Goldsmid died suddenly—that everybody knows. But it is not so generally known what was the manner of his death. It is known, however, in his own family, and by those who are connected with it. As time passed on, the mystery of the sealed package so worked upon him that he felt compelled at last to open it. Wrapping after wrapping was removed, until at length he came upon a single sheet of parchment, upon which were written in the sacred, almost forgotten characters of the oldest form of our language, that in which the law was given, a prophecy of what was to be.

"He who first broke these seals, graven with the device stamped on them by the ring of the Baal Shem, was to bring about his own fate by his very act. A mortal sickness was to seize upon him. How, why, I cannot tell. But Aaron Goldsmid died that day."

"A strange tale, sure enough," said he who had spoken before. "But of what use to us?"

"A true story; I know it is true," said another, a Jew like Rosenthal.

"Nor was that all," said Rosenthal. "Here I speak, however, of what I do not know for certain, but of what I have heard half-hinted with bated breath amongst ourselves. It is that the prophecy went on to say that the children of Aaron Goldsmid were to be cut off suddenly and unexpectedly when at the very height of their prosperity. Kings were to be their guests, and their state was to be that of princes. Yet in the midst of this golden time of theirs they were to wither away and perish.

"Now, what has already happened? Did not one son die mysteriously—cut off in the midst of his wealth and power? 'Twas said to be the gout, but 'twas by violence, though that is not the report.

"Abraham Goldsmid cannot forget what was said by the Baal Shem. What is written is written—there is no saying that is truer than that. Rich and powerful as he is, he carries about with him that canker at his heart. For years he has had everything his own way. There has been no check to the flow of his prosperity. But if there should be a change—don't you see—the mere recollection of that fatal prophecy will paralyse his nerves and palsy his brains. Then he does not forget how his brother perished."

Digitized by Google

When he had ceased speaking he looked carefully into each face to see what the effect of his words had been. One of them asked: "Is it true?"

"It is true—I know," again said the Jew who had given a similar testimony already.

"Yes, it is true; every word of it!" said Rosenthal. "You all know me, and the sort of man I am in business. I am no weakling to place belief in old wives' fables. But this is true.

"Let us look at the position of affairs," went on Rosenthal. "Is there a single member of the Stock Exchange who will not gladly help him on to his downfall? Let but the tide go against him ever so little, and there is not a mouth in the City that will not find breath enough to try to strand and wreck him upon the shore."

"But how to bring about that change?" asked one.

"I was going to add," continued Rosenthal, "it needs not so much as you might suppose, for that ever-present fear of his will prove his worst foe."

Then Rosenthal, who had evidently given the subject much consideration, outlined a scheme, bold and yet cunning, for the downfall of the House of Goldsmid.

It was discussed and adopted, each man pledging himself to work with a single eye to its success, and to endeavour by every possible means to get the co-operation of others. Thereupon they separated in a determined and hopeful mood.

During the time that this conversation had been going on, the old head-waiter, good Tom Perkins, had several times entered the room to see if further refreshments were required. Being by nature a bit of a gossip, like most waiters, and more privileged than most, he had managed to hear snatches of their talk. Being also a man much learned in human nature—as indeed is the case with those of his calling—he guessed not only from what he had heard, but also from what he saw, that there was mischief afoot.

As a general thing, Perkins would have said that it was no affair of his. "Gen'l'm'n in the City would be up to their tricks; 'twas their way," he had often told himself, for he knew very well that tricks, as he called them, were part of the game. But the name of Goldsmid, however, had reached his ears; that name made all the difference. He could never hear it uttered without having a certain moistness about his eyes.

And the way of it was this:

One day the world, so far as Perkins was concerned, had, to all intents and purposes, come to an end. He owed a debt he could not pay—'twas not much, being only a matter of £50 or so, but it was just as far beyond his means as if the sum involved had spelt millions. As he had been shining up the silver in the dining-room of the tavern, he had felt the bailiff's hand upon his shoulder.

He could not have felt worse if it had been the hand of death. He was arrested. What was to become of his wife and their five children! Prevailing upon the officer to let him wait at table during the mid-day meal, he fulfilled his duties with so melancholy an air that it attracted the attention of Abraham Goldsmid, who inquired what the matter was.

Goldsmid was a kindly soul, and Perkins, who waited on him daily, was a favourite of his. Bursting into tears, Perkins told him how he was placed.

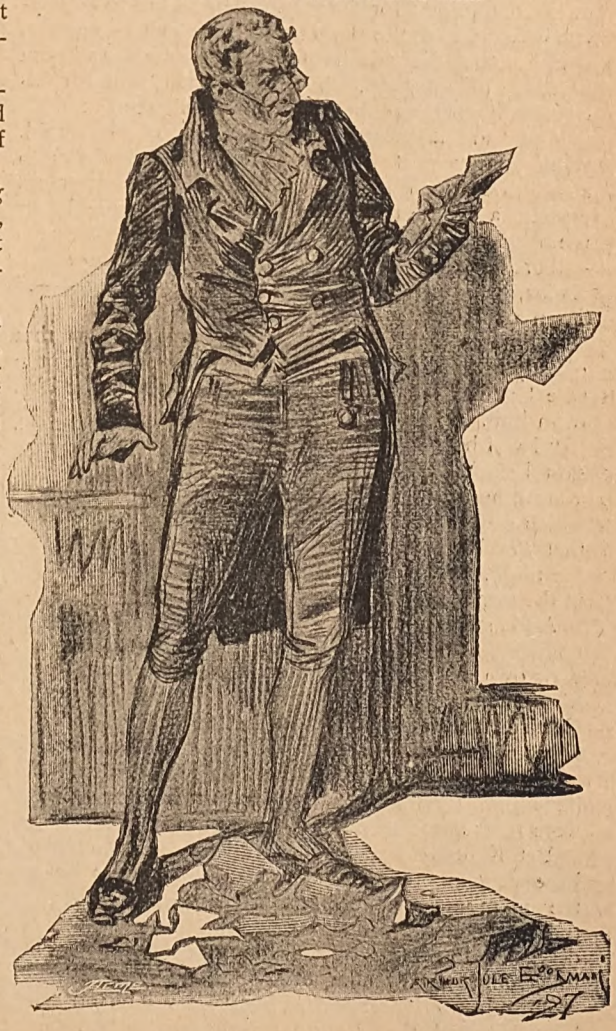
"'Tain't for myself," said Tom, "but for my wife and the poor children at home. I don't know what on earth will become of them."

"How much is it, Tom?" asked Goldsmid.

"Fifty-five pounds," he replied.

"Tuts, tuts, man. I'll put that right for you."

And then the great banker had instantly drawn forth his cheque-book, and filled up an order for a hundred pounds, which he handed to Tom. No, Tom was never likely to forget that. Henceforth, the name of Goldsmid was sacred to him.



At length he came upon a single sheet of parchment.

Google

What was he to do? At least he might give a warning, the warning which would forearm. And the sooner the better—that was plain enough. So that evening Perkins went to the banker's house, but found he had gone to his country mansion at Roehampton, where a great banquet was being given. Urged by his spirit of gratitude, Tom procured a horse, which he mounted with fear and trembling, as he was no horseman, and set out along the Richmond Road. It was not, however, until far in the night that he was able to get speech with Goldsmid, and to tell him of what he more than suspected.

It had been a magnificent entertainment, graced by the presence of Royalty itself, and in every way worthy of the wealth and taste of a king of finance. Goldsmid was in high spirits, both on account of the success of his dinner-party and also because the King that very day had graciously given him a pardon for a Jew, a poor member of the synagogue, who had been condemned for forgery. He was in too benevolent a mood at the moment to think evil of anyone.

He listened good-humouredly enough as Tom unfolded his tale, and, while he thanked him for his thoughtfulness, was inclined to make light of it.

"You are a grateful fellow, Perkins," he said. "But your regard for me, I think, has led you to attach too much importance to what was after all perhaps a chance meeting. Whoever they were, I fear them not. As for plots and tricks and stratagems—there are always plenty of them on the Stock Exchange. And threatened men live long——." Then a sort of shadow passed over his face.

What was Goldsmid thinking of? Was it of that ghostly bequest of destiny, of which he was now the sole legatee? If so, he immediately shook the idea from him.

"I will bear in mind what you have done, Perkins," said he. "Nay, stop a minute." And, generous to a fault, he presented to the man a handful of guineas which he took from his pocket. Then he gave orders that Perkins should be given food and a place for the night, and so dismissed the man and the matter at the same instant.

And small wonder. For years past, the great financial firm of the Goldsmids had more than held their own in their rivalry for the Government loans with such people as the Couttses, the Grotes, the Curtises, and others of the principal magnates of the City. The chief cashier of the Bank of England was practically their partner. The Barings, then becoming pillars of a world-wide financial power, were their associates.

Yet if he had reflected a little longer, he might have remembered that they had few friends among the members of the Stock Exchange; how very few these friends were in number had as yet not been disclosed to him. In fact, his great prosperity had lulled him into a feeling of false security.

Now, in no department of affairs, can it be too much kept in mind that "eternal vigilance is the price of safety." This is especially true of the Stock Exchange. It was not many days before he found out that his vigilance had slept, and so experienced how precarious are the foundations of even a vast fortune when beat upon by the storms and tempests of Capel-court.

All through the summer of that year the storm had been gathering. It was now about to break. Rosenthal was the prime mover, and in him it possessed a spirit at once bold and resolute, cold as the grave and as pitiless. The unerring judgment of the man was shown by his selecting for the field of battle, as it were, the greatest single Government loan which had ever been placed upon the market at one time.

In May of that year, Mr. Perceval, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had announced in his Budget speech to the House of Commons that a loan nominally of the amount of twelve millions sterling, but which with the premium came to fourteen millions sterling—the three per cents. in those days ranged between sixty and seventy—had been taken up by the firms of Goldsmid and Co. and Baring and Co.

In other words, Abraham Goldsmid, for he was the real principal, had contracted for the whole loan.

It was not, however, until far in the night that he was able to get speech with Goldsmid.

Digitized by Google

Of course, it was his purpose to sell the Funds represented by this loan to the public through the Stock Exchange in the usual way at a considerable premium. If the operation were successful he would realise an immense profit. On former occasions in regard to other loans he had met with no difficulty in following a similar course, nor did he anticipate any other sequel now.

At the beginning certainly everything looked favourable enough.

The "Omnium"* towards the end of June, was quoted at a premium of one and one quarter per cent. In July, however, there was a sudden change.

In one of the purlieus of Fleet Street there had been written and printed a pamphlet which appeared to prove conclusively that the French, with that everlasting bogey of a Bonaparte at their head, were quietly and secretly taking all the gold out of the country. Few people would suspect, said the writer, that many a herring-boat was dispatched from the English coast with a cargo not of fish but of guineas.

This precious pamphlet was the first act of Rosenthal, and it was strangely and unexpectedly productive of results. The words of the pamphlet echoed throughout the country, and induced many of the real money holders to sell the Funds out of sheer fright that Britain might become bankrupt.

Taking immediate advantage of this opening, and with a view to increase its effects, he caused some of his associates to offer stock at 20 per cent. under the market-price if payment were made for it in gold.

Simultaneously with these proceedings, Rosenthal and his friends managed to procure from the collectors and receivers of the National revenue so large an amount of floating securities, such as Exchequer bills and India bonds, that Goldsmid, in spite of all his money, found it impossible to keep the price of the "omnium" up, and by the end of August it was at a discount of two per cent.

Goldsmid struggled desperately against these serried ranks of sellers—selling, selling, selling, ever selling the Funds. They hung about his agents; they hustled them on 'Change, they hooted at and guyed them. If his brokers opened their mouths to ask a price, that very moment there seemed to be a signal given, and the quotation appeared to be here a sixteenth, there an eighth, there a quarter, here a full half, below the last—always a little lower.

The struggle began to tell upon him. He became fitful, morose, depressed. The tell-tale lines of the face deepened. The eyes grew weary. Strange bursts of temper shook the man. Nor was it singular, when it was known that he was now losing money to the tune of something like £100,000 a day.

The whisper went round that the House of Goldsmid was going, and the conspirators lost no opportunity of painting the situation as even blacker than it really was. In every way within their power they laboured to destroy the credit of his firm, and credit is one of those delicate things which will not stand much of this kind of business. But as yet Goldsmid held his head proudly enough, and honoured every demand upon him.

The well-known figure of the banker was seen, one day, passing along Lombard Street.

The first fortnight of that September, however, showed that the struggle was only beginning, and that the worst had yet to come. Delighted with their success, the band of plotters were incessant in their activity, and when they had brought the "omnium" down to a discount of four per cent. by the fourteenth of the month, Goldsmid for the first time realised that the fight was one to the death.

His losses now amounted, it was said quite openly—and the openness with which it was said was in itself the worst of all signs—to between one and two millions sterling.

It was at this very time that there occurred an incident which was trifling in its character, but which had the most marked effect upon Goldsmid himself and upon the whole Stock Exchange.

The well-known figure of the banker was seen, one

*"Omnium" meant the various kinds of stock covering the National debt in which a loan was eventually absorbed, or, to make the matter more easily understood, a person purchasing a certain quantity of "omnium," purchased given proportions of the various descriptions of Government securities. In those days there were the three, four, five per cents., the Navy five's, India bonds, besides consols, &c.

Digitized by Google

day, passing along Lombard Street. It was noticed that his body was bent as if with fatigue, and that his whole appearance showed symptoms of cruel strain. His eyes were fixed, as if upon some object which he saw in front of him, and he turned neither to the right nor to the left in his steps. He seemed utterly absorbed.

Suddenly a bull, which had escaped from the hands of a butcher, rushed down the street, and before the banker could move out of its way it had knocked him down and trodden upon him. There were many who said that it was an evil omen. Amongst those who went to Goldsmid's assistance was Tom Perkins, the head-waiter of the "City of London Tavern." Tom had no idea that it was an omen, good or bad, but he saw the accident which had befallen his benefactor, and with the help of two others made haste to carry him into the inn, where, presently, Goldsmid revived.

When he came to himself, having been made somewhat dazed by what had happened, he kept murmuring to himself in a childish fashion, and Tom at first could make no sense out of his babblings. But after a while Goldsmid fully recovered, and demanded that he should be left alone. As Tom remained after the others, anxiously inquiring if there was anything he could do for him, Goldsmid said—

"Ah, my man, if I only could have seen how much there was behind what you told me a few weeks ago, how very different would be my case. But how could I tell? You may still, however, do me a great service. You told me that you overheard some men devising a plot against me. You never told me their names. Tell me now. Who was their leader?"

In the course of his daily avocations at the tavern, which was frequented by so many members of the Stock Exchange, Perkins had heard several rumours of how Goldsmid was being "hurt" in trying to dispose of the loan for which he had contracted with the Government. His sympathies were, of course, with Goldsmid.

"I am under the deepest obligation, sir, to you," said honest Tom, "and you have a right to ask me to do almost anything in return. It was Mr. Rosenthal, a relative of your own, if I mistake not, who appeared to be the chief speaker at the meeting of which I told you."

"Rosenthal! Joel!" exclaimed Goldsmid. "Ah, he is implacable. He has neither forgiven nor forgotten how I refused him the hand of my brother's daughter." And, muttering to himself, "Bad, bad, bad," insisted upon leaving the tavern at once.

But Rosenthal had yet one more card to play, one more deadly stroke to deliver, and that by far the most fatal of all.

On the Monday following the accident the market was in a state of semi-panic. Several failures of merchants of fairly high standing were announced. The "Bears" were bolder than ever, and the discount on "omnium" went down to seven per cent. Amongst those who were watching what was going on was a director of the East India Company. Rosenthal addressed him, as he knew him well.

"A word with you in private, if you please."

They moved aside into a quiet part of the street.

"I may be mistaken, sir," said Rosenthal, "but your Company was reported to have placed bonds to a large figure in the hands of Goldsmid and Co. to dispose of. Am I right?"

"Quite right," he replied. "I can see no harm in telling you that the firm has half a million of our bonds, for which they agreed to pay us a certain sum some time ago."

"There are sinister rumours afloat. It might be a matter of wisdom to call for that money at once—to-morrow might be too late."

"I am your debtor for the hint. I shall see about the matter at once."

That very day the half million in cash was called for by the East India Company. This got to be known, and many who had deposits with the Goldsmids demanded their immediate payment.

For all the rest of that terrible week Abraham Goldsmid stood like a lion at bay, but sick at heart, and with a dreadful fear that overwhelming disaster was coming upon him. "Omnium" declined as low as eight per cent., then ten, discount.

On the day when that took place, Goldsmid made a last effort. He even went so far as to send a message to his traitorous kinsman, Rosenthal — a proceeding which was as the bitterness of death to him. Whatever it was he asked for, the only reply he received was: "Your time has come. Remember what was written."

Remember what was written! "After all," the said to himself, "no man can escape his fate." A few hours later he was dead—dead, by his own act.

It made a great sensation, for Goldsmid had done many a kindly and even noble deed. When Rosenthal heard of it he shrugged his shoulders and said: "To every dog his day."

Goldsmid's losses were Rosenthal's gains. But the time came when a fate not very different from that of the man he had plotted so successfully against was his own, and, no doubt, there were not a few who were ready enough also to say: "To every dog his day."

Digitized by Google

£10, £5, £3, £1 CASH PRIZES.

NO DIVISION. NO PRIZE LESS THAN £1.

GRAND PRIZE COMPETITION.

BONA-FIDE AND GENUINE.

As guarantee we have deposited the solution with our Bankers, together with a substantial sum as provision for the payment of Prizes in connection with this unparalleled offer, which we have decided to renew.

RENEWAL NOTICE.

To advertise the surprising efficacy of our High-class Specialité, we shall give away the above CASH PRIZES in Competition to Purchasers (United Kingdom only) of a box of the KAROL UNIQUE VOICE AND THROAT PILLETS, price 1s. 1½d., post free 1s. 4d. (Competitors may, at their option, purchase the 2s. 9d. size, which contains three times as many Pillets, and is therefore better value.) In connection with this advertising scheme we are prepared to spend a large sum of money. This is a free offer to our customers, there being no entry fee.

"Such an opportunity may ne'er occur again."

Seize this unusual opportunity to win a Cash Prize. There is no difficulty. Everyone should try. The Competition simply requires the filling in correctly of missing letters to complete four sets of words indicated below in skeleton, having reference to

THE KAROL UNIQUE VOICE AND THROAT PILLETS.

1. K...L U....E V...E A.D T....T P.....S
2. A.E I.....Y E.....T
3. A....N P.....Y I.....S
4. I.....E U.....S

The KAROL UNIQUE VOICE AND THROAT PILLETS are prepared from a special formula, designed to promote and safeguard the welfare of the Voice and Throat. Soothing in their operation, they yet are Incredibly Efficient, while at the same time their Action is Pre-eminently Innocuous. They are of Incalculable Usefulness to all who have frequently to use their voice in singing or speaking, as a Voice Tonic, Pleasant to the Taste, and as a Protective against Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, etc. The Cash Prizes will be awarded as follows: To EACH Competing Purchaser who fills in correctly ALL THE WORDS, £10; 13 WORDS, £5; 11 WORDS, £3; 9 WORDS, £1. No prize awarded for less than 9 correct words.

DIRECTIONS.—This GENUINE OFFER OF PRIZES IS OPEN FOR A LIMITED PERIOD ONLY. ALL ANSWERS TO THIS ADVERTISEMENT SHOULD REACH US WITHIN THREE WEEKS. When you have found out your words, write them out in order (1, 2, 3, 4), giving name of this paper at top, and send on as soon as possible, with a postal order for 1s. 4d., for a box of KAROL PILLETS (1s. 1½d. for the pillets, the extra pence for postage, etc., on the box and results of Competition) and an addressed envelope to MUIR & CO. (S. T. Dept.), 23 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

The Prizes will be awarded promptly, the Competition closed, and results posted to all competitors as per competition coupon accompanying each box. If the KAROL PILLETS are not received within 7 or 8 days communicate with us, and at the same time repeat the solution sent with order.

IMPORTANT.—Write distinctly full name and address above the solution, enclose the addressed envelope required, and send in order without delay.

No Beauty Without White Teeth.

DR. EMY'S

ALBAZENE.

THE PUREST AND MOST ELEGANT DENTIFRICE IN THE WORLD.

TO KEEP YOUR TEETH SOUND KEEP THEM CLEAN.

Absolutely Uninjurious.

In boxes, 1s., of all Chemists, or Post Free from THE ALBAZENE COMPANY, 276 STRAND.

Digitized by Google

The Awakening.

A MONOLOGUE.

Oh, dear! I suppose I shall have to let it go! And how carefully I have treasured it! The gold in the setting is as bright now as it was when Arthur first slipped it on my finger, and stole the kiss that I could hardly (even if he had waited to ask for it), have refused. Three years ago! What a lot has happened in those three years! Then I was just a young girl; now, I feel an old woman. I was full of illusions then—only I didn't call them illusions. I don't think I really knew then what the word meant. Now I have almost forgotten that I ever had any, it seems so long since I lost them.

But, there, what is the good of thinking. It's getting late, and Florence must be back before Jack comes home or he'll be suspicious. Here it is, Florence; be very careful.

I feel horrid at parting with it; it seems somehow like giving away a part of one's self. But, then, what else was I to do? I can't ask Jack for any more money. When I asked him to pay Violette's bill, he made quite a scene about it—said I was horribly extravagant, and things "on 'Change" had been so bad lately, and he really didn't know whether we oughtn't to move into a cheaper house. That was only a week ago, and I really wouldn't dare to show him another bill so soon, and such a big one, too.

It can't really be a bit true about "on 'Change," I believe. A year ago Jack was quite different. Really I was much more extravagant then, and he never grumbled once. Only a year makes a lot of difference in a man, doesn't it, especially if he is your husband? I really believe Jack hardly cares for me a bit now. He's always out at the club, or kept late at the office, or something—especially something, I fancy. I believe we hardly spend one evening in a week together. And to think I might have married Arthur! Oh, what a fool I've been!

How well I remember that afternoon when Arthur brought me the ring. He said the stones in it were not half so bright as my eyes. Why doesn't Jack ever talk to me like that? But, then, Jack never did have much romance in his nature, and what little he had he seems to have lost now. Arthur was always different! There was caress in his voice, and the mere touch of his hand was a declaration of love. And I might have married him!

I wonder what Arthur is doing now? I've never seen him since. Perhaps he is dead; he never was very strong—not a bit like Jack; Jack's a regular horse; nothing ever seems to make him ill.

If there was anything else I could have sold I would never have let Arthur's ring go. But, there, I have nothing else so valuable. I remember how he told me that there were half a dozen people after that ring, and how he had only just managed to get it by outbidding them. It was frightfully extravagant of him, but, then, he loved me—ah—how he must have loved me! Jack would never dream of buying me a ring like that, and he's a great deal better off, whatever he chooses to say now, than poor Arthur ever was.

It's lucky Jack has never seen it; he would be sure to have asked embarrassing questions about it, and I am sure I don't know what I would have said. He nearly did see it that evening, too, when he came in suddenly as I was slipping it on and off my finger and watching the diamonds glitter in the firelight. How fortunate it was that I had just got into my frock for dinner, and how I trembled when Jack insisted on pinning in the roses at my breast. I thought his clumsy fingers would be sure to tumble across its hiding-place, and, indeed, once he actually touched it, but he never guessed what it was. He wondered why it was that I rushed upstairs for my handkerchief the moment we sat down to dinner, instead of sending Florence. But the minute I had to myself in my room was quite sufficient to dive down into my dress for the ring, and lock it up in its usual place.

Ten o'clock. What a time Florence is taking. Surely the shops aren't all shut! I thought those dreadful pawnbrokers were always open. I've always heard so. I wonder what I shall get for the ring—a hundred pounds at least, though, of course it's worth a great deal more than that. I know what I'll do—I'll pay the bill; that's—let me see, seventy-five pounds and then buy myself another ring with what's left. That will be like still having Arthur's ring—in a way—and I shan't feel quite so dreadful.

Ah, there's Florence at last! What a long time you have been! Give me the money! Three and sixpence! What do you say; 3s. 6d. for a ring like that? Eh—paste? My—er—er—you may go, Florence. Go! Don't you hear?

Think of it! That I should have been so deceived! Me, it's monstrous! That little wretch of an Arthur! I don't believe he ever cared for me at all. Paste! and all the lies he told me about it, too! Why, it's disgraceful—scandalous! And I—loved him! No, never! And yet—no, I am sure I didn't! Horrid—er—bother this pocket—where's my handkerchief? After all, what's the good of being a woman if one can't have a good cry sometimes? What's—what's—(sinks back into a chair and sobs passionately).

Why, it's past twelve! Jack said he would be home at twelve. I mustn't let him see I have been crying. And—yes, there's a key in the door now. It is Jack! I wonder if he will come upstairs or go into the smoking-room. I know I told him never to dare to come upstairs at this time, but I didn't really mean it. Listen—yes, he is coming upstairs; the dear old fellow; Oh, I am so glad! (Runs to the door and throws herself into her husband's arms.) Come and kiss me, Jack!

Grace Mann.

Digitized by Google

HERE'S SOMETHING FOR YOU.

CYCLES GIVEN AWAY

FREE, GRATIS, AND FOR NOTHING.

Nowadays everybody wants a Cycle—young, old, rich and poor alike. Unfortunately there are many people who cannot afford to purchase a Bicycle however much they may desire to have a real smart up-to-date machine. As a means of advertising and introducing their unrivalled preparation into every home, the Proprietors of HERBULINE, THE FINEST EMBROCATION IN THE WORLD, have arranged to give away, during the season, Ladies' and Gentlemen's Cycles. These machines will be supplied by the Coventry Cross Cycle Co. Ltd., of Coventry, Manchester, and London, where the Cycles are now on view, and the patterns selected are this celebrated firm's latest 1898 models (fitted with Dunlop Tyres), the prices of which are £20 each. Anyone and everyone can secure the Cycles, the very thing for the coming summer. All the HERBULINE Co. ask you to do is to introduce HERBULINE to your friends.

HERBULINE is sold by Chemists and Stores at 1s. 1½d. per bottle, postage 3d. extra. For full particulars of how to obtain a cycle, write direct to our London Office, mentioning "Short Stories," and enclosing 1s. 4½d. for a bottle of HERBULINE.

THE CYCLIST'S FRIEND. HERBULINE THE ATHLETE'S COMPANION.

The Finest Embrocation in the World.

WHAT IS IT?

HERBULINE is a herb composition which does not injure the skin and is for external use only; it is the only remedy which attacks the disease as soon as it is applied.

HERBULINE

Is the ONLY PROPRIETARY ARTICLE able to print a list of rapid results such as follows:

TOOTHACHE	cured in	30 Seconds.
NEURALGIA and TIC	„	20 Minutes.
EARACHE	„	10 Minutes.
CHILBLAINS	„	8 Hours.
RHEUMATISM	„	24 Hours.
LUMBAGO	„	24 Hours.
INFLUENZA	„	24 Hours.

WHAT CAN IT DO?

HERBULINE can and does cure. All that is necessary is to follow the instructions given with each bottle. Its merits are manifold. One trial convinces. Just try it. Thousands use it.

HERBULINE.

A CERTAIN CURE FOR

Bronchitis, Asthma, Sciatica, Inflammation, Pleurisy, Fever, Ague, Cramp, Croup, Lumbago, Sprains and Bruises.

THE HERBULINE CO., 54 BOW LANE, LONDON, E.C., AND GLASGOW.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, Giving a Beautiful Complexion and Pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

"JUNO" CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST

DIAMONDS from £10. 16/8 monthly. JUNO Lady's or Gents' Safety £12 12/- 21/- monthly. £14 14/-, 24/6 „ £16 16/-, 28/- „ Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories, sent post free to any part.

METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO. LTD., 75 and 76 Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.; and at Piccadilly Circus, exactly opposite the Criterion, London, W. N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. New JUNO Riding School, 1,700ft., now open.

KEATING'S POWDER IS USEFUL

in preserving blankets and furs from Moths. Sprinkle well with the Powder before putting away.

KILLS BLACKBEETLES & FLEAS.

Tins 3d., 6d. and 1/- each.

DR MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL SOAP.

Prepared with Arsenic, Zinc, and other Ingredients as a beautifier of Skin and Complexion

6d. and 1s.

Madame PATTI says: "Most Excellent."

Eradicates Spots and all Imperfections.

Of all Chemists, etc., or post free from S. HARVEY Ltd., 5 Denman Street, London Bridge, S.E.

WADE'S

WONDERFUL OFFER

A SOLID SILVER WATCH GIVEN AWAY.

SEND NO MONEY.

In order to introduce my name into every household in the Kingdom, I undertake and guarantee to give away one of my "World-Famed £2 Silver Watches," list price, Ladies' or Gentlemen's, to every reader who sends me the correct reading of the Rebus printed below. I am preparing to send out immediately 2,000 of these watches. This is a perfectly genuine competition, and the only thing you have to do is carry out the conditions, and if you succeed in guessing correctly you have the advantage of our truly wonderful offer.

These pictures represent three well-known English Wild Flowers. The conditions of the Competition are that you find out what these flowers are, and if you are correct you undertake to purchase one of my inexpensive Solid Silver Chains. These chains are the best made, are marvellous value. Money returned if dissatisfied. Send at once, enclosing stamped and addressed envelope, so that I may inform you if correct.

W. W. WADE,

WATCH MANUFACTURER,

Dept. 35, GOLD EXCHANGE,

Hammersmith, London, W.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

CYCLE DEPOTS

High-class Selection of GENTS', LADIES', & JUVENILE CYCLES. From £3 Cash, or on Easy Terms 10/- Monthly. Head Depot: 52 to 55 Blackfriars Road, London, S.E.

BEST IN LONDON. Lists Post Free.

CYCLEDOM LTD.

RIDING SCHOOLS

Practical Tuition Until Perfect, 10/6. Single Lesson, 2/-. PURCHASERS TAUGHT FREE. Open 9 till 9. West End Branch: 124 King's Road, Sloane Square, S.W.

TRILENE REGD TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins Immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably"

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MR. CLAUDE CARTER, of Thorn House, Johnstone, N.B., says: "Your Tablets much reduced my weight and I have been waiting to see if it was permanent, and so it has proved."

MR. CANHAM, 87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, says: "Tablets cured my wife two years ago of extreme stoutness. It has never returned."

MARION TAYLOR, of Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "Have lost quite two stone."

A. PEEL, of Darley Hydro, Matlock, writes: "They have reduced and benefited me a good deal."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than one stone."

MR. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead. "I think them wonderful not only to reduce fat but as a medicine."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

PLAIN SPEAKING.

W. G.—Of the whole length of the Suez Canal, sixty-six miles are cuttings, fourteen were made by dredging through lakes and eight required no labour.

H. asks the following question: "I see that the word 'idiot' is derived from the Greek idiotes, a private person. Isn't this a trifle hard on the private person?" ———How is it? The Greek word (made up from idios, one's own) meant a man who looked after his own affairs only, in contradistinction to the polites or politician. In course of time, the man who took no interest in the affairs of the city (polis) was looked down upon; this new signification of idiotes apparently became accentuated, and now our word idiot means a person incapable of attending to anything—either his own affairs or other people's.

John M.—The Magna Charta is still preserved in the British Museum. It shows traces of age, but the seal and name of King John are still legible.

Mike Colan.—Cape Colony is divided into seventy-seven districts, and its dependencies into twenty-nine. The Legislative Council consists of twenty-three members, elected for seven years; the House of Assembly has seventy-nine members, elected for five years. All members of Parliament are entitled to a guinea a day for services, with 15s. extra if resident more than fifteen miles from Cape Town.

Florian has noticed the oily or slimy feeling of seaweed, and suggests that it might be used to calm the waves in a storm.———The floating beds of seaweed observed in mid-ocean are known to reduce the height of waves, like oil thrown upon the water; but it would be too large a commission for a ship to carry a supply for that purpose. A scientist has invented a thin cotton or silken net, properly oiled, which he thinks will act in the same way, and will not take up much room.

Miner.—The name "Klondyke" means absolutely nothing. It is most probably a corruption of the Indian name for the creek made so famous by its tributaries. The Indians name a creek from some characteristic; the water is so swift in this one that, in order to set their salmon traps, they have to use a hammer to drive in the stake to which they are fixed. They call it Troan Dik (Hammer Creek) in consequence.

G. M.—Nebuchadnezzar is said to have had a library—the first on record—in which the books were bricks engraved with cuneiform characters.

V. N. is curious to know who is the biggest farmer in England. Oddly enough, his name is Farmer. He is a neighbour of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in Wiltshire, and his holdings exceed 15,000 acres. He has at least one thousand cows and upwards of five thousand sheep.

Money.—No gold coinage existed in this country till the reign of Henry III.; silver and brass were the metals used prior to that. The notes used by the Bank of England cost just about one halfpenny apiece.

Lisse.—It seems strange, on first thoughts, to eat salt with oranges, but you are by no means the only person who does so. The Mexicans prefer the fruit seasoned in that way, and consider it more wholesome.

Major puts this question: "It is calculated that it requires eight times the force to move a man's body upstairs that it does to move it along on the level. It must require much less to move it downstairs. Do you know the figures?" ——— Our statistical editor is away just now, but from information received from a young man who had a similar experiment tried upon him after a brief interview with his best girl's parent, he is of opinion that the force used to move his body downstairs was twenty horse-power. He thinks, however, half that force would have been sufficient.

T. Y.—Some idea of the mixed character of the population of Austria-Hungary may be obtained from the fact that twelve languages are spoken in the army.

Valiant is anxious to possess a relic of one of our national heroes; an autograph or any similar souvenir is not good enough for him. He would like a sword. ———Such a relic fetches a high price when offered for sale, which, as you may guess, is very seldom. About four years ago the sword carried by General Wolfe at the capture of Quebec was for sale. It was in the possession of a Canadian gentleman for many years; he gave it to Major Dunn, of the 100th Regiment, a Crimean hero. Then it passed into the hands of a gentleman in the War Office, whose son put it up for sale.

W. J. T. wishes to know in which country the total population increases most rapidly; he thinks it is Germany. ———If we take the statistics for a century, we find that Russia has the most rapidly increasing population. The growth during the past century has been almost 1,000,000 annually.

Shipmate.—There are more shipwrecks in the Baltic Sea than in any other place in the world. The average is one wreck a day throughout the year.

Farmer.—Waste or desert lands are being re-claimed everywhere. In Eastern Australia, for instance, there is a region which was a sandy desert thirty years ago, but in which 100,000,000 sheep now find sustenance.

A. C. writes in this fashion: "I have heard it stated that there is gold in the bricks used in building dwelling houses. I should like to know how much, because it might pay me to pull down my old house and build a new and better one with the gold obtained from the bricks."——— You haven't a Klondyke so near home as that, A. C. The common red clay of which bricks are made contains gold in the proportion of about one shillingsworth to the ton. Estimating that there are 5,000,000 tons of brick in London houses, we see that there is £250,000 of gold stored up in the many miles of streets which go to make up the Metropolis.

Light B.—Yes, the bugle upon which was sounded the order for the charge of the Light Brigade is still in existence. The bugle, with medals and testimonials belonging to its owner, was sold quite recently by auction, the lot fetched 750 guineas.

Garden.—It is estimated that the sunflower plant draws from the soil and exhales twelve ounces of water in as many hours.

L. T. writes: "We have a blind horse. I have watched it grazing, and am surprised that it does not eat something that would kill it or injure it. I suppose it is instinct?"——— Horses are said to be guided entirely by the nostrils in the selection of food; hence blind horses are not more liable than their brethren to make mistakes in their diet.

Tourist.—The annual influx of visitors in the Riviera is calculated at 270,000. One third of this number is British, another third is French, and the remaining third is made up of Americans, Germans, Russians, and other nationalities. These visitors spend something like £8,000,000.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE HIGHEST KNOWN VALUE FOR MONEY

IS SEEN IN

THE John Noble

HOME, HOLIDAY, AND HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

sent safely packed by Parcel Post direct from the Largest Firm of Costumiers in the World.

* * * * *

Three Gold Medals awarded for excellence of design, material, make, & finish.

THE NEW GORDON COSTUME.
Model 894.—Well cut Bodice, trimmed on centre with fancy stitching al'Ecosse Full wide Tailor Skirt. Price 10/6 complete; carriage 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d.

10/6

Model 648.
A Young Lady's Costume in John Noble Cheviot Serge or Costume Coating, bodice made with prettily gathered front and shaped belt. Well-cut skirt.
Lengths & Prices:
35in., 6/11;
38in., 7/11;
42in., 8/11;
46in., 9/11;
each.
Carriage paid 6d. extra.

THE NEW CURRACH' MODE.
Model 901.—A smart well-cut Bodice, trimmed on facings and sleeves with military braid. Price 10/6 complete costume. Sent safely packed and carriage paid, 6d. extra. Skirt alone, 5/6. Carriage 5d.

10/6

THE JOHN NOBLE Knockabout Frock
Made in strong Serge, with saddle-top, full sleeves, and pocket.
Sizes and Prices:
21in., 1/6;
24in., 2/-;
27in., 2/6;
30in., 3/-;
33in., 3/6;
36in., 4/-;
39in., 4/6;
42in., 5/-;
each.
Carriage 4d. extra.
Warm Woollen KNITTED CAPS (as sketch), in shades of Sky, Cardinal, Drab, Navy, etc., for 1/-.
Ladies' Tam o' Shanters in same colours and prices.

THE "ST. HELIER" COSTUME.
Model 900.
A well-cut open Coat and full tailor-made Skirt. Price complete, 10/6. Safe packed and carriage paid, 6d. extra. Skirt alone, 5/6. Carriage, 5d.

10/6

PATTERNS SENT POST FREE,
together with the new Book of Costumes, to all who name Short Stories when writing, and need not be returned.
FULL DRESS LENGTH OF EITHER CLOTH FOR 7/6.
Carriage 8d.

COLOURS
of all Costumes are Black, Navy, Myrtle, Ruby, Fawn, Sage Green, Reseda, Purple, Grey, Electric, and Brown.
THE THREE STOCK SIZES are: 34, 36, 38 inches round bust, under arms; Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 inches long in front. Any other sizes can be made to measure, 1/6 extra.

MOURNING ORDERS
executed and sent off in 12 hours.

Ladies can have their own designs made up in any kind of fabric by skilled dressmakers at very moderate cost. A Box of 1,000 Patterns of Dress Fabrics lent to select from and sent carriage paid.

The Advertisements of JOHN NOBLE LTD., MANCHESTER,

Originators of Half-Guinea Costumes, and Largest Firm of Costumiers in the World, are imitated by many unscrupulous firms, but their plan of giving utmost value for money is imitated by none.

"To John Noble Ltd.
"6 Garford St., Poplar, London, E., March 31st, 1898.
"I have had several costumes from you which gave the greatest satisfaction, but, in winter, was on the point of ordering one, having sent for costume album and patterns, when a friend of mine persuaded me to try a London firm, which professed to forward 10/6 costumes superior to any other firm. I paid extra to have it made to measure, and when, after long delay, it reached me, I could not wear it, as it was a misfit, and much inferior in style and workmanship to The John Noble Costumes.
—Yours truly, "V. SERKOFF."

Bankers: LONDON & MIDLAND BANK LTD.

PLEASE NAME "SHORT STORIES" WHEN WRITING TO

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

Invalids, as well as those in health, may enjoy drinking this Tea without the least fear of the injurious effects which so frequently result from using other Teas.

Price 2/-, 2 6, 3/-, & 4/- per lb. 3lb. and upwards Carriage Paid. Terms—Cash with Order.

INVALIDS' TEA

Fragrant, Refreshing, Delicious.

THE TEA OF THE FUTURE.

Entirely New Process.

G. WILLIAMS, TEA MERCHANT,

Established 1875. WAIN HOUSE, TONYPANDY. Mention this Paper.

PURE DRY CRISP.

VERDIN COOKE'S

TRADE EXTRA REFINED MARK

Specially Prepared

TABLE SALT

PUT UP BY SPECIAL MACHINERY IN DAMP PROOF PACKETS
DOES NOT CAKE.

TO BE OBTAINED OF ALL GROCERS

WHOLESALE of J. J. VERDIN COOKE, LIVERPOOL.

"THE" SAUCE

DELICIOUS. APPETISING

BATTY & Co FINSBURY, LONDON.

MAKERS OF HIGH CLASS PICKLES, SAUCES, JAMS, JELLIES &c

LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP

LONGEST ESTABLISHED, PUREST & BEST.

Reckitt's Blue.

Ask for it and See that you get it.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 487. FOR WEEK ENDING APRIL 30TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

FANCY

often plays strange pranks with some of us. There are excellent people who fancy the earth is flat, and who decline to accept evidence to the contrary. Others fancy they can run this journal better than any able editor of ancient or modern times. Some folks fancy they are so strong they can never fall ill. Others fancy they are so ill they can never get well. The latter class is, in large part, composed of sufferers from prolonged nervous dyspepsia, with all its insidious, ever-increasing troubles. Such people are weighed down by a sense of hopelessness. They are the victims of lassitude and headache, aye, and of heartache, too, for they can enjoy little, and envy the buoyancy of their more robust fellows. In short, they endure a life of misery, with scant sympathy because they are not actually laid on their backs. To such we can offer the welcome assurance of perfect restoration to health through the medium of BEECHAM'S PILLS. In the treatment of those disorders which involve any failure of nervous force, this medicine has, during 50 years, built up for itself an unassailable reputation. Nothing renews the power of the entire digestive apparatus like BEECHAM'S PILLS. They cleanse the blood of long-standing impurities, brace up the nervous system to a high point of vigour, and effectually chase away every symptom of weariness or depression. And since BEECHAM'S PILLS have cured tens of thousands in this and every country of the globe, just ask yourself why they should not equally prove a boon to

MEETING

YOU!

"Its food value is double that of Bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

will not only help to improve your digestion and consequently your health, but will also bring back that energetic and happy feeling of good health. Man does not live a natural life, so a good portion of a natural food, in the shape of HOVIS, at each meal will largely counteract the bad influence that modern life has upon the health and digestive organs. This is not an idle remark, but a proved statement, daily being verified.

HOVIS is baked and sold by all good class Bakers. No loaf genuine unless stamped HOVIS. 6d. and 1/- samples of Bread and Biscuits sent on receipt of stamps by

S. FITTON & SON, Millers, Macclesfield.

Every Economical Housewife

uses

Tower Tea.

Tower Coffee.

Tower Cocoa.

IN PACKETS AND TINS ONLY.

SOLD EVERYWHERE.

WHOLESALE:

TOWER TEA LTD.,

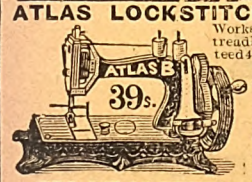
5, JEWRY STREET, LONDON, E.C.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send a machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

KEATING'S POWDER IS USEFUL

in preserving blankets and furs from Moths. Sprinkle well with the Powder before putting away.

KILLS BLACKBEETLES & FLEAS.

Tins 3d., 6d. and 1/4 each.

£20 Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (259 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000. Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

WADE'S

WONDERFUL OFFER

A SOLID SILVER WATCH GIVEN AWAY.

SEND NO MONEY.

In order to introduce my name into every household in the Kingdom, I undertake and guarantee to give away one of my "World-Famed £2 Silver Watches," list price, Ladies' or Gentlemen's, to every reader who sends me the correct reading of the Rebus printed below. I am preparing to send out immediately 2,000 of these watches. This is a perfectly genuine competition, and the only thing you have to do is carry out the conditions, and if you succeed in guessing correctly you have the advantage of our truly wonderful offer.

These pictures represent three well-known English Wild Flowers. The conditions of the Competition are that you find out what these flowers are, and if you are correct you undertake to purchase one of my inexpensive Solid Silver Chains. These chains are the best made, are marvellous value. Money returned if dissatisfied. Send at once, enclosing stamped and addressed envelope, so that I may inform you if correct.

W. W. WADE,

WATCH MANUFACTURER,

Dept. 35, GOLD EXCHANGE,

Hammersmith, London, W.

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

"JUNO" CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

DIAMONDS from £10. 16/8 monthly. JUNO Lady's or Gents' Safety £12 12/- 21/- monthly. £14 14/-, 24/- £16 16/-, 28/- Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories, sent post free to any part.

METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO. LTD., 75 and 76 Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.; and at Piccadilly Circus, exactly opposite the Criterion, London, W. N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. New JUNO Riding School, 1,700ft., now open.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably"

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MR. CLAUDE CARTER, of Thorn House, Johnstone, N.B., says: "Your Tablets much reduced my weight and I have been waiting to see if it was permanent, and so it has proved."

MR. CANHAM, 87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, says: "Tablets cured my wife two years ago of extreme stoutness. It has never returned."

MARION TAYLOR, of Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "Have lost quite two stone."

A. PEEL, of Darley Hydro, Matlock, writes: "They have reduced and benefited me a good deal."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than one stone."

MR. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead. "I think them wonderful not only to reduce fat but as a medicine."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

Edited by C. Arthur Pearson.

No. 487.] For the Week ending April 30th, 1898. [One Penny.

Love and Hypnotism.

I began my artistic career by hiring a room in an old building that had an extension at the back. At the top of the spacious extension were a number of rooms let out to young artists; the remainder of the edifice —both the front and the back buildings—was occupied by tailors and other small tradesmen, none of whom stopped very long, owing to the pranks of the knight of the brush.

Returning to my den the night following my instalment, I was swinging carelessly up the stairs, when something bright in the light of the gas jet caught my eye, and I stopped short, simply petrified with astonishment. There, curling down the banisters within six feet of my nose, was a huge serpent, its head raised, its beady little eyes glittering, and its forked tongue darting in and out of its mouth.

I think it was ten seconds before I recovered—it seemed at least ten minutes. Then I made a wild spring backwards, my hat falling into my arms as I did so. I landed somehow on my feet, and seizing my hat, a hard felt one, I flung it with all my force at the brute's head, and without waiting to see if it had taken effect, rushed howling down the passage.

Heavens! I never thought that passage was so long. I expected every minute to feel the reptile seize me. How I got down to the front door without breaking my neck I don't know, but I did, and out into the street; and, as luck would have it, right into the arms of a big Irish policeman, one of the very finest.

"An' fwat is the matter wid ye?"

"A serpent," I gasped, "loose on the stairs!"

"A sarpint, is it? Is that all?"

"Is that all! Why, man, it might have killed me!"

"Na, na! You'll get over it all right. Where do ye live?"

"Look here, policeman, no nonsense. I'm not squiffy, I'm an artist. My studio is up on the top floor of the extension, and I tell you there is a big snake—looks like a boa constrictor or a python to me—on the banisters——"

"Where's yer hat?"

"I threw it at him just as he was going to seize me."

So we went up again, the constable first, very cautiously. Arriving at the foot of the stairs we found my hat but no snake.

"Well, where is he?"

"How do I know? Do you suppose he left me his card? Of course he's sneaking round here somewhere."

Well, we hunted every nook and cranny, examined even the walls and ceilings, but all in vain. He had gone as mysteriously as he came.

The policeman took off his helmet, mopped his brow, then said: "Now, get along wid ye. Where was yez last night?"

"At the theatre."

"Theyater, no, no! Yer a young sprig, but yer got 'em sure."

"Got what?"

"Blue devils."

I was about to make an indignant denial, when a suppressed titter reached our ears from the floor above, and looking up we saw half a dozen heads peering down at us. When they saw they were discovered the storm broke: they howled and shrieked with laughter, stamping and shouting up and down the corridor. Recognising that in some manner we had been made the victims of a practical joke, we went up. Dennis haughtily, I in a shamefaced manner.

"Bedad! Look at that now! Put down that sarpint, or Oi'le arrest ivry mither's son of yez fur carrying deadly weapons."

"What rot! Here, have a drink," and, advancing, came the man who I afterwards knew as Arthur Melton —in one hand a whisky bottle and in the other the neck of a huge snake, whose body was coiled in loose folds round him.

While Dennis was paying his respects to the bottle, the others standing round still grinning, the young fellow advanced smiling towards me, and when he did so all the little anger I still felt left me.

"I say, old chap, it was rough, I know, and we apologise. But, Great Scott, I wouldn't have missed it for a tenner!"

Here they all exploded again, while Dennis and I grinned sheepishly. After the officer had left, formal

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

introductions took place, and I'm afraid they had something to do with my headache the next day.

The ice having been thus broken, I found the men about me the best natured fellows imaginable, and during the next few days one or another of them was in and out of my den continually, helping me in the disposition of the furniture and things, and taking as much interest in getting the right artistic effect as I myself.

But for the finishing touches the concensus of opinion appeared to be that I must have Bessie. Upon inquiry I found that she was a model, who, during her leisure, devoted herself to the endless wants of the "boys," stitching on buttons, keeping a check on the laundry, in fact, acting as a kind of general housekeeper.

I expected to see something ancient, but was agreeably surprised when one of the fellows brought a tall, slender girl to my room, and introduced her as Bessie. She could hardly have been more than nineteen, and with her pretty face and graceful ways she would have seemed far more at home in a father's house entertaining her guests, than living and chumming with a band of vagabonds like us. However, as she seemed to have no doubts as to the propriety and desirability of her position, I naturally fell in with the rest and soon began to regard her as a most necessary and important part of the "rookery."

Dressed in a dainty little costume, and looking as sweet and charming as nature and art could make her, she would beard the most irascible art editor in his den, and she rarely came back without having disposed of one or two at least of the drawings intrusted to her.

She had her own little private room, the walls of which were covered with the choicest bits of the boys' work, and—well, if she were good to them, they showed their appreciation of her by the thousand little attentions that help to make a woman's life pleasant, and she was always treated with the greatest respect.

I believe we were all a little smitten, and it must be pretty hard for a girl to keep the peace between ten geniuses who persist in admiring her, especially if she possibly have a secret inclination towards one of them, which, in common justice to the rest, she would have to hide. If she had any such inclination she kept it well hidden.

One night, about two weeks after I got permanently settled and before I had got really intimate with my surroundings, I was awakened by the most unearthly howls, and jumping out of bed, stood shivering in my pyjamas, bewildered, and trying to make out what it was all about. Hearing doors open, and voices in the passage, I opened mine, and found several of the fellows staring about inquiringly; finally we traced the row to Melton's room, and shouted to him through the door to know what was the matter.

We heard him floundering round inside, and presently his voice sounded.

"Quick, boys, up on the roof; it's a burglar! I can't get out; all the snakes are loose and seem to have gone clean daft!"

We hurried to the trap door in the roof, but by the time we got up our visitor had made good his escape. The flat roof was covered with snow, and his footprints showed clear enough, leading to and from Melton's skylight.

We prowled about for a few minutes, but there was no signs of the fugitive, and were just going below again when the gas, shining through the skylight, attracted one of the men, and he went and peered down.

"Come here, quick! If that don't beat Dante I'm a Dutchman," he cried.

We all crowded round, and I, at least, forgot all about my slippered feet in the snow, so great was my interest at the sight inside.

In the middle of the floor stood Melton, some kind of a woollen dressing-gown hanging about him; a violin and bow in his hands, and as he played he swayed and twisted in all directions, while round him everywhere, clinging to the pictures, on the backs of chairs, swarming over the easel, were snakes in a state of intense excitement, darting and snapping, the sound of their horrible hissing sounding at times over the wail of the music.

This continued for a while: then gradually they grew quieter. Instead of the continuous striking, they moved more sinuously and began to take long, curving and indescribably graceful poises, swinging backwards and forwards to the rythm of the music; as this grew slower they settled down in large coils, and all the excitement and hissing was over. Indeed, had we not seen their positions at first, it would have been difficult to detect their presence in the room, so still had they become.

Then the music and the motions of the man grew quieter, slower and finally ceased. He looked critically round the room, went and touched the heads of one or two of the creatures caressingly, then reached for a black bottle, and as he raised his face to drink, we saw it was quivering and ghastly, and his hand was trembling so violently he could scarcely hold the bottle. He caught sight of our faces peering down, pulled himself together, and cried:

"Hallo, you chaps! Did you see him? Come down and have a drink."

As far as we could gather, Mr. Burglar must have had a pretty bad fright; he seems to have clambered down from the top flight—of course being unaware of the eccentricities of genius. The snakes evidently spied him just as he caught sight of them. What he thought while half way down the wall on seeing a score of serpents coming after him, we shall never know! but it resulted in a howl of terror, which woke Melton, who, it appears made a habit of letting out his venomous pets at night for exercise.

The next day my curiosity led me to pay a visit to Melton's room. On entering, I found Bessie there, lying in a hammock, and appearing very much at home; while Melton stood near, smoking, and caressing one of his everlasting pets.

Melton, after proffering rum and tobacco, proceeded to show off his animals. First one, then another he brought out, handling them easily and familiarly as they coiled round him; talking to them, kissing them, as they silently, sinuously glided about him, touching his face, his neck, his throat, with their flat, vicious looking heads. Then I was formally introduced to the boa. He was, I think, the biggest serpent I have ever seen. Melton had had him ever since he was a baby, and with a few strains of music could control him, hypnotise him, so that he would stay as placed for an incredible time, fixed, silent, motionless, but for the weird motion of his tongue.

All the snakes seemed alike amenable to music; it swayed them, roused them to fierce hissing, or soothed them to trance-like quiet. And of music Melton was a master; whatever instrument he touched, and, seemingly, however he touched it, vibrated harmoniously. He played for me that day; I am fond of music and thought I understood somewhat of it, but here I was completely lost; the room was full of sighing sounds, wild, mournful and sweet, and I forgot the grinning skulls, the snakes and all the other oddities of his room in a perfect trance of delight.

Digitized by Google

Bessie, at first, when the music began, rose and moved about restlessly, then sat down again, and I forgot her; but, when it ceased I looked at her once more and started. She sat stiffly up, almost rigidly, gazing straight in front of her, with a strange, uncanny look in her pretty eyes. Her hands were clenched tightly in her lap, her lips slightly apart, though she hardly seemed to breathe. I turned towards Melton and caught a look of half annoyance, half anxiety, in his nervous face; he walked across the room, and rather clumsily, I thought, stumbled over a stool, bringing it down with a crash. When I recovered from my start, Bessie was rubbing her eyes and looking round as if she had just awakened.

Melton's mood seemed to change, and seizing a mahl stick, he began to poke viciously into the cages of some of the unoffending pets, and soon raised up a most horrible hissing, that successfully served to distract my attention, if such was his intent.

During the next few days I did a considerable amount of thinking. I felt quite certain that there had been something queer about Bessie that afternoon. She had had the same helpless look that the snakes had when the music obtained control over them. Could it be possible that it acted in the same manner on her, and if so, did she know it? I could not help thinking that Melton at least knew it. If so, what did it all mean?

One afternoon, about ten days later, Bessie was posing for me for some black and white illustrations. The whole place was intensely still, most of the men being out. The faint notes of a violin came from the direction of Melton's closed doors, and, I confess, the plaintive melody soothed me despite the uncanny feelings it aroused.

Bessie was sitting quieter than usual. Generally when the head was finished she kept up a pretty continuous flow of chatter and laughter; but to-day she was quite silent. Once or twice I tried to start a conversation, but met with nothing but monosyllables in return.

I was vaguely conscious of the continuance of the music for some time, but finally became so engrossed in my work that I did not notice when it ceased. Then I saw Bessie pass her hand wearily across her eyes, and, thinking she was tired, told her to rest. I looked up a moment later; she was still sitting in the same position, but there was some indefinable change in her; her whole attitude seemed one of strained eagerness, and, as I watched, her lips parted and her head inclined a little forward, as if listening intently; then suddenly her whole figure seemed to start and stiffen rigidly; she gave a half shudder and rose up, her hand to her head, and a strange, frightened look on her face.

"Yes, yes, I hear; I am coming," she muttered. I jumped up, thinking she was ill.

"Bessie, what is it?"

But she waved me to one side, walked quickly to the door, unlocked and opened it, and started down the passage, I following.

She went directly to Melton's door, opened it and entered, perhaps two feet ahead of me.

I was so surprised at her strange manner, that I naturally went in after her. She walked calmly towards the great divan in the corner, stopped for an instant, then stooped and picked up the violin and bow that lay on the floor. As she stooped, I looked beyond her and saw what her figure had hitherto hidden, and at the sight my heart seemed for one instant to stand still, then thump against my ribs with a shock that made me stagger.

On the couch, propped by pillows, sat Melton, stiff, rigid, his eyes glazed and staring, and round him coiled and slowly tightening and crushing him was Buz, the boa. Even as I looked, the reptile's head went gliding round the man's throat for a last, final grip, and the man sat inert, unconscious of his terrible danger. I gave one wild gasp, then sprang to a chair, tore down an old sword and started towards them, but with a fierce gesture Bessie waved me back, and the next instant drew the bow across the voilin.

Was I mad? This child, who could not play a note, seemed to draw the very soul out of the instrument, and, swaying from side to side, as I had seen Melton do, she moved towards the serpent.

And that horrible thing paused, seemingly puzzled, while I watched behind her in a state of excitement impossible to analyse, though I recognised even at that moment that had I attacked the reptile, I could not have got a chance at him without risking Melton's life.

Well, that girl played on and on; the same wild dirge music that Melton used to improvise throbbed through the air, and her slender body vibrated with it as she swayed backwards and forwards. The head of the snake was protruding from the under side of Melton's jaw, its attention diverted from its prey to that slight, swaying figure. It seemed like eternity while the boa poised motionless; then slowly he began to unloose those terrible coils; fold after fold was unloosened till only one remained, and from this fixed base the great boa's body curled gracefully out towards the music. But the man sat as stiff and rigid as ever, though he was free.

As I saw the snake's ugly, stealthy head drawing slowly towards the girl, I cautiously slipped past her, glancing at her, to let her know my purpose as I did so. But she never even saw me; her eyes were just like Melton's, fixed and staring, while her face was drawn and ghastly. I sidled along, well out of reach of Buz, who, however was far too intent with Bessie to notice me; then, when I was well behind him, I measured my distance, raised the sword and—swish!—Buz's head flew clean across the studio.

The body gave one or two convulsive wriggles, then the violin gave several screeches of the most villainous discord I ever heard, and the next moment Bessie was on her knees at Melton's side.

"Arthur, sweetheart, wake up! Oh, Arthur!"

Then slowly, as if in answer to the call of love, Melton came back with a shuddering sigh from—where?

Well, it was very interesting, and I stood staring with my mouth rather more open than intelligence warrants—the dead snake in one hand and the sword in the other—until I became conscious that—well, really, perhaps I was rather de trop; so I sneaked out on tiptoe and shut the door.

They are married now, and apparently Melton has reformed; any how the snake hobby is a thing of the past, and they live in a little flat and are very happy.

As to exactly what happened that afternoon, nobody really knows, and I doubt if anybody ever will. Melton declares that all he remembers was sitting on the divan and fiddling to the late Buz, who was poised in front of him; he recollects thinking how bright the reptile's eyes were and how steadily they looked into his.

As for Bessie, she declares she fell asleep while posing for me, and did the fiddling in a dream. So far as I can see, it seems to have been a case of love and hypnotism all round.

A. Kempster.

Digitized by Google

A Love Sacrifice.

"Yes, Jack, I am proud of you!" she had whispered, in response to his question, his kisses were still warm on her lips, their hearts were beating in unison, though not so tumultuously as before; and now that the first rapture and thrill were over they were asking questions, and making their little confessions, after the manner of lovers on the threshold of an engagement.

"How many times have I been in love before? Now, Jack, do you think that is a fair question?" she asked, meeting his look with a roguish glance.

"Why, certainly it is, Dora," he replied earnestly. "You say you love me, so it doesn't really make any difference about the others; but I think I ought to know. Still, if there are so many of them——"

"Please stop, Jack! I won't have you saying such dreadful things and with that look on your face!" she interrupted, playfully placing her hand over his mouth, but quickly withdrawing it when he attempted to kiss it.

"How dare you!" she exclaimed, "after the way you've been talking!"

"Well, if you don't want me to say things why don't you answer my question?"

"Must I, Jack?"

"I am afraid you must, my dear."

"And you won't hate me after I tell, will you?"

"Well—"

"'That depends,' you are going to say. You needn't hesitate so long; I can read your thoughts."

"Can you? That's convenient for you, I'm sure. I wish I could read yours, then I'd know the answer to my question."

"Would you really like to know?"

"Why, yes, or I shouldn't have asked it."

"Well, Jack, if it will relieve your mind to know it, you have no predecessors."

"Are you sure, Dora?"

"Yes, Jack. You are the first and only one."

"Thank you, Dora! I'm glad to hear it; and now that question is settled we will——"

"Oh, no, my dear; you don't get off quite so easily as that; I want your confession now. About how many dozen times have you been in love?"

Jack Vernon winced. He hadn't counted on that.

"Come, young man, you are now in the witness box, sworn to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth!" she continued banteringly.

"Must I?" said Jack, helplessly repeating her question of a few minutes before.

"I am afraid you must, my dear," mimicked she.

"But I am afraid you will hate me after I confess."

"Is the record then, so long?"

"No; it is a very short one. I have never loved but once before."

"And she—she refused you?"

"No, I never asked her."

"Why not? You see, I want the whole story now."

"Because of pride. She was a wealthy heiress. I, a penniless barrister, with my fame and fortune yet to make. I loved her; I am not ashamed to say it; she was a woman that one could not help loving; she was all to me then that you are now, and——"

"And more. Go on and say it, Jack; I want the whole truth!"

"No, I won't say that, but she was the first, and love was a new sensation to me then, and if I had been her equal in wealth and station I might—but, pshaw! What is the use of telling you all this? It is all over now. Her love was not for me. I have put it aside—and, besides, I have you. But why are you looking so sober, Dora? Have I confessed too much? You wanted the whole truth, you know!"

"Yes, and I am glad you were brave enough to tell it. How long ago was it that—that this happened?" she faltered.

"Three years."

"And her name?" she asked in low tones.

"Need I tell that?"

"Yes, please," said Dora faintly.

"Edith Burton."

Dora's face grew suddenly pale.

"I thought, perhaps, she was the one," she said, in a voice that Jack scarcely recognised.

"Why, do you know her?" he exclaimed in surprise.

"I used to be at boarding school with her," answered Dora. She had regained control of her voice now. "She is a good, noble woman, far better than I am, and I don't wonder that you love her."

"You mean loved," corrected Jack. "My love for her is in the past tense, not the present."

"'True love can never die,'" quoted Dora gravely, "Wasn't it the divine William who said that? But here, Jack, we have talked enough of love for one evening. Don't you think so?"

Digitized by Google

"But you haven't promised to marry me yet."

"You didn't ask me that question. You simply asked me if I loved you, and you got your answer."

"And I am to take the rest for granted, eh?"

"Well, no; nothing should be taken for granted in this world. I'll give you your answer, but not now. I think I'd better send it to you in writing."

"Dear me! How formal we are getting all at once! But, after all, I think I prefer it that way! then I can carry your note next to my heart for a mascot until you are mine for good and all. Shall I run over here for it to-morrow morning?"

"No; I'll post it to you at your chambers."

"All right, Dora; and now, just one before I go!" He bent down and planted a kiss on her unresisting lips. "Thanks, dear! Now please forget that there ever was any other girl, and don't look quite so sober the next time I call. Good-night, Dora!"

"Good night, Jack!"

When Jack Vernon reached his chambers in the Temple next morning he found Dora Stevens' note awaiting him. Tearing it open he read:

DEAR JACK:—The love I expressed for you an hour ago I find has turned to pity, and I am going to make you happy by sending to you the only woman you have a right to marry. After hearing your confession, and knowing what I do, I could never be happy with you. I know you think you are in love with me, but the tendrils of your heart are still entwined around that early love, and she needs you more than I do. I told you she was my schoolmate years ago. I still regard her as one of my dearest friends, and, though we have not met for a long time, we have always kept up correspondence. I inclose my latest letter from her, received two months ago. I did not know until to-night who the man is that she loves. I know now, and I wish you both all the joy that life in each other's society can bring you. Go to her, Jack, and make her happy—and my blessing and prayers will go with you. Not good-night this time, but good-bye!

Ever your Friend
DORA.

The inclosure ran as follows:

MY DEAR DORA,—No, I am not engaged yet, and never expect to be. I have had plenty of chances to confer my hand and fortune—especially the latter—upon aspiring applicants, but I have declined them all. I have never met a man I really cared for, except one, and I know he cared for me at a time, perhaps he does yet; but, alas! he discovered that I was an heiress, and then pride (he was a young barrister, with plenty of brains and ambition, but no money) held him back. He loved me; my heart told me that; but fortune-hunters were fluttering round me, like moths about a candle, and I suppose he was afraid if he spoke he would be classed with the rest—just as though the alchemy of a woman's love could not detect the gold among the dross!

Ah, well! he is gone, and there's no use mourning for the past. I cannot help sighing, though, to think that the very money which attracted so many society moths should drive away the only man I ever loved!

There, Dora you have my secret, and know why I shall evermore a maiden be—but please don't tell. Wishing you a lover true, some time, dear Dora (not being burdened with wealth, you won't have so many unworthy ones as I) and hoping to hear from you soon, I remain, with oceans of love, yours affectionately,

EDITH BURTON.

Late that afternoon Dora Stevens received the following brief message from Jack Vernon.

MY DEAR DORA,—Many thanks for your kind note and the inclosure. There are at least two angels left on earth. You are one of them. May Heaven ever guard and bless you! Yours gratefully,

JACK.

P.S.—I start for Rochester at once, and will post this on my way to the station.

And as Dora read these words, she smiled one little, wee ghost of a smile, and whispered:

"Better my heart than hers!" H. WILSON.

"SHOULD PARSONS EAT PEAS?"

The Editor of PEARSON'S WEEKLY will give £2 2s. to the person who tells, in not more than 200 words, the best reason why they should or should not. See this week's P.W.

RESULT OF THE BOOK COMPETITION FOR WEEK ENDING APRIL 9th.

Miss E. Beal, 33 Basuto Road, Poole Park, Fulham. "King Solomon's Mines." By Rider Haggard.

Mrs. Allan, 12 Sydney Street, Glasgow. "Dreamers of the Ghetto."

J. C. King, R.I. Constabulary, Maryborough, Queen's Co "Origin of Species." By Darwin.

Richard Keddy, 94 Milbourne Street, Carlisle. "Helps to the Bible."

Geo. Hunt, 24 Hinckley Road, Nuneaton. "Sankey's Songs and Solos Music Book."

Thos. Simon, 13 Hauteville, Guernsey. "All About Book-keeping" (Ward and Lock).

"Pick-Me-Up."

The Most Artistic Penny Paper Published.

DRAWINGS by Phil May, Oscar Wilson, and other clever black and white artists.

Serial Story by George Griffith, author of "The Angel of the Revolution," etc., etc., entitled: "THE GREAT PIRATE SYNDICATE," a splendid tale of War and Finance.

Complete Short Story Every Week.

Every Line Absolutely Original.

If you have not seen a copy lately, please buy one next Tuesday,

And notice how greatly the paper has been improved.

It gets better every week.

And you can take it home and please everyone.

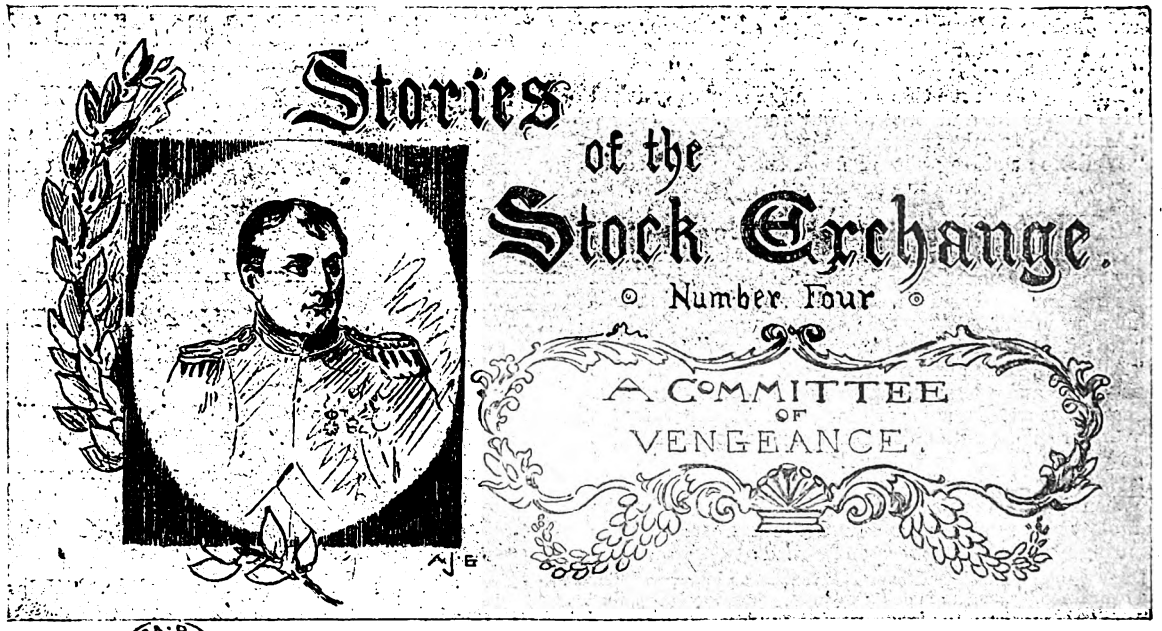
A KLONDYKE GOLD MINE FREE!

How some Reader of our Papers may go to Klondyke at our expense and become a Millionaire.

WE HAVE THE MOST ASTOUNDING OFFER OF THE DAY TO PUT BEFORE YOU.

Full Particulars are now appearing in THE ATHLETIC RECORD and PICK-ME-UP.

Digitized by Google



BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

Unearthed and Re-Edited by Robert Machray.

I.

It was between midnight and one o'clock of a February morning, in the year 1814, that the landlord, guests, and servants of the "Ship" tavern, then the principal inn in Dover, were awakened by a loud knocking at the front door.

So insistent was the clamour that in a very short time "mine host" appeared at an upper window, and demanded who it was that disturbed the peace of His Majesty's lieges at that ghostly hour with such unghostly noise.

Standing in front of the inn was a figure almost hidden by the darkness. In a clear voice he informed the landlord that he had just come from France with important dispatches, and that it was a matter of the greatest urgency that he should at once procure post-horses and a carriage to proceed to London for the speedy delivery of the letters he carried with him.

"Is it good news you bring?" asked the landlord.

"Ay, that it is," replied the figure.

Descending hastily, the worthy landlord withdrew the bolts that secured the door, and admitted the traveller. Holding up a lantern in his hand, he gazed at the stranger with much curiosity.

The light disclosed a tall, somewhat military-looking man. He was dressed in a long, grey overcoat, and on his head he wore a gold-laced cap. When he unbuttoned his heavy coat he was seen to be wearing some kind of uniform. It was also noticed that his clothes were wet up to his middle, as if he had either been wading through the water, or had been drenched with the surf of the sea.

"I am Colonel de Bourgh, aide-de-camp to Lord Cathcart."

This he said in reply to the inquiring looks of the landlord, who had now been joined by several of the inmates of the house. For good news from France was what every good Briton was dying to hear at that time.

The armies of the Allies, it must be remembered, were hemming in the great and hitherto invincible Napoleon. It was known that he had been defeated, and that his position was well nigh desperate. Still, there was a fear that the genius of the world's greatest soldier might triumph after all, and overcome the tremendous combination that had been formed against him. It was now known, however, that the Allies were almost in sight of Paris, and that a decisive battle might take place at any moment.

Hence the interest in the news that the stranger might bring.

"May I ask your honour," asked the landlord, "what are the tidings, or is the matter secret?"

"No secret, surely," said De Bourgh; "'tis the best of all possible news. But spare me, I pray you; the need for haste is great. Do you order for me a post-chaise and horses while I have some refreshment. I landed an hour ago."

"Landed an hour ago!" exclaimed the landlord. "Did your honour not land at the quay?"

"Nay, I cannot tell you exactly how I came; that, indeed, must be kept close—you understand. I may say, though, that I was landed about two miles from here on the beach, and got wet, as you may see, in the process."

Copyright, 1898, by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., in the United States of America.

Digitized by Google

The landlord turned away to do the bidding of the stranger. A commercial traveller, who was stopping at the inn, now asked De Bourgh if he would not be kind enough to so far gratify their curiosity as to tell them what had actually happened.

"Well, I do not think that it will do any harm to inform you that the war is over, for Napoleon is dead."

"Napoleon dead!" responded the other, with a world of glad surprise in the tones of his voice; "that is good news indeed."

"Yes; he is dead; his body cut in pieces—ay, scrambled for by the savage Cossacks who slew him."

"Horrible, horrible," cried the commercial. "Where was it that this took place?"

"That I scarcely think it right to tell. And yet, why not?"

"'Twill bring home the news to us all so much the more if your honour will but condescend to give us so much of the story of his death as you think is right."

"Well, then, you must know that there have been fights not a few, ay, great and bloody battles, the scene of which lies not many leagues from Paris. Sachen, Schwartzenburg, and Blücher, like dogs after their quarry, have been biting at his heels, and springing upon his flanks and shoulders. At length he was forced to stand at bay, and in the most dreadful battle you can imagine his army was overwhelmed, and he himself killed by the Cossacks of Sachen. As I told you, the enraged soldiers showed him no mercy, but cut his body into a thousand pieces, as if to glut their fury with this so barbarous revenge."

"'Tis almost too good to be true!" was the involuntary exclamation of one who listened.

De Bourgh looked at the speaker fiercely.

"Do you doubt my word, sir?" said he. "Ah, well," continued he with a shrug of his shoulders, "it will be no news soon, for in another day or two it will be all over the country. Perhaps," said he, turning to an attendant who had just come into the room with a tray on which were placed cold meat, bread, and other provisions for supper, "you will bring me some ink and writing paper. No time must be lost in acquainting the Admiral at Deal with the glorious intelligence. He can then communicate with London by telegraph, if the day be fine, and presently every joy bell in the city will be set a-ringing."

While De Bourgh was hurriedly dispatching the meal which had been set before him, the landlord entered to say that the chaise and horses were now ready. Then writing materials were brought in, the letter to the Admiral written, and sent by a trusty messenger to his residence at Deal.

Pulling out some napoleons from his pocket, De Bourgh asked the landlord what he owed him, and tendered two of them in payment of his bill. When the boniface rather demurred at the foreign money, De Bourgh said that it did not matter, and forthwith produced a note of the Bank of England. Having received the change, in another minute or so he had

In a clear voice he informed the landlord that he had just come from France with important dispatches.

Digitized by Google

entered the carriage, and was on his way to Canterbury, where, at an inn called the "Fountain," he changed horses.

Here his postboys, who were known at the "Fountain," smoothed matters for him, and after a brief halt he was thundering along the road to Sittingbourne, where, at the "Rose" of that place, he procured fresh horses. Without delay, he continued his journey, and reached Rochester.

His postboys had taken him to the "Crown," and at first he experienced a difficulty in getting a change of horses. Some few minutes were spent by him in the tavern, and its landlord made bold to ask De Bourgh if by any chance he might be in a position to tell him what was the most recent news from France. Whereupon De Bourgh repeated what he had told the landlord of the "Ship" at Dover.

"Great news—great news!" So huge was his delight that he refused to accept anything for the trouble De Bourgh had put him to.

"Nay, nay," said he, "I should think myself but a mean fellow if I received aught from you who are the bearer of such splendid intelligence."

One result of this short conversation was that the landlord had observed, as De Bourgh was warming himself at the fire, and had unloosed his overcoat so as to get the full effect of the heat, that De Bourgh was wearing a military uniform, across the breast of which was a scarf, and, also, beside it, a star, as of some order or decoration.

The chaise having come at length to the front of the inn, De Bourgh entered it, and directed the postboys to go on with all speed to Dartford, which, as everybody knows, is no great distance from London. Everything proved favourable for the journey, and Dartford was reached in due time. From this point he went more slowly, as the morning light was now more clear. Soon afterwards he dismissed the chaise, having first inquired where he was likely to get a hackney carriage.

Having obtained what he sought, a hackney coach, he made his way to the Marsh Gate, Lambeth, where presently he disappeared.

Before he dismissed his postboys he had given them wine and money, and at the same time had told them the wonderful news he brought about Napoleon, saying that there was no secrecy about the matter, and that they might tell it to anybody they pleased.

The light disclosed a tall, somewhat military-looking man.

II.

About ten o'clock the same morning, knots of brokers and dealers were gathered about the Stock Exchange, the adjacent courts, and the approaches to it. At the close of business on the preceding Saturday, the market had, on the whole, been quiet and dull. If there was any tendency at all, it was in the direction of lower prices. Omnium had closed from 26½ to 27 premium.

They were discussing somewhat freely and eagerly the various items which had appeared in that morning's Times and Post, with respect to the movements of the Allies on their march to Paris, which was still held for Napoleon by the Empress Queen and Regent, the Austrian Archduchess, who had been wedded by her father to the "Little Corsican."

There were different opinions expressed as to how soon or how long it would be before the Dread of Europe was overthrown, but all were agreed that it was now only a matter of time. They all agreed that the end of these bloody wars was at last well in sight.

Digitized by Google

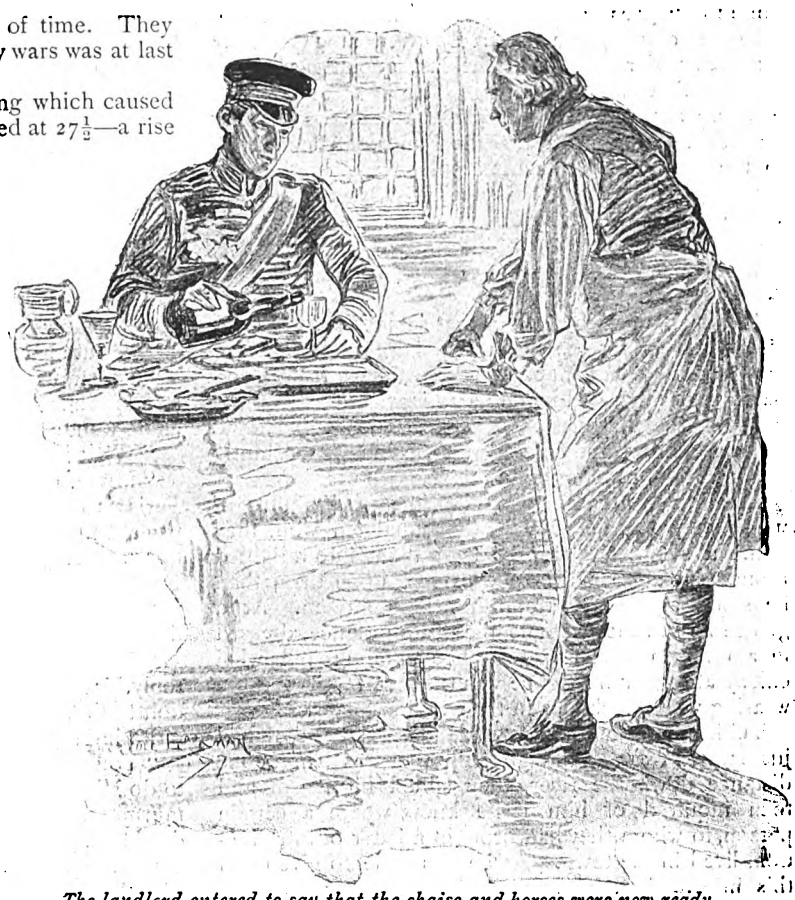
It was probably this universal feeling which caused the first prices of Omnium to be quoted at 27½—a rise of nearly a full point from the previous Saturday.

It was about half-past ten when one of those sudden inexplicable waves of feeling for which the Stock Exchange is famous suddenly passed over the members. What caused it was not at first quite clear. That it was something good was, however, sufficiently obvious, as the bidding for Omnium quickly became clamorous, while the price of it was raised at a bound up to 30, 30½, 31.

Now a crowd on the Stock Exchange is a good deal like any other crowd, and acts precisely in the same way. Just as a great body of people frequently come together, and is swayed in a particular direction without much rhyme or reason, so the various units of this crowd on 'Change acted together, as if moved by a common impulse. There seemed to be good news, prices were rising, and everyone was anxious to be in the swim.

The first excitement over, and the upward movement of the Funds having stopped for a time, they had leisure to make inquiries as to what had caused this remarkable buoyancy in the National Securities. And it was easy enough to find out what had occurred.



The landlord entered to say that the chaise and horses were now ready.

Shortly after the opening of the Stock Exchange expresses had arrived from Dover in hot haste with the extraordinary but most welcome intelligence that Napoleon, the great disturber of peace, and therefore of all the movements of money in the market, had not only been utterly defeated, but that he himself had been slain. No wonder was it then that a considerable rise had taken place in the Funds, for never, surely, had there ever been received a better piece of news.

Many questions, of course, were asked as to the manner in which the news had been brought to town. So far as could be made out, a courier with dispatches, a colonel in the army, had landed at Dover late on the preceding night, and had brought the amazing intelligence. The dress, bearing, and position of the messenger were all such, it was declared, as to place the tidings beyond doubt.

As soon as the messenger could procure horses he had set out for London, so it was said, but not before he had sent a communication to the port admiral at Deal telling him of what had taken place. These expresses from Dover said that they had been so joyously affected by what they had heard that they had set out immediately for London, and they expressed some surprise that nothing had been seen of the courier from France, the military gentleman, who had gone on ahead of them in the postchaise. At first, however, there was not much attention given to this aspect of the affair.

Another hour passed quickly away. One or two of the more critical members went to the Lord Mayor, and asked if he had received any confirmation of the report. He replied that nothing had reached him directly, but that he understood that some sort of message had been received from Admiral Foley at Deal by telegraph, which certainly appeared to give a greater body of colour to the statement. For himself, he said, he was not quite convinced, as it was a time of endless rumours and counter rumours.

By noon, a feeling of doubt had sprung up. The Funds began to show some signs of dropping again. The members of the Stock Exchange were no longer all of the same opinion, and the two sides, into which it is generally divided, the "Bulls" and the "Bears," were once more in evidence.

So matters stood, when another wind of excitement arose, and in another minute or two, amidst a tumult of voices, in a hideous and indescribable din, the price of Omnium was freely given at 33—nearly six points of a rise from the last quotations of the previous Saturday.

Digitized by Google

There was, to be sure, a special reason for this new outbreak, this frenzy to buy the Funds. All doubt as to the death of the hated Napoleon appeared to be completely dissipated by its being substantiated from what seemed an entirely different, and probably trustworthy, source.

III.

It was about six o'clock of that same Monday morning, while as yet the dawn had hardly come, when two French officers landed at Northfleet from a six-oared gig, which had made its way mysteriously up the river in the darkness. When they had been put ashore, the boat immediately put off, and was instantly swallowed up in the gloom.

Repairing forthwith to an inn, the whereabouts of which they seemed sufficiently acquainted with, they found a sleepy waiter, who took them into a lighted room. No sooner did his eyes rest upon them than he stood agape and trembling before them. At a glance he saw they were people of importance, dressed in a uniform which was strange to him; but what chiefly attracted his notice was the fact that they were wearing white cockades in their military caps.

Telling him that they were friends, and that they had just landed from a foreign ship that was lying some distance down the river, they stilled his alarm, and then inquired of him if he knew where a certain person, to whom they had brought a letter of introduction, lived in the town. As he was able to give them this information, he readily did so, saying, however, that it was too early surely for them to disturb him. To this they replied that their business was of so urgent a character that, early as it was, they must immediately go and find him if that were possible.

It had now become somewhat lighter, and the waiter standing at the door of the inn, directed them how to go, but they had scarcely got out of his sight before they quickened their steps to a run, and made for the house where they were going without any hesitation or difficulty as to the way.

The person whom they sought was still abed, but, telling his servant that his master would on this occasion certainly forgive his being aroused from sleep, they bade him call him at once, and at the same time gave him the letter of introduction, saying: "This will sufficiently excuse our intrusion at this untimely hour."

Some ten minutes later, the gentleman appeared, holding in his hand the letter they had brought. It was easy to see that he had been somewhat suddenly awakened from slumber, as, while his face indicated that he was greatly pleased, his eyes still had an air of sleepiness about them.

"You gentlemen brought me this letter, I presume," said he. "'Tis from my old friend M. Replessis, and I am so much his debtor that I will do anything within my power to serve him. He informs me that you bring news of a very special nature, but he preferred that you should tell me it by word of mouth, rather than that he should do so by means of a letter."

He looked at them with keen inquiry, taking in both their dress and looks with the greatest interest.

"M. Replessis is also a good friend of ours, and he assured us that no one was more likely than yourself to forward the matter which we have in hand."

"And that is?"

"We desire to get to London with the utmost speed. We are the bearers of a great piece of news which will gratify many people, and these not English people alone, but also many of our own countrymen."

The stranger spoke with a strong foreign accent, and interlarded his speech with several French phrases as he went along.

"What has happened?"

"Much," he replied. "The Allies are victorious, Paris is now occupied by them; but the most important thing of all is that Napoleon is dead, and that our sovereign, Louis XVIII., is now master of France."

"Bonaparte dead!" was the exclamation. "Can that indeed be true, gentlemen?"

"There is no doubt whatever about it," was the reply. "Our object, indeed, is to take that information to the English Ministry. There could be nothing more important, could there?"

"You are right. Now, what is it that you wish me to do?" But even as he asked them the question he murmured to himself, like one in a dream, "Napoleon dead! Napoleon dead!"

"Perhaps you will be kind enough to arrange at once with the keeper of some livery stable, whom you will doubtless know, to take us to London with all convenient haste. We are strangers here, and know not the way. Will you do this for us?"

"With pleasure," he replied. "You will allow me to offer you some slight refreshment, while you wait, and I will myself go at once and order horses and a carriage for you. There shall be no delay, I assure you."

He was as good as his word, but an hour had nearly passed before all was in readiness, and it was now broad daylight. When they descended to the carriage, they saw that the horses had been decked with laurel. In this way the friend of M. Replessis showed how highly he esteemed the news which had been brought.

They journeyed on to London by way of Shooter's Hill without mishap, although there were not a few whom they passed on the road who were greatly struck by their appearance, and also by the triumphal garnishing of their horses.

It was just a little after noon when that identical postchaise with the laurel-bedecked horses drove slowly over London Bridge. The two French officers in it distributed billets to the crowd, who wondered what was the meaning of the appearance of this extraordinary portent in the city. Suddenly there was a great shout of joy, of unmistakable gladness, for they had seen written on these billets the statements that Paris had fallen before the armies of the Allies, and that Napoleon was dead.

Digitized by Google

The waiter standing at the door of the inn, directed them how to go.

"Napoleon is dead!"

This was the cry that went surging along the streets. It was taken up here, there, everywhere. It flew from mouth to mouth. The words were swift winged, and sped about all over the town.

The French officers in the postchaise next paraded through Cheapside and Fleet-street, passed over Blackfriars Bridge, then drove rapidly to the Marsh Gate, Lambeth—where, it will be remembered, De Bourgh had also gone some two hours previously. Here they disappeared, exactly as he had done.

IV.

That echoing cry, "Napoleon is Dead," had not gone all round London without being heard in the Stock Exchange. Indeed, it was this that had brought about the second advance in Omnium, until it had reached the highest point of the day. Towards two o'clock in the afternoon, however, there began to appear well marked signs of a reaction in the market. Some of those who had been most eager buyers commenced to wonder—for the joy of the Stock Exchange is never very distant from its gloom—if what they had heard were true.

As the hours wore on no confirmation came. The ministers of the Government sent word that they had received no intelligence of Napoleon's death, or of the fall of Paris, and that they were inclined to believe that the whole affair was nothing more than a plot, a tissue of falsehoods woven purely and simply for the purpose of influencing the price of the Funds.

Digitized by Google

Before the day was over this was the general opinion—so swiftly do ideas change. Omnium declined severely, losing nearly the whole of the augmented price. There were many losers by the day's operations. They were loud in their threats. They had been laughed at, mocked, deceived—bought and sold like a flock of silly sheep.

Next day doubt was at an end. It was known that Paris had not fallen, and that Napoleon was not dead, but still fighting, although against tremendous odds. The newspapers came out with the whole story, and denounced the plot as the most scandalous and infamous imposition ever perpetrated upon the Stock Exchange. The committee of that institution formed itself into one of vengeance, and immediately took steps to ferret out the authors of the conspiracy.

On the eventful Monday there had been sold large quantities both of Omnium and of the 3 per cents. These transactions had been mainly at the instance of a well-known firm of brokers. A little investigation served to show that this firm had dealt in the Funds on that day for an amount which, in round figures, came to a million sterling.

Feeling in the matter was so strong among the members of the Stock Exchange that the firm in question would have been forced to divulge the names of their principals, had it not been that, in the ordinary course of business, they had in any case to do so. But when the Committee found amongst these principals the name of one of the most distinguished servants of the Crown, and a relation of his, they were half inclined at first to let the matter rest.

The affair, however, had by this time become so public that its future was practically taken out of their hands; they were compelled to go on, though now with caution and secrecy. For it had transpired that those chiefly concerned in the plot were no other than Lord Cochrane and a nephew of his.

There was no want of evidence as to the appearance and dress of those who had been guilty of carrying out the conspiracy.

The innkeepers at Dover and Rochester, the commercial traveller who had spoken to De Bourgh at the "Ship," the postboys who had conducted De Bourgh along the various stages of his route to London, the driver of the hackney coach who had dropped him at the Marsh Gate, Lambeth, the gentleman at Northfleet who had been imposed upon by a letter, which, of course, had been forged, from his friend, M. Replessis, and several others who had seen either De Bourgh or the other party in the course of their travels—all these either came forward as witnesses, or were gradually hunted down.

The problem was, how was De Bourgh to be connected with so illustrious a personage as Lord Cochrane? Who was De Bourgh?

Meanwhile a process, which can only be described as one of bribery and corruption, had been going on with respect to the servants of Lord Cochrane and his nephew. Through this channel it was ultimately discovered that on that very Monday a man dressed as a French officer, or in some sort of foreign uniform, had called in the forenoon at Lord Cochrane's house in Green-street. The name of this person, however, was declared to be not De Bourgh, but De Berenger.

De Berenger was tracked down, was identified by the Dover innkeeper as De Bourgh, was arrested on charge of being concerned in a fraudulent conspiracy, and thrown into prison.

Shortly afterwards Lord Cochrane and several others who had either profited by the plot on the Stock Exchange, or who had been proved to be actually concerned in its working out, were seized and sent to the King's Bench prison.

The arrest of so eminent a man as Lord Cochrane, who had rendered great services to the country by the splendid deeds he had performed against the enemy at sea, created a profound and painful sensation throughout the land. It was understood, however, that he emphatically declared that he was entirely innocent of any complicity in the whole affair. He had been in the habit, he said, of buying and selling the public Funds, but merely in the way of speculation, as any other gentleman might do.

At the trial which took place in June of that year, it was shown that Lord Cochrane, his nephew, and one or two others for whom Omnium had been sold at the given time, were in such a position that they would have been heavy losers on their accounts with their brokers if no rise had taken place in Omnium exactly at that very date.

As witness after witness was produced for the prosecution, their testimony was so condemning that it was soon seen that the verdict of the jury could scarcely be other than that of "guilty."

And such was their verdict.

Some days after their finding sentence was pronounced. Lord Cochrane, De Berenger, and four others were given twelve months imprisonment in the Marshalsea, and at the same time Lord Cochrane was fined one thousand pounds, and two others were also mulcted in considerable sums.

Now comes the strangest part of this story, which is taken with but slight change from the journals of the time. It was subsequently proved conclusively that Lord Cochrane had no part whatever in the plot. De Berenger in the end owned up. He had merely gone to Lord Cochrane's house as a blind. It had been known that Lord Cochrane speculated in the funds, and advantage was taken of this to implicate him in the affair in the hope that his great name might shield the others, perhaps, in the event of anything untoward taking place.

Lord Cochrane in after days took his proper place among the heroes of the English race, as the Earl of Dundonald, and lies buried in Westminster Abbey.

(Next week: "In Twenty-four Hours.")

Digitized by Google

TRACKED!

"Our last day together," she said. "Well, it's been a good time, hasn't it? I wonder how many people at the lake are saying the same thing?"

"Inanity of inanities, all is inanity," I replied sententiously. Then I stopped to think whether I had said something bright, and stopped so long that my cigar went out.

Her lips curled. "And because the preacher was wise."

I had never seen her sneer before in the whole week of our acquaintance. But, when you come to think of it, when a girl is kittenish, she is likely, as a rule, to have claws. We were sitting in a skiff under the trees at Lake Geneva. The lake lay like a great sheet of cerulean glass, and no breeze stirred the sweltering August afternoon. There was a rattle of dishes and the sound of laughter from the recesses of the island where we were moored. That was the way I was able to fix the time of day, for my watch was in my coat, and it was too much trouble to get it.

"The aggravating part of a woman is that she keeps cool on a hot day," I said. Then I wondered if she would comprehend the sarcasm. I lit my cigar.

"The aggravating part of a man is—the man," she replied angrily. She did not look cool then.

"To return to our starting point—it has been a good time, hasn't it?"

She said nothing. What came next was more her fault than mine. When a girl says nothing, she knows the man has to say something.

"Don't you wish there could be more of it?" I continued, wishing at that moment that flirtations did not fall into grooves.

"It's been very pleasant. I always did love the lake."

"Is the lake the only thing you?"

"It's the only thing I ever said I—"

"But it never asked you; and the other things must—"

"Shall we be moving on?" she asked irrelevantly.

"Not yet," I said sternly. I was beginning to forget it was hot. She was pulling a rose to pieces, and when I caught hold of her hand I pricked my finger. Then, of course, I called her by her Christian name, and went through the time-honoured formula. I did not succeed in kissing her, but she seemed thankful that no boats were passing. She glanced nervously round to make sure of it. Her face froze, but I got the impression that it was by a muscular effort rather than by exercise of righteous indignation.

"Take me back, if you please, Mr. Killeen."

"Is there no——?"

"How dare you?" she said (and I began to think she really was angry). "Engaged as you are—"

She stopped and blushed. In my astonishment I as nearly as possible gave myself away on the spot. I saved myself, though.

"Engaged!" I said. "What on earth do you mean? I never loved anyone but you."

"From what I have seen of you I should imagine that made very little difference to your engagement. Do you think I am blind? You've got letters every day at breakfast addressed in the same hand-writing."

"My sister's letters," forgetting how aged was the ruse.

"How fond your sister must be of you!" It was the second time she had sneered. "Unfortunately, you told me yesterday you had no sisters."

I had to fence then. "Well, for all you know I may be married." I had moored the skiff, and we were on our way back.

"Yes, but I happen to know you are engaged." And again she blushed confusedly.

"You know!" I exclaimed faintly.

"You have been engaged to Miss Minnie Heilig just seven months, if you wish me to be precise."

That was all. I taunted her, implored her, besought her, but to no purpose. I was as much in the dark when we reached the hotel as when she astonished me by telling the truth. When I spoke to her she would not answer.

What I needed most was stimulant—I could see that. When I got to the bar I met Harry Day.

"What, you?" he said. "Let's have something. What's yours?"

We had five of them and I felt no difference.

"By the way, old man, what in the name of the seven Sutherland sisters were you doing in a skiff with Maud Conway?"

"Never heard of her."

"Oh, come old man; I saw you, you know."

I was not listening much to what he said.

"Her name's Fanny Keene," I said absently. In reply he roared out laughing till I was driven out of my dreaminess.

"What the dickens are you laughing at?"

"You don't mean to say you don't know who she is?"

"I know nothing about her except that she is the nicest girl I—well, look here, Day, if you want to keep friends with me you'd better not say anything against that lady's character."

Day stopped laughing. "You don't mean to say you've knocked about London all this time without knowing—'s cleverest female 'tec. Why, she was the chief witness in the Leslie divorce case; she brought the kleptomania business home to Mrs. Austen,—she—"

He ran through a whole list of the dirty linen that had been washed in public during the past year or two. I heard him with a dizzy swimming in my head.

"What are you doing, Killeen? What on earth is she after you for?"

It came to me like a flash. The door stood open at the end of the passage. Beyond there was a seat out on the lawn, and a figure in a white gown on it. I heard Day's voice, "Don't be a fool, man! What are you going to do?" I was upon the lawn almost before he had finished his sentence.

"I know now how you discovered my engagement," I said between my teeth. She answered with her face covered with her hands.

"Luke, forgive me."

"Good-bye," I said.

"She was jealous. Forgive her, too. If she loves you as I do, you ought not to blame her."

"Good-bye," I said.

"Luke! I could not help it. They—they sent me down here. I never knew till it came to our last day what it was going to cost me——"

"Good-bye," I said again. She never raised her head. I felt glad it was twilight.

Reffell Naye.

Digitized by Google

A MAN'S MISTAKE.

Through the sighing boughs of the Australian bush there came drifting the hum as of a million bees set in rhythmic tone and tune. It was a great saw at Foley's mill flashing its merciless disc of steel through the logs. Foley himself sat on a low bench, his throat bare, his head leaning against a tree, watching through his slightly opened lids the swift movements of the men at the saw.

The girl who came up noiselessly behind him thrust her small fingers over his forehead and opened the lids of his eyes.

"Wake up, Dave, and take me out in the boat for a row in the shade. The house is hotter than a furnace."

"How did you get here?" said Foley indolently.

"I walked across the logs."

"I wish you wouldn't do that, Lize," said Foley with a frown. "Some day you'll get on a loose one and go under, and the logs will hold you fast."

"I'm too sure footed," laughed Lize, coquettishly thrusting out a slippered foot. "Come on, Dave."

"Oh, it's too warm for such exercise. Ask Langham to go with you. Here he comes." Foley looked up in time to see the curious sidewise glance from the girl's eyes.

"What did you look at me like that for, Lize?" he said suddenly.

"Like what?" she said. Without waiting for an answer she tripped to Langham.

"Dave is lazy and contrary," she said, pouting her pretty lips. "He says, won't you take me down the river in the boat?"

Langham lifted his hat to her. His dark eyes glanced from Foley to the girl with a cynical light that melted into something tender as it rested upon Lize's primrose face.

"With pleasure, Mrs. Foley. Good afternoon to you both. Foley, did you ever feel such a heat in the bush?"

"Not often in Australia," said Foley, shifting his straw hat over his eyes to shut out the glare. "There'll be a storm, a regular scorcher in a day or two."

"No sign of it now," said Lize, glancing at the yellow sky.

"Where is the boat?" queried Langham.

Foley nodded sleepily towards the landing—a platform of logs.

"Down there," he said. "Lize will show you."

Through motionless lids he watched them as they rowed away. His wife blew him a kiss from the tips of her dainty fingers. Far down the river her white dress gleamed like a darting heron under the arched boughs.

The sun had dropped ere the mill shut down for the night. Two of the hands lingered to light their pipes and gossip.

"Foley's gone. Didn't wait for her."

"Foley's a fool. Ketch me sendin' my wife out for a row with a fellow like that Langham. Did you see how he looked at her?"

"Soft on her, hey?"

"And I fancy she is on him," said the other, shrugging his shoulders.

They passed on oblivious of Foley's white face staring at them from the engine-room.

Had Lize been wise or observant she would have caught the ominous calm in Foley's voice as he laid his hand on her shoulder that night.

"Lize, I've been thinking it don't look exactly right, your going so often with that fellow."

"Indeed!" said Lize, her lips curling. "Gentleman is a better word than fellow, Mr. Foley."

"I don't know," said Foley slowly. "Gentlemen don't fall in love with other men's wives."

"Who said so?"

Her face grew suddenly white. Foley's hand tightened its grasp.

"You'd better be careful, Lize. I'll have my way in this. I forbid you to go on the river with Langham again."

"You were the one who sent me! Take your hand off—it hurts! I don't know whether I'll obey such a tyrant or not!"

She fled into the little parlour and Foley heard the bolt slip in the door.

Two days of sultry weather passed, during which the boat remained tied to its tree, the rope swaying in the water undisturbed. Langham, whose vagrant fancy had led him to fit up a rude hut on the south end, did not come down to the mill. Foley hoped he would stay away. There was a feeling in the tips of Foley's fingers that would have been relieved could they have rested on Langham's throat.

Digitized by Google

The sky had grown black with clouds that Saturday evening, and through the trees there came the breath of the storm. The men had left the mill, and Foley, standing midway on the unsteady bridge, swept the heavens with his long glass. He lowered it to watch a snipe in combat with a fellow fowl. A cry broke from his lips; he looked through the glass with an eye keen with fury. There, far down the river, he saw Langham draw Lize towards him and kiss her.

Without waiting to see more, Foley went leaping to the bank like a madman. On, on, up to his house and into the tiny sitting-room. A pearl handled bit of steel lay upon the mantelpiece. He snatched it up and thrust it into his pocket. The cold steel chilled his blood, and the face of Lize looked at him from a rough wooden frame. Foley fell upon his knees and threw the weapon from him.

The storm that had been brewing all the day broke at evening in all its fury. Langham in his cosy cabin heard the outside thunderstorm as in a dream. There was a tempest in his heart—his brain, and the touch of her lips lingering still. Suddenly the door flew open in a burst of rain, and he saw a drenched figure enter the cabin and sink to the ground sobbing and shivering.

"Oh, take me, take me away from here! Take me away—anywhere, Dave struck me—he saw you kiss me, and he will never forgive me."

Langham stroked her wet hair tenderly.

"You are safe with me," he said. "You shall come with me."

"I wish I had not gone with you," she sobbed, yet clinging to him. "I am so cold."

Langham placed her in a chair and found a great shawl to wrap round her; he knelt before her and began to chafe her hands. The September rain was chill and her blue little face was quivering like a child's.

Not until he heard her cry did Langham look up to see Foley standing in the room, his great arms folded upon his breast. Langham sprang to the shelf where his pistol lay, but Foley had a powerful hand upon his arm.

"Not that! If I had wanted to shoot you I would not have given you a chance for life. I've come to talk with you. What are you going to do? I gave her the choice—and she came here."

Langham's face burnt dull scarlet, but Foley's eyes were like steady steel.

"She's been my wife, but I want no woman that don't want me. Still, I can't see her go to ruin! I'll kill her first. She was a baby in a basket cradle when the river floated her to my cabin door. She's been all the world to me ever since. I haven't been so soft-spoken or so loving, but I gave her my name, my love, my respect. Can you do that for her? Or do you want her at all?"

It was a curious, pathetic scene. The girl in the chair stared at Foley, but Langham's face was troubled.

"I love her," he said slowly. "I am willing to take her, but she is innocent now of all but folly. I swear to you, Foley," he added with sudden passion.

"So much the better if you love each other. Now, listen. I am going away this night—no matter where. She can get her freedom in a little while. I won't bother you—unless you cast her off or break her heart! Then, by Heaven, I'll follow you and kill you inch by inch!"

For one moment Foley's eyes blazed their threat into Langham's heart. Then he was gone into the night without one word for Lize.

"He is gone," she said in a dull tone.

Langham bent and kissed her face. Lize pushed him back from her.

"I shall never see him any more!" she cried in a tone of anguish.

"No, you shall be all my own now."

Lize sprang to her feet; her eyes flashed a strange, amberlight upon him.

"I don't love you. I hate you! I know now that I love Dave. I want Dave! I am his wife! I am sorry I kissed you and came to you. Oh, Heaven! Dave, Dave, forgive me! Dave, Dave, I want you!" And freeing herself from his grasp she rushed into the storm.

Foley, working like a madman at his trunk, heard a light step upon the little porch. His heart leapt in a sickening throb as Lize crept into the room and stood trembling by the hearth.

"Well?" he said sternly, through his teeth, "has Langham driven you from him?"

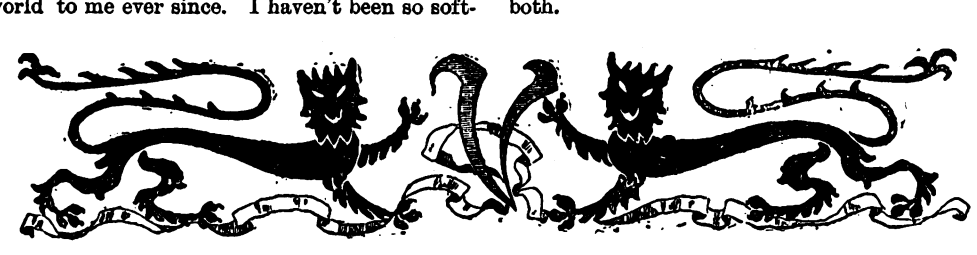
"Dave, Dave! Oh, will you please let me stay with you? I will not ask more; only just to stay with you? I did not know I loved you until to-night. You were not like a lover, Dave. You treated me like a child; and I was a woman, who wanted love and sweet words. I hate him, I told him so, and he tried to keep me back; but I had to come to you. I have been wicked—I let him kiss me!"

Her voice died in her throat. Foley caught her by the arms.

"Yes, it is all my fault. I made a mistake. And I struck you!" he said hoarsely. "Can you forgive that?"

"Oh, yes!" she sobbed, her lips touching his rough hand. Foley caught her in his arms and turned her face towards the lamp. In her eyes he saw the "light that never was on sea or land." In his long, silent kiss the past was buried, and a lovely future dawned for both.

H. T. P.



Digitized by Google

The Tale of the Yellow War.

BY M. P. SHIEL.

Author of "The Man-Stealers," "Prince Zaleski," "Shapes in the Fire," "The Rajah's Sapphire," etc.

SUMMARY.

Yen How, a shrewd Chino-Japanese doctor, falls desperately in love with Ada Seward, an English nursemaid. His advances are rudely repulsed, however; but he leaves England with a fixed determination to win the object of his affections in spite of all opposition.

He goes to China and becomes virtual ruler of that nation. In the course of a conversation which he has with Li Hung Chang he unfolds his scheme for setting all the European Powers against Great Britain. After the slaughter China will step in and conquer the remnants of the armies.

War is declared between Great Britain and France, Germany and Russia. The British fleet meets the Allied ships in Mid-channel and a battle ensues. Although the British vessels are outnumbered by two to one, the superior tactics of the British, and of John Hardy, a consumptive midshipman and a genius for modern warfare (who escapes on the Jupiter from the fight, and rams all the transports some distance away), result in the destruction of the Allied fleet. Hardy is ill for a time, and on his recovery decides to go to China. Before going, however, he endeavours to obtain a promise of marriage from Miss Bosey Jay, a young lady artist, but is refused. He goes to the Palace Theatre of Varieties, and there meets Ada Seward, the nursemaid with whom Yen How is in love. Yen How organises an army of 400,000,000 souls—men, women, and children—to overrun Europe when the time is ripe. All the Europeans in China are massacred, and when John Hardy gets there he is brought before Yen How, who discovers that the English boy has kissed Ada Seward.

They quarrel, and Hardy fires at the Chinaman, but the bullet strikes a breast-plate of steel and does no harm. John is seized and thrown into prison. Foo-chee loves Ah-lin (they are in the same Chinese regimental company), but the latter is loved by Sin-wan, a warder of the Imperial Prison. Ni-ching-tang is Foo-chee's father (although Sin-wan does not know this), and one of the scullions of Yen How's kitchen. John Hardy is cruelly tortured by Sin-wan, acting under Yen How's instructions. Ni-ching-tang, Foo-chee's father, discovers that Sin-wan has murdered his son and Ah-lin. He then goes in revenge and drugs Sin-wan, and enables John Hardy to escape in a boat to Kiao-Chau. The British warship Iphigenia, which escaped from the Japanese ships in the last battle, is run ashore at Kiao-Chau, now occupied by the Chinese. The British take possession of the fort and hold it against the Celestials.

John Hardy arrives at the island, and in due course propounds a scheme for escaping by taking possession of one of the deserted ships in a Chinese port, and manning her with the wrecked sailors of the Iphigenia.

CHAPTER XXIII. (continued).

"July 4th.—Here we are, every man Jack of us, on board a very smart and spanking little German barque called the Conrad, a thing of about 400 tons, and we making straight for Nagasaki, God only knows what for. However, everybody in the best of spirits, and the lads ready for any game. This man Hardy, is, in my opinion, as wild a creature as ever drew the breath of life, and yet it would be a lie if I say that I have not every confidence in his leadership, for I have. The Conrad is very high out of the water, and is scudding along before a good stiff breeze from the N.W., with the foam singing past the level of her weather bulwarks, and her deck too steep to walk on without gripping hold of things. She's got nothing in her but ballast, and not too much of that. So away we fly, under all plain sail and courses—a tidy spread of canvas for this light thing—but toward what? I am surprised at the lads: they don't seem to be asking themselves that question. The nineteen who went to Chefoo have got a fine old tale to tell of the capture of the Conrad, which they accomplished at about ten at night, without the least trouble. There was nobody aboard of her but an old Chinese woman, and one of those frizzy dogs that the Chinese eat. Not content with the ship and her three boats, Hardy boarded two other ships in the port, and seized three more boats; so that, counting the pinnace, we have got seven boats in all, which is not bad for a little nipper like this. What is troubling me is the thought of provisions; we have not enough to last us another three days at the present rate of going on. The ship is packed with men, and very far from packed with food. It is true, we should be in sight of Nagasaki by sun-down to-morrow, if this breeze lasts. But how in the name of Providence we are to get provisions at Nagasaki, even if we are not blown to the devil by some little Japanese gun-boat, is what I don't see. It isn't that I mistrust Hardy; there can be no doubt that he has a head-piece, and can lead. But I am a prudent man, and this looks to me like the wildest and maddest voyage that ever was made by any crew which ever put to sea.

"July 5th, one p.m—Breeze continued good during night and all morning. Conrad splendid, and twice did twelve knots. Lads looking out confidently for coast before sunset. Hardy having long private talks with Richardson and Lovel, both of whom have been Eastern traders, and say they know Nagasaki harbour well. Everybody getting pretty excited, and some saying Hardy ought to speak. I with great weight of fear at my heart, which I can't get rid of.

Digitized by Google

"July 5th, six p.m.—Good for Hardy! I believe it will work!—though as wild a thing, I suppose, as ever entered into the brain of a man! This day at five, Council. Resolved: that in the event ——"

[Here Murray's diary abruptly ends, and is not resumed till some weeks later. But the account which follows is also due to Murray, though given in a different form.]

Some little time after one bell in the second dog-watch on the 5th July, the Conrad's crew sighted the blue coast of Kiûsiu, they at that time being in a very high-wrought state, on account of the announcements made to them by Hardy in the "Council" at five, of which Murray speaks. It may be said, by the way, that Murray (a homely, well-meaning man, far more cautious than enterprising by temperament) fails to give in his diary anything like a fair idea of the enthusiasm with which John Hardy by this time seems to have inspired this crew. As a matter of fact, they now followed him blindly, adoring his audacity, believing in his success, entranced by his personality. Hardy was for them a dazzling angel sent to lead them to vague glories and to indefinite conquests, the precise nature of which did not, for the present, trouble their sailor-brains. When he unfolded his plans at the "Council" on the 5th, they discussed nothing, but hailed with rapture his proposals, eager to use their magnificent training for him, to do and die for him. Even Murray was infected. And at eight o'clock they lay-to behind a small island outside Nagasaki harbour, and waited there.

The moon arose. And everybody looked at her. For in all the creation there was nothing half so interesting to this crew this night as the earth's satellite.

She was at her full, and gravid with light. Up she climbed from the East in peerless, cloudy majesty. At midnight she was nearly overhead, and had then wheeled about her a light, fleecy cloud, prismic with rainbow hues, like Miss Löie Fuller in her serpentine dance. The night was full of shining, and shining was on the calm water.

The crew of the Conrad looked at her and swore. John Hardy, sitting among the main-sheet-ropes behind the wheel, looked questioningly at her, and muttered. But the moon did not hear.

It was better to be out at sea among the brisk breezes and the spray. At one o'clock, Hardy gave the order to let go the sheet of the main-jib, and put the helm to lee. The Conrad swung round, and went snorting once more to Mother Carey and the central sea.

At ten on the following night she was back at the same spot behind the island, and there she lay-to again. And the sailors watched the moon arise, and saw her climb to her noon, gravid with light, and saw her wheel about her a light cloud, à la Löie Fuller. And they swore more than ever.

But this time there was no turning back. It was now or never. Their stores were at an end.

John Hardy said to two men leaning over the bulwarks near him:

"Well, by moonlight, then, lads. It may not turn out to be so bad as we think."

And at about two o'clock in the morning, six boats put off from the Conrad and rowed away. Two contained nineteen men each, one twenty, one twenty-two, one twenty-three, and one thirty-three. On board the Conrad eight men were left.

At this hour the moon was westering far down the steep slope of her setting course, and all the smooth sea was branded with trails of tremulous silver. The old and drowsing Night, heavy with vigil, was all enkindled now and aglow, instinct with the glamour of the moon-beams absorbed through many a long hour, like an old toper who has imbibed in solitary orgy all the night, and towards morning he rises gorged for bed, drunken, and sighing with surfeit. A flush of pallid gold suffused the fainting air. Yonder, like a lamp which has burnt through all the slow period of the dark, and in the small hours it smoulders red, and gives an odour in the room, so down with troubled visage went the moon. Hardly a breath sighed through the slumbering harbour, and about its dark and silent islets.

The narrow inlet of sea which forms Nagasaki port lies nearly north and south, and is about twelve go (three miles) in length. At its mouth, it is only a quarter of a mile broad, and though it spreads out within, it is nowhere of very great breadth. All along its length, however, on both sides, the land opens up into numerous bays of considerable capacity. On the east side the land is mostly flat, and here used to be the "foreign settlement," with a water-frontage of some 700 yards, backed by picturesque slopes on which stood the villa-residences of the rich merchants. On the west side, however, where the moon went down, rose wooded mountain and steep crag. The whole is thoroughly sheltered, and affords anchorage for the biggest ships.

The six boats, furrowing their silent, silvery way, entered the harbour-mouth at the north-west, the largest boat (which contained Hardy, Richardson, and Brassey), leading. Anyone looking at this little fleet would have said that each of the boats contained no more than two men. The rest of their crowding crew were stowed away in the bottoms, and lined the sides, lying mostly at full length, and covered with strips of tarpaulin. Under the tarpaulins, too, were lanterns. The cross-seats, except those used by the rowers, had been removed.

The course lay among a number of islets, with the navigation of which Richardson seemed quite familiar. They passed Kami-no-Shima, the site of a disused gun-battery; and they crossed a stretch of sea, all white and incrusted with moonlight, to Takabok.

From the cliffs of Takabok, two centuries before, thousands of Christians were flung by the Japanese into the sea, because they refused to trample upon the Cross. And after two centuries John Hardy came to Takabok.

Yonder, a little inland, was the burning light of the Iwoshima light-house, and further still, the less brilliant beam of the Kage-no-Shima pharos. Further still, lay Pappenberg, and then Nezumi-Shima, which, in old quiet days was so often used as a pic-nic place by the white residents of Nagasaki.

One by one the islands receded, and the file of daring boats stole nearer and nearer upon the interior of the harbour, now in shadow, now adventuring swiftly across a patch of sea gloating in the dream of moonshine. And now, behind them is the last island, and before them the open basin, and ponderous in black slumber on the basin—the great navy of Japan.

But where are the eyes of the watchmen that they cannot pierce those dark coverings, and divine that there, beneath them, is creeping nearer and nearer an insidious death, a strange retribution? The watchmen, if they see, cannot divine. The riddle of destiny is far beyond them. All droops and faints in slumber—the sea, and the old night, and the moon in her far western couch, and the divining of the watchmen.

Only the best-trained crew in the world, led by the best leader, are awake: and they have sworn an oath.

And, suddenly, a miracle of luck is revealed to them. For yonder all the western half of the harbour is seen to be lying in absolute shadow, while the eastern half is still glittering in aspen corruscations of white light. And the main part of the fleet, it is clear, is lying within that western gloom.

The boats, by signal, separate. Each knows its work—each has its instructions.

They are, in general, to aim at the stars, they are to fly at big game, they are to make for battle-ships.

But each has separate recommendations to fulfil. And to every man is given his place, and his work, according to his powers. The company is organised into captains, commanders, lieutenants, as in the big navy at home. Hardy has been minute.

Digitized by Google

The biggest boat of all, containing thirty-three men, cruises at zig-zag for three or four minutes; and then Hardy sees, and decides. He whispers an order; and the boat—the long-boat of some European four-master—turns directly westward, and enters the recess in the coast-wall which is directly north of the Tetegami dock. Here the water is hardly ruffled by a ripple; and here the blackness of shadow is absolute. Two points of light only are visible within that gloom—the white mast-light, and the coloured port light of a great ship.

The sword of Brassey is in his breast.

Her massive hull is just discernible, disparting the water with its outward-bulging girth. She conveys a suggestion of such ponderousness, that it looks as though no power on earth could ever move that squat mass an inch through the water. She is the giant of the Japanese navy, the terrible Hirosaki, and she has a crew of 576 men.

But they are asleep, and the thirty-three are awake; and yonder to the far eastward, in the broad brand of shimmering and weltering moonshine, is a boat in which some of the harbour police are lolling on their oars, chatting, seeing nothing. And the bull's-eyes of the lighthouses glare steadily, and the watch-lights of the ships glare steadily, and they see nothing.

The oars are muffled, and the boat glides through shadow beneath the poop of the Hirosaki, and when a grappling iron steals upward and fixes in a beading of the stern, we may very well say that the British lion is crouching to spring.

Up wriggles Brassey by the pole and gains the cornice, and, immediately afterwards, up wriggles Hardy. And when Hardy gains the cornice, he coughs a little; and Brassey whispers in his ear a long: "Sh-h-h-h."

Yonder, six yards from them, is the officer of the watch, walking to and fro, between the mainmast and the aft nine-incher.

The two lie on their faces, and are hidden by a ridge of bulwark above the cornice. Within reach is a coil of rope, and Brassey's hand steals between an interspace of the taffrail, and with absolute noiselessness draws forth the coil, makes a bowling-knot round one rail, and lowers a rope-end to the boat.

And now the men arrive rapidly. There is plenty of room to receive them. They are like flies climbing an overhanging rampart by a spider's fil de toile.

Before the last man is up, three of them have run stooping forward, and the officer drops without a groan. Just then, from for'ard, a man climbs the stair to report to the officer that the three lights are duly burning: it is his half-hourly duty. And as he reaches the topmast rung, the sword of Brassey is in his breast, and he drops.

The upper deck of the Hirosaki is a village, five hundred feet long, but an almost deserted village. Just for'ard of the foremost funnel, two men are talking, one leaning against the foremast, one with his hand resting on a boat-davit; and a moment before the sword pierces him, the latter gives a light laugh at a jest of the other; and the other utters a feeble cry, and dies. The upper deck of the Hirosaki is an English village.

They descend to the main-deck, to the fo'castles, to the cabins, to the engine-rooms, down even to the turtle-back armour-deck at the water-line, and everywhere, with the silence and the thoroughness of the Angel of the Passover, they smite, they slay. As a man cries out, he dies; he opens his eyes, and they are sightless. The ship flows with blood.

At a door for'ard, Hardy lifts a lantern and looks into a small apartment in which sleep ten men. He shuts the door upon them, secures it, and does not kill. They are the remnant,—the only men left alive,—and he will have need of them.

In the bunkers of the Hirosaki are 2,500 tons of coal. The Englishmen are soon crowding in the engine-room.

Five other ships, besides the Hirosaki, are already in their hands. But their work is not over. Massacre for massacre—John Hardy's for Yen How's! Each has his Sabbath, and his Passover-night.

Once more the six boats put off from the six captured ships, each containing from five to nine men, all carefully picked and mixed, according to their special knowledge of ship-work; and these, six meet at an agreed spot just opposite the patent slip of the Dock-company. Then three of the boats' crews abandon their boats, stepping over into the other three boats, and these three row away, each containing sixteen men.

And each of them glides beneath the stern of a Japanese war-ship, and the men climb, and kill, and hurry to the engine-rooms.

Down in smoky disaster and eclipse sets the red moon, and the deep dark which precedes the morning covers the silent tragedy.

Three pistol-shots altogether, two in one ship, one in another, have been fired by the Japanese. These shots represent all the struggle which has taken place.

But the darkness which has supervened, almost as suddenly as the flickering-out of an out-worn lamp, cannot prevent the watches on other ships from perceiving that some of the fleet are pouring out an unaccountable smoke from their funnels. They must be lost in amazement, unless they conclude that the ships have received secret orders from the Admiral to sail. But they look on, and do nothing but look—for the Admiral is with the fleet, borne in the Hirosaki, and all, they think, is under his eyes.

There is a rattle of chains, and the steam-windlasses are a-clank, and as the first faint hint of day tinges the East, the solid-looking bulk of the Hirosaki—moves. And one after another the nine bulks move, wending northwards in file.

Digitized by Google

Nine—they are few in number, but they represent a good quarter of Japan's weight in war-ships. And with that quarter, Hardy would then and there attack the other three-quarters, with an inward certainty of beating them, were it not that he lacks one thing—men. The crew of a six-inch quick-firer is five; and five men represent the third part of a complete ship's-crew in this sparsely-manned fleet.

But the sound of cannon is good to the ear of Hardy, and in mere self-indulgence, as the Hirosaki steams past the island of Takabok, he sends a 9·2 inch wire-gun shell among the still slumbering fleet. And the startled hills of Nagasaki awake, and cry aloud with many a voice of surprise, and the shell bursts in the engine-room of a cruiser.

The shot is not answered. There is an amazement so profound as to resemble coma. While it lasts action is impossible.

But the amazement of the Japanese navy at being shot at by their own Admiral-ship was, if possible, surpassed by the crews of the three new Chinese cruisers, the Hi-ti, Hi-tien, and Hai-wan, when, three days later, at noon, a fleet of nine Japanese ships proceeded without warning to sink them as they lay at anchor at Shanghai. They made no resistence to this sudden and overwhelming assault; they simply sank.

In each of the nine ships were a few Japanese who, by Hardy's orders, had been spared to do forced labour in working the ships. Being unarmed, they behaved well, and from them was learnt the probable station of the three Chinese cruisers.

The "Hundred and Eighty" (so called) then proceeded southward, and touched at Hong-Kong, intending to take on board all the white men they could find there. But there were no longer any white men at Hong Kong, though there was coal.

Then they turned their bows toward the West, among them being the Conrad, with her crew of eight.

CHAPTER XXIV.

The Frown of England.

By the end of July, one thing at least had been clearly hinted to the whole of Europe: that if those British could not write music, they could work; if they could not make pretty things, they could certainly fight; if they were not "élégants," they at least possessed the knack, and the secret, and the sword of the Conqueror.

"La morgue britannique!" "La raideur britannique!"—it was not, then, after all, a mere insolence of semi-savages, but a pride based on a genuine superiority of national value and valour.

The Continental nations were not quick in learning this fact: a lingering unbelief persisted in them; and in learning it, they perished; and in teaching it to them, Britain herself all but perished.

The numerous campaigns all over the Continent had now occupied not quite five months; and at the end of this time Europe was in a state of collapse and exhaustion far exceeding that which existed at the close of the Thirty Years War.

About a league to the south-west of Liege, in a pine-wood, there stands a small, old-fashioned inn with over-hanging gables, whose frontage looks directly upon the brown waters of the Meuse. Here the Emperor Wilhelm, Duke Paul, representing the Romanoffs, and M. Hanotaux met by appointment.

The first was chiefly a soldier, the second chiefly a diplomat, the third chiefly a man of business.

They sat in one of those vast bedrooms of old Belgian inns, on the first floor, grouped near a window which overlooked the river.

The deliberation was conducted, as usual, in French.

"The situation," said M. Hanotaux "has developed. And developments generally demand new plans. The facts we know: by means of a single contretemps to our fleet, France finds herself with two invading armies in her territories, Germany with three, and Russia with three. And in no case has any one of these eight armies been unsuccessful."

"The defensive," said the Emperor, "has always been intensely repugnant to the genius of the German army. It is an army of conquest and aggression. The smallness of its victories in this war has been due to the fact that it fought on German soil."

Duke Paul and M. Hanotaux smiled at each other with their eyes.

"But the question is one of means, rather than of causes," said M. Hanotaux. "Let us face this fact boldly: that our great enemy is aided by the geography of the earth. We should have beaten England—we none of us doubted that we should. But we have not. To me there seems to have been two chief reasons for this failure, which may now be more or less removed: Firstly, the diversions caused by the hostilities entered upon against us by other nations; and secondly, the sea."

"But both reasons remain?" said Duke Paul interrogatively.

"The sea does," broke in Wilhelm, "but, candidly, it is my opinion that France should long ago have made peace with Italy, and Russia with Austria."

"Your Majesty is perhaps a little sanguine in this view," answered M. Hanotaux, "for Italy was the aggressor, and perhaps one might say the same of Austria. On the other hand, Germany seems to have no real cause for a bloody war with Sweden and Denmark."

"But was not Sweden, then, the aggressor, monsieur, as far as Germany was concerned?" asked Wilhelm. "Did she not wantonly attack my coasts for no other valid reason than that Germany was the ally of Russia? And since Denmark has joined Sweden in this unprovoked attack, what would you have? This, be sure, is not a matter for the peace-maker, monsieur, but for the unsparing and implacable sword."

"Still," said M. Hanotaux, and he stroked his straggling barbiche de bourgeois, "our conference, conducted in a spirit of unyielding insistence upon rights, will hardly result in good fruit. The fact is that we each of us have to fight one great, and at least one smaller foe. I have inaugurated this meeting for the purpose of asking in the most definite terms this question: Since the resources of Europe are visibly nearing their end, do we prefer to conquer the great foe or the small? Is it wisdom to persist in both attempts?"

"I agree with you in principle," said Wilhelm.

"The principle is obvious," said Duke Paul.

"And to me the details also seem obvious," said M. Hanotaux quietly. "England triumphant over Europe means, of course, the wiping out of the empires of the world—it means a Saxon earth. When I say 'a Saxon earth,' I shudder, Your Majesty—I shudder, M. le Duc Paul,—and you shudder, too. The thought, you will say, is not pretty. And the nations will not permit that? Let us make peace with our brothers, that we may crush the stranger!"

"A League of Europe?" said the Duke.

"A League of Europe," answered M. Hanotaux, and bowed.

Wilhelm flushed with enthusiasm, and he said:

"I agree!—in principle."

"The principle is obvious," put in the Duke.

"And the details, I think!" cried M. Hanotaux.

"Who will make a beginning?"

"If we say—Germany."

"Not Germany!" said the Kaiser.

"Then Russia," said M. Hanotaux.

"Hardly Russia, perhaps," mused Duke Paul. "The heart of the Tsar is set upon the crushing of Sweden, at least——"

"Then France!" exclaimed M. Hanotaux, "since you leave to France this glory."

"You mean that you will accept the conditions demanded by Italy, monsieur?"

Digitized by Google

"Yes, Your Majesty!"

"At once?"

"No—not precisely—but soon."

"When?"

"After the next great battle."

"Whatever the result?"

"Yes, M. le Duc Paul."

"But after the next great battle the southern resources of France will, as I understand it, be at an end," said Wilhelm bluntly. "You will be compelled to do what you offer to do."

"Not 'compelled,' perhaps, Your Majesty; for the territorial resources of Italy will be practically at an end also. There remains, however, her—Navy. We have need of it."

As the inwardness of M. Hanotaux's scheme unfolded with these words, it won the whole interest of his two interlocutors. In both the royal and the ducal brains ripened at the same instant this thought: "A Second Invasion of England."

"I follow you with the closest attention, monsieur," said Wilhelm.

"And I also find your reflections of the profoundest interest, monsieur," added the Duke.

"France," proceeded M. Hanotaux, "will adopt this line of conduct under the following conditions: first, she will satisfy the claims of Italy on the understanding, between her and Italy, that Italy becomes the ally of the Allies; and secondly, France demands that the two Allies follow her example, by generally granting the demands of Sweden, Denmark, and Austria, on the understanding that they also become the allies of the Allies against the common foe of Europe."

Wilhelm leapt up.

"The thing is done, monsieur!" he exclaimed.

"It is a question of when," said Duke Paul.

"Precisely," said the Kaiser, "it becomes a question of when."

"When the next great battle between France and Italy has been fought," answered M. Hanotaux.

"No!" leapt from the mouth of Wilhelm, in a sort of half-suppressed start, and then there was a long pause. The fact was that each desired to fight yet one battle with the enemy with whom it was proposed to make terms, in the hope and belief that the victory would be his, and the terms of peace therefore more advantageous for him.

Duke Paul spoke meditatively; and he said:

"I agree, on the condition that Russia will make no terms with Sweden and Austria until after the next considerable battle with each of these, whether the battle of France with Italy has then occurred or not."

"And the conditions of Germany are identical," said the Kaiser.

"Then there is nothing for it but to shake hands on the compact, Your Majesty, and M. le Duc Paul. It may be observed, however, that your condition, and mine, insures a certain and very considerable reduction of the not large territorial forces now at our disposal. Is there no departure possible from this determination?"

There was no departure. The three men spoke on for about an hour; and as the darkness gathered, they rode away toward Liege, and took train in different directions.

The agreement, often repeated, was this: five battles, one by France, two by Germany, two by Russia; then, if possible, a European peace and League.

Russia would be prepared to hand over to Austria the doubtful legacy of the still warring Balkan States, and all that stretch of fair land from the Golden Horn to Cape Matapan: and she would yield Finland, with an indemnity, to the victorious arms of Sweden; Germany would buy off Sweden and Denmark; France would yield to Italy the Haute Savoy, Avoie, the Alpes Hautes, Basses, and Maritimes, and Var.

For all this large generosity there was a cause, bitterly near home, awfully pressing. The one thing now that could save Europe from England was the necessity imposed upon England to recall her armies to defend her own territory.

For, at last, 100,000 British soldiers occupied all the Seine valley between St. Germain and Argenteuil, and, the headquarters of Lord Roberts and his staff was the Taverne St. Roch near the great escalier of St. Germain. A hundred thousand men—a small army when the war began; an immense war-host now. There was no intention of attacking Paris, which required an investing circuit of 125 miles;—but Paris was not France. Normandy already was once more British; the rest of France lay open; and Italy had crossed the Iser.

Germany's plight was hardly less extreme. Her splendid legions had thrown themselves northward in three continuous streams to meet three branches of the same Teutonic race of which she was part. To the west, occupying Schleswig-Holstein and the upper reaches of the Elbe as far as Domitz, Denmark lay encamped; to the east, Sweden had drawn lines of circumvallation by a ring of earthwork forts and Schumann gun-turrets round Breslau, having captured the Breslau-Posen railway; and midway between these two was that brazen-browed, nimble, ever-intruding enemy, who alone had made possible to the others their victories.

Northern Germany, from Hamburg to Tilsit, had been the scene of the worst series of massacres—carnage after carnage—ever witnessed in history; Royal Saxon Corps, famed in military history, Bismarck Cuirassiers, gallant Silesian and West Prussian Corps—paragons of the soldier's hope of attainment—all had been flung, and flung in vain, into the devouring maw of war; still the British came, though in ever-lessening numbers; and still from further and further south marched the precious levies of the Fatherland. Seven of the twenty corps of the Imperial host remained; and of these, two Bavarian brigades were marching upon Naumberg, whence a nondescript army of Socialists, Nihilists, and malcontents had issued from its headquarters a manifesto to the nation, announcing the day of Liberty, and inviting support.

As for Russia, she turned a four-fold face south, south-west, north-west, and inward, and everywhere saw doom. The Army of India, having waited in vain for invasion, crossed the Helmund, annihilated at Merv the still unrecalled remnants of the Russian army of Turkestan, and had now, after a great victory at Novo Tcherkask, reached Kharkov by road, with the Kremlin for its objectif. Odessa, Sebastopol, and the Black Sea littoral were British.

One of the divisions of the Austrian army had in a single day disappeared; but another quickly sprang in its place; and this, with its sister army, adopted Moltke's principle of marching separately and fighting together, had, after a strenuous campaign, only surpassed for carnage by the great drama of blood transacting itself in Northern Germany, made Poland an Austrian province, and crossed the sources of the Niemen. Russia was doing doubtful battle in Bulgaria, Turkey, and Asia Minor. The battleships of Sweden were at the mouth of the Neva; and in the heart of Russia itself a deep subterranean muttering, like a presage of universal earthquake and overthrow, was suggested by the mere word "Nihilist."

This, in briefest outline, was the situation on the Continent at the moment of the conference in the wood at Liege. The three nations which had primarily been made the tools of Yen How, regretted now their rashness. They had miscalculated the Lion.

But, suddenly—as if it needed only the conference in the wood to bring them luck—their sky cleared. In the darkest hour of their extremity, they found a Hope, their last.

On two days following, about two weeks after the meeting in the wood, two considerable victories attended the arms of the Allies.

One of these was French: the 14th (or Lyons) Army Corps of 40,000 men met the advancing Italian Army between Burgoin and the left bank of the Rhone, and though outnumbered by ten thousand, gave to Italy an emphatic, and indeed final negative to her long-fought attempt at conquest. And at once the Aurillas brigade of the 13th (Clermont-Ferrand) corps, which was all that was left of it, was ordered southward to cross the Alps and carry the threat of war into the enemy's country, prior to the proposition to Italy of the terms agreed upon between the Allies.

Digitized by Google

Won by a flanking movement of Don Cossacks.

The second victory was Russian, and was gained in a far more momentous conflict over the magnificent British Indian troops, which had gallantly won their way from Quetta almost to the walls of Moscow. On this battle General Dragomiroff, in a great, final bid for victory, had concentrated almost the whole of the remaining forces of his master. It was a mixed combat in which Ural, Orenburg and Transcaspian Cossacks fought with Bengal Lancers, and Turkestan Infantry Brigades with Royal Fusiliers. The battle, from the commencement of which the 90,000 British were greatly outnumbered, was, after five hours' massacre, won by a flanking movement of Don Cossacks. The number of the slain was 160,000.

Great as was the exhaustion in which this dear victory left Russia, the immediate result was a sudden and enormous increase of her prestige. And two things at once happened: first, Sweden, no longer acting in concert with the great arm of England, which was the incentive to her audacity, became anxious to secure by peace her conquests in Northern Russia; and secondly, the Kaiser, knowing that terms would now be offered to Sweden by Russia, became anxious to make terms with Sweden before her hands were freed to direct upon Germany the entire remnant of her forces. In this way it happened that nearly every one of the contending nations were, owing to the results of these two battles, strongly motived toward peace. Nor could Austria resist the pressure of her allies, Italy and Germany, nor the large amenities of Russia south of the Balkans; and in the many-sided treaty signed at Vienna on the 23rd of August, Denmark, too, compelled by the pressure of events, was one of the signatories.

It was now that the long-expected had come at last. Led by the rigour of events, and by the general tendency of long-maturing sentiment, an exhausted Europe had inaugurated a League—as the first preliminary to a renewal of her life—having for its object the destruction of an exhausted Britain.

For Britain, too, was exhausted; and already had lost semblance to that land of free-handed opulence which her sons remembered with sighs. John Bull's girth had thinned.

Yet if photographs at this hour could have been taken of all her people, and the traits of these agglomerated into the expression of a single face, that face would have been the wild and wan and gaunt visage of a Man, on whose brow brooded a fatal frown of indignation and resolve, not to be softened but by death.

The idea of Europe was to hurl itself in its whole banded strength upon this diminished force. And it would be strange if, this time, the island could withstand the continent.

England's navy had, on the whole, done well. Up to the moment of the new League, she still might be said to command the seas. But with the League, even without the practically intact navy of Italy, her supremacy was gone. With the navy of Italy, it was twice and thrice obliterated.

The new Allies, indeed, looked forward with certainty to another great naval battle before they could effect their design; but their ultimate passage to England was practically assured.

And Sweden, flushed with victory, contributed an Army Corps; and Russia, freed from invaders, contributed two; and Germany one; and France one; and Austria three; and Denmark two brigades; and Italy two brigades.

The port of debarkation was fixed at Antwerp, whose neutrality thus suffered willing violation, and in the last days of August 360,000 troops, troop-ships, and war-ships were hasting over sea and land to rendez-vous upon Antwerp.

England, warned both from the Continent and America, was not in the dark. On the 5th of September, when the great Armada set sail from the Belgian port, her whole available force in ships of war was massed in Portsmouth Harbour, all but ready to sail.

It was on this very day, toward two in the afternoon, that a singular species of duel was taking place between two men at Worthing. It was war in extremis, as bitter as, and more breathless in its mad intensity than the great war going forward around them.

One of these men was called Richardson, and the other Atkins. Atkins was excise, with a salary of thirty shillings; Richardson was municipal, and acquainted with rates. His locale was the Town Hall, and he earned forty shillings. Both were fairly active young men of twenty-five.

Apart from their steady and respectable employments, each had a species of less reputable avocation, which, however, he pursued with extreme zeal, and, for some reason or other, was proud of. Richardson said that he was "on the staff" of the Evening News; and Atkins that he was "on the staff" of the Sun.

This only meant that they had agreed to send any local news that might be of interest to those papers.

Now, on this 5th of August, a bit of local news of considerable interest did, in fact, occur. For a strange-looking little craft, which was nothing else than a Maltese speronare, had arrived at the pier; and from her had landed a man of uncertain age, who slowly walked up the pier with his eyes on the ground, made his way to Dixon's Commercial Hotel half-way up the Pier Street, and there disappeared. The rest of the speronare's occupants had at once put out to sea again. But it was quite an hour afterwards before either Atkins or Richardson, being employed on their Jekyll affairs, got the least scent of this Hyde matter.

It was Atkins who, at the dinner-hour, first entered Dixon's commercial-room. In the front of Dixon's was announced a "Daily———Ordinary," the two words being separated by a great gap where the word "Shilling," now painted out, had once stood.

As Atkins entered the room, he saw the back of the stranger, who was leaving it by a door which led to the bedrooms above, and he started.

The whole interest of his life was instantly centred upon this man; there was something in his appearance, his dress, which aroused the instinct of the reporter. About the man was the odour of the sea.

At this time, a bit of news was to the people of Britain like rain to the desert. Men often spent their very last half-penny in buying a paper, which they knew could tell them little more than they already knew.

We have said that Atkins was interested at sight of the stranger; but this interest became a passion the moment that, approaching a spread side-table, he saw beside a soiled plate a piece of paper; and on the paper a certain name written at the bottom of a promise-to-pay, together with a London address.

It had happened that the stranger had, to begin with, informed Dixon that he was without a copper in his pockets; and Dixon, after some demur, on the security of a gold ring, an honest face, and a written promise-to-pay, had not only trusted the stranger with a meal and a bed, but had lent him twelve shillings to pay his fare to London that night. The promise-to-pay, he had in a moment of bustle left on the table, and Atkins saw it, and turned to run.

And as he turned to run, lo! Richardson was at the door. And Atkins let his flat hand fall upon the paper, and stood leaning with careless grace.

Richardson, on his way to Dixon's, had heard of the arrival of the stranger, and there was a breath of haste at his lips. He said:

"Hullo! Anything up?"

"Not as I know of. You heard anything?"

"No. Seen the article in to-day's D.T.——?"

"No. Why are you so late to-day? I have had dinner ten minutes——"

"What, are you off? It's only——"

"I've got to be. Beastly job on hand——gauging business for Hatley's. See you to-night at the club——"

Atkin's diplomacy was bad, for his walk toward the door, for one thing, was too rapid to be natural; and Richardson had noted his statuesque pose, his rather pale face, and his unmoving hand over the paper. So he had no sooner passed through the door, than Richardson, too, had read; and at once he, too, rushed to the door. But it was locked on the outside.

The thought of summoning slow Mr. Dixon by the bell never even entered his head; he simply flew to the window, dashed up the sash, dropped into the area, and climbed up to the rails on the opposite side by the help of a swinging coal-cellar door.

Yonder, half way down the street, was Atkins, running with all his legs. Richardson, as though life lay before, and death behind, was after him.

Atkins, however, was considerably taller and fleeter, Richardson being inclined to be fat; and the race was clearly the foremost man's, when, suddenly, there appeared from a bye-street, with callous saunter, a policeman about ten yards ahead of Atkins.

And at once Richardson sent forth the impassioned shout of "Stop thief! Stop thief!" many times repeated.

And an instant later Atkins was firmly gripped in the arms of the officer.

"Let me go, Jones, you infernal idiot!" screamed Atkins, "you ought to know better, you fool! Can't you guess—Jones—you silly ass——"

But Jones, with zealous sense of duty, maintained his grip on the frantic man, till he saw the accuser mysteriously rush onward past the accused. And he tossed his head with a smile, as he relaxed his hold of Atkins; and he said:

"Oh, well, I suppose it's only one of their little newspaper squabbles——"

Atkins was firmly gripped in the arms of the officer.

So Richardson only reached the telegraph-office about ten seconds before Atkins; and the telegraph-man was engaged to Atkin's sister.

And therefore the Sun got its message some five minutes before the News; but by some sleight-of-hand, or extra energy, the News was not out-done. It reached Piccadilly Circus first, though the Sun was first at Holborn; and it was never quite determined to which of the two Finsbury and Tooting owed their gratitude for the news.

On the placards of each the words were the same:

JOHN HARDY ARRIVED IN ENGLAND.

(To be continued.)

THE WORLD OF DRESS.

Edited by Mrs. ARIA.

Published by C. Arthur Pearson Limited.

Monthly, 1s.; Subscription, 12s. a year, post free.

The World of Dress will contain the Latest Fashion News in Paris, Vienna, New York, and London. Theatrical Dress in these cities will be largely dealt with, for it is on the stage that the changes of Fashion are first noted. A special feature each month will be an Interview with a Leading Costumier in one of those cities, who will specially design for The World of Dress one of the Coloured Plates which will be presented with each copy every month.

READY ON THE 1st OF EVERY MONTH.

BROUGHT HOME.

"Hallo, old man! Can't accept the invitation? Oh, pshaw, you'll regret it! Any number of swell people and pretty girls are to be there, and all the fellows. By the way, have you met the new girl? Country niece of Mrs. Witherbee, I believe. The fellows are raving about her."

"Is she to be at the houseparty, Upton?"

"Should say so! Couldn't get along without her! Good-bye old fellow; must be off. I'm running to the sea-side for the week end. Better change your mind about that invitation."

"Thank you, Upton. I may. Remember me to everyone."

"H'm! Upton's a queer fellow; good-hearted, though. I rather think I shall take his advice. A few days off can do me no harm. Almost five years have passed since I took my last holiday."

"Well, well, Hampton, glad to see you took my advice!" was the greeting he received from Upton. "Girls all inquiring for you. Come and join us."

"Ah, Mrs. Witherbee!"

"Why, Mr. Hampton! I am so glad you have come. We were almost afraid to count upon you."

"Mr. Hampton,—Katherine, my neice, Miss Heyward, —Mr. Hampton."

"I am very pleased to meet you, Miss Heyward."

It was rather a conventional speech, but there was a depth of sincerity in his low voice which gave it a real charm. He wondered where he had seen this beautiful niece of Mrs. Witherbee. Her eyes, her mouth, her regular features, even the graceful outlines of her head and shoulders, seemed familiar.

The rest of the company demanded his attention, and he had to leave Heyward's circle.

The conversation was not very general at dinner that evening. Hampton had taken Miss Heyward to the table, and he was very willing to have his attention absorbed by her. As he gazed at her perfect complexion and clear-cut profile he thought he had never before been so forcibly struck with a woman's beauty; "and yet," he added to himself, "I feel that I have seen her somewhere before."

"Do you enjoy boating, Miss Heyward?" A bright idea came to Hampton.

"I am passionately fond of it, Mr. Hampton. Indeed, it is almost my only pastime at home."

"Then let us arrange a boating party for this evening. Mrs. Fitzsimmons proposed it. There are four small boats available. Whom shall we ask?"

"Let me think—Mr. Upton (Hampton bit his lip) and Miss Cruttendon (it was all right, after all, he thought; she had planned for Upton to take Miss Cruttendon). Mr. James and Miss Carhart, Mr. Harrington and Miss Wycliffe—that will fill the boats will it not, Mr. Hampton?"

She looked up brightly, and counted them off on her dainty fingers.

"Capital! I shall speak to the men immediately after dinner, and tell them whom they are to ask to accompany them. You will favour me, will you not, Miss Heyward?"

"I thank you, Mr. Hampton,"—she glanced charmingly up at him—"but Mr. Upton has already asked me to go with him. Of course, you will take Miss Cruttendon?"

Hampton tried hard to hide his chagrin.

"I am very sorry that Mr. Upton is to be the fortunate one. Yes, I shall be pleased to take Miss Cruttendon, if she has no previous engagement."

As the boats in single file silently rounded the outer point the sound of music floated across the water. Musicians were playing a serenade—an Italian love song, with soft, insinuating cadence. The oars ceased to move and the boats drifted aimlessly on into the shadows.

"Heavenly, Miss Cruttendon, is it not?" Hampton asked, as the music ceased. But his eyes were fixed upon the boat occupied by Miss Heyward and Upton.

"I say, there's a jolly place a little way up, called Satan's ladder, I believe. Let's row up."

They glided up past meadow and woodland. As they rounded a sharp point there came into view a perpendicular wall of rock, towering majestically above the water. Miniature trees shot out from the crevices and tangled vines hung from it in beautiful festoons. Winding up through a natural ravine, rude steps led to the summit.

The boats were secured at the foot of the cliff.

"Let's go up, Miss Heyward."

"Thank you, but I would rather not undertake it."

"Oh, I would love to go, Mr. Upton!" Miss Cruttendon said quickly.

Upton ascended extending a helping hand to Miss Cruttendon. The others followed. Hampton was left alone with Miss Heyward.

"I should love to have undertaken that climb five years ago."

"Do five years, then, make so much difference in a girl's life?"

"Why, yes, Mr. Hampton, or in a man's either. Don't you think so?"

"Yes, sometimes—but it has not made much difference in mine. Five years ago I took my last vacation, and I find myself just as capable of enjoyment now as then."

"And just as ready to fall in love!"

He was taken aback.

"I do not quite understand, Miss Heyward."

There was just a trace of haughtiness in his tone.

"Why, you know, all men are ready to fall in love—and to fall out again."

"Hardly all men, Miss Heyward." his voice was reproachful. "Do you think it altogether fair to make so sweeping an assertion?"

"No, it is not; but have you never been guilty of that, Mr. Hampton?"

"No, Miss Heyward; decidedly no! that very quality I have always regarded in man's character as one of his lowest, meanest traits. For me to love once would be to love always."

"Would be, Mr. Hampton?" she looked shyly up at him.

She leant back wearily against the massive wall of rock, and in contrast to it she seemed so frail, that he longed to protect her, to shield her from the men who had made her doubt.

"Mr. Hampton, some years ago one of my girl friends met a man who swore that he would always be true to her. She was but a girl, and blindly trusted him. He was an artist taking a holiday in her village, and acquaintance ripened into something deeper. When the summer was over and he was forced to leave, he kissed her and swore with his lips to hers he would return; and she waited for him with a blind trust.

Digitized by Google

"Imagine her feelings when, some time ago, she, grown to a woman, met him; and he, not knowing her, showered attention upon her, even attempted to make love to her."

Hampton leant back against the cliff, and, with his oar, traced figures in the sand.

"Do you marvel that she began to distrust men?"

He did not speak and all round them was silence, unbroken save by the muffled laughter of the climbers.

Suddenly he straightened up. He took her hand in his. His arm stole round her waist.

"She shall believe in them hereafter, Kate."

She drew her young form up to its full height and stepped out from the rock. Her resolute head was silhouetted against the silver moon.

"Stop! five years make a great difference in a girl's life, Mr. Hampton."

His hands dropped to his side.

"And in a man's," he muttered.

The others were descending.

"I say, you missed a jolly climb. Glorious view from above. Can't see why they call it Satan's ladder though. Ought to be the golden stairs."

H. T. C.

AN AUCTION EXPERIENCE.

It is one of those drowsy autumn days when the atmosphere seems charged with the hum of busy insect life. I am sole occupant of the principal room of a village inn. Mingling with the universal hum without comes the sound of a monotonous human voice through the open window. It is too far away for me to be able to distinguish it clearly.

The landlord fortunately enters at this moment, and I forthwith seize the opportunity of satisfying my lazy curiosity concerning the distant voice, which has never ceased to murmur monotonously since I entered. The explanation is unexciting. It is only an auctioneer on a neighbouring green—a travelling auctioneer, the landlord informs me, who accomodates any number of persons in the matter of selling.

I stroll leisurely out of the inn, light a cigar, and take the direction whence comes the buzz of voices. Behind a dilapidated house surrounded by a dilapidated wall, I come upon a motley group. I look on in silent amusement now at the auctioneer, who glibly extols the quality of each article in turn, with a fluency and air of conviction quite astonishing, considering that any knowledge of what he offers for sale has probably been derived within the last few hours.

I have stood thus for a good while; it is beginning to grow somewhat slow, and I soon tire of the salesman's monotonous voice, for ever ascending the scale: "12s., 12-6, going at 13—gone!" And so it repeats itself, varied by nods and gesticulations on the part of the audience, and ever culminating in the significant monosyllable.

Just at this state of the proceedings my eye falls on the figure of a girl in my vicinity. I am leaning over a low wall; she is close to me on the other side; her very nearness has caused me to overlook her. She is a lady, evidently, judging from her dress. Her face I cannot see well; it is covered with a long veil edged deeply with crape, so that her features are, to a great extent, hidden from me. She is clad as a widow in deepest mourning attire, with only her hair as a bright redeeming spot from the general sombreness.

When I first observed her, she is leaning wearily against the wall. I feel stirred to compassion. She looks so lonely, so sad. Can I help her, I ask myself? Is there no chance of getting into conversation? I beat about mentally to discover any means by which to meet my end. A glass of water might, and almost certainly would, be considered an officious and unwarranted offer.

I dismissed the idea. But a chair, as a substitute for the comfortless support of the wall—that could surely not be objected to! I hastened away full of new ideas, but find the matter more easily contemplated than achieved. In breathless haste, I finally pounce upon one. It is but a ricketty kitchen one, but what matters it? With it I hurry back elated. Fearful of rebuff, I present my spoil somewhat diffidently to the mysterious stranger. She only looks up surprised, bows, and graciously accepts. I am fascinated—enthralled.

"You—you!" I stammer, inelegantly (it is strange, I never can command fluency when most desirable). "Is there any article you would like me to bid for, for you?"

"Oh, no," she says very softly. "I am seller, not buyer; see, my things are going up."

She speaks so low I have to stoop to catch the words. I suppose it is the effect of some recently sustained grief; I have heard of sorrow subduing people like this.

"You cannot mean it?" I exclaim, astounded at the information. "Well, luckily, I am a buyer."

I feel I have proved equal to the occasion here; other matters must be in keeping. The first article exposed for sale is a small timepiece, a perfect little gem in its way.

"My poor husband's," murmurs my companion, whereupon I procure the article in question, not without a jealous pang at the thought of the former proprietor. I became reckless of consequences, as one after another the articles are knocked down to me, and reckless of the suspicious and curious glances directed towards me. My companion remonstrates with me scarcely above her breath. And soon all the fair stranger's property has been disposed of, and I am the happy possessor.

"Should you," said I, a happy thought striking me as I ruefully ask myself what I am to do with it all, "should you," treading carefully and delicately, "care to select any of these things to take with you? I shall only be too happy, you know."

"Oh, no, no!" she exclaimed, with somewhat of pain in her voice, and yet with a gentle decision; and so I desist.

The sale is over now. As I am turning away it occurs to me that, being here, at any rate I may as well dispatch business matters.

Digitized by Google

"It makes things so much easier," the salesman remarks confidentially, "your having bought up the lot, sir. The party in black," indicating the stranger by a movement of his thumb in her direction and a solemn shake of his head, "requested it quite specially that, as she goes up to London by next train and then abroad, she might receive payment for her articles directly after the sale."

I leave him. Shortly afterwards he moves in the direction of the stranger, and I delay purposely that they may have the opportunity of arranging money matters, and then join her. It is nearly time for the London train, and mine, too, will be due directly. Upon the strength of this, I venture to escort my companion to the station. She is evidently very tired and is silent on the way. She has kept her veil persistently down throughout the close sultry day; to my infinite disgust I see no prospect of its being raised now. As we reach the station I procure a first class ticket and secure an empty carriage. She is really looking very faint; so at the last moment I thrust in my sherry flask in case it may prove of use.

"You are very kind," she falters in a low voice.

Just as I am about to disclaim the charge the train begins to move, and I stand off, raising my hat in farewell. The next moment the mysterious stranger is gone, and with her name yet undiscovered.

The things!—by the way, I had almost forgotten my extensive purchases. The thought is damping, still I have done a philanthropic deed. I have arranged for them to arrive at Bayham next day, thence at the Grange, by porter, to provoke as little notice as possible. So I seek to dismiss them from my thoughts.

* * * * *

The Grange breakfast room is a pleasant change after City chambers; at least, so I find it the morning after my arrival. My father, mother and I make up the breakfast party. My father is enjoying his newspaper and coffee, alternately, and is consequently silent.

"I'm blessed!" exclaims my father, suddenly startling us. "If I ever heard of such a clever trick! Ha, ha!" with a loud laugh, "very good indeed—capital!"

My mother raises her meek eyes in mild curiosity.

"You've heard of Ramforth, of course," pursues my father, "the notorious London thief? Well," he continued, "Lady Broadford's house has been broken into during her absence, and articles abstracted to the value of a pretty round sum. How do you think the audacious rascal has disposed of them—in London? Oh, no, he was too well looked after there; but there happened to be a travelling auctioneer at Fairly, who, all unsuspecting, served his turn admirably. Such things as plate, of course, he reserved; that would have been dangerous, but valuable articles of various sorts were all easily disposed of here.

"But that is not the point yet," as an expression of surprise escaped my mother, "that is not all the audacity of the fellow! He was there himself, got up as an interesting young widow, attracted a wealthy lord, or baronet, or something of the kind, who happened to be there, got him over quite head and ears with her charms, got him to buy up the stock, intact, in the heat of his juvenile passion! Didn't stop there, but was escorted by the young idiot to the station at the close of the proceedings, and seen off to London. Oh, the precious young idiot!" exclaims my father, with a laugh that seems to me almost diabolical. "I've not heard of anything so good for a long time. The infatuated ass!" and here follow a chuckle.

I am unable to describe my frame of mind at the close of my father's graphic recital. Of course I did not occur to him in connection with the story. I am a true Englishman. I abhor the idea of the impending ridicule I shall have to undergo. Can nothing be done to avert it? I experience a horrible revulsion of feeling when I realise that at any moment the porter may appear in sight, bearing my hated purchases.

I retire from the breakfast room precipitately, and pace the library in bitter mortification of spirit. I realise at last how thoroughly I have been imposed upon. With a fresh significance, yesterday's scene rises before me. Like a flash of lightning I recall the figure, too tall for a woman's—the flaxen hair, unnaturally fair, the soft, almost inaudible voice, always suspiciously lowered, the close and persistent veiling despite the oppression of the day.

I recall it with a sharp pang.

I have already occupied some time in like cheering ruminations, when wheels sound on the gravel, and I rush hastily to the window. It is a carriage, an open one, containing, of all undesirable people, the most undesirable—Mrs. Seymour and her daughter Laura.

At this somewhat late stage in my narrative, and in a mere parenthesis, I must explain that Laura and I are supposed to have a mutual liking for one another; which mutual liking, being zealously fostered by the different members, of both our families, promises fair to develop into something more serious. Their appearance at this most unfortunate moment proves for me the proverbial "last straw." I sink into a chair and try to arrange my thoughts. If my eyes do not belie me, I can distinguish some kind of a light vehicle in the distance. It must be my ill-fated purchases. I have the feeling of a leaden weight tugging at the region of my heart. At this moment a servant appears announcing the arrival of Mr. Smith.

I quit my station at the window, and stumble downstairs to my father's private room. A small, square man occupies the chair facing my relative, who regards me as I enter with a kind of withering scorn, just such a look as I have been picturing to myself.

"You are probably acquainted with Mr. Smith's business?" he remarks with sarcastic interrogation.

I forbear from a reply, unable to make a civil one. Mr. Smith hereupon enters into fluent details, the drift of which I take to be that all the "rubbish" as my father elegantly phrases it, which I had yesterday collected so ingeniously, must be transferred this very day to its rightful owner, who I understand to be Lady Broadford. I do not wait further than to learn what is required of me, but as soon as possible beat a hasty retreat.

Luncheon hour is approaching. A little behind time I cross the hall on my way to the dining room. I am late; I can distinguish voices and laughter through the closed door. I halt for a second. Can I believe my ears? My father is actually rehearsing the whole story, if one might judge from sounds, to an appreciative audience! At this moment his sudden demise would almost be grateful to me. My hand trembles on the door handle; but it is now or never, so I push it open and enter.

To this day my reminiscences of that luncheon are hazy. Suffice it to say that Laura behaved magnanimously throughout, and now that we are married, never reminds me of my first auction experience—need I ask it?—also my last.

Digitized by Google

A TALE OF OLD FRANCE.

By MARY FERMOR.

SUMMARY.

Amaury Montruel, a knight, and Mahmoud-el-Reis, a Saracen, meet on the road to Paris. The former's mission is to kill the Queen of France; the latter's to kill the King. At the same time two children, Eric and Eve, are on their way to Paris to aid the Queen, and overhear the conversation of these two horsemen. Shortly afterwards a knight and his page give the children a lift on the road, and, on arriving at Paris, place them under the care of the Freemasons. Maitre Samson, Montruel's secretary, tries to induce Tristan de Pamiers, king of the law students, to raise a rebellion in favour of Agnes de Méranie against Philip's consort, Queen Ingeburge. Albret, the King's page, takes Eve, alias Little Adam, to the King, who gives her permission to visit Ingeburge in her captivity in the Abbey St. Martin. Meanwhile Agnes de Méranie pays a visit to Notre Dame with Amaury Montruel, and stills the ominous cries of the people by distributing among them her paste jewels. In the cathedral she meets Mahmoud-el-Reis, who is carving a figure of the Virgin, and tries to win his regard by presenting him with pearls, which he crushes under his feet when she has gone. Returning from the visit to the cathedral, the members of the Royal party are intercepted by the Free-Lances, but are finally allowed to go on their way. Thinking this wild crew may be of future use to her, Agnes de Méranie determines to enlist the sympathies of their leader, Antoine Cadocu. To accomplish her object she visits him the same evening, accompanied by Montruel, in the low tavern in which he and his followers hold their nightly revels. She is very rudely treated, and returns with Montruel without having attained her object of enlisting the sympathies of Cadocu. Montruel's secretary, Samson, hints to the King that Agnes has been seen out late at night, and, although he confirms his suspicions, he does not allow Agnes to suspect his knowledge. During the sitting of a council appointed by the Pope to decide which of the King's two wives is his lawful consort, Montruel visits Mahmoud-el-Reis to urge him to fulfil his promise to murder Ingeburge without delay. In order to gain access to the Queen's presence, the two men arrange that Mahmoud shall feign sickness and be taken to the hospital attached to the Abbey, where the Queen is confined. Eric, being at work on the cathedral as a mason, overhears the plot and determines to save Ingeburge. Meanwhile the Saracen partakes of a drug which renders him unconscious, is conveyed to the Abbey by Montruel, and ministered to by the Queen herself. She is heavily veiled, and Mahmoud is unaware of her identity.

CHAPTER XV.

The Veil Lifted.

By a curious coincidence the Syrian said to Ingeburge at this moment:

"Maiden, if you will help me to have speech with the Queen alone, you shall have this purse of gold."

These words came in confirmation of her worst fears, and with the tears starting from her eyes she said tremulously:

"And you come from the King? It was his name that opened these doors to you?"

She knew she was an obstacle in his path, and the thought that he had sent this man to put an end to her young life, the idea that her lord and husband wanted to kill her that the man upon whom she had lavished such a wealth of love should only desire to be rid of her, tortured her far more than the mere dread of death itself. No thought of blame rested on the King in her generous heart, she was crushed by the sense that she had been found unworthy of his love: it was her duty to bow before the inscrutable will of the man to whom she had pledged her faith. It was better perhaps, that she should die, life held but little to attract her, save the faint hope that one day she might take her lawful place by her husband's side.

Eve's story was so confused in her mind, that she had no doubt about this dark, mysterious man being the assassin paid by Philip Augustus, to kill his unwanted wife.

Mahmoud-el-Reis, far from guessing who she was, and unable to see the workings of her face, was quite at a loss to account for her evident emotion, but he drew a bow at venture, and the arrow went home.

"Yes," he answered, "I come from the King."

"And the King gave you that purse?"

"Yes, the King himself."

"To bribe some poor soul to sell you the Queen's life, I suppose?" she continued, breathlessly awaiting his reply.

"You have guessed exactly."

Ingeburge gave a long low moan and fell back senseless.

* * * * *

The Syrian sprang from his couch, and knelt beside the prostrate Queen. He raised her veil and gazed with rapture on the pale, noble features, the fair neck round which soft little curls of golden hair were clustering lovingly, and the dark-fringed lids which concealed the eyes that he knew must be blue. It was his own statue in flesh and blood; He gave a low, wondering cry of delight, and passed his hand over his eyes to make sure that he had not fallen again into some feverish dream.

"Dilah!" he crooned caressingly, "Dilah! Is it not the same supple form, the same dear features, and broad, low brow, the same sweet sadness about the lips! Dilah! as she would have been born under the pale northern skies, with the golden sunlight in her hair and the blue of Heaven in her eyes!"

He bent down and kissed the white brow with lips and heart as pure as those of a man who kisses his dead child, murmuring:

Digitized by Google

"Dilah, my beloved, I greet thee! I will love and guard thy twin soul!"

The minutes passed, and the Abbey was wrapped in sleep, save for a few silent watchers like himself, and the moonlit garden lay deserted beneath the old grey walls; but far away in the city there raged a tumult and the sound penetrated now and again as far as the Abbey St. Martin, but the Syrian heeded nothing while he looked on the still unconscious form beside him. He had placed his pillow beneath her head and moistened her lips and brow with water. Now he was kneeling with bowed head and clasped hands as a devotee at the shrine of his divinity, awaiting her return to life.

It came at last, and he gently passed his hand under the pillow to raise her slowly. She opened her eyes and looked round with that half-vacant, inquiring glance that marks the mind's return from a state of oblivion.

"I have been dreaming," she whispered faintly. "Where are you, Eve, my sister?"

"The very voice is the same," thought Mahmoud, and tears dimmed the eyes of this hardy son of the desert for a moment. All his fierceness, all his fanatic pursuit of blood were forgotten in the memory of the woman he loved so fondly.

When Ingeburge's eyes rested on the dark face, with its almost adoring expression, she shuddered and raised her hands to shut out the painful sight, moaning:

"Ah, it was no dream! The assassin! The assassin!"

A look of pain crossed the Syrian's face and he said gently:

"Madame, as you seem to love the Queen so dearly, she shall be guarded from all ill. Do not tremble so, the mere sight of your face has made me your slave. Yet, do not mistake, there is no love in my heart for you, maiden, my words need bring no blush to your fair cheeks. I would protect you and your Queen as a man shields a dear sister or his own child."

As her fears seemed in no way to diminish, he added, with one of his rare, grave smiles.

He bent down and kissed the white brow.

"What do you fear from me? Just now you were lying there at my mercy!"

This was one of those simple, lucid arguments, that never fail to bring conviction even to the most confused brain, and her face cleared.

"That is true, he might have killed me then!" she thought, and the change in his voice went far to reassure her. It had lost all the suppressed fierceness, the cold, cruel tone in which he had bartered for her blood had vanished, and he spoke in respectful tenderness.

Ingeburge was little versed in the ways of the world, she had a sweet, sunny nature that was quick to think well of others, and her sad experiences had made her very susceptible to any kindness, so she smiled in return and asked timidly:

"What had the Queen done to you? And why were you chosen to carry out the King's cruel intentions?"

"I deceived you, maiden, but now that I have seen your face, I can deceive you no more, I would rather die. It was not by the King's orders that I was to kill the Queen!"

She clasped her hands on her breast and raised her eyes to Heaven as her heart went out in deep thankfulness to God. Again she looked eagerly at the Syrian's face, for it seemed to her as that of a stranger, so completely had love and tenderness transformed it.

"Thank you," she said at last, "you cannot know what joy your words give me, my brother."

"Your brother!" he repeated thoughtfully, as if this term used in Christian charity to the sick and suffering, had gained a new significance for him.

"But," persisted Ingeburge, "if you did not come by the King's command, why did you want to assassinate the Queen?"

"That would be a long story to tell you, maiden," answered the Moslem in a sad tone, "and you would not understand me, for you and I have neither the same manners nor the same faith."

"What?" cried Ingeburge, "are you not a Christian?"

Mahmoud-el-Reis rose to his full height, and folding his arms across his breast, replied solemly:

"There is but one God, Who is God, and Mohammed is his Prophet."

Ingeburge started as if she had been stung, and shrank back into the farthest corner of the cell as if to escape contamination from any further contact with the man who had confessed to be what her faith taught her to regard as a child of Satan.

"Ah, I knew you would shrink from me with abhorrence," he said in a voice of infinite pathos, "but I told you the truth because I had seen your face, and it is the face of Dilah, my beloved—so I could not deceive you, even at the risk of losing your regard."

The Queen listened to the Moslem with growing wonder and decreasing repugnance. She had never heard that sweet sounding name of Dilah, and yet it seemed to strike some chord of memory in her breast, as of one loved and lost in a past stage of existence.

The poetic Eastern belief that each soul has its twin, which shares every joy and sorrow, even though their bodily presence may be wholly unknown to each other, would account for the inexplicable change of mood, entirely independent of our surroundings, which all of us know so well. It would explain the indefinable sense of sadness when all is bright around us, and the joy in the mere fact of being alive, and able to draw in our breath, which cheers us when outward circumstances have not altered very materially. Latter-day cynics and men of science would tell us it all depended on the state of our digestion, and so it probably does, but there may be more in the pretty fancy than we deem.

Mahmoud had sunk into one of his reveries, but he roused himself and asked gravely:

Digitized by Google

"Maiden, do you love?"

In any other stranger such a question would have seemed to her as the height of idle curiosity, but this man, in spite of his confession, still dominated her strangely.

"Yes, I do love."

"Do you love ardently? Do you love passionately?"

"Yes," she replied again, her large blue eyes dilating as she spoke, "I love ardently, I love passionately."

"So that you would die for the man you had chosen?"

"Die! yes, a thousand deaths, were it possible to save m."

"Then he is happy," said the Syrian, as if thinking aloud.

Poor Ingeburge bent her head to hide the tears that came welling to her eyes at the thought that the one upon whom all this love was bestowed only requited it by coldness and neglect.

"I wanted to kill the Queen," he resumed, "because a man said to me, 'I will give you the life of the King in exchange for that of the Queen.'"

Again a flash of light seemed to cross Ingeburge's memory, and the tangled skein of Eve's story began to unravel itself before her mind's eyes with distracting clearness.

"Mad, wicked, that I was!" she cried, "to have suspected for one moment that the noble heart of Philip Augustus could be capable of so base a crime! That man wanted to kill the King himself!"

She stopped, and paused as if trying to recall a name, that of the other assassin who had figured in Eve's narrative.

"Amaury Montruel—" began Mahmoud.

"Yes! that's the name, that's it!" interrupted Ingeburge; "He's the one who wanted to kill me, Eve said so!"

"To kill you?" echoed the Moslem, in surprise.

"To kill me, the Queen of France."

He was silent for some moments, during which time a fierce struggle raged in his breast, between the implacable fanaticism of his creed and the tender chivalry of his love.

"The Queen!" he repeated, and his dark eyes fell before the calm dignity of her gaze.

"Yes, the Queen," cried Ingeburge passionately, "and I say the same words to you as did that traitor. I will give you the Queen's life in exchange for that of the King! I tell you——" She broke off, her voice was choked with sobs, and she knelt before him with clasped hands and tear-dimmed eyes pleading for the life of her beloved.

"I tell you again, take the Queen's life in exchange for that of the King!"

With a convulsive movement of her little hands she parted the neck of her dress as if to lay bare her breast to the assassin's knife; but the Moslem never raised his downcast eyes, and only murmured:

"You love, in very deed, but you love too well, for you are not loved in return."

"I ask for death and you only torture me!" she moaned.

"I am beloved," continued the Moslem with some return of his old hauteur, "I am beloved, and she whom my soul loves awaits my coming, but before this cruel separation that wounds both our hearts can have an end, I must kneel at my master's feet and show him this dagger's point crimsoned with the blood of Philip Augustus!"

He had drawn out the crystal poniard, and now held it above his head, where the rays from the lamp fell upon it, and made it sparkle like a thousand gems. Ingeburge's brain reeled with horror as he concluded:

"That is why I sought to kill the Queen."

Silence followed, only broken by the low moaning sobs that Ingeburge could not repress, and far away boomed the hoarse roar that had been faintly heard before. Now for the first time the Syrian became aware of it. It was increasing, it seemed to be coming nearer, and for a moment he listened attentively, but soon turned away with a gesture of indifference.

"It has nothing to do with me," he thought.

Had it nothing to do with him? Perhaps it had more than he surmised; a few hours would show.

Parted the neck of her dress as if to lay bare her breast to the assassin's knife.

CHAPTER XVI.

The Light in the Tower.

Eric had lingered in the vicinity of the Abbey till nightfall. Three times he had sought admittance at the gate, only to be sternly refused; but he was nothing daunted for his was one of those slow, strong natures, without brilliant ideas, but possessed of that dogged determination and boundless patience which usually win in the end.

It had taken many long months to reach the land where his beloved Princess was in captivity and disgrace, but he had never lost heart. He seemed to live to protect those two foster sisters, whose destinies were linked by a mysterious chain, and though he did not underrate his own weakness, his will was strong and his heart bold to die for them if needs be.

He knew the Syrian assassin had been admitted to the Abbey, and was therefore under the same roof as the Queen, but he also knew that it would also take some hours for the death-like effects of the marvellous drug to work off, and that until the man regained consciousness, Ingeburge was safe. Another respite would be afforded by the difficulty that the patient would find in getting to any other part of the Abbey from the hospital, as Eric knew from personal experience. He had been laid up more than once in the infirmary of a religious house, from accident and other maladies consequent on his dangerous trade, and it had always proved next to impossible to have any communication with the interior of the monastery.

Digitized by Google

Then, shading his eyes, he looked again.

He therefore waited for the friendly darkness in a fairly calm state of mind; but the hours dragged heavily and his ever-present anxiety for Eve's safety weighed upon his spirits and blunted his perceptions. His only idea was to climb the outer wall as soon as it should be safe for him to attempt it, and after that his mind was a blank. If only Eve had been with him! Where was she? and why had the King wanted to see "Little Adam," who mixed the mortar for his brother? No answer was forthcoming to these perplexing questions, and his heart-strings tightened as the dreadful thought crossed his mind—"Perhaps I shall never see her again!"

At last the sun sank beneath the horizon, and about the time when Ingeburge was taking up her post by the assassin's bed-side, Eric crept into the thickest of the bushes and took up his post close to the ivy-covered walls, under a large oak through whose branches he could see the dark towers of the Abbey.

Behind those grim, fortress-like walls, he knew that his Queen Angel was a captive, and he scanned every window, wondering if any that he could see lighted the prison chamber of his royal mistress.

Would the darkness never come? He longed to scale the walls and so remove one barrier, at least, from between them.

At the farthest extremity of the Abbey he noticed a small tower, which was still bathed in the crimson afterglow that lighted up the little casements till they shone like patches of fire against the grey masonry.

"Perhaps she lives there!" he mused. "Our poor sister Angel, cut off from all that she holds dear!"

At this moment one of the windows was pushed open and a woman, dressed in white, leant out and looked round on the peaceful evening scene. Eric sprang to his feet, and climbing one of the lower branches, sought to gain a better view of the figure. He could not distinguish more than the general outline, but that seemed familiar, and he murmured under his breath:

"It's the Queen herself!"

Then, shading his eyes, which were dazzled by the glow, he looked again, long and eagerly, straining every nerve to read those far-off features. Something in the turn of the head made his heart beat faster, and his breath came in quick, short gasps as he thought:

"No, it's Eve! my little sister Eve! Ah, if only it might be so!"

The light faded, and the figure became indistinct, merged in the haze of the deepening twilight.

"It can't have been Eve! I must have been mistaken, for how could she have got there? My eyes seem to see her everywhere since I lost her," said the poor fellow sadly to himself.

He resumed his seat on the grass and continued his mournful reflections for some minutes, then a sound of music reached his ear, and he fancied he caught the strains of the old Masonic choral sung in a girl's clear young voice; but the wind carried the sounds away and the stillness was unbroken save for the distant buzz of the city.

He kept his eyes fixed on the tower, and as it grew darker he saw a light kindled in the casement upon which his attention was rivetted, so he determined to take this as a guiding star when he had entered the precincts of the Abbey.

Noiselessly he climbed the high wall and let himself down in the deserted garden. The maze of winding paths and close-cut hedges gave him a sense of utter bewilderment at first, but he kept the friendly light in view and crept along under the shade of the trees, making many circuitous turns to evade the danger of being seen from the windows.

Within the Abbey he could hear, from, time to time, the measured footsteps of the monks, and at intervals there rose the solemn chanting from the choir of the chapel.

Suddenly he stopped behind a

Eric threw up his hands, and gave a stifled cry of despair.

Digitized by Google

large shrub and knelt down with his ear to the ground. The buzz of the city was increasing, it grew louder and louder, and the very ground seemed to tremble under the tramp of many feet.

"I wonder what that is?" thought Eric. "Perhaps the King is marching with his army against John of England, who they say has invaded his dominions. I wish he might get killed!"

With this very excusable, if not Christian, desire, he rose, and began to grope his way forward again, and after much difficulty he found himself beneath the tower. He carefully examined its position and the chances of being able to effect an entrance, but to his sorrow, he discovered that, even to an intrepid climber like himself, it would be impossible. There was a door opening into the garden, but it was heavily clamped with iron and studded with huge nails. Nothing less than a battering-ram would have forced an entrance there.

The utter hopelessness of his position for a moment nearly took away his courage, but he looked up at the still-lighted casement as if for inspiration.

"If only Eve were here, she would suggest something! She has always a clear head and a quick eye!"

A shadow crossed the window, and then he heard again the same sweet voice that had come to him under the trees an hour ago.

The old familiar words that had directed them out of their darkness and distress on the night of their arrival in Paris, now floated above his head, and, as on the previous occasion, he took up the answering refrain.

At first his notes were weak and quavering, but after the first few bars his voice gained strength, and before he had finished the verse it was certainly powerful enough to reach the singer above him. No answer came. The voice in the tower had ceased, and the shadow disappeared.

"Eve!" he called recklessly, "don't you hear me? Eve, my sister Eve?"

He saw the light extinguished, and still there was no sign in response to his passionate appeal.

"Eve, Eve, it's Eric, your brother!" he called louder.

"Silence!" whispered a voice which seemed to pierce the impenetrable door.

Then he noticed for the first time a small loop-hole above his head, and the next moment the massive door swung slowly on its hinges and his little sister was clasped in his loving arms.

For some seconds neither could find words to express their joy at this unlooked for re-union; but Eric, knowing that every moment was now precious if they were to avert the threatened danger from the Queen, asked quickly:

"Where's Queen Angel?"

"Oh, our dear sister Angel is as good and sweet as ever. She has just obtained leave to go and nurse one of the sick men in the hospital."

Eve did not notice at first what an effect her words had upon her brother, and continued merrily:

"But how did you get in? And how did you know I was here? Have you seen the page Albret?" At the last name her cheek flushed slightly, but as Eric made her no answer, she looked hard at him and saw in the dusk that his face was stern and set, his eyes dilated with horror, and as she seized his hand, she felt it was cold and trembling.

"Eric, dear, what is the matter?" she cried anxiously.

"Tell me, was this sick man brought here to-day?" he asked, regardless of her questions.

"Yes; but what has he to do with you?"

"At what time?"

"About twelve, I think."

"And how long has the Queen been with him?"

"Oh, more than an hour now."

Eric threw up his hands and gave a stifled cry of despair.

"Heaven have mercy on her—Heaven help us all!" he repeated wildly.

Eve put her arms round him, for he staggered and would have fallen. The long strain of watching and waiting with this terrible load upon his mind, coupled with the fact that he had taken nothing since his early breakfast, which had been of the most frugal kind, had proved almost too much for him.

Eve tried to persuade him to sit down on the grass, but he refused, and propping himself up against the door, he gasped:

"Do you know the name of the man whom the Queen is nursing?"

Some of his fear had communicated itself to Eve, for her voice trembled as she whispered:

"Tell me!"

"He is called Mahmoud-el-Reis, and the traitor Amaury Montruel has promised to give the King's life into his hands so soon as Queen Angel has fallen under his dagger!"

Eve's face blanched, and she had to steady herself by the wall as she cried:

"But how do you know all this? The man looked like one dead they tell me, when he was carried in here."

In a few hurried words Eric told his sister of what he had witnessed that morning, and how he had helped to carry the Syrian from the city, in the hope of warning Ingeburge of her awful danger.

"The only thing we can do is to seek Prior Anselm," said Eve at last, "he will do all he can to help and shield our dear Angel."

"There is no time to be lost," said Eric quickly.

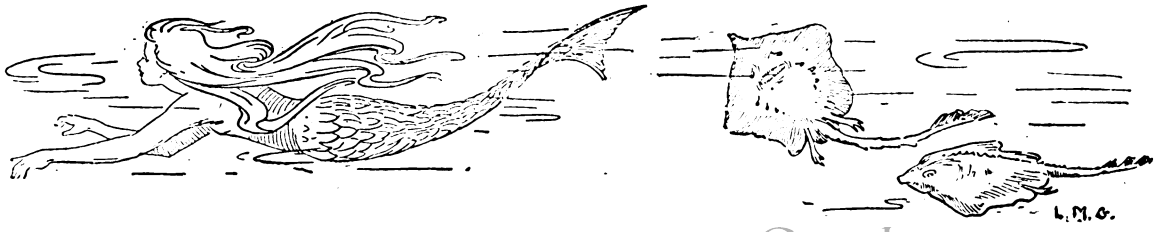
"No, I will send to him at once, but I must hide you in the Queen's rooms till I have permission to take you to the Prior, or else the lay brothers and the guards would turn you out again."

So saying, she drew him inside the door and closed it gently. Then they mounted the dark spiral staircase, and, after putting her brother in a place of security, Eve went off to gain an interview with good Prior Anselm.

It needed all her tact and ready wit to prevail upon one of the sleepy monks who was keeping watch in the chapel to go and tell the Prior that he was wanted on a matter of vital importance, but at last she gained her way, and in a few minutes, Eric was summoned to the presence of Anselm.

Meanwhile Ingeburge's life was in the hand of the Syrian fanatic, and the tumultuous sounds from the city were approaching with every passing minute. Those in the Abbey were too engrossed to notice them, or failed to discover any personal import in them, yet that swelling roar was to affect the destinies of more than one of those who passed it by unheeded.

(To be continued.)



Digitized by Google

An Elastic Bookcase!

A Living Bookcase that Grows with your Needs!

Always Complete! Never Finished!

Showing Case built round a Pillar.

The Wernicke Patent Elastic Bookcase System is the only perfect System invented. You can commence in one corner of the room with a case large enough for ten books, and this can be expanded upwards or sideways to any extent: the "Wernicke" Bookcase is thus never too large and never too small.

ADVANTAGES.—Gradual Expense—Dust-proof Glass Doors—Any Corner can be fitted—Cases can be Built Square or round a Pillar—Protection of Books—Portability — Elegance — Utility—Economy, etc.

The Purchaser incurs no liability unless absolutely satisfied with the goods.

Special Illustrated No. 61 Catalogue, fully explaining the above, posted free to any Readers of "Short Stories."

THOS. TURNER Ltd. (Leicester).
44 HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.
7 and 9 NEWARKE STREET, LEICESTER.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.
Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.
A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious Non-Alcoholic Wine.
Agents Wanted.
NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES
are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger Lemon, Orange, Blackberry etc.
YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vesicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. Taylor, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

From Rev. J. H. Burn.

Deer Rectory, Mintlaw, Aberdeen,
November 8th, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

NOTES OF INTEREST.

We want one clean and perfect copy of each of the following numbers of Short Stories: 26, 28, 29, 30, 31, 124, 127, 128, 137, 140, 141, 151, 233, and will pay sixpence each for them. Copies should be addressed to the Publisher.

A. D.—Millions of old corks are found in the Thames annually. They are sold for different purposes. Some are said to be used for packing between the plates of iron ships.

Bunny.—There is an immense rabbit warren in Norfolk, where the visitors may see, on fine evenings in the warm weather, hundreds of rabbits running in and out of their burrows. The lessee of the warren makes about £600 a year out of it. He drives the rabbits out of the burrows by means of paraffin oil, and he has to pay something like £200 a year for the oil and labour.

S. N.—The "White General" was the Russian General Skobeloff, who distinguished himself in the war with Turkey twenty years ago, and was the hero not only of the army but also of the people generally. He was supposed to have died some time ago, but there is a wide-spread belief in Russia that he is not dead. Many people are of opinion that he took part in the late war between China and Japan. The exact reason for the deception, if it be a deception, is not known; but strange things happen in the empire of the Tsar. Three or four years ago, for instance, there was a report—backed by good evidence—that a former Tsar had not died as stated to the world, but had abdicated and retired to a country house far in the interior, where he ended his days.

L. C.—The first regular effort to instruct the deaf and dumb was made by Pedro de Ponce, a Spanish monk, in 1570.

Country Maiden writes: "According to reports I have heard, there seem to be no birds in London but a few smutty sparrows. Is this so?"———Gracious, no. There is plenty of bird life to be found without moving more than a mile or two from the heart of the metropolis. Many of the London gardens possess rookeries, nearly every London square and garden has its starlings, and every spring wood pigeons come to these same gardens. Nightingales may be heard four miles in any direction from Charing Cross, and the Tower of London is quite a favourite nesting place for jackdaws.

Martha would like to know what is the difference between black and white pepper, and if they are products of different plants?———Black and white pepper both come from the same shrub, and the only difference between them is that with the latter the berries are stripped of their outer skin or covering before being ground, and retained in the former.

Rowan Ash asks what I consider to be the world's favourite colour?———There is a regard for things red all the world over. This colour was once held sacred to Thor, the God of Lightning; and Grimm suggests that the robin has probably been singled out for reverence on account of its red breast. Highland women tie a piece of red worsted thread to their cows' tails before turning them out to grass for the first time in the spring to protect them from the evil eye. In China something red is tied round children's wrists as a safeguard against evil spirits, and in that country red holds a prominent place in all religious and social ceremonies.

Sailor.—The title "Admiral" is derived by some authorities from the word amir or emir, a chief. In the sense of a naval commander it was introduced into Europe by the Venetians in the fourteenth century.

Malcolm.—Yes, it is a fact that both the first and the last stand of the Confederates in the American Civil War took place on land owned by the same man. A part of the Bull Run battlefield was the property of Mr. McLean; after that battle, he decided to move to some spot where there would not be so much risk of suffering from the ravages of war. He took up his abode at Appomattox, which, by a strange coincidence, proved to be the final battlefield of the Civil War.

"Do we get thinner in the summer?" is the question put by S. R. T.———No; on the contrary the human frame has a tendency to increase in weight during the summer, and to waste in the winter. This fact is the result of experiments by an eminent doctor upon 4,000 criminals.

Having heard that tea tasters are well paid, Apollo would like to become one. He has also heard, however, that it is extremely injurious to the health, and writes to ask if this is the case.———No. The tasting operation has been practically eliminated in all but the name, tea being now tested by sight and smell. Boiling water is first poured on an accurately-measured portion of the leaves. In a few minutes the liquid shows some tint of green or brown, and the length of this time and the shade of the colour produced are important elements in the test. The tester then inhales the rising steam from the mixture. This is called "getting the aroma," and is the most important part of the test.

L.—Yes. Liverpool was made an independent port as long ago as 1338. In 1672 the income from the estates of the Corporation was about £13; it is now as many millions.

Inquisitive asks: "Has any monarch laid claim to the greater part of Europe? I mean in historic times. Napoleon I. seemed to have had a good slice of it, but I don't think he ever included this country."———The former Kings of Sardinia laid claim to a tolerably large portion, judging from their description of themselves. It was "King of Sardinia, of France, Spain and England, of Italy and Jerusalem, of Greece and Alexandria, of Hamburg and Sicily." To this they added a few more modest titles, such as "Master of the Deep." But, in the words of the poet, where is that party now?

T. C. asks: "Which wind is the most prevalent in England?"———The south-west; it blows on almost twice as many days in the year as any other wind.

Carpenter.—In times past, Greek and Roman doors opened outwards, and when a man was about to go from the house into the street he knocked on the door so that he should not hurt anyone who might be passing.

Cricket writes: "Has anyone ever stood on the cross of St. Paul's? I think I have 'stumped' you this time."———Not out! About twenty-five years ago, when the cathedral was undergoing repair, one of the men stood on the cross and gazed round with apparent unconcern. At the coronation of Queen Mary a Dutchman named Peter "stood on the weathercocke of Paule's steeple," and performed various antics "to the great marvell of all people." He had two scaffolds under him—one above the cross and another over the ball of the cross, each bedecked with streamers. The torches on the scaffolds "could not burne, the wind was so great." The city paid him sixteen pounds thirteen shillings for the performance.

C. C.—There are only twenty-seven wooden ships in the Navy at the present time.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A CHANCE OF A LIFETIME.

GIGANTIC CLEARANCE SALE.

£50,000 worth of Goods Offered at Half Price.

THE ENORMOUS STOCK OF CARPETS, CURTAINS, SHEETS, BLANKETS, QUILTS, &C., MUST BE CLEARED WITHOUT REGARD TO COST, OWING TO THE L.C.C. REQUIRING PRESENT PREMISES FOR STREET IMPROVEMENTS.

New Premises having to be acquired by us, this Sale is held in order to Clear Out Heavy Stocks previous to the removal. NEW GOODS have to be sacrificed, together with all Regular Stocks, as it would be almost impossible to remove the Valuable and Heavy Stocks to New Premises without great risk and loss by damage to the Goods in transit, and this renders AN ABSOLUTE CLEARANCE IMPERATIVE. The magnificent opportunity is therefore afforded the readers of Short Stories of buying the NEW SEASON'S GOODS that are just coming in fresh from the looms at prices lower than the cost of production; and in many cases the Goods are being offered at less than HALF PRICE.

This Offer Will Not be Repeated.

ALL GOODS WARRANTED ABSOLUTELY PERFECT IN EVERY WAY. Money Willingly Returned if not Approved

Lot 1.—4s. Lace Curtains for 1s. 11d. These beautiful Lace Curtains, containing about 6 yards in the pair, 48in. wide, shaded ground, taped edges, with handsome double borders. Undoubtedly the cheapest ever offered. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 5s. 6d. Satisfaction guaranteed. — 4s. Lace Curtains for 1s. 11d.

Lot 22.—10s. 6d. White Scotch Blankets for 5s. 9d. per pair, measuring about 56in. by 76in.; light, warm, and durable. Admittedly the cheapest blankets ever offered. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 15s. 6d. Satisfaction guaranteed or money returned. — 10s. 6d. White Scotch Blankets for 5s. 6d.

Lot 30.—9s. Bleached Twill Sheets for 4s. 11d., measuring 64in. by 84in. Made from the best cotton yarns, thoroughly shrunk, soft finish, and hemmed ready for use. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 14s. 3d. Satisfaction guaranteed. — 9s. Twilled Sheets for 4s. 11d.

7s. Lace Curtains for 3s. 11d. — Lot 2.—7s. Lace Curtains for 3s. 11d. per pair, measuring 3½yd. long, by 52in. wide, shaded ground, taped edges and handsome double borders; wash easily. 3 pairs for 11s. 3d. Money returned if not approved.

25s. Special Heavy Blankets for 14s. 9d. — Lot 23.—25s. Special Heavy Witney Yorkshire Blankets for 14s. 9d., measuring 75in. by 96in. Manufactured entirely of pure long staple wool, bleached by the sun and beautifully white. Give endless wear, and are easily washed. For perfection of finish, durability, and economy, they are unequalled. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 42s. Money returned if not approved.

15s. 6d. Sheets for 7s. 11d. — Lot 31.—15s. 6d. Bleached Twill Sheets for 7s. 11d., measuring 90in. by 100in. Made from the best cotton yarns, thoroughly shrunk, soft, finish, and hemmed ready for use. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 23s. Money returned if not approved.

Lot 3.—Specially handsome Drawing-room Design, entirely new and most successful. In white or cream, with scolloped and taped edges, made from thoroughly sound cotton yarns; warranted to wear well. Sale price, 5s. 11d. per pair. Each Curtain measures 3½yd. long by 60in. wide. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 17s. Money returned if not approved. — 10s. 6d. Lace Curtains for 5s. 11d.

WITNEY BLANKETS.

EXCEPTIONAL VALUE.

Lot 24.—800 pairs of best quality Witney Blankets, with fancy borders, very soft, warm, of great durability. Made from the best wool, and warranted to give every satisfaction. Prices given below are little more than half the original cost.

Size	Weight.	Price per Pair.	3 Pairs for
53in. by 70in.	4lb.	6s. 3d.	18s.
60in. by 80in.	6lb.	7s. 9d.	22s.
70in. by 90in.	8lb.	11s. 6d.	33s.
75in. by 96in.	9lb.	13½. 0s.	37s.
80in. by 99in.	10lb.	15s. 3d.	43s.
86in. by 104in.	11lb.	16s. 9d.	42s.

Lot 39.—1,500 yards of Best Quality Kidderminster Carpeting, 36 inches wide, at 1s. 11d. per yard; usual price 3s. 6d. per yard. Can be supplied in numerous handsome and effective designs and rich colourings to harmonise with all requirements. Impossible to repeat this offer. Money returned if not approved. — 3s. 6d. Best Quality Kidderminster Carpeting for 1s. 11d.

Lot 7.—10,000 Special Extra Quality, Heavy Loom Kitchen Table Cloths, made from the heaviest and strongest Linen Yarns. Numerous artistic patterns. Specially recommended for hard wear. Warranted to give the best possible satisfaction, being very neat, inexpensive, and durable.
Size 54in. by 45in., price 1s. 2d. each, or 3 for 3s. 3d.
Size 56in. by 56in., price 1s. 5d. each, or 3 for 4s. 0d.
Size 62in. by 62in., price 1s. 11d. each, or 3 for 5s. 3d.
Size 68in. by 62in., price 2s. 2d. each, or 3 for 5s. 11d.

3s. Best Brussels Stair Carpet for 1s. 9d. — Lot 48.—3s. Brussels Carpeting for 1s. 9d. per yard, 22 inches wide. Handsomely bordered, superior quality, light and dark shades, magnificent design and colourings. Satisfaction guaranteed or money returned

10,000 RUGS

GIVEN AWAY.

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Lot 50.—THIS PHENOMENAL OFFER is made to the readers of Short Stories only. On receipt of Postal Order for 6s., or 74 stamps, we will forward DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, etc., handsomely bordered and woven in 20 different patterns and art colourings to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for the goods of the British Carpet Weaving Company BELOW THE ACTUAL COST OF PRODUCTION. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained Direct from our Looms, thus saving the Purchasers all Middle Profits.

GIVEN AWAY.—WITH EVERY CARPET WE SHALL ABSOLUTELY GIVE AWAY A VERY HANDSOME RUG TO MATCH; OR WE WILL SEND TWO CARPETS AND TWO RUGS FOR 10/6.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

THOUSANDS of REPEAT ORDERS & UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

"SHORT STORIES" COUPON.
On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. for amount we guarantee to send any goods as above.
THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.

BRUSSELETTE CARPETS.

ADMITTEDLY THE CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD.

Seamless, Woven, and Reversible, Rich Turkey Patterns and Colourings, Superior Quality, with Handsome Border to match; a Marvel of Excellence and Beauty.

Lot 60. No.	SIZES and PRICES. ft. in.	ft. in.	Sale Price.	Former Price.
1	9 0 by 6 0		5/6	9/0
2	9 0 by 7 6		7/0	11/9
3	9 0 by 9 0		8/6	13/6
4	10 6 by 7 6		8/9	13/9
5	10 6 by 9 0		10/0	15/6
6	12 0 by 9 0		11/6	18/0

Lot 60. No.	SIZES and PRICES. ft. in.	ft. in.	Sale Price.	Former Price.
7	12 0 by 10 6		13/6	20/6
8	13 6 by 10 6		15/3	24/0
9	12 0 by 12 0		15/3	24/0
10	13 6 by 12 0		17/0	27/0
11	15 0 by 12 0		19/0	32/0
12	18 0 by 12 0		22/9	36/0

These Carpets are splendid imitations of real Brussels Carpets, the designs having been carefully copied from the originals, both as regards colourings and patterns, so that when in use it is almost impossible, except by close scrutiny, to detect the difference. All designs are registered, and deservedly considered works of art. We can confidently recommend them for use in the dining and drawing rooms, or any rooms and landings where hard wear is a necessity.

GIVEN AWAY.

As an advertisement for the introduction of these goods to all readers of Short Stories we have decided to give away to every purchaser a very handsomely-woven Hearthrug, 6 feet long and 3 feet wide, to match carpets in colours, etc.

THOUSANDS of REPEAT ORDERS & UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

DEAR SIR,— 9 Bedford Row, High Wycombe, Bucks.

I have seen some of the Carpets and rugs sent by your firm, and think they are really a marvel. Please forward goods as follows, etc.—Yours faithfully, Rev. F. H. May

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED OR MONEY WILLINGLY REFUNDED.

All Orders despatched same day as received. Cheques and Postal Orders should be made payable to J. HARGREAVES, and crossed UNION BANK. ADDRESS:

THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING COMPANY, Sale Dept., 31 OLD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

A FREE GIFT!

100,000 BEAUTIFUL RUGS

ABSOLUTELY GIVEN AWAY.

Direct from the Loom.

This Pioneer Offer is made to readers of Short Stories only, on receipt of Postal Order or Stamps, value 5s. We will forward direct from the Looms to any address, on receipt of amount, 5s., a

GENUINE WOVEN REVERSIBLE CARPET,

In 20 Patterns, to your Homes. Suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, &c., bordered and woven in art shades, and large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any middle profits. Remember, these are woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to wool. Thousands of these Carpets have been already sold at double these prices.

With each Carpet we shall ABSOLUTELY GIVE AWAY a very Handsome RUG to match, or we will send TWO CARPETS and TWO RUGS for 9s. 6d. Greatest Bargain ever offered. Subject to approval, cash gladly returned.

"We have never seen a cheaper article, the wonder being how the carpet can be made and sold at the ridiculously small sum."—Exchange and Mart.

"Wonderful value for money."—Church Bells. Hundreds of favourable Press notices from the Christian Globe, Christian World, Christian Age, Rock, Catholic Times, etc., etc.

With each Carpet we shall give away a very handsome Rug to match, or we will send Two Carpets and Two Rugs for 9/6. The greatest bargain ever offered. [Cut this out].

Write subject to approval or cash gladly returned. Thousands of repeat orders and Testimonials from all parts.

ILLUSTRATED BARGAIN CATALOGUES OF CARPETS, HEARTHRUGS, CURTAINS, etc., POST FREE.

All orders despatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post.

The "Queen's Royal" Household Carpets and Hearthrugs are extolled by all the Nations of the Earth.

Gigantic Sale of the "QUEEN'S ROYAL" Household

Sale Price. 2/- HEARTHRUGS Regd. Sale Price. 2/-

In Reversible Rich Turkey patterns, measuring 6ft. long, and 3ft wide. These Hearthrugs have gained a world-wide reputation for Magnificence, Cheapness, and Utility, having no equal. Registered New Designs, and considered Works of Art. Thousands of repeat orders and testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 for 5/9, 6 for 11/3, 12 for 22/-.

Gigantic Sale of the "QUEEN'S ROYAL" Household Reversible Rich Turkey Pattern

TRADE MARK ON ALL GOODS. CARPETS (REGD.) BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

ADMITTEDLY THE CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD. Woven without seam. Altogether superior quality, with handsome border to correspond. A marvel for excellence and beauty. Thousands of repeat orders and testimonials received giving the highest satisfaction. When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

Reduced Sale Price.	Reduced Sale Price.	Reduced Sale Price.	Reduced Sale Price.
6ft. by 9ft. 7/6	9ft. by 9ft. 11/-	10½ft. by 12ft. 18/-	12ft. by 15ft. 25/6
8ft. by 9ft. 9/-	9ft. by 10½ft. 13/6	12ft. by 12ft. 21/-	12ft. by 18ft. 30/-
6ft. by 12ft. 10/6	9ft. by 12ft. 15/-	9ft. by 15ft. 19/6	12ft. by 21ft. 35/6
	9ft. by 13½ft. 16/6	12ft. by 13½ft. ... 22/-

COLOSSAL SALE OF RICH VELVET PILE Sale Price.

REAL BRUSSELS HEARTHRUGS 5/6

In Rich Oriental and Indian Art Designs, measuring 6ft. by 3ft., which for price, real value, weight and richness of manufacture will be found unapproachable.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Rugs, 16/-; 6 for 31/-.

"Melville Castle, Glasswade, Midlothian, June 1st.

The Right Honourable The VISCOUNTESS MELVILLE writes: "I am very pleased with the 'Royal' Velvet Hearthrugs to hand, and would like four more Hearthrugs. Her ladyship would also like two Velvet Carpets at 39/-, one ditto 60/6 to match them. Cheque £8 14s. inclosed."

Colossal Sale of

RICH VELVET PILE REAL BRUSSELS CARPETS.

Extraordinarily Heavy, very best Quality, Newest and Choicest Designs. In Old Gold, Sultan, Terra-Cotta, Crimson, Sky, Navy, and the latest colours. With handsome border to correspond. Guaranteed to wear for years, and give every satisfaction. The sizes and prices as follows (all ready for putting down):

REDUCED SALE PRICE LIST,	4½ft. by 7ft. 11/-	VELVET PILE BRUSSELS CARPET SQUARES.	9ft. by 12ft. 38/-
	6ft. by 9ft. 18/-		11ft. by 12ft. 47/-
	7½ft. by 9ft. 23/-		12ft. by 13½ft. 59/-
	9ft. by 9ft. 28/-		12ft. by 16ft. 69/-
	9ft. by 10½ft. 33/-		12ft. by 18ft. 77/-

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any colour preferred.

SPECIAL. Specially Reduced 1898.

INTRODUCTION SALE PARCEL

With FREE GIFT enclosed.

CONSISTING OF

THE LOT 10/6

1 Magnificently Rich Cream-Coloured Curly Sheepskin

HEARTHRUG,

average size 6ft. by 3ft., perfection in quality.

1 Beautiful Reversible Art Crimson Plush

BED RUG, SOFA COVER, OR TABLE COVER, double warp, very heavy, size 50in. by 78in.

2 Beautiful Silver Goatskin

DOOR MATS,

lined woollen cloth throughout, pinked edges, best finish, ornamental to any room.

1 Elegant HAIR BRUSH, highly finished, with mirror back.

"Given Away."

Providing "Short Stories" Coupon, 30/4/98, is quoted, a FREE GIFT will be enclosed—a very handsome Electro-Silver Plated "OWL" PEPPER STAND, with coloured eyes and gilt feet.

Cash returned if not satisfied.

(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE POST FREE.

We rely upon spontaneous Repeat Orders from our Clients for the Maintenance of our Trade. Established nearly a Quarter of a Century. All Orders dispatched same day, in rotation, as they arrive by post. N.B.—Foreign Orders executed and packed free, and shipped at lowest rates.

Telegraphic Address: "ECLIPSE, LEEDS." CHEQUES AND P.O.'s PAYABLE TO

F. HODGSON & SON,

Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants,

WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

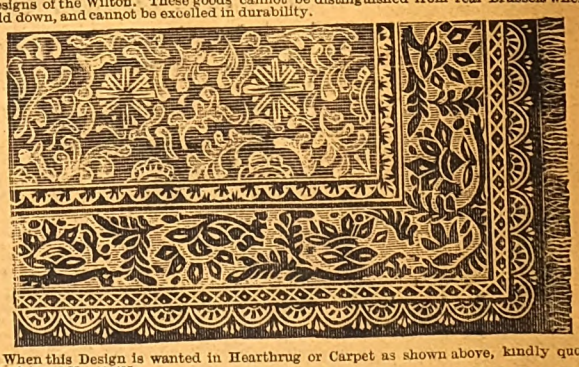
OUR NEW VENTURE.

Yes, Two Different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the price of one! (Copyright.)

PRODIGIOUS SALE OF THE "PRUDENTIAL"

REVERSIBLE CARPETS (Regd.)

Reversible, woven throughout, with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in twelve sizes only. These Carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine on one side the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian, and on the reverse the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.



When this Design is wanted in Hearthrug or Carpet as shown above, kindly quote Registered No. 208495.

Reduced Sale Price	6ft. by 9ft. ..... 4s. 9d.	Reduced Sale Price	9ft. by 15ft. ..... 12s 9d.
	7½ft. by 9ft. ..... 5s. 11d.		12ft. by 12ft. ..... 12s. 9d.
	9ft. by 9ft. ..... 7s. 6d.		12ft. by 13½ft. ..... 14s. 6d.
	9ft. by 10½ft. ..... 8s. 6d.		12ft. by 15ft. ..... 15s. 9d.
	9ft. by 12ft. ..... 9s. 6d.		12ft. by 18ft. ..... 19s. 6d.
	10½ft. by 12ft. ..... 11s. 6d.		12ft. by 21ft. ..... 22s. 6d.

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

Blairquhan, Maybole, N.B., Aug. 3rd.—Lady Hunter Blair writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son send her another 'Prudential' Carpet, same as before, crimson and gold, dimensions, 9ft. by 10½ft. Cheque enclosed."

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Regd.), to match above Carpets, sent for 1s. 6d. extra, size, 2yd. long and 1yd. wide.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Hearthrugs for 4/3, 6 for 8/-, or 12 for 15/6. Sterling Value

Digitized by Google

BIG BATTLE IN THE CHANNEL IMMINENT. (See Page 586.)

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 488. FOR WEEK ENDING MAY 7TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

PHYSICIANS AND SCIENTISTS
REPORT THAT FROMMS EXTRACT
IS A PERFECT FOOD
FOR INFANTS AND INVALIDS
AS WELL AS FOR THE
STRONG AND HEALTHY.
HALF THE PRICE OF MEAT EXTRACTS.

SOLD BY CHEMISTS AND GROCERS

10/6 ALLEN FOSTER & CO., 10/6

SOLE MAKERS OF THE

'Alfosco' Costumes

These marvellous Costumes are acknowledged throughout the world to be far SUPERIOR IN VALUE, STYLE, AND FINISH to any Costumes ever yet offered to the public at anything approaching the same prices.

Design No. 847.—Ten and Sixpence.

The Chesterfield Costume is in great demand this season.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO. are offering a special line of extraordinary value. This charming Costume is made in the Specialite Serge, tailor made, and well-finished. Full size skirt.

PRICE ONLY
10/6
SKIRT ONLY 5/6
or in the new Venetian Cloth, only 13/6
This Costume also looks well in the pretty Edinboro' Tweed, price
18/6
PATTERNS FREE.

Design No. 847. 10/6

Design No. 700 Ten and Sixpence.

This is a very smart "Alfosco" Costume made in the Specialite Serge. It has the new Russian Blouse Style of Bodice shaped to the figure at back. It has prettily designed epaulettes, and the bodice is trimmed with rows of flat braid and large buttons. The bodice and sleeves are lined; the skirt is cut full and well made. ALLEN FOSTER & CO. have great confidence in recommending this Costume. It never fails to give the utmost satisfaction.

Design No. 750. 10/6

THOUSANDS OF TESTIMONIALS.

Costume Complete, 10/6. Skirt only, 5/6.

This Costume in our New Venetian Cloth, 13/6. It can also be ordered in our Edinboro' Tweed and Estémene, all wool serge. All particulars and PATTERNS POST FREE.

Regular Stock Sizes are 34, 36, and 38in. round bust (under arms); the Skirts being 38, 40, and 42in. long in front. Larger or Special Sizes made to measure, 1/6 ex. Each Costume securely packed and sent carr. paid, 9d. extra. Skirt only, 6d. extra.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., The London Manufacturers,
17 ROSCOE ST., GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

"Its food value is double that of Bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

will not only help to improve your digestion and consequently your health, but will also bring back that energetic and happy feeling of good health. Man does not live a natural life, so a good portion of a natural food, in the shape of HOVIS, at each meal will largely counteract the bad influence that modern life has upon the health and digestive organs. This is not an idle remark, but a proved statement, daily being verified.

HOVIS is baked and sold by all good class Bakers. No loaf genuine unless stamped HOVIS. 6d. and 1/- samples of Bread and Biscuits sent on receipt of stamps by

S. FITTON & SON, Millers, Macclesfield.

THE John Noble

HOME, HOLIDAY, AND

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

(Highest Value for Money)

Are supplied in the following two good cloths:

I. John Noble Costume Coating, and in II. John Noble Cheviot Serge.

PATTERNS and New Illustrated 84 page Catalogue of Fashions and Fabrics SENT POST FREE to all who name Short Stories.

THE NEW "GORDON" COSTUME.

Model 894.

New design, with well-cut bodice, trimmed braid at centre A l'Ecosse, Tailor-made Skirt, full wide. Price 10/6 complete. Safely packed and carriage paid 6d. extra. Skirt alone, 5/6. Carriage, 6d.

JOHN NOBLE KNOCK-ABOUT FROCKS.

Thoroughly well made, with saddle top, long full sleeves and pocket.

Lengths and Prices:

21	24	27	30 in.
1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-
33	36	39	42 in.
3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-

Postage 4d. extra.

COLOURS of all Costumes: Black, Navy, Electric, Brown, Ruby, Myrtle, Fawn, Grey, Sage Green and Purple.

SIZES IN STOCK are 34, 36, and 38in. round bust (under arms). Skirts being 38, 40, and 42in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra. Mourning Orders executed and despatched within twelve hours.

Please mention SHORT STORIES when ordering.

Bankers: London & Midland Bank Ltd.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook Street Mills, MANCHESTER.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (259 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

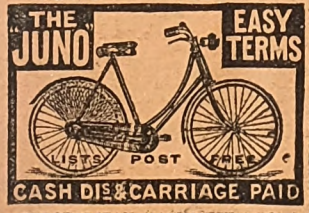
COCOA

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

"JUNO" CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.



DIAMONDS from £10, 16/8 monthly. JUNO Lady's or Gent's Safety £12 12/- 21/- monthly. £14 14/-, 24/6 „ £16 16/-, 28/- „ Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories, sent post free to any part.

METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO. LTD., 75 and 76 Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.; and at Piccadilly Circus, exactly opposite the Criterion, London, W. N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. New JUNO Riding School, 1,700ft., now open.

SILVER QUEEN CYCLES!

Best Value on Earth. Immense stock of Ladies' and Gents' machines. New and Secondhand. Wonderful bargains. Carriage paid. Easy payments from 10s. monthly, or large cash discount. 1 year's guarantee. Illus. price lists post free on application. Old cycles exchanged The SILVER QUEEN CYCLE CO. Ltd., 221 Tottenham Court Road, London.

WADE'S

WONDERFUL OFFER

A SOLID SILVER WATCH GIVEN AWAY.

SEND NO MONEY.

In order to introduce my name into every household in the Kingdom, I undertake and guarantee to give away one of my "World-Famed £2 Silver Watches," list price, Ladies' or Gentlemen's, to every reader who sends me the correct reading of the Rebus printed below. I am preparing to send out immediately 2,000 of these watches. This is a perfectly genuine competition, and the only thing you have to do is carry out the conditions, and if you succeed in guessing correctly you have the advantage of our truly wonderful offer.

These pictures represent three well-known English Wild Flowers. The conditions of the Competition are that you find out what these flowers are, and if you are correct you undertake to purchase one of my inexpensive Solid Silver Chains. These chains are the best made, are marvellous value. Money returned if dissatisfied. Send at once, enclosing stamped and addressed envelope, so that I may inform you if correct.

W. W. WADE,

WATCH MANUFACTURER,

Dept. 35, GOLD EXCHANGE,

Hammersmith, London, W.

BE STRONG

PROF. J. SZALAY'S

Quick and Certain Method of

PHYSICAL CULTURE AT HOME.

Increase One Inch a Month in Chest Measurement.

Send for his HOME TRAINERS.

Made in Three Strengths, 8/6, 10/6, 12/6.

Send Stamped Wrapper for Lists and Testimonials from

J. SZALAY, Trainer and Adviser of all the most successful Amateur Strong Men, including the champion and record holders, L. Elliott, T. Pevier, G. B. Richmond and others.

12 CULLUM STREET, E.C.

When writing mention Short Stories.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

No. 488.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending May 7th, 1898.

IN A LANE.

The Tramp shuffled wearily into the lane. It was an ordinary country lane; a farmhouse and low wall on one side, on the other a hedge of tall trees. The Tramp shuffled into it from the high road because he was dead beat. He did not know to where it led; he didn't much care. He would have thrown himself down on the grassy bank under the trees, but the Farmer stood at the gate, watching. For very shame the tired man shuffled on. He dared not even ask for food—he had been refused so often lately. Besides, he had taken the edge off his appetite with sundry herbs and berries, and, it must be confessed, with a turnip stolen from a well-filled field. Hunger has a wonderful way of altering one's moral views. Necessity knows no law, human or divine.

The Tramp ambled along as slowly as he could, keeping his weather eye on the red-bearded farmer. He muttered swear words to himself, anathematizing the whole agricultural population. He consigned Red-Beard to a climate less severely frigid than that of the Arctic Regions.

The Farmer stood watching him suspiciously. So many queer characters were about, and you never knew.

Edited By G. Arthur Pearson.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

The crops were rather a failure this year. He couldn't afford to have any of his live-stock stolen, and this out-at-elbows tramp, with his furtive glance, his dawdling gait, his long thin arms and fingers—the Farmer noticed these—looked none too honest. He wished the Tramp would take his hook and be—well, condemned.

"Hey, there!" he called at last. "What's your game—hangin' about here?"

The Tramp started violently and stopped. He came back a step or so, mumbling.

"Speak up, man!" shouted the Farmer. "I can't hear them silent phonographs!"

"I'm only a tramp; haven't a thing on me except these rags, Farmer," said Out-at-Elbows. "I'm tryin' to get to Workleigh yonder, to look for a job. I'm dead beat."

His last sentence ended in a wheedling snivel. It was getting second nature to him now.

"Better hurry on then," said the Farmer, ramming his red hands in his pockets. "We hain't no work here nor no charity neither. We've enuff to do to keep our own end up. We've got two fine dogs, though, with good, sound teeth."

He paused, to let the intelligence sink into the Tramp's mind. Then, feeling a little relieved of his suspicions, he fished out a penny.

"Take that and be off!" he grunted shortly. "It's all you'll get here, and a wonder you've got that!"

The Tramp took it servilely, touched his forehead and mumbled incoherent thanks, then shuffled on again. The Farmer chuckled to himself, and went in, putting the peg of the chain in the staple on the inside of the gate. The moment he was out of sight the Tramp crossed the lane and dossed on the turf. A low gorse bush hid him from the farm house.

"Something like," he jerked, with an imprecation. He kicked off his boots. They had been a misfit of somebody's, and certainly were never made for him. He stretched his long arms, pillowed his head in his hands, and went to sleep. A new melody soon mingled with the chirping of the birds, the buzzing of the insects, the rustle of the leaves in the breeze. The flies made a cluster over him, but they did not stay. The gnats that bite one in the shade of trees and among long grass did not bite him. His tramp's blood was not rich enough for those tiny beasts of prey. A tramp's blood is often deficient in the red corpuscles.

He slept awhile undisturbed. The blazing heat of noon scorched his thin face. The heat passed and the shadow of the trees fell over him again. Some time towards the end of the afternoon a creeping thing of some kind got in his open mouth and woke him. He sat up, spluttering it out, and rubbed his eyes.

"Must be getting on," he thought, and glancing over the bush, looked up and down the lane. The farmyard gate was still shut, but he heard a dog barking. No one was in sight. He noticed, inconsequently, that the column of smoke from the kitchen chimney rose straight upwards; that the western sky was taking a pale, red tinge. Fine weather to-morrow, whatever good that might be.

He put on his boots, got to his feet awkwardly, and went on shuffling up the lane. From the look of things it promised to be a short cut to the town, whose smoke hung like a shroud over the valley yonder. He walked in the middle of the road; a solitary figure on the crown of the macadam. The evening was very still and beautiful. The smell of the hay was in the air; the mellowed peal of church bells floated up from the village down there on the right. But for that he would not have troubled to remember that it was Wednesday night.

After all, what was Wednesday to him, more than any other revolution of the earth? He was an outcast of society; one of the "manufactured residuum of civilization;" a man without any use in the universe. He was one of those, he thought,—he had once, in more fortunate days, attended a course of lectures on "Physics and Politics"—who were being crushed underfoot in the march of Progress. He was one of the unnecessary; one of the unfit: it followed naturally that he must go under. The race of life is to the swift, the battle to the strong, the prize to the clever. The fittest must survive. Nature knows no other mark of merit. She gives life recklessly, uses it carelessly, takes it away ruthlessly. Why not? Yet—he held his solitary penny in his fist until it burnt him as a circle of fire. Somehow, the memory of those lectures, blurred by this time, it is true, was little comfort to him. To-morrow stared him in the face. Better have been born an animal, without reason. Animals, at least, take no thought nor heed for the morrow, what they shall eat nor what they shall drink.

He was now near the end of the lane, where it came at right angles into another. He was startled out of his maudlin reflections by the sound of a child's sobbing. The sound came nearer. He saw something red bobbing up and down now and then over the edge of the stone wall, and nearing the corner. Now the sobs ceased, stifled, now they broke out again violently.

"Some kid in trouble," he jerked out. "Funny thing—what kids cry for!"

Just then the red object reached the corner of the wall. It was the red "soot-bag" cap of a little girl. She turned into the lane and came on, meeting the Tramp. He looked at her curiously, and stopped; he didn't know why. I suppose if it had been a little boy he would have shuffled on carelessly. But it wasn't, so there's an end of speculation.

She was a pretty little thing, though she was doing her best to make herself ugly. Her cheeks were like rosy red apples, her hair was sunny gold, her eyes were large and blue. The blue-serge dress and little white apron she wore suited her small figure well. At present the said apple cheeks were disfigured with the courses of tears, and the blue eyes ringed with dirt that the chubby knuckles had rubbed in. The Tramp somehow felt sorry for that, though he didn't want to feel sorry for anyone's misfortunes just then. When he stopped, she stopped too; ceased her sobbing and looked up at him wonderingly. She was yet too young to understand the sanctity of social distinctions. Out-at-Elbows felt that he must say something.

"What's matter, little 'un?" he asked.

The chubby knuckles, half-raised to the blue eyes, dropped again. The blue eyes opened wide, showing very moist with imminent tears.

"I'se—lost—it," she said, parting each syllable with a breath and a sob.

"Lost what?"

"I'se lost—it," she repeated. It never occurred to her that anyone would be ignorant of what "it" was. "I'se lost it, an' dad'll be so cross. He'll——"

But at contemplation of what "dad" would do, her sobbing broke out afresh. The blue eyes were eclipsed again. The Tramp felt still more curious.

"But what's it you've lost, little 'un?" he asked, sticking his hands in his pockets and striking an interrogative attitude. The little girl put down her doubled fists an'inch or so.

Digitized by Google

"She gave it me to buy some 'judes at Mrs. Sandlin's, and I wasn't to have 'nother for a w-eek."

The Tramp guessed "judes" must be jujubes, and Mrs. Sandlin's a sweetstuff shop in some near village. "She," of course, was mother. Grim irony, come to think of it, this kid crying because she couldn't spoil her teeth with that rubbish, and he—well, his luck. Little Blue-Eyes went on, feeling better for telling her trouble.

"An' it was on'y a penny, and I hadn't had one since Sunday, an' dad says, mustn't never get pennies lost, cos it's bad prin-ci-ple."

She brought out the last word with an effort, yet with a touch of pride in the accomplishment of so big a piece of language.

"Whereabouts did you drop it?" queried Out-at-Elbows. "We might come across it yet."

"Dunno. It's long way to Mrs. Sandlin's, and—dunno."

Then a new idea came into her little mind. She looked up at the Tramp hopefully.

"You'se big. Do you know anywhere where little girls can get pennies—when they'se lost theirs? There must be somewhere—when they'se really lost their pennies."

The justice of her logic seemed perfect in her eyes, but the Tramp shook his head. He had never observed much justice, anyway. "Don't think so," he said gravely. Then an odd idea came into his mind. Something in his pocket burnt his fingers. He could not help the ghost of a smile at the very thought of that. The blue eyes were quick to notice every change of feature, and they filled with tears again.

"I'se goin'," she said. "You'se no good."

That settled him. He didn't feel much of a hero; but it was perhaps the most unselfish act in his wasted life.

"Here, little 'un," he said huskily. "I reckon that'll stop you crying. An' you'd better be running to Mrs. Sandlin's if you want to get home afore it's dark."

The chubby fingers closed on the coin greedily. Her face brightened. It was sun after shower.

"Thank you," she said, with childish politeness. Then, ignoring her former verdict with sublime indifference: "I knowed you'd help me. But I'se goin' home now. It's far away to Mrs. Sandlin's, an' I can go in the mornin'. Shan't get it lost 'gain!"

She clutched the precious coin tightly, and was ready to go; began walking on down the lane. But the Tramp was yet curious. He wanted to know one thing more—and felt sure of the answer as the thought flashed across him.

"Say, little 'un; where do you live?"

"That's our house," she said, pointing to the solitary farm behind him. "That's Carlo barkin'. It's suppertime."

She ended with a child's abruptness, and started running. Out-at-Elbows watched her little figure down the path, noticing uninterestedly how queerly the tail of her soot-bag cap danced on her little shoulders. He saw her open the gate and turn in; heard the click of the peg in the staple again.

Then the Tramp spoke rapidly but vividly under his breath, and shuffled wearily out of the lane. The sun was now setting in a sea of crimson and gold.

GEORGE C. WALLIS.

Digitized by Google

"By Jove, I know that woman!" exclaimed Sellon.

"You do? Where did you make her acquaintance?" asked his companion.

"Well, Crossland, perhaps it is going too far to say that I know her," returned Sellon, not noticing the other's tone of surprise. "But I recognise in her a girl whom I was able to save from being run over in London some years ago. I feel certain she is the same. She gave promise of becoming a pretty woman; but she is more than pretty, she is positively beautiful! Fancy seeing her here in Kimberley!"

Crossland did not reply. There was a far away look in his eyes; he was meditating deeply.

Sellon was a diamond broker. He was distinguished from most gentlemen of his profession by his reputation for integrity; there was not the faintest breath of a suspicion that he had been engaged in any illicit transaction, and those who came into possession of stolen diamonds would as soon have thought of taking them to the detectives as to Sellon.

Crossland was reputed to be a man of independent means, who came to South Africa for the benefit of his health during the winter. He was a pleasant and well-informed man, and Sellon, who had but few friends among Kimberley people, had taken to him. This was the second winter that Crossland had spent there, so that they were quite old friends.

"What is she doing here? Do you know?" asked Sellon.

"Yes. She was doing a little on the variety stage in England," was the reply. "She determined to come out here because she thought she could make some sort of a sensation that would help her on her return to London. I was introduced to her in the old country."

"So you know her, then? You must introduce me to her. I shall see whether she is the girl I——."

"You seem rather smitten," laughed Crossland.

Sellon flushed.

"She is a beautiful woman," he remarked as coolly as he could. "I suppose she has an engagement?"

"No. She came out on the chance. Risky, but she is a plucky girl. She came over in the same boat as I did. I believe she has been doing a little in Cape Town."

Sellon went home to his rooms that evening full of the lovely face of the woman he had seen pass in the carriage. He had been proof against the charms of the ladies in Kimberley and elsewhere, but it seemed as if he were about to capitulate unconditionally to a woman whom he scarcely knew. He sat in his chair for an hour without moving; his thoughts were fixed on the vision of loveliness that had floated past him. Then he aroused himself with a sheepish smile.

"Nonsense!" he muttered. "I am a fool to be so taken with a pretty face. And what do I want with a wife?" He paused. "It is lonely here, though," he added with a sigh.

The next morning he was punctual in keeping his appointment with Crossland, who at once conducted him to the hotel where Miss Lane was staying. To Sellon's delight, she recognised him at once and received him with such warmth that he was intoxicated with pleasure and love.

"I have often thought of you since that time, Mr. Sellon!" she exclaimed, "and have wondered whether I should ever see you again. I have wanted so much to thank you again for your bravery."

"Oh, it was nothing—nothing," stammered Sellon in confusion. "Do you really mean to say that you have remembered me all this time?"

"I can honestly say that not one day has passed without my thinking of your noble action," she replied, with a look that increased Sellon's confusion.

Crossland then joined in the conversation and contrived to turn it to other subjects. A few minutes later he declared hurriedly that he must leave them, and took his departure.

Sellon was glad of the opportunity of a tête-à-tête with Miss Lane, and when he left the hotel he was more infatuated than ever with the lovely artiste.

He called the next day and spent an hour with her; Crossland did not accompany him. It would have been impossible for Sellon to have given any idea of the conversation; he was now conscious that he was hopelessly in love with Alice, as he called her in his mind, and he cared for nothing else. He felt the soft touch of her hand upon his, he remembered the looks that had sunk deep into his heart, and the passionate longing to kiss the beautiful face that had been so close to his, was still with him.

For a week this went on. He saw her every day, and at last he determined to ask her to marry him. He had seen Crossland two or three times during the week, but it struck him that Crossland had wished to avoid him.

Digitized by Google

"Perhaps he is jealous of my conquest," thought Sellon. "I am sorry for him, if it is so, but——" He completed the sentence by a shrug of the shoulders.

There was a certain amount of nervousness, anxiety even, apparent in Miss Lane's demeanour as she received her lover that morning. Sellon noticed it, and as soon as they were seated on the couch he gently placed his arm round her waist and drew her head upon his shoulder.

"Alice—I must call you by that name, dear—what is it that makes you look so worried this morning? Confide all your troubles to me, little one, so that I may have the happiness of driving them away."

She nestled more closely to him and began to sob.

"Oh, Arthur, I am so unhappy!"

Sellon kissed her and tried to soothe her, but it was some time before he could persuade her to dry her eyes and tell him what troubled her.

"I am afraid of two men here, who have some evil designs against me," she said hesitatingly.

"Who are they?" demanded Sellon hotly.

"Don't get angry or you may make it worse for me," cried Alice. "One is a theatrical agent here and the other is—is—Mr. Crossland."

"Has Crossland dared—" began Sellon, jumping up and moving towards the door. She ran after him and pulled him back.

"You will spoil all," she exclaimed. "They are cunning, unscrupulous men—oh, that I had known it before! Listen," she continued hurriedly. "I cannot explain all, but I know there is only one way to escape them."

"And that is?"

"Someone must take me away," she answered, looking him straight in the eyes. "Someone must take me to Bloemfontein—quickly—to-night."

For a moment Sellon hesitated. He had come to offer her his hand, but an elopement or a runaway match had not entered his head. He caught the beseeching, bewitching glance of her piercing dark eyes, however, and all his scruples vanished.

"I came with the intention of asking you to be my wife, Alice. I will take you from here to-night, as you wish; and when we are out of Kimberley you shall explain it all to me. But why," he added, "do you wish to go to Bloemfontein?"

"Because it is a garden of flowers," she said softly, holding out her hands to him. "A path of flowers—will it not be symbolical of our future?"

"Yes, you are right, my darling," he whispered, pressing her to his breast. "I am too worldly; for me, Bloemfontein has hitherto been connected with diamond robberies—once in Bloemfontein, the thieves are safe. Forgive me for not remembering how pretty a place it is, and how natural that you should wish to go there to escape from your troubles."

He was about to kiss her again when they heard a gentle, but hasty knock at the door. Alice disengaged herself from her lover's embrace and went to the door. She opened it just a little and spoke to the person outside. A few sentences were rapidly exchanged in a low tone. Sellon could not see who it was, but he guessed from the voice that it was a coolie servant.

Alice closed the door and walked into the second room. She came out a moment later, holding a small package.

"How silly of him to interrupt," she cried playfully. "But you must go now, Arthur. And I want you to mind this packet for me." She hesitated a second, then continued: "Take care of it and do not fail to bring it with you this evening. Put it away in a pocket; where it will not be noticed—no, not in your breast pocket; it will bulge it out a little. Yes, that will do splendidly," she added as he placed it in one of his coat-tail pockets; "but be very careful of it."

She came out a moment later, holding a small package.

He took her in his arms and kissed her passionately. A few whispered words passed between them, and she led him to the door.

"To-night, at nine o'clock, I will come for you," he said softly.

He opened the door; then started back in surprise. Two men, whom he recognised as detectives, had just reached it, and the foremost had raised his hand to knock. They entered without ceremony.

"What is the meaning of this visit, gentlemen?" he asked. All three men were looking away from Miss Lane, or they would have noticed the nervous twitching of her lips.

"We have authority to search these rooms, Mr. Sellon," replied the superior officer. "Mr. Crossland has been arrested for illicit dealing in diamonds. He has been watched and we have seen him enter this place to visit Miss Lane. We are trying to find the gems."

"We have authority to search these rooms."

"But you surely do not suspect this lady?" was all that Sellon could say. Crossland arrested! What did it mean?

"We have our orders, Mr. Sellon. You know we must obey."

Then the remembrance of the package flashed across Sellon's mind and a cold chill ran down his spine. Was it possible? Were Crossland and Alice accomplices? The low conversation with the coolie, the handing of the packet to him! Alice had been warned of the probable arrival of the detectives and had endeavoured to hurry him away with the stolen stones in order to save herself! But could it be so? His brain was in a whirl.

Then another horrible thought struck him. If the incriminating packet were discovered on his person! His good name would be gone and he would be ruined; it would not clear him if he made a clean breast of what he knew—suspicion would still rest upon him, even if his word were accepted for the main point—and then he would be giving her to certain imprisonment.

He wavered between love and duty; it was a trying ordeal. He cast a hesitating glance at Alice; she was looking at him with such a pleading expression that he was conquered. He would save her at any price! But could he elude the vigilance of the detectives in any way?

"Do you intend to submit me to the indignity of a search?" he asked haughtily.

"No, Mr. Sellon," replied the detective. "You are too well known to be suspected. We have no authority to do so, either. But we must search these rooms and—and we must ask Miss Lane to prove that she is not hiding them in her dress."

The young broker stifled a cry of relief, but now he hated himself! The detective's words cut him to the heart; he was above suspicion, yet he was aiding in the robbery!

The officers did their work, but found nothing. Sellon felt that he could not stay to talk to Alice; he remembered renewing his promise to call that evening in order to take her to Bloemfontein, but he recollected nothing of the walk home.

For the next few hours he suffered unspeakable mental anguish. Crossland was a thief; was Alice his accomplice? Had she not said that she was afraid of him? Did the package contain diamonds, after all? Had she not asked him to take her away before she had any knowledge of the arrest of Crossland and the arrival of the officers? He might have satisfied himself about the contents of the package by opening it, but his honourable nature repelled against this course, in spite of the events of the morning.

Gradually he grew calmer; and as his mind became more easy, his love for Alice assumed stronger hold upon him. No, he could not believe in her duplicity; it would be all right, she would explain it all! So, by the evening, he had become convinced that all was well. When we wish to see things in a certain light, we can soon bring ourselves to believe that they are as we desire them to be!

At nine o'clock punctually he was with her. He felt repaid for all he had done when she received him with that winning smile and raised her face, with a pretended pout on her rosy lips, for him to kiss.

It was not until they were bowling away in the trap and fairly within the territory of the Orange Free State that any reference was made to the incidents of the morning. Then he handed her the package.

"I have kept it safe for you," he said. "But it was a great risk. No, I did not open it."

She laughed softly.

"You have guessed what is in it?"

"Diamonds," he returned briefly. He did not care to talk on that subject; he wanted to forget it. He asked for no explanation; he desired, in his infatuation, to be oblivious of all save that she was his.

Suddenly she asked him to pull up.

"I think we passed something," she said. "It was like a huddled heap of humanity. Oh, do go back and see. I will stop here."

With a laugh at her anxiety, he sprang from the trap and retraced his steps. He had not gone very far, just round a bend in the road, when he heard a sound of a horse's hoofs. He hurried back to the bend. He saw the trap flying along and heard a mocking laugh.

He stood dumfounded. Then the truth forced itself upon him. He had been duped all along! She had pretended to be in love with him and had suggested the elopement with him for the sole purpose of using his reputation to enable her to get away from Kimberley, with her booty, in safety!

He did not attempt to follow her. He reviled himself for his infatuation and set his face towards Kimberley, to get back as best he could.

The following afternoon he saw Crossland in goal. He briefly stated what had passed and asked for an explanation. His pseudo friend, after some hesitation, gave him all the details of the scheme.

Crossland had carried out a number of transactions in diamonds and had escaped suspicion until within the last few days. When he discovered that he was watched he sent for Miss Lane, who was really his accomplice, to come from Bloemfontein to help him in a big deal of £20,000. It was his intention to pass the stones to her, so that she could take them away. There was some risk that she might be stopped, but they must take the chance.

Digitized by Google

At this point occurred the incident narrated at the commencement. This suggested the idea to Crossland. If Alice could contrive to fascinate Sellon, she could get away from Kimberley under the protection of his reputation; the fact that the broker fancied he recognised her was a trump card for the conspirators and we know how it was played. Their plans were precipitated; Crossland had an idea that the officers were becoming extra attentive, and it was resolved to get Alice away at once with the booty, which had just come into their possession. Hence the plan for the elopement.

"I tell you this," said Crossland coolly, "to set your mind at rest. I don't think you will split on me—if you do you must acknowledge your own complicity—and because—" He paused and a half-anxious look appeared on his countenance. "Hang it! I don't understand why she acted like that. It looks as if she intended to hoax us both and enjoy the proceeds with someone else! She is capable of it, I believe! I was relying upon your keeping her in view till I could arrive. They can't do anything to me here now that they have failed to find the stones."

Suddenly she asked him to pull up.

Sellon left him in disgust. Crossland's theory proved correct; the duped diamond broker received a letter from from Miss Lane three days afterwards, in which she expressed her thanks for services rendered and begged him to inform Mr. Crossland that she and her friend Mr. Joyce, whom he would doubtless remember, would constantly think of him while they were enjoying the fruits of his biggest deal in diamonds.

Sellon has grown rich since then, and has had many a coy glance shot at him from a woman's eyes, but he is not likely to fall a victim to feminine charms again.

E. R. Kennen.

A SPLENDID LIBRARY FOR NOTHING!

We Want to Make you a Present of Some 6s. Books.

This is the most extraordinary offer that has ever been made by any journal to its readers.

The Sunday Reader, as you know, is the brightest, biggest, and best religious journal published.

Very well.

If you will send us 6s. 6d., a year's subscription to The Sunday Reader (1d. a week for the paper, and ½d. a week for its postage, wrapper and address thrown in) we will send you the paper every week for a year, and we will give you

ANY ONE OF THE 6/- BOOKS MENTIONED BELOW.

The ordinary annual subscription to The Sunday Reader is 8s. 8d., so that you get the paper at a reduced rate and the 6s. book absolutely for nothing.

But you are not confined to one book. If you like to get one of your friends to subscribe to The Sunday Reader for a year, you can send his or her subscription to us, and we will send you another 6s. book. And if you send us half-a-dozen annual subscriptions of 6s. 6d. each, we will forward half-a-dozen magnificent 6s. volumes, free of charge.

The editions are limited, and, of course, should there be a rush on any particular volume, and the whole issue be used up, you would have to select another of the 6s. books. Applications will be dealt with in the order in which they are received.

Here is a list of the 6s. books we are offering free of charge to readers:

IN HASTE AND AT LEISURE. By Mrs. E. Lynn Linton.

THE DRAGONNADES; or, Asylum Christi. By the Rev. E. Gilliat, M.A., Assistant Master of Harrow School.

THE WORKS OF THE REV. ROBERT HALL, M.A., the great divine, beautifully bound in half roan.

ADAM SMITH'S ESSAYS, bound in half roan.

THE REV. ANNABEL LEE. By Robert Buchanan.

STORIES FROM THE BIBLE. By Evelyn Farrar, with a chapter by her father, the Very Rev. Dean Farrar. (A splendid, illustrated book for children.)

AN AMERICAN EMPEROR. By Louis Tracy.

THE ZONE OF FIRE. By Headon Hill.

VALDAR THE OFTBORN. By George Griffith.

THE MASTER KEY. By Florence Warden.

THE VIRGIN OF THE SUN. By George Griffith.

The following form a series of magnificent presentation volumes, each consisting of about 450 pages, beautifully illustrated and bound, with gilt edges.

THE PRINCE OF THE HOUSE OF DAVID. By the Rev. Thomas Ingraham.

MELBOURNE HOUSE. By S. Warner.

OPENING A CHESTNUT BURR. By E. P. Roe.

QUEECHY. By the author of "The Wide, Wide World."

HOME INFLUENCE. By Grace Aguilar.

BEULAH. By A. Wilson.

INFELICE. By A. Wilson.

BEN-HUR. By Lew Wallace.

THE OLD HELMET. By the Author of "The Wide, Wide World."

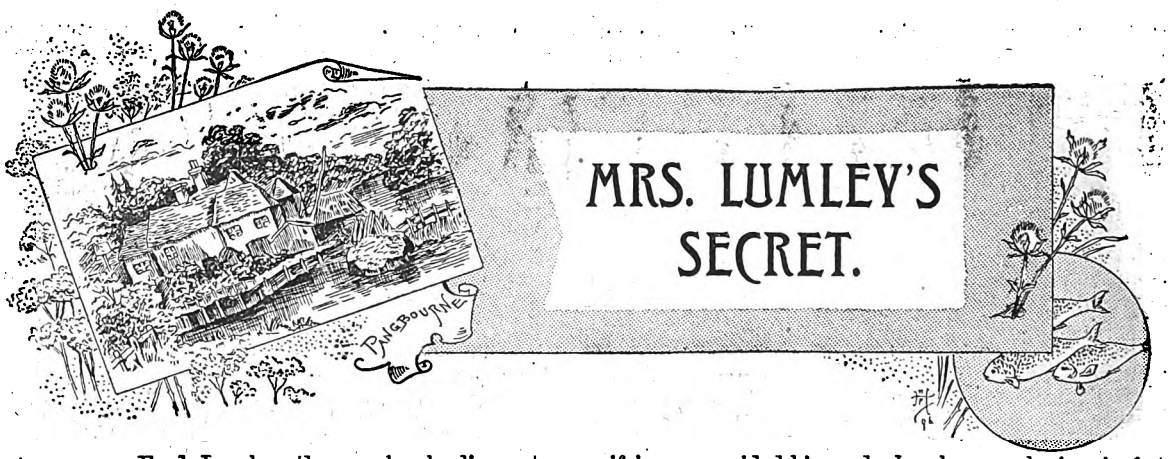
BRUCE. By Grace Aguilar.

IVANHOE. By Sir Walter Scott.

DAVID COPPERFIELD. By Charles Dickens.

KENILWORTH. By Sir Walter Scott.

Digitized by Google



ALTHOUGH Fred Lumley, the popular leading actor of the "Kemble" Theatre, had been often heard to declare before marriage that there were men in the world who would marry the daughter of a Carribean savage providing she had £500 a year, he was not prepared to withdraw that statement even when Miss Emily Staples, the beautiful and accomplished niece of the wealthy Mr. Nicholas Staples, an enthusiastic patron of the drama, became his wife.

The young actor could safely affirm that his marriage had not been dictated by mercenary considerations, for although Mr. Staples, in giving his consent, had stipulated that he should be allowed to reside with the young couple on condition of his settling on his niece £500 a year, Fred, with that perception of character which seems peculiar to actors, would have declined his offer, had he not been afraid of losing Emily. He didn't like Mr. Staples, but he was very fond of Emily, so with a wry face he consented.

The lapse of five years left the young couple mutually satisfied with each other. Fred was ardently devoted to his profession, and as his services were much in request at matinées as well as at night, he and his wife did not often see much of each other, but they were always polite and affectionate when they did.

True, the fires lit by matrimony had nearly gone out, but the embers were glowing, showing that they had not yet arrived at that state when a stony embrace once a day is an indication that the domestic barometer is at fair. At the breakfast table Fred contemplated his wife's pretty face with a placid sense of pleasure, and when he left the house for rehearsals it was with the consciousness that the diadem of purity encircled her brow.

It was about this time that the actor's perceptive qualities—which, as we have said, were great—informed him that Uncle Nicholas had begun to eye him with a very mournful and sympathising expression, and, as Fred hated mysteries, he determined to have it out with the old gentleman, but all he could extract amounted to this: "Keep an eye on your wife, watch her, and if you think she is keeping anything from you, come to me. As my niece is the daughter of my dead brother, it behoves me to proceed in this matter with caution."

Fred pooh-poohed and pished a good deal during the delivery of this warning. It was not the first time Uncle Nicholas had been the cause of little "tiffs" between Emily and himself, but, try as he would, he found himself unable to resist following his advice. Slowly it dawned on him that Nicholas was right. His wife's eyes avoided his, and when he casually inquired at dinner one evening how she had spent the day, she stammered an inarticulate reply, and hastily left the room.

The next day, on returning from rehearsal, he happened to go into her boudoir without knocking. She was reading a letter. With cheeks aflame she tried to hide it. Fred saw nothing strange in her reading a letter, but why should a hot flush mantle her cheek as she declared the letter was from her sister? When Emily left the room her husband's eye lighted on an envelope in the grate, and he saw that it was addressed to his wife, and that the handwriting was that of a man, so he sought Nicholas again.

"I have come," he said. "My wife has a secret."

"I knew it," replied the old man with a malicious chuckle, which caused Fred to feel an inclination to strangle him. "It's a sad thing, a very sad thing."

"What's a very sad thing?" inquired the actor, a horrible fear gnawing his heart.

"Find out where your wife goes in the hansom cab which waits for her round the corner of the next street three and sometimes four times a week at 11.a.m."

Now, Fred did not think much of this; he was not naturally of a jealous disposition, and although he remembered the envelope he had found in the grate, there was no reason it should have any connection with journeys in a hansom cab at 11 a.m. Still, next morning, when his wife refused to accompany him to rehearsal, alleging as an excuse that her duties at home would occupy all the morning, he could not help peeping at her face over the top of the part he was studying. It gave him quite a shock.

He felt convinced she was deceiving him. So after pleading indisposition at rehearsal he hurried home, opened the door softly, slipped into his study unobserved and waited. A little later he heard a stealthy step descending the stairs, and opening the door slightly, saw his wife most elegantly dressed, quietly leaving the house.

The corner of the street was visible from the staircase window, but he found that occupied by the servants, who seemed as much interested in the doings of their mistress as Mr. Lumley was. The cook, who was a shocking example of the deteriorating effect of hard work on the female form, and whose stockings were not immaculate, was just confiding her opinions of married life to one of the housemaids, when she saw Mr. Lumley and fled, followed by the others, allowing their master to reach the window in time to see his wife step into a hansom and drive off. Before he left the window he was joined by Uncle Nicholas, who drew his attention to the alertness which characterised the neighbourhood that morning. There were heads at every window, and from the signalling, pointing, and smiling, it seemed as if the watchers had very definite views on the matter, if he hadn't. Where had his wife gone to in the hansom, and how dare she keep these journeys a secret from him? She was his wife. What did it all mean?

Digitized by Google

Mr. Lumley took advantage of his wife's absence to institute a minute search in her boudoir and dressing-room, and an icy terror crept into his heart when he saw his wretched old relation pounce on a letter hidden at the back of a drawer in the dressing-table. It was only a fragment, but it was in the same handwriting as the envelope he had found in the grate, and ran as follows:

"As my brother who is staying with me knows your husband, we must be very careful. I shall expect you to-morrow morning. Be at the side entrance at 11.30. I will be on the watch, and will let you in unobserved."

He read the letter again and again, and tried to imagine a case where a married lady found it necessary, for some good and praiseworthy object, to be smuggled into the house of a gentleman at 11 30 a.m. unknown to her husband. He tried but failed, and, leaden winged, the effort to believe her innocent fluttered to the ground.

That evening Mr. Lumley dined at his club, and for the first time in his life took too much wine. The most poignant griefs are apt to fade when contemplated through vinous and alcholic mists, but the next morning after he had asked his wife to meet him after rehearsal to go to the Royal Academy, and she had refused, saying she had "some shopping to do," he looked quite ten years older as he stepped into the cab which Uncle Nicholas had secured to follow Mrs. Lumley. Sorrow is an unsparing sculptor, and horrible suspicion will mar the smoothness of the noblest brow.

The features of the unhappy actor twitched with passion, and from the way he wriggled in his seat it seemed to his relative—who, never having been married himself, regarded his companion with a sort of "tired sneer"—that a veritable tempest of jealousy was rushing up and down him, north, south, east, and west. Uncle Nicholas had to endure something more than the proverbial "bad quarter of an hour" that morning.

"This is all your confounded work!" exclaimed the actor, turning on the old gentleman with a look appalling in its ferocity.

"My dear boy, the sacred instincts of truth would not permit me to remain silent."

"Indeed!" was the withering reply. "Not even to preserve the reputation of your niece?"

"Truth should be paramount to all consideration," said the old gentleman uneasily.

"The truth!" roared Fred, so loudly that it is a wonder his wife did not hear him. "The truth is only estimable when spoken in a righteous cause. If it is true that truth lies at the bottom of a well, I tell you to your face that I wish you had drowned yourself when you went down to seek it!"

Fred's spirits rose as the cab drove on. Her destination might be Regent Street and shopping after all. Yes, there was still a ray of hope, a thin, half-starved ray if you like, but the actor clung to it and basked and revelled in its meagre warmth, till the cab containing Emily left Regent Street and made straight for St. John's Wood, when he sank back on his seat with a low groan. When Emily's cab drew up at a small villa in Alpha Grove, Fred and his companion hurriedly alighted, and hiding behind their vehicle, watched the movements of the guilty woman. Looking furtively round, Mrs. Lumley drew down her veil, and cautiously approaching the side entrance, knocked.

A young gentleman presently opened the door, and motioning her to silence, drew her inside, closing it again. A young gentleman, and a handsome one, too. Who was the serpent who had crept into his paradise?

"Come away," whispered Nicholas, "depraved hussy!"

"Come away," cried Fred hoarsely, "when my wife is in that house with a man whose features, when he opened the door, anyone could see were distinctly affectionate? Come away? Never!" and shaking off his companion's grasp, he went up the steps, and giving a couple of loud knocks in imitation of a postman's summons soon found himself inside the house.

Slipping a sovereign into the astonished domestic's hand, he asked where the lady was who had just entered.

"What lady, sir?"

"Well, where's your master!"

"Upstairs, sir, in that room."

Accompanied by Uncle Nicholas Fred stole upstairs. They reached the door, stopped and listened. They heard voices. One was Emily's, the other a gentleman's.

"I think I shall have another try at your mouth, you closed it too firmly yesterday."

The airy gusto with which the gentleman announced this intention completely upset the actor's self-command. The next moment he was in the room, looking uncommonly foolish too, when he found that his wife was having her portrait painted by that rising young artist, Bucklaw, and that the work was being prepared in secret, as Emily intended the picture as a birthday surprise for her husband.

Fred seized a favourable opportunity that evening and replaced the letter which had so upset his peace of mind in the drawer of the dressing-table, and swore he would kick Uncle Nicholas out of the house if he breathed a word of what had taken place. Emily appeared perfectly satisfied with her husband's masterly explanation, that "he happened to be passing through Alpha Grove as Emily entered Bucklaw's studio," but for all that she discharged the cook the next day, and made matters so very uncomfortable for Uncle Nicholas that he soon left the house exclaiming with hardened jocosity:

"Emily, my presence in your husband's house, and the occasional domestic breezes I have caused, have given crisp ripples to the waters of your domestic life. I leave you now to the utter stagnation of contentment. Good-bye."

ARTHUR GOODRICH.

RESULT OF "BOOK" COMPETITION FOR WEEK ENDING APRIL 16th.

Miss C. Hart, 21 King's Road, Brownswood Park, N. "Tennyson's Poems."

W. H. Procter, School Board Offices, Congleton. "The Zone of Fire." By Headon Hill.

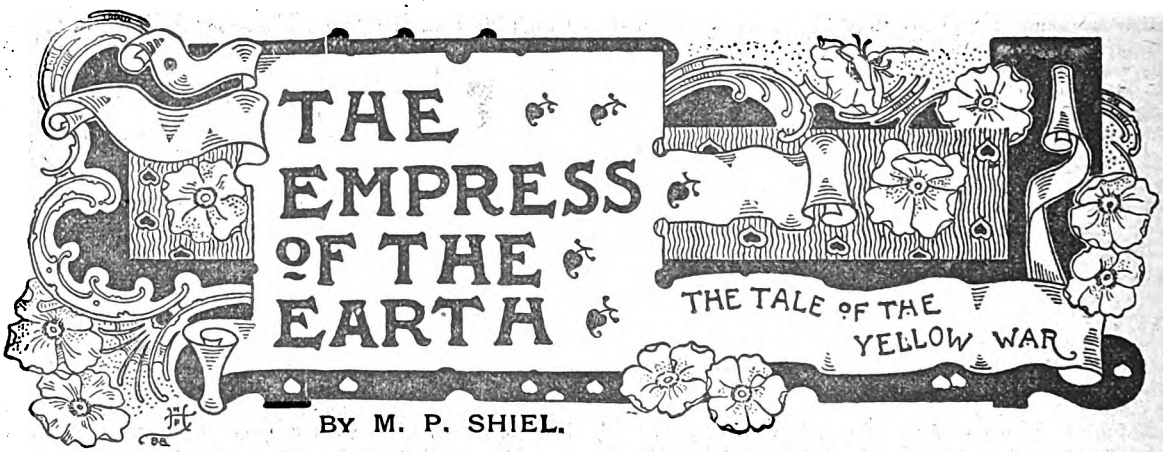
Thomas Boddy, Heighington R.S.O., County Durham. "Exercise for Health."

G. Jones, 26 Yorkington Street, Stockport. "The Christian." By Hall Caine

Jack Hazeldene, Middle Class Schools, Sheffield. "Huxley's Physiology."

W. H. Westlake, 2 Rownham Place, Clifton, Bristol. "Strength." By Sandow.

Digitized by Google



BY M. P. SHIEL.

CHAPTER XXV.

Before the Battle.

During all that afternoon and night England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland uttered its voice.

For on the 6th of August the usual 5,000,000 letters and post-cards delivered by the Post-office leapt up to 14,500,000. This meant that the whole nation had taken busily to pen-and-ink, to paper and card-board. It meant that it was profoundly stirred about something, that it wanted something with its whole heart.

All these extra millions of letters were directed to London, some to the Government offices, the majority to the London daily papers. Not a thousandth part of them were ever opened. The Circulation Office of the London Postal Service Department was kept in a flurry of business all through the night. St. Martin's in the morning got postmen where it could; and the bags of the carriers bulged.

When any vast collection of animals acts in this spontaneous way, all doing the same thing, it is that they are stirred by some instinct which is in unison with the Soul of the world. The Universal Voice is, in truth, the voice of God. Democracy is thus a kind of Holy Scripture. Its Will is the Decalogue.

The nation, having eagerly drunk the news that John Hardy had suddenly reappeared in England as mysteriously as he had disappeared from it, demanded his presence at the impending battle. It insisted that no nonsense about formality or convention should deprive it of his possible help. Most of the people demanded his appointment as Admiral of the Fleet.

And why? He had only been instrumental in winning a single battle for England. If they had reasoned, their ardour of persuasion could not have been so intense. But the fact is, that their cry proceeded only from that divine instinct for truth which, in hours of extremity, often inspires nations, and sometimes individuals. That Hardy was the right man, just then, just there, they felt intuitively; and they did not mince matters in proclaiming it.

The Daily Mail sent a telegram to Mr. Gladstone at Hawarden, to ask his opinion. The reply was characteristic of the aged statesman. He wired:

"Am not specially qualified to judge, but agree in the main with the nation."

The only person in Europe to whom the coming battle, or his own possible share in it, did not seem of direct momentous importance, was Hardy.

For the immediate motive of the Allies in invading England was to compel the withdrawal of the British troops from the Continent; but even supposing they effected a landing, there was an enemy impending upon them, as Hardy knew, far more terrible than all the combined armies of several Europes; and this enemy would at once compel them to do the very thing they sought to force upon Britain.

And it was near—it was not far off. As he stepped into the train at Worthing that night for his journey to London, he bought a paper; and in a small-type paragraph, unmarked perhaps but by him, he saw this quaint item of news:

"A train containing 500 Chinese has arrived at Petersburg from Vladivostok. They seem poor, and the object of their journey is unknown. It is the intention of the Russian authorities to send them back to their own country."

Hardy muttered to himself:

"So soon, Yen How?"

But in the eyes of England, of Britain, of Europe, the coming battle was the Greater Waterloo of world-history; the final shock of this annihilating war; the crowning Armageddon before a probable thousand years of Peace.

If Britain failed now, she failed; and if Europe, then Europe failed, too. There could be little further struggle: for who would be there to make it? There would be no fight left in the limp nations.

Hardy reached London at eleven p.m. It was partly expecting him, for as soon as the two Worthing reporters had got off their news, Worthing had pricked its ears and heard. Dixon's became the centre of the town, and a moving crowd surveyed the house for hours. Long before Hardy appeared all his immediate plans were known from Dixon; he was then cheered by the full street; only those near enough to see him well being mostly silent, impressed with something of that strangeness of expression which made the sailors at Kiao-chau whisper: "What a face!"

London, therefore, expected him, without certainty as to the hour of his arrival. A considerable crowd waited at Victoria; but when at last it saw him, it made no sign. They looked for a very young man, with swift glance and free air. They saw a man with stooping shoulders and grey in his long hair; and decided that this was hardly he.

But one pair of eyes knew him under his disguise. Old Bobbie Mason had been waiting all the evening at the station, wondering why his boy had forgotten him, had sent him no line or word. When at last he saw, he started with horror; but he knew his own.

Outside, instead of the crowd of busy cabs, Hardy saw a meagre muster of five or six; and his musing eye noted the raw-boned look of the horses. As his carriage passed through Buckingham Palace Road, a baked-potato apparatus stood just in front of the Palace, and he noted with a pang the largeness of the crowd round it. The streets were almost deserted. Even the policemen seemed fewer. In a bye-street near Oxford Circus, an old woman walked and behind her a cat, with little halts and runs, followed persistently, sending out piteous feeble cries to the night.

Digitized by Google

Old Bobbie, sitting there by his side, waited for a caress of the once affectionate hand. But no caress came. They drove onward in absolute silence. The only words which John had spoken were the two: "Well, Bobbie," at the station-platform. The old man was frightened.

Once only, as John was moving off to bed, the old butler broke out; and he cried, with clasped hand:

"Master John—what—what—have they done to you!"

And John answered:

"They have tortured me to death, Bobbie, if you want to know."

And that was all. The rose-leaf lips were pressed pretty tight now.

Early in the morning the Government knew what it had to do, if it meant to keep its place. In a thousand startling ways it learnt that the nation's will, this time, had got to be done.

But the thing was officially impossible. John Hardy was nobody, officially. The ships' crews were complete; and it was anticipated that the main portion of the fleet still at anchor would sail at noon. The Government could not exactly telegraph to a Captain or a Vice-Admiral, and say: "You must give up your place to John Hardy, because he is a better man than you." They were absolutely at their wits' end.

But the chief characteristic of the British race is its nimble way. It actually does manage in the end. At nine o'clock Captain MacLeod, once of the Jupiter, now of the Royal Sovereign, was seized by "a sudden illness"; at half-past nine, Admiral Sir Nowell Salmon, principal Naval Aide-de-Camp to the Queen, was at 11A Cavendish Square; at ten, Lord Charles Beresford, upon whom, in the hour of peril, the supreme command had been imposed, telegraphed to the Committee of National Safety, and also to the Admiralty, offering to Hardy a joint command of the squadron: at half-past ten Hardy was hasting in a special train toward Portsmouth.

An old woman walked, and behind her a cat.

But he went under compulsion, not knowing why. He had no theory of naval war. He had, indeed, won a battle, but—he shrank a little from this prominence. The truth was, he was more or less unconscious of the clearness of his own eyes, and the valour of his own heart. It needed that the actual hard facts of a situation should be before him before he could assume the aggressiveness and the self-assurance of the hero.

When on the point of setting out from Cavendish Square, he had cut out from the newspaper bought at Worthing the paragraph about the 500 Chinese. And he had written the two following letters, the first to Mr. Goschen at his private address:

DEAR SIR,—I am just about to set out to fight in the battle which you kindly allow me to attend. In case I should get killed, I am writing this letter to ask you if you will kindly send a ship, flying the English White Ensign at her mast-head, under that the Blue Peter, and under that the Union Jack, to the island of Monte Christo, with orders to bring home what she will find there. I believe you will find that this will come in useful to you in a few weeks' time.

I am, sir,
Your obdt. servant,
JOHN HARDY.

The second letter was to Lord Salisbury. It ran:

MY LORD,—I take the liberty to inclose you a slip from a newspaper about some Chinamen who have come to Petersburg, because I believe it is well worth your attention. In my opinion, within three or four weeks from now there will be some four hundred millions of yellow men in Europe, and perhaps in England, too. I have just come from China myself, so I ought to know what I am saying. A very great man, named Yen How, is the cause of all this. In my opinion, the very best thing England could do would be to withdraw at once from the Continent the armies she has there.

I am, my Lord,
Your obdt. servant,
JOHN HARDY.

If ever man was shocked with fright, or started at the keen spur of terror, it was the Prime Minister on reading this note.

Now he understood some things which had puzzled him.

News had reached England that three American cruisers in Chinese waters had mysteriously ceased to report themselves. Later had come the news that no intelligence could be obtained of some Italian and Austrian ships of war sent out to China during the "Eastern craze." Merchant ships from Europe had sailed round the Cape to the far East, and their long-delayed return was still awaited. It was known that China and Europe were telegraphically disconnected.

These things, at another time, might have given to Europe some faint hint of the actual facts. But during the preoccupation of the war, not the remotest inkling of the truth occurred to anyone. China was a forgotten land. The result of the great naval battle in the Hwang-hai was still unknown in England—all was unknown. John Hardy was the first messenger from that silent, but busy Eastern world, who had appeared for many a month.

At the quay a boat awaited him. He was taken on board the Anson, which carried the Admiral's flag at the main, and was received by Lord Charles Beresford in his private cabin.

The cheery sailor took the hand of the grave-faced one, and said:

Digitized by Google

"They have tortured me to death, Bobbie, if you want to know."

"I congratulate you most heartily, Mr. Hardy, on the merited enthusiasm and confidence which you have aroused in your countrymen, and I shall feel myself honoured by your collaboration."

And Hardy said:

"Thank you, my lord."

And, after some few words, they sat together, and Beresford said:

"The facts, since you are ignorant of them, are roughly these: The navy of Italy is practically intact. Of her twelve first-class battleships, two were sunk by Riviera forts, but about 130,000 tons of her 150,000 odd tons in this line remain, with say 44 guns over 13 inches, and counting the whole fleet, 16 over 10. With the names, tonnage, and armaments of the various ships you are doubtless familiar, the two lost ships being the Re Umberto, and the Rugiero di Lauria. France, on the other hand, has lost heavily in the war, her Toulon squadron of some eighteen armoured ships, which she had imprudently reduced by the four sent to take part in the first invasion of England, was practically annihilated in the Bay of Algesiras, during an attempt to pass through the Straits. A few antiquated wooden things like the Colbert and the Suffren, as well as that rather lame duck, the Richelieu, still remain.

"Her Levant squadron, however, is mostly good for fight; there was a brush with our East Mediterranean force, but the French turned tail, and were lost in a mist after some mutual injuries. The majority of the fifteen coast-defence iron-clads, moreover, are intact, and I have no doubt will be dragged into this final effort. Altogether we have, I think, to reckon with a contribution from France of, say, 96,000 tons, and this will include, I think I may say, the Brennus, the Sfax, the Trident, the two three-masted contre-torpilleurs, Voutour and Cosmao, the Amiral Duperré, the Levrier, the cruiser Troude, the Marceau, and the Magenta. Those, I think, are all I can be sure of. In the Baltic there have been four battles, one British-German, one British-Russian-German, one Swedish-German, and the last Swedish-Russian. On the state of affairs with regard to Baltic ships I am unfortunately not so well informed.

"I very much doubt if there remains to Sweden a single effective ship of war; but, if I am not wrong, we may expect to have to do with a contribution from Russia and Germany combined of say, 100,000 tons, one half of which, I calculate, will be battle-ship weight, and the rest cruisers and torpedo flotillas. Austria will send her single battle-ship and her 32,000 ton weight in cruisers, making altogether, with torpedo-boats, say 40,000 tons. Putting all these together, I have calculated, Mr. Hardy, an opposition of 456,000 tons.

"Very well, now. Let us turn nearer home, and see what force we have to oppose to this great armada. Britain, I assure you, has had a hard and up-hill fight of it. There lie around you ships recalled from every quarter of the globe, except China, where, I hear that you say, our squadron has gone to Davy Jones. If an invading army were to descend from, let us say, the planet Jupiter, they would find all our colonies undefended. Happily our enemies are in the same plight. Altogether we have at our command, including available coast-defence ships, 156,000 tons, just about one-third of the enemy's force; and if these figures do not fill you with a certain gravity, it is because you are a Briton and Mr. Hardy."

Beresford smiled as he concluded, leaning back in his chair; Hardy, looking upon the ground, did not smile.

After a minute Hardy said:

"I take it, my lord, that after this battle, there won't be any ships of war left anywhere?"

"There will be the Japanese, Chinese, and American navies," said Beresford, "and some things known as the Marina Espagñola, with some inconsiderable Portuguese and Dutch ships. Europe will then have to fight with her Atlantic greyhounds."

Still Hardy did not smile.

"And what are our best ships, my lord?" he said.

"Our best ships are good," replied Lord Charles Beresford. "We have the Illustrious, the Hood, the Anson, the Trafalgar, the Royal Sovereign, on board of which you will bear the joint direction of the battle, though I am sorry to say without a Flag Captain—also the Centurion, the Nile, the Benbow, the Hero. You will see in a few minutes for yourself. Not all the most modern of the modern, perhaps—but all good ships and true."

"There won't be much of them left after the battle, my lord," remarked Hardy.

This was obvious. Lord Beresford coughed. And he said:

"I suppose not. But now—the case being as I have explained to you, what are your ideas as to a plan of battle, and so on?"

For some time Hardy was silent, perusing the ground. Afterwards, he said:

"To be candid, my lord, I have no idea, not a single one. Or rather, I have One."

"Very good, Mr. Hardy; let me hear it, and we will then confer together upon it."

Digitized by Google

"My idea is this, sir," said Hardy, "to ask you to let me take a cruiser, or a pinnace, and go to the foreign fleet with a flag of truce to try and persuade them, by hook or by crook, to go back again to their own country."

"My good Mr. Hardy!" broke from Lord Charles' lips.

"You are astonished, my lord," said Hardy. "You guess that I am as fond of a fight as anyone, and you did not quite expect to hear that sort of proposal from me. But I make it seriously to you, and in doing so, I forget my own inclination, and even I forget the glory of England. I am thinking of the good of the whole world. The fact is, sir, I happen to know more of the actual conditions of the present and the near future than you do, and therefore see things in different proportions. I say to you, Lord Beresford, that mankind is at this moment in by far the greatest fix in which it has ever been since the first man stepped; and how it is going to get out of it, God only knows. You think you have been having a great war in Europe, and so you have.

"But this little great war of yours is not anything compared with what is coming upon you, sir. Believe me, for I know, or I would not say it. It has been man warring with man all the time, has it not? But how if all the devils in Hades, myriads of them, my lord, suddenly break loose upon you?

"It would be an easy thing for four millions of yellow men, with a proper leader, to conquer Europe in its present state. But it is not four millions which are coming; it is four hundred millions; and every single one of them a devil, as I say, vomited from below. I have just come from China; and that is what I have to tell you, sir."

As Hardy ceased, he lifted his hitherto careless eyes, and now there was a flash in them; in the face of the other was horror, query, incredulity.

There was a dead silence. Lord Beresford had of old been himself one of the preachers of "The Yellow Danger;" but he had preached it as a theory, afar off. When he was told that it was here—had come — it shocked and appalled him as though he had never once heard of such a thing.

In the midst of the silence, there was a knock, and the Admiral's Flag-Lieutenant entered the room. He said:

"The Indefatigable has steamed into harbour, sir, and signals that the enemy are now passing through the Straits."

A chain of four British cruisers, going and coming within signalling distance of one another, the remotest keeping watch upon the movements of the enemy, the nearest in touch with Portsmouth, had been told off for this duty two days previously.

"We must be looking alive, then," said Lord Beresford. "The words you have spoken, Mr. Hardy, are terrible; and the course you suggest seems to me one almost requiring the authority of the civil powers. But now, you see, there is no time. I suppose I must take upon myself the responsibility of acceding to your views."

"I believe that England will approve our conduct, sir."

"Good. At the same time I can't say that I have much faith in the success of your expedition."

"I hope it will succeed, my lord. If it does not——"

"Well?"

"Then it will serve another end."

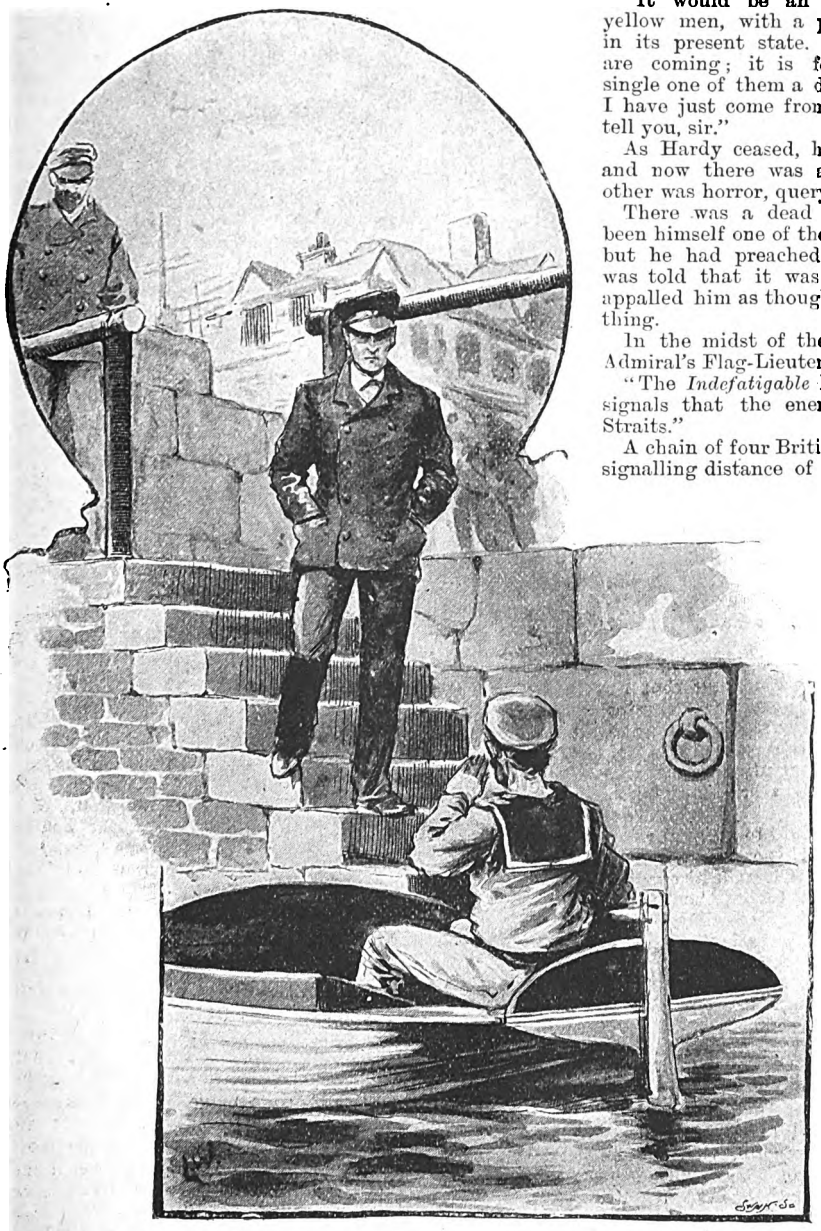
"What end?"

"I shall have a good look at the enemy's formation, forces, and disposition."

And at these words the eyes of the two men met.

And Lord Charles Beresford smiled.

And John Hardy, for the first time, smiled.



He was taken on board the Anson.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER XXVI.

The Greater Waterloo.

The ships lay in harbour with fires banked and steam at a quarter of an hour's notice.

The single signal "Weigh!" went up from the Anson, and ten thousand sailor-hearts went fluttering with awe as the fat chain-links, like processions of slow-footed sea-tortoises, came waddling clumsily in-board.

It was arranged between Hardy and Beresford that the plan of advance which the latter had long since determined upon should be put into execution and maintained, up to the time of Hardy's visit to the Allied fleet. If, after the visit, Hardy wished to take over the sole command, he would signal that fact throughout the fleet.

At noon exactly the ships steamed out. At once the news was flashed over all Britain, and an hour later the churches of the land, in village, town, and city, were thronged with worshippers, imploring the Almighty to protect His Witness in the earth, and not to forsake in the hour of her extremity that chosen Nation, His Servant, which had proclaimed the greatness of goodness, and, as far as her poor striving eyes could see, had loved Righteousness, and had hated Iniquity.

The ships passed Spithead massed in four columns in line ahead, flag and senior officers leading their columns, Hardy at the head of the starboard line in the Royal Sovereign, and Beresford at the head of the extreme port. Ships had stringent instructions to keep their speed, and maintain an exact formation. Six knots, eight knots, ten knots were signalled; and it was evident from the position of the steam cones that every ship had steam in plenty.

It was a bright early September day; but as often happens on such days, a bluish mist, which was half a mist, and half a luminosity, delicately veiled the distance.

Off Selsey Bill the second link of the chain of look-outs joined the fleet, an hour afterwards the third, and half an hour afterwards the fourth. The last, having come in at the rate of twenty-one knots, reported the enemy off Winchelsea, steering W. by S. in four lines abreast, the last line consisting mainly of troopships, and the whole occupying a vast breadth of sea midway between the French coast at Dieppe and the English at Winchelsea. In half-an-hour everybody of any rank in either fleet had a glass at his eyes.

It was the head signalman of the Royal Sovereign who first sent a thrill through his ship by reporting that he could make out something to eastward; and five minutes later every glass could detect the enemy, faint and toy-like in the vague haze as mirage, or the other-world hues of soap-bubbles. The fleets were then twenty miles apart, and it was just after four, the day being as bright and hot as ever.

John Hardy, the glass at his eyes, said to a signal midshipman, an old Britannia ship-mate of his own age:

"I want No. 98. Have her signalled alongside at once."

No. 98 was a quite new first-class torpedo-boat, the fastest thing in the British navy, and the first of her build. Only 130 tons in displacement, she yet had a length of 160 feet, and an I.H.P. of 2,800. She steamed, or rushed, at the rate of 27 knots, and while she was doing it, her crew were not comfortable, and the sea in all her neighbourhood changed colour. John Hardy, before he stepped aboard her, took the precaution to drape himself from head to foot in oil-skins.

Away, then, in a few minutes, drove No. 98 at full speed, swaying in a horrible vibratory heave of her flanks, like a charger who has galloped all day, and at night-fall he sprawls with drooped neck at the inn-gate, the sweat reeking on his rocking ribs; so drove No. 98, groaning for speed, seeming far too frail for the power that pumped and travailed within her rocking ribs.

Eastward she flew, a mere white spectre of hurrying foam; and within this shroud of spray, Hardy in his oilskins lay flat on his face, his left arm round an upright at the extreme bow, a double spy-glass at his eyes. From the mast-head amidships floated a large white flag.

As soon as No. 98 was seen to shoot ahead of the fleet, Lord Beresford signalled slow speed, and the fleet proceeded at a mere crawl through the water, this having been previously agreed upon. It was Hardy's idea that the enemy were probably ignorant of our exact forces, and that something might possibly be gained, when the facts of the battle unfolded themselves, by keeping them in this ignorance as long as might be. Hence a nearer approach was for the present avoided.

In thirty-five minutes Hardy was on the deck of the Allied Admiral's ship, the ship being the Andrea Doria, and the Admiral, in virtue of seniority, Admiral Prémesnil, the Grand Duke Alexis being second in command.

He was led, his face half enveloped in the throat-flap of the oil-skin, and the water streaming to his feet, into the Admiral's quarters. Prémesnil, a tall man, with grey hair, and a stately courteousness of manner, sat opposite to Hardy, supporting a thoughtful brow on thumb and finger.

"May I ask, sir," said Hardy, "are you fairly well acquainted with English?"

"Fairly well, sir," answered Prémesnil; "and that is not a confession, but a boast."

He bowed. Hardy bowed.

"Well, sir," said Hardy, "I come to you to make a proposal of peace. But before I can say anything, I must ask you to slacken your speed, so as not to approach too near to my fleet during our talk. Our fleet is almost stationary. I ask the same of you."

"It shall be done, sir. But first let us understand who we are. I, as you guess, am the Admiral-in-Chief here Admiral Prémesnil. Who are you?"

"I have the joint-command of the British fleet," said Hardy, "in collaboration with Lord Charles Beresford. My name is John Hardy. I speak for myself and my colleague."

"Might I ask—Hardy of Shoreham fame?"

"Yes, sir."

"Good. Then I shall at once comply with your request as to speed, and order you a glass of wine. You have had a good drenching, I see."

The Admiral touched a button, and gave an order to an officer as to speed. But Hardy declined the wine.

He put his brow on his hand, and he began to talk slowly and gravely in his plain, strong Saxon, unfolding to the Admiral why he was there, going into the minutiæ of the Chinese character, prophesying in simple English, but with the conviction and effusion of a Hebrew Seer, the doom of Europe.

He spoke for half-an-hour without interruption. And when he was finished, the Admiral sighed, for he was weary, and he was wondering what all this was about, and when it would end. He did not believe a word of the matter.

The thought occurred to him: "Can this be a ruse to keep back the battle till darkness comes on?"

His manner stiffened. He was hopelessly narrow and technical; he lacked both sight and insight.

"And what are your proposals, sir?" he said.

"I have made them!" said Hardy.

"But not seriously—come now."

Hardy leapt to his feet, flushing.

"Do you reject them, then?"

"In my own name, and in the name of my colleagues, without consulting them, most decidedly—yes."

"Then, sir, we will fight you."

"Since nothing else remains, Mr. Hardy."

"I say you bonjour, monsieur."

"Good day, Mr. Hardy."

They bowed. Hardy passed through the door, his brow very pink, the Admiral following.

Digitized by Google

Again they bowed as Hardy passed down the ship's side; and never met again.

Back tore No. 98 to her own fleet, Hardy lying at her stern with the glass held steadily to his musing eyes.

To the surprise of the fleet, the torpedo-boat, instead of returning to the starboard column, made for the extreme port, steering for the Anson.

At this time Hardy, stung by the French Admiral, and excited at the near approach of battle, was flushed in face, and about him was something of his natural look of youth. His blood was up. He had come into contact with the realities of the case—the very realities to which his own inner nature was akin. Here he was at home, among familiar things, which he could manipulate without fail. His nature, as it were, rose and buckled on its sword, feeling its force, not doubting its dowry. He was prepared now for any responsibility. His soul recognised and acknowledged itself, and his eyes were bright. He was a Hero.

His face half enveloped in the throat-flap of the oilskin.

As other men discover theories and apply them to facts, so he, on contact with facts, evolved theories. He had formed a plan of the battle.

He ran up to the Anson's side with alacrity. And as he was hurriedly met by Lord Beresford, he hurriedly said:

"These people will have nothing to do with peace, my lord. The thing now is to beat them."

"I heartily agree, Mr. Hardy. Am I to understand that, having seen their disposition, you are prepared to take over the sole command?"

"I am willing, my lord."

"Good! And have you come to tell me that?"

"No. I came to save you a journey to my ship, as I was already abroad from mine. What I want is a meeting of all captains and commanders in your ward-room at once. But it must be at once."

Beresford instantly turned, and sent a middy packing with the order; the flags climbed up, and a flotilla of forty-three hurried boats came converging over a wide space of sea.

They were soon all on board, and gathered in the ward-room. Beresford, half-rising from his chair, said: "Mr. Hardy will speak on my behalf and on his own, gentlemen," and sat down again.

Every one of those assembled eyes rested critically upon Hardy as he rose, he in his wet oil-skins, they all in uniform, prepared to pass judgment upon him as seaman, as general, as man.

Would he not hesitate, or blush, or strut, or stammer? Would he not show himself blatant, or timorous, or crude, or uninitiated?

They none of them felt absolutely sure of him. Only Hardy felt absolutely sure of himself, standing on fact. He rose with the self-assurance and the self-unconsciousness of Cromwell, four-square to his place and his hour.

This is what he said:

"We have not much time for talk, gentlemen, as the enemy must now be approaching us at the rate of eight or ten knots, and I do not want them to come too near before I tell you what I think. Lord Charles Beresford has calculated that they outnumber us by three to one, and that is just about the truth. Now, I am not at all sure that you will all absolutely agree with what I am going to say about that; but, personally, I am quite certain of my ground. They are three, I say, and we are one. Well, suppose three men attack me in the street, what would be the best thing, and what would be the worst, which I could do? The best thing I could do would be to set my back against a wall, face them, and try to drive away at them; the worst thing, would be to get in the middle of a triangle formed by them. We agree, of course, as to that; and hence the horror which all military people have of the phrase: 'between two fires.'

"But surely, gentlemen, with a ship it is different! On land you must not be too bold, for then you become rash; but on board a ship, I give it as my opinion, that the rasher you are, the better the chance you have! Why, let me ask you, ought I to try to get my back against a wall, if three men attack me in the street? There is no other reason than this: that I have only got one face and two hands. If I had three faces, and six hands, the best thing I could do would be to get in the middle of them, and try to finish them all off, before any two could attack me in one quarter.

"Now, a ship has four faces—a bow, a stern, and two sides—and under each of these a gallant number of hands. I believe now, whatever the books on naval tactics may say, that you will be on my side in this matter, for one, of course, must not go by books, where so much is at stake.

"But I do wish to convince you quite fully. Let me point out to you, then, that the modern battle-ship, as distinct from the old-time ones, is a far more potent thing as an attacking than as a self-defensive machine. The Camperdown rammed the Victoria as they were playing about together, and down, with hardly a sigh, went the Victoria, like lead. If you were to armour a battle-ship to resist the attack of a 111-ton gun, that ship would sink without troubling anyone to fire the gun off. And what does this prove? It proves that if three ships attack one, the best thing which that one can do is to to turn three faces simultaneously to those three ships, and batter away at them with her hundred hands, making sure that, not one, but four, ships will have disappeared when the smoke clears. In other words, the one ship must get in the middle of the three. It is a question of Time.

"Of course, gentlemen, if a ship could float with only one side, then it would be of great importance for her to avoid getting 'between two fires.' But when one side is broken, both sides sink, and it is of no consequence whether or not the other side is broken, too; while it is of consequence that that other side should, before it sinks, be sinking an enemy's ship. It is a question of Time.

Digitized by Google

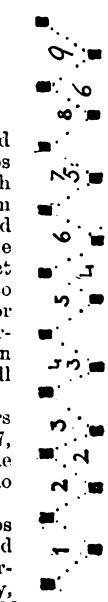
"I hope I make myself clear. I am led to express these thoughts to you, because they have just been passing most vividly through my own head; and they have been doing so in consequence of the sight I have had of the enemy's fleet.

"The arrangement of that fleet you already partly know. The important point is this: that their first and second lines abreast consist of two rows of battle-ships, the first numbering ten, and the second nine. Now these are arranged in echelon; so that you get a series of nine triangles with their bases toward us, and their apex away from us, as you see in this drawing which I have made, marking the names of ships as far as I could determine, or guess them."

A paper roughly marked with a diagram like the following was handed round:

"Now, gentlemen, since we have just nine battle-ships, we have it in our power to make a dash into these nine triangles, and fire away; but in that case, every second Allied battle-ship in the front line would be attacked by two, instead of one British ship; and we really have not the material to spare for these luxuries. No: what I propose is that we spread ourselves out, so that six of our battle-ships shall occupy the whole length of the French line abreast; and in that case, as the diagram shows us, our extreme starboard ship will find herself running into a foreign triangle, base facing; our second ship into a quite distinct foreign triangle, apex facing; our third ship into a third foreign triangle, base facing; and so, for the six ships, base facing, and apex facing, alternately. Thus our six ships will engage eighteen distinct foreign ships; and the foreigners will have one ship left; and we shall have—three.



"Now, that one left ship of the foreigners I wish to have attacked by torpedo-boats No. 47, No. 53, and No. 98 at the same moment, the instant the battle commences. They are to do nothing else till that one ship is in the air.

"Well, with regard to our three battle-ships left, it is chiefly to tell you what I think should be done with them that I have called this hurried meeting. Gentlemen, it seems to me, really, that a perfectly whole and sound ship, suddenly and unexpectedly entering a battle when it is more than half over, must be not only a tremendous weapon in herself, but must necessarily be the cause of a tremendous demoralization in the minds of her enemies. Hence it is that I grudge the time taken up by every word that I am now speaking.

"The enemy is not quite certain of our numbers—they do not know that we have these three ships. I therefore want these three, at once, to retreat westward under forced draught till they see the smoke of the battle, and then, making a detour, to get behind the enemy's troopships, and dash among them from the east. I have very good reasons for knowing that, this time, it is not a matter of supreme national importance whether the foreigners land upon English soil, or not; but still, we do not want the people of Britain to be saying that they had a fleet, and it was not good enough to clear the seas of foreigners. The three ships will therefore worry among the troopships, sinking all they can—on this clear understanding, that they be not careful to destroy straggling ships, that they waste little time, that they dash as soon as may be into the general battle, and finish the destruction of the enemy.

"The three ships which I tell off for this duty are the Centurion, the Benbow, and the Hero.

"With regard to the method to be adopted by the Six, the three which enter a triangle-base will, after as much fight as possible without lowering speed in the middle, pass through and ram the apex; then if possible, and if need be, reform, return, and fight. The three which enter their triangles by an apex, will ram the apex, enter, and fight.

"One of the greatest horrors of modern sea-battles I believe to be the danger we are all in of doing injury to our own ships. But this time we shall be so spread out, that nothing of that sort is likely to happen—to battle-ships at least. But to captains and commanders of cruisers and composite vessels I recommend that reflection. For they, passing into the third line of the enemy, will have a thicker fight, which, I hope, will be conducted on the same principles as those I have enunciated for battle-ships.

"That is all I had to say, and now we must look sharp, I think, especially those Three. I wish you success and good-bye. After all, ships are dead things; it is not ships that fight a battle, but men; and everyone knows that we have the right men. Nice steering, dash, and plenty of quick thunder: that, I think, is much. We ought to be able to destroy this foreign fleet. I have seen their Admiral-in-chief, gentlemen, and he certainly did not look to me as if he knew much about ships and fighting."

A noise of laughter ran round the room. Already the magic of Hardy's plain, but dashing and fascinating personality, had caught and won his colleagues. It was impossible not to see, by the faces around him, that he was approved. He possessed the faculty of making men work with enthusiasm for him.

"What about the battle-word?" said a captain, as they turned to troop away.

"Suppose we say Trafalgar?" said Hardy.

"Trafalgar has been already used three times during the war," said Lord Beresford. "I had decided upon another, Mr. Hardy."

"What, my lord?"

"Shoreham," answered Lord Beresford.

And a murmur of "hear, hear," as the officers busily shook hands, spread half-way up the stairway; and Jack, a short while afterwards, knowing who now led him, received the signalled word with high enthusiasm.

(To be continued.)

WAR BETWEEN SPAIN AND AMERICA!

Now that hostilities between these two nations have at last broken out, you should at once secure a copy of Pearson's Weekly dated May 7th, which contains not only a brilliant illustrated article, showing the relative military and commercial strength of the two countries, but the first instalment of a powerful serial story, entitled:

"CONTRABAND OF WAR."

By M. P. SHIEL.

The scene of this story is laid chiefly round about the identical places where the fighting at the present moment is going on. A more up-to-date and thoroughly crisp, sparkling serial story is yet to be written.

PEARSON'S WEEKLY* costs One Penny, And is published every Saturday.

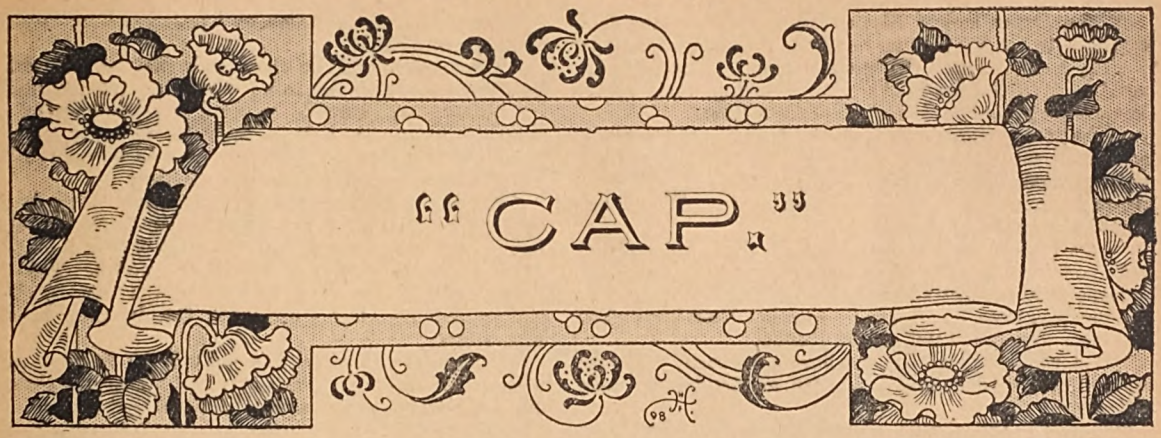
Digitized by Google



"CAP."

"That reminds me of an incident that occurred while I was out in Australia," said uncle Dick. "Did I ever tell you how Captola won her husband? No? Well, I'll tell you now.

"It was an early September morning in the late sixties. The summer rains had made vegetation rank, and the long grass was then thickly matted brown and dry as powder.

"I had been given orders for branding a herd of steers, and as I came to the porch I discovered Cap in her dingy old riding habit, sitting on the edge swinging her feet, her pony browsing just in front of her, and beside her was Henry, the owner of the big 'Home' ranch and her affianced lover. He was earnestly begging the girl to comply with some request.

"'Please, Cappie, yield to me this time.'

"'But I want the gloves and whip.'

"'I'll buy you a gross of silver-mounted whips and a dozen pairs of Jouvin's best—import them especially for the purpose—if you will give up riding at the fair.'

"'That would be a circumstance, wouldn't it?' flashed Captola. 'I could shake them under Miss Oates' nose and say, "There! just see what I got for letting you win the prize." No, Hal, it isn't the gloves or the whip, but a mean little ambition I want to gratify. That woman called me a hoyden, an uncultivated little heathen, and said I couldn't ride a bit. I don't mind the hoyden and heathen. I suppose I am both; but I can ride, and mean to do it.'

"'Little girl, you hurt me when you talk so thoughtlessly.'

"'And you hurt me cruelly,' she cried passionately, as she turned her flashing eyes upon him. 'I am ashamed to acknowledge how much. I fancied you loved me, but you don't. When you see me beside your mother and your incomparable sisters, and—and that horrid prim Miss Oates, you get ashamed of me, and want to bring me to the level of your social world; but you can't do it. I should die under the cultivating process. So you—I think—you can have your ring back,' and with a little sob Captola began to tug at her ring, but Henry caught her hands.

"'My dear little wild bird, I love you. I am years older than you, but I never said that to a woman till I met you. I am graver and quieter than you are, but I like your sunny nature, your winning ways. My mother and sisters do not know you as I do, and they want me to marry Miss Oates. They are looking for flaws in my gem, and I don't want them to have a chance to think they have found one. It is such a trifle I have asked you. Your father is away; there is no one to attend you, as you utterly refuse my escort unless I desert my mother and the other ladies, which I cannot do.'

"Henry paused.

"'No,' Cap replied angrily, as she jerked her hands away. 'They may take me as I am or not at all. If mamma had lived I might have been different, but I've only had dad, and he likes me best as I am. I never would have thought of riding at the fair, only when we were all out on horseback riding one night after Miss Oates first came, she said, purposely for me to hear, that "sticking on" was not good riding by any means, and made fun of my "old-fashioned" riding habit.' And Cap's tears splashed down on the dingy black calico.

"'You are much prettier in it than Miss Oates is in hers,' returned Henry warmly.

"'Oh, yes!' said Cap mockingly, 'much prettier; but you don't want to see me match my skill against her grace; but I will; and I will win the whip and gloves, so now!'

"'Then we will discuss the matter no further.'

"'Adieu, then, sir, until this afternoon, and remember,' she called, as she vaulted on Bret's back and turned to go, 'after to-day, I mean to show that dad has as much money as anybody. I don't care for dress, but if you do you shall be pleased,' and with a saucy kiss from her finger tips she rode away.

"Miss Oates and some of the city girls were going to ride for the prize, properly chaperoned, of course, and Captola had suddenly decided that she would ride too. The rules for entry required saddles, a piece of harness Cap scorned, and, besides her riding alone, Henry feared that she would be defeated by Miss Oates, who was extremely graceful in the saddle, and he knew that would nearly break Cap's heart. He was not aware that Cap had a thoroughbred Australian mare of her father's in training, and a saddle, or that she had added to her wardrobe an almost conventional habit. Captola was so nearly perfect that I verily believe she could have ridden on that saddle standing on her head."

Uncle Dick stopped to chuckle quietly at the remembrance.

"When afternoon came the fair grounds were crowded. I was there, and watched for Captola. Suddenly a little buzz of comment called the attention of all as Captola rode up unattended.

"She was a beauty. Her slender black mare was full of go, and impatient to be off. Cap was as slim and willowy as a cottonwood sapling in her close-fitting black velvet habit. She had put up all her curls under a little black velvet hat, round which was a long ostrich plume.

Digitized by Google

"Miss Oates looked like a thundercloud. She had expected to see the girl on her little mustang and in the old black calico habit she usually wore. Henry smiled, and went to her instantly with a loving word, and I knew the clouds had disappeared for a time.

"The tournament began; up and down, round this way and back that, under the coppery sky the ladies rode, then paused. The judges were undecided, so they went through their paces again. No decision. The ladies would please change horses.

"Cap was off Rondo in an instant, but many of the ladies demurred. Miss Oates positively refused to mount anything but her own thoroughbred trained animal. The contest narrowed to Cap and two other bush-bred girls, but even they dared not mount Rondo.

"Cap rode each of the six horses in turn. As she changed the seventh and last time to Rondo, she rode up to me.

"'Uncle'—she always called me uncle—'don't you smell the bush fire?' she asked uneasily.

"'Yes; but it's across the creek. It can't reach us,' I replied.

"'I was thinking of the school-house,' she replied hurriedly, as the judges called. 'School began in Henry's district yesterday, and his sister let her little daughter go with Rose Williams to-day.' And then she rode into the ring.

"I looked at my watch—half-past three—then over to the north. The smoke was rolling up black and thick. I could see an eating line of red; the air was dense and heavy with the smell of burnt grass. If the wind should rise—just then a puff lifted my hat—yes, the schoolhouse was in great danger if the wind veered a point or two.

"I heard a shout of pleasure, and turned to see the judge hand a silver-mounted whip to Cap. She turned her head to look at me, and beyond me she saw the clouds of smoke. She brought the whip down on the flanks of the mare, and, quivering with fright, Rondo reached me in two leaps.

"'The Gill schoolhouse!' gasped Cap, pointing with her whip.

"Up to that moment the bush fire, so common a thing, had not been noticed. In a moment all was confusion. Miss Oates screamed, Mrs. Merriam, Henry's sister, fainted, and his mother turned white. In an instant Henry was out of the buggy with his hands upon Rondo's neck.

"'May I take her, Cappie? Nellie is over there.'

"Cap slid down. The saddle was flung off, and cutting the mare with the silver-mounted whip which Cap thrust into his hand, Henry was off, followed by half a dozen mounted men.

"Just then Cap heard a whinney, and a cold nose was thrust against her face. With a scream of joy, she threw her arms about Bret's neck! Her faithful little pony had broken its hobbles, and followed its mistress. Catching the trailing rope, Cap tied it bridle-fashion in the halter; then slipping out of her velvet riding skirt, and tearing off her gloves, she said to me as she jumped on Bret:

"'I know a short cut below the ford; perhaps I can help,' and was off.

"I followed in the buggy. Cap reached the school-house. The fire-guards were forty feet wide, and the teacher and his pupils had burnt the grass about the building, and felt safe in the school-house. The teacher said he would not let the children go till all danger was passed.

"'She cried to go home, so I permitted her to do so about three o'clock.'

"The teacher told me afterwards that he thought he had been struck by lightning when Cap got her breath.

"'Idiot!' she blazed, 'to let a little town-bred six-year-old child go half a mile through the bush by herself. Why, she isn't tall enough to see over the blue stem in the grass;' and she dashed away.

"At the ranch only the frightened housekeeper appeared. Nellie had not come! Cap rushed into the house and seized a handful of matches and a blanket from a pile that was airing in the porch. This she dipped into the watering trough as she flew by; then she jumped on Bret again, with the dripping blanket before her.

"'The little mischief has gone down in that gully where we found the rabbit's nest, and if the wind changes one atom to the north-west we are doomed,' was her one thought as she dug her heels into Bret's steaming sides.

"Sure enough, as she neared the bank of the gully, she saw a head of dark curls, and a little girl clambering and crying up the steep banks. Cap slid to the ground, and gathered the frightened waif in her arms. It was too late to ride from the fire! With all the strength left her she struck Bret a stinging blow.

"'Go home, if you can,' she cried, and the snorting animal fled before the flames, now hot upon them.

"Cap struck matches, and threw them into the ravine. The fire leapt up and ran over the bank towards the creek. Down over the hot embers, hands and feet blistering, and the child in her arms screaming with pain, Cap crept, dragging the wet blanket with her. The oncoming flames swept to the edge of the gully, and hungrily licked up the bits of dry grass left. They singed Cap's hair and scorched her face. She could barely keep the frantic child under the blanket, and could not save herself.

"The roar and crackle died away towards the creek, the air cooled a little, and then came unconsciousness.

"Just at dusk we found them. The men had all taken the bridge road, two miles round, but Bret and Cap had gone right down over the rocky hill and across the stream, dangerous to ford at the proper place, doubly dangerous there; but they had dared and won.

"Henry and his men rode right into the jaws of death in the blue stem along the creek, and had to retreat till the flames had exhausted themselves at the water's edge.

"We found Bret first. He had stumbled in a dog hole, broken his leg, and died in the fire. After a search of four awful hours we found Cap. Through the gathering gloom the crying of the child guided us to her. The wet blanket had saved Nellie, but poor Cap was nearly dead. She had lost all her yellow curls. Her face was blistered, and her eyes swollen and shut.

"She was wandering a little in her mind, and when Henry gathered her up in his arms she put her blistered little hands about his neck, and said sorrowfully:

"'If I'd only had a mother perhaps I should be different.'

"'Thank God you are your dear, loving little self,' Henry replied, with grave tenderness, as he drew her disfigured face close to his loving heart.'

"It was a baptism of fire, but it burnt lots of dross out of several natures, and blazed a safe and sure path for two of the best people I ever knew.

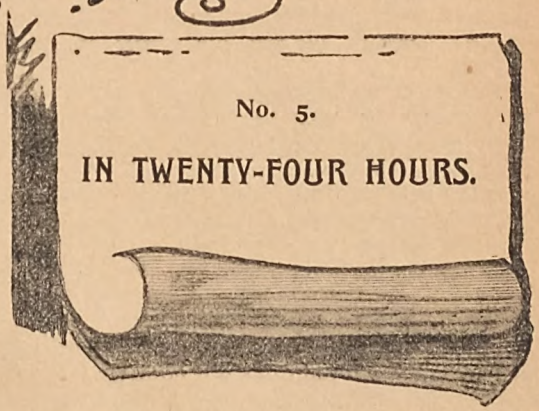
"Yes," concluded Uncle Dick, "I shall always insist that 'knowing how to gallop' was in this instance a very desirable accomplishment, even if not according to the 'English method.'"

GERALD BLAKE.

Digitized by Google

STORIES OF THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

UNEARTHED AND RE-EDITED BY ROBERT MACHRAY.



HENRY FARMER took a last look over a sheet of figures which he held in his shaking hand; the deep lines about his eyes and the trembling lips showed the unmistakable signs of some cruel mental strain he was undergoing—his whole attitude, indeed, was one of deep dejection.

Opposite him stood his clerk, who, by his air of gloom, mirrored back, as it were, only too faithfully the wretchedness of his master.

"Do you see any way, John?" Farmer asked for the hundredth time. "Do you see any way? But there is no way," and the words sounded like the moan of one dying, so hopeless, so despairing were the speaker's accents.

"No, sir—there is no way," echoed the clerk.

A half memory of some phrase about the bitterness of death came into Farmer's mind. He felt that the bitterness of living, so far as his present position was concerned, was infinitely worse.

"I wish I were dead," he said, uttering what was in his mind.

"I would not give way, sir," said his servant. "Why, the man who is on top to-day will be at the bottom to-morrow, and the man who was at the bottom yesterday is on the top to-day. I feel sure that you will master your difficulties before long."

"I have no such hopes," responded Farmer; "and in any case, as you know quite well, there is no possibility of my meeting my engagement to-morrow. There is no escape from the posting of my name to-morrow morning on the blackboard of the Stock Exchange as a defaulter."

The clerk only sighed. What his master said was true. During the past two weeks he had been well aware that nothing short of a miracle would save his master's credit. No miracle had happened, and the worst was come.

In those days when the whole of Europe was once more plunged into the horrors of war by Napoleon, the prices of all securities dealt in on 'Change varied very considerably, and there was always a chance, and something more than a chance even, for a daring swimmer in these troubled waters to make some great haul.

But where others had succeeded, Farmer had failed. When he had become a member of the Stock Exchange he was possessed of a considerable fortune, which he had inherited from his father. Through one mischance or another, he had managed to lose every penny of it, so that now his ruin was complete.

For him it had been one long losing game, with but few breaks of good luck. One melancholy satisfaction, however, was his, and that was that he had fought the game all through with honesty and courage. He had played it squarely, like a man. This had brought him not a few friends, to whom if he had gone earlier he might have applied for assistance and received it. A sort of stubborn pride had prevented him from doing so.

It had been a sweltering hot day in June—the 20th of June, in that great year of this century, 1815, to be exact. It was now late in the afternoon, and the streets in the neighbourhood of the Stock Exchange were deserted, partly owing to the hour and partly to the oppressive sultriness of the air. Most of the brokers and dealers had gone to their homes in the suburbs, or out of town altogether. It was too late to look for help, even if he had wished to do so.

Digitized by Google

Once more Farmer went over the list of figures, looking and longing for some loop-hole of escape, but prospect of deliverance was there none. He could even see now quite clearly in his mind his name chalked up on the blackboard, the gibbet of the Stock Exchange.

What made his case more poignant was that about a month before this fatal time he had become the accepted lover of a young lady whom he regarded as the most beautiful and accomplished in the world. She was infinitely dear to him, and he believed with all his soul that she regarded him as infinitely dear to her.

Those who knew the young lady to whom Farmer was betrothed were more than half disposed to agree with him in his rapturous estimate of her charms. They contented themselves, however, by usually saying that she was a pretty creature, and a dear, and a sweet little soul, and so forth. As to what her character really was beneath her airs and graces, no one had any idea.

Nothing so far had occurred in the life of Miss Charlotte Dunbar, who was Farmer's sweetheart, to show whether she had any character at all. Now she was to be suddenly subjected to a cruel test.

Farmer was expected that night at the house of Alderman Dunbar, Charlotte's father, out at Kew. As a man of honour, he felt it was necessary that he should tell her the sorry plight in which he was, and break off the engagement between them at once. At first he thought he would send a letter. Then he told himself this would be cowardly, but in reality the face of the girl he loved came up before him with such an irresistible appeal, that he determined he must see her again, even if it were for the last time, and no matter at what cost to his own feelings.

When he reached the Alderman's mansion, he made his way in the warm dusk of the evening to a certain garden house in the grounds, where he had every reason to expect he would find his lady-love. She was waiting for him there—had been waiting for him some little time, and, though she greeted him with smiles of welcome, there was some hint of reproach upon her face.

Farmer's manner was so embarrassed, so troubled, that she knew at once that there was something seriously wrong with him.

"What is it, Henry?" she immediately asked, and placing her hand in his, seated him beside herself on the bench within the rustic arbour. "Tell me everything, I beg of you."

Henry Farmer had thought a good deal as he had driven along the road, of what he should say. His great anxiety was to spare her as much as possible, and he had framed a story which he hoped would gradually lead up without any harsh shock to the necessity that existed in his unfortunate position for the breaking off of their engagement. But at sight of her all his cunningly devised tale passed from his mind.

His agitation became extreme. After a piteous pause—and he felt the warm pressure of her hand on his through every fibre of his being, he said slowly and painfully:

"I should not have come. I had meant to be brave, and to prepare you as gently as I could for what I have to tell you. But I am not so strong as I thought I was. I have had much to try me lately."

"What is it, Henry? Tell me at once."

"I am ruined," he said desperately. "We must part, dear."

"Henry," was all she said, and now both hands clasped his.

There was a minute or two of silence, and then she said: "Tell me all about it."

Then he explained to her in a clear and simple fashion, so that she could thoroughly understand how he stood, that he had been unsuccessful in his speculations on the Stock Exchange, and that his fortune had been gradually dissipated by the various transactions he had been involved in.

The story, as a general thing, of a man's doings in that great centre of gambling, is not one that can be called romantic, or even very interesting, except to the person or persons most concerned in it. It is hardly one which is likely to fascinate a young girl, whose thoughts are naturally of pleasure and of all the brightness associated with the springtide of life.

Had it been anybody else's story but Henry Farmer's, Charlotte would have given it but scant attention; but as it was her lover's, she listened quite eagerly, helping him by a question here, or a sympathetic murmur there, as he proceeded with his tale.

"So you see, dear," concluded Farmer, who had grown much calmer as he went on with his narrative, "there is nothing for it but that we must part. I have no future to offer you. I am a defeated man, and you are made for success."

"Defeated, but not conquered, Henry, surely," said she, with unexpected firmness.

It was sweet to hear her speak.

"You must not give up, Henry," she continued. "You are young; we are both young. For myself, my whole life is before me; I can and will wait for you. Never fear that I shall desert you,—that is, if you love me as you have so often declared you do."

Henry groaned.

"You don't know quite what you are saying—what it means—the opposition of your father, the long waiting there must be even should he consent to the continuance of our engagement. It is very noble of you, but my duty, I fear, is quite clear."

"It surely lies with ourselves, Henry," she said. "I feel certain that your career will not end in this terrible way. You will get over it, and that before long."

And much more she said to the same effect, so that when he left her it was with lighter heart and firmer step. He still had her promise, and had agreed with her that he would say nothing to her father for the present.

But next morning, after a sleepless night, everything took on a different appearance. His position was so black, so overwhelming for the moment, that all the hope and confidence with which his sweetheart had filled him disappeared. The one ugly fact stood out above even the fact of her love for him. And that was that within the next two or three hours he must inevitably be posted on the blackboard of the Stock Exchange.

Digitized by Google

Almost mechanically he went as usual to his office, where his clerk had already arrived.

"You had better go and tell Tennant and the others that I shall not be able to settle with them this morning."

"There is no other way, sir?" asked the clerk.

Farmer merely shook his head.

Then he wrote a brief letter to the committee of the Stock Exchange, in which he said that he was unable to fulfil his contracts in the House.

Shortly afterwards the clerk was in the Exchange, where he found all its members assembled, busy settling their accounts with each other, some of whom were already beginning to feel some anxiety as to the absence of Henry Farmer. The clerk made his way to Mr. Tennant, the dealer with whom most of his master's transactions had been, and whispering to him drew him aside.

When Tennant heard what had happened he said:

"Well, I am not altogether surprised, for I cannot but know that Mr. Farmer has lost very heavily, and that for a considerable length of time."

Hardly had he uttered these words when the porter stationed at the door suddenly gave three loud and distinctly repeated knocks with a mallet. Instantly there was a dead silence.

The porter announced in the usual formula which obtains on such occasions that Mr. Henry Farmer presented his respects to the House, and regretted that he was unable to comply with his "bargains." In other words, Farmer acknowledged that he was not in a position to fulfil his engagements.

There was a moment's pause, then everything went on as if nothing had happened. Another man had gone down in the maelstrom of speculation, and the waves, having swallowed him up, showed no signs of it after the event. Scarcely a soul even looked at the blackboard on which was written Farmer's name.

When the clerk returned to the office, he found that Farmer had worked himself into a state of frenzy.

"What were they saying?" he asked.

When he was told what a small effect had been produced upon the members of the Stock Exchange by the news of his failures, he could scarcely believe that this matter, so all important to him, had made no greater sensation. As for himself, it was the only thing left in life.

Putting on his hat he went into the streets, and, scarcely knowing what he was doing or where he was going, wandered in the direction of London Bridge, staring in a crazed way into the faces of the people he met.

He was so full of his own trouble that he resented the interest in mere living shown by them in their alert movements. He dumbly wondered that the sun should shine with its accustomed glory, and he so wretched.

This was his frame of mind when at length he found himself standing by one of the parapets of London Bridge. The thought of suicide was not far away. "Why not make an end?" he asked himself.

Hardly struggling with himself, but drifting on along this current of morbid feeling, he was confirmed in it by the discovery that he had but a few shillings in his pocket, and by the reflection that this was all the money he had left in the world.

"Of what use is this?" he said, and flung the silver into the stream. In another moment he was on the parapet and was about to leap.

"You must not give up, Henry"—the words of Charlotte Dunbar came to him quite clearly, as if she had been standing by his side. Above the roar of the city, above the tumult of his thoughts, he heard her speak.

"It surely lies with ourselves, Henry"—that was the high note which she had struck. Again he heard her voice.

Weak and faint he fell back upon the pavement of the bridge.

Even as he fell, some one seized him by the hand and supported him, breaking the shock of the fall.

Farmer looked to see who had given him the helping hand. To his surprise and astonishment, the man who had come to his assistance was dressed in a foreign uniform and wore in his cap the white cockade which showed him to be a partisan of Louis XVIII. That monarch had been driven from Paris a short time before this by Napoleon after his escape from Elba.

"The Man of Blood of the Iron Island," was the title they had given Bonaparte when it was thought the powers had made an end of him. He had broken his bonds, and was now understood to be making a wonderful and magnificent stand—his last, as it proved.

"You are not well, my friend; is it not so?" asked the French officer. "It is indeed warm. Yet it should be a day of sunshine, a day of glory."

"A day of sunshine indeed," said Farmer, to whom the brightness of the day was a mockery.

"Yes, my friend," returned the Frenchman. "There is great news, wonderful news. The tyrant, the usurper, the devil—that Bonaparte, has been overthrown at last by your Duke of Wellington and by the Prince Blücher."

"Napoleon defeated? How do you know? Pardon me, there are so many rumours, and they nearly all prove to be false."

"This is no idle, lying rumour," said the officer. "I have it on the very best authority. See here, my friend, I have just come from the Embassy—the French Embassy—where my chief, the Count le Chartre, told me that Bonaparte had been annihilated in a great battle fought last Sunday not far from Brussels, There is no doubt whatever. Louis will now return to the city and sit on the throne of his fathers."

"How can the ambassador have heard this so quickly?" asked Farmer. "No one in London seemed to know anything about it a few minutes ago—at least, not in the City."

Digitized by Google

"A courier only arrived two hours ago; he had travelled from Ostend by a swift-sailing packet. After he had landed, he spared neither himself nor his horses to bring the intelligence to the Embassy. That is all I know, my friend."

"It is true, then?" said Farmer.

"Quite true—you may depend upon it," and the impulsive Frenchman shook hands with Farmer, exclaiming with joy, "The tyrant is overthrown."

It was in this way that Farmer heard of the Battle of Waterloo. Notwithstanding his dejection, the news of that great victory made him feel happier, and took him for a time out of himself. Suddenly a gleam of hope shone upon the miserable man.

"How many people in London," he asked himself, "had heard of Waterloo?"

An idea now came to him with lightning rapidity—all his despair and helplessness immediately gave place to quick and energetic action. He strode along the streets at the top of his speed towards his office, and yet not so quickly as to prevent him from regarding with some scrutiny the appearance of those he met.

No, there was nothing unusual in their aspect. Quite evidently these people did not know that a great battle had been fought, otherwise they would have certainly shown it in one way or another; and if they did not know—here, in the heart of the City, where everything, generally speaking, was known sooner than anywhere else—it was long odds that the Stock Exchange knew nothing of it either.

Having arrived at his office, he asked his clerk if there was any special news, or if there was any movement of an unusual character on 'Change. The clerk, who evidently thought that the question referred to his master's bankruptcy, replied that he had been in and out, but had heard nothing except some expressions of regret that Henry Farmer had succumbed.

Merely saying, "I think I have found a way out," Farmer dashed downstairs, and in two or three minutes was closeted with the senior partner of the great house of the Brownes, who were amongst the most influential members of the Stock Exchange, and who he knew were friendly to himself, and likely from what had already transpired between them in the way of business to place considerable confidence in him.

Mr. Albert Browne, on meeting Farmer, immediately took the opportunity of condoling with him on what had happened, and asked him why it was that he, Farmer, had not at least given them the chance of considering whether they should help him or not before the worst had taken place.

Scarcely pausing to thank Browne for what he had said, he asked him if had still sufficient faith in him to believe in what he was about to tell him, and to act on that belief by undertaking an extensive operation that morning on the Stock Exchange. He had received news, he said, and that from a source of absolute authority, of the very last importance—the result of which, if acted upon at once, would be undoubtedly a very successful piece of business.

But, before he would impart to him what he knew, he thought it only right that it should be on the distinct understanding that he was to receive one half of whatever profits—he was sure they would amount to a large sum—might be realised from the operation on 'Change.

"Otherwise, I presume," said Browne, "you will take the offer of this news elsewhere?"

"You could hardly expect me to do anything else," Farmer replied.

"I will make this bargain with you," said Browne, "if the news is as important as you say, I will either accept your offer—that is to give you half the profits that may ensue from what follows—or, if I do not consider the news important enough, I pledge my word to keep silence with regard to it, and not to be influenced by what you may tell me in any of our dealing to-day in the market."

The bargain was made. Without reserve Farmer told Browne exactly what had happened on London Bridge, and what the French officer had said.

Browne was convinced of the truth of what Farmer had told him, and resolved to take instant advantage of it. He rushed out into the street and succeeded in the course of half an hour in purchasing consols to a large amount.

In the meantime, Farmer, who had been greatly steadied by his satisfactory interview with Browne, and who already felt a different man from the wretched being who had meditated self-destruction on London Bridge only a few minutes before, had been thinking hard as to how he might further derive advantage from this unique opportunity.

Then it occurred to him that there was no reason why he should not make a bargain with another firm of stock-brokers similar to that he had made with Browne. He had given no promise to the latter not to communicate the all-important intelligence to another.

Having thought the matter over, he proceeded to another firm, that of Richards and Martin. There were no keener men of business in London than the two partners who traded under that name, and Farmer felt that if he could only succeed in convincing them that Waterloo had been fought and Napoleon overwhelmed, they would be ready to make even larger purchases than Browne.

Without losing any further time Farmer made his way to their private room, where he was lucky enough to find both men together. They had just come in to have lunch, which they were in the habit of having there, so that they could discuss the transactions they had undertaken during the early part of the day, and consider how they should proceed in the afternoon. They invited him to join them in the repast.

Here again he had to listen to the same commiseration for his fallen fortunes. "Why had he not asked them to give him a little assistance; it was a mistake to be too proud," and so on.

Digitized by Google

Farmer thanked them, and told them that if they desired to do so, to help him, he was in a position to allow them to do so with the greatest possible advantage to themselves. Then he made them an offer similar to that he had made to Browne, and it was accepted, on much the same conditions.

So, once again, he poured out the story, the almost miraculous story, that he had been told by the French ensign.

Both men listened to him with the utmost eagerness. If the story were true, there could be no hesitation as to the course to be followed, and that immediately. Not only would the Funds rise considerably, but every other class of security would be enormously enhanced in value. They must buy for the "rise."

But was it true?

It was not without some difficulty that Farmer managed at length to impress them with the confidence in the Frenchman's story he himself possessed.

But he did succeed in the end.

The two partners whispered for a moment together, and agreed that Martin was forthwith to go on to 'Change and to purchase £200,000 worth of Consols and other Government securities. Meanwhile, Richards was to stay with Farmer, and to prevent him, either by holding him in talk, or forcibly if need be, from leaving the room. He might tell someone else, and thus the market would be spoilt.

It seemed to Farmer that an impossibly short time had elapsed to allow of Martin having been in the market and returned, when he appeared, his face working with excitement, to say that there had already been heavy purchases of Consols during the last half-hour, and that the price had gone up three per cent. He was afraid to buy.

But Farmer, who knew that the increased price was in all probability the result of Browne's investments, declared that even a rise of three per cent. was not nearly sufficient to discount the effects of so tremendous a victory.

Urged by his own imperious necessities, he used such language that once more the two partners were persuaded. This time, however, they determined to stake what was practically the whole credit of their firm, and their entire deposits with their bankers, in the game.

Their purchases now were not to be by the hundred thousand, but by the million. Afterwards, when the whole affair was over, the partners confessed that they had never acted in such a rash manner before in their lives, and they solemnly swore never to do so again.

The immense amount of buying done by this firm, added to the high character it bore upon the Stock Exchange, drove Omnium—which a week before had been as low as 2 premium—up to 5. The market took on a look of subdued excitement, of waiting, of expectancy; but with the exception of Farmer, the Brownes, and Richards and Martin, no one had the least idea that one of the greatest and most decisive battles in history had been fought.

Late that same evening Colonel Percy, the aide-de-camp of the Duke of Wellington, arrived in London with dispatches from that general, giving a tolerably full account of the defeat of Napoleon. The ministers lost no time in communicating the joyful news to the Prince Regent, and the following morning a Gazette Extraordinary was published by the Government announcing the overthrow of the hated Bonaparte.

The news at first seemed too good to be true, but as fuller details were received—circumstantial details mentioning, for instance, the number of cannon taken on the field, doubt gave place to certainty, and the nation rejoiced with such rejoicings as had never been before witnessed in England.

The effect upon the Stock Exchange was electrical, amidst scenes, the excitement of which defy description, the price of the Funds went up by leaps and bounds, until a rise of fifteen per cent., the greatest rise they were ever known to experience, was registered.

Of course the Brownes, and Richards and Martin sold out what they had purchased on the previous day as near the top as they could get.

Farmer's share of the profits realised from the operations of the two firms in question on that one memorable occasion exceeded £100,000.

He returned next day to the Stock Exchange, where he liquidated all accounts in full—rather against the advice of some of the members, who declared that it would be considered an act of weakness to act in this manner.

It is further recorded of him that soon afterwards he married Miss Charlotte Dunbar; that he amassed a large fortune out of his speculations, which after Waterloo were marked by as great a success as they had been characterised by failure before it; that he purchased with the money he had realised, a large estate in the county of Middlesex; and having done this, he made a vow to leave the Stock Exchange alone for ever—a vow which he religiously kept.

(Next week: "Rothschild Outwitted.")

Some Books Worth Reading.

NOW READY.

PAUL BECK: The Rule-of-Thumb Detective. By M. McDonnell Bodkin, Q.C. Crown 8vo, cloth. Price 3s. 6d.

Paul Beck, the Rule-of-Thumb Detective, is an Irish Sherlock Holmes, with a very original yet logical method for the detection of crime. Hitherto we have had every species of detective, except an Irish one, and it has been reserved for Mr. McDonnell Bodkin to set right this injustice to the Sister Isle.

READY ON MAY 4th.

THE SHROUDED FACE. By Owen Rhoscomyl, Author of "Battlement and Tower," "The Jewel of Ynys Galon." Crown 8vo, cloth. Price 6s.

This is a tale of the time of Elizabeth, and the scene is placed in Wales. At that period many Welsh gentlemen took to the sea as rovers, finding their swordland on the Spanish main, as their fathers had found a swordland on the English marches.

The above books can be obtained at all Booksellers, and from the Libraries, or post free for the published price from C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., "Book Department," Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE RIVAL QUEENS.

A TALE OF OLD FRANCE RETOLD FROM THE FRENCH BY MARY FERMOR

SUMMARY.

Amaury Montruel, a knight, and Mahmoud-el-Reis, a Saracen, meet on the road to Paris. The former's mission is to kill the Queen of France; the latter's to kill the King. At the same time two children, Eric and Eve, are on their way to Paris to aid the Queen, and overhear the conversation of these two horsemen. Shortly afterwards a knight and his page give the children a lift on the road, and, on arriving at Paris, place them under the care of the Freemasons. Maître Samson, Montruel's secretary, tries to induce Tristan de Pamiers, king of the law students, to raise a rebellion in favour of Agnes de Méranie against Philip's consort, Queen Ingeburge. Albret, the King's page, takes Eve, alias Little Adam, to the King, who gives her permission to visit Ingeburge in her captivity in the Abbey St. Martin. Meanwhile Agnes de Méranie pays a visit to Notre Dame with Amaury Montruel, and stills the ominous cries of the people by distributing among them her paste jewels. In the cathedral she meets Mahmoud-el-Reis, who is carving a figure of the Virgin, and tries to win his regard by presenting him with pearls, which he crushes under his feet when she has gone. Returning from the visit to the cathedral, the members of the Royal party are intercepted by the Free-Lances, but are finally allowed to go on their way. Thinking this wild crew may be of future use to her, Agnes de Méranie determines to enlist the sympathies of their leader, Antoine Cadocu. To accomplish her object she visits him the same evening, accompanied by Montruel, in the low tavern in which he and his followers hold their nightly revels. She is very rudely treated, and returns with Montruel without having attained her object of enlisting the sympathies of Cadocu. Montruel's secretary, Samson, hints to the King that Agnes has been seen out late at night, and, although he confirms his suspicions, he does not allow Agnes to suspect his knowledge. During the sitting of a council appointed by the Pope to decide which of the King's two wives is his lawful consort, Montruel visits Mahmoud-el-Reis to urge him to fulfil his promise to murder Ingeburge without delay. In order to gain access to the Queen's presence, the two men arrange that Mahmoud shall feign sickness and be taken to the hospital attached to the Abbey, where the Queen is confined. Eric, being at work on the cathedral as a mason, overhears the plot and determines to save Ingeburge. Meanwhile the Saracen partakes of a drug which renders him unconscious, is conveyed to the Abbey by Montruel, and ministered to by the Queen herself. She is heavily veiled, and Mahmoud is unaware of her identity. He tells her of his misson to the Abbey, hearing which Ingeberge faints. In order to restore her, he raises her veil, and is surprised to find her to be the living image of his beloved Dilah, and her twin soul. For this reason he vows to protect her from all harm, even when Ingeburge confesses that she is the King's wife. After considerable delay Eric succeeds in gaining audience with the Prior, and tells him of the Queen's danger.

CHAPTER XVII.

The Twin Soul.

When the Moslem finished his story with the words "That is why I wished to kill the Queen," all sense of personal danger had left Ingeburge's heart, but she cowered under the mysterious power of this man's will, and in her tortured mind there rose visions of the King's dead body lying in one of those rooms at the Louvre that she had not been permitted to enter, pierced to the heart with that cruel, glittering weapon that flashed even now before her eyes. She could not even plead for her lord's life, her tongue was paralysed by the awful weight of fear.

But Mahmoud's voice softened as he saw the sorrow-stricken woman crouching at his feet, the passion faded from his face and the blood-lust died out of his heart. It was as if Dilah suffered at his hands, and as though she were pleading for her twin soul.

"I have sought in the Western Heavens for the shining star that Dilah watches when she utters my name ere seeking her couch, but the star is not there," he said. "The mystic cord which unites our hearts has thus been broken, and it is to replace our lost star that the kindly Fates have led me to the side of my beloved's twin soul. But what shall I say to Dilah," he broke off suddenly, "when she asks me what I have done to win her? When she bids me show her the infidel's blood that was to be the price of her hand? Will she not ask me if I am a true man, or a base coward, unworthy of a woman's love?"

As these thoughts coursed through his mind, Ingeburge remained silent, save for a stifled sob which now and then broke from her, but a powerful advocate was pleading her cause in this strange man's breast. Mahmoud-el-Reis had never before hesitated in the path of what he believed to be his duty, but now he had a hard battle to fight with himself. On the one hand was arrayed the promise of Dilah as his bride, the solemn oath which bound him and all members of his order to obey without flinching the master's orders, the wild fanaticism which is born in every son of the desert; while against all this was a dream, a mere sweet illusion, a

Passed the back of his hand over his burning forehead.

Digitized by Google

poetic fancy, fostered by the wealth of his artist's imagination.

The forces were unequally matched, but the weaker side was embodied in the form of a lovely woman, living, loving and weeping beneath his eyes.

Mahmoud-el-Reis loved with the intensity that characterised his whole being, and love mastered fanaticism—the embodied dream chased away even the vision of the incensed Lord of the Mountain, for behind his dark tyrannical face smiled the sweet eyes of Dilah with loving approval.

The fair daughter of the North seemed merged into one being with her dark-eyed, olive-skinned sister of the South, whom the Moslem loved with a love stronger than death.

He shook himself with an unwonted gesture of impatience, and passed the back of his hand over his burning forehead, then, turning to Ingeburge, he spoke out the tormenting thoughts of his heart.

"Listen, Queen. What does all that matter? She and you are but one soul parted in the flesh by the will of Allah. If I strike your heart, shall I not pierce hers? And if I raise my hand against the King, will not you fall beneath the blow?"

Though much of what he said was obscure to her, Ingeburge had that keen intuitive sympathy that so quickly establishes itself between those who love, and she could follow the workings of his mind sufficiently to grasp his meaning. She saw a ray of light shining in upon her soul's darkness, a gleam of hope in her hour of despair.

"Yes, yes. If the King dies, I die too," she said fervently.

"Then you must live!" cried the Moslem, "for if you died, would not Dilah, your twin soul, soon languish and fade in the tomb? Do I not know that you two share but one soul, and when I meet her there in the shady palm-grove, radiant and lovely in the joy of our reunion, I shall say:

"'My poniard was raised, the King's life was mine! I could have fulfilled my oath, and gained with one blow the joys which the Prophet has promised to his faithful children! I could have——'

"I can still do it!" he repeated almost savagely, as the old struggle once more threatened to assail him.

The Queen looked up at the sudden change in his voice and watched the workings of his face with breathless anxiety, but the dark mood passed and the invisible foe was beaten off for ever. The victory was gained, blind fanaticism gave way before love, tender pity broke the iron band that bound him to deeds of blood.

"Your King shall live, but he shall live to love you, I swear it by the name of the Prophet! And when I hold Dilah in my last embrace I shall say:

"Beloved, I return to a traitor's death, not to the nuptial feast; for I have given my life and my earthly bliss to save thy twin soul."

As he spoke these words in a kind of dreamy ecstasy, a sound was heard outside. Hasty steps were coming down the corridor, doors were being noisily opened and shut and voices were heard talking in excited tones. Ingeburge turned to listen, and the Syrian resumed his usual calm demeanour.

A woman's voice was heard among the rest, saying:

"This way, the Prior said it was here that he had brought Queen Angel!"

"Eve, it is Eve," murmured Ingeburge.

The door was forced open from the corridor and Eric dashed in.

"Look in every cell," cried a man. "If no one has gone out of the Abbey we must find the assassin."

"That is Eric's voice," said the Queen wonderingly.

The steps had reached the door, a hand shook it from outside and a voice exclaimed:

"This is the last cell! It must be here. Now we shall have the assassin!"

"Queen," said Mahmoud impressively, "if you wish to save the King's life, you would do well to protect mine, for he is threatened by other daggers than this."

"Eve, Eve," called Ingeburge, "I am here, come to me, my sister."

The Syrian said no more, but stood watching the Queen and calmly awaiting the issue of events. At the Queen's cry the door was forced open from the corridor and Eric dashed in, closely followed by Eve and half-a-dozen of the archers who formed the guard of the Abbey. An excited group of monks and lay-brothers remained outside, peering in with timid curiosity at the dreaded stranger.

The young Dane was armed with a dagger which he would have plunged into the Moslem's breast, but Ingeburge stayed his hand, and, hard though it was, he obeyed her. Eve was clinging convulsively to the Queen, as though to interpose her slender form between that of her mistress and the assassin's poniard. At any rate she was determined that if she might not die for her beloved sister Angel, she would die with her.

For a moment the guards stood paralysed at the sight of the man they had seen carried in senseless, and with Brother Martin had spoken of as being dead two hours before.

The Syrian was standing erect, in the full vigour of his manhood, with all his faculties of mind and body in perfect order.

Digitized by Google

He drew the dagger which he had sheathed.

It must be sorcery; he was in league with the Evil One. It were well to rid the earth of such a child of darkness, if only their weapons would avail in such a case.

Three or four archers sprang upon him, but he made no attempt to protect himself beyond raising his hand to push aside the halberd nearest to his breast, with as unconcerned a gesture as if he had been brushing off a fly.

Turning to Ingeburge he said, with dignity and calmness:

"Queen, you have to speak but one word to save my life! I await that gracious favour at your hands."

"Down with the assassin! He would kill the Queen! Down with him!" cried the frightened little crowd outside.

Ingeburge was touched by his confidence in her and she recognised his claim. She opened her lips to speak the word he needed, when the vision of him as he was an hour ago, fierce, cold and implacable, returned to her with overpowering force. She hesitated, the words would not come, her eyes again caught sight of the crystal poniard which he still held in his strong grasp.

"He is an infidel, how can I trust him? If I spare his life he will take that of Philip, my lord and husband!" she said to herself, as the horrible picture of the murdered King rose again before her eyes.

"Seize him!" she panted with a terrified shudder.

Still Mahmoud-el-Reis made no effort to defend himself, and though he was more than a match for his enemies, he submitted quietly while they bound him hand and foot with the ropes they had brought for the purpose. Then turning towards the Queen, his face softened by a sad smile, he murmured.

"I forgive you, for you have wronged me out of love to him! I read it in your eyes, and I forgive you for love's sake! You love well, indeed!"

While this little scene was being enacted in the cell, those without experienced a sudden shock. It was as though the ancient walls which had stood the test of time through three centuries, had shivered at the touch of some mysterious, unknown hand.

All eyes and thoughts were turned on the Moslem as the probable cause of this incident. He had summoned the powers of darkness to aid him in his hour of need! This was the first solution of the mystery that naturally suggested itself to the minds of timid, superstitious men, but stern fact soon proved that here was no invisible foe. A surging, shouting, motley throng of men, armed with any and every weapon they could lay their hands on, followed by a train of shrieking women, now surrounded the Abbey, and were battering the gates with unmistakable earthly violence, however much their motives might savour of demoniacal intent.

Most of the Prior's timid flock ran hither and thither in search of a safe hiding place, but a few of the more daring spirits ranged themselves alongside of the archers and sought to inspire their weaker brethren with something of their courage.

"Help! Help! The glorious Abbey of Saint Martin is attacked! To the rescue, one and all!"

Their efforts availed but little, and it was a very small, if resolute body that prepared to ward off the assailants.

The archers hurriedly left the cell, and only one or two monks remained with Ingeburge and Eve, while Eric constituted himself their guard. He hardly ever took his eyes from the expressive face and motionless form of the captive Syrian, and though he longed to go and take his part in the thickest of the fight, fear for his Queen, should she be left again in the power of this desperate man, prompted him to stay at his post.

Mahmoud-el-Reis, even when apparently most helpless, had the power of inspiring awe in those who had reason to fear him.

From time to time Eve thought she caught the name of "Ingeburge, Ingeburge," amongst the mad confusion of sounds. But who could dare to use the Queen's name at such a time?

The monks were too frightened to move, they felt danger coming nearer every moment, and yet they dare not flee before it. They prayed with all the fervour of their hearts, and asked who it could be that dared to invade so sacred a retreat! What heathen hords had over-run the realm, to bring back the horrors of Atilla or Genseric?

The only two who maintained anything like their wonted composure were the Queen and the Moslem. Her whole mind was still dominated by Mahmoud-el-Reis, she could not keep her terrified gaze from his face. His mission of death, his strange story of love, his generous abandonment of self, all kept coursing through her distracted mind, and keen pangs of self-reproach stung her as she looked at the bonds which her word had fastened on him.

More than once she was tempted to say to Eric:

"Cut those bonds! He is a true man, he has spared my life and has promised me that of the King! He alone can save the life of Philip Augustus!"

But the words failed to find utterance. The prejudices of her life and training were too powerful to give way permanently before a romantic sense of interest and admiration for a Moslem assassin.

So absorbed was she in her own mental struggle that the greater one going on below them made no impression on her. Every time she caught Mahmoud's eye, with its look of deep and resigned melancholy, her heart was touched, even though she trembled with fear. She felt as one gazing into some unfathomable abyss which no human eye can penetrate, and whose depths refuse to reveal the secrets which attract us.

He was huddled on the floor just as the guards had left him, passive and observant, too proud to ask for mercy, too much of a fatalist to experience fear.

The noise had become deafening, and it was evident to the listeners that the attacking force had succeeded in forcing an entrance by the great door of the Abbey.

Mahmoud's quick ear caught every variation of sound, and at this last developement a curious smile crossed his face.

Eric, who was watching his prey with eyes quickened by anxiety for those he loved, noticed this change of expression, and though he consoled himself with the thought that the Moslem was too securely bound to attempt an escape, he involuntarily felt a sensation of fear, as if this man knew of some new danger threatening Queen Angel. The Syrian's smile gave a fresh significance to the tumult, in Eric's mind, and he drew the dagger which he had sheathed at the Queen's command.

Digitized by Google

Mahmoud-el-Reis saw the action and made an almost imperceptible gesture of contempt.

So they waited.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Maître Samson in Command.

In order to explain the cause of the unexpected disturbance at the Abbey St. Martin, it will be necessary to go back to Paris early in the evening of the same day.

At the hour when the masons left work at Nôtre-Dame, and the great building with its frame of scaffolding was consigned to peace and solitude during the hours of the night, a large number of apprentices, journeymen and lookers-on were wending their way, with wild mirth, in the direction of St. Jaques-la-Boucherie, where Montruel's house was so cleverly concealed. But though in a measure the guests of "The Friend of the King" these worthy gentlemen were not going to be entertained at that nobleman's residence.

While the regular, hard-working masons sought their well-earned rest and enjoyed their frugal supper, this noisy, idle troop disappeared within the various taverns in the adjoining streets of ill-fame.

Another crowd, consisting of the rabble which congregated round the cathedral, and which represented a still lower stratum in the community, emerged from the inclosure and swarmed over the great bridge, and every dirty alley sent forth its contribution to swell the unsavoury train. Lame men managed to limp along at no inconsiderable pace, the blind found eyes to see their way in the thronged and narrow thoroughfares, women dropped their feeble offspring for which they had been pleading so pathetically during the day, and all rushed madly on.

Every scoundrel and vagabond in Paris was let loose to work the will of Madame Agnes and her henchman Amaury Montruel.

A handful of Free-lances escorted this undisciplined mob, which as a rule was kept out of sight as a body, and only drew attention to its existence by individual appeals or by appearing in small detachments; but to-night was their carnival, and however empty their pockets, each man and woman was catered for right royally as they presented themselves at the tavern doors.

Wine flowed in rivers to slake the thirst and fire the passions of the ignorant and outcast, who were thus being bribed to carry out the designs of the unscrupulous woman who shared the throne.

The favourite place of meeting was undoubtedly the tavern kept by Maître Jean Fontanelle, the husband of "La Fontanelle," who had unconsciously led poor Agnes the Fair to her doom at the hands of Montruel. This seemed to be the head-quarters of the ragged army.

Tristan de Pamiers and Maître Samson were chief in command, and the latter was giving orders to those who were to act under them.

Samson's face looked more than ever like that of an antiquated witch. He had consumed an amount of wine since the morning that would have killed two ordinary men, especially when the quality of the beverage was taken into consideration, but his head was still clear, even though his attenuated legs showed some disinclination to carry his meagre body.

Tristan was drunk and made no attempt to conceal it, though his libations had fallen far short of those consumed by his comrade. He was lolling on a wooden bench, while the crafty clerk was endeavouring to steady himself on a rickety table, rallying his trusty lieutenants round him.

"Come here, Ezekiel! Here, Tréfouilloux! Jean, Pierre, François, Giles, all of you! Come here."

The first to answer this summons were, as might be supposed, Ezekiel and Tréfouilloux, though it would have needed a quick eye to recognise our afflicted friends of the pavement. No one who had in the kindness of his heart or the keenness of his curiosity, parted with his hardly earned money to peer for the very last time into the horrible wound of the wild boar's victim; or had stopped to throw a coin into the lap of the twisted and tortured ex-crusader, could have detected any resemblance to these poor creatures in the able-bodied, if somewhat lean men who came forward to answer Maître Samson's hoarse, rasping cry.

They were both wearing the loose cassock and small clothes affected by the students, while battered caps were cocked jauntily on one side of their low, receding foreheads.

They looked to the last degree repulsive, each if possible uglier than his fellow, but still they might easily have been mistaken for two of those hapless, prematurely-aged scholars whose intellect and reputation had long been swamped in the wine cup.

Pierre, Jean, François and the others, all similarly attired, soon crowded round the table, and in a few moments the tavern was thronged to suffocation with these spurious students.

At the sight of our two famous friends, Ezekiel and Tréfouilloux, Tristan did not know whether to laugh or to curse. He was just clear enough in his head to feel

"Hola! Comrade!" cried Samson, plucking his sleeve

Digitized by Google

thoroughly ashamed of the night's proceedings, in fact he could not have played his part if he had been sober, for he was proud of his title of "King of the Basoche," and loved his festive subjects after his own wild fashion. As for this rabble, he would gladly have helped to hang the lot of them!

"Tête-diable;" he groaned: "It's desecration! profanity!"

"Bah!" retorted Samson, who had caught the words. "We've only got knaves instead of fools. And for my part, I'd rather have this lot than the other!"

Tristan had to clutch the gold coins in his pocket to keep his hands off the man who thus sneered at him and his fellows. How gladly would he have plunged his dagger into the heart of his hated pay-master!

The leader of the expedition now began to harangue his forces in a voice that would not have done discredit to a town-crier. He complimented them on their appearance and praised their untried bravery. He impressed upon them the dignity of their present position as representatives of the great Republic of letters, and exhorted them to display their learning for the benefit of those whom their united action was to influence.

"As we pass through the streets," he continued, "we want all the people to say as they listen to our learned remarks, 'There is the University, the daughter of the Church, protesting against Ingeburge the alien, the scourge of France, the curse of the King!'"

"Capital, first-rate, master!" applauded Tréfouilloux. "The people of Paris shall say what you wish: I'll answer for that. Magnificat! Cicero! Benedictus! Only let us be off before the old monks have emptied their larder!"

"A good thought, friend, but the Abbey cellars will repay your trouble even if the larder is scantily provisioned. En route!"

The supposed members of the University made a desperate rush for the door, pushing, jostling and trampling on each other without a qualm as they thought of the wine in store for them, and after they had forced their way out of the tavern they speedily found themselves in collision with the groups that were standing in the narrow street.

Tristan, who had been listening to the oration with increased disgust and repugnance made no offer to move, but sat gnawing his nails in horrible indecision.

"Hola! Comrade!" cried Samson, plucking his sleeve with a bad attempt at gaiety. "Aren't you coming with us?"

"It's profanation! Do it yourself!"

"Nonsense, we want you to talk Latin, the pure language of the classics. The jargon of these rascals is all very well for the mob, with its asses' ears, but if any scholar passed us!"

"Heaven forbid!" muttered Tristan as he bent his head lower at this picture of further degradation.

Maitre Samson watched him with an evil leer, and bending down, he whispered:

"Have you forgotten the prettiest girl in Paris? Eh?"

"She's gone," sighed Tristan. "I've watched the house for days, and have hunted in every nook and corner of the city, but I can't find a trace of her! Ah! she was a little beauty!" he went on in a maudlin tone. "Never was a form so graceful or a face so sweet! Venus herself could not have surpassed her! And to think I have lost her!"

"Yes, she was a nice little thing, as girls go," agreed Samson, "and you're right, she's lost to you at any rate."

The King of the Basoche sat up and looked hard at his companion in whose tone he thought he detected some hidden meaning.

"Lost to me! What do you mean. Do you know where she is then?"

Samson answered by a vague movement of the head, which caused his exasperated listener to spring to his feet and seize him by the shoulders, shouting as he did so:

"Speak, you cur! Or I'll make you tell me pretty quickly!"

"If I tell you, will you swear to come with us?"

"Yes, even though I loathe the whole thing! It's profanation!"

"And you'll speak Latin all the time?"

"Yes, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, anything you like."

"Well then, my friend, you'll have better luck than you deserve, for the prettiest girl in Paris is in the very place we're going to."

"What, at the Abbey St. Martin?"

"Yes, in attendance on Madame Ingeburge."

Tristan clapped on his shabby cap, gave himself a good shake and, dashing through the door, had soon fought his way to the front of the procession, shouting Latin oaths at the top of his voice.

Samson followed more leisurely, chuckling to himself:

"I thought that card would win the game for us."

In the Rue des Arcis the University, headed by a gorgeous banner, met the brotherhood of the Freemasons who were also flying their colours, and with combined forces the whole mass moved forward with some show of order in the direction of the Porte aux Peintres, followed by the usual train of stragglers that go with a multitude.

Wherever they passed the greatest excitement greeted them. Heads were thrust out of windows and doors, men wondered, while women pretended to be frightened, and all listened eagerly to catch the words shouted from time to time by a man with a clear, strong voice:

"Le loz des écoles et les privilèges de l'Université!' while the crowd supplied the chorus:

"Death to Ingeburge the alien! Down with the ruin of France and the curse of the King!"

Those who had not seen the prologue to this shameless comedy, marked only its apparent significance. The worthy citizens saw in this masquerading mob the representatives of learning uniting in one common demonstration against the cause of the nation's woe.

They knew that the King supported and encouraged the schools, and, to their ignorant minds, it was convincing that such a body should express publicly their opinion on so weighty a matter. They were impressed by the high-sounding jargon and very soon the by-standers took up the cry they did understand: "Down with the alien!" The whole city seemed infected by the uproar, and the numbers swelled at every step, till it looked as if all Paris had gone mad together.

"This is a grand success," said Samson, "the beggars are doing their work well!"

"Yes," answered Tristan, with a high-flown Latin quotation, "but I wish they would get on a little faster."

Ezekiel was meanwhile shouting lustily:

"Tirliput, Credo, Discipulis suis, Ergo, Porro Confiteor!" while Tréfouilloux kept the ball rolling with his favourite stock phrases.

How could such a display of learning fail to make a deep impression on the unlearned and credulous?

By the time they reached the Porte aux Peintres half the townsfolk had joined them. Some were decrying Ingeburge with the full force of their lungs, others were trying to imitate the doggerel rubbish which they mistook for Latin, and all were in a state of the wildest excitement. Vagabonds, mock masons and sham students yelled and swore in turn, as if the Furies had been let loose on the earth, and on all sides of the main body, tawdrily dressed girls and unkempt women danced and sang with a zeal that was even surpassing that of the men.

Most of these attendant dames were supplied with cans of wine and drinking cups, with which to ply the guards in charge of the gate, by which means they hoped that the rabble might gain easy egress from the city.

Digitized by Google

(To be continued.)

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

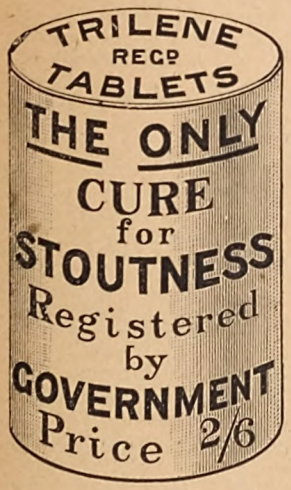
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, Oct. 19th, 1896.
"GENTLEMEN,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them—their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was for many years growing too stout; but although the disease was, I consider, chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks; and if I can do anything to promote your interests, I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.
"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me directly your excellent Tablets."

SURGEON-COLONEL E. S. BRANDER, M.D., writes from Ihansi, India: "September 12th, 1897. In my experience your Tablets form an efficient remedy for reducing weight."

LADY CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

MRS. BOSTON, of Clifford Street, South Wigston, Leicester, writes: "I am much thinner and lighter in myself since taking your Tablets."

W. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead, N.B., says: "I finished Tablets a fortnight ago, and am reduced a great deal—never felt better in my life."

Convalescent Home, New Brighton, Cheshire.
MISS S. J. PRITCHARD says: "They have done me much good. I am 21lb. lighter already."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk either by means of severe dieting or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a case of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are guaranteed absolutely harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, or any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing Cure for Obesity. The Tablets are sold in boxes at 2s. 6d., and are obtainable from the Trilene Company, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London."

25, Windsor Terrace, Plasnewydd, Cardiff.
MISS M. FLAVELL says: "I have lost 2st., and am much better in health."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.
MR. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17½st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.
MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

MRS. HUTCHINSON, 46, Irwell Street, Widnes, Lancashire, writes: "I have taken three boxes and am reduced 2st."

A. D. BILLINGS, Bell Inn, Aldershot, writes: "Have derived great benefit already. Less in size and weight, breathing greatly improved."

MISS WELLS, Aldeburgh Hall, Saxmundham, writes: "I am pleased to say I receive great benefit from them."

MISS DUGGLEBY, 16, New Road, Driffield, writes: "The girl who took your Tablets is reduced about 2½st."

MISS C. E. SINGLETON, 3, Courtenay Terrace, Teignmouth, says: "They have done me a great deal of good, and I will do my best to make them known. You may use this letter as you please."

MISS MACPHERSON, Balnagowan Lodge, Methuen, Perth, says: "I have taken one box, and am reduced 1st."

MRS. EDMONDS, Pontyguesta, Pontychin, Llantrissant, says: "I have lost more than a stone in a very short time."

MARIAN TAYLOR, Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "I have lost quite 2st. since taking your Tablets."

MISS GILLESPIE, 50, Chaucer Road, Forest Gate, Essex, says: "I have lost just 3st."

E. NICHOLSON, Crossfield, Staniland, Halifax, says: "I am pleased to say your Tablets are lessening my size very much, and my two sisters are going in for your pleasant treatment."

COUNTESS G. FÜRSTENBERG, of Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT LONDON.

Digitized by Google

"CAPTAIN" HIGGINS.

"OF course, I wasn't a captain, but then he'd no call to go and hurt my feelings," argumentatively said Captain Higgins.

"Ah," said the ship's steward, "some folks 'ill say anythink. Down him with a belayin' pin's wot you ought to have done."

"I don't hold with spoilin' good belayin' pins on them officers in the Queen's service," continued Captain Higgins, dreamily watching his smoke-wreaths float through the air. "What with keepin' their ships from runnin' aground and maintainin' discipline, 'taint no easy time for 'em; but still, as I said before, they needn't put on airs when I comes along. I'm a sort of captain in my way; if it ain't their way, they might stretch a point."

"From wot I knows of 'em," suggested the ship's steward, "they'd rather empty one, it being, as you may say, the manner of all folks that float the seas to swallow whatever they can get hold of. It's the salt in the air as makes 'em so thirsty. Somehow, the air's saltish to-night."

Captain Higgins, taking the hint, sent into the hut for liquid refreshments. The two old cronies sat at the Captain's little wicket-gate and watched the stately ships sail on through the Black Sea mouth of the Bosphorus.

"Fifteen years have I commanded the lifeboat here," resumed Captain Higgins—"Fifteen years have I commanded the lifeboat up here, the only Englishman among 'em, and folk have took to callin' me 'Captain' quite natural-like. I am captain of that 'ere crew, and every man of 'em knows it."

"To be sure!" said the ship's steward; "to be sure! You have a way with you when roused, Captain Higgins, as makes it impossible for even a 'eathen in his blindness to mistake you."

"Bein' gen'rally respected and looked up to," said Captain Higgins, soothed by the steward's whole-hearted admiration, "when I hears as Her Majesty's gunboat Snapshot is a-comin' up the Bosphorus jest to give the Sultan wot for if he doesn't behave 'isself——"

"Abdul the Dam——"

"Ladies present," said Captain Higgins severely, pointing with the stem of his pipe in the direction of the hut. "Ladies, steward; where's your manners?"

The abashed steward murmured an apology.

"When I hears about the gunboat, I goes down to Pera on board that little black craft there (he pointed to his horse, which was tied to the railing, too dejected even to swish away the flies), and orders some cards to be printed with 'Captain Higgins' on 'em."

"And quite right, too," murmured the steward, looking wistfully at the bottle on the deal table.

"Then I calls on the ship and sends in my card. I was shown down into the first officer's cabin. Presently he sails in holdin' my card in his hand and a-lookin' at me hard. 'Captain Higgins?' says he, with a snigger. 'Captain! May I ask what vessel you are commanding just now, Captain Higgins?' And he grinned all over him, and I stood lookin' as red as a lobster, not expectin' to be jeered at by a countryman of my own."

"Nat'rally," said the steward, absently helping himself to a fresh supply of whisky.

"Hold hard, there," said Captain Higgins, gently yet firmly repossessing himself of the bottle. "I own I was took aback. But I asked him to come up here and see me put my men through the Briches Drill the next arternoon, and he said he'd come. 'Good arternoon,' says I. 'Good arternoon, Captain Higgins,' says he, in the same silly, jeerin' kind of way; and I went off makin' up my mind to get even with him."

"And did you?" asked the steward, again absently feeling for the bottle.

The Captain drew it back to his side of the table "In course I did. He come up next day, and the men went through the drill. Then I made 'em put on their cork jackets, and we took him out into deep water. He, not knowin' Turkish, didn't suspect nothing when I gave the word to upset the lifeboat. When she'd righted, we all got in again, 'cept him. He couldn't swim a stroke, so I poked out an oar, and he held on to it.

"'Haul me in, my good fellow,' says he sharply. 'You've spoilt my clothes with your confounded clumsiness.'

"Somehow, that oar dipped, and he got his mouth full of water. 'Are you going to leave me here all night?' he says, as if the truth was beginning to strike him. 'If your men was my men, I'd have a word to say when I got 'em on board ship again.'

"'I'm generally called Captain Higgins by my friends,' said I, giving the oar another jerk.

"'I'll die first,' says he, as soon as he could get his mouth open.

"I pulls out my pipe and begins to smoke. As the sun went down, the water got chilly. 'Are you going to keep me here all night, you infernal scoundrel?' he asks at last.

"'Captain Higgins is quite willing to take you in again,' says I, quiet like.

"He looked round again and saw some porpoises driving the fish in shore. Being new to the place, he took 'em for sharks. 'I'll be obliged to you if you'll haul me into the boat, Captain Higgins,' he says quite civilly. 'If it rested with me I'd see you d——'"

"Ladies!" said the steward severely. "Ladies, 'Iggins."

"'I'd see you further first' he says; 'but me being an officer and my life being of some use to my country, I'll be obliged to you, Captain Higgins, if you'll haul me in before those sharks have a go at me.'"

"And then?"

"I hauled him in and gave him a nip of whisky. When he saw they was only porpoises and not sharks he turned quite green, but he apologises like a gentleman and asks me to dinner."

"Was it a good dinner?" asked the steward.

"I don't remember," said Captain Higgins, somewhat shortly. "All I know is that it took me two days to weave my way up here again after it. Mrs. Higgins knows more about it than I do. Hush, here she comes."

G. B. BURGIN.

Digitized by Google

THE NEW LEMONADE
2 Gallons for 4½d.

Many people suffer from extreme thirst during the hot weather. Messrs. Foster Clark & Co. have supplied the want that has so long been felt by making a concentrated lemonade, which is far more economical than the ordinary lemonade. It is made from the finest lemons, and the great advantage is that it is partly manufactured in Italy, in the midst of the lemon orchards. The lemons are taken direct from the trees to the factory to commence their transformation into the Eiffel Tower Lemonade. You can get thirty-two tumblers (or two gallons) for fourpence halfpenny. If you cannot get it from your grocer, send sixpence to G. Foster Clark & Co., No. 115 Eiffel Tower Factory, Maidstone, Sole manufacturers of "Eiffel Tower Lemonade."

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

DR MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL SOAP

Prepared with Arsenic, Zinc, and other Ingredients as a beautifier of Skin and Complexion

Madame PATTI says: "Most Excellent."

6d. and 1s.

Eradicates Spots and all Imperfections.

Of all Chemists, etc., or post free from S. HARVEY Ltd., 5 Denman Street, London Bridge, S.E.

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

CYCLE DEPOTS

High-class Selection of GENTS', LADIES', & JUVENILE CYCLES.

From £3 Cash, or on Easy Terms 10/- Monthly.

Lists Post Free.

Head Depôt: 52 to 55 Blackfriars Road, London, S.E.

RIDING SCHOOLS BEST IN LONDON.

Practical Tuition until Perfect, 10/6. Single Lesson, 2/-.

Purchasers Taught Free.

Open 9 till 9.

West End Branch: 124 King's Road, Sloane Square, S.W.

CYCLEDOM LTD.

KEATING'S POWDER IS USEFUL

in preserving blankets and furs from Moths. Sprinkle well with the Powder before putting away.

KILLS BLACKBEETLES & FLEAS.

Tins 3d., 6d. and 1/- each.

FREE FREE

OUR

£21 BICYCLES £21

to every person taking advantage of this advertisement and the offer we will send. The Bicycle is packed in a good crate, and is sent to your address FREE of any monetary charge, with one exception, that you pay carriage to railway company when you receive the Bicycle. We are giving these machines away as a startling advertisement, feeling assured that after you receive the Bicycle you will recommend us to all your friends as being a firm to be relied on for honest, straightforward dealings.

£21 BICYCLES £21

For 3s. we will forward our Gents' Epingle de Cravate, or Ladies' Broché together with our offer, and on your complying with offer, the Bicycle is forwarded Free of Charge as above stated. To save any disappointment, we will refund money in full to any person sending in, after all the Bicycles have been given away.

Send stamped addressed envelope together with P.O. or stamps for 3s.

THE ANGLO-AMERICAN AGENCY (Dept. 16), 196 St. Vincent Street, GLASGOW.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.

Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.

A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious, Non-Alcoholic Wine. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger Lemon, Orange, Blackberry etc.

YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

Digitized by Google

SHORT TRUTHS.

Town Crier asks: "What is the most common name for a street in London?"———In the 40,000 streets of London, "Park" is the name which is most frequently repeated. There are no fewer than 314 streets in which the word Park figures, such as Park Street, Park Lane, Park Place, etc.

E. S.—It costs the country between a million and a million and a quarter of money annually to keep our soldiers and sailors supplied with clothes.

H. H.—It is a mistake to suppose that children grow faster by night than by day. Light, air, and exercise are all necessary for rapid and healthy growth, and those children who are brought up in the air and sunshine, and live a great part of their time out of doors, are those in whom growth is most rapid.

L. D.—The first domesticated animal seems to have been the dog. The most ancient variety in Europe was the so-called peat-dog, which belonged to the Neolithic period. Four other varieties were known in the Bronze and the lake-dwelling periods. Direct descendants of these are the German hunting-hound, the shepherd's dog, and the poodle.

Alice.—There are 270 officials in the Queen's household.

F. R. C. S. writes describing another of Nature's many barometers. He says: "A piece of rock salt, say one cubic inch in size, suspended by a string from any convenient nail near to a window, will faithfully foretell the weather. During dull, but not rainy weather, a slight amount of moisture gathers on the salt, and the approach of rain is shown by that moisture collecting in a drop, which hangs pendant until the shower falls. Then, as if in affinity with the rain, it breaks away, followed by other drops, with some rapidity if the rainfall is a heavy one. The advent of dry weather is, of course, indicated by a total lack of moisture. Such a piece of salt will give correct indications, up to the limit of its power, for a whole year."

Anxious.—It is not a fact that genius and stoutness never go together. Plenty of men of genius have been fat. Dr. Johnson, Balzac, Rossini, and Dumas the elder are examples of men whose circumference has been almost as great as their talents.

Leonard.—The Prince of Wales holds three dukedoms, those of Cornwall, Rothesay, and Saxe-Coburg Gotha; three earldoms, those of Chester, Carrick, and Dublin; and one baronetcy, that of Renfrew. Besides these titles, he has the right to call himself Lord of the Isles of Scotland and Prince of Saxony.

Mabel.—There is no reason why your canary should not live to be twelve or fifteen years of age if you look after it properly. Those flying at liberty in their native island live to a much more advanced age, however.

C. M. W.—The custom of men wearing black clothes for evening dress is said to have had its origin in the black military tunic which was worn nearly three hundred years ago.

Fish is very fond of the humble bloater, and is afraid that the supply will fail. "It is estimated that fishermen take 900,000,000 annually on our coasts!" he writes in dismay.———You will be still more horrified to learn that man is responsible for only 5 per cent. of the destruction wrought upon your favourite fish. Its enemies, including birds, are very numerous. Some authorities place the figure much higher than you. However, the mother herring lays 30,000 eggs a year, so the supply is likely to be maintained.

Couvre-Feu.—No, it is not quite like the curfew bell, although it is a curious custom. At Seoul, in Corea, every man is bound by law to retire to his home when the bronze bell of the city has proclaimed the hour of sunset. This is the time for closing the gates, and any man caught in the streets after that hour is liable to a flogging. Women, however, are allowed to go about and visit their friends.

Nag.—You are thinking of Incitatus, the horse of the Roman Emperor, Caligula, which was made a priest and consul, had a manger of ivory, and drank wine from a golden pail.

Anglo-Saxon writes to ask what nation I consider to be the best behaved and most well mannered people in Europe?———The Norwegians, undoubtedly. They, of all classes, exhibit the peculiar external attributes of high breeding in a most remarkable degree. Haughtiness and cringing seem equally unknown among them. They possess a quiet sense of dignity and independence, no doubt owing to the fact that they are owners by inheritance of the land upon which they live, and that they have never passed through the degrading stage of feudal tyranny and serfdom. The peculiar absence of snobbishness and flunkeyism in Norway is largely attributable to the fact that aristocratic influences, the aping of style, and our prevalent ideas of "station" and "social position" are so little known there.

T. H. asks: "What are the privileges accorded to members of Parliament out of the House?"———All I have been able to discover is the right to sit in a particular pew at St. Margaret's, Westminster, and that of procuring a reading order at the British Museum without the signature of a London householder.

A Constant Reader has a bet with a friend as to whether there are any mines in existence a mile deep. His friend says there are not; he maintains that there are.———I am afraid you are the one who must pay up this time, for the deepest mine in existence is the Lambert coal mine in Belgium, with a depth of 3,490 feet. The second in depth is the Birkenberg silver mine of Austria, 3,280 feet, and the third the Zwickan coal mine with a depth of 2,637 feet.

D. C. D.—The percentage of twins to all births differs widely in different countries. Ireland stands highest in this respect with 17½, and Spain lowest with 8½ births of twins per 1,000 births. In England the number is 11 per 1,000 and in Scotland 11½.

A. P. P. asks: "Which tree in this country is the first to lose its leaves?"———Season and locality have a great deal to do with this question. Taking the country all over in average seasons, probably the horse-chestnut is the tree which first loses its leaves. Its foliage appears very early in the spring, and it is only to be expected, therefore, that it should wither and fall at a correspondingly early period. Often chestnut leaves begin to litter the ground as early as the month of July.

E. C. H. asks: "How much should a person eat?"———Doctors disagree, and always have disagreed, as to the quantity of food a day required by Nature for the support of the human system. Most of them seem to think that between five and six pounds of solid and liquid food is the golden mean between excess and improper abstinence, but, after all, the quantity of food that may be beneficially taken cannot be regulated by fixed rules. It depends upon the size, the occupation and habits of the individual, and other conditions, and can only be ascertained by individual experience.

R. B.—Hazel eyes are believed to be more subject to disease than those of any other colour. This opinion arises from the fact that makers of artificial eyes are more often called upon to provide those of this hue than any other, in spite of the fact that hazel eyes are by no means the most common.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

UNDER ROYAL PATRONAGE.

TWELVE GENUINE GIFTS

For the Readers of "Short Stories."

FINAL OFFER

Every Reader of "Short Stories" is entitled to the privileges attaching to the following Coupons; and, therefore, One Copy of each of the GENUINE ENGRAVINGS.

Guaranteed to be produced Entirely by Hand DIRECT FROM THE STEEL PLATES, or the Charming Oil Pictures described in the various Coupons, will be secured to every Reader, provided the Instructions given below are fully carried out.

SERIES "O."

Short Stories COUPON No. 1.
For the Genuine Steel Plate Engraving,
"BOLTON ABBEY IN THE OLDEN TIME."
After Sir EDWIN LANDSEER, R.A.
(On Plate Paper measuring 27 by 20 inches.)
Published in larger size in Artist's Proof State at 3gs.
For Instructions see below. [71

Short Stories COUPON No. 2.
For the Genuine Steel Plate Engraving,
"LAYING DOWN THE LAW."
After Sir EDWIN LANDSEER, R.A.
(On Plate Paper measuring 27 by 20 inches.)
Published in larger size in Artist's Proof State at 3gs.
For Instructions see below. [71

Short Stories COUPON No. 3.
For the Genuine Steel Plate Engraving,
"THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD!"
After W. HOLMAN HUNT.
(On Plate Paper measuring 25½ by 20 inches.)
Published in larger size in Artist's Proof State at 8 guineas.
For Instructions see below. [71

Short Stories COUPON No. 4.
For the Genuine Steel Plate Engraving,
"ECCE HOMO!"
("Behold the Man!")
After GUIDO.
(On Plate Paper measuring (24 by 17½ inches.)
For Instructions see below. [71

Short Stories COUPON No. 5.
For the Genuine Steel Plate Engraving,
"CHRIST AT THE WELL."
"I that speak unto thee am He."
After J. R. HERBERT, R.A.
(On Plate Paper measuring 24 by 17½ inches.)
Published in next size in Artist's Proof State at 8gs.
For Instructions see below. [71

Short Stories COUPON No. 6.
For the Genuine Steel Plate Engraving,
"A SURE FIND!"
(Dogs.)
After RICHARD ANSDELL, R.A.
(On Plate Paper measuring 30 by 22 inches.)
Published in Artist's Proof State at 3 guineas.
For Instructions see below. [71

Short Stories COUPON No. 7.
For the Genuine Steel Plate Engraving,
"ESCAPED!"
(Dogs.)
After RICHARD ANSDELL, R.A.
(On Plate Paper measuring (30 by 22 inches.)
Published in Artist's Proof State at 3gs.
Companion Subject to No. 6.
For Instructions see below. [71

Short Stories COUPON No. 8.
For the Genuine "Rembrandt" Photogravure,
"THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE."
After the remarkable oil portrait by K. KEY.
(On Plate Paper measuring 24 by 18 inches.)
For Instructions see below. [71

Short Stories COUPON No. 9.
For the Oil Picture,
"THE NEEDLES, ISLE OF WIGHT."
After H. HILLER.
(Measuring 28 by 17½ inches.)
For Instructions see below. [71

Short Stories COUPON No. 10.
For the Oil Picture,
"VENTNOR, ISLE OF WIGHT."
After H. HILLER.
(Measuring 28 by 17½ inches.)
Companion Subject to No. 9.
For Instructions see below. [71

Short Stories COUPON No. 11.
For the Oil Picture,
"MARY, QUEEN OF SOOTS, AT FOTHERINGAY CASTLE."
After SICHEL.
(Size 28 inches by 21 inches.)
Published in larger size at 1½ Gs.
Companion Subject to No. 11.
For Instructions see below. [71

Short Stories COUPON No. 12.
For the Oil Picture,
"LADY JANE GREY PLEADING WITH QUEEN MARY FOR THE LIFE OF HER HUSBAND."
After BACHEREAU.
(Size 28 inches by 21 inches.)
Pub. in larger size at 1½ Gs.
Companion Subject to No. 11.
For Instructions see below. [71

INSTRUCTIONS.

Readers of Short Stories must detach the above Coupons for the particular Subjects required, and forward them to the South Kensington Fine Art Association, 8 Exhibition Road, South Kensington, London, S.W., together with a Postal Order for 3/- for one Subject, 5/- for two, 12/6 for six Subjects, or One Guinea for the whole Set of Twelve. It will be observed that the Pictures are mostly arranged in pairs.

Produced also entirely by hand but on INDIA PAPER and mounted on Plate Paper, the Engravings mentioned in Coupons Nos. 1 to 7 can be secured, in India Print style, at 3s. each extra.

Readers preferring these Engravings COLOURED can also secure the subjects mentioned in Coupons Nos. 1 to 7 at 3s. each EXTRA. These will be specially PAINTED BY HAND IN WATER COLOURS, each WATER-COLOUR PAINTING being SIGNED BY THE ARTIST, to enhance the value of the Pictures.

These payments will cover all charges, including Plates (the property of the South Kensington Fine Art Association), packing, case, carriage and all other expenses.

Cheques, Post Office Orders, and Postal Orders should, IN EVERY INSTANCE, be crossed for safety, "LONDON AND COUNTY BANK, HEAD OFFICE."

It must be understood that the offer of such Genuine and Beautiful Steel-Plate Engravings as "Bolton Abbey in the Olden Time," and "Laying Down the Law," after Sir Edwin Landseer, R.A., at 3s. each, are practically GIFTS to the Readers of Short Stories, for Artist's Proofs on India Paper in a larger size have fetched Three Guineas each, the impressions which we are PRESENTING to the Readers of Short Stories for 3s., being GUARANTEED GENUINE Engravings, each produced BY HAND, direct from the Steel Plates; and the other exquisite Subjects are equally beautiful in every respect. The Water-Coloured Engravings, painted by hand, are exceptionally charming.

The general distribution of the magnificent Pictures recently effected has given the greatest satisfaction, and letters of thanks have been received from all parts of the world, from many who have long desired such High-class Works of Art for the adornment of their homes at a merely nominal figure, but who have hitherto been unable to acquire them by reason of the prohibitive prices usually charged for the same.

If the instructions given above are faithfully carried out, and the Coupons are sent (with name and address carefully written), the South Kensington Fine Art Association, of 8 Exhibition Road, South Kensington, London, S.W., undertake to forward the Pictures, carriage paid, to any part of the world (Foreign and Colonial, 2s. extra), securely packed in a stout case so that they will arrive in good condition.

N.B.—As the number of copies is limited, it is desirable to make early application. A certain portion of the issue will be reserved for Foreign and Colonial readers of Short Stories.

Digitized by Google

MOTH PREVENTATIVES.
In various forms, all equally efficacious.
MIKADO MOTH PAPER, especially adapted for folded Clothes, closely-packed Articles, etc., 1/- per box. ALABASTRINE TABLETS, for placing in wardrobes. CRYSTALLISED CAMPHYLENE, for scattering under carpets, into crevices, etc., 1/- per tin.

Stimulating and invigorating. Refreshing and agreeable in odour. Cleanses the Hair. Promotes a Healthy and Velvety Skin. Immeasurably superior to any other preparation for the TOILET, BATH & NURSERY. An Antiseptic, Purifier & Cleanser. Price 1/3 pint bott.
Miss Ellaline Terriss writes: "I find it most excellent. I shall always use it."

If any difficulty in obtaining at Chemists, Grocers, Stores, etc., will be sent post free direct, from Sole Manufacturers: Fleming's Oil & Chemical Co. Ld., 101 Leadenhall St., London, E.C.

PURE DRY CRISP.
VERDIN COOKE'S
TRADE EXTRA REFINED MARK
Specially Prepared
TABLE SALT
PUT UP BY SPECIAL MACHINERY IN DAMP PROOF PACKETS
DOES NOT CAKE.
TO BE OBTAINED OF ALL GROCERS
OR WHOLESALE OF J. J. VERDIN COOKE, LIVERPOOL.

NUCOLINE
A PURE VEGETABLE BUTTER.
FOR BAKED & BOILED PASTRY, FRYING, etc.
A PERFECT COOKING BUTTER.
NUTRITIVE, DIGESTIVE, ECONOMICAL. FIVE PRIZE MEDALS AWARDED.
Stocked by all London Stores, etc.
A SAMPLE TIN SENT POST FREE FOR THREE STAMPS. Write
NUCOLINE LTD., SILVERTOWN, LONDON, E.

LYLE'S
GOLDEN SYRUP
LONGEST ESTABLISHED PUREST & BEST.

"BIG WHEEL"
BRAND.
CARTER'S, BRISTOL.
4½D TIN = 2 GALS LEMONADE
Lemon Crystals

ZEBRA
Grate Polish.
In Packets or as a Paste in Tins.

GREAT WAR COMPETITION.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 489. FOR WEEK ENDING MAY 14TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH

DEPENDS LARGELY ON THE PURITY OF FOOD.

Beware of Mixtures.—"We cannot imagine that our ideal pure Cocoa—a perfect food in itself—can be improved by such additions (as Kola and Hops). In fact, we are of opinion that its dietetic value would be altered, and that it would become a medicinal preparation."—Guy's Hospital Gazette.

"Kola is a Drug pure and simple."—Epicure. "Kola is not harmless."—Medical World

CADBURY's Cocoa is Absolutely Pure.

CADBURY'S

Cocoa is the most sustaining beverage for brain fatigue and for muscular force.

"Consumers should be supplied with a dietetic article whose purity is unquestioned, and without doubt this essential quality is the characteristic virtue of Cadbury's Cocoa."—Public Opinion.

CADBURY'S

Cocoa stands among the highest, if it has not attained the first place for its purity. According to analysis it stands head and shoulders above all other Cocoas."—To-Day.

"The name of Cadbury may always be accepted as an unimpeachable guarantee of excellence."—Happy Home.

"CADBURY's Cocoa knows no superior as a perfect food, and is absolutely genuine."—Gentlewoman.

☛ When you ask for CADBURY's Cocoa see that you get it, as commoner and mixed qualities are often pushed for the sake of extra profit.

Digitized by Google

"Its food value is double that of bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—
Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

Frames the Form and Forms the Frame.

HOVIS BREAD is baked and delivered daily by all leading bakers. HOVIS BISCUITS and FLOUR—the latter packed in 3½lb. and 7lb. Bags, with recipes enclosed—by all leading Grocers, or 6d. and 1/- Samples of Bread and Biscuits will be sent on receipt of stamps by the

HOVIS-BREAD FLOUR COMPANY Limited,
MILLERS, MACCLESFIELD.

BE SURE EACH LOAF IS STAMPED HOVIS.

Every Economical Housewife
uses
Tower Tea.
Tower Coffee.
Tower Cocoa.

IN PACKETS AND TINS ONLY.
SOLD EVERYWHERE.

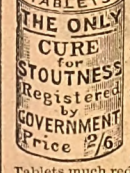
WHOLESALE:
TOWER TEA LTD.,
5, JEWRY STREET, LONDON, E.C.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,
183B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.
63 Seven Sisters Road. :: 14 High Rd., Kilburn.



ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably"

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MR. CLAUDE CARTER, of Thorn House, Johnstone, N.B., says: "Your Tablets much reduced my weight and I have been waiting to see if it was permanent; and so it has proved."

MR. CANHAM, 87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, says: "Tablets cured my wife two years ago of extreme stoutness. It has never returned."

MARION TAYLOR, of Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "Have lost quite two stone."

A. PEEL, of Darley Hydro, Matlock, writes: "They have reduced and benefited me a good deal."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than one stone."

MR. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead. "I think them wonderful not only to reduce fat but as a medicine.

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

FREE FREE
OUR
£21 BICYCLES £21

to every person taking advantage of this advertisement and the offer we will send. The Bicycle is packed in a good crate, and is sent to your address FREE of any monetary charge, with one exception, that you pay carriage to railway company when you receive the Bicycle. We are giving these machines away as a startling advertisement, feeling assured that after you receive the Bicycle you will recommend us to all your friends as being a firm to be relied on for honest, straightforward dealings.

£21 BICYCLES £21

For 1s. 6d. we will forward our Gents' Evingle de Cravate, or Ladies' Broché together with our offer, and on your complying with offer, the Bicycle is forwarded Free of Charge as above stated. To save any disappointment, we will refund money in full to any person sending in, after all the Bicycles have been given away.

Send stamped addressed envelope together with P.O. or stamps for 1s. 6d.

THE ANGLO-AMERICAN AGENCY (Dept. 16),
196 St. Vincent Street, GLASGOW.

£20
Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (239 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

"JUNO" CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

DIAMONDS from £10. 16/8 monthly. JUNO Lady's or Gents' Safety £12 12/- 21/- monthly. £14 14/-, 21/6, £16 16/-, 28/-. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories, sent post free to any part.

METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO. LTD., 75 and 76 Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.; and at Piccadilly Circus, exactly opposite the Criterion, London, W. N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. New JUNO Riding School, 1,700ft., now open.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

KEATING'S POWDER IS USEFUL

in preserving blankets and furs from Moths. Sprinkle well with the Powder before putting away.

KILLS BLACKBEETLES & FLEAS.
Tins 3d., 6d. and 1/- each.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 489.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending May 14th, 1898.

Edited by Arthur Morrison

The Failure of the Class.

The doctor had ten miles to ride before he reached home. The road was muddy; the air was not cold, but it was raw and chill, and the mud clung to his horse's fetlocks. Old Calline put down her head and plodded on through the mire. The doctor's shoulders drooped over her neck; the rain, which had ceased, had soaked his shabby great-coat and dripped down over his mud-splashed boots.

"How untidy I do look!" he grumbled, as he took out his handkerchief to brush the drops from his face and noticed the holes in the linen. "I don't believe that Aunt Maggie ever mends my stockings. I look just what I am, a shabby country doctor! Confound it, how he ground it into me!"

Old Calline stumbled; he pulled her head up sharply.

"It's not your fault, old girl, that I missed marrying the only woman I ever loved, and settled down in this out-of-the-way part; and now, when my old class-mate comes to see me, I am cut up because I see how he has succeeded and I have failed. I suppose I am so busy usually, I don't see things. Oh, dear! I'm the failure of the class!"

His laugh rang out, jarring the air, not at all the loud, genial laugh which many a patient had found better than medicine. Old Calline pricked up her ears and struggled into a heavy trot, as if struck. He patted her with a soothing word. The doctor's "softness" with respect to animals was a common jest in the country. The old mare, feeling all was well and that her easy-going master had not gone crazy, relaxed into her customary jog; and John Fair's thoughts returned to the channel in which they had run since the meeting with Dr. Phil Martin.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Martin was a man rather below than above the middle height. He had a dogged, pleasant manner, with a certain nerve and quickness of vision, but in no wise a man marked out for success; yet Martin was a great city physician, earning hundreds a year, while Fair took cows and pigs for a long doctor's bill, and lived in an old cottage with an old woman to care for him.

There was something in the city man's clothes, in his neat-clipped, assured enunciation, in his air of one accustomed to deference, in his very courtesy of manner and word, which spoke of the man who knew he had succeeded and which galled the soul of the man who knew he had failed.

Martin and he had been class-mates together; they had been house surgeons on the staff of the same hospital, never actually intimate, always thrown a great deal in each other's way. Twice it had befallen them to have to tackle one of those medical puzzles that have a poignant interest, because the success or failure in solving them means life or death. And both times Phil was wrong and he was right.

On another occasion Phil had his way and the poor fellow had died. The autopsy showed that he, John Fair, could have saved him. It was a dreadful mortification to Phil; it was something different but quite as keen in its pain to John; he had actually burst into tears after a night of frantic effort to save the man, he having gone into the house-staff room for a moment and hearing of the man's death there.

"Oh! I could have saved him," he had muttered, fortunately so low that nobody heard him.

And yet this was what he had become—a country doctor, who lived on his farm and augmented his professional earnings by selling stock.

"And because I took the medical journals and bought all the new instruments, and wore my old overcoat to get books, and wrote articles on pneumonia, I thought I was in touch with the world. I'm not in it!" John uttered the words savagely aloud. There was no one to hear. Old Calline paid no attention; she was accustomed to hear the doctor discuss his cases.

Colonel Barnes and the doctor were great chums. Once a week, the colonel, the doctor, Miss Lettie Barnes and the colonel's wife, played whist; and then the colonel mixed one of his famous punches, and he and the doctor would sit until late and chat about things in general.

The doctor always played with Mrs. Barnes, who was the most docile of pupils and invariably played according to rule. Hers was what is called a safe game. Miss Letty, on the contrary, would have delighted the great Desbarolles with her brilliant ventures and her subtle schemes and traps. The colonel played a straightforward, rather daring game. There was an almost unbroken record of victories for the brother and sister; yet the doctor was a good player, a fine player!

It was Fair's secret, unavowed ambition to play whist sometimes with Miss Letty. Miss Letty was not young; indeed she was distinctly old, being ten years the senior of the Colonel, who owned fifty-four—fourteen years longer at the game of life than the doctor. She was a pretty, plump, cheerful little gentlewoman, who didn't look a day older than fifty, and wore dainty black dresses and a widow's cap. The widow's cap and a little diamond ring were the only outward signs of Miss Letty's romance. For ten years she had been betrothed to a young Scotsman, whose father had so deeply offended her brother that it took ten years and the young lover's conspicuous gallantry in the army to soften old Colonel Barnes' resentment; and then, instead of her lover, there came to Letty only a word of farewell scrawled on her own photograph, and the story of a gallant death out in India.

The doctor believed in her grief as he believed in her friendship or her brother's. She was not one to change old friends for new. Yet, this was the barb of the sting, here was Miss Letty, when her nephew, home from college for his holidays, fell ill, importuning his mother to send to Memphis for a doctor. He had attended Arthur on several occasions, and liked the young fellow greatly. To have another doctor called for Arthur was like a blow between the eyes. Yet this is what had happened; he heard it just now from the old butler whom he had met.

And this doctor, this distinguished physician, was Phil Martin!

John Fair was returning from a visit to Widow Little's boy and was passing the station when the train came in. He knew Phil instantly, for all the flesh he had put on, and the brown beard. But he was obliged to mention his own name before Dr. Martin recognised him; then to be sure, he mustered a cordial smile and shook John's hand warmly.

"One of the pleasures I've counted on in coming to this—coming here, has been getting a glimpse of you, old man," he smiled as he spoke—Phil Martin's old, jovial, complacent smile. "You're coming with me, I suppose?"

"Not this morning," John stammered. He felt the blood pumping into his heart in a hot gush of mortification; he knew it coloured his cheek. Martin was cordial—offensively cordial, it appeared to the doctor, whose nerves were unstrung. He kept harking back to the doctor's own history; and turned him off almost roughly.

Martin's eyes gravely roamed over the not very cheerful surroundings and then back to the carriage of the Barnes' and the sleek horses—a queer contrast to the surroundings; last of all to the doctor's old Calline patiently waiting untied, for her master. A flicker of some keener feeling lit his shrewd grey eyes.

"You were born hereabouts, weren't you, John?" he said in a gentle tone.

"He pities me, confound him!" thought the country doctor.

"My father had a farm ten miles down the river," he answered shortly.

"Must be a very pretty country in summer," Martin observed suavely; and again John resented his evident desire to be civil.

John helped the distinguished physician into the carriage and bade him good-bye. There was talk of seeing each other soon again, but no mention of the patient, no medical inquiries. Plainly the new doctor recognised that he was the only responsible party in the case; there wasn't even a fiction of a consultation. So the carriage drove away, and John climbed up on old Calline and went at his own pace home.

His reflections did not brighten as he went along. When a man is young, he has the possibility of better things always at his elbow; and in himself is an illimitable vista of hope. There is no telling what he may not do. His dreams betoken his power, he fancies; and he picks himself up after every fall, convinced that he knows a new trick that will fling the jade Fortune at the next tussle. But after fifty, a man of sense has lost, among other illusions, the illusion of his own capacity. He has discovered his own limitations, and there is no drearier discovery.

Digitized by Google

"I'm the failure of the class," groaned John again, as he alighted at his own door. He had to call several times before Uncle Bob, Maggie's husband, could summon resolution to tear himself from the kitchen fire and shuffle out in the yard. The doctor did not reprove him; he walked stiffly up the steps, stumbling on the last, which was broken. In fact, it had been broken for a month. Half-a-dozen times had the doctor spoken to the old man about it; but the days when he spoke Bob had had a pain in his back, and the days when Bob did not have the pain the doctor hadn't spoken. He was about to give vent to his annoyance, in a torrent of angry words, when he saw the old man's penitent look, and remembered how often he had tramped miles in the mud to fetch books and papers for his master. Then the old man's wife hurried forward with a note that had been sent by Miss Letty Barnes.

The doctor's fingers shook a little as he opened the paper.

"It's confoundedly chilly," he muttered. Then he read:

"Dear Doctor.—Arthur was going to take this to you, and tell you something at the same time; but he caught a cold and I've begged him to stay in to-day. I think you had better come over to look at him as a physician, as well as a friend. He has no fever, and I have succeeded in persuading him to wear a continuous mustard plaster to-day. Please come as soon as you get this. After you have looked at Arthur perhaps you will do us a kindness. It is this, Arthur wanted to tell you. You know I hinted that he was interested deeply in a young Oxford lady whom he met while at college. Being his confidant, I cannot do more than hint. I know, my dear friend, that you will be rejoiced to know that our boy's romance has prospered. He brings tidings that she has accepted him; and it is his future father-in-law who is to come to pay us a visit to-day. I shall not tell you his name now, but save that for a pleasant surprise. Please come as soon as possible, and arrange to come back to supper and spend the night. We may have some whist!

"Very sincerely your attached old friend,
"Letitia Mainwaring Barnes."

The doctor whirled on his heel; his face was the face of a young man; his eyes were shining. Old Maggie held up her hand in surprise and he laughed.

"I've a very dear old friend, whom I knew years ago, to see at the Barnes's," he called. "Old Calline must get out again, but it's nearly two miles.

"Why did that idiot of a coachman tell me that cock-and-bull story?" he added to himself. "A fine mess he has made of things."

The doctor rode along far more briskly than he had ridden before that afternoon. He had made his best toilet, he sat erect in the saddle. At least, his old friends had not meant to wound him; worldly success or failure were of lesser account to that unworldly soul! "After all, I did cure the folks," he consoled himself, "and that's something."

Yet a sense of his failure remained in a corner of his consciousness and lent a touch of embarrassment to his greeting when he met Martin again. He had seen Arthur, who had nothing worse than a bronchial cold and was already on the mend, and disposed to apologise for not having braved the rain. "Aunt Letty sent old Nelson before I knew it," he laughed.

"Your aunt is always right," said John, and he passed on into the other room and Martin's presence. They were alone for a minute. Martin wrung his hand.

"Perhaps I shall not get the chance to say it, John," he said hurriedly—was there an unexpected warmth in his tone? "Look here, old fellow, what have you been doing here?"

"Nothing much, just vegetating and trying to kill as few of my confiding patients as possible." John stammered. He felt his sense of failure returning to him.

"I should say so," said Martin; "I've been hearing of you from the ladies and Arthur and other people. I know how you are responsible for not even the babies getting a chance to die hereabouts, and how you will get up in the night and ride ten miles for an old woman who can't give you even——"

"Strange to say, folks who haven't even a penny want to go on living," interrupted John, feebly jocular, and not knowing how to take Martin, who seemed almost excited.

"Confound it, while the rest of us have been trying to make money, you have been a missionary without expecting to save your soul by it! I know who is responsible for that little town over there actually having a drainage system. I know who sends the wine and the nourishment that he prescribes to his patients. There was an old man in the train who couldn't talk of you and keep his voice straight; he said you had saved his wife and made his daughter's last days easy! And all this while, in this desolate place where you hardly have a soul to throw a professional word to, you have kept at your studies and observations. You know——?" He named a great German doctor—"Well, he is over here. I saw him, last week; he was anxious to know about you. Your articles on hemorrhagic fever and your discoveries about the pneumonia-germ, he says are wonderful, wonderful!"

"Don't talk about discoveries," begged John, red and hot and ready to perspire with his embarrassment, "it is only a—a guess at the truth; the toxine has worked well; but it is only a surmise, a mere surmise, not yet ascertained. When I think of Koch—don't for goodness sake talk of discoveries, only my experiments."

"I tell you they are—big—big! You can call them what you please. And here you are lost in this place, and yet going on, never discouraged! At least, I know a man of genius, a real man of science when I see him. John, you're the success of the class!"

John gasped; and, as he caught at the nearest excuse for composure, Miss Letty came in.

"We are to have whist after supper," said she, smiling, "and Dr. Martin has asked sister Elly. I fear you will have to put up with me, Dr. Fair."

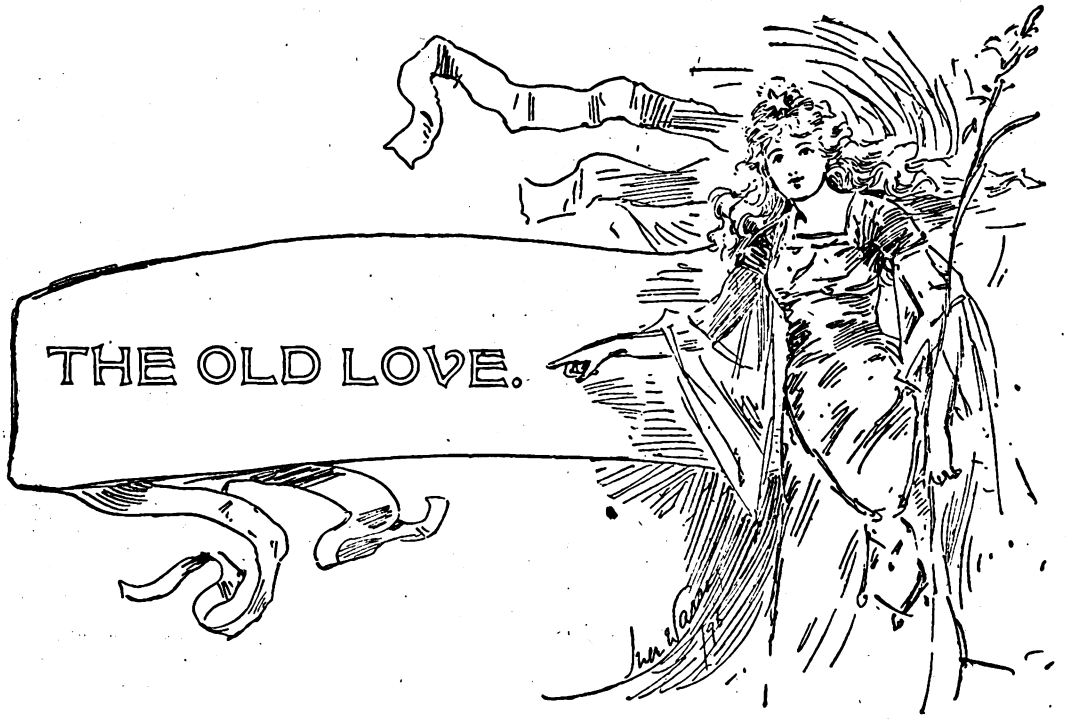
And it may be added here, that in spite of Dr. Martin's club game, Miss Letty justified all the doctor's hope, and he played the game of his life.

And when he had retired Martin spoke to Arthur about him.

"He's a man of genius," he cried—"no—he's a child!"

MARGARET PINE.

Digitized by Google



For nearly ten years Drixie had been carving on the trees a fanciful design of his own contriving—a heart, in outline, with a sort of plus sign cut in the middle. It looked more like a religious symbol than anything else—a mystic emblem carved by some mediæval hermit quite out of place in this age.

But to Drixie it had quite another signification. It was a love token, little less than an open declaration in this youth's own estimation. And, indeed, it was open enough to those who knew him. For Drixie's proper name was Henry Hart, "Drixie" being a pet name, and hers was Jennie Cross, so the riddle was easily read. He was scarcely twelve then. Now he was a well-grown man, and not an unattractive specimen, either, but that boyish trick of carving his emblem upon the trees had persisted, too, until one dreamy afternoon Stella Gaylaird floated into Woodvale and began the upsetting of all its traditions. Then the suffering chestnuts and beeches obtained a respite.

How Jennie Cross had regarded the hieroglyphic propensities of her eccentric admirer is not definitely known. It is probable that of late years they had caused her some mortification of spirit, but there is no manner of doubt that she was far more deeply annoyed at their sudden cessation. Although she had never formally accepted Drixie—for except through the medium of his jack-knife he had never proposed—she had very naturally come to regard his devotion as one of her belongings. That she rather liked him, in spite of odd ways, was evident enough. At school they helped each other, on holidays they had many a romp together, and since they had grown to an age demanding more ceremony, he was her constant escort to "parties" of every description. The gossips had long ago decided that it was a "match," and their comments were singularly free from disapproval. Drixie's freaks were still a favourite topic, but both these young folks were generally liked.

The gossips however, struck quite another note when Stella appeared and all the young men went trailing after her, Drixie leading the van; yet I doubt that the faithless lover suffered half as much from their caustic criticisms as did poor Jennie from their outspoken sympathy. "What difference does it make to me," she protested, almost tearfully, but in vain.

Stella was a town girl and an interloper. For my own part, I can't admit that she was Jennie's equal in beauty, but she was distractingly pretty, and she had that wonderful gift of fascination which in most cases avails far more than beauty uninspired. If her golden hair was less abundant than Jennie's dark tresses, it was done up with more "style." If her features were less regular they were charmingly piquant. If her eyes had less depth and earnestness they were full of animation, and that her conversation was the brightest ever heard in Woodvale is out of the question. This last, which rather daunted the rest of her infatuated train, was to Drixie the greatest attraction of all; and this appreciation won him if not her heart at least considerable favour.

That poor Drixie made a pitiable spectacle of himself, and furnished the local gossips with plenty of choice material, must be conceded. Ultimately he made himself a nuisance, and had to be snubbed. All through the autumn he took Miss Stella out driving as often as she would consent to go; and for a time she found the brown country roads, winding amid wooded hills aglow with the rich fruit-tints of the ripening leaves, exceedingly alluring, and often gladdened Drixie's heart with her exclamations of delight. After the snow came they had a ride or two, but now Stella's manner was growing as cold as the winter air, and Drixie's sensitive heart was chilled.

Digitized by Google

He continued, nevertheless, to ring the door bell of her uncle's dwelling with unabated persistency, more and more frequently finding the young lady out. Finally he took advantage of her birthday very cleverly, as he fancied, to send her a present — a trinket of considerable value. His present was promptly returned. Then he called.

Stella was not at home—out for a ride with one of his rivals, he suspected. The next day, by the merest chance, he overheard her talking to a young fellow and laughing at him. He returned to his home in bitter wrath and ground the discarded jewel under his boot heel. For an hour he paced up and down his room, suffering torments of disappointment, rage and jealousy. At last there came a sudden revulsion of feeling.

He burst into tears, and his whole heart turned back with a passionate throb to Jennie. He longed as he had never longed for anything in the whole world before for her gentle sympathy, her comforting love. He hastened to her home. She was out—gone for a short walk, they told him, rather coldly. He ascertained the direction she had taken, however, and fairly ran along the road to overtake her.

Presently he noticed footprints, which some instinct told him were hers, leading aside into a little grove. He floundered through the snow, and soon found her standing beside an oak-tree. On its bark, obscured by years of growth and rusty with weathering, he saw his own boyish symbol—the big heart with the little cross cut within it—one of the first he had ever carved.

"Jennie! Jennie!" he cried.

The wretched girl was so glad to see him that she forgot all and held out her hand. He seized it and dropped on his knees in the snow.

"Oh, Jennie! Do you really love me so?"

The soft blush of welcome which was dawning upon her cheek flamed into angry scarlet, which spread and deepened till brow and ears and throat were all ablaze. Hot tears streamed from her eyes. She snatched away her hand and fled homeward, nor by his utmost efforts was he able to overtake her.

So he wandered along the village streets, bewildered and disconsolate, until the perversity of fate and his own marvellous aptitude for blundering again betrayed him. He saw some flowers displayed in the front window of one of the shops, a few pink carnations; but it suddenly occured to the woe begone Drixie that it might be a good idea to send these as a peace offering to the offended maiden.

The more he thought of it the more the ingenuity and delicate tact of the scheme impressed him. So he bought the flowers at a price that was sheer robbery on the dealer's part, and subsidised the assistant to deliver them. Upon the card which was to accompany them he wrote, "Dear Jennie, I am so sorry. Please forgive me, and don't take it so badly. I'll call to-morrow."

Then he went home, feeling almost elated. Now it happened that Jennie had given considerable attention to the "Language of Flowers," and she knew that pink carnations meant "Woman's love."

Bitterly self-conscious and burning with mortification she attributed to the unlucky Drixie a minuteness of knowledge and a subtlety of purpose which were as far from being his as was the hardness of heart with which she also credited him.

"He is returning me my love," she moaned. The unhappy worded note fully confirmed her in this opinion. It seemed to the proud girl a last humiliation, and she passed the night in fits of sobbing almost hysterical in their violence. When Drixie called the next morning she would not see him.

The months that followed were the most miserable that Drixie had ever known. He felt abominably ill-used. He adjured the society of all women, dark or fair, but found small comfort in that. He heard of Stella's departure without a pang, but when he thought of Jennie and how he had for ever forfeited her love, and even her friendship, he felt as if his heart would break.

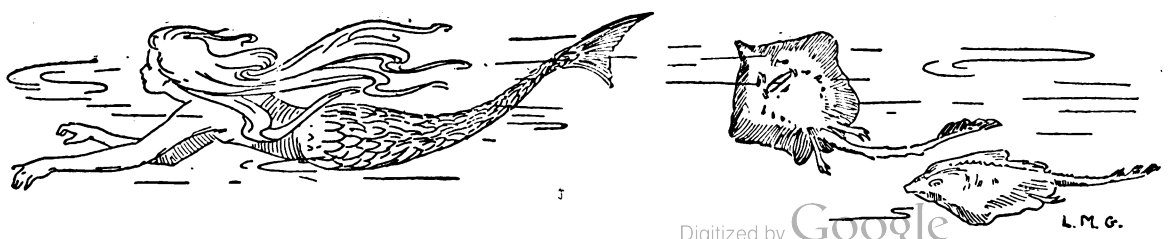
So he tried to forget his woes in close application to study, and did long and reckless bicycle rides across the country. If he could keep his heart pumping hard enough, it didn't seem to ache so cruelly.

One evening he was riding in a heedless fashion that had become habitual with him, down the steep grade that wound like a corkscrew round the precipitous sides of a hill. On the left was a perpendicular cutting; on the right was a sheer drop of several feet and below it a rugged slope obstructed by trees and stumps. Suddenly, about half way down, he perceived that the repairer had been at work on the side of the road next the cutting, and had set up a temporary fence to prevent vehicles from driving into an excavation which they had opened there, leaving a narrow track on the outer edge. And in the middle of this track, riding towards him with uncertain movements and obvious lack of confidence, he saw another cyclist. It was a girl—it was Jennie Cross. All this flashed before him in a moment. His speed was beyond control; there was not an instant for deliberation—scarcely time to act. He gave a sharp wrench to the right, his machine leapt from the verge, he felt himself hurled through the air like a sling-stone—then a stunning concussion, and all was dark and silent.

* * * * *

A few weeks later the young man was lying on a cot in a darkened room, slowly recovering. Jennie had just been allowed to enter—for the first time since the accident. She was holding his hand; her eyes were cast down in deep humility; her face was flushed, but sweetly resolute. "Drixie," she said, in a voice that hardly broke the silence, "Drixie dear, it was simply horrid of you to ask me that way—but I do."

H. T. D.



Digitized by Google

STORIES OF THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

UNEARTHED AND RE-EDITED BY ROBERT MACHRAY.

No. 6.

ROTHSCHILD OUTWITTED.

ONE day about the middle of October, 1822, a large number of the brokers and dealers had gathered themselves together in little groups in and about the Stock Exchange.

To the casual eye, these gentlemen appeared to be conversing in their ordinary tones about nothing in particular, but when they were watched more closely, it was quite evident, from their furtive glances and other indications, that they were the victims of some excitement, some anxiety they were endeavouring to suppress.

The news had passed through Capel Court that Rothschild was "bearing" the market, and that as a consequence the price of the funds was slowly but sensibly being lowered. It was well known that the great financial magnate never entered into any transaction without having abundant reason for doing so.

The sources from which he obtained the information he acted upon were so numerous and excellent, and the influence he exercised throughout the whole of Europe by means of his connection with his brothers in Paris, Vienna, Naples, and elsewhere, was so tremendous, that his operations upon 'Change had a significance possessed by those of no other man.

"What then had happened?"

This was the question men were putting to each other—each one as cautiously as he could. The object of each one was to try to find out what his neighbour knew without letting him know whether he were better informed or not. This business of getting something and giving nothing in return, is one that is practised all the world over in some form or other, but nowhere so skilfully and so persistently as upon the Stock Exchange.

It soon became apparent to those who could read the signs that nothing, so far as was known, had occurred to lead Rothschild to take a pessimistic view of affairs on the Continent, which were then engaging the attention of the English people.

Still there the fact was. Brokers who were the recognised agents of Nathan Meyer were openly selling large quantities of consols and other high-class securities. Some said that half a million of the funds had been already disposed of; others were certain that the sales of Government stock, which had already been effected that morning, came to two or three times that amount.

Just as lions have their jackals, so the kings of finance have their own special dependants and hangers-on, eagerly waiting for some tit-bit of information, some tip or hint upon which to go, or, in despite of anything better, only too anxious to follow in the trail of these great men, and to do in their own small way what their masters were doing on a larger scale.

Thus, upon this occasion, a considerable number of the dealers, seeing how things were obviously going, also sold the funds; these again in their turn influenced others. The movement spread, the knots of men who had so far been discussing the matter with such quietness as we have noticed, broke up in some confusion; bad news of some sort was looked for; something like a panicky feeling began to prevail, the result being that at the close of the day there had been a drop of from two to three per cent. in the general list.

Nor did the following morning show any improvement. No intelligence of disaster had been received, but, on the other hand, neither had there been anything of a favourable character. The selling movement was continued without any marked attempt at checking it,

Copyright, 1898, by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., in the United States of America.

Digitized by Google

and the public getting wind that something was wrong, sold a large amount of their genuine holdings, a circumstance which, of course, increased the depression in the market.

All that day Rothschild sat in his office, a cold, unemotional, inscrutable figure. There was nothing in his appearance to indicate the great wealth and power of the man, but the rigid pose, the dead colour of the face, the studied blankness of the eyes, the whole air of astonishing indifference to everything and everybody, the indescribable callousness and hardness of this remarkable being were sufficiently extraordinary and characteristic.

Every few minutes a visitor would be announced, and then would come in. Suddenly the whole aspect of the man would change and blaze with energy. When the newcomer had communicated his message, telling what was the price at the moment of the Funds, and the names of the parties who were buying and selling, question after question would be asked of him with lightning-like rapidity—questions so keen and so comprehensive that the whole ground was covered, the entire position analysed and grasped in a moment.

Never appearing on the Stock Exchange in person, and generally acting, when any great coup was being worked, through brokers different from those usually employed by him, no inkling of his real plans was ever betrayed to any of his subordinates. In former days some had presumed to think that they understood him, but they had soon been undeceived by some lesson which he contrived to make exceeding bitter and—expensive to them.

Here was a man who was infinitely able to keep his own counsel, having learnt very early in life that one of the chief uses of speech was to create confusion and conceal what his intentions were. He was feared; he was hated; but no one affected to despise or ignore him. He was their master, and they knew it.

Brokers had planned and plotted against him times without number, but the victory had nearly always been with him.

Now, when he had got the market exactly to the point at which he wished to have it through these late operations of his, there was no trace of satisfaction or pleasure to be seen on his countenance. This, in any case, was the nature of the man, but just at the moment he was in some little doubt how to proceed. All that day he had been expecting couriers from abroad, but as yet they had not come.

Late in the afternoon Rothschild returned to his house at Stamford Hill—a locality at that time considerably affected by members of the Stock Exchange. Close upon midnight a carriage and four drove up to his gate, and two figures, closely muffled up, issued from the coach, and after some slight delay were admitted into the mansion.

Rothschild had retired to bed, but as soon as he knew the names of his nocturnal visitors, he rose and dressed. Presently the three were closeted together.

Opposite to the house of Mr. Rothschild stood the residence of another wealthy dealer on 'Change. This gentleman, a Mr. Herbert, had that night been out at a friend's house, where he had formed one of the not least hilarious of a very hilarious party. As he drew near his own residence, he noticed the carriage and four standing before the gate of the great Hebrew financier. His attention was at once aroused by what he knew to be a very unusual sight, and, as often happens, the wine he had taken, instead of rendering him less acute, had rather tended to sharpen his intelligence.

Descending from his coach, he told his driver to await him some distance away in the shelter of a high wall, the shadow of which hid the carriage from view. Taking advantage of the cover given him by the darkness, he crept stealthily close up to the entrance of the Rothschild grounds, and there, unobserved, waited patiently to see if he could find out what was the meaning of this late visit to his neighbour's place.

An hour passed in this manner, and Herbert was beginning to think that after all no particular meaning was to be attached to the presence of the coach and four. He was just about to return to his own carriage, when he heard steps approaching. A minute more, and he beheld Rothschild accompanied by two men who were unknown to him, and who were wrapped up in such a way as to conceal their features, come through the gate and step into the carriage.

"To the City," was the order given by Rothschild to the driver.

"Something afoot—something very important indeed," Herbert murmured to himself. "This is no ordinary business. How am I to discover what it is?"

Then there came into his mind—probably born of the wine whose influence he still felt, a somewhat daring plan. He considered the matter for a brief space, for it was necessary to act quickly if he were to succeed in carrying out the stratagem by which he hoped to be as wise as Rothschild himself, and resolved to attempt it.

When he reached his own carriage, the coachman was fast asleep, and was roused with some difficulty. Having told him the direction in which the carriage he desired to follow had gone, he promised him a considerable reward if he should catch it up sufficiently to keep it in sight without himself being perceived; and here luck befriended him, so that when Rothschild had reached the street in which the banker's office was situated, Herbert was not far behind, and could easily see where the other was going with his companions.

Telling his driver to stop, Herbert got out, and sent his carriage back to the stable. Though Herbert had undoubtedly been to some extent under the influence of his potations when he had left the convivial party, his long wait in the night air had certainly sobered him completely, and yet scarcely had his man driven away than it appeared that Herbert was very drunk indeed.

Never was there a drunker man. He lurched about from side to side, he reeled to and fro, he sang a snatch of a ribald song, he broke it off to shout aloud a loyal toast. In a word, he was so royally and mortally intoxicated that the wonder was that he did not fall in a heap, comatose and helpless, in the street.

Digitized by Google

The few people he met gave him but scant notice. It was a time when men drank deep, and their revels, when in the condition that Herbert was, excited no more than a good-natured smile or a half-indulgent oath. So when Herbert came staggering along, they passed him by with indifference.

Yet if anyone had watched his movements carefully, they would have seen that the drunken man was acting with a good deal of method.

Notwithstanding his reeling and lurching, he made his way as far as the office of Nathan Rothschild, and with a hoarse drunken scream knocked upon the door. Then, without further ceremony, he went in, to be met by the housekeeper, who was coming along the hall-way to see what the matter was.

When she saw this wild, dishevelled figure of a man, and realised the state in which he was, she broke into a great cry of terror. Yelling to her at the top of his voice to get out of his way, and heedless of the fright in which she was, he made as though he would push her aside. She, however, took hold of his arm, and began timidly to remonstrate with him.

For a moment Herbert seemed to yield. His face was turned towards the still open door. Then, as if changing his mind, he swung her somewhat roughly aside, uttering at the same time the most extraordinary Bacchanalian oaths. Knowing the exact position of Rothschild's particular den in the building, he at once made his way to it with many a stagger, each one of which seemed likely to be his last.

Meanwhile the housekeeper strove to hinder him from opening the door of the special chamber devoted to her master's use, and which he knew to be occupied at that very moment by Rothschild himself and the two men who had come with him only a short time before.

Putting her aside with some force, Herbert succeeded in entering Rothschild's private office, and no sooner had his foot crossed the threshold than, after swaying unsteadily about, as if in a vain effort to gain some degree of composure, he fell down flat on the floor, insensible and like one dead.

Behind the fallen man appeared the housekeeper, her face pale with vexation, fear, and horror.

"He's drunk," she gasped, "dead drunk."

"What is all this?" sternly demanded Rothschild, who had risen from his chair. His cheeks, too, were pallid. Master as he was of men, and of millions of money, there was always in his breast the haunting dread of assassination. He felt himself strong enough to provide against everything—but death. "Who is this?" he cried, pointing to the figure as it lay prone before him.

"He opened the door," protested the poor woman, "before I reached it—I'd heard him knock. Then he came in from the street, without as much as by your leave, or saying, 'What's your business.' I tried to restrain him, and to talk him over, so that he might go out quietly. But he thrust me aside, and I could do nothing with him."

She paused, and looked at her employer, whose appearance now indicated that that terrible fear which so often oppressed him was passing away.

"He is beside himself with wine," she continued. "He did not know what he was doing when he came in any more than he does now," she cried with hysterical tears.

"Opened the door, did he?" exclaimed Rothschild.

"Yes," she replied.

"But why was the door not locked?" demanded Rothschild.

"You came in yourself last, sir," she answered, "and you called to me not to mind as you entered."

"True. Well, what is to be done?" he asked. "We must do something for the man. He can't be left lying here in this condition. Yet he can hardly be thrust out into the street,—that might be the end of him. Who is it, I wonder?"

Meanwhile the two men who had come from Stamford Hill with Rothschild had looked on without saying a word. Now when Rothschild approached the drunken man, who was lying on his face full-length on the floor, they rose from their seats to assist him, and showed a lively wonder in this strange scene.

"You English people are curious people," said one of them, speaking with a marked foreign accent.

"You must not judge them by this," said Rothschild. "Who is it—let us see if I know him."

Taking hold of Herbert's body, he tried to turn it over to see if he could recognise the face. This he managed to do with some difficulty. He knew it at once.

"Herbert!" he exclaimed in amazement. "This is the most extraordinary thing."

"You know him, then?" said one of his visitors.

"Know him? Of course, I do. He is not only a well-known dealer on the Stock Exchange, but his house is not more than a stone's throw from my own. But, to speak the truth, I had no idea he was this kind of man. The amazing thing is that he should be down here in the city at this time of night. I cannot understand it."

In the meantime, he had been trying to get the inanimate form of the man into a sitting posture,—a process for which he required the help of the housekeeper. But for his sterterous breathing, Herbert might have been dead,—so utterly unconscious was he.

"After all," said Rothschild, "I think I know, perhaps, how this has come about. There are many queer clubs in London—night hawks, ghostly prowlers, and Herbert must belong to one of them. That, no doubt, is it."

Suddenly, even as Rothschild spoke, Herbert seemed to slip out of their hands, the back of his head striking the floor with a dull thud, while his face took on a deep purple hue, and his body stretched out tense and rigid.

Rothschild and his friends were fast becoming seriously alarmed. Herbert's drunken fit now seemed to them likely to end in apoplexy or some sudden seizure, which might have a fatal termination.

Digitized by Google

"Is there no quiet room to which he can be removed," asked one of the strangers.

"He should be put to bed and a physician sent for," said the other.

"This is the most comfortable room in the house," said Rothschild, "and as you can see for yourselves, it is none too comfortable."

"You are indeed a Spartan," said the man who had spoken first, with a half satirical smile. Rothschild's office was furnished with the utmost simplicity.

"Have you any brandy?" Rothschild now asked of the housekeeper.

Some spirits were brought in a glass, and an attempt was made to force the fluid between Herbert's set teeth, but in vain. Nothing apparently was of the slightest use.

"Perhaps you had better go for a doctor," said Rothschild to the woman.

"Let us try the effect of a bucket of water on him first," she suggested, and without waiting to hear his reply, went off to fetch it. A minute or two later, while Rothschild was apologising to his guests for the unseemly interruption which their business had suffered, she returned, and without more ado soused Herbert well with the water.

At first this drenching did not appear to affect Herbert's condition, but in the course of a short time the patient began to breathe in a more natural manner, and then fell into a somewhat noisy but sound sleep. Two or three rugs and a pillow were brought into the room, and Herbert was made as comfortable as circumstances permitted.

His anxiety for Herbert now being calmed, Rothschild said with a grim smile, "When Herbert comes to himself, and realises where he is, he will never forgive himself."

"That will depend on circumstances," said Herbert to himself under the rugs. "I wish, however, I was not so confoundedly wet."

"Now, señor," said Rothschild pointedly, to the taller of the two men, "I think you can tell me now, as fully as you possibly can, what intelligence you have brought me from Madrid."

In this year of grace, 1822, the famous compact which had bound the Holy Alliance, as it was called, together, was seen to be coming to an end. The British Government had been forced to the conclusion that it could be no party to the Absolutist views which were cherished by the sovereigns of Russia, Austria, Prussia, and France—views which completely rejected all liberal institutions, and were only satisfied by the most thorough-going despotism.

The problem before the Holy Alliance was: What was to be done with Spain and the revolted Spanish colonies in South America?

At this time the Spanish people were far from being well-disposed to their king, Ferdinand, whom Europe sought to impose upon them. They protested that they were entitled to select the form of government that suited them best without any interference on the part of anyone outside their own country. To a certain extent they were backed up in this attitude by Great Britain.

France had called upon the allied monarchs to re-establish the despotism of Ferdinand, and had gone so far as to assemble a considerable army on the slopes of the Pyrenees.

Such was the state of things when the Duke of Wellington was sent as plenipotentiary to the Continental monarchs, and he was frankly told in Paris that 100,000 French troops had been mobilised; one column was to pass into the country through Catalonia, while the other was to march by the great road through Irun upon Madrid.

A week before the time when Rothschild had met his two visitors, the duke had let it be known that he had practically failed in his efforts to keep the French king quiet. He had then gone on to Vienna, where a great congress was expected to be held.

What Rothschild was anxious to know from his Spanish visitors was what the attitude would be of the Spaniards if a French army invaded their country. To his questions on this point he received the reply that the leaders of the revolution were jealous of each other, and that it was tolerably certain that their rivalries would render the work of the French very easy.

He had also brought a letter in cipher from one of Rothschild's most trusted correspondents, who looked after his business in the Peninsula, stating that a French occupation would be a matter of little consequence, as the Spanish people were uneasy and restless, and, on the whole, would prefer a more settled form of government than that they now had.

Rothschild's second visitor was from Paris, and had been sent across the Channel by the brother who was the head of that branch of the Rothschild family.

After some conversation as to the position of affairs in France at the time, it transpired that the French Government had been asking in an informal manner if the Rothschilds would be willing to float a loan for a large sum of money, the understanding being that it was to be used in the Spanish campaign for the restoration of Ferdinand. Otherwise, the French troops would not cross the mountains.

"There will be no loan," said Rothschild shortly, "for any such purpose."

He drew towards him some writing materials, and wrote a brief letter, which he gave to the French courier.

"So far as we are concerned there shall be no war," said Rothschild. "Money is no longer to be made out of war."

As anyone who is acquainted with history must be well aware, what Rothschild said was not fulfilled. Spain was occupied, but that did not take place for a considerable time later, and the circumstances which led the Rothschilds to advance the necessary funds in the end to the French king lie outside the domain of this narrative.

Digitized by Google

For the present the key-note of the occasion was that there was to be no war in Spain. That very morning this would be announced in such a way that confidence would be restored upon the Stock Exchange, and the result would be that, as always happened in such cases, there would be a marked rise in Consols and every other class of security.

Before dismissing his visitors, he sent out to the housekeeper to call a carriage.

"You will drive back to my house," he said to them when it had arrived, "and you will tell my people to go across to my brother-in-law, Montefiore, and ask him to come to me at once. Say the business is most important, and will admit of no delay."

When they had gone, he sat for awhile wrapt in thought. Then, regardless of the sleeping figure, whose presence there he had almost forgotten, he commenced to speak to himself aloud.

"It will be some hours before the Stock Exchange can learn the news I shall give it. If I let it be known after noon, that will be quite time enough. As soon as the Exchange opens, I will have Montefiore and a host of other brokers employed in picking up all the stock they can get without disturbing the market."

He was as calm, as impassive as ever. At this sort of game, he was endlessly proficient. That his gains should be made out of the losses of others disturbed him not in the least. Though he believed himself to be entirely alone, as it was shown by this soliloquy, no one would have marked anything unusual in his demeanour.

After all, he was only using his money and brains against the money and brains of others, who would have only been too glad to have been able to act as he did.

Two or three hours sped away. It was now nearly daylight, and he grew very anxious over the delay of the appearance of his most trusted broker. He reckoned up in his mind the time it should have taken for his message to have been delivered and responded to, and came to the conclusion that some accident had occurred. After waiting a short time longer, he determined to go himself as fast as possible on the way to Stamford Hill, taking the road along which he was sure his brother-in-law must come.

Hardly had the door closed behind Rothschild when Herbert showed some symptoms of recovering. After her master had gone out, the housekeeper entered the room to see how her patient was getting on. She found him sitting up, and, although he still presented a most haggard appearance, he appeared to be coming to himself.

"How do you feel, sir?" she asked.

"Oh, I think I am all right," responded Herbert. "Although I am perfectly distracted with a violent headache. But where am I? What has happened! This is certainly not my own house."

"You are in the office of Mr. Rothschild," she said.

"In Mr. Rothschild's office," he exclaimed. "How did I get here?"

The housekeeper smiled.

"Well, sir, when you came here last night you were hardly aware of what you were doing."

"Oh, I see," he said. "I must have had too much wine at the club last night. I am afraid I have given you a great deal of trouble," and he rose up and stood on his feet. "I must be going," he said, and he handed her a couple of guineas. "Let that pay you for your trouble."

The housekeeper tried to expostulate with him. He really ought to rest a little longer, for he was not well enough to go out. But he was resolved, he said, and presently went out into the street, where the air was so fresh and bracing that not only did he at once lose all signs of his headache, but in a remarkably short space of time had managed also to present something uncommonly like his ordinary appearance.

As he went along he smiled pleasantly to himself. "Never was there such a chance," he said, in his gayest manner. "Rothschild will never forgive me, but if I work matters properly, his forgiveness will not matter a bit to me."

Next he went to an early coffee house, where he made a hearty breakfast. Then he sauntered to the office of his principal broker, who was not a little surprised at so early a visit.

Nor was his surprise less when Herbert gave him instructions to buy as soon as the market had opened an enormous amount of the three and four per cents., as well as an equally large block of Omnium.

"I suppose you know what you are doing?" said the astonished broker. "The market has been very weak for the last two days. You must surely have heard something?"

"You may be quite certain of that," Herbert replied.

The broker did as he was ordered, and by eleven o'clock had fulfilled the whole of Herbert's commissions, and it was just about this time that Herbert met Rothschild, whom he asked satirically, "How are you off for stock?"

When Rothschild's brokers appeared in the market, a heavy rise in Consuls had already taken place, and while their actions, and the favourable news from abroad still further stimulated prices, the advantage lay with Herbert, who was able to sell in the afternoon of the same day the stock he had bought in the morning at a gain of from three to four per cent.

Rothschild never forgave Herbert for what he termed "a base, dishonest, and nefarious stratagem."

Great Cricket Competition

PRIZES OF £1,000, £100, £25.

In Pearson's Weekly now on sale appear particulars of a big competition in which the above substantial amounts are offered.

A list of fifteen matches appears, and all you have to do is to indicate which club you consider will win in the same way as the famous Pearson's Weekly Football Competitions.

Digitized by Google

GREAT - WAR - COMPETITION.

FIRST PRIZE . . £5 | 25 Prizes of Handsome Books.
Five Prizes of £1 each. | 25 Gold-plated Pencil-cases.

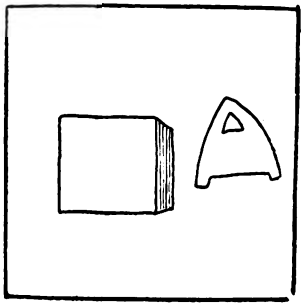
In the event of a tie, the prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

TOO much interest is at the present moment centred in that part of the world round the unfortunate Island of Cuba, that the competition we have inaugurated, and which starts to-day, should commend itself particularly to readers of Short Stories.

Below will be found eight pictures. Each one depicts the name of some place, or ship, or man associated with the combatants. Five sets of these pictures will be published. Write down the names in the spaces provided, and keep all the sets by you until we ask you to send them in.

The daily newspapers will give you the best help in discovering solutions, as most of the names depicted have already appeared in the press.

THIS WILL HELP YOU.

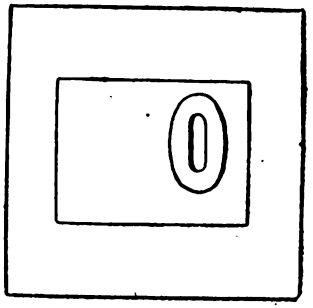


No. 1.—CUBA.

WARSHIP.

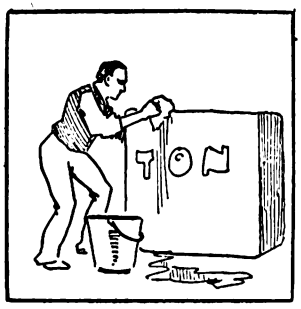
No. 2.....

LEADER.



No. 3.....

PLACE.



No. 4.....

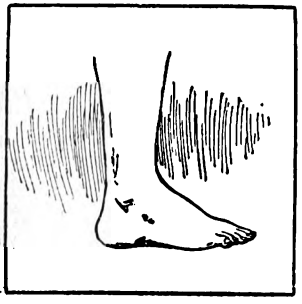
WARSHIP.

No. 5.....

LEADER.

No. 6.....

WARSHIP



No. 7.....

WAR COMPETITION.

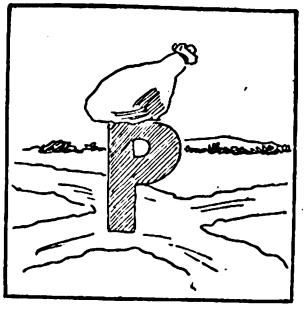
No. 1.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

PLACE.



No. 8.....

Digitized by Google

THE EMPRESS OF THE EARTH

THE TALE OF THE YELLOW WAR

BY M. P. SHIEL.

CHAPTER XXVI. (continued).

By the time Hardy reached his own ship in No. 98, the three appointed battle-ships were off to the west.

It was just three bells, first dog-watch; and the day, as if lingering to see, showed hardly a tendency to darken. The Allied fleet was now much more distinctly marked on the horizon. The British had quite a stripped appearance, prepared, to its mast-heads, for battle.

As so n as Hardy reached his deck he ordered eight knots to be signalled. And at once the two masses of power began to approach rapidly, growing up upon each other, marching over to the insubstantial deep, to meet.

It is impossible for even the coolest heart to be present at the impending of a contest so august, without a quickened beat, a thump of awe. Even to contemplate the thing from afar is horror. The weak flesh shrinks. The forces that rush to horrid combat are hardly of man,—they stride out into the infinite, they reach the supernatural, they become ghostly. Commonplace Jack suddenly finds himself face to face with ineffable Hades.

They are ten miles apart—they are eight—they are six. The heart seems jammed in the dry throat, and the hands shake like reeds through which the huntsman's dog has flitted. The anticipation of the thing is, if possible, a greater horror than the reality.

The five ships have pricked their course off, debouching to port, and the three appointed torpedo-boats are rushing like sword-fish still further to port upon the single doomed ship designated by Hardy. Only the Royal Sovereign in the far starboard limb maintains her straight course to eastward. Hardy is in her conning-tower, and his eyes, alight with awe and joy, are everywhere.

Signal after signal goes up from the Royal Sovereign. The speeds on both sides intensify. She is five miles from the line of the two ships between which she means to run, and she is the foremost of her own fleet. In two minutes she is four miles; in two more three. How frightful is her Silence. . . . !

If the earth's foot should slip upon its course, and she were perceived to be sailing slowly, yet with ever swifter and madder joy, toward her native sun, just so the wild heart would beat, and the blanched face be pinched. . . .

The ships are no longer mere toys one to the other. They are two miles apart. Hardy waits, grandly patient. They are two thousand yards apart. . . . And then the Royal Sovereign talks.

Talks—and is answered. It is a single savage bark of Cerberus, the hell-dog, answered by two single savage Cerberus-barks—the talk of heavy guns. But before the sounds have passed in pallid flight over that sea, there breaks forth a continued rolling row, like that solemn roar of doom and deep-throated jabber of bubbering and thundering Etna, the mere intolerable tumult of which throws the crews into a sort of crazy daze. It is the lighter guns which chatter.

John Hardy forgets Yen How and his tortures. He is a youth again. A wild hilarity lights his gallant eyes.

But now he is passing midway between the two ships, and straight before him is the third. Not an instant of that precious period passes unmarked by him. Though his face, like all faces there, is the face of a madman, the back of his brain is cool as ice.

"Plenty of quick thunder," he had said—in his robust, Cromwellian way! And as he passed by her, the great Brennus reeled and plunged, with a sort of haste, from sight.

But now all the battle, over many a mile of troubled sea, is rolled in smoke; and nimble-treading clouds pass in mysterious haste to and fro across the water. From fifteen miles away to northward there comes a great detonation, and the Italia is "in the air." The three torpedo-boats detailed to attack her have been sunk, but the sixth steel-needle waits half a minute swinging between her screws, and bursts, and sends her—flying.

Near by, Lord Beresford on the Anson, has rammed the Lepanto at a triangle-apex, and run on with sinking bows toward the Amiral Duperré and the Oldenburg; and these two he passes with such a rain of wrath that not a single crew is left alive at their unprotected guns.

Now, if never before, is proved the truth of Hardy's saying, that the modern battleship is a destructive, rather than a self-protective, engine. Even as he gasps the sharp, short order "Ram!" the two masses of white cloud, within which are the Royal Sovereign and the Francisco Morosimi coalesce; they are both tearing along at fifteen knots, in nearly opposite directions; they close—they meet; and there is nothing on earth to which to liken the shocking jar with which those armoured powers crash.

On both ships every living brain spins and faints; and before any one has recovered consciousness, the Francisco Morosimi is wheeling furiously in a hollow basin of sea, whose waters shoot and gurgle in cataracts above her leaning hull.

All along the line of fifteen miles, from the Italia "in the air" to the Francisco Morosimi in the deep, the tale of tragedy has accumulated; and in three minutes the charge is over, and the ships are firing stern-guns.

Only three minutes—and at the end of that time, one British battle-ship, the Illustrious, and four foreign battle-ships, the Italia, the Francisco Morosimi, the Lepanto, and the Admiral-ship, are no longer there; seven minutes later, and nine more foreign battle-ships, with three more British, sink, without receiving any further injuries. Some of the crews of these last are afloat in boats.

Two of the six British ships in tatters, and six of the enemy in tatters, still float. John Hardy slowly opens his eyes, leaps to his feet, looks round, and orders his helm to be put to starboard, for there is a wide clear space about him. He is told, in reply, that it is impossible to keep steam, as the water is rising in the stoke-holds.

Digitized by Google

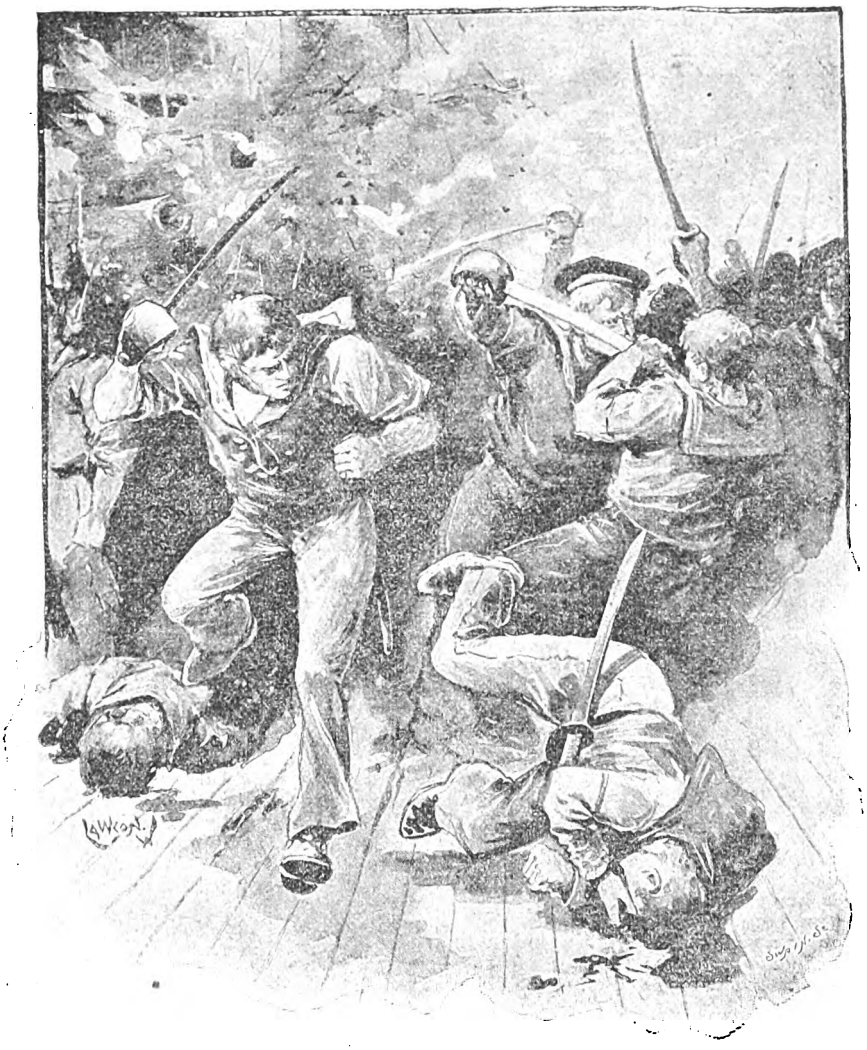
This only means that he cannot ram again, not that the fight is quite over for him. The Royal Sovereign creeps wearily round; yonder to the northwest is a still reeking ship, the Sfax, apparently hardly moving; and like a dying lion, intent upon dealing a last rent to his enemy, the Royal Sovereign, trailing her wounded stern, drags herself painfully forward upon the Sfax.

The ships are alone, and the combat, dreadful because almost stationary, lasts five minutes. Neither is fit for fight, yet neither will strike colours. The rain of shells clash midway in the air, and burst in unison, as if with clapping hands, and grand hurrahs of flame and sound. The ships are near, and suddenly Hardy cries: "Helm hard to port—hands prepare to board!" And as the Sfax discharges a last broadside at nothingness, the high bow of the Royal Sovereign creeps forward upon the quarter of the Sfax, there is a small crash and mutual shudder of the meeting ships, and the next moment, Jack, with Hardy at his head, is swarming, cutlass in hand, with nimble impetuosity, into the enemy's aft upper-deck. The feat is unexpected; the Frenchmen wince and die; in a moment the British tar is everywhere, and his touch is rough. A white-faced commodore rushes past Hardy on the main-deck, crying: "We yield! we yield!"



Swarming, cutlass in hand, with nimble impetuosity, into the enemy's aft upper-deck.

The stern of the Sfax sways and wobbles a little. She feels the suction of the Royal Sovereign, which has quietly sunk beside her.

Hardy stills the tumult, orders the French flag to be pulled down, and leaps to the conning-tower. He looks abroad with keenly curious eyes over the sea. Around him is a great dull roar, and the air is all of thin smoke. No human brain can now fully divine, much less direct, the vast drama that is still progressing. Far away, beyond the ken of vision, the battle is raging between meeting cruisers, between torpedoes and contre-torpilleurs, between shot and shell, ram and barbette, in incalculable hurly-burly. But through all this confusion there has run, and runs, a thread of plan, on at least one side. Hardy, as far as he can see, is well content.

He waits and waits, with wildly throbbing heart, for the appearance of his three battle-ships.

As for himself, he is a prisoner. The Sfax has neither screw, nor rudder, nor boat.

At last they come, hurrying from the eastward, where they have been delayed by sinking the greater part of the enemy's troopships—in line abreast.

Hardy's signalman has been busy among the French flags, and when they approach within a thousand yards of the Sfax, summoned by steam-syren, he signals them to destroy, or capture, the five dismantled battle-ships which remain.

And with this order the battle is nearly over: the mere apparition of the fresh ships has all but won it. There is a renewed energy of firing which lasts from four to five minutes.

And then a gradual, and finally deathly silence grows upon the dun air, and the callous green sea-surface; and night at last descends.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER XXVII.

The Yellow Danger.

We, writing the history, have gone into detail, and explained the means employed by Hardy in the winning of this great battle.. But the mass of the British public, not looking narrowly into means, looking only at the astonishing result, hailed the victory as a perplexing miracle of genius.

That even one of the British ships should return to harbour was marvellous. But that three should return, having in tow two Italian and one French ship, after destroying the whole overwhelming remainder of the invading force, this seemed to approach the incredible.

The three ships arrived at Portsmouth at eleven in the night. They were the Nile, the Hero, and a sloop, the Pelican. (The Benbow, the third of the ships kept by Hardy in reserve, had been torpedoed at the last moment.) They had on board, beside their own crews, Lord Beresford, Hardy, and a number of boatloads of British and foreign sailors which they had picked up. The three captured ships—the Sfax, and two Italian gun-boats, all disabled—were towed to Newhaven, and left. The three British, almost intact (the Hero had some central-battery guns unshipped) proceeded to Portsmouth.

At midnight there was a sound of jubilee bells in London, in Liverpool, and in every considerable town in Britain. Watch-night processions, which showed no intention of going to bed, filled the streets; and penniless Hodge at the door of the village ale-house heard a rumour, and was glad.

Better times would come now; hard Scarcity and dreary outlook would be no more; the great war was over; and the True Blue had won it.

But the real case was fearfully different. The war just practically ended was a preliminary: it was the first-piece comedietta before the tragedy, and it was put upon the stage by a great actor in order the better to set off his own grandiose strutting and storming. It was the streak of foam which fore-runs the tidal-wave.

If ever a man had a day of strain and toil it was John Hardy that day; with every breath his chest wheezed in labour; when he landed at Portsmouth at eleven, his hands hung so heavy that he could hardly stir them. His voice was gone. The sound of thunder still rang in his ears.

Yet, even while preparations were being made for a train to conduct him to London, he wrote, and had sent off, a telegram. It was to the editor of the Times. It said:

> Kindly reserve two columns for letter from me for to-morrow. Will let you have manuscript by three a.m.
>
> John Hardy.

At this message Printing House Square rubbed its tickled hands, and was prone to dance. The editorial head grew dizzy with big anticipation. For copy at that moment from John Hardy, two columns of it, was copy indeed—and gratis! It seemed too exquisite a thing to be true.

"But what can it be all about?" wondered the editor.

"A thrilling description of the battle!" suggested an inspired sub.

"Hardly that, perhaps," doubted the Chief.

One of the staff waited in Cavendish Square, which till far into the morning was filled by an upper-class crowd. A little before three the Times man drove from Hardy's door with the precious copy written in pencil; and not till then did Hardy's head drop asleep on the table where he had sat; part of the copy he had scribbled in the train with half-closed eyes.

The letter contained no thrilling description of the battle; though it was thrilling enough, too, and made the Times editor rub his eyes in a somewhat unusual way.

Was the letter a stupendous hoax? Or was it a letter, the publication of which would lift the Times to a greater pitch of glory than was ever dreamt of by human editor in this world before?

The Times man was questioned narrowly. From whom had he received the letter? From Hardy's old butler himself. There could be no mistake.

It appeared next morning, side by side with the detailed description of the battle. And England rubbed its eyes, too, as the Times editor had rubbed his.

Hardy had spoken out clearly, careless, in his belief in the British character, whether he threw the nation into a state of panic or not. He told what was coming; he explained the motive with which the European war had been brought about by Yen How; he told of the massacre, of the action of the Japanese fleet; he showed how there was not even the least possible chance for Europe; how England alone, for a time at least, was sheltered by her sea; and how this was the chance of England to come forward and prove her patriarchal heart, her imperial clemency, her motherhood of the world. He gave his reasons for thinking that the fulfilment of his prophecy was near, impending, about to happen. And he wound up with a series of numbered skeleton recommendations. They were:

1. That the tiny remainder of the British fleet be utilised to seize all the merchant-ships in European ports; and that these ships, together with all the available ships in the British mercantile marine, be employed, with or without the consent of foreign governments or individual owners, in bringing over to England, and in taking to America, and to Africa, such of the inhabitants of Europe as could and would seek shelter in those countries.
2. That America be invited to a League with Britain, having for its object the salvation of the white races, and the extermination of the yellow.
3. That the armies of Britain be at once recalled from the Continent.
4. That the Government at once begin to make all possible provision for the huge increase of population in Britain which would result on the appearance in Europe of the yellow men.

Such were the Times two-columns, and under the last was the name John Hardy.

Of the sensation which this letter caused it is impossible to give a real idea, for there is nothing else to which to compare it. By noon copies of the paper were being bought and sold for ten guineas.

At this hour thanksgiving hymns were being sung; and the name of Hardy was being made the text of a thousand sermons.

After the battle of Shorcham, he had been instinctively adopted by the race as its "darling;" the battle of the Channel made him definitely its hero; his letter made him its Leader.

He was at once elected a member of the Permanent Committee of National Safety.

Not that there was no searching of heart, no doubting, as to this extraordinary letter. To many people it seemed as wild as possible. All the proof which Hardy could adduce to shew that the Yellow Wave was near (if it was coming at all) was his contention that Yen How, having destroyed Europe by the European war, would not be silly enough to wait for Europe to recover herself before his invasion. The argument was sound, if the hypothesis was sound. But where were the signs of his coming? There was an "if."

On the whole, however, the nation had learnt to trust him; and trusting him, it stood aghast at his awful message.

At this time, the people of Britain, if they had never been so before, was genuinely a Nation, as distinct from a mob. They had suffered keenly together, resolved and acted nobly together: and they had been welded in the furnace-heat. By a Nation we mean a multifold Man. It was remarkable, about this period, how large an amount of attention was attracted by certain badly-spelt letters written to the papers. Each man felt himself verily part of the whole, and "the government was upon his shoulders."

Digitized by Google

It was no longer a nation of shop-keepers—it was a nation of Councillors. "To be made perfect by suffering" is even more true of communities than of individuals. "Happy," it is said, "is the nation which has no history"—but "nation" in that phrase should be spelt "crowd." It is the Marathons and Trafalgars which knit and nationalise. At all events, Britain, now, with her largely decreased population, was certainly knit and nationalised. She could proceed from thought to action almost with the spontaneity of a single brain and arm. In her hand was the sword, but upon her brow sat Deliberation, and the grave air of the Statesman.

This was all the more, and not the less reason why Hardy's announcements should be followed by the wildest dismay, the most unalloyed panic. For Britain, and every Briton, felt that it was England, in the end, who would have to dam the yellow wave, or sink beneath it; that it was she, and she alone, who must needs take up the cross of the world, and, like the Christ of the nations, with many an agony and bloody sweat, redeem mankind.

Laden with booty.

Whatever else was true or false in Hardy's letter, this, it was clear, was true: that, in the event of the yellow wave, Continental Europe was powerless.

When there would be no eye to pity, and no arm to save, it must, then, be the arm of Britain which should bring salvation. And was it able . . .?

There was the fleet of Japan, the fleet of China. And if even there were not the fleet of Japan, neither was there any longer a British fleet at all capable of opposing the landing, even in open boats, of an endless succession of innumerable armies on various parts of the coast.

These reflections at once occurred to everyone. And they had the same effect upon the mind, as if it had been scientifically announced that some fatal change was about to occur in the composition of the atmosphere of the earth.

It was felt, of course, that the yellow conquest could not be an ordinary conquest, if it happened at all. There was no question of conqueror and conquered living together afterwards and fraternizing, like Norman and Saxon. The yellow conquest meant, naturally, that wherever it passed, the very memory of the white races it encountered would disappear for ever.

At this dark thought, the heart quailed: and there was Panic.

And at five o'clock of the day of the Times two-columns, the Pall Mall Gazette came out with the following:

"(From Our Own Correspondent.)

"New York.—The New York Evening Post publishes to-day the report that a body of Thibetans (?) has seized the Russian railway between Kokand and Krasnovodsk, together with the partially-dismantled fortress at Samarkand, and have finally appeared at the east bank of the Caspian. Their number, probably amounting to ten or fifteen thousand, has not been definitely ascertained. The rumour originates, I understand, from an Evening Post correspondent at Astrakhan, and comes vid Odessa and Paris."

This item of news, meagre as it was, was enough for Britain. At once everyone jumped at the right conclusion. Here, it was agreed, were "the signs of his coming"—the first!

As when a sudden comet lowers near the earth, terrifying the heart of kings, prophesying Change to the nations, and shaking pestilence from her "horrid hair"—so, with its growing certainty, did the British nation cower at the dread future. Someone rediscovered the telegram about the 500 Chinese at Petersburg, and noised it abroad afresh. The bleak and dismal sky lowered darkly.

At twilight the Prime Minister was sitting by John Hardy's bed-side, which two physicians had just left.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

The Three Gospels.

About the time when the three important personages met at the inn, in the wood near Liège, Dr. Yen How was deep in study from morning to night. On the table before him, all round his feet, overflowing upon every article of furniture in the apartment, were maps, general maps, local maps, special maps, survey maps. He had a goodly wide brain, and every village in Europe, its position, its name, its population, and every stream, and fort, and railway, and town, was climbing into that brain, one after the other, with the intention of staying there. And when he was finished, he knew how Nature had made Europe, and how man had made it, and what was in it.

He knew also Asia.

While he was still pondering his maps, China was already far on its march. The seizure of the railway-line by "Thibetans" (?), reported in the Pall Mall Gazette, had taken place four weeks before the news reached New York. The British army of India, afterwards annihilated in Russia, had passed that way, and left an easy task for the yellow pioneers.

Even before this, China had begun to flow westward. Yen How had found her a frozen stream; and like a frozen stream when the sun shines strongly, she had moved at last under his steady heat, slowly, in trickling rivulets, long before the crash of the dripping ice and the billowing broad rush of the torrent.

Having waked China by the methods we have described, how did he effect this irresistible Western tendency, so mighty in its impulse that an arm a million times stronger than Yen How's could not have checked it, had he willed?

He did it by preaching, with the inspiration of Confucius, only with a far greater success than Confucius, his three gospels of Greed, of Race, and of Cruelty.

And in doing so, he remembered the density of the skull which he had to inspire with ideas; he was not preaching even to Russian moujiks, but to men slower still of understanding. To plough a fact into their brains, he knew that he must plough hard. But he was quite equal to this. With his usual thoroughness he said: "A hundred ways: and of these one will not fail." At all events he had chosen the doctrines to teach which the Chinese were most apt to learn, and had, in fact, already been taught by nature. And herein lay his chief wisdom.

Digitized by Google

Just when the pressure of the new taxation crushed heaviest upon the penurious poor of China, he collected an army of 400,000, composed of men taken from each of the regiments into which all the land of the Mongols was now divided; and this force he hurled in two divisions across the Si-Kiang against Annam, the ancient antagonist of China, and Burma. The horrors perpetrated in these atrocious, and totally unexpected raids, could not be described; a great massacre resulted, and the army amassed hoards of spoil, gathered from many a Buddhist vihára and jewelled palace-gate. And immediately on its return, the individuals who composed it were redrafted, laden with booty, to their former districts, to spread through every village in China fairy-tales of gore and gold in foreign lands.

There was not, moreover, a drill-sergeant of the remotest squad of conscripts who did not become a missionary of Yen How, preaching for him the three glad tidings of Hades.

Many Chinese did not know that there was any other land than China, nor had, till the Massacre, seen a white man, nor known that there were such things as white men.

Now they heard and the astonished ear was charmed.

Could it be that beyond that land of pinched Scarcity which they knew, there was Another, in which feeble, pretty creatures, resembling real men, lived in rose-beds, and threw to one another balls of gold, and made love on couches of eider-down and ivory? And if not, what was this rumour, this tidings of good, coming strangely from afar, this new talk? And this new holiday of blood, and this new drilling, after four thousand years? And this new Movement, and this new stirring of sap in the old, dead tree-trunk after the long, long, changeless Winter? Surely the seasons return! and by wondrous miracle leaves are again on the branches, and all is new! There is, then, Spring and Joy in the world? and not utter, ugly Woe—four thousand years of age? Gold?—and frail, white limbs to be torn apart?—and the blood of luxurious kings to be quaffed by thirsty Chinamen in carved goblets of alabaster?—and cushions of embroidered silk hanging in plenty for all among the lazy, rotting melons on the far-off trees?

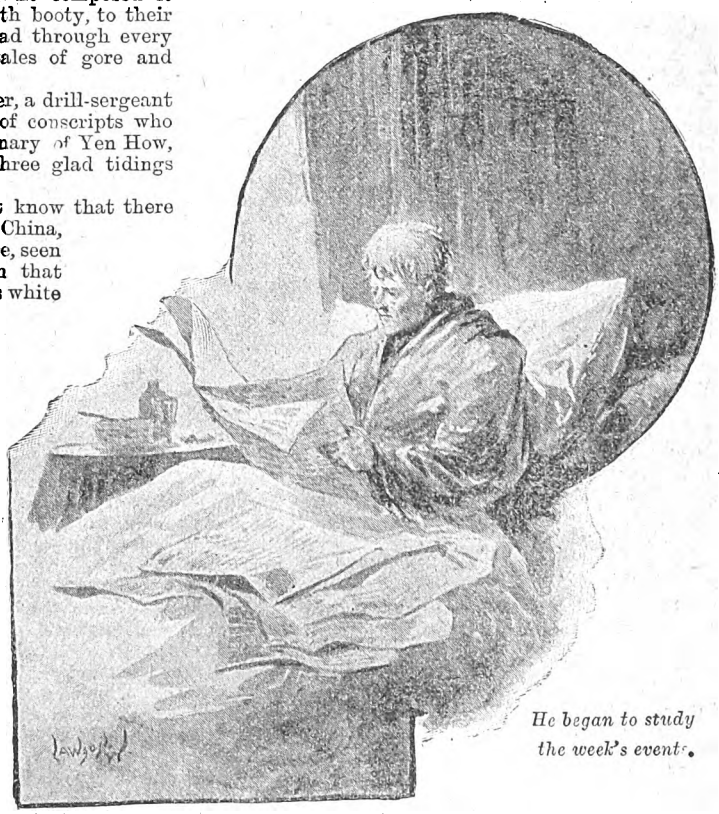
Far into the dreamiest wilds of savage China, Mongolia, Thibet, came this message of blessedness, this New Religion of lust. And every citizen became a convert, and every convert a zealot, and every zealot an apostle.

And the more intolerable Yen How made China for them with burden, and drill, and tax, the louder and deeper swelled their cry to be led forthwith into this promised land of plenty afar.

In the commentaries of Cæsar we read of whole communities packing, as it were, their trunks, leaving their own land, and migrating in a body to some new territory. It was this strange, wandering tendency which now possessed the Mongolian race; but instead of a tribe or community on the march, the stars were to look down and behold a nomad Empire.

This weird and, indeed, awful spectacle, Destiny had held concealed in her womb; for this, too, was to be one of the acts in the drama of Man; and in the fulness of time it was evolved, and seen.

But no one knew better than Dr. Yen How that the Mongolian race in its passage across the old world would meet with obstacle and pain—the weariness of the march, the day's hunger, the fight in the street, the rain of shot and shell at Metz, and Königsberg, and Paris, and Dover; as for the Japanese section of the race, they knew that Greed and Cruelty alone were incentives sufficient to provide a steady impulse to their native firmness and valour; but as for the Continental section of it, he decided to hurl them forward by an added impulse—the excitation of the instinct of Race.



He began to study the week's event.

In China this instinct took, always, a religious form. And hence Yen How had skilfully contrived to invest his Massacre with something of the solemnity of a Rite. In the cities round the coast, where the white man had long been known, and abominated, the massacre gave an impetus to racial animus, which perhaps was capable of no further fury; but, in addition, he planned for China on the whole a religious mania in connection with this very race instinct, which he counted upon to inspire it in the direction he willed with the frenzy of the Crusader.

The religion of China consisted in the worship of their dead; and this worship took the form also of the worship of the living, whenever the living happened to be a reincarnation of the dead. On this point Buddhism and Confucianism were at one: the belief in reincarnation.

The living were reincarnations of the dead when they were either proclaimed to be so by the priests, or when they were proclaimed to be so by the Emperor, or—when they could work miracles.

Now, Yen How could work the most astounding miracles; and he was proclaimed by the Emperor, and he was proclaimed all over China by the priests, to be the reincarnation of a dead man. And the dead man of whom he was proclaimed to be the reincarnation was—Confucius.

To begin with, he was made a Saint.

Then (at about the time when John Hardy joined the Englishmen at Kiao-chau) began a remarkable triumphant passage through China of this great man and his enormous Court of dignitaries, when, in a grand religious festival, lasting by Imperial Decree through a month, Yen How was presented and hailed in temple and at praying-mill, from Pekin to Lhassa, as the Heaven-descended Leader of the only Race, come back, according to old promise, to lead them to the conquest and fruition of the world. His progress was attended with more than imperial pomp; he was raised high on a throne of royal splendour, and exhibited to the muttering and kneeling people; the dazzled eye admitted him a god.

Digitized by Google

If in some mountain-dell of remotest China there had dwelt some benighted peasant who had never yet heard the name of Yen How, the ruler, the driller, the oppressor, there was certainly not one now who did not know of Yen How, the Reincarnate, the bringer of glad tidings, the Head of his People.

Confucius was China; and Yen How was Confucius. He stood for the Race.

Thus did he centre in his own Person the whole race-instinct and race-religion of the land. He associated the new creed of lust with the old of superstition; and of both he was the embodiment and Prophet.

He knew that principles must centre in a Person before they can lead nations by the nose, and fire them to heroism and martyrdom. No stirring Mahomedanism without Mahomet, and no strong Christianity without Christ. But in thus making himself the sole guide and motive-power, the one centre of adoration and trust, to the whole people, he went a step too far; he committed an error in tactics; he did not take into account every contingency.

For if the shepherd chance to perish, what will become of the sheep?

This was the very question which John Hardy, with his sure eye for the main fact among ten thousand, asked himself:

"If the shepherd chance to perish . . . ?"

At all events, it was the shepherd with which he, personally, had mainly to do. Between him and Yen How was the tug of war; and he knew it.

So, as he lay among his pillows, almost as white as they, a week after the battle in the channel, he called old Bobbie to him, and said:

"Bobbie, do you know anything about British regiments and the dress they wear?"

"Not much, I am afraid, Master John," answered Bobbie.

"Well, then, you will find out, please, and as soon as possible—to-day. I want to know what regiment it is whose privates wear——" and he frowned in an effort of recollection—"wear a scarlet uniform with white facings, and have somewhere about them a Prince of Wales' plume, and a Coronet. Yes, that is it. Please find out; and whether they are still in existence, and all about them."

The old servant bowed and went away. In his eyes now there was a perpetual look of wonder and reproach. The colour and taste of the world was changed to him; someone had meddled with his heart's delight; Hardy had come back, but the dazed old fellow could not find him.

Hardy was now recovering from an attack of asthma which had brought him near to death. When he opened his eyes to renewed care and thought, he had lost a week. The Chinese were now in Europe.

He put out his thin hand and languidly lifted a Times, and he saw the words: "The Yellow Terror," and his hand fell helplessly; and presently he lifted the paper again, and he glanced at another place, and saw the words: "It is this scream of the Chinese which seems to inspire their victims with some indefinable new species of terror, never before . . .;" and his hand fell again.

But already, by the next morning, he could sit up in bed to drink his cordial, and then he began to study the week's events. His vitality was in reality intense and tough, and the single thread by which he clung to life a strong one. He set to work to gather facts, and he could work stoutly.

While the pile of papers was still about him, old Bobbie hobbled into the chamber.

"This, I think, Master John, is the name of the regiment you want," said the old man, handing a slip of paper.

On the paper was written:

"The Duke of Cambridge's Own (Middlesex Regiment). Regimental Dist.: No. 57— Hounslow."

"Well, Bobbie, and what about them?" asked Hardy.

"The Depôt of the Regiment is Hounslow, Master John; and their late history is this: the first line battalion was in India at the beginning of the year, and the second line battalion was drafted from South Africa to join them a month after the commencement of the war. Both of these, as far as is known, have been destroyed in Russia. The 3rd and 4th (Militia) battalions have been fighting in North Germany, and seem to be no longer in existence, except for some few now in hospital at Chelsea, sir."

"And have you found out the names of those?"

"No, Master John."

"Then do so at once."

He went on reading. The actual details in the papers had about them a certain indefiniteness, and they were not voluminous; but he was quickly able to determine that the Chinese avalanche was pouring in four main streams.

(To be continued.)

RESULT OF "BOOK" COMPETITION FOR WEEK ENDING APRIL 23rd.

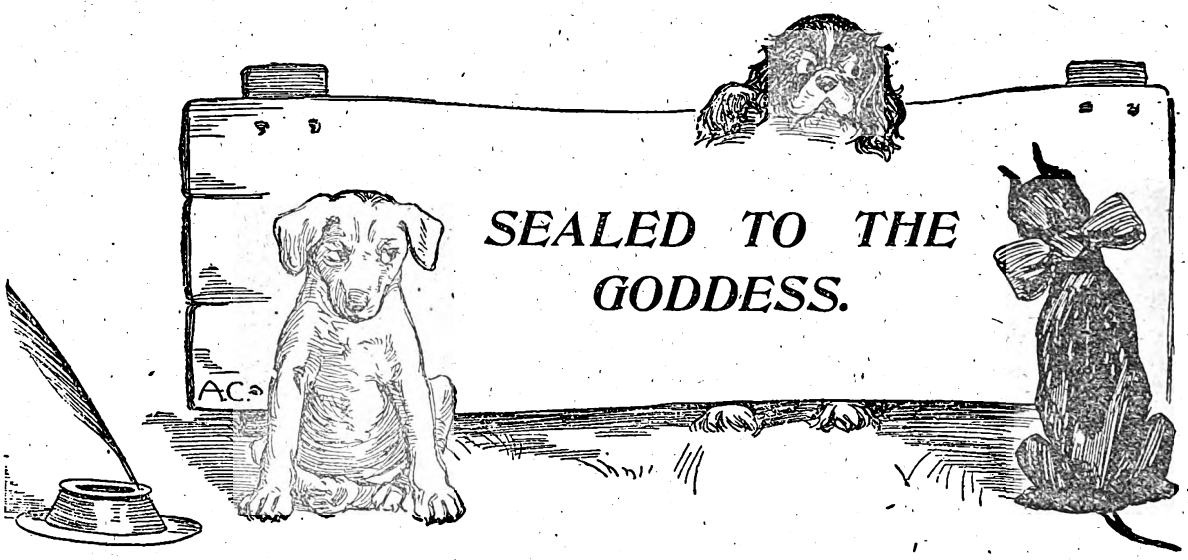
G. B. Hall, The Chantry, Ely. "Twenty-thousand Leagues Under the Sea." By Jules Verne.
H. C. Khyler, 95 Cedar Grove, Lodge Lane, Liverpool. "The Student's English Dictionary."
George Jenkins, Dafen House, Dafen, Llanelly, South Wales. "Cowham's School Method."
L. Albott, 10 Lindal Road, Crofton Park, Brockley, S.E. "Condemned as a Nihilist."
Miss Davison, 34 Lodge Road, The Avenue, Southampton. "Lord Oakburn's Daughters." By Mrs. Henry Wood.
E. Quayle, 33 Warner Street, Barnsbury, N. "Sign of the Cross." By Wilson Barrett.

RESULT OF "VERSELET" COMPETITION.

The winner of the £1 1s. in this competition is L. W. Judd, 2 Alfred Villas, Stanton Road, Barnes.

To the following twenty-five books have been forwarded:

J. E. Hehir, 149 Upper Lewis Road, Brighton.
W. T. M. Wallet, 1 Crescent, Minories, E.C., London.
W. E. Gould, 61 Gibralter Walk, Bethnal Green, E.
Miss E. Malone, Lissadele, Sligo, Ireland.
A. Lees, Central Board School, Normanton, Yorks.
J. T. Cricks, 121 Sebert Road, Forest Gate, E.
R. Lawson, 12 Buccleuch Place, Edinburgh.
B. Croft, St. Margaret's Bury, Ware, Herts.
Miss Adams, 1 Camden Gardens, Shepherd's Bush.
W. G. H. Cable, 1 Gloucester Place, Greenwich, S.E.
F. Bradburn, 80 Brewery Road, Plumstead, S.E.
Miss B. Price, 266 Victoria Park Road, N.E.
H. Dolling, 57 Lower Clapton Road, Clapton, N.E.
D. O. Neill, 7 Stow Hill, Newport, Mon.
E. C. Thompson, 31 Pearcroft Road, Leytonstone, E.
W. Parker, 13 Cottage Row, St. James' Square, Hull.
A. W. Law, 261 Lavender Hill, Clapham Junction, S.W.
M. J. Borrows, 85 Regent's Road, Great Yarmouth.
Jessie Marriott-Hodgkins, 6 Leighton Mansions, Queen's Club Gardens, West Kensington.
H. C. Smith, 40 Vernon Street, Liverpool.
Mrs. Barrington, Kirk Langley, Derby.
Mary Oades, 26 Summers Town, Lower Tooting, S.W.
W. Shipway, 32 Howard Street, Reading.
E. Jenkins, 4 Hartington Road, Southend-on-Sea, Essex.
H. Howe, 3 Iverson Road, Brondesbury, N.W.



SEALED TO THE GODDESS.

It was Colonel Somers who told the story, prefacing it with the remark that he had no explanations to offer, therefore it would be useless to ask questions.

"At Burrampore," began the Colonel, "where I was stationed in 1860, I made the acquaintance of a smart young civilian of about five and thirty, who, under the old 'Compannee' had held a post of considerable trust in the Police Department. For his services during the Mutiny the Calcutta people had appointed him Deputy Commissioner.

"I will call him Baker; that was not his name, but Baker will do as well as another.

"On both sides of the Service, it was a matter of common report that Baker, disguised as a native, had been present at certain Hindoo ceremonies to which none but Brahmins are supposed ever to gain admittance.

"The man was perfectly fearless. There was nothing that Baker would not dare, to add another item to his continually growing stock of 'native' information.

"Some of the fellows, however, didn't conceal their opinion that some day Baker would go a bit too far. 'He'll get 'bogged,' they said, and the Service will lose a good man for a foolish fancy.' But nobody ever hinted that in his official capacity Baker had shewn himself other than a thoroughly practical Englishman, who had come into closer contact with the daily life of the people than the rest of us.

"I had been at Burrampore for the most part of two years. It was September; the great festival of the Doorga-pooja was being held. Going through the bazaar I stopped to listen to some ballad singers who were chanting the praises of Vishnoo and Krishna.

"At the close of their performance, a tall, muscular-looking Brahmin stepped into the circle. He was naked to the waist, round his loins he wore only a cloth, at his feet stood a basket, and in his right hand he held a small brass bowl. The trident traced in red upon his forehead proclaimed him a votary of Kali—the sanguinary goddess.

"Opening his lips, he invoked the blessing of Mother Durga.

"At the first notes of the invocation, two snakes crept out of the basket, and wound themselves about the bare brown legs. At the close, dipping his finger in the bowl, he pressed it against his forehead, leaving there a bright scarlet stain; and taking one of his pets in each sinewy hand, held them to the place, while the reptiles licked away the blood with a rapid movement of their tongues. Replacing the snakes in the basket, he drew himself proudly up, his eyes glowing with unholy fire; and, shouting 'Joy Kali!' * proceeded to recite a passage from the Mahabharut.

"It was not till some minutes after I had left the crowd that I found I had an impression that Commissioner Baker was amongst the group of natives immediately facing the performer. I had not seen Baker. As a matter of fact I had seen no one—only the Brahmin, whose eyes flamed and flashed in a way that uncomfortably suggested the infernal.

"Why, then, should I have this feeling about Baker?

"The thing stuck in my mind, and I determined to ask Baker over our game of chess in the evening if he had heard the strange Brahmin reciting in the bazaar.

"It was nearly a month, however, before I had a chance of putting the question.

"The Commissioner had been called away suddenly to Ajmeer, and went off immediately after early breakfast. This 'thickened the gruel' certainly. I had no doubt whatever that Baker had been one of the audience in front of the Brahmin.

"The thing which puzzled me was that I should have the sense of his presence without the accompanying idea that I had seen him.

"However, it was not a thing to 'mag' about, and before the end of the month Baker was back.

"At our first meeting I was 'mum.' I wanted to see if Baker would give me a 'lead.' But he didn't—so, on the next occasion, we being alone, I remarked: 'By the way, Baker, there was a strange fellow reciting in the bazaar during the Doorga-pooja—a fellow with the most wonderful eyes and a voice like a flute. I wish you could have heard him.'

"He looked at me, I thought, in a peculiar sort of way, and observed quietly, 'Why do you say that, Somers? You know that I heard him.'

* Victory to Kali.

Digitized by Google

"I tried to speak but could only stammer; the queer light in his eyes confused me. It was the first time I had noticed it there. He repeated the question with more insistence, keeping his eyes bent on me in that peculiar way in which I saw the glint I had seen in those of the Brahmin. The pupils seemed actually to become luminous and to glow with a fire that was not earthly. I remembered the queer tales which were told of Baker, and, at that moment believed them—every one.

"'You know that I was amongst the rabble in front of the man!' he insisted.

"'Well, I have that impression, certainly,' I answered. 'But where I got it I don't know. I'll swear that I never saw you.'

"He laughed, and the unnatural light in his eyes went slowly out.

"'If you had,' he said. 'I should have been food for the vultures before morning.'

"'And—how?' I queried.

"He took another cheroot, and lying back in his long lounging chair, smoked in silence for several minutes.

"'You'll think me a fool, I suppose, Somers,' said he speaking at last, 'and, I'm not so sure that you wouldn't do right to call me one. Of course, what I shall tell you, old man, is between ourselves.

"'With a view to utilising the knowledge in the interest of the Department, I have ventured to cross the boundary at several points.'

"'I thought that was no secret,' I remarked, as he came to a pause.

"He smiled.

"'Hitherto, my friend, the danger has always been personal; but a change in the circumstances may possibly bring about a change of contingencies. You don't catch my meaning, p'r'aps?'

"'No, I don't,' said I, not liking the turn the conversation was taking.

"'Well,' he returned, 'it'll be clear enough presently. For some little time now, I have been making a study of the darkest side of Hindoo mysticism and Oriental superstition. I've learnt many a trick from Mahomedan fakirs and Hindoo jogees—the one I practised upon you in the bazaar amongst others.'

"'That was a trick, was it?' I said, looking at my companion curiously.

"'Well, it was this way. From a clever scoundrel amongst the Baharupas, I learnt the art of projecting myself across another person's mental vision—by no means a difficult trick when you've learnt it. It does not require much more than a concentration of will. A man at Calcutta, who has acquired the power, can project to Bombay a mental image of himself or a distinct impression of his presence without the counterfeit presentment—provided his volition be sufficiently strong. It depends on the strength of the will current.'

"I suppose I must have looked incredulous, for he added quickly: 'Old Nynee Lal, my dear fellow, who taught me, could do a thing that would make this business shrink to very small dimensions. And that bazaar Brahmin—he belongs to a caste which claims to control the will and determine the actions, even to the doing of deeds which men shall tremble to hear.'

"'But, surely,' I began, 'you don't——'

"'——Say, yea, or nay,' he struck in. 'But the mental impression which I was able to fix upon you under the simplest conditions was a bit of mere apprentice work compared with what I have witnessed. Trickery, illusion, deception, of course. Well, I can't prove it, and that's what irks me.'

"'You must have had some object, I suppose,' said I, 'in desiring to impress me with the fact of your presence in the crowd?'

"'I had,' was the answer, 'and a very practical one, too. Lal Singh, the Brahmin, is a priest of Kali, serving the chief temple of that amiable goddess at Benares. I heard that he would be at the Doorga-pooja, and determined to seize the opportunity to learn, if possible, a few of the secrets of esoteric Sivaism. The worship of Mother Durga demands many a victim, and I've good warrant for saying that the blood which flows is not always that of "bulls and goats." I can pass anywhere as a native, and had arranged through Nynee for initiation; but Lal Singh has eyes like needle-points—they go through one, and as I looked at the man who was to perform the ceremony, a curious, uneasy sort of feeling crept over me. Vowed to Kali, he would think no more of plunging his knife into me on occasion, than I of shooting a bustard.

"'Seeing you in the crowd, it occured to me that in case of "accident" it might be as well for you to carry away the impression that I had been in the bazaar.

"'The business, however, passed off without "accident." I won't describe the ritual; I thought I was pretty well hardened; but it made the flesh creep on my bones. I wouldn't go through it again to learn the dearest secret in Mother Nature's bosom. There was no human sacrifice. The horrible Shaktee ceremonies are never performed upon initiation. But the place looked like a slaughter-house and smelt like a shambles. A bowl of warm blood stood on the altar and the image itself was splashed with it from head to foot.

"'The old rascal sealed me on the forehead with the seal of the goddess, while the sacred snake licked off with its tongue — though, sometimes, I fancy it's there still under the skin. This pretty thing,—' opening his shirt-front, he displayed a queer-shaped, black-looking stone. It had five faces and on each face was carved the device of Kali. It was attached to a Brahminical thread which he wore round his neck.

Digitized by Google

"'This pretty thing, inscribed with Kali's seal in her favourite vermilion, I got in exchange for three rupees. Strange, isn't it, that priests everywhe e always have these little perquisites attached to their office. When the Mother requires the services of her new recruit she will communicate with him in some mysterious manner through the stone.'

"He laughed, but the laugh made me shudder. 'Pitch it into the river,' I said, 'and, for goodness' sake, Baker, keep clear of this business. India isn't the country in which to play jokes with the horrible.'

"'Hello!' he exclaimed. 'Are you hit? You, my boy? Why, Somers, I thought pig-sticking and tiger-shooting had driven all that dreamy stuff clean out of your brain.'

"'I think these matters are best left alone,' said I, a bit nettled. 'Well, that,' said Baker, 'is a question we won't discuss. My object in sealing myself to the god less—don't shiver, my dear fellow—is twofold. To gain knowledge which may be useful to the Department—the priests of the Death-Mother, you will remember, were notable agents in stirring up the mutiny—and also to test for private satisfaction the nature and strength of powers which, here, are believed in implicitly, however much we may despise them at home.

"'Now, having said so much, I'll be frank, Somers, and say more. I'm really sorry I ever touched the thing. I feel more uncomfortable about it than I like. But I won't go back on it through funk—query, if I could?

"'Four months, I reckon, will suffi e to knock the bottom out of the business, or—wipe Tony Baker out of the Service.

"'It stands this way. Without admitting probability of danger, I wish to provide against possible contingencies.'

"'Great heavens!' I exclaimed, beginning now to catch a hint of his meaning. 'Have you gone mad?'

"'Not yet,' he answered, smiling, 'but, seriously, Somers, put me under surveillance, my dear fellow; begin to-day. If you should notice anything about me that strikes you as—suggestive; anything that looks—h'm—like going smash, speak to the doc—likely I'll drop Reid a us ful hint myself on the Q. T.—and have me put under restraint. Then send off to Ajmeer for Nynee Lal the poojari; give him the ring which I wear on the little finger, and tell him that the grey wolf hath need of him. He'll know what to do. Kali the Insatiable demands within three months of initiation a human victim. Her novice must prove himself, or—— Well, we don't believe the nonsense, of course. All the same though, old man, I've had some queer experiences in India.

"'Soon after coming out, an o d fellow came one day to my tent, and, after sitting silent awhile, begged permission to draw my horoscope. I gave him some particulars he asked for and dismissed him. Two weeks later, he came again, bringing a nativity card—it's in my possession now, you can s e it at any time. Of course he wanted backsheesh, but the point which concerns me is that everything set down in the table of periods has happened as predicted.

"'Don't misunderstand me. The nativity card isn't a monthly calendar. The old man divided my life into peric ds—indicat ng the critical years and forecasting the important passages. He's been right all the way.

"'Now listen, and remember, please, that it was not till after my return from Ka i's shrine that I thought of consulting the old nativity card, which I had not looked at since before coming to Burrampore. "It is now," says the card, "in this period—" that is the period I am now passing through, "that the great crisis in your life will occur. At this time you will pass under a dark shadow of fearful shape. You will leave this country and go over the black water, but the shadow will stay with you; and before the end of the period is reached"—it corresponds to December '63 by our reckoning, "the tale of thy years will be told."

"'Not a jot or a tittle of that will fail, Somers. It has the witness of fifteen years behind it.

"'But I see, Somers,' he went on, changing his tone on the instant, 'you can't take these little things so philosophically as I do; which shows you're a healthy English animal. Open the piano, my dear fellow, and let's play over a few airs from the operas.'

* * * * *

"It was just thirteen weeks after the conversation with Baker, that I found myself one of a small dinner-party given by the Collector to a few of the 'John Company' men. When the ladies withdrew, Baker sat opposite me.

"After the first month the disagreeable impression his story had left began to fade. By the end of the second month I could have believed it to be only the faint remembrance of some hideous dream.

"Everything was going the regular round. The gossip was not more ill-natured or personal than usual, nor did Baker's name come into it oftener than before. Sometimes I had a notion that Reid, the regimental doctor, would shoot a keen glance at the Commissioner; but not another word had been said to me on the subject; and gradually I had ceased to 'keep a watch.'

"Two days, however, before the dinner, Baker himself startled me by saying:

"'You haven't forgotten, I hope, what I asked of you, Somers?'—therefore, when he deliberately took the seat immediately facing me, I had an uncomfortable sensation that something was going to happen.

"The decanters had been twice round, when I noticed that odd, luminous glitter in Baker's eyes which on a previous occasion had given them such a strange, unearthly glow.

"At the same time it occured to me that the man had been fumbling in his bosom for several minutes—feeling for that wretched bit of stone he kept there, the seal of Kali, wife of Siva the Destroyer. His voice, however, was still the voice of Baker—soft, persuasive, bland. Yet I observed that his eyes grew ever larger and brighter; while his body began to quiver as if under some uncontrollable emotion.

"I sat star ng at him, unable to do anything, save watch the glittering eyes, which presently assumed an expression that was perfectly fiendish in its frightful malignity. Suddenly I heard Reid's voice—he had gone out of the room for a few moments—and at the same instant Baker, rising in his seat, shouted in a tone of fierce exultancy: 'Jey Kali! Kali mata ke jey! I am thine, Mother. O maha Kali!'

"By this time the doctor had got round the table; and I, having recovered from the spell which had paralysed me, was also now at Baker's side. In his eyes, which flamed with lurid light, there lurked possibilities of most fearful danger.

"The man's entire nature had undergone a change.

Digitized by Google

The cool, clear-headed Englishman had become the insane votary of the sanguinary Goddess on whose name he was calling by all the accursed phrases in the Gurúra Purána. Before we could stop him he had flung himself on the Judge. A naked weapon gleamed for a moment, but the doctor and I stuck to him, and Judge Matheson escaped with a nasty cut on the left cheek.

"The sight of the blood seemed to send Baker into a sort of frenzy. He laughed till we could have strangled him.

"'The man's blood-mad.' I heard the words without knowing who spoke them. But the doctor and I had exchanged a few whispers, and a messenger had already gone for Nynee Lal. Meanwhile, Indian hemp was handy, and ere long the patient lay unconscious on the floor.

"'What the mischief—?' began the doctor, and stopped. It was the seal of the Goddess, which, catching his eye, had provoked the exclamation. He looked at me. I made to tear it off, but he prevented me. 'Leave it,' he said almost fiercely. 'What business has he in this galley? The thing's anathema. Leave it for Nynee Lal. They're the devil's own, every one of these arch-priests of Kali.'

"It seemed a weary time before Nynee arrived. He appeared to know exactly what was required of him.

"Baker had recovered somewhat from the narcotic effects of the drug, and was gazing in rapt ecstasy upon some vision of the mind—'the blood-splashed image of Mother Durgá,' said the doctor.

"The old poojari began by sprinkling some incense over the bottom of a shallow brass plate, some red powder was poured into another, and some ashes of sandalwood into a third. While the perfume of the incense was filling the room, Nynee sat on his heels watching the blue smoke as it ascended upwards, and muttering scraps from the Gurúra Purána,—'the Devil's Litany,' the doctor called it.

"Of us, the poojari seemed quite as unconscious as was Baker.

"The incantations presently ceased, and the old man solemnly rising, drew round the patient a magic circle. Then divesting himself of his upper garments, he took some of the red powder, threw a few grains on the incense, which immediately flamed up, and, smearing the rest on his forehead, entered the circle, repeating the words: 'I greet thee, O Brother, in the name of the Mother.'

"Taking his place immediately behind Baker he crossed his hands over the Commissioner's head, muttering a few words in Sanscrit as he did so.

"The man stiffened, every muscle in his body becoming rigid, every feature fixed. Nynee continued to weave spells with his hands for the space of a minute; then, taking some ashes of sandalwood on which incense had been sprinkled, he rubbed the forehead of the patient with the mixture.

"In a few minutes Baker's eyes, which had been staring wide, closed. The poojara removed from his neck the mystic thread, placed the stone in a fold of his own girdle, and wetted the Commissioner's lips with some stuff from a diminutive-looking brass vessel, produced from the same receptacle.

"'The sahib will sleep long while,' he said, addressing us for the first time. 'When he wakes, his strength will be as water. Of Kali, the Black One, he will have no recollection. Our gods are not his gods, and he must go to his own.'

"Then Nynee Lal gathered up his property and departed.

* * * * *

"A month later Baker went home on sick leave. All the vitality seemed to have been drained out of the man. He could never make out what had happened to him; but never by any chance referred to the incidents which connected him with the terrible scene in the Collector's dining-room.

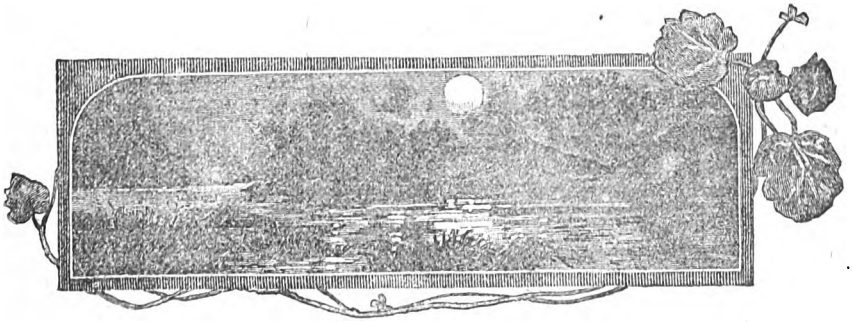
"At the end of the season I went to the Punjab; and for three years heard no more of Commissioner Baker. At the beginning of '67, however, I was in Calcutta and happened to meet Reid.

"'Baker?' said he, in reply to a query of mine. 'The man's dead—only lived about six months after reaching home.

"'Died in the following November. I had it from the doctor at Clayborough. He wrote me several times about the case. Couldn't understand it a bit. No disease, no wasting. Just a slow ebbing away of the vital power—end, total collapse. You didn't expect anything else, did you, after that devil's business at Burrampore?'

"And so," concluded the Colonel, "was fulfilled the prediction on the old jogee's nativity card."

H. Hunter.



Digitized by Google

CHAPTER XIX.

"Poor Louise."

"Mars adamat Venerem!" said Tristan, who had quite recovered his spirits and was spouting Latin with the volubility of a cheap-jack recommending his wares.

"With the help of Bacchus and his nymphs, we shall soon be masters of the gates, and then we can say 'Pandantur portae!'"

"That's it," chimed in Trefouilloux confidently, "we'll hang every soldier to the gates who dares to refuse us!"

This remarkably free translation made Tristan laugh till his sides ached, and the good citizens said as they watched him:

"He's not too learned to enjoy a good joke like one of ourselves."

The guards at the Porte aux Peintres had been on the alert for some time as they heard the increasing tumult in the city, and their captain had ordered the gates to be closed and the portcullis to be lowered.

"What on earth is all this row?" he asked. "Has the whole city gone mad?"

Perhaps some of his soldiers had already been won over to the cause, for they answered calmly.

"Oh, it's nothing!" and at first it appeared as if they said true, for the crowd kept back, shrouded in the darkness, Samson having ordered all the torches to be extinguished; and only a gay, laughing band of girls advanced towards the archers, offering them wine and challenging them to join the dance. Nothing loth to enjoy themselves, the gallant sons of Mars responded cordially to the invitations of Venus, and as the cups were passed to and fro suspicions were lulled, and before many minutes had elapsed, the hand of a susceptible young archer had drawn the bolts back and the game was won.

The women sprang forward, and a cry of triumph rose from the hitherto silent crowd in the background. The half-drunken guard was speedily overpowered, despite the heroic efforts of the captain to resist the mob.

As the gates were flung open, La Fontanelle, who had followed the train at some distance, caught hold of a young girl she had brought with her, and said hurriedly:

"Martha, do you remember your sister Agnes, whom they called 'the Fair'?"

The girl had been laughing madly with the rest, but at these words her face clouded and hot tears started to her eyes.

"All right. I see that you've not forgotten her. You can cry over your murdered sister,—would you like to avenge her death?"

Martha seized both the woman's hands and her dark eyes gleamed dangerously.

"Well then, listen to me. The man who killed your sister is in this crowd, hidden under a disguise as he thinks, the coward that he is! You run as fast as you can to the Louvre, ask to see the King's page Albret, and tell him what you have seen."

"And will he come and kill my sister's murderer?" asked the girl in a tearful voice.

"Yes, he will come and kill him, if you don't forget to say that those who have forced the gate are on their way to take by storm the Abbey St. Martin, where Queen Ingeburge and her attendant, the Danish girl Eve, are in danger."

Martha needed no second bidding, but started off, fleet as a hare, and sure-footed as a mountain goat.

The drunken rabble surged through the gates, smashing the heads of the luckless victims of their hospitality as they went, and bearing triumphantly before them the wounded form of the captain of the guard in a roughly improvised litter.

In the open ground outside the walls the mob spread itself over the gardens and cultivated fields, leaving ruin and desolation wherever they trod. The torches were re-kindled, voices were raised louder than ever, and the destroying host pursued its mad march unchecked and triumphant. Not a flower, not a leaf, not a blade of grass was left where this swarm of human locusts had passed.

The three tallest and most powerful knaves carried a huge oaken beam immediately behind the banner, and this was to serve as a battering-ram, while they were followed by about fifty desperadoes armed with hatchets and mallets. In the centre of the force came a handful of Free-lances that they had managed to hire, and they were regarded as the mainstay of the attacking party, for men trained under Cadocu were better fighters than even the King's regulars.

These fellows knew that they would meet with a warm reception from their former chief when he knew that they had been concerned in this night's work, so they were very eager to provide for their future out of the abundant plunder that a rich abbey would afford.

The rest were flourishing branches which they had torn off the trees as they passed, old rusty swords, broken halberds, and even cooking spoons!

In the wake of this noisy horde walked a man and a woman, who, though evidently on the same errand, yet managed to keep apart from the main body. The man was dressed as a tramp, and his rags were of the filthiest description. The woman wore an exaggerated costume of the kind affected by the dancing girls of the city, and yet, when these two had met, evidently by appointment, in the Rue aux Ours, the beggar had greeted her with a bow that would have done credit to the grandest courtier, and he might be heard from time to time addressing her with supplicating deference as "My Queen."

Digitized by Google

His fulsome adulation couched in poetic language savoured strongly of the chivalrous Courts of Love, with its romantic ballads and pretty courtesies.

She was sullen and unresponsive to his advances. Every attempt to propitiate her failed, for she had neither time nor thought to waste on such folly. Her mind was set on murder! Amaury Montruel, for it was he, as you will have guessed, had drawn his soft felt hat well down over his face to avoid detection, and Madame Agnes had so arranged the fantastic trimming of her headgear that only her dark, penetrating eyes were visible.

At last she broke the silence which she had imposed upon him, with:

"A whole week gone without a single thing to show for it! I think I was a fool to put my trust in you, Sir Amaury!"

"Ah! my Queen! If you knew half of what I suffered in that eternity that you call a week—"

She interrupted him, shrugging her shoulders contemptuously:

"What about that foreign knave you counted upon so surely?"

"Mahmoud-el-Reis has been in the Abbey St. Martin for some hours by this time."

"Then why all this masquerade? Are you afraid your infidel will not strike the blow home?"

"Up to this morning I had no fear, but then I made a discovery that both surprised and alarmed me."

Agnes turned upon him suspiciously:

"What discovery?" she demanded imperiously, seeing that he hesitated.

"Mahmoud-el-Reis has carved a statue," replied Montruel slowly, as if choosing his words carefully, "and this statue, which seems to him as an object of devotion, is the portrait of Madame Ingeburge!"

"Holà, comrades!" shouted a stifled voice from the rear of the crowd, "don't go so fast, it's all up hill, and we've plenty of time!"

"Celsa sedet Eolus arce!" replied Tristan, who was still well to the fore. "The wine of the monks is at the brow of the hill! A little more courage, boys, if you want to arrive before supper!"

"And supposing Mahmoud betrays you?" said Agnes bitterly.

"If Mahmoud betrays me," answered Montruel, lowering his voice, "I have found another man to do his work."

They had drawn a little nearer to the rabble, and he pointed out cautiously, a wretched creature some paces in front of them, who, as he turned round, showed a face, the villainy of whose expression made it remarkable, even in that mass of human depravity.

Madame Agnes looked at him carefully in the lurid light of the waving torches, and said, with a shudder of disgust:

"I have seen that man before somewhere."

"Yes, you've seen him outside Nôtre-Dame, my Queen, it was he who asked for the ruby pendant from your necklace. Don't you recognise 'Poor Louise'?"

She turned upon Montruel with an angry gesture, for she was in no mood for joking. But he was quite serious. This man, known to the greater part of Paris as "Poor Louise," was the successful rival of Ezekiel and Tréfouilloux, and offered for the consideration of the public his phenomenal physical construction consisting of four arms, one of which terminated in a goat's foot.

In return for a comparatively small sum Poor Louise had undertaken to supply the place of Mahmoud-el-Reis, in the event of his not having executed Montruel's orders, and to dispatch Madame Ingeburge with all speed, so soon as he should gain admittance to her presence.

He possessed great advantages over the Moslem, for he was neither influenced by false delicacy nor inspired by any "Martha, do you remember your sister Agnes?"

poetic dreams of love and chivalry. Nothing appealed to his brutal nature but money.

Madame Agnes studied this new partizan with more calmness when she knew his value, and then broke off:

"The King is beginning to give way! This first day of the council has had a great effect on him, I can see, and I tell you it is more than ever important to get rid of this woman. Her life is my death!"

The three bearers of the battering-ram had by this time reached the gates, and a halt was made for the others to come up; then a furious onslaught was made on the iron-clamped door, and in a few seconds it gave way before the force of the attack.

The good monks, as we have seen, were wholly unprepared for this incursion, and were either retiring to rest or performing such duties as their offices required of them, secure in the peaceful and sacred character of their house.

In right of the Lord Abbot's temporal power, the monastery was garrisoned by a small, but well-disciplined force of archers, but, unfortunately, the scare about the assassin had taken these men from their posts just before the attack was made; had it been otherwise, the mob would soon have been beaten back, for the Abbey was so constructed that it could be held by a very small garrison.

As it was, the rabble met with no opposition when they got inside the vestibule, and a rush was made for the great staircase, which led to the main portion of the building.

In less time than it takes to write it, the usually calm, peaceful scene was converted into Pandemonium itself, the off-scourings of the city polluted the incense-laden air with their foul jests and ribald oaths, the long silent corridors were turned into channels for this turbid living torrent, the cells were invaded, the larder ransacked, the refectory, and even the chapel itself, thronged by these abandoned men and women, who revelled and fought under the shadow of the carved saints, and in sight of the Crucifix that bore silent witness in every room.

Digitized by Google

Perched herself on the broad sill.

Tristan, who had been well supplied with wine on the way by the nymphs of Bacchus, was now quite incoherent, and his Latin would have paired admirably with that of Ezekiel or Tréfouilloux.

"Let's sack the place and burn the old shavelings out!" cried one and another.

"Bring us Ingeburge the alien!" shouted men and women alike.

The clash of arms and cries of the wounded were heard wherever the Free-lances and archers fought their way. Blood flowed freely, plunder and rapine raged in the abode of prayer and peace, and instead of midnight orisons there rose the yells of fiends in human shape in their quest for loot and liquor.

Some clamoured for the destruction of the Abbey by fire, others for the extinction of the monks. Tréfouilloux was in favour of the former, "De fundum in comblum," as he stated with dignity; but Ezekiel, who had an exact mind, corrected him thus: "De fondo in comblos."

In spite of all this seeming confusion the real object of the raid was never lost sight of, for Maitre Samson had kept his head clear, and when he saw signs of demoralization, he whispered in the ear of one he could rely on, and immediately the cry was raised:

"Ingeburge the alien! Bring her out!"

While the main body had pressed into the Abbey, three figures, two men and a woman, had remained near the great door. The men were Montruel and "Poor Louise" and the woman was Madame Agnes.

"When you leave the vestibule," Montruel was saying to "Poor Louise" in a low tone, "turn to the right and go up the big staircase till you come to the statue of St. Martin: then turn to the right again and you will get to the second floor where the hospital is. You will very likely find a monk in charge, but if you show him your knife and say you will cut his throat if he does not tell you in which cell Jean Cador is, you'll be all right. Do you understand?"

"Yes, is that all?"

"Jean Cador will be able to tell you where Madame Ingeburge is to be found."

"And when I've found her——" began "Poor Louise" with a hideous grin. "I'll——" and he made an eloquent thrust with his knife.

Montruel turned to the listening woman, who had withdrawn into the darkest nook she could find, to ask if she were satisfied, and "Poor Louise" started upon his dark errand.

"Stop!" cried the woman. "Poor Louise" obeyed with a bad grace, and Montruel thought, for a moment, that some gleam of pity had at last penetrated Madame Agnes' hard heart, but she soon undeceived him by saying, in low, cold tones:

"Suppose Jean Cador is a traitor, or is lying insensible, helpless, from the effects of this morning's dose, what then?"

Montruel sighed, he was sick of bloodshed.

"If Jean Cador gives you any trouble, you must kill him, and anyone else who stands in your way. The monks will soon tell you if you prick them with your knife! Only begone, and do it quickly!"

"If you succeed," added Agnes, "I will give you a solid gold chain, worth thirty gold crowns, in addition to what you have been already promised."

"Poor Louise" gave a yell of joy, and vanished brandishing his knife. He might beg for years and not get half such a sum, this was a chance he would never have again, he must make the most of it!

As soon as he had gone, Montruel and Madame Agnes stepped back into the garden and disappeared in the copse adjoining the Abbey.

CHAPTER XX.

The Sacking of the Abbey St. Martin.

A venerable old man with white hair, and a grave, kindly face, appeared at the door of the large hall opening out of the refectory, and he was instantly greeted with frantic cries of "Ingeburge the alien! Bring out Madame Ingeburge!" as the excited revellers pressed upon him. They thought he was someone of importance and they were right, for it was Prior Anslem himself. He looked sadly at the sea of faces before him, some of which were flushed and triumphant, others bestial and besotted, all marred by indulgence in the lowest passions of humanity; and there was in his voice a calm dignity as he put the simple question:

"Who are you who thus defile the house of God?"

"If it please you, Sir Prior," began Tristan with a desperate effort to speak plainly, "we are the pious sons of the University. We come here on a pious errand—Pieiatis Causae. It distresses us sorely to be deprived of the Sacraments of our holy Mother, the Church, so we wish to break down the barrier between us and our eternal welfare."

"Well said! That's it!" shouted his followers.

In order to emphasise this solemn announcement still further, Tréfouilloux brought forth, with unction, the treasures of his learning:

"Magnificat! Benedictus! Cicero! Cara Michel Larigus."

A slight flush spread over the old Prior's face, as he answered gravely:

"You mock at holy things, my poor children! May God grant you time and place for repentance!"

Digitized by Google

These simple, earnest words, spoken, as they were, out of the fulness of the good man's heart, did not fail to touch those of his hearers. Many heads were bent in shame, many eyes were wet with tears, many hearts were struck with fear, and for a moment an ominous silence fell upon all.

"Quousque Tandem——" began Tristan at last, but Samson, interrupting him, took the word with due gravity.

"Reverend Father, raillery is far from our thoughts! We are only striving to do here what the most illustrious council is working to effect in the city. We desire to put an end to the lamentable state of things under which our beloved kingdom is suffering. We serve Church and King. If you will deliver Madame Ingeburge into our hands, we will conduct her out of France, which she never ought to have entered, and, if needs be, see her safely to her native land."

Samson was a clever rogue. By these well-chosen words he repudiated all idea of blasphemy or violence, and the awakened consciences of the mob were speedily lulled to rest again. What better motive could they have than to remove the cause of discord from the land, and enable both King and people to make their peace with the Church? With the facile conscience of an excited multitude, they quickly persuaded themselves that they were there on a holy mission, so that when the Prior attempted to reply to Samson's sophistry, his voice was drowned in an angry murmur.

"Reverend Father, you are wrong!" bawled Tréfouilloux insolently. "The noble scholar Tristan, King of the Basoche, told you his mind when he called you Quousque Tandem!"

"But," vainly interposed Tristan.

"Quousque Tandem! Quousque Tandem!" resounded on all sides.

While Prior Anselm was endeavouring to get a hearing in this wild babel of derisive tongues. "Poor Louise" was stealthily pursuing his way along the path mapped out by Amaury Montruel, thinking of the promised reward of thirty gold crowns. Had he recognized Madame Agnes in the veiled woman, the remembrance of her former benefactions would have checked his hopes and made him feel disposed to try the point of his knife in her avaricious breast.

He found his way quite easily to the second floor where the hospital cells were situated, and met neither monk nor lay-brother to bar his passage or prove his prowess, for that part of the building had been, as we have seen, quite deserted by all those who could either fight or flee.

Meanwhile the little party in Jean Cador's cell had remained in a state of agonised suspense. Eric tried again and again to read the inscrutable face of the Moslem in the dim light, but it was impossible. More than once he thought he heard a curious noise as of snapping cords, but he bent down and carefully examined the Syrian's bonds and found them intact, so far as he could see, and he felt not a little humiliated as he noticed the grave smile with which his precautions were received.

Every moment increased their danger. They could hear the rush of feet below them, and more than once the cry of "Fire" had risen above the general tumult. As the panic was reaching its height, Mahmoud-el-Reis spoke to Eric for the first time.

"If you will cut these bonds, I can save the Queen."

"Have these people come to kill the Queen, then?"

"They will set me free, if you don't. But it will then be too late to save the Queen!"

"Then you're in league with them! You know their errand!" cried Eric, seizing his dagger. "You confess that the Queen's life is in danger! But I swear that neither they nor I will deliver you, for at the first step in this cell, you will be a dead man!"

Mahmoud vouchsafed no other answer to this outburst than to say:

"There is but one God who is God, and Mohammed is His Prophet! The destiny of man is written in the book of Allah. It is not the will of Allah that the Queen should escape."

Suddenly a ruddy glow illuminated the cell. It came from the court-yard beneath one of the windows, where the more light-hearted of the rioters were dancing to the music of ribald songs.

Buried his dagger in the ruffian's breast.

At the close of each round a chorus of voices raised the catch-word: "Ingeburge the alien! Ingeburge, the bane of France and her King!"

The poor Queen covered her face with her hands as she listened, and murmured:

"That is my death sentence! I pray you, my fathers, prepare my soul to appear before God!"

The monks, at first, neither heard nor understood, but she continued her supplications till the younger one came and knelt at her side and began to mutter incoherently the commendatory prayer.

Eve was kneeling on the ground at the other end of the cell, and over her head was a high, deeply-set window looking towards the old Roman road which led from the Porte-aux-Peintres.

On this side of the Abbey all was quiet, and the pure white light of the moon formed a fitting contrast to the lurid glare of the torches which came from the interior of the building, while the soft sighing of the night-wind fell soothingly upon the ear in the short intervals of peace that the watchers were permitted. The contrast between Nature in repose and Humanity in revolt was painfully marked; but none of them had time to notice this, save perhaps the Syrian.

A new sound caught Eve's ear, and she started up instantly, for it came from the direction of the city.

In a moment she had swung herself up by the bar which

Digitized by Google

For a moment he was seen in the glare of the flames, the dark Moslem and the white Queen.

ran across the window and perched herself on the broad sill. At first she could see nothing, but by insinuating her head out of the opening she could distinguish the clatter of horses' hoofs and the clang of armour, then, as it came nearer, she caught sight of bright, moving specks, glancing in the moonlight, through the mutilated trees. She was quick to recognise them as the glittering breast-plates and sparkling helmets of the King's soldiers.

"The soldiers! The King's soldiers!" she cried raptuously.

Mahmoud looked up at once, and Eric was surprised to see pleasure rather than chagrin depicted on his face. It was impossible to understand this man;

The Queen had risen at her husband's name and was looking anxiously at the young girl.

"Is it a large troop of men?" asked the Moslem.

"They cover the road! said Eve quickly, and her heart was beating fast with joy as she added in a lower tone, "and I know who leads them! I know him! I know him!"

Mahmoud was still listening intently to every sound that came to them from the interior of the Abbey, and now he turned to Eve, saying:

"If they are near enough, maiden, call to them that they come quickly, or it will be too late!"

"Albret!" called Eve with all her might. "Albret, my lord! my friend come to the rescue!"

But the night-wind carried her clear young voice in the other direction, and the next time she tried to shout, her voice could not even be heard by those in the cell, so fierce was the tumult below.

After the temporary lull caused by the parley with Prior Anselm, the rioters had broken loose again with renewed vigour. The first floor had already been pillaged, an outlying part of the building had been set on fire and the flames were casting their light on the revolting scene. Death and destruction seemed to be engulfing all, even those who had come to destroy.

Eve dropped from the window and resumed her place at the Queen's side, while Eric laid hold of his dagger, prepared to fulfil his threat, and the two monks fled from the cell, perhaps to meet a worse fate.

The trained ear of Mahmoud-el-Re's could distinguish between the rush of the rabble and the steady tramp of the soldiers. But who would reach them first? The assassins or the rescuers?

Just as the monks reached the end of the corridor they met "Poor Louise," who promptly took the first man by the throat and demanded:

"Where is Jean Cador's cell?"

The terrified monk fell senseless at his feet, and his companion could only make frantic gestures to the door they had just left.

Tristan and his band were pressing up behind. Some of them heard an increased clash of arms below, but none paused to account for it, so "Poor Louise" felt he had no time to lose. Dealing a blow with his fist at the second monk, he made for the door indicated, and the first thing his eyes met was Eve clinging to her mistress.

At the sight of his repulsive face and tremendously bulky form, his fat red hand waving the long butcher's knife, both the women shrank back involuntarily in terror and disgust.

"Ha, ha!" thought the brute, "I'm on the right track now."

Turning to the two men he said:

"Which of you is Jean Cador, carver of images?"

"I am," replied Eric promptly, and bending down he whispered to Mahmoud:

"If you deny it, you're a dead man!"

The Syrian made no answer, but as Eric's attention was necessarily diverted from him, there might have been heard a renewal of that strange cracking sound, and when it ceased, the captive gave a deep sigh of relief.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

"Ah, ah, so you're Jean Cador? Are you? Then you can tell me which of these two is Queen Ingeburge!"

"I am the Queen!" said Eve, stepping forward bravely.

"Poor Louise" made a dash at the girl, and had already raised his long knife when he felt himself dragged backwards by the hair, and with a quick plunge, Eric had buried his dagger in the ruffian's breast. Like a huge inert mass, the wretch lay at his feet. Without a twitch or a change of colour, he fell in a heap, just as the others swarmed up to the door.

Tristan had not forgotten the face of the prettiest girl in Paris, through all his mad carouse, and most of his fluent Latin phrases had been in praise of the divinity, whom in his eyes, she excelled in charm.

The moment he caught sight of her he waved his cap and cried: "At last! En Ecce! Behold her!" and sprang forward to clasp her in his arms. The wildest confusion raged for a few seconds. Shouts of "Kill! Kill! in the King's name!" were heard coming up behind, mingled with frantic clamours for Ingeburge's blood. But the soldiers were gaining ground, and their swords were cutting a ghastly path through the mob, towards the door of the cell.

Eric, thinking that the climax had come, turned on Mahmoud with his dagger raised, saying between his teeth:

"I swore you should not see the Queen die!"

He made a desperate thrust at the Syrian, but, as if by magic, the captive sprang to his feet and wrenched the weapon out of his assailant's hand with such force that Eric slipped on the blood-stained floor and lay stunned at the Moslem's feet.

Without regarding anyone else, Mahmoud-el-Reis made straight for the Queen and flung one arm round her, throwing Eve to the ground as he did so, and with the other he brandished Eric's dagger.

Tristan, ever mindful of Eve, bent down to steal a kiss from her unconscious lips, but his gallantry cost him dear.

Albret's sword descended with a well-aimed force on the head of his former comrade, and the King of the Basoche, fell beside the girl he had sought so eagerly.

Having settled this personal account, Albret turned to intercept the course of Mahmoud-el-Reis, but a thrust from the Syrian's dagger laid him low, and the son of the desert pursued his way with flashing eye and dilated nostril, bearing the unconscious form of the Queen still before him. The quickness and dexterity of his movements seemed to paralyse those who would have opposed his passage, and soldiers and tramps alike gave way before him.

For a moment he was seen in the glare of the flames, the dark Moslem and the white Queen, his blood-stained dagger raised aloft against the dark background of struggling humanity, and then he vanished, leaving on the air the sound of his fierce war-cry:

"There is but one God, who is God, and Mohammed is His prophet!"

As these words fell upon the dying ear of Tristan the Scholar, he made a last effort to look at Eve, then sinking back, murmured faintly:

"Vitaque cum gemitu fugit sub umbras."

So he died, faithful to his oath, speaking Latin to the last, having lost his life for a kiss, and staked his all upon the chance of seeing her, who, perhaps, had things been different, might have won him back to the life of honour he had still the grace to admire.

(To be continued.)

The May Pearson's

The Most Sumptuously Illustrated - - Magazine. - -

NOW ON SALE. PRICE SIXPENCE.

SOME OF THE CONTENTS:

THE ROYAL ACADEMY. A most interesting account is given of the origin and history of the great national Academy of Art. The article is magnificently illustrated with many reproductions of famous pictures.

HOW SOLDIERS FIGHT. No. II.—Artillery. (Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood.) By F. Norreys Connell. Mr. Connell gives a splendid description of the duties of the artillery man on the field of battle.

HE MAN WHO MEASURES EARTHQUAKES. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By Cleveland Moffett. Here we have the marvellously interesting life history of Professor Milne, who knows more about earthquakes than any other man living. Mr Milne has constructed an earthquake-observatory in the Isle of Wight, where he has set up instruments which will record the slightest tremor of the earth, even in such a far distant country as Japan.

QUEER NESTS AND NESTING PLACES. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By E. le Breton-Martin.

THE DETHRONEMENT OF THOMAS WAGGE. (Illustrated by Raymond Potter.) By J. R. Creed. A complete story.

CRICKET CLUBS. Written and Illustrated by Harry Furniss.

THE DIVE OF DEATH. (Illustrated by D. Murray Smith.) By Alys Hallard. A complete story.

THE WHITE MAGICIAN. (Illustrated from Photographs.) By Rudolph de Cordova. An illustrated interview with Edison.

SHOW CATS. (Illustrated by Louis Wain and from Photographs.) By G. B. Burgin.

THE ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN KETTLE. No. XI.—The Salving of the "Duncansby Head." (Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood.) By Cutcliffe Hyne.

A CITY OF CARS. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By Merriden Howard. An interesting account is given and excellent photographs are reproduced of a "city" (using the word in the Californian sense) in which all the houses are formed of disused tramcars, each one set up in its own plot of land.

THE MASKED MEN OF TUSCANY. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By Herbert Vivian. This great brotherhood, freely and without any reward, tends the sick and buries the dead of the city of Leghorn.

LIFE'S LITTLE WORRIES. (Illustrated by A. Popini.) By W. L. Alden.

Some Books Worth Reading.

NOW READY.

PAUL BECK: The Rule-of-Thumb Detective. By M. McDonnell Bodkin, Q.C. Crown 8vo, cloth. Price 3s. 6d.

Paul Beck, the Rule-of-Thumb Detective, is an Irish Sherlock Hohmes, with a very original yet logical method for the detection of crime. Hitherto we have had every species of detective, except an Irish one, and it has been reserved for Mr. McDonnell Bodkin to set right this injustice to the Sister Isle.

THE VIRGIN OF THE SUN.—A Tale of the Conquest of Peru.—By George Griffith, Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "Valdar the Oft-Born," "Men Who Have Made the Empire," etc., etc. Crown 8vo, cloth. With Frontispiece by Stanley L. Wood. Price 6s. 306 pp.

THE SHROUDED FACE. By Owen Rhoscomyl, Author of "Battlement and Tower," "The Jewel of Ynys Galon." Crown 8vo, cloth. Price 6s. Ready May 18th.

This is a tale of the time of Elizabeth, and the scene is placed in Wales. At that period many Welsh gentlemen took to the sea as rovers, finding their swordland on the Spanish main, as their fathers had found a swordland on the English marches.

JOHN OF STRATHBOURNE. A Romance of the days of Francis I. By R. D. Chetwode. Crown 8vo, cloth. Price 3s. 6d.

The above books can be obtained at all Booksellers, and from the Libraries, or post free for the published price from C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., "Book Department," Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE LILAC WITCH.

"It can't be as bad as that, Sophie. Must your father have twenty thousand francs by the first of June?"

"Yes, Henri, or else"—her lip quivered a little—"or else the mortgage will be foreclosed, and father will lose all his land, and we shall be homeless."

"Not if I'm here," said Henri stoutly.

Sophie looked proudly at him, and then at the walls of the studio. What an artist Henri was!

She came to him, and laying her hand gently on his shoulder, gazed sadly into his eyes and said:

"I know, Henri, I know. But then you are poor now."

"I shall rise—get a picture into the Salon—make money——"

"Yes, dear; but if papa loses all his property, and besides—" and her grey eyes grew moist and she looked wistfully away.

"And besides?" repeated Henri with anxious inquiry.

"And, besides, papa has been hinting at the marriage proposals of Jean Bertrand, an old playmate of mine, who offers to pay off all the mortgage on the day of his betrothal to me."

"To you, Sophie! you don't mean that you—that your father——"

Sophie looked down sadly at a pair of neat little feet.

"Henri, you know I love you, and that I have promised faithfully to be your wife; but think of poor papa, and think of all I owe him—ought I not to be ready to make any sacrifice that will save him from ruin?"

"Sophie," he exclaimed, after a pause. "I have thought of a plan. We, you and I, can earn that twenty thousand."

"Yes, yes; how?"

"Why, you be my model, and I'll paint you."

"Oh, will you? But—but you couldn't sell a picture of me for twenty thousand francs."

In answer Henri drew her before a little square mirror hung between two windows, and made her look at her own reflection.

"See there, Sophie! just look at your eyes—are they not the deepest grey, with golden lights in them? are not your lips as red as this carmine? and just see that little pointed chin! how I could paint that! and those pink cheeks—fresh as a baby's!"

Sophie began to blush at Henri's enthusiasm, and turning from the glass looked into his dark face, which was lit up with a glow of almost poetic inspiration.

"And, you know," he went on, "something tells me that I shall paint you better than I ever painted anything before—that you will be my inspiration. You must wear a loosely fitting, very soft lilac robe, and you will have your hair down, hanging over your left shoulder, which will peep through your curls like a white dove in a golden cage. And you must hold a spray of lilac in your hand and be reclining under a lilac-bush, and I'll call you the 'Lilac Witch.'

"Did you ever hear the legend of the 'Lilac Witch'? Grandma used to love to tell me about her; she was a very beautiful fairy, and men came round to catch a smile from her red lips, and the man she smiled on was made bold to do great deeds; but if his heart were drawn to another woman, in a moment she spoilt all he had done, and made a beggarly wretch of him. Besides, you know, the lilac will go well with your complexion, and hair, and eyes."

And so it was planned. He threw the whole of his poetic soul into his work, striving to get that longing, inspiring look in the large grey eyes, which, mingled with an expression, half of pity, half of triumph, in the rest of the face, was to make up the ideal of the "Lilac Witch." He found the look of longing and inspiration in Sophie's eyes, but the pity and triumph—that divine mixture of pride in victory and sorrow for the conquered—were wanting. By his own talent Henri created them, inspired by his love and the prize set before him.

One day in May she was telling him of the importunities of Bertrand, when he interrupted her.

"Very good for M. Bertrand," he said. "But I have something to tell you."

Then he told her how the agent of a rich Englishman was looking all over Paris for paintings of beautiful women; how he had seen the "Lilac Witch," now nearly finished, and how he had, with an Englishman's extravagance, offered the fabulous sum of thirty thousand francs.

That ended the sitting for that day, for Sophie insisted on taking Henri at once to her father to tell him the news, and to make him break off all further negotiations with Jean Bertrand.

It was arranged that Henri was to pay off the mortgage as soon as the picture was transferred, keeping the surplus of ten thousand to start life with Sophie, while her father dismissed Jean Bertrand, with the precautionary hint that, in case the Englishman should fail them, he would immediately accept Bertrand's offer.

It was the evening before the next day when the

Digitized by Google

GOOD NEWS FOR STOUT PERSONS.

It is a matter for congratulation that obesity is taking its proper place as a disease, and is receiving that scientific attention which it has long lacked. It does not follow that a person needs to be the size of Sir John Falstaff to show that he is unhealthily fat. According to a person's height so should his weight correspond, and this standard has been prepared by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., so that anyone can see at a glance whether or no he is too stout. People in the past have been wont to regard fatness as constitutional, and something to be laughed at rather than to be prescribed for seriously; but this is evidently an error, as persons whose mode of life has caused a certain excess of flesh require treating for the cause of that excess, not by merely stopping further increase, but by removing the cause itself. It is astonishing how long we go on perpetuating error, and how difficult it is to make people disbelieve anything, no matter how palpably false the principle, if it has become at all firmly fixed in the public mind. These facts with regard to obesity, however, are so obvious that there ought to be no difficulty about their acceptance when once they become known; and, as a matter of fact, the immense number of persons who have already acknowledged their truth by recording the benefits received from Mr. Russell's treatment is simply wonderful. It is marvellous how this "Pasteur" and "Koch" of English discoverers can actually reduce as much as 14lb. in seven days with a simple herbal remedy. His book only costs 3d., and he is quite willing to afford all information to those sending as above. It is really worth reading.—Southport Visitor.

CORPULENCE

INCREASING POPULARITY OF AN EFFECTUAL CURE.

Many of our readers are, doubtless, familiar with the nature of the extraordinary revolution in the cure of obesity which, within recent years, has been wrought by the original researches of that now eminent expert, Mr. F. Cecil Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square London, W.C. It is evident that the certainty, the rapidity, and the agreeable surroundings of his curative process have been recognised, in a very large degree, among ladies and gentlemen belonging to the highest social circles. Keen observers who have an opportunity of judging inform us, through the pages of society papers and otherwise, that owing to the general employment of Mr. Russell's treatment extreme obesity is becoming as much a thing of the past, at fashionable gatherings, as intoxication; and, no doubt, it will soon be regarded as nearly as disgraceful. The issue of an eighteenth edition of the author's singularly convincing little text-book, "Corpulency, and the Cure," however, serves to remind us that the popularity of the system has now reached spheres far remote from those of West End fashion. The book of 256 pages may be had (post free) by sending three penny stamps to Mr Russell's offices, as above; and it is worth the careful attention of those who wish to free themselves of a burden of fat—not merely because it is unseemly and adds enormously to the apparent age of the sufferer—but because extreme obesity terribly interferes with the energy necessary in these days of competition to make one's way in the world, or even to earn a very modest competency. A large proportion of the letters of Mr. Russell's grateful correspondents refer to their delight at being enabled—within a very brief period, and without any irksome conditions implying semi-starvation—to attack their accustomed tasks with pleasure instead of wearied disgust, through being reduced to their normal weight. The popularity of the system is also largely due, doubtless, to the English hatred of mystery, which is utterly swept aside by Mr. Russell. He fully explains his modus operandi, and supplies the receipt for his preparation.—Bicester Herald.

Digitized by Google

picture was to be formally sold, and thirty thousand francs handed over, and Henri and Sophie married. Henri was in the studio standing before a picture. In one hand he held a lighted cigarette. In the other an acutely pointed paint brush. He was scrutinising the face of his beloved "Lilac Witch" with a look of intense exultation. Every now and then he would make an infinitesimal stroke with the brush, after which he would take a long pull at the cigarette. He was putting on what he called the last touches before he said good-night to the picture and went to call on Sophie. He looked at his watch. It was already past nine and he had promised to be there at eight. Still there were only a few more tiny touches needed and then he would go. He lit another cigarette, he walked up and down the room, changed the lamps and surveyed the painting from twenty different points of view. Finally he seemed satisfied, threw down the brush, drew a sofa up in front of the easel and lay there, watching the Witch's face with a lover's rapture. His chest heaved, his eyes grew bright, the muscles round his face softened into an expression of supreme delight.

Suddenly he started and looked at his watch. It was twelve o'clock and he had forgotten, and Sophie had probably gone to bed, wondering why he never came. He blamed himself for being so thoughtless.

This changed the current of his thoughts, reminding him that to-morrow he married Sophie, and they would always live together; a bright smile lit up his face, but it was a commonplace smile compared to his look of a few seconds ago.

Yes; to-morrow Sophie would be his, and they would come and pay him thirty thousand francs and take away the "Lilac Witch." Take away the "Lilac Witch"? Why, of course; he only painted it for the sake of marrying Sophie.

Henri looked away from the picture with a dull ache of his heart. Somehow, life with Sophie when the "Lilac Witch" was gone did not seem so sweet as it used in the days when they had the first sittings. Then the picture only meant to him the portrait of his dear Sophie. Now, when he was gazing into that fair, arch face on the canvas, so triumphant and yet so pitying and tender, he never thought of its being Sophie's face at all. He seemed to see there something that was all his own, and had come out of his own soul. How could he bear to part with it? But he was winning Sophie by giving it up. A horrible doubt came to him. What if after all he should love the picture better than the model? He shook his head resolutely, and went to bed. All that night in his dream that awful thought tormented him.

On the morrow Sophie appeared before the hour of the business transaction, in order to tidy up the studio and make it look more festive. She found Henri there before the picture as usual. He had wheeled the easel up near the window and was devouring the painting with his eyes. He never so much as turned his head to greet her.

Henri looked long at the face, and then turned and glanced half timidly, half hopefully, at Sophie. She thought she caught his meaning and smiled back at him.

"Is it like?" she laughed.

Henri's face lost the look of hope. He turned eagerly back to the picture, looked at it a minute, then turned away with a sigh. Sophie came to him, and looking over his shoulder at the lovely picture of herself, asked him why he sighed. He answered:

"Ah, Sophie, you cannot understand, you cannot know the feeling of adoration which an artist has for something into which he has poured his whole soul. This is my masterpiece. I shall never do anything so good, so rich, so valuable again—no, never! All the strength, all the purity, all the poetry, of my inmost soul are embodied in that one painting, now—now, I must part with it—must say good-bye for ever to what has been meat and drink to me for months past. You cannot know what it has come to mean to me. It is more than a portrait. It is an ideal in which I have lived for months. Oh, where—where shall I find anything to take its place?"

And Henri, kneeling before the figure, spread out his hands in supplication. Sophie knelt beside him, and gently passing one arm over his shoulder, whispered softly to him, as if they already knelt before the altar:

"Henri, Henri, here I am! have you not me? Did you not paint that picture to marry me? and now it's done, we are to be married, and you are to have me always?"

She paused. Henri slowly looked round and gazed long and steadily, with a blank, searching look into her sweet, pale face. Then he turned towards the "Lilac Witch," shuddered, and sorrowfully shook his head. He noticed that in a spot near the edge of the canvas the varnish had worn a little rough. He got up from his knees, and pushing aside a curtain, went into a side room to get a pot of varnish.

Sophie remained motionless, kneeling before the picture, her bosom heaving, her eyes flashing, her hands clutching convulsively at her dress. She repeated his last words:

"Where shall I find anything to take its place?"

Jealousy, as cruel as the grave, jealousy of her own idealised self, jealousy of the image of her own person reflected in the artist's imagination, was taking hold of her. Oh, how she hated the picture that had stolen her only possession! had cheated her of Henri's love. She arose and looked savagely at the "Lilac Witch." Then, glancing wildly round the room for a weapon, she spied on a little table Henri's mixing-knife. It was of steel, and quite sharp. She ran to it, seized it, and then coming up so close that her hot breath made the canvas moist, she hissed:

"There, you thief!" and with a few strokes of the knife, she cut and slashed the lovely face, and tore out the grey eyes, and hacked the poor head and bosom into shreds. Then throwing back her head, she stood upright, panting and trembling, before her disfigured rival.

At that second it seemed as if the scornful, pitying, triumphant look of the "Lilac Witch" had passed into her own face.

Just then came a rustle of the curtain and a rattle at the door. Henri slipped in quietly from the inner room, and Sophie's father came bustling in from the hall. The two men came forward and greeted one another cordially; then they turned towards Sophie and the picture.

With a sharp cry Henri bounded forward, and pressing his forehead against the mutilated painting, cried like a child.

Sophie looked wildly about, and staggered towards her father. He roughly led her to a chair.

Then pulling his hat down over his ears, he said hoarsely, half aloud:

"I must go and find Jean Bertrand."

F. M. L.

Digitized by Google

You Can't Afford

to be without

Antiseptic.
Pure.
Preserves Food and Milk.
Stops Smells.
Arrests Decay.
Purifies everything.
Invaluable for the Bath and Toilet.
For Rinsing and Cleansing.

By Special Appointment — Makers to Her Majesty.

THE PATENT BORAX CO. LTD., LADYWOOD, BIRMINGHAM.
LONDON DEPOT: 129 HIGH HOLBORN.
Grocers, Oilmen, and Stores keep it

DIRECT FROM THE FACTORY.

THE

"DERBY" DESK

Is quite the Finest in the World. Every portion is made under the personal supervision of the Originator. We both Recommend and Guarantee the "Derby" Desk. It has a Roll-Top, which locks all the drawers automatically when shut down; full of convenient pigeonholes, etc. Elegant, Useful, and Durable! All prices from £7; as Illustrated, £8 8s. Invaluable in the Private Study and the Office. We stock a large variety of Novelties and Specialities in Office and Library Appliances. New Handsome Illustrated No. 61 Catalogue sent free to any reader of Short Stories on application. Filing Cabinets and Elastic Bookcases a Speciality.

THOMAS TURNER

(Leicester) LTD.,

44 HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.; 7 & 9 NEWARKE STREET, LEICESTER.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. Taylor, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

Deer Rectory, Mintlaw, Aberdeen,
November 8th, 1897.

From Rev. J. H. Burn.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

Digitized by Google

IN FRIENDLY CONVERSE.

I WISH to draw special attention this week to the new War Competition, of which particulars will be found in another part of this number. The fact that most of the names indicated by the pictures have already appeared in the daily papers make the Competition of special interest.

P. O. writes to say that he has been looking up the subject and finds that more robberies of letters take place in August and September than during any other part of the year. How is it?————Probably this is attributable to the fact that those months form the holiday season, when a much greater amount of money is transmitted by post.

S. C. W.—There is still room in Westminster Abbey for the burial of another eighty or ninety persons, and, taking the average of the last century, it will be a long time yet before these places are filled up.

YOUNG MOTHER.—The average baby is sensible to light, touch, temperature, smell, and taste on the first day of its existence. Hearing comes on the third or fourth day. Speech should begin by the end of the first year.

MINERVA, T. T., and Others.—It is astonishing what a number of my readers are victims to extreme nervousness. The following is a simple cure suggested by an old doctor of our acquaintance. Devote half-an-hour a day to absolute rest in a darkened room. Lie down, close your eyes, and refuse to be disturbed by any one for thirty minutes. The method is certainly simple enough, and, where possible, at any rate deserves a trial.

F. P.—"Escroquerie" is a crime in France which has no distinct counterpart in England. When a person orders any goods for which they are unable to pay, they are arrested and imprisoned, as the French see no great difference between running off with an article and getting it without paying for it.

B. L. E.—The most expensive war, viewed from the point of yearly expenditure, was the United States Civil War, on which the expenditure was at the rate of three hundred and fifty millions per annum. The Franco-German War stands next highest, its cost having been at the rate of three hundred and sixteen millions per year.

ANCIENT.—The viking ship that was found in a mound on the shores of Christiania fjord is the oldest sailing craft in existence. It is one thousand years old.

H. G.—The only countries in the world where the horses outnumber the human beings are Algeria and the district of the River Plate.

SAXON writes: "Is there any meaning attached to the prefix of 'O',' so common to Irish names?"————It is an abbreviation of the word "ogha," meaning grandchild, so that originally O'Brien signified, "grandson of Brien," and so on.

H. M.—No, Chinese cannot be telegraphed; figures have to be used corresponding to certain words. Only one-eighth of the words of the language are in this code, but this has been found sufficient for practical purposes.

D. S. asks: "Why is the pineapple such an expensive fruit in this country?"————Because it requires such a great amount of care and attention and expense to rear. The fruit requires to be grown in hot-houses specially devoted to it, and great care has to be taken to preserve a certain temperature. Then, again, each plant produces only a single fruit and then dies; the suckers, however, become bearing plants for a subsequent year.

P. P.—The huge guns of modern navies can be fired only about seventy-five times, when they become worn out.

TIME.—The Christian Era, as a basis for reckoning time, was not invented until the sixth century. It was ordered to be used by bishops at a council held in 816, but it was not generally used till much later. Charles III. of Germany was the first to use the words "in the year of our Lord" on documents; that was in 879.

R. N.—No bird of prey has the gift of song; such birds have developed rapidity of flight, and sharp sight, which are more useful. You cannot imagine a warbling vulture, for instance.

J. M.—No; it is not the ground that is on fire. Near the Caspian Sea there are tracts of land where natural gas issues from the soil; this has at some period been set on fire, and has been burning so long that the natives call it "eternal fire." In some instances, this gas occasionally collects on the surface of the water, and when set on fire, you would at first glance imagine that the water was burning.

S. P.—The Palolo is a sea-worm found in the South Pacific Ocean; the natives bake and eat them. These worms are exceedingly brittle, and if broken in many pieces, each piece swims off as if it were an entire worm.

ANNIE.—You probably mean the shawl that belonged to Charles X. of France. It was made from the fur of Persian cats; many thousands of cats' skins were utilised, and the weaving is said to have taken years. It measured eight yards square, but it was so fine that it could be compressed into the space of a large tea cup.

H. I.—It is stated that the list of dowries carried from the United States by American wives to England of recent years, in the case of only fourteen women, amounts to over six and a quarter millions sterling.

S. H. asks: "How is it that plants growing near the sea have thicker leaves than those growing inland?"————Apparently the sea salt is the cause of this phenomenon, as plants cultivated in artificially-salted soil produce thicker leaves.

EX.—"Spondulix" is certainly a slang term for money, but, like some other slang terms now out of date, it is taken from some correct word in another language. In this case it is the Greek Spondulos, the name of a shell that was at one time used as money both in Greece and Egypt.

GLOBE has been told that there is a portion of the earth's surface where a person's shadow falls in two directions at the same time, and he would like to know if that is true.————Not if the shadow is cast by either the sun or the moon. In the tropics it happens that on certain days and at certain positions along the line of the sun's apparent path, it is exactly overhead at noon, and in these circumstances a man stands literally on his own shadow. It follows that a slight inclination of the body either way would throw a shadow in that direction. A cursory observation of this fact has probably given rise to the statement made to you.

WHISKERS.—The ceremony observed in the House of Lords when a new peer, by right of succession, takes his seat is quite a simple one. All he has to do is to present his writ of summons to the clerk, swear the oath of allegiance, and make his bow to the Lord Chancellor.

ALIEN.—For a foreigner to become a naturalised Britisher only costs about £6, but he must have been living in this country for about five years, or have been in the service of the Crown for a similar period.

BOOKWORM.—The first dictionary of which there is any record is the Chinese work compiled by Pa-out-she, who lived about 1100 B.C. It contains about 40,000 characters, mostly hieroglyphic and not unlike the signs of the zodiac.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

COSTUMES COMPLETE, 10/6 SKIRTS ALONE, 5/6

THE John Noble

10/6

HOME, HOLIDAY, AND HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

HIGHEST KNOWN VALUE FOR MONEY.

Sent by Parcel Post direct from the Largest Firm of Costumiers in the World.

PATTERNS

of these Costumes, which are made up in Two Good Durable Cloths—

I. John Noble Cheviot Serge, weighty and weather-resisting.

II. John Noble Costume Coating, smooth surfaced and of lighter-weight—

SENT POST FREE

together with NEW ILLUSTRATED 84-PAGE CATALOGUE for Ladies and Children, to all who name Short Stories, and need not be returned.

A Full Dress Length (6yd., 52in. wide) of either cloth for 7/6; carriage, 8d.

COLOURS of all Costumes: Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Ruby, Sage Green, Electric, Fawn, Purple, and Grey.

The Three Stock Sizes are 34, 36, 38 in. round bust (under arms), Skirts being 38, 40, 42 in. long in front. Any other sizes, made to measure, 1/6 extra.

Ladies' Own Designs made up in any kind of Fabric by Skilled Dressmakers at minimum cost. A Box of 1,000 Patterns lent to select from, and sent carriage paid.

Mourning Orders executed and sent off in 12 hours.

Bankers: LONDON & MIDLAND BANK Ltd.

PLEASE MENTION "SHORT STORIES" when ordering from

JOHN NOBLE LTD.,

Brook Street Mills,

MANCHESTER.

Model 894.
New "Gordon" Costume.
New design, with well-cut bodice trimmed fancy stitching, Tailor-made Skirt, full-wide. Price 10/6 complete; carriage, 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d.

Model 900.
New Tailor-made Suit.
Very smartly-shaped Coat with velvet collar, ample skirt in the latest design. Price for the Costume, 10/6; carriage, 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d.

Model 901.
New "Curragh" Costume
A smart, well-made Bodice, trimmed on facings and sleeves, military braid. Full wide skirt. Price 10/6 complete costume; carriage, 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.

Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.

A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious, Non-Alcoholic Wine. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger Lemon, Orange, Blackberry etc.

YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

WHY THE MILL STOPPED.

Down in Norfolk one beautiful summer day, having an hour to kill while waiting for a train, I amused myself by watching a windmill on a near-by hillside. Round and round went the great sails, so many revolutions to the minute, for a long time. Inside the mill the big stones rumbled and roared as they ground the grain. Ever and anon the miller came to the door of the upper story, looked at the sails and the sky, and then went back, like the little sentinels that come and go on the ramparts of intricate mechanical clocks.

It was the peacefulest of pictures. Not a blessed thing in all that landscape seemed to be moving save the regularly-rotating arms of that old mill. Even their shadows on the ground appeared to drag, as though weary of the effort to keep up. What on earth should people want of flour, or, indeed, of anything except a place to sleep, in a country as dead and dull as that? I was about dozing off myself when, glancing again at the mill, I remarked that the sails were going slower, and slower, and slower. Ten minutes later they stopped.

Had the man in the mill shut down on them from the inside? Was the grain all ground and the day's work done? What! at three o'clock in the afternoon? Nonsense; no. The wind had entirely died out; not a breath of air was stirring. And even though fifty farmers were waiting for their grist, no windmill will go without wind.

Now here are two letters written by women. I have been reading them over; they interested me. But could I make them interest you? Possibly, I said to myself, if I could only think of an illustration that would bring out the point, which is the same in both. Have I done it? You shall answer that question after you have read the letters and the comment that is to follow.

"For many years," runs the first, "I suffered from indigestion and weakness. I felt tired and weary. I had a bad taste in the mouth, my tongue being thickly coated. My appetite was poor, and what little food I ate did not agree with me, causing me pain at the chest and stomach. I saw a doctor, and took medicines from time to time, but got no good from anything until I read about the benefit many persons had obtained from Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. I got a bottle of this medicine from Mr. Saunders, chemist, and after taking it I felt much better, the pain and nervousness being removed. I could eat better, and was stronger every way. If I ever ail anything I take a few doses of the medicine, and it never fails to set me right. I have recommended it to many, and you can make use of this statement as you like. (Signed) (Mrs.) Margaret Ledner, Prospect House, St. Lawrence, Ramsgate, January 28th, 1897."

"In the early part of 1894," says the second, "I suffered severely from indigestion. I had a bad taste in the mouth, my appetite was bad, and all the food that I took gave me pain at the chest. I was constantly belching gas, and had pain at my left side around the heart. I got extremely weak, and was unable to do anything. Nothing that I took did me any good until I began taking a medicine that had benefited my mother, called Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. After taking this medicine a short time my appetite improved, and the food agreed with me, and I gained strength. I know many persons who have benefited by the same medicine. You can publish this statement if you think fit to do so. (Signed) (Mrs.) Harriett Folton, Durlock, Minster, near Ramsgate, January 28th, 1897."

Now let me make you a comprehensive proposition which, I think, will cover the matters we have in hand. All motion comes from power, and all power from heat produced by combustion. Whether the power be moving air, steam, electricity, or running water, it is the same. Human strength, human power, result from food digested or consumed (slowly burned) in the body. The opposite of this is called indigestion, or dyspepsia—the disease from which these ladies suffered. That is why they were weak, tired, weary, and unable to do anything. They were as engines are when the fire is out; as water-mills are when the streams are dry; as our windmill was when the breeze fainted.

Mother Seigel's Syrup re-kindled the fire, drove away the deadening disease, and health, life, and motion began again. Do we understand it now? I think so.

Digitized by Google

OU SHOULD GO IN FOR OUR WAR COMPETITION.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 490. FOR WEEK ENDING MAY 21ST, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

PHYSICIANS AND SCIENTISTS
REPORT THAT FROMMS EXTRACT
IS A PERFECT FOOD
FOR INFANTS AND INVALIDS
AS WELL AS FOR THE
STRONG AND HEALTHY.
HALF THE PRICE OF MEAT EXTRACTS.

SOLD BY CHEMISTS AND GROCERS.

10/6 ALLEN FOSTER & CO., 10/6

SOLE MAKERS OF THE

'Alfosco' Costumes

Acknowledged by thousands of delighted customers to be vastly superior in value, style, and finish to any Costumes yet offered to the public at anything approaching the same price.

These two favourite "Alfosco" Costumes are made in the Allen Foster Specialite Serge, renowned for its durability and wear.

COLOURS:

Black, Navy, Fawn, Brown, Dark Cinnamon, Tabac, New Blue, Bronze-Green, Myrtle, Electric-Blue, Ruby, Grey, Cardinal, &c.

WRITE FOR PATTERNS.

These two Models are exceedingly smart.

Design No. 545 is the fashionable Costume for the COMING SEASON.

It is the Best Value for Half-a-Guinea ever offered to the public. It consists of the stylish Reefer Jacket with fashionably-made Skirt. The Jacket is cut full length, has six buttons down front, velvet collar, tailor stitching. A Costume any lady can wear.

Design No. 100. 10/6. Design No. 545. 10/6.

Costume Complete, 10/6. Skirt only, 5/6.

Design No. 100 is a favourite Costume. The Bodice is shaped to the figure, the pretty lapels are trimmed with braid and large buttons. The Skirt is gracefully draped. The bodice and sleeves are lined.

Price Complete, 10/6. Skirt only, 5/6.

Either of these Costumes made in the smooth-faced Venetian Cloth will be 13/6.

Patterns and Sketches Post Free. A variety of styles and Cloths to select from will be forwarded. Each Costume securely packed and sent Carriage Paid, 9d. extra. Skirt only, 6d. extra.

When ordering please mention Short Stories.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., The London Manufacturers,
17 ROSCOE ST., GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"Its food value is double that of bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—
Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

Frames the Form and Forms the Frame.

HOVIS BREAD is baked and delivered daily by all leading bakers. HOVIS BISCUITS and FLOUR—the latter packed in 3½lb. and 7lb. Bags, with recipes enclosed—by all leading Grocers, or 6d. and 1/- Samples of Bread and Biscuits will be sent on receipt of stamps by the

HOVIS-BREAD FLOUR COMPANY Limited,
MILLERS, MACCLESFIELD.

BE SURE EACH LOAF IS STAMPED HOVIS.

For SNOW White LINEN ALWAYS BUY

NIXEY'S BLUE

FLANNELETTE BAGS READY FOR USE.
LARGE PENNY BAGS.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

REALLY GENUINE.

In Patent Air-tight Tins. ¼lb., 10d.; ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; including tin and postage.

MRS. CONYERS,
MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

LADIES' Everybody should give these Marvellous Costumes a trial. They are made in the latest fashion in specially selected cloths by skilled Tailors. Prices from 10s. 6d. to £5 5s.

TAILOR-MADE

Send a post-card, and we will forward, by return, Illustrations and patterns. Satisfaction guaranteed.

Arthur Campbell & Co. Ltd., 31 Barbican, & 1 Redcross St., E.C. COSTUMES

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Bldgs., London, W.C.

Invested Funds,
£10,000,000.

Particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.
Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

SAMPLE BOTTLE. 9 STAMPS.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.

A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious, Non-Alcoholic Wine. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger Lemon, Orange, Blackberry etc.

YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

Edited by J. Arthur Pearson.

No. 490.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending May 21st, 1898.

The Flawed Amethyst.

Neil Boyd had been telling tiger stories, and Willie Adams was half through with a yarn concerning a snake that lived in the colonel's compound at Durrumtollah, Sir George, who had shot tigers himself and heard the snake story before ever Adams had landed at the Apollo Bunder, was reading the Globe. A sudden and somewhat forcible exclamation from the Baronet interrupted the snake story, and drew upon Sir George the attention of every pair of eyes in the room.

"Anything fresh, George?" inquired Hamilton Graham, Sir George's brother. "Any news of Richards?"

Captain Richards, R.E., an old college mate of the Grahams, had gone on a surveying expedition into the country beyond the Jelum; and, not having returned when expected, many were the rumours concerning him.

"Not a word, Hamilton. But Jimmy's a lucky dog—always was since I knew him. He'll come out right, you'll see, when all's over. No, nothing about Richards. Pinaud's was broken into on Monday night, and the manager shot while attempting to prevent the thieves from getting possession of the keys of the safe."

"Pinaud's?"

"Yes, Pinaud's!—the big jewellers in the Rue de la Paix. Why 'twas only on Saturday that I showed you in their window the amethyst which a dozen years ago I bought from a Hindoo fakir in the fruit market at Singapore."

"Anything extraordinary about that?" queried Boyd, when Hamilton remained silent.

"About what?" asked Sir George.

"The burglary."

"Yes, I think so," returned the Baronet drily, "and p'raps you'll think the same, Neil, when you've heard the story."

"Tell us the tale then, old chap, if it's like that," said Boyd, settling himself down for a smoke; and Sir George, who preferred pig-sticking to story-telling, and would rather ride ten miles any day to shoot a tiger than sit down quietly for ten minutes to tell how it was done, didn't wait for pressing, but actually started at once.

"A dozen years back," he began, "I was spending a few weeks in Singapore. You know the sort of crowd one meets there—Malays, Javanese, Jews, Turks, Europeans, Japanese, Chinese, Cingalese, Hindoos: halfcastes out of the South, halfcastes out of the East—the most motley medley to be found in any single spot on the broad bosom of this weary old planet—though I won't say but what in the variety and diversity of its items, the Praya at Hong Kong doesn't run Singapore very close.

"Strolling through the fruit market early one morning, I was accosted by a fakir of the type one sees at the bathing ghats in the holy city of Benares. Throwing himself at my feet, he produced from his dirty loin cloth a still dirtier roll of muslin. Unfolding it, he disclosed a thin strip of leather, which before opening I knew would reveal an assortment of gems which he was offering for sale.

"His collection was not very large. A few diamonds cut smooth after the fashion of the Orient, a few sapphires, a pearl or two, half-a-dozen emeralds and three remarkably fine uncut rubies.

"It was the rubies that attracted my notice, and if the price was right I was disposed to purchase.

"Lal Singh named his figure, and from another corner of his scanty waist cloth, producing a second piece of dirty rag, exhibited an amethyst of a size uncommonly large, and of the softest and purest colour. The value and appearance of the stone, however was injured, I thought, by a flaw, which ran obliquely across the face of it, giving it a very singular, not to say bizarre appearance.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"The amethyst and the rubies, I found, went in the same parcel. But, while something of a curio, certainly, I had no use for the violet-blue stone, and said so; but the old beggar was obdurate. If I took the rubies, I must take the amethyst; if I declined the amethyst, I couldn't have the rubies. Eventually, I bought the lot, the amethyst being put in at a price that made no difference; and I went off to my hotel satisfied that I had secured a bargain.

"Two days afterwards, my room at the Grand Oriental was entered, and the rubies and a few other articles stolen. But, with a nice appreciation of circumstances, the flawed amethyst was considerately left. The thief I put down as Lal Singh himself; the police, more probably, that he was merely the instigator thereof. Anyway, his dusky person vanished straightway from the bazaars and alleys of Singapore, and was seen by me no more, during my stay at the Straits Settlements.

"On the amethyst I set no particular value but, as that was all I had to show for the money I'd parted with, I sat looking at it rather ruefully the morning after the robbery, wondering why it had been left when the rubies were taken, and considering what use I could possibly turn it to.

"'Were it not for that unsightly-looking "flaw"' thought I, 'the stone itself isn't a bad one—the colour indeed, is the purest and most delicate of violets; and, when it catches the light, the successive waves of colour, as they pass over the surface, produce an effect that would be perfect but for one thing—that sinister-looking flaw.'

"Yes, the longer I looked at the stone, the more convinced did I become that the flaw on the face of it had an appearance that was decidedly sinister. I hadn't observed it before, but now, as I sat with the thing in my hand and gazed into it, I seemed to see another face grinning back at me through the cleavage of the fracture. Yes, there it was—and the longer I looked the clearer I saw it. Not a human face; no, the face of one of the thirty-three million gods of Hindoostan. But the features varied continually. Now it was Siva the Destroyer, now it was Ganesha, now Hanuman the monkey-god. It was uncanny.

"I admit to a strong strain of Highland blood in the Grahams; but we draw the line at spells, charms and amulets. I put down the stone and took a few turns across the room stopping for a minute before the window; then, coming back to the table I picked up the amethyst again. As I expected, I saw nothing but the long, ugly-looking flaw. For a moment I had fancied that by some piece of diabolical cunning a clever artificer had evolved the likeness of some idol-face out of the lines at the base of the fracture. But no—the face had been evolved by some strange freak of my own imagination.

"I examined the stone closely. There was a queer, 'creepy' sort of a look about the flaw; but I no longer saw any resemblance to a face—human or animal. I was dismissing the matter as a vision of the mind, a mental picture called up by some fantastical arrangement of lines and curves, as the light fell upon the different facets, when a noise in the street below attracted my attention, and I walked to the window, the stone still in my hand.

"A procession was passing. After the last man had gone by, I opened my hand and took another look at the stone. There was Hanuman the monkey-god, grinning at me as plainly as if I were in his own temple at Benares.

"What did it mean? I rubbed my eyes and looked again. There was nothing but the long transverse line of the flaw—stay! Yes, there was Hanuman again. No, it was Ganesha this time, Ganesha the elephant-headed. I locked away the stone and went out for a walk.

"In the native bazaar I saw a lapidary carving a seal; as it happened, the stone was an amethyst, but the colour was cloudy and the cutting very inferior. I decided that I couldn't do better with my specimen than have it converted into a seal. The flaw would be no hindrance to a clever workman, the stone was unusually large; and the cutting of the design would effectually spoil the features of Messrs. Hanuman, Ganesha & Co., which I had again persuaded myself could only be due to a lively fancy provoked by some singular refraction of light through the cleavage of the flaw.

"Next morning, I took the stone to an expert, a Cingalese who did all the best work in the place, and went off for a day's shooting.

"Before leaving the hotel, I had taken a hasty peep at the flawed stone—just for satisfaction's sake. There was nothing to distinguish it from any similar stone in the same condition; and, laughing at the stupid whimseys which foolish fancy had engendered, I wrapped it up and set out. That was the day the end of my thumb was carried away through a gun accident, while after peafowl; and the first thing I saw on going to my room in the evening was the box containing the flawed amethyst. It had been returned by the jeweller with an excuse quite too elaborate to be genuine. I was the first man in his shop in the morning.

"After much fencing and dodging he told me that the stone was considered to be unlucky—and more than that it was impossible to get out of him.

"Unlucky, was it? Well, certainly I had lost three rubies and the top of my thumb since it came into my possession.

"I went to another lapidary, but before I'd got a hundred yards from his shop, his boy was begging me to return. It was the same story, only more so—lies, excuses, what you will first; and then, the real reason: 'Ver sorree, sahib, but him no lucky. Not for ten tousand rupee, sahib. Him no good stone; no lucky, sahib, no lucky.'

"I put the stone in my pocket, and went to an English cutler's in the town where I had purchases to make. While examining some razors I managed to give myself an ugly gash with the blade. 'That confounded stone,' I muttered, looking at my bandaged thumb. 'My thumb yesterday, my finger to-day; to-morrow, perhaps, my neck.'

"At the first opportunity I stole another look at the stone. The flaw had that queer sort of uncomfortable suggestion about it which I had noticed before; but I could see nothing resembling a face looking out of the stone. Confound the thing! what was the matter with it?

"Next day I walked off to the old lapidary I had seen in the native bazaar; but with a curt shake of his venerable head and a brief 'no, sahib, no,' he returned me the stone.

"There was an English jeweller in Stamford Raffles Street and away I trudged to him. I explained what I wanted done. He examined the stone carefully, spending a considerable time over it, while I scrutinised him narrowly. 'Funny stone, isn't it?' he said, putting down the glass he had been using and eyeing me curiously. 'Queer sort of flaw, that. Can't quite make it out.'

Digitized by Google

"'What's the matter with it?' I asked carelessly.

"'I don't know,' said he, 'but—well, I could have sworn I saw a face look at me out of the stone.'

"'A face?' said I 'what sort of a face?'

"'Well,' he replied, 'I didn't see it again when I looked through the glass; so p'raps it was only fancy.'

"'Must have been,' I said, though his words had nearly brought my heart into my mouth.

"'You can leave it,' he said, 'till to-morrow, and I'll let you know what we can do with it.'

"When I called on the following day, he handed it to me with the observation that not one of his cutters—natives all—would touch it.

"It was bewitched, it was unlucky. It was this, it was that. So the flawed amethyst came back to me.

"I thought I would get Peters, my man, a long-headed, hawk-eyed Lowland Scot, to look at it; and tell me if he saw anything amiss with it.

"'There's something wrong, sir, with that "stone,"' was his verdict, delivered very impressively, as he returned it to me. But what he saw in it I couldn't get him to say, beyond the emphatic utterance of the awesome word—'devils.'

"That night, before locking the stone away—it was my purpose then to bring it to England, where, I told myself, the jewellers would not be so idiotically absurd as to refuse a job on so flimsy a pretext—that night, I forced myself to look at the stone steadily by the light of an Osler reading lamp. At the end of five minutes, the face of Siva began to show—Siva the Destroyer—blurred at first, then clearer and at last quite plain. No sooner, however, had I recognised Siva, than it was the monkey-god, Hanuman, who was mowing and grinning at me.

"The perspiration was standing in great drops upon my forehead, and, forgetting my previous resolution to take the stone home, I flung the thing from me, careless whither it fell; and undressing rapidly, got into bed.

"Some hours after, I was roused by cries of 'Fire!' The room was full of smoke. Half suffocated, I was dragged out, and the flames extinguished by the attendants. The reading lamp was found smashed upon the floor. How it came there, I haven't a notion.

"During the remainder of my stay at Singapore, I left the flawed amethyst religiously alone. Where it had fallen, there it might stay. I made no search after it, or induced any to be made; and when, at the beginning of the following week, I started for Hong Kong, I cherished the hope that, if Peters had come across the crystal in putting my things together for shipment, he had tactfully contrived, with a due regard for prejudice, to leave the unclean thing in the dust of the corner where it lay. He had said nothing to me about it; and I made up my mind I would say nothing to him.

"The run to Hong Kong would have been pleasant enough but for the fear of that stone turning up unexpectedly. It haunted me like a nightmare. When we dropped anchor in Hong Kong harbour, I felt perfectly wretched—all because of that miserable stone. What had become of it? I would have given a pocketfull of sovereigns to know; yet I was too proud to inquire of Peters, and he had never mentioned the 'deil's stane' since the day when he had given his verdict against it.

"I began to wish I had never seen the thing. It was getting on my nerves. I couldn't rid myself of the dread of it.

"I got into the boat that was to take us to the landing wharf, feeling as if a millstone were round my neck; and, looking up at the terraced roads which cut the face of the Peak, wished it was dear old Devon and the long white terraces on Plymouth Hoe.

"I suppose I got up too soon and overbalanced myself; anyway, before I could spring ashore at the wharf, I'd gone over—hat box in one hand and dispatch box in the other. The former fell back into the boat, the latter went under with me and was not recovered till days after. That blessed amethyst had found a lodging in my hat box, when I flung it across the room—the box was standing on the floor with the lid partly off. Peters had never seen it, so he tried to make me believe.

"Well, after that, what do you think? I went straight off to a Chinese dealer to whom I had been directed as a man who would buy the devil's horns if he could make a profit on them; and, after the usual 'haggle,' the stone changed hands. I had no compunction about selling it to friend 'John,' and the price was nothing. But the transaction was peculiar.

"'John' looked hard at the crystal, and, at one time I thought he was going to refuse; but presently, a grim smile overspread his yellow features—I wondered what was the particular idea which had given birth to it—and he agreed to purchase. The transfer however was effected in a manner that struck me as decidedly singular.

"Three joss sticks were produced, round which a priest had wound strips of red paper stamped with a yellow dragon. Three, you know, is the Chinese lucky number. These joss sticks were then handed to me, and it was explained that the sticks would be bought at the price named for the stone, which could be thrown into the scale as a sort of make-weight to the bargain.

"The 'lucky sticks' would subsequently be burnt before the altar of the Earth god.

"Well, that is a dozen years ago now, and I had almost forgotten the incident of the flawed amethyst, when, passing up the Rue de la Paix last Saturday with Hamilton, I saw the identical stone in Pinaud's window. We stopped to look at it. It was the same stone that I sold to Sin How at Hong Kong, twelve years ago, and in exactly the same condition. I had half a mind to go in and make some inquiry about it; but Hamilton dissuaded me. That there is some subtle connection between that unlucky stone and the shooting of Pinaud's manager, I am fully convinced; but how, why and wherefore, it would puzzle Solomon to explain.

"I have told my story," concluded Sir George, after a pause, "if any person feels equal to fording the stream, let him wade in."

But a great silence had fallen upon the room.

H. HUNTER.

Digitized by Google

A PLAIN GIRL'S STORY.

"MR. RALPH DECKER is coming home from Queensland on a visit, and Aunt Mary says he is looking for a wife. What a chance for the Malsham girls!" laughed Kitty Rand; and she turned a bright, dark face, full of mischief, to her handsome, blonde sister Jean.

"We will give him an opportunity to judge of the beauty and grace of Malsham, won't we, dear?" laughed back the fair Jean. "As to finding a wife, why he must take his chances like the others who have come and gone—eh, Kitty?"

The two-seated, o'd-fashioned trap toiled on up the hill with the two handsome daughters on the back seat; and in front, with the kind-hearted, care-worn, farmer-father, sat the middle sister, Bess, small and brown and plain, except for a pair of large, demure, and thoughtful eyes.

"Father, dear, tell us about Mr. Decker," begged Jean. "He lived in Malsham when he was a boy. You must have known his father."

The farmer, thus suddenly addressed, flicked at the road-side ferns with his whip, and cleared his throat suspiciously before he could reply to the careless question. Quick-eyed Bess glanced at him keenly from under her long lashes.

"Something is the matter with father," she said to herself. "What can it be?"

Bessie was glad when they reached the farm, and her father had gone to the barn. She was her father's girl, every one said. Retiring, reticent and silent before strangers, she was the family sunbeam, thoughtful, patient and bright, with interest in all pleasant things at home. When the young men who came to see Jean and Kitty were set aside for newcomers, they sometimes took refuge in Bessie's society, but they never sought her first, though she was only a year Kitty's junior. Somehow her mouth felt parched when she tried to talk to them and she could only answer in commonplaces.

Down in the depths of he loving heart sweet Bessie wondered if it would always be so. Would she always be passed by for her pretty sisters and never find the one who should understand her? It was hard to be neglected when all her friends were surrounded.

Bessie hastily ran out to the barn for a talk with her father. The old barn had been the scene of many such talks; and seated on the hay she and her father had often talked and planned for the good of the family. To-night, the tired man knew that she would follow him, however he tried to evade her.

"Now, father, dear, you know that you have to tell me, first or last."

"Go away, Bessie; there is nothing for a young girl like you to know. I must finish this to-night, and——"

"And I'll help you, dad. What is in that big blue envelope? Tell me the very worst of it, please."

The worst of it was quite bad enough. Worse than Bessie had dreamt. Years ago John Rand's youngest brother, a weak but never vicious boy, had run away, and had only been heard of at long intervals. The news which had come from various parts of the world had always been of a dissipated, profitless life. Brotherly letters remained unanswered, and he heeded not the request to return. This was the one grief of the farmer's life, for the young brother had been dear to him, and it was his cherished hope that one day the prodigal would come back to the home of his fathers, and to a better life.

But Edgar Rand had now caused himself to be heard from in the most unexpected and unwelcome fashion. He had deliberately forged on a bill the name of his brother for a sum so large, that the last penny of value on the little farm and the small sum laid by for a rainy day in the Grafton bank would just suffice to meet the obligation, as the forger had doubtless discovered in some manner. As matters now stood, the whole affair could be settled without publicity; but how could John Rand meet the trial?

To sell the home of his fathers would break his heart. No other place would be home to him; and to borrow a large sum of money, even if it were possible to do so, would involve a debt which would burden his whole life, if, indeed, he should live long enough to pay it. The unhappy alternative was open disgrace, the publication to the world of a stain on a hitherto fair name.

John Rand bowed his head, and his frame shook with the depth of his grief, as he finished the story.

"Oh, father, dear, we will find some way out of it; we always have found a way out, you know. Don't take it to heart so, father—don't. Let us be brave and talk it over."

"There is nothing to talk about, Bessie," said the farmer brokenly. "It is all plainly stated in the lawyer's letter, and there are just two weeks more in which to redeem the bill, or disgrace and ruin are upon us! How can Kitty and Jean and your mother bear it?"

Bessie did her best to cheer him, but her heart was heavy and she could see no way out of the trouble, although she forced a smile and pretended to be cheerful.

The next morning, a very small boy, with a big cart and an overgrown horse, was seen coming over the long hill towards the farm-house, and a three-cornered note from Bessie's particular and intimate friend, Miss Polly Waters, requested the pleasure of her company to stay over night, as the family were going away; and Bessie speedily made up her mind to accept the invitation. She resolved to confide a part of the story, at least, to Polly, whose big brother Dan was a solicitor in Grafton; and as the gaunt horse carefully adjusted his awkward proportions to the steep hills, Bessie's thoughts ran far ahead of his slow steps.

Digitized by Google

"We can go over to Dan's office this afternoon," said Polly, when she heard the story, her bright face full of sympathy. "I can drive old Bunker, and we'll have a nice ride. Dan will manage it for you," said comforting Polly, whose ideas of financial matters were of the crudest sort.

Old Bunker was jogging away easily, with his head to the ground, when the girls noticed a few drops of rain.

"There is a sprinkle of rain," cried Polly.

"And look at that heavy cloud," said Bessie. "What if it should be a thunder storm, and not a house in sight, and Grafton fully two miles away! There! that's thunder!"

"Old Bunker is afraid of thunder; I never thought of that before," added his mistress. "Just look at him. He knows what is coming."

The gaunt, big horse, had pricked up his ears, and, with head erect, was listening in terror to a distant muttering sound, which came nearer and nearer, and burst in a great peal just over their heads. Polly jumped out and ran to the horse's head in time to save him from a frightened plunge forward, and just then the clouds which had rolled up unperceived behind them, began to pour down a blinding deluge of rain.

Bessie leapt out lightly, and the two hastily wrapped themselves in cloaks. The lightning began to flash in great sheets, and the rain poured down in torrents. They were now on the open road, unprotected by shelter of any kind. The big horse shivered in terror at each fresh peal of thunder, but partly soothed by Polly's coaxing, made no further effort to break away, though steadily refusing to move in either direction. And the storm increasing in fury, gave no signs of a speedy ending.

The girls held a consultation, and Polly insisted that Bessie must go on alone in order to see Dan before he left his office. After considerable hesitation, Bessie agreed, and started off alone on foot, leaving Polly to follow as soon as she could.

Bessie Rand trudged on bravely for about a mile in the face of the storm. Her boots, heavy with water, and clogged with mud, did not move easily over the soaked ground, her head beat and throbbed with the exertion, and her mouth was parched and dry; her cheeks burnt and her hair hung dishevelled about her face.

Just at the cross-roads, and when she felt that she must give up the fight against the elements, a welcome sound greeted her ears, and in a moment a swift-footed horse and a low phaeton came in sight.

The horse's head was turned towards Grafton, and a man, muffled closely from the storm, leant out and in a strange voice courteously offered her a place in the phaeton. Bessie, in her wet garments, breathless and anxious with her errand, gave no thought to the propriety of trusting herself to a stranger, but eagerly accepted the offer and bestowed herself in one corner of the phaeton with supreme thankfulness for the swiftness of the steed that was bearing them towards Grafton.

There was nothing to indicate to the young lady whether her companion was young or old, fair or dark, so thoroughly was he protected from the storm; nothing but a pair of dark eyes, which seldom looked towards her corner. The girl leant back exhausted on the cushions and closed her eyes.

"Do you live in Grafton?" she asked, when she at length opened her eyes.

The question was evidently a surprise, and it was a few minutes before the man answered.

"I am a stranger in this part of the country. I come from abroad. But what brings a young lady like you out in such a wild storm, alone and apparently in such haste?"

The question was as unconventional as her own, and recalled to Bessie all that had been disturbing her. She was never a careless talker, and was notably reticent about her own affairs; but the strangeness and the urgency of the situation seemed to have transformed her.

She scarcely knew herself, and something in the dark eyes compelled her to do what seemed then a perfectly natural and proper thing to do. With the first sound of her voice all the evil that she feared came rushing over her, and in trembling tones and with fast-falling tears she answered question after question in her own straightforward way, until she had told everything—her hopes and fears, the story of her quiet life, and of the old farm, the dear father and the handsome sisters and the dissipated uncle—all to this stranger.

The stranger made a few sympathetic observations, and by that time they were at the solicitor's office.

"Be sure that you tell no one," was Dan's parting injunction, after the whole story had been told, the sister rescued and the two made comfortable.

"But I did tell it to some one," said Bessie regretfully; "and to a stranger. How could I have been so foolish?"

The solicitor was not pleased. He had heard of no stranger in Grafton answering to her description, and it might lead to great mischief. However, it was done and nothing remained but to make the best of it.

Mr. Waters was going away on business and would take the papers with him and see what could be done. In the meantime, Bessie was to tell her father to take courage, and to leave everything for the present to the young solicitor, who had already won a reputation for marked ability.

But the days passed slowly and painfully in the old farm-house. Perhaps they were the last they would spend in the old home, they thought; and never had the woods and the hills looked so beautiful, never had the cheery sitting-room seemed so delightful. The father and daughter held many conferences on the long hillside, and the farmer's sallow cheeks gained new furrows.

Great was the excitement in the little house during the last days of Dan's absence, when a telegram made its unaccustomed way to the Rands. It contained but two words—"All right,"—but since it was signed with Dan's name it meant much.

Two days afterwards, Bessie accepted an invitation to spend a day or two with Polly, as her mother and father would be away. On the second morning, Polly surprised her by saying that her lover, Jack Matthews, was coming to tea, and would bring a gentleman friend with him.

Bessie felt rather nervous at first, but she soon recovered her spirits, and in much friendly chatter the morning and afternoon passed away.

The little tea-table was a marvel of homely beauty, with its fresh roses and dainty viands; and when Jack came in, and introduced his friend, Bessie found herself face to face with the much-talked of Mr. Ralph Decker.

All sorts of embarrassing thoughts rushed into the girl's mind, and made her forget her surprise that he should know Jack Matthews.

Bessie, as usual, could only utter monosyllabic replies; and when Jack and Polly slipped away for a few minutes, she could scarcely answer at all.

Digitized by Google

The young man seemed not in the least embarrassed, but talked on pleasantly enough. It seemed to Bessie that something in his eyes when he spoke looked strangely familiar. He began to talk of the weather, of the lack of rain, of storms, and of a horse he had once owned that would never travel in a thunderstorm and appeared to be maddened by lightning.

"The Waters' have just such a horse," ventured Bessie. "Polly and I were caught in a storm only a few days ago and old Bunker wouldn't stir."

"What did you do then?"

"Oh, we were going to Grafton on important business," she said hesitatingly, "and I had to go on and leave her, until her brother Dan could come after her."

"And did you walk all the way to Grafton?"

"Oh, no," said Bessie innocently. "Just as I came to the cross-roads, an old man in a phaeton came along all bundled up in cloak and rugs and let me ride with him."

Ralph Decker gave a quick side glance at the demure face of his companion, in which honesty and sympathy were plainly written, and he judged it best for his purpose to appeal to the latter. So he straightway heaved a sigh—not a mild, delicate sigh, but a deep drawn, heart-rending affair, which really cost an effort.

"Oh, what is it?" asked Bessie quickly. "Are you ill?"

"No, oh, no." said the young man; "I am not ill, but——" here he leant his head back against the chair, and spoke very gravely: "but it really makes me feel faint to think that, although I am barely thirty, I look so venerable that a young lady like yourself thinks I am an old man."

Bessie's eyes widened and lengthened to an edifying state of roundness, and her companion with difficulty repressed the laughter which would have ruined his cause. Over the young girl's expressive face a light was slowly creeping.

"I believe it was your own self," she said gravely, "and I told you all about my father, and the dreadful bill and all! Dan said it was such a bad thing to do, and it was so unlike me, for I always keep secrets. But I might have told it to someone worse," she added, impolitely and illogically, but in a hopeful tone.

"Doubtless, yes," said Ralph, and he allowed himself a little smile as he saw Bessie's face brightening. "Because, you see, if you would allow me, I am a friend of Dan's, and have known all about your family from my father, and just in the way of business." The young man was growing embarrassed in his turn. "Now, please, don't thank me, Miss Rand, for I really cannot endure being thanked, but I found that I could look after that bill in a way that I will explain to your father, and Dan understands it and says it is all right. I know the man who—er—wrote the bill; I met him abroad! And I know the man who holds it very well indeed."

"My uncle?" whispered Bessie faintly.

"Yes, and I could arrange the affair better than anyone else. I ventured to tell you myself, so that you need not worry about it any more, you know."

Tears and smiles and burning blushes united to make our plain girl almost beautiful, as she lifted her large eyes to meet the young man's gaze.

"I won't thank you," she said slowly, "if you really feel so badly about being thanked, but I do think you, are—uncommonly unusual. And you are a stranger to us all. It is so kind. Father will be so glad, for, in spite of Dan's telegram, we have been very anxious lest we should lose our home. It is about all we have for our old age, you see."

Ralph Decker laughed out loud this time, and Bessie relieved of her burden, laughed too, though she did not know what amused the stranger.

"Do you expect to spend your old age on the farm with your father and mother?" he added quizzically.

"They all expect it," said Bessie, with a cheerful laugh; for she felt so happy, not only because of the freedom from anxiety, but because relief had come through such a pleasant channel, that even a monotonous single life on the hills seemed a subject for congratulation.

But the young man came and sat beside her on the sofa, and said, with a laugh in his eyes, but very earnestly all the same:

"Do you know I have been thinking of a pleasant little home that I know of away in Queensland, and of a lonely man in that little home, and best of all, of a dear little girl, honest and true and tender-hearted, altogether too dear and nice to live alone when she could make such a charming wife. And I have been thinking that if she could forgive a man, as honest and true as herself, I firmly believe, for taking advantage of her frankness when she was in trouble, perhaps she might, in time—not a long time either—come to think rather kindly of this man and of the little home that would so gladly own her as its mistress."

It is quite impossible to guess what answer Bessie would have made, though her eyes shone with a happiness of which she was very much ashamed. But just at this moment Jack and Polly came in, and they all went in to tea. Bessie's eyes rested on his gravely, but with a delightfully pleasant expression.

Like the very wise man that he was, however—and the men are few who really understand the best and the quickest way to a woman's heart—he did not allude to the matter again that day.

He met her three days later near her home, and they met each day for the next week. He told her of his plans and many other things; and Bessie listened, blushed at his words, and thought she must be dreaming, but it was a very happy dream.

And as Ralph Decker was obliged to be back by a certain date, and as there would still be two sisters at the farm-house, and as Ralph loved Bessie with all his heart, which was a large one, and as Bessie could not deny that she regarded him with something much dearer than friendship, it happened that there was a pretty wedding in a very short space of time at the little church under the hill, and all the young men and maidens came, and the plain sister could hardly be told from the pretty ones.

And with blinding tears of sorrow at the parting, and of joy because of her suddenly given rich store of happiness, Bessie said good-bye to the dear home-folks and went away with her big husband to the little home which she long lived to bless.

L. WISCARD WORMS.

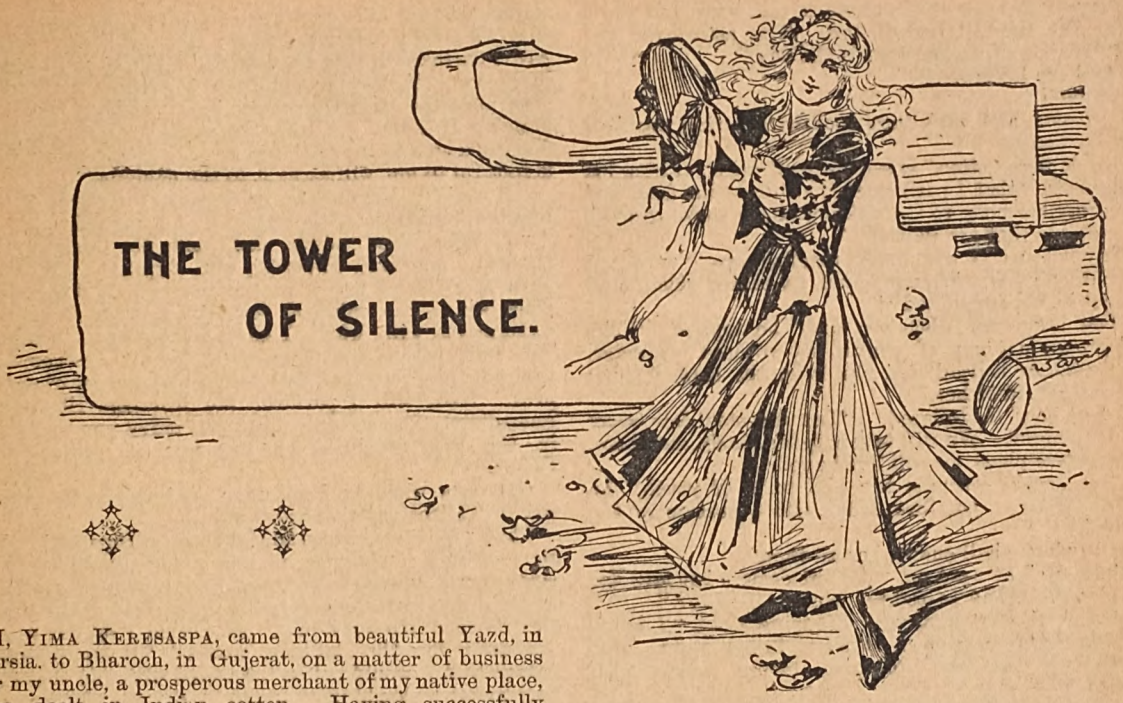
- - THE FIRST VOLUME OF THE - - Imperial Naval and Military Album is now ready, price 7s. 6d. Cloth covers for binding may be obtained from J. and J. Keliher, 33 King William Street, E.C., or from these offices, at 2s. each.

Digitized by Google



THE TOWER OF SILENCE.

I, Yima Keresaspa, came from beautiful Yazd, in Persia, to Bharoch, in Gujerat, on a matter of business for my uncle, a prosperous merchant of my native place, who dealt in Indian cotton. Having successfully accomplished my mission, I paused on my homeward journey to deliver a letter of introduction to a friend of my uncle's, one Sayuzdri, a mobed (priest of the middle order) of our sect, the Shenshai, resident in Bombay.

Arrived in the city, I wandered to the Parsee settlement on beautiful Back Bay beach. The situation was delightful, and as I had become somewhat heated with my walk, I reclined on a rustic seat in the shade of a jungle of palms and allowed my eyes to take in the landscape beauties spread out before them.

I was suddenly aroused by hearing a long-drawn sigh. Turning quickly I saw, not far distant, the most beautiful woman it has ever been my lot to behold.

She was a type of our women, but, oh! it was an idealised type, excelling in all the graces. Her face was wondrous fair, her form delicately rounded in the full blossom of its development, and her hands were small and shapely.

Her eyes were large, lustrous and dark, and looked out over the sea with a sadness and melancholy that pierced my heart. Instinctively I rose and approached her. She looked up, startled, and then the fear fled from her eyes, and the light that filled them flashed into my soul and intoxicated me with the first draught of love.

"Forgive me," I said. "I heard you sigh and was surprised that so much sorrow and beauty should be found together."

"Comeliness," she answered, in a soft voice, "is no armour against sadness, nor is purity of heart a protection from the wiles of the evil-minded. However, it is not meet that I should pass words with a stranger, even though so gentle and so kindly spoken."

She discreetly veiled her face with the folds of silk that hung down over her left arm and turned away.

"Ah, fair one," I murmured, "grant me yet a moment! I come from afar and am seeking the priest, Sayuzdri."

"You know him?" she cried, turning upon me with sparkling eyes, the veil partially dropping away.

"I have that which insures me his friendship," I made answer. "He is an old friend of my uncle's, who lives in distant Yazd."

"He is a good man," she said slowly; "a faithful friend to me. There is his house, yonder."

She pointed to the peak of a dwelling, just visible through the trees.

"When you go to him," she continued, "tell him that it was Ardvi Navazza who directed you, unhappy Ardvi who directed——"

"Yima Keresaspa," I answered, in a rapture of happiness.

"Even so," she responded, again sadly as she replaced the silken folds over her face.

She paused before parting and then extended her small hand. I caught it and pressed it to my lips. I would have held it, but she drew away and disappeared from my sight.

Peerless, unhappy Ardvi! From that moment I loved her with my very soul.

I found Sayuzdri, delivered my letter and was received by him as his son. It may well be imagined that I lost no time in approaching the subject nearest my heart.

"I was directed here, reverend Sayuzdri, by a beautiful maiden who bade me tell you that it was Ardvi, the unhappy, who had performed the service."

"Poor Ardvi," he murmured; "victim of——"

"How," I cried. "What mean you, reverend one?"

His sharp eyes were bent upon me.

"Two weeks from to-morrow," he said, "I shall light the lamp of incense at the house of the bride and there repeat the nuptial benediction. The astrologer has consulted the stars, and that is the day."

Digitized by Google

"And the bride is——"

"Ardvi!"

I groaned and sank into a chair, covering my face with my hands.

"Ah, it were better," cried the good priest, raising his hands aloft, "that I performed the rites of the dead and bore away her body to the dakhma, there to be a prey to the vultures that are waiting!"

"Say not so!" I exclaimed, starting up; "surely, if the maiden's heart has not found its choice, this union will not be consummated?"

"You know not what you say," he replied. "The bridegroom is a man of wealth, but without character. Ardvi's father is dead, and she is in the care of those eager to get rid of her."

"I love her," I declared. "Let me steal her away this very night. We will take ship for Persia, and there, in my native place, we will live happily."

"You speak with the fire and folly of youth," he replied calmly; "you love Ardvi with a passion of the moment."

"But which shall endure for all time."

"And she," he went on, "did she declare her love for you before you had passed ten words together?"

"Alas!" I answered, with drooping head, "I know not whether my passion finds favour in her sight. But it was not her part to pass loving words with another."

"And that other a stranger," he said forcibly. "Do not misunderstand me, Yima. I do not frown upon your love, although the suddenness of its awakening furnishes grave doubts of its constancy. Come to me a week hence. In the meantime, I will see Ardvi, and if she gives her consent to a plan I have long thought of, and you are still in the same mind, something shall be done."

I caught his hands in both my own.

"But," he added, "you are not to see her again until the culmination of our plot, if so it is to be."

Sorely against my will I consented and went away.

At the end of a week I returned, but Sayuzdri had not been successful and held forth little hope; at the same time, he directed me to call upon him again in a day or two. Once more I called, and this time the good man met me with a smiling face, invoking upon me the blessings of Ormuzd.

"You have seen Ardvi?" I asked eagerly.

"I have seen her," he replied, "and if you have courage equal to the passion you profess, all may yet be well."

"My courage, as well as my passion, reverend one," said I, "will bear the test of any trial. Who would not love Ardvi and dare the world for her sake?"

"Headstrong words, my son; and yet, I have observed you well. You come of a good stock. Ardvi is not insensible to the love you profess; even though she might be tempted to doubt—it is so sudden. Listen, Yima! A great and terrible thing is that which we are about to do. If our plot prospers, and I unite your fate with that of Ardvi, it may happen that you have wrongly read your heart and that misery will be visited upon you both. Do not speak! I know what you would say," and thereupon he bowed his head and solemnly recited a prayer for guidance.

The prayer over, Sayuzdri continued:

"There is a drug, my son, whose effect is to throw the one who partakes of it into a trance so like unto death that the wisest cannot detect a sign of life. To-day, Ardvi partakes of this drug and to-night she will seemingly die. In the morning, I will perform the funeral obsequies, the nassesalars will bear the body away to Malabar Hill and the stone of parting, and thence you, disguised as a priest and assisted by a young priest who is faithful to me, will carry it to the dakhma."

"How is it possible for us to usurp the offices of the regular attendants of the dakhma?" I queried.

"I have some power and influence among the faithful," answered Sayuzdri, with dignity. "What I have done is neither a profanation nor a dishonour. Once within the dakhma, you will apply to Ardvi the restoratives with which I shall provide you; then you will wait within the stone walls for night to come so that you may return to this house under cover of darkness. Here will I perform the marriage rites, and immediately thereafter a boat will carry you to a ship in the bay which is on the eve of sailing for Persia."

Overcome with joy, I fell upon my knees at the reverend man's feet and thanked him.

That night I remained in the house of Sayuzdri. In the morning, he hurried me into one of the white linen suits worn by the priests. As an additional precaution, my face was partially covered with one fold of the cloth that formed the headdress. After this, I set out without delay for the dakhma, assured by my priestly patron that I would not be interfered with and that the only priest I should meet would be the one who was to act with me.

I shall never forget that morning on Malabar Hill, the strangeness of the adventure fixing each scene and incident upon my mind with an intensity which makes everything as vivid to-day as it was then, a score of years ago.

"Ardvi," I murmured, as I betook myself slowly towards the dakhma, "is to be saved from a fate worse than death, but we are to pass to our happiness only through this temple of the dead!"

I had learnt this much of Ardvi's history. Her mother had been married again and her step-father had forced Ardvi to bear his name. The unfortunate girl was not esteemed in her home as a daughter should be, and she was to be married to a wealthy Hindu, a notorious character in Bombay. As to this alliance, Ardvi had had little to say. Everything had been arranged by her step-father. The Parsees have a law forbidding intermarriages with the natives, but in Ardvi's case it was considered that Parsee laws did not apply, her father not being of that religion. Poor girl! What wonder that, in order to escape the unhappy influences that surrounded her, she was willing to resort to any measure, however desperate?

At the dakhma I was met by a tall figure, hooded in white linen, and was asked if I were the young Persian. I replied in the affirmative and would have spoken further, but the priest laid a finger on his lips and made a gesture which plainly said that he understood all. As we stood there, I looked below and saw the nassesalars ascending towards us, bearing the supposed corpse of Ardvi. Before them walked Sayuzdri; behind them came the cortege.

"They have reached the stone of parting," said my companion; "we must descend and meet them."

My nerves tingled with excitement as we advanced towards the waiting group, raised the bier and bore it into the dakhma.

Digitized by Google

Already were the vultures flapping their wings and flying towards the Tower.

Within the Tower of Silence, we placed our insensible burden down upon the grating, and I drew the spotless covering from Ardvi's face.

"Is she not beautiful?" I murmured, all the passion of my soul surging to the surface.

As I bent over the form of my loved one, I felt a sudden and strong pressure about my neck, and was drawn forcibly backward and cast upon the floor of the Tower. For a moment, astonishment paralysed my limbs even as my tongue, because of the gripping at my throat, clove to the roof of my mouth. My eyes stared upward and I saw a demonical face bending over me. It was my supposed confederate!

He now disclosed, beneath the white linen vestments, the garb of a Hindu. Upon my breast he placed his heavily-shod foot and twisted with unmerciful strength the folds of the roomal which he had cast about my head.

"I will strangle the life from your body!" he hissed. "You thought to trick me out of my prize, but you shall not. You shall die and Ardvi will be mine! I have sworn it!"

How had all this come to pass? As I lay there, helpless and slowly choking to death, I wondered vaguely what had gone wrong with Sayuzdri's plans. I gave up all thoughts of life and resigned myself to my fate; but, suddenly, there came a rush of beating wings and the vultures swooped down upon my enemy and attacked him beak and talon. He was obliged to use his hands in fighting them off and this caused him to release me.

As I sprang up I heard a cry of anguish and rage, and through the legion of flapping wings and brown bodies I saw the bleeding face of the Hindu. He ran madly towards the centre of the dakhma, tripped, fell and plunged wildly against one of the grated tiers. He was blinded by the blood from his wounds and could not see whither he went. Cursing and groaning, the wretched man again rushed forward impetuously, stumbled as before and dashed himself headforemost against the wall of the Tower. Falling to the floor, he lay motionless, with the vultures hovering about him.

Throwing one arm across my face, I hurried forward and fought off the infuriated birds while I knelt a moment at the Hindu's side. My amazement was great when I discovered that he was dead. In his headlong plunge against the rocky wall he had slain himself.

Returning to Ardvi, I hastily applied the restoratives which I had brought. The vultures did not annoy us, the lifeless form of the Hindu claiming their attention, and I soon had the satisfaction of seeing my beloved one open her bright eyes and gaze up into my face.

"Yima," she whispered, "your love is indeed great since you dare so much for me. I will endeavour to prove myself worthy of it."

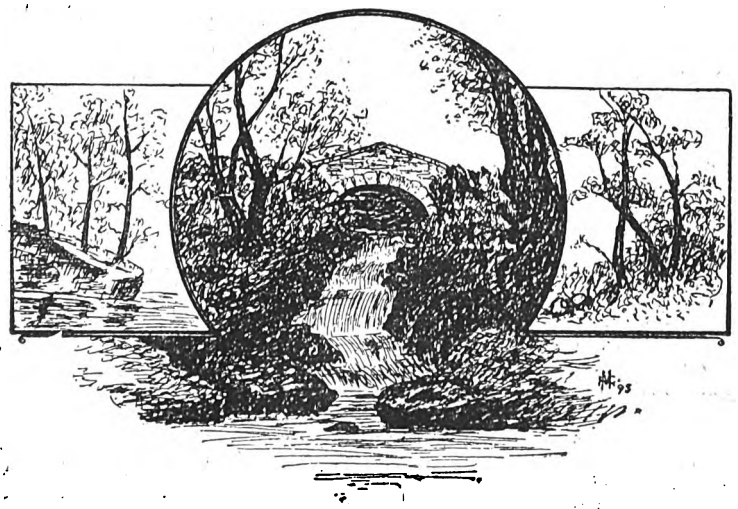
With these words she arose and pressed her lips to my bleeding forehead. Then we hurried to a spot where we should be safe from the vultures.

That night, Ardvi and I, hand in hand, descended Malabar Hill, thankful that our plans had succeeded in spite of all difficulties.

We found Sayuzdri pacing the floor of his dwelling, greatly agitated. The young priest who was to have been my confederate had visited him but a short time before our arrival and had told of being bound hand and foot, in his own home, by a trio of Hindus, one of whom had donned his sacred habit and repaired to the dakhma. The good man heard my story with thankfulness and commended my future days to the care of Ormuzd. How the Hindu, who had met his fate in the Tower of Silence, became possessed of our secret remains unknown to Sayuzdri and myself, even unto this day.

Within a few hours after returning to the home of the good priest, Ardvi and I had been joined in wedlock; and we then took ship for Persia, arriving in due time in safety at Yazd.

W. ROGERSON.



Digitized by Google

TWO HATS.

A FLASH of yellow light striking downwards upon a man's face and breast. Faintly visible, behind the light, a dark and tall figure in uniform. Kneeling on the edge of the light another figure also in uniform.

The kneeling man raised his head, bringing his own face into the light.

"Do you know him, Warner?" he asked.

"No," answered the other. "Is he drunk?"

"Dying."

There was a moment's pause. One officer supported the dying man's head, while the other, keeping the light steady upon the stranger, took mental note of his appearance.

He saw a man of nearly fifty. The pallor of death struggled through the bronze hue of the skin. Abundant wavy, grey hair clustered about the forehead, which was broad and high.

The man was dressed in garments of a dark colour. His waistcoat was open, showing a great red stain upon the shirt.

"There's the knife," said Constable Warner, pointing downwards.

Breen picked it up. It was a strange weapon, with a very thin blade, pointed like a needle, yet had a cutting edge. Its appearance suggested the Far East.

"We must carry him to Dr. Borden's," said Breen. "We shall just catch him before he goes to bed."

He bent forward to lift the upper part of the body, and in so doing raised the man's right hand, bringing it into the circle of the light.

"What's he got there?" cried Warner.

Breen took the object from the man's hand. It was a lead-pencil.

"Can he have written anything?" asked Breen. "I don't see any paper."

"Perhaps he scratched something on the stones," rejoined the other, holding his lantern close down to the pavement.

"I can't see anything there," said Breen. "We must not waste this fellow's time looking for it. He hasn't much to spare, and what little he has may be worth a good deal if he can be restored to consciousness."

Hastily lifting the senseless burden, they bore it to the doctor's, and the physician succeeded in restoring the man to consciousness—at least for a moment.

Breen, Warner and the doctor were bending over him when he opened his eyes.

"Speak quick, if you're got any questions to ask," whispered the doctor.

"Who did this?" said Breen, speaking very distinctly.

There was no answer, although there was an indication of comprehension in the man's eyes. The question was three times repeated; then the doctor whispered:

"Try something else. Ask his name."

"Who are you?" asked Breen.

The man made an effort to speak, but the words could not be understood. Breen bent down till his ears almost touched the dying man's lips. The others heard only a faint, muttering sound. Immediately the man's body stiffened; a shudder passed over it, the eyes became fixed and glassy.

"Dead!" cried the doctor. "Did you catch what he said?"

"The name on the stone," replied Breen. "That's what he said just before he fell back."

Warner stepped towards the door, and he and his mate hurried out, leaving the doctor beside the body. In a few minutes they returned, bring with them a small flagstone which they had torn out of the pavement. On the clean, white surface of this stone had been written with a lead pencil:

"Henry Owen,
90 Orchard Street."

The doctor read the words, and then exclaimed:

"The murderer's name!"

But Breen pointed out that the waistcoat had been deliberately opened, and held up a hat which he found near the spot, and showed the same name written on the band. That appeared to disprove the murder theory.

An examination showed that the clothing was new and "ready-made," and that the pockets had not been rifled. The case was reported, and the body removed to the mortuary, while Breen was sent to No. 90 Orchard Street to inform the relatives of what had occurred.

Digitized by Google

The earlier editions of the evening papers of the following day contained an account of the finding of the body and the result of the constable's visit to the house in Orchard Street, which was not the least extraordinary part of the story. The door was opened by a lady who said she was Mrs. Henry Owen, to whom the officer gently broke the news that her husband was dead.

To his surprise, Mrs. Owen informed him that her husband was alive and well in the bedroom! Mr. Owen then came forward and indignantly described it as "another stupid police blunder"; but when he heard of the writing on the stone he was nonplussed. Then Breen showed the name on the band inside the hat—which he had taken with him for purposes of identification—and the constable noticed that Mr. Owen started violently. Finally, when Breen described the man, Mrs. Owen nearly swooned.

The latest editions contained particulars of further developments. Inquiries showed that Mr. Owen possessed a hat exactly similar to that worn by the dead man, but without the name of the owner, and that it bore the same maker's name. It was proved that he had passed the scene of the occurrence that evening at half-past ten. He had appeared confused by certain questions put to him, and the police had decided to arrest him.

The mystery surrounding the case called for the superior ability of an experienced man, and it was handed to the celebrated Inspector Harrison. The latter knew Breen well. The constable was anxious to become a detective and had given promise of considerable ability; moreover, Breen had on a recent occasion rendered the Inspector a great service; so, for these reasons, Harrison was determined to help the constable, and asked for his assistance in the case.

On the second morning Inspector Harrison and Breen were in the mortuary, as the former wished to view the body and see the position of the wound.

"The writing on the stone could scarcely have been done by the man who lies here, as you say," said Harrison. "It is too regular for a dying man."

"That's what I thought, sir," replied Breen. "And that's why I went to Owen's office and managed to get some specimens of his handwriting. I hope you'll help me if I get censured for exceeding my duty."

"You're all right, Breen. It was a smart move. And the handwriting is strikingly like that on the stone," returned Harrison.

"Any news of the identification of the body?" asked the detective, as he prepared to depart a few minutes later.

"No, so far as I know," replied Breen.

As these words were spoken, the conversation was interrupted by the entrance of an old man dressed like a well-to-do farmer. His face indicated intelligence and education, but he had something of that peculiar hesitating manner which marks the man unaccustomed to the turmoil of a great city.

"What do you want?" asked Breen, stepping up to the visitor, who was walking towards the place where the body lay.

"Why, as I was going by," said the old countryman timidly, "I thought I'd step in and look at the body."

"What for?" asked the officer. "Do you think you'll recognise it?"

"Recognise it! Well, I should say so. Why, I'm the poor fellow's uncle!"

"Whose uncle?"

"Why, Henry Owen's uncle."

"Henry Owen isn't dead."

"Not dead?" echoed the old man as with trembling hands he drew a copy of a newspaper out of his pocket. "Why, this paper says that he was murdered and that his body was brought here."

"That newspaper has made a blunder," said Harrison, stepping forward. "It was at first thought that the body was Mr. Owen's, but he is alive and well."

"Thank heaven!" said the old man fervently. "Gentlemen, you can't imagine what I've suffered coming here. I've thought over and over again of what his wife must feel, and what I should do to comfort her. And to think it was all what you might call a hoax, and Henry wasn't dead after all! But who is the poor fellow?"

"We do not know," said Harrison, leading the old man to the rude coffin in which the body lay.

At the first glance at the face the farmer started in surprise.

"Well, I don't so much blame them after all," he said. "He certainly looks like Henry."

This statement was a surprise to Breen, who had seen Henry Owen, and had not remarked any striking resemblance between him and the dead man. Yet it now seemed to him that there was some grounds for the farmer's remark.

"Yes, he is very much like Henry," continued the stranger, "but older."

"Do you know Henry Owen intimately?" asked Breen.

"Why, if you come to that, I ain't seen him for ten years," replied the stranger. "But when he was a boy, and even after he grew up, I used to see him every day. Yes, I was very fond of Henry, and of Horace, too."

"Who was Horace?" asked Harrison.

"Henry's elder brother. He's been dead a dozen years or more. He was a wild boy, and ran away from home. That was in '77 or '78 if I remember right."

"Horace ran away?"

"Yes, I'm afraid he was rather the black sheep of the family. But Henry was steady enough—as steady as most boys. That's why he got his father's money, when brother John died. John was a rich man, and his money has been well taken care of by Henry."

"And you say it's ten years since you've seen Henry?"

Digitized by Google

"Yes, quite that."

There was a moment of silence, during which Harrison, who was observing the old man closely, saw him give a sudden start as the bright eyes behind the steel framed glasses rested upon some objects on the table near by. Among them was the old-fashioned gold watch that had been found in the dead man's pocket.

"It appears to me that I've seen that watch before," said Mr. Owen.

He stepped forward and took up the watch.

"It can't be possible, and yet it is, it must be," he murmured. "Gentlemen, this is the body of Horace Owen. I've been trying to fight against that conclusion ever since I saw it, but now I'm convinced."

"I thought you said Horace died long ago," said the Inspector.

"We thought he had been lost at sea," replied the old man. "Yet drowned people come back in fact as well as in the story books. This must be Horace, for here's the watch that I gave him when he was a boy."

"How do you know it? There must be a good many watches like it in the world."

"Very likely," responded Mr. Owen, "but I'm sure of this one. Let me show you what an old man's memory can do. It was twenty odd years ago that I gave the boy that watch, yet I'll tell you the number."

Breen took the watch and opened it in a twinkling. Then, turning to Mr. Owen, he said questioningly:

"Well?"

"Shall I give it to you forwards or backwards?" asked the old man with a smile.

"That settles it," said Breen, and he handed the watch to Keith, who saw at a glance what Mr. Owen and the officer meant.

The number was 2,3 2. Owen gave it just as the inspector looked up.

"This is a strong point in the identification," said the detective, "yet it does not go far towards solving the real puzzle. How do you account for the name on the stone?"

"Horace, after he was stabbed, wrote his brother's name and address," said the farmer. "That's natural enough. He wanted his body taken there."

"That might do but for one curious fact," said Harrison. "The writing is not Horace's, but Henry's, and it was done before the stabbing—not after."

"If what you say is true," said the old man slowly, "I don't understand it at all."

"Had the brothers ever quarrelled?" asked the inspector.

"Only about Florence," was the reply. "They both wanted to marry her, and we thought she'd take Horace, though he was so wild. But she took Henry, and there it ended."

"Without bitter feeling?"

"Without an open quarrel," said the old man impressively. "Heaven only knows what a man may feel when the woman he loves is married, and he is not the bridegroom. Yet that was years ago, and it certainly cannot account for the murder of the disappointed man by the successful one."

The old man further said that Horace cut his chest accidentally with a knife when a boy, and, no doubt the scar was still visible; but an examination of the body yielded no result.

Some hours after the scene in the mortuary, Harrison called upon Mrs. Henry Owen.

"I am engaged in the investigation of the death of the man whose body was found in York Alley the night before last," said he, "and I thought that you would be anxious to know what progress has been made."

"Indeed I am," replied the lady. "My husband's uncle has told me of the identification. I cannot credit it; and even if it is correct, not one-hundredth part of the mystery is explained."

"It seemed so to me at first," said the detective, "but on further consideration I decided that the identification carried with it almost the full story of the affair."

"You do not suspect my husband?" she said anxiously, but in a firm voice.

"I am sorry to be obliged to tell you," he said, "that I believe your husband struck the fatal blow."

"You are mad to think so," she exclaimed, growing paler.

"Let us consider the evidence," the Inspector rejoined. "I am glad to find you so calm."

"The evidence in the case," he continued, "takes us back fifteen years. At that time you were loved by two brothers. One of them was a wild and reckless fellow, the other prudent and thrifty. You made the choice that wisdom dictated; that is, if love could go where worldly judgment pointed the way.

"You were married, and for five years you lived in Southampton. Then you moved here and have dwelt in this house ever since.

"I learn from the man—now very old—of whom you at first rented, and later bought this house, that all the negotiations were conducted by you."

Mrs. Owen started to her feet.

"What do you mean by this?" she exclaimed.

"I see that I may omit a large part of the history," said the detective calmly. "You already see its bearing. Let us come at once to the evidence of your husband's uncle. He tells me that though he has been here often, he has never met your husband in this house."

"Well, what of that? It happened so."

"I cannot find that anyone who knew Henry Owen in Southampton ever saw him here. When you moved you severed all old connections.

"You made new friends here. You led a new life. With whom?"

The woman covered her face with her hands.

"Mrs. Owen," the inspector continued, "when I learnt that your husband's only relative had not seen him for ten years; when I discovered that ten years ago he apparently began a new business career; when, finally, I looked for that old scar on the breast of the dead man, and did not find it, then I concluded that here was a strange love story to unravel."

"Speak out," she cried.

"I decided to look for that scar on the breast of a living man," said Harrison. "That the two men who figured in this case were Henry and Horace Owen I could not doubt. But I decided that Henry lay dead in his coffin, and that Horace was alive and in prison.

"I, therefore, sought the prisoner. I asked him, in the interests of justice, to permit me to see his breast. He refused, of course. You should have seen how his hand clutched his coat above that scar."

"Stop!" cried the woman. "You have said that my husband's hand struck the blow which killed that unhappy man. When you said that whom did you mean?"

"I meant your lawful husband," said Harrison. "This was no murder. The condition of the clothing is strong evidence; but stronger than that, in fact conclusive, is the surgical examination of the wound. The man could have sought help; he could have made an outcry. Had murder been done by means of such a wound alone, the whole neighbourhood would have been alarmed.

Digitized by Google

"No; Henry Owen's own hand inflicted the wound upon his breast. I can guess the cause. I have learnt that he arrived here on the day before yesterday in a sailing vessel from Calcutta. Doubtless he has been absent ten years.

"Something parted you. He strayed a long time, and then came back to renew the old life. He learnt your secret, and then he struck that blow.

"But first he wrote those words upon the stone. But for them he might have been buried in an unmarked grave, and your sin might not have been punished in this world. Perhaps that thought came to him at the very last. At any rate his purpose is accomplished.

"This, I am sure, is an accurate outline of the story, sufficient, perhaps, for my purpose. But there are details which you can supply, and I need not tell you that further concealment is useless."

Mrs. Owen crossed the room and leant against the window, pressing her forehead to the cool glass. When she turned, her face showed Harrison what he wished to see—that the struggle was over.

She sat down, and motioned the detective to a seat before her. Then she told her story:

"I have always loved Horace," she said. "I married his brother because he was to be his father's heir.

"Naturally, we did not live happily. It was my fault. My husband grew morose. He gave up his business; he shunned all his friends until they almost forgot him.

"Our unhappiness was known in a general way to our neighbours in Southampton. I was anxious to get away. I persuaded my husband to let me take a lease of this house. He consented, but took no interest in what was to be—as I thought—his new home. In fact, he never came to see it.

"Just before we were ready to come here, we had a quarrel, more violent than any that had preceded. He left me, declaring that he would end a life which I had made unbearable.

"Days passed, and he did not return. I kept my own counsel. My neighbours knew nothing of what had occurred.

"One day I read in a newspaper that a drowned body had been found in the Mersey and had been taken to the mortuary in Liverpool. I went there, for a picture in a newspaper resembled Henry.

"The face of the dead man was greatly distorted, but I thought it was my husband's. The resemblance was certainly remarkable. The clothes were not his. They were rougher than any I had ever seen him wear. I fancied them a disguise.

"I happened to raise my eyes. A man was approaching the slab. It was Horace Owen. I had thought him dead, but he had been living in Liverpool, and had read the account of the finding of the body, and had seen the newspaper picture which had been so like my husband.

"I made a secret sign to him to be silent. He, too, believed the body to be Henry's, but he held his peace at my command.

"We left the mortuary separately, but met not far away. There I unfolded to him the plan which had leapt into my mind the instant that I saw his face.

"It involved both love and money. If Henry's death became known, I should, by the terms of his uncle's will, have only a small portion of his estate. If Horace personated Henry, we could keep all.

"It was easily done. We came to this new house, and all went well. The body that had been found in the river was buried in a pauper's grave.

"I had no suspicion that my husband was alive until he appeared at this house the day before yesterday. You can imagine how dreadful was our meeting. Yet he was generous. He said that he would go away and never trouble me. But his resolution failed, and a desire both to end his wretched life and to be revenged conquered him.

"Try to think what I have suffered since that night!"

Harrison was doubtful for a moment as to what course he should pursue. The woman's agony moved his pity, yet there was no real choice. The story must be told; for there was a fortune to be distributed to the rightful persons, to say nothing of the moral aspects of the case.

The detective secured the release of Horace Owen, and the couple vanished from those parts.

Their remarkable story did, indeed, involve some strange coincidences. The similarity of penmanship discovered by Breen, was, however, not to be included among the doings of chance, for naturally it had been Horace's first task to acquire his brother's style of handwriting.

The matter of the two hats was more in the line of chance, yet the firms of the clothiers and hatters were among the best known in the city; their advertisements were in every paper; and it was not wonderful that a man just home from a far country should buy new attire. He must have written his name in the hat as the result of an old habit. It will be remembered that at that time he had no premonition of the fate that awaited him.

J. Johnson.

Exercise for Health.

Its Science and Practice.

By H. H. HULBERT, L.R.C.P. & M.R.C.S., & LUIS J. PHELAN.

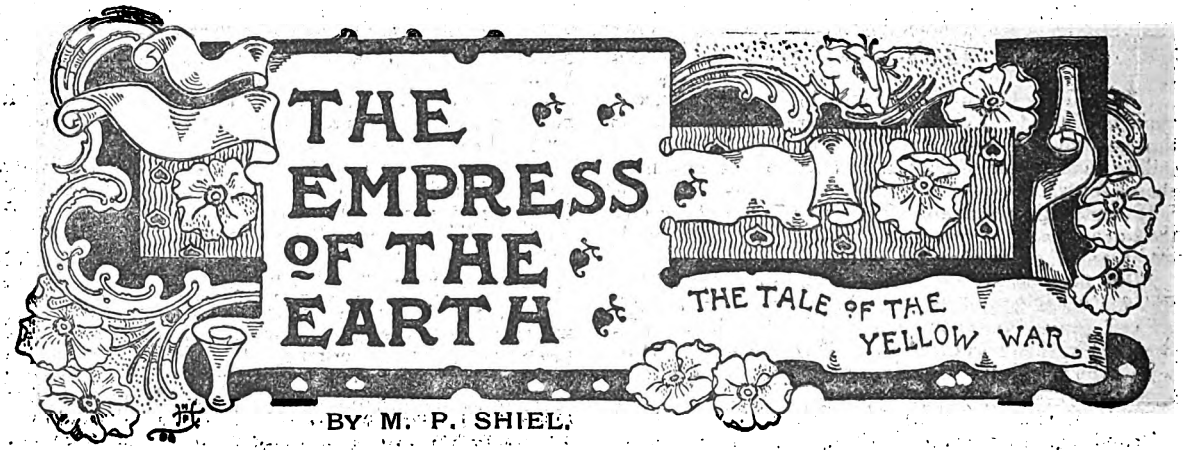
Price 3s. 6d. net. Post Free, 3s. 10d.

This book has been written for the express purpose of teaching men and women of to-day how to bring their bodies into a perfect condition of health. It is crammed full of information, and embellished with anatomical charts and beautiful photographic reproductions. It instructs not only the Athlete, but also the hard-worked City man, as to the best methods of keeping "fit and well."

No man or woman who has any regard for his or her own physique should neglect to buy it. It is the only really perfec book of its kind.

(C. Arthur Pearson Limited.)

Digitized by Google



BY M. P. SHIEL.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE YELLOW TERROR.

THE 500 "Chinese", who had come to Petersburg "seeming poor," and who were to be "sent back to their own country," were not Chinese at all, but Japanese; and before they could be "sent back" they had mysteriously scattered, and disappeared in the general mass of Europeans. They were intended to report to Yen How when the moment had come for him, personally, to move forward towards Europe.

The Jehu of that wild four-horse chariot still sat far back in his seat, the reins taut in his hands. The four-fold van of his army was upon Europe, while its rear was still upon Pekin. It stretched across the world.

Between those two mighty masses of mountains which, like the ramparts of the New Jerusalem, have locked in the Celestial Empire from contact, or knowledge, or suspicion, of the vague world beyond, they came. The Dead-Sea-lake after old ages, was a-move, a-flow. Through that mysterious land, which the race-venom of the Mongol race has made a third unknown Pole in the midst of the earth, crawled the weird procession, the unbounded caravan. The wild elephant, and the mild-eyed zebu saw them with wonder, and the summer monsoon went gadding with the marvellous tidings toward the plain, and over the sea to Africa, gossiping that there above, on the high flat land, was a New Thing moving under the sun. The sources of the Me-Kong, the Saluen, and the Irrawady, which only the eye of the couchant tigress, and of the yellow man, have seen, beheld their week-long passage, and heard the creak of the cart, and the cry of the camel, and the muling of a child at the breast.

They heard also the sudden scream with which the Chinese laughed.

Never was so sloven and pell-mell an army; never so straggling, and lumbering, and clumsy an array; but never a power more eager, and more certain, to reach its goal.

The Friant Division of the French Army, going from Presburgh to Austerlitz, once marched forty-five miles a day for two consecutive days. But never a day which did not see this far-spread host seventeen leagues further towards its aim. They could not be called infantry, though millions, during great part of the way, went on foot; for the armoured carts which Yen How had provisioned, the presence of which spread out the host from continent to continent, were the chief means of locomotion, and continually changed their occupants. There was, moreover, no care for life; if a man was ill, if he dropped out of the march like a bird from the flight, he was left to perish, or to return.

The length of all the units of a single army corps in column of route was so unlike anything with which we are familiar, that the figures are incapable of conveying any real idea of its vastness. If the corps could have marched on a single road, its length would have been 1,200 miles, that is to say, the length of three Englands; and the entire corps would have taken eleven days to pass a given point.

This inconceivable worm of humanity contained among its two millions of individuals women incapable of walking a thousand yards, children born since the march began, old men, boys and girls of ten.

Each of these pilgrimaging masses of men was in itself a nation, such as those of which Cæsar writes, only probably far vaster. Its members came, nearly all, from the same province, spoke the same dialect, had been impelled forward by the same set of influences, and been drilled by the same captains. Only its officers were, in the main, Japanese; and into the rank and file of each corps had also been drafted a hundred thousand Japanese, all men.

At the time when the five hundred scattered at Petersburgh, and Yen How, immediately afterwards, received from them through Vladivostok and Nagasaki the news that all Europe was ready to receive him—there were already of these nomad nations a hundred-and-forty on the march.

Some of these hosts (particularly those that passed by the depression of the Jungarie Mountains, along the source of the Irtush, where the central plateau of Asia finds its western gate) had need to traverse tracts of desert country, bare of flocks and cattle, bare even of forage for mule and camel. No widespread difficulty, however, as to food and forage was felt even by these. Whole districts of China had been left bare, as though eaten up by human locusts, by the successive corps which, as it were, bore the country away with them.

Already, on the march, the soldiers of Yen How—men who had lived upon skeleton scarcity from birth, at the rate of some fraction of a penny per week—began to taste the luxuries of life. Not merely dried vegetables, rice, salt, and tea he saw squandered round him, but sausages, preserved meats, fresh meats. The administrative convoys and regimental trains, intended for the distribution of supplies to the troops, covered many a mile; the administrative convoys being in four echelons, two half a day's march in the rear of the regimental trains, and the other two intended to bring up possible additional supplies from the rear. Auxiliary convoys, also in four echelons, and containing many hundreds of vehicles, took up deposits of rice, biscuits and hay, made long before the commencement of operations, at cantonments which extended to the furthest bounds of Chinese and Thibetan territory. They also carried supplies of preserved meats and forage, and followed the army corps at a distance of two days' march.

Digitized by Google

Each individual of an army corps, besides, was compelled to carry seven pounds of food in some utensil corresponding to a mess-tin or haversack; this to form a reserve not to be touched, except when every other means of supply failed.

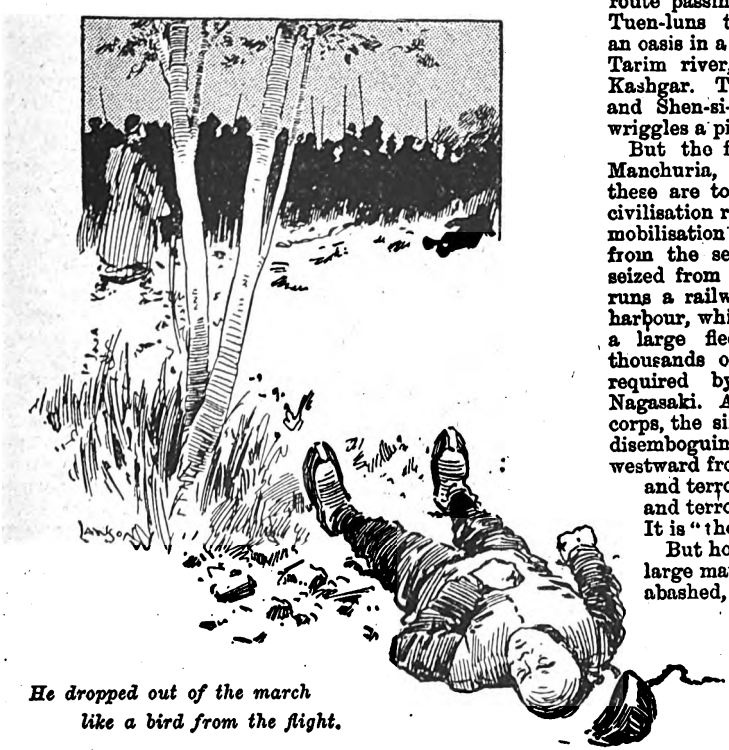
During the process of mobilisation, each division of infantry, and each army corps headquarters, had already vast collections of requisitioned herds of animals, from dogs to camels, sufficient for two days' meat, but intended, by the help of other provisions, to last for weeks. On the march, the cattle marched between the advanced column and the main body of the column.

It was singular with what smoothness the immeasurable machine slid into motion; there was no confusion; western army corps marched first, and then the next in order took up the minuet of nomadism, converging and diverging in rhythmic involution and evolution, like the harmonious currents of a stream, as China began to flow in earnest. In the week, on the day, at the hour that Yen How designed, they moved, they passed away.

Through all that breadth of Thibet between the Himalayas and the Kuen-luns, on a level equal to the height of Mount Blanc, they came pouring and blundering ponderously, fifty army corps of them, some almost abreast, separated only by short intervals of twenty or thirty miles, a hundred millions of them, and behind each man a pigtail wriggling in haste.

Toward what do they press? What vague blessedness? They do not know. They do not ask. When the Pied Piper played his tune, all the rats of all the cities went gaily in haste after him, entranced; they, too, with wriggling tail, and whiskers cocked, and vaguest prospect. Yen How is the Piper of these prone, purblind, forward-shouldering multitudes of nations—he himself a dancer to Another piping.

Then, again, along the sources of the Irtush they poured, and, one night, all round the inhospitable steppe-like slopes which surround the lower level of Lake Balkash, there camped another fifty army corps, some within sight of others, making by far the largest collection of human beings covering a similar area which the stars had yet seen. And the next morning, and during all that day and the next, army corps after army corps, they moved, they passed away.



He dropped out of the march like a bird from the flight.

The first (Thibetan) fifty are southern and western tribesmen, used to hard industry, short of stature, their skin a clear yellow, almost of lemon. They are from furthest Taiwan, from Fo-kien to Yun-nan, and from Kwang-tung to Ho-nan; and they pass between the sources of the Yang-tse-kiang and the Mekong, and between the Hwang-ho and the source of the Kia-ling, climbing to the flat roof of the world through colossal forests bordering on eternal snows, where glaciers and masses of angry water tear and pierce the mountains, forming natural routes through the impassable. By the time they reach the high tableland of many rains and rushing rivers and abounding lakes, they find silent villages and deserted groves of the mulberry. The Thibetans have already passed away. And on through the stripped and empty land they go, shouldering and trundling—a hundred millions—and behind each man wriggles a pigtail in haste.

Then, by the caravan-route which passes from Pekin through the Gobi desert north of the Southern Altais, pass the second (Balkash) fifty. They are Kobdoans, North-western Mongolians (so-called), and tribesmen of the Chinese provinces north of the Hwang-ho (except those of Kan-see, Shen-si, and Pechili); men of a duskier yellow, as of weak-tea-and-milk, tall, and nomads already by instinct and habit, not averse to a further house-flitting—in plenty of company! And these pass the sources of the Irtish to Balkash, and thence go swarming down into the lowlands and desert places round the Aral Sea, where Russia had so sweated and striven in vain. Across the Caspian they will follow, at the right hour, the pioneering (Thibetan) fifty.

Then there are ten corps (the smallest of the four great branches), which, one by one, take the caravan-route passing from Pekin north of the bleak and bare Tuen-luns through all that rich agricultural region—an oasis in a land of barrenness—which is traversed by the Tarim river, beginning at Lob Nov, and ending beyond Kashgar. They are from the teeming provinces of Kan-su and Shen-si—twenty millions—and behind each man wriggles a pigtail in haste.

But the fourth main branch—Pe-chi-li, Korea, Kirim, Manchuria, Eastern Mongolia—tarry long behind; for these are to travel swiftly, and in luxury—in Western-civilisation railway-trains! Not till the last moment before mobilisation is the Russian garrison at Vladivostok shelled from the sea by Japanese ships, and Vladivostok itself seized from land by Chinese soldiers. From Vladivostok runs a railway to Petersburgh; and outside Vladivostok harbour, while the shelling of the forts is proceeding, waits a large fleet of merchant-ships crowded with many thousands of large-grade railway-carriages, such as are required by the Russian lines, manufactured all at Nagasaki. And so to Vladivostok come the thirty Western corps, the sixty millions, the fourth great torrent of that disemboguing Nile. And as the crowded train moves out westward from the station, a shocking shrill scream of glee and terror from two thousand throats—the shrill glee and terror of a child in its first swing—fills all the air. It is "the Chinese scream."

But how great a general is the little doctor! This large matter of his, which would have bewildered, and abashed, and appalled the genius of Cæsar or Napoleon, is all clearly perceived and calculated in his intellect of ice. When he thinks of the world-magnitude of it all, he says "Poh!" To God the world is a grain of dust; to Yen How it is a geographical globe: he metes it with a compass; in a moment he walks about it. With what ease and thoroughness has his first thought—that thought which could have occurred only to genius—been realised! By a few scratches of his pen, Europe had been prepared to receive him. "There will be no more Maxims there," he had said to Count Ito with screwed-up eyes; and there are no more Maxims there, or none worth mentioning. To lead one's troops "along the line of least resistance"—that being the first maxim of the general, how great a general is Yen in first of all creating a line of no resistance along which to lead!

Digitized by Google

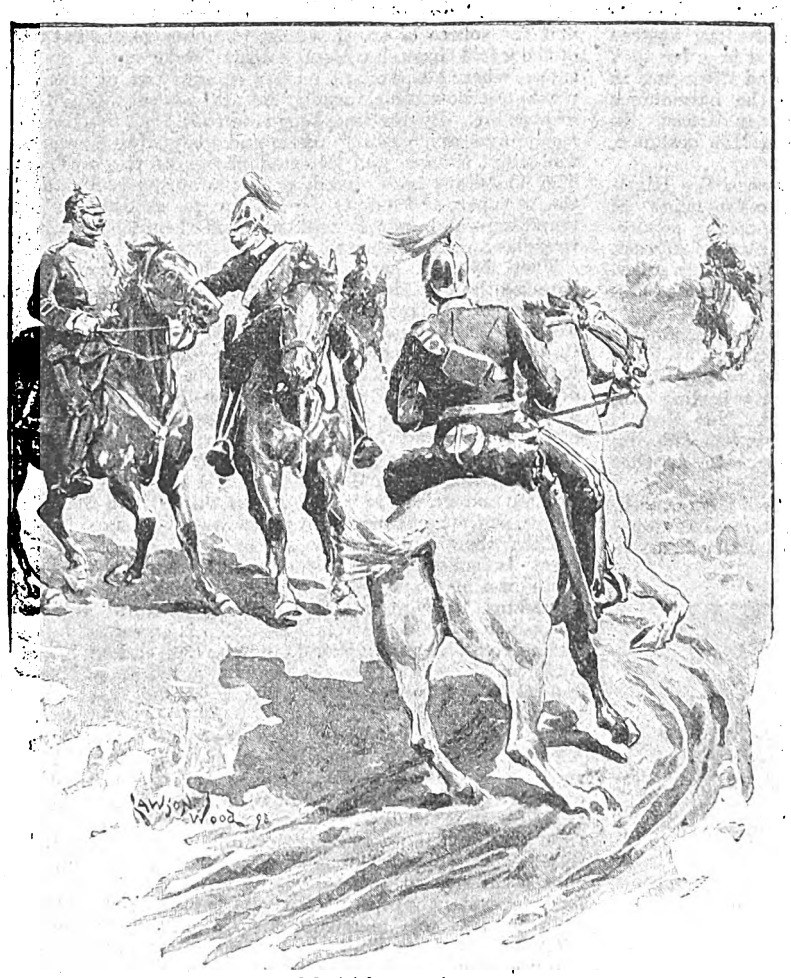
But to guide that restive, rearing four-horse chariot even over the levelest plain, how iron-strong must be the wrist of its Jehu, and how sublime his gallant callousness!



Surprised by a troop of British mounted vedettes and taken prisoner.

This was his general plan: to connect himself telegraphically with his armies, and personally to direct their actions even in the minutest particulars. For the peculiarity of these monstrous hosts was this: that by means of their unimaginable numbers they could, almost without effort, carry out works in a day which no other army could dream of ever accomplishing at all. Thus, the fifty Thibetan corps crossed the Caspian from Krasnovodsk to Baku, with its carts, transport, and stores, on huge towed rafts constructed within two days from materials which they carried with them. So also, wherever the first three great branches passed, they were followed by as many lines of telegraph as there were corps, just as a spider is followed by the thread it spins. And in the centre of this web sat Yen How at Pekin.

Such was his general plan. His particular plan was this: that the first line of Europe's defence should be Germany; for with exact foresight he calculated, some months before the battle in the Channel, that, in almost any case, Germany would still have left some of her army corps. Russia he meant to take by surprise; the Balkan Peninsula by surprise; and both, he calculated, would be incapable of serious opposition.

Into Russia he would pour the sixty millions who went screaming along the Vladivostok railway; into the Balkan Peninsula sixteen millions of the first (Thibetan) hundred millions. The remaining eighty-four millions of these were to be German, Swiss, and Austrian. The two other branches, numbering altogether a hundred and twenty millions, were to be divided into thirty French, twenty Italian, ten Norwegian and Swedish; and because Holland and Belgium had not been directly ravaged by the war, and Spain only by the American war, he designed for Spain the large number of thirty millions, and for Holland, Belgium, and Denmark thirty millions.

And at Pekin Yen How might have remained, and directed all this with absolute exactness and success, were it not that, at the back of the man's brain, there lay this singular thought: that none of the women of England must be killed!—till he gave the word. And he knew well that no earthly power save his own strong, present, personal grip could restrain his wild hordes, fresh from the gleeful slaughter of Europe, from washing their hands in the blood of every human female in Britain.

Therefore he took train at Vladivostok.

The difference between him and Hardy was chiefly this: that with the race-instinct, and race-hatred, and race-ambition of the Chinaman was mixed a personal, private motive, stronger even than the race-motive. Hardy, like the very greatest, was concerned only for his country and for the world.

It is written in the Book of the Law of the Universe that selfishness shall, sooner or later, be a source of weakness. Whoever denies this has not gone deep.

The difference between Hardy and Yen How was the difference being Wellington and Napoleon. The latter, being more richly endowed, should have been the stronger—and was not.

At the time when Yen How took train, there was no longer any country corresponding to what was meant when one said "Russia."

As soon as the first contingent of the first army corps passed through the Urals north of Mount Iremel, its first care was to destroy all telegraphic communication between the locality and western centres. Up to this moment not even a suspicion of what was coming had occurred to anyone on the Continent, for it was not till the day after the first arrival of Chinese, that the two British forces in France and Germany received homeward orders.

On the very day of their arrival, the final battle had been fought in France near Bar-sur-Seine with a French loss of eighteen thousand; and on the same day, the Emperor

Digitized by Google

Wilhelm, rashly advancing with his staff and a small reconnoitring party too near the British lines at Landsberg, was suddenly surprised by a troop of British mounted vedettes, and taken prisoner.

But when, on the next day, Lord Roberts invited General Daubisson to a conference, and Sir Evelyn Wood invited the freely-liberated Kaiser, the announcements by the two British generals of their intention of immediate withdrawal, and of its cause, was received with mere amazed incredulity. The blow of the thunderbolt was stupifying. The Continental leaders did not fall to their knees and beseech the presence and aid of their British invaders; there are tidings too large to find for themselves room in the brain.

But even while the two conferences were proceeding, what was to become known as the "Yellow Terror" was already abroad—and fifty thousand Chinese had settled in fifteen or twenty Ural villages, whose streets were strewn with dead.

And almost as fast as the news could spread westward, the Chinese spread westward also.

It was the strangest army of occupation. As soon as an army corps entered upon Russian territory it scattered and vanished; it split up into divisions, and one division went one way and one another; and divisions split up into brigades, and one brigade went one way and one another; and so the sub-division went on, every regiment, every company, having its town or village allotted to it by long-previous design. By the time the first contingents of the second corps had crossed the Volga at Syzran, there were probably not a thousand Russians left alive anywhere between Perm and Astrakhan.

There was no fighting. Those that could fly or hide, fled or hid. The rest heard "the Chinese scream," and died. For every one that died two screams went to Heaven; the scream of the victim and the scream of his slayer.

Then spread "the Yellow Terror"; at first slowly, then with the wings of the lightning.

In old Saxon times mothers frightened their crying babes with the swiftly whispered words: "The Danes are coming!" So say, or used to say, the history books. But the panic-horror with which Europe in a few days learnt to receive the simple announcement: "The Chinese are coming!" had no sort of resemblance, in its unutterable awesomeness, in its supernatural affright, to any previous terror experienced by men.

The Black Death of the middle ages, which nearly altogether emptied Europe, inspired no doubt an equally agic suggestion, but it probably failed in something of that staring, pallid, dry-throated panic characteristic of the Yellow Terror, chiefly on account of the element of the unknown and wholly novel in the Chinese cataclysm, on account, also, of the certainty of his doom which pierced the heart of each European, and on account, thirdly, of certain hints of unutterable horror which accompanied the rumours of the onward sweep of the yellow wave.

The reign of hell on earth which had followed upon some Japanese victories during the Chino-Japanese war was well known in Europe. If China had fared so at the hand of Japan, how would Europe fare at the hand of China led by Japan . . . ?

Lamentation and a voice in Ramah, and a widening, running shriek, swelling into a cry of such volume and intensity as had never yet risen from earth to the throne of Heaven, marked the middle of the month of August in Europe.

Then came to pass, even to the utmost, that vision in the Apocalypse of the poet: "Woe, woe, to the inhabitants of the earth . . . "

Among the millions that rushed westward in plague-striken panic and frenzied selfishness was the famous duellist Edrapol, who happened to be then at Crackow.

He made straight for Paris; and on arriving at the hotel in the avenue Wagram where he always stayed, he found awaiting him this letter:

SIR,—As I promised you, I am writing to seek you out for the purpose of the little duel to which you challenged me, the European war being now at an end. I confess to you that this duel of yours and mine seems to me a very absurd thing; but still, a bargain is a bargain. I am in a low state of health at present, and quite unable to come to you, even if I knew where you are to be found. But I write instead, so as to be able to say I did not altogether break my word, and am getting the letter to you at considerable personal trouble. I hope you will receive it, and send me, when you can, a reply.

I am, sir,
Your servant,
JOHN HARDY.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE WEAK POINT.

DURING the first part of that memorable Week of accountable, yet strange Night, when the darkened sun and the quaking crust of the earth seemed to the affrighted imagination of men surely to portend the coming of the great and dreadful day of the wrath of God, John Hardy's agents were hot on the trail of the young woman whom he sought.

The scream of the victim and the scream of his slayer.

Three weeks previous to the week of darkness, the old butler had brought him a list of the men left in hospital of the Duke of Cambridge's Own regiment, and as Hardy's eye ran down the list, he saw a name which he had heard, which was on the tip of his memory, yet which he had been unable to remember. His eye lit up at the sight of it. It was the name of the soldier John Brabant.

There was nothing miraculous in the fact that Brabant still lived; yet to Hardy it seemed nothing less than a genuine miracle. Faith in the Divine formed the groundwork and rock-bed of his simple nature; and his eye continually searched for, and assumed the stealthy, busy Finger.

A day after receiving the list he was able to leave his bed, and at once he hurried, muffled up in wrappers in a close carriage, to the Chelsea Hospital, and the bed-side of Brabant.

Brabant, as it happened, was slowly dying from exhaustion as the result of an amputation, and did, in fact, die a few days later. He was, however, in his senses, and able to give to Hardy the address of the villa at which the girl Seward had been, or was still (for he was not sure), a servant.

Digitized by Google

To Hardy, the one thing of paramount interest in the world seemed to be to have this girl, whose initials he bore branded on his breast, secure in his own keeping. He had the instinct to lock her away in some Castle of absolute safety, and feed her every hour with his own hands, lest chance or change should befall her.

That, at a time when the earth was travailing in death-throes and birth-throes, all should depend, one way or the other, upon a London servant-girl, was not, in reality, unlike the way of Life. Things happen—not "with vigour and rigour," as Mr. Matthew Arnold very well says, but in that fast-and-loose fashion. When Fate is not freakish, she is unlike herself. The unprecedented is the natural, and may be counted upon. Destiny is full of novelties.

That a nerve in this particular girl should set a nerve in Yen How a-tingling, and that Yen How's tingling, spreading out beyond all limit into transcendental rapture, should infect a whole planet with tingling,—this was nothing more than the launching of a battle-ship by the pressure of an electric button, or the loosening of an avalanche by the rolling of a pebble. In such surprises both Fate and Nature abound.

But Ada Seward was no longer at the Pattison villa; all the information which could be gathered there was the fact that she had a brother, a bicycle-smith, residing in Church Road, Chelsea, to whom she may have gone after suddenly leaving the Pattisons. But the brother declared that she was not there; and either he could not, or would not, give any further details about Ada to the agents employed by Hardy.

It became clear that about the girl and her movements hung some sort of mystery; that something was being concealed with regard to her.

Hardy commenced to seek her throughout England, advertising in every paper, and setting to work the best detectives.

If she were abroad? If she were dead? And if Yen How knew it—had secret means of knowing it? In that case Hardy had no hope.

He remained in a state of brooding, morbid pensiveness. At night he sat long at table after dinner, drinking much too freely, his right hand on the mouth of the decanter, his left hanging heavy, his head sunk. In this way three weeks passed; and still the girl remained hidden.

Then came the memorable Week of Darkness.

At this time the wild flood of migration from the Continent was in full sweep. England had risen nobly to Hardy's summons to offer herself as the City of Refuge to the ill-fated peoples of Europe, and had opened to them her large and pitying bosom, as a mother folds her terrified child.

The merchant marines of all the still unswamped nations, with the whole available merchant marine of Britain, were engaged in the continual task of deportation.

But like "the pious pelican" which feeds her young with the blood of her own torn breast, England fed the stranger with her own life.

The famine grew sore in the land, even though the self-governing colonies, at the first warning of the facts, set stoutly to work to meet the demands upon their feeding powers.

In Britain itself, quite suddenly, there sprang into being the visible germs of a real Socialism. The necessities of the human race no longer admitted of quibbling and compromise with the root facts of life and the root laws of God. It had been the custom before the war to say, in a phrase so generally accepted that it had passed into an axiom, that England "could not feed herself." The wild fancifulness of this assertion (which might bring a smile to the lips of even a child who seriously thinks of it) may be seen from the arithmetical fact that England (or any other ordinary piece of land of similar size) can feed, not only herself, but almost the entire population of the globe—under right and natural conditions of life. For if a man, or a child, unhampered by artificial customs, will set to work with a spade and a hoe upon the ground, it is a fact that a very small piece of fertile land—something like the tenth of an acre—will supply him not only with food to keep him continually munching, but with so much more than he can eat himself, that he shall have enough left over to give in exchange to someone else who has spent his time in making boots and clothes, and wishes to sell these in exchange for the surplus corn or carrots grown by the first man. Now, on the broad bosom of Britain, which is not niggardly, but rich in alimentary bounty, there are 790,000,000 of such pieces of land; and 790,000,000 is much the larger portion of the population of the earth.

England, therefore, if she be properly governed, can quite surely feed not only herself, but the rest of mankind as well.

This had been the "open secret" of social life, preached through many a century by the single-eyed great ones—with their simple and discerning wit! But it needed nothing less than the inexorable compulsion of Destiny to teach it clearly, once and for all, to the whole race.

Meantime, in the absence of regulations, which involve time for their accomplishment, the rich men and the not-poor men of Britain came nobly forward with proffered purse to the perishing millions.

But from the West, from across the Atlantic, there came to Britain a shock almost as horrifying as the vague rumours of the reign of Terror then going forward eastward on the Continent.

America, crowded with ten thousand Christian churches, refused to receive the fugitives from Europe.

This shocking inhumanity had for its excuse an objection to be swamped by "a pauper immigration."

England, now the one great Mother of the world, pondered this thing in her heart—and never forgave it.

John Hardy's proposal of a League between Britain and the United States had ended in a fiasco. An attempt had at once been made by the British Government to carry the proposal into effect. America had accepted the idea; but as soon as it came to a question of detail, of the making of sacrifices, Mammon, "the least erect" of all the spirits, drew back into selfish aloofness.

Meanwhile, the only possible defensive measure against the Yellow Wave on the part of England was an intense activity at Chiswick, at Jarrow, at Chatham, at Birkenhead, at Sheerness, at Portsmouth, at Paisley, at Glasgow, at Newcastle, at Pembroke, at Sunderland, in every government, in every private dock ard. Thousands of men were requisitioned from remotely allied trades to aid in the agonised work of building, building, building. But Hardy, for one, smiled at the idea that Yen How was going to be simple enough to allow Britain time to build ships to beat him.

He, for his part, had set going another activity, equally eager, and more to the point.

By direct suggestion to the First Lord of the Admiralty, he had singled out the men of the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers as the nucleus of force which must now become the hope of Britain.

Though there was hardly any longer a Royal Naval body of men, there still remained a Royal Naval Reserve in considerable numbers; when therefore Hardy designated the Artillery Volunteers, Mr. Goschen, who alone was in the secret of his plans, expressed surprise.

Hardy, however, persisted; and the next day, by proclamation, the members of the force were requisitioned for service. At the same time a large additional number of volunteers sent in their names to the commanding officers of the stationary drill-ships.

The members of this force, which had always, since its formation by special Act in 1873, formed one of the most exclusive clubs in the world, consisted only of professional and business men, doctors, bank-clerks, solicitors, stock-brokers, authors, who had regularly left the desk, or the consulting-room, or the office, to attend at least twice a month at gun, rifle, pistol and cutlass drill, until they attained the standard of "efficients," men who had cast off the orchided frock coat, completely sinking their social position, to put on the blue working-dress of the simple blue-jacket on the yearly cruises in the gun-boat, or the Saturday-to-Monday cruise in the seamanship-practice schooner. These men, belonging exclusively to the great middle class, represented the very essence of the mood of England. And it was with them alone that Hardy proposed to set up the first, and perhaps the last, dam to the flowing Yellow Wave.

Digitized by Google

He wanted 4,000 of them; and he got them.

The various drill-ships of the local brigades were assembled at Portsmouth with tenders, and the work of drilling and instruction went forward with unremitting zeal, the 4,000 and odd gentlemen who composed this strange force subjecting themselves to the most grinding discipline, sleeping in hammocks, swabbing decks, cooking food, and cleaning guns; opening, above all, their already trained minds to the art of fighting on moving water.

But when they asked one another why they were doing all this, there was no forthcoming answer. There certainly were the men, but where were the ships?

Hardy, in his jealousy lest his ships might be used for purposes at all other than those for which he purposed them, had kept his secret well. They were to him like buried gold to the miser. He gloated inwardly over the thought of them, over the loud language he would make them talk when that great hour came.

Meantime, he sat brooding often, sometimes desperately ill, sometimes with his hand resting for hours on the mouth of the decanter, his sunken head crowded with the busy fumes of wine.

He hurried . . . to the bedside of Brabant.

And as he sat so one night—it was the Tuesday of the Week of Darkness—something spurred within him, and he sprang to his feet, and took his cap, and went out into the stifling dark air.

His once gentle heart, though embittered and desperate, was not wholly dead. Under this sudden impulse, wine-inspired, he jumped into a cab and drove to Park Lane.

He stopped at the door of Miss Jay. He had now been several weeks in England, yet had not seen her. Why he now went he did not ask himself: some vague motive worked in him to insult, or press, or smite her in the face,—such was the tragic desperation of his empty and callous heart.

Love, tenderness, were far from him now; yet in the depths of his nature some ungovernable cry in the dark, some fierce yearning perhaps, spurred him toward the sister of his soul: such subterranean throes occur in the dim places of the hearts of men.

Her carriage drove up to the door as he entered it, and he found her in evening dress in the drawing-room, cutting the leaves of a book. War, and eclipse, and the overthrow of the world, seemed to leave untouched the reposeful tenor of this very-modern young lady's life.

Here was the "morgue britannique" in its very ultimate demonstration.

"You are well again, then, Mr. Hardy?" she said, giving him her hand, "I am so glad!"

"Well or not, I am come to see you, you see."

He threw his cap one way and himself another, and looked gloomily at her.

She, for her part, was shocked—at his aged eyes, his wild aspect, the quite visible grey in his hair. Now, at least she recognised a man, and a master of men.

For minutes of inward reflection there was silence between them. He said:

"I told you I would come again, and come I am."

Her heart bounded. She answered: "Yes."

"Have you got over all that about Art?" This he asked with a momentary gentle smile.

"No—not got over it"—the irony in her leaping up, and smothering the pity: "not yet. A weakness of that sort clings so to one. In the absence of a sun, one works by lamp-light—which is all that remains."

"Well, I see you are still a mocker. But one cannot always go on mocking."

"No, no. I do not mean, really, to mock at anything. In reality, I am very sorry, and sad, at everything."

"Is that so?"

"Yes."

"Well, I believe that, too. At bottom you are good and kind."

"I hope so."

"That was why I came to see you now. Heaven only knows why I came. You ought to have married me when I told you."

"Oh, as to that—" she said.

"No, no, do not begin that again!" he retorted fretfully. "Can't you guess that I am changed in mood, and everything? All that is not for me any more."

Digitized by Google

Somehow her heart sank; and the sadness of autumnal winds sighing among dead leaves smote its chords. So wild a pity is in the world, and so bitter a sob.

She said:

"I can see that you are changed, yes; and I divine that you are far from happy. What has been the matter?"

"Why should I tell you?"

"There is no reason in the world, Mr. Hardy."

"You see, that is the way you talk to me!" he said, regarding her fixedly under his eyes: "soon, when I am gone, you will be saying to yourself, 'Well, it was bitter of me not to love and comfort poor John Hardy in his misery.'"

"Gone?" she questioned,—"gone where to?"

"Gone to God"—and in a lower tone—"gone to Hell."

And now she rose, and in haste went to sit beside him. And the pity of ministering angels was in her voice.

A private detective was ushered into his presence.

"Tell me," she said, "for you have come to me feeling that I am your good friend, and you should tell me."

"Ah, it is nothing," he said, and he flung himself backwards on the sofa where he sat.

"It must be very much, since it has affected you so. I heard something . . . . but did not quite realise it. You should—you should have come before."

"Come for what? I tell you it is no good at all any more!"

"But you are too—too despondent. See—you say you want my love and comfort—there is my hand in yours, my friend. If you do not tell me your trouble, that will mean to me that you do not—really—care for me."

"Ah, I did, though! I did!"

"And do—or you would not come. Can't you see that? You do still. So you must open your heart to your friend."

He looked into her eyes, and they swam in tears. His head lying back on the sofa-back rolled from side to side.

"You are a good, kind girl," he said, "and I knew that long ago. I had a kind of power to guess everything that was in you. Why did you not—but it is useless talking now. Let me go away."

"No, no—do not say that."

"Well, now, I call you wondrously good."

"Of course I am—of course. Can't you divine? I—naturally—do not wish you to go. You look so sad—so worn with suffering. Why is that? How is it? Ah! I am so—I could not tell you. But you—tell me, for I beg you, all your trouble."

"Well, well. . . . But to what end?"

"Because I ask you: and because I feel that it will do you good to tell me."

She ought to have said "because it will redeem you, and save you to tell me"; for that was the truth.

And, indeed, an impulse did then rise in John Hardy to tell to her at least that history which he was hoarding and hugging venomously in his breast, which he had breathed to no living soul, save in one short sentence to old Bobbie Mason; the history of those long tortures—how the scream of a cat had been rent from his twisting and beastialised soul—how he had cursed the deaf ears of Heaven—how, now, his poor nerves, tingling in a chaos of jangling dissonance, like the wires of some shattered instrument of music, represented all the universe to him as a mere black nightmare crowded with sighing winds and unutterable, dismal shapes of woe—how, above all, his passion for vengeance had settled within him into the cruel and wicked malice of a fiend.

He had the impulse to tell it all out, and save his soul. And he said:

"Well—I will tell you—if your ears can bear it. You know, do you not, that I went to China—but no, no, no! I am not a child, Miss Jay! do let me get away—!"

And suddenly, he had snatched his hand from hers, had sprung up, and was gone almost before the cry had leapt from her lips.

And she, for a long time, sat staring vacantly at the floor, and did not go out that evening.

During that (Tuesday) night, the Japanese fleet, just arrived in Europe, appeared in twos and threes along the south-east coast. On Wednesday morning, England heard the news that Hastings, Brighton, Worthing, and so on all along to Bognor, had been reduced to heaps of broken stone, some seven hundred people having been killed.

That was on the Tuesday. On the Wednesday evening Hardy received a small wooden box, bearing the direction: "John Hardy, England." It bore no stamps, and had evidently been brought from its origin "by hand."

On opening it, he found a quantity of paper stuffing; and, this being removed, a dry and shrivelled, but still evil-smelling object, upon which had been stuck a small oblong piece of paper. On the paper were three lines of tiny, neat writing; and the words written were these:

"From Yen How to John Hardy.

"Heart of His Royal Highness Prince Heinrich of Hesse."

Prince Heinrich of Hesse, as Hardy knew, was a young child of eight.

Even while Hardy sat contemplating this object, a private detective was ushered into his presence. He came to say that, at last, by means of a confession of her brother, he had been able to trace the whereabouts of the girl Seaward.

(To be continued.)

U.S.A. v. SPAIN.

For the first time in the history of British journalism a serial story of a war is running concurrently with the actual fighting.

This story is entitled

"Contraband of War,"

and has just started in Pearson's Weekly.

Get a copy at once; you will not regret it. A concise summary will enable you to start right away.

Pearson's Weekly is published every Saturday, and costs one penny.

Digitized by Google

GREAT - WAR - COMPETITION.

FIRST PRIZE . . £5 | 25 Prizes of Handsome Books.
Five Prizes of £1 each. | 25 Gold-plated Pencil-cases.

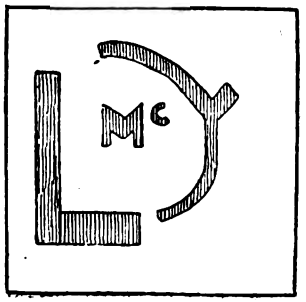
In the event of a tie, the prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

TOO much interest is at the present moment centred in that part of the world round the unfortunate Island of Cuba, that the competition we have inaugurated, and which started last week, should commend itself particularly to readers of Short Stories.

Below will be found eight pictures. Each one depicts the name of some place, or ship, or man associated with the combatants. Five sets of these pictures will be published. Write down the names in the spaces provided, and keep all the sets by you until we ask you to send them in.

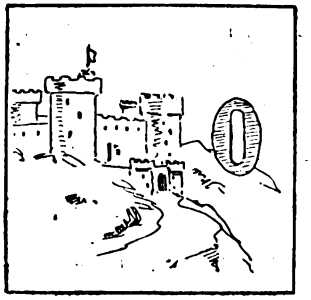
The daily newspapers will give you the best help in discovering solutions, as most of the names depicted have already appeared in the press.

PERSON.



No. 9.....

WARSHIP.



No 10.....

PERSON.

No. 11.....

WARSHIP.

No. 12.....

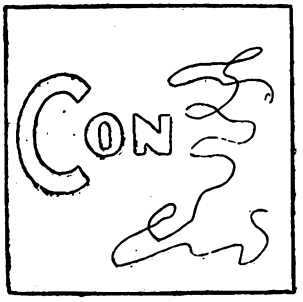
PLACE.

No. 13.....

WARSHIP.

No. 14.....

WARSHIP



No. 15.....

WAR COMPETITION.

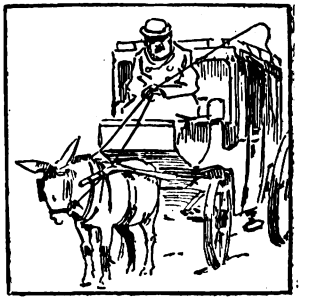
No. 2.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

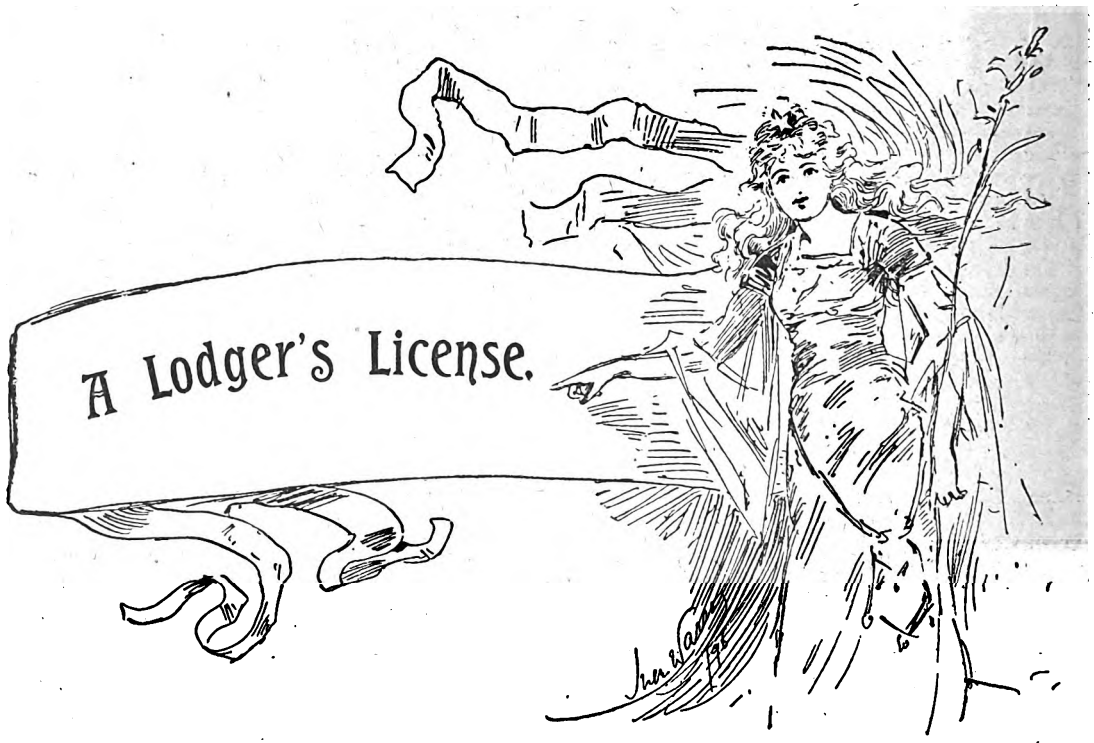
PLACE.



No. 16.....

Digitized by Google

A Lodger's License.



I was disgustingly late. A clock somewhere behind the Museum struck three as I came round the corner of the square. The one wedge of light thrown on the spectre trees was my reproach. It came, undoubtedly, from the third floor window of number thirty-one.

And from the second floor! I noticed this as I reached the steps and laughed softly. So after all I was not the only one. Besides, the other man would have someone waiting up for him. I knew this because he was newly married, had only been married a few weeks.

I felt sorry for the man. I had never seen him, did not even know his name. But to come home at three in the morning and find someone sitting up for you was horrible.

"Poor beggar," I said.

Something made me glance up towards the lighted window on the second floor. The shadow of a woman was thrown distinctly on the blind. It was the shadow, one knew instinctively, of a pretty woman.

Instinctively—yet for my part I was not dependent on instinct. It was possible for me, presumptious, but possible, to fill in the pretty profile with unquestionable precision.

Smoking my pipe at the window I had often watched that tiny figure emerge from the house, enter the square by the rusty iron gate, and pace up and down the prim gravel path waiting for his return. Once I had been indiscreet enough to cough in the hope that she might look up. A flirtation from a fourth floor window might have led to anything.

But a fourth floor window is a long way up. The cough miscarried, solicited an old clothes man, brought him to the door, kept him there arguing with the landlady, insisting that I had called him, wanted to see him, and that he wasn't going away until he had seen me.

By this time I had found the latch.

It was perfectly dark as I closed the door behind me. I never knew before what a long way it was along that hallway, or what a lot of things, perambulators chiefly, I fancy, were used in the furnishing.

I hoped that the other man might not come in until I was safely aloft. In doing so he might bring about a scuffle in the dark before discovering that we had an equal right to the stairs.

The first floor at last! I began to mount circumspectly. I knew nothing of married life, but I thought if she were waiting for him with a water jug.——

In spite of my caution, the door opened as I went by.

"I beg your pardon," I said quickly. "It's——"

The door closed softly but rapidly; I fancied I heard a sigh. I am quite sure I heard one. Perhaps she had had no intention of throwing water-jugs about. Perhaps—I recalled many instances in which a mistake like that had been made in the dark. Pooh!

I made up my mind to get married: began to anathmatise the other man.

"The brute," I said.

I could hear footsteps down below; every now and then the swish of a skirt.

She was pacing up and down, growing anxious. What in the world did the man mean by it—if a man can't come home at decent hours when he is married and to such a pretty woman as——

Certainly she was pretty, and undoubtedly jolly. Girls with crumply hair and blue eyes and big laughing mouths are invariably jolly. Probably wouldn't be hard to entertain. With such a girl as that I could get on famously.

I looked at my watch. It was, in fact, nearly half-past-three, and still that pacing down below continued. It got on my nerves; when a woman gets on my nerves I invariably grow impolite.

"Little fool," I said. "Why doesn't she go to bed?"

Digitized by Google

Perhaps she was frightened that something had happened to that reprobate husband of hers. I had half a mind to call to her over the banisters and tell her not to be ridiculous. It was useless for her to sit up.

And if she would sit up—why, she might just as well come and entertain me.

For my own part I had no inclination to go to bed. I lit a cigarette and waited.

I cannot say what put the idea into my head, but it certainly crossed my mind more than once that it was a pity we could not entertain one another until the missing man chose to return. To conform with the proprieties we might sit on the stairs. I pictured her to myself, however, sitting in the arm-chair opposite. I imagined how she would look with the soft glow of the tall lamp falling on her. With my mind filled with this delicious reverie I was, in fact, already carrying on an imaginary conversation with my visitor.

The door down below opened softly.

I rose from my chair, and crossing over to my own door, opened it. She might just as well know that I was not asleep in case—well it was possible that she might be frightened, might be glad to consult with someone; just talking will help to pass away the time.

Yet I confess that surprise made my breath come a little faster when a moment later I heard her foot on the stairs.

She hesitated half way up, then came on resolutely and knocked at the door.

"May I come in?" she asked.

"Please do," I said.

She was perfectly self-possessed seemingly. And yet somehow I fancied that this appearance was due to extreme embarrassment. She bowed formally; hesitated; threw a half glance over her shoulder.

"I am afraid you'll thing it very strange of me coming up in this unceremonious way," she said, and blushed. She began rushing her words; anxious to say something, suddenly her nerve gave way, she stopped, and blushed.

I hastened to put her at her ease.

"I think it is very kind of you," I said. "Your husband is late, but I am sure there is no need for anxiety. If I can do anything for you——"

"That is just—" Her courage seemed to ooze away again. "My husband has not yet come back. It's most extraordinary. He is always in long before this—and I am dreadfully tired."

"He cannot be much longer," I said. Secretly I hoped he would be. It was not at all unpleasant to act as comforter in his absence.

"You will find that chair very comfortable," I said with a little wave of invitation.

"Oh, but I can't stop," she said. "I only came up ——" She came a step nearer and laughed nervously.

"Have you any sisters?" she asked.

"Lots," I answered encouragingly.

"Then—" She looked at me closely. "Grown-up ones?" she asked sharply.

"No—short frocks and pretty governesses," I said.

I suppose she thought this flippant; her face fell dismally, and she took a pace back. And then the devil got into me.

"I'm sorry," I said, "I would have grown-up ones if I could. I would do anything if I thought it would please you. I—pretty governesses are just the same experience as grown-up sisters," I said.

"You don't understand," she said.

"Then teach me to understand."

She stood with her head a little on one side tantalisingly. "It's so ridiculous," she said.

"Seems ridiculous," I admitted, "but in reality—dead earnest."

"Yes," she said.

I went a little nearer. Events were hurrying.

"You don't think it very strange of me," she said. "You understand?"

"Perfectly—of course," I said. "Under the same circumstances."

"So you appreciate the circumstances——?"

"Perfectly," said I.

I went a little nearer, and as I did so she turned away.

I took her hands into mine from behind. She snatched them away violently—furiously. My lips just touched her hair.

"How dare you!" she cried. Her face flamed, a taut look came into her eyes.

I heard the front door open and shut again.

With a little cry she darted across the room.

That door opening and closing again appeared to have an extraordinary effect upon her. All her composure returned. At the door she even waited to throw me a little mocking courtesy.

"Look here," I said hurriedly.

"Well?"

She stood with one hand on the door handle listening to me and to the footsteps on the stairs.

"You are not angry with me? You——"

"Misunderstood me," she said.

The look in her blue eyes emboldened me.

"Well, what did you want?" I said defiantly.

The footsteps were coming every moment nearer.

"I wanted my bodice unlaced behind, of course," she said, and flaunted out of the room.

I was never more surprised in my life.

MERRIDEN HOWARD.

A Novel Competition.

THE proprietors of Nixey's Black Lead and Cervus Flannelette Bag Blue, offer £5 in prizes for competition on the following conditions:

Eight prizes: £2, £1, two of 10s., and four of 5s., for the best poem or experiences in the use of Nixey's Black Lead and Blue.

There is no entry fee, but each competitor must enclose a wrapper, one of which is supplied with every packet of black lead and bag of blue.

Contributions to be sent in before May 31st, 1898, addressed, Black Lead and Bag Blue Competition, care of W. G. NIXEY, 12 Soho Square, W., and mentioning Short Stories.

Why is your Nose in the Middle of your Face?

IF you can correctly answer this all-absorbing question, together with others that are appearing within the next few weeks in Pearson's Weekly, you stand a very good chance of scooping in £50, which is the first prize offered in a Big Conundrum Competition. Altogether there will be thirty of such conundrums, and £100 will be divided amongst those who answer them most correctly.

WHY IS YOUR NOSE IN THE MIDDLE OF YOUR FACE?

Come now, can't you guess? If not, ask the next friend you meet. Perhaps he or she will be able to help you.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER XXI.

In the Lord Abbot's Cellar.

Travellers who wish to form a correct estimate of the political condition of a country without the trouble of reading the newspapers and making the deductions necessary after such reading, would do well to observe the noses of the statues adorning the public buildings and squares. If the noses are in good condition, then the ship of state is sailing in calm water; but if marks of violence and mutilation are to be seen, it may be safely asserted that the land has passed through troublous times.

On the day following the attack on the Abbey St. Martin, there was comparatively little evidence of the horrible scene that had been enacted there. A certain portion of the outlying buildings lay in blackened ruins, it is true; shutters had been torn from several windows, and the costly hangings in the chapel had been dragged down and trampled under foot; but all these were matters that could easily be set right, and things would have looked much the same as ever in a few days, if it had not been for the mournful and grotesque appearance presented by the many figures of saints which adorned every room and corridor. Not a nose had been left to the holy men of old! Some of the statues had been nearly demolished, others had been chipped and scarred, but one and all had been ruthlessly deprived of their most prominent feature!

As soon as the Abbey had been cleared of the marauders, the wounded were cared for and the dead prepared for burial. Many were found to have fallen in the fray, monks had been trampled to death or struck down by the brutal mob, archers and tramps had fallen in deadly conflict, more had been cut down by the royal troops. The body of Tristan de Pamiers was claimed by his student subjects and was honoured by a stately funeral.

Prior Anselm celebrated a solemn mass for the departed, and then all at the Abbey resumed its usual course.

The one department which had suffered irreparable loss, in addition to the stone saints, was the wine cellar. The door had been forced by the thirsty throng early in the proceedings, and the casks of choice wines had been rifled, the contents had been poured like water down the insatiable throats of those who had never tasted the like before, and never would again.

When the underground premises had been cleared of belated revellers, and the remainder of the wine laid down with all due care, a thorough search was set on foot by the Prior, to discover the fate of the Queen. Every nook and corner of the Abbey had been carefully investigated without result, and now the only hope was that she might have fled to the cellars to take refuge in the dark.

They called the name of Ingeburge through all the subterranean vaults and passages, they took torches into every dark recess, but in vain. Not a trace of the Queen could be discovered!

The only small comfort left to Anselm was that her body had not been among the slain, but how did he know that a worse fate had overtaken her? Amongst the archers and more ignorant of the brotherhood, the belief gained credence that the mock invalid who had gained

Prior Anselm sadly turned towards this last resource.

Digitized by Google

admittance by fraud, was the enemy of mankind in person, who had carried her off under the disguise of Jean Cador, the carver of images.

There only remained one place where search had not been made, and that was the Lord Abbot's private cellar, which opened out of the last vault. This place contained a special store of the choicest vintage and was only opened when the Abbot paid a visit to his Abbey, as he took care to keep the key himself.

Prior Anselm sadly turned towards this last resource, and tried the door, but it resisted every effort, so he came away in despair, saying:

"No one has gone in there!"

A lay brother shot the bolt across the door and the little band withdrew, feeling sad indeed, for the Queen had endeared herself to all who had come in contact with her during her stay amongst them.

As soon as the sound of their retreating footsteps had died away, under the low roof, a distinct noise, as of stifled laughter came from the Abbot's cellar. Three voices were distinguishable, and it was not the mad mirth of maniacs but the suppressed merriment of men who were thoroughly enjoying themselves.

Behind that door were three men, and it was they who had succes-fully baffled the Prior's attempts to open it. When one of them lighted a torch, the well-known features of Ezekiel, Tréfouilloux, and "Poor Louise" were recognisable in the uncertain light.

The last-named, who had been left for dead on the floor of the cell by the soldiers when they carried away the wounded, speedily took advantage of his solitude to make off in the direction of the cellars. Here he fell in with his two rivals, who had no heart for fighting when it involved personal risk. To explain how "Poor Louise" had survived the deadly thrust from Eric's dagger it will be necessary to go back to his quest in the monastery.

When he was exploring the deserted cells, any one who had had time to notice him would have observed that in proportion as his search was prolonged his bodily dimensions increased. Nature had been bountiful to him in the first instance, but this rapid development of corpulence was due solely to art—the art of acquisition. "Poor Louise" participated in the common weakness of the sex he counterfeited, and could not resist the temptation of white, finely-spun linen, so that in each cell he entered, he managed to annex something. A sheet, no matter whether it covered a sick man or a corpse was not to be passed over, shirts, towels, anything he could lay hands on, were quickly stuffed inside his capacious garments.

It was into this ample breast-plate of stolen goods that Eric's dagger entered, and "Poor Louise," who was no fool, saw that the game was up for the present, and that it would be the better part of valour to lie low.

By dint of long and continued efforts, these three doughty warriors had managed to burst open the door of the private cellar, and had taken great pains to secure themselves from all interruption. Their investigation of the contents of their hiding-place gave them unmixed satisfaction, and Tréfouilloux had made a nice calculation that, provided they were undisturbed, they could drink on for the next two years without the supply running short. The only drawback was that they had nothing to eat, but that was a small matter, for they knew that when a man is drunk he wants but little solid food, and they meant to be drunk for months to come!

"Oh, good luck!" said Tréfouilloux, "what a change this is from the gutter outside Nôtre Dame! Mates, this is something like a life!"

"We shall not have the sun scorching our heads," added Ezekiel.

"Nor the cold rain and sleet to freeze the marrow in our bones!" chimed in "Poor Louise."

They struggled to their feet and clinked the huge flagons which were serving them as drinking-cups, before emptying them to their new-found happiness.

Clinked the huge flagons.

There was almost an element of solemnity in their joy Their wildest dreams had never pictured such a scene as this! To have wine from morning till night, only for the trouble of pouring it out! Warmth! Shelter! Drink and Idleness! Truly a veritable beggars' Paradise!

"When they come to fetch wine for the Abbot, we must hide in the empty casks," said Tréfouilloux prudently.

"Ah, that greedy old monk will be drinking half our store! I'd forgotten him," grumbled "Poor Louise."

The other two laughed and proposed all kinds of ways by which they might deprive the holy Father of his costly nectar.

"Bah!" cried Ezekiel in a fit of generosity, "we must all drink!"

"Look here," began Tréfouilloux, after a moment's reflection, "we can tell all sorts of tales of our adventures by sea and land when we go back to Nôtre Dame, now's the time to invent our stories."

"When we go back——" began Ezekiel.

"There's time enough for that," broke in "Poor Louise," who was feeling the pangs of hunger. "Have either of you got an old crust of bread in your pockets?"

"Bread?" cried the others scornfully, "what do you want that stuff for?"

"To eat, of course."

Words were inadequate to express the contempt with which this simple answer was greeted. They shrugged their shoulders in disdain and turned away to fetch more wine.

"Look here, mates, if you're no hungry, you soon will be. Perhaps you've had food later than I have, but I've tasted nothing since the night before last, and I feel as if a rat were gnawing me here," and he laid his hand upon where his supper ought to have been.

"If you're hungry, why don't you drink, man?" said Tréfouilloux.

"The fool!" snorted Ezekiel, "to talk about an empty stomach in a sea of wine!"

Digitized by Google

"Poor Louise," wishing to fortify himself against the pangs he knew so well, took their advice and drank off a long draught of strong wine; but scarcely had he swallowed it than he sank writhing on the floor, moaning:

"I'm burning! Burning like fire!"

For some time they watched him in his agonies, and wondered what was the matter with him, but after continued libations they began to feel a sense of discomfort similar to that which he described by his intermittent wails: "I'm burning! I'm on fire!"

"I begin to feel horribly hot inside!" gasped Ezekiel at last.

"I feel as if I'd swallowed a red-hot plate of iron!" retorted Tréfouilloux in torture.

The whole scene was changed. All gaiety had fled, and three pale, haggard faces looked with horror on the well-filled casks that had been their joy a short time before. They shrank from the luscious wine as if it had been poison, and from their parched lips went up the cry: "It burns, burns like Hades itself!"

They would have given the whole cellar-full of wine for one draught of water, the thing they had drunk the least of in their lives.

"How dark this hole is! I'm choked," panted Tréfouilloux. "Oh, for the sun and air at Nôtre Dame again!"

"And good rain, too," sighed "Poor Louise," "I'd drink every drop I could!"

"I said, 'when we got back to Nôtre Dame,' just now mates, but perhaps—who knows—we may never get back there again," sobbed Tréfouilloux dismally.

At this awful suggestion they all three scrambled to their feet and tried to open the door, but the bolt on the outer side stood firm, and they sank down exhausted to watch the last flickering gleams of their only remaining torch, with the certainty that their own lives had but little longer to last.

From time to time one or the other groaned out a sigh for former days.

"My snug corner under the wall!" sighed Ezekiel.

"My ulcer! my open wound!" moaned Tréfouilloux.

"My four arms and the goat's hoof!" sobbed "Poor Louise."

The torch gave its last flash and all was dark around them. With strained eyes they watched the spot where last they saw the light, and clutched each other in their panic of despair. Hour after hour wore on only to add to their sufferings. Mad with hunger they groped about for more drink, and then cursed the inward fire it fed so cruelly.

They dashed themselves on the casks and fought like wild beasts in their dark lair. Shrieks, groans, oaths rang from their parched and fevered lips, but no one came to to their aid. Gradually the sounds became fainter and less frequent, then a hoarse rattle, a low, long-drawn moan and a spell of silence. With a yell one of the wretched creatures sprang upon the form nearest to him and died with an oath on his lips—Silence again—a few sobs—and all was still.

* * * * *

Three days later my Lord Abbot elected to dine at the Abbey, so a lay-brother was despatched to fetch the wine. Finding that the lock had been tampered with he returned to tell the Prior, and Anselm went, in some alarm, to investigate the matter. When they opened the door a flood of foul air drove them back, and it was some seconds before they could attempt to enter the cellar again. When they did so, a ghastly sight met their view. Three bodies in an advanced state of decomposition lay within. Two of them were locked in a deadly embrace and the fingers of one were fixed tightly in the throat of the other. Recognition was impossible, so the mystery of the Abbot's cellar remained unsolved. The only clue to the identity of the bodies was the discovery of a neatly folded pile of linen on one of the up-turned casks, and that led to the conclusion that the victims were belonging to the marauders who had plundered the Abbey.

Who they were, and how they got into the private cellar, were questions never answered. Some may have missed the distinguished trio from their wonted places in the inclosure, but we may be sure there were plenty to replace them, and equally certain that there were few, if any, to mourn their loss.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE CRYSTAL PONIARD.

PARIS was in a state of great excitement, and the old Parisians were talking with a volubility not unworthy of their modern descendants; not about political or international affairs, the mysterious assassin, the war with John of England, or the state of the Holy Land, all these were for the time being forgotten, and even the decision of the Ecclesiastical Council was temporarily thrown into the background by the prevailing curiosity as to the fate of Queen Ingeburge.

Various more or less elaborated versions of the riot were in circulation throughout the city, and the same question rose to the lips of every listener, "Who had organised the attack?"

The students of the University protested their ignorance of the whole affair, with the exception of the tragic fate that had overtaken their leader. The Freemasons swore by Holy Writ that they had had neither part nor lot in the act of sacrilege.

Some malicious tongues whispered that the sudden disappearance of Madame Ingeburge fitted in admirably with the personal desires of Philip Augustus, but on the other hand it was the King's troops who had gone to the rescue, even though they were too late to save the Queen. Where was she? Had she been quietly done to death? Or was she being left to languish in some dark dungeon?

Such questions as these occupied the minds of the bulk of the people of Paris, that large class of sober-minded clear-sighted men and women who generally arrive at the truth when they are not led away by popular agitators or sedition mongers. Most of them still felt a kindly interest in the poor young Queen, whom they had seen come amongst them as a happy and expectant bride, only to find a gaoler instead of a husband, and a cloister instead of a court.

And now perhaps that monastic prison had given place to the tomb, simply because she loved her lord too well to renounce those sacred rights which were hers in the sight of God and man.

Murmurs against the King and his advisers began to find utterance, and men said that if Madame Ingeburge could have shown herself she would soon have had an army to support her cause.

If she were not dead, then her place of concealment was very cleverly chosen, for there were many loving eyes looking for her. Eve, who had quite recovered from the shock of that terrible night, was exercising all her quick brain and womanly intuition to penetrate the darkness that enshrouded the fate of her beloved Angel. Eric had not thought of returning to work, indeed, he was not fit for it, for he had lost much blood from a flesh-wound he received in the fight, so he spent his days wandering about the city and its environs trying to glean some clue to the mystery. Then there was Albret, whose wound from the dagger of Mahmoud-el-Reis had by no means healed, still he was using every effort to further the search, and the King did not discourage it, though he had not taken any public part in the matter. Men said he was waiting till the final decision of the Council was given.

Not only had Madame Ingeburge disappeared, but the celebrated sculptor Jean Cador had never returned to the cathedral since he had been carried out in that deadlike swoon. Bishop Maurice de Sully was in great perplexity. The workshop was locked up and he did not like to force the door—the time in which the strange artist had promised to complete his work had elapsed, and he had neither produced the statue, nor come to explain his omission. The dumb negro servants had not been seen either, and Amaury Montruel the only man who had any knowledge of the true state of the work, kept silence for reasons of his own.

Digitized by Google

One night, as Albret was on his way to the King's apartments, he fancied he saw the sharply defined features of the Syrian in the shadow of a doorway. He darted forward to seize the intruder, but his hand only grasped the air, the figure had vanished like a phantom! The vast corridor was but dimly lighted by candelabra, which hung at intervals from the roof, and when he came to reflect upon the impossibility of Mahmoud-el-Reis having been able to evade the numerous guards, or scale the impregnable walls of the Louvre, which was more fortress than palace, he came to the conclusion that his over-excited brain had played him a trick, and that his mind had brought before him the picture of one of those whom he so eagerly sought.

The fable of Ingeburge's having been spirited away by the Evil One under the disguise of Jean Cador, had caused many an anxious moment to the more ignorant of her partizans. Her personal friends were so convinced of her purity and innocence, that the tale made no impression on them.

Four days had elapsed since the attack on the Abbey, and King Philip Augustus was in his private room that opened out of his sleeping apartment, in deep and affectionate converse with Agnes de Méranie. She was watching him with adoring eyes, and he bent over her with well-feigned tenderness.

"Alas! my dear lord," she was saying as she passed her fingers caressingly through his hair: "Why can I never feel my mind at rest? Why do I love you more and more every day, and yet this love, once the source of so much unalloyed delight, now only tortures me?"

Her eyes softened as she continued pathetically:

"The heart guesses the truth infallibly, and mine tells me, sometimes, that if I suffer, it is because my lord no longer loves me!"

Those who knew the passionate infatuation which the King had shown for Agnes de Méranie, and the empire that her subtle, seductive charms had wielded over him, might have thought to see them together, that the spell was still holding its magic sway.

He met her plaintive appeal with reproachful tenderness, and his eyes seemed still to find the same exquisite pleasure in her beauty. And she was looking her best. These daughters of the Tzeck race are bewitching in the soft subdued light of evening. Their somewhat striking features are toned down, their eyes shine more tenderly, their vigorous vitality yields to langorous grace, and their melodious voices fall harmoniously on the ear that is wearied with the day's excitement. Agnes de Méranie possessed all these charms and knew well how to use them. While the indomitable will and passionate pride of the woman gave fire to her glance, it was veiled by the softer love-light and the tender regrets to which she had given utterance.

"Foolish child!" murmured the King, pressing her hand to his lips. "You know your power over me!"

This answer by no means lulled her fears to rest, and, moreover, she noted with a shudder that his lips were

"My dearest lady, I have been fighting all day for the love of you."

Digitized by Google

Standing underneath the lamp was a tall, dark man, wearing the turban and costly dress of a wealthy Saracen.

cold as ice. She looked past him to the burnished mirror which faithfully reflected her radiant beauty, but for once it gave her no satisfaction. What was the good of beauty if it could not keep the love she prized so dearly?

"I believe you, I believe you, my dear lord, for if I doubted you, it would kill me!" was her passionate reply.

He bent and kissed her hand a second time.

She was a consummate actress, but she well knew that in this, as in all else, the King was her superior, and therefore her misgivings were roused to the uttermost. She felt emboldened by the belief that Philip was in total ignorance of her visit to Cadocu at the tavern: but every now and then her heart would fail her as the fateful words rang in her ears—"The King knows all."

Perfect silence reigned about them. It was getting late, and they were secure from all interruption, so she braced herself for another effort to regain the ground she felt she had lost.

"Thank you, my dearest lord; you comfort and reassure me, because you pity your poor wife. But love is jealous, and quick to see signs of coldness. I have been banished from your side so much of late. Will you not let me stay with you now and lull you to rest with lute and song as in the happy days we have spent together?"

As he was preparing to answer her the clock struck eleven, and he rose abruptly, saying:

"My dearest lady, I have been fighting all day for the love of you. Not with my sword, but with tongue and brain. Not against men clad in armour, but against wily Churchmen, fenced in with text and dogma, and weaving subtle arguments that bewilder me. When I was fighting against the English I had time to enjoy your sweet society, but in this contest I must keep my brain cool and my nerve steady, so I dare not listen to your sweet songs."

This was her dismissal and she rose at once, hiding her chagrin under the semblance of dutiful submission.

"I must thank you again, my liege, for if you gain the victory, shall I not be the happiest woman in the world? But when will the Council cease their endless sittings?"

He had given her his hand and was leading her to the door.

"To-morrow, at this time, the Council of Bishops will hold their final deliberation, not in the palace, but in the choir of Nôtre Dame, which had the finishing touches put to the roof to-day. At the stroke of midnight Mass will be celebrated, and then the prelates will pronounce the name of the Queen!"

At these words, spoken in a tone of tender gallantry, he stooped and kissed her hand for the third time, and she felt, with a sense of exultation, that she might safely substitute her own name for that of the title she was so eager to wear.

She pressed his hand gratefully, and with another eloquent glance, passed out of the door.

Amaury Montruel, clad in full armour, was keeping his accustomed watch outside his royal master's room. He bowed his head respectfully as Madame Agnes swept by him, but she barely acknowledged his humble salutation.

"Good night, Amaury," said the King kindly.

"May God keep your majesty, and give you peaceful sleep!" was the fervent answer.

"Thank you," replied the King as he went in and shut the door, whereupon his faithful "Friend" lay down, still fully armed, across the threshold.

As soon as he was alone, Philip Augustus gave a deep sigh of utter weariness, and began talking to himself:

"Ingeburge was a King's daughter—she was beautiful, and she loved me!—but—there must be a demon in the heart of man—or else such women as——"

He broke off, and stepping cautiously to the door, shot two small bolts to secure himself on the inside, even while he was so ably guarded from without.

Then, smiling at his own precaution, he went towards his sleeping apartment. The royal couch was in a kind of a box, the sides and cover of which were beautifully carved outside and hung with rich curtains within. As was his wont the King called his page Albret, almost mechanically, for he knew that he had no need to raise his voice, as the youth was quick of hearing and always at his post.

Digitized by Google

Having called once, he thought no more about it, but went to draw back the curtains of his luxurious couch.

"Poor Ingeburge," he resumed meditatively, "what can have become of her? She would be just twenty-two now. She has suffered cruelly, I fear, and now—what if her happiness should come too late?"

His eyes fell on the silken coverlet, and just where it met the pillow he saw a glittering speck. Wondering how it got there, he put out his hand to pick up the stray gem, as he thought it, but scarcely had his fingers touched it, when he shrank back with a shudder, and uttered a low stifled cry.

The supposed gem was the point of a delicate crystal poniard, sharper than any steel and fine as a needle, bearing on the hilt an inscription in Arabic characters.

For the first time in his life Philip Augustus knew what the cold, clammy sweat of fear was!

Everyone in those days knew of the terrible and mysterious assassinations effected by the emissaries of the dreaded "Lord of the Mountain;" they knew the deadly significance of the crystal poniard, inscribed with a passage from the Koran, in the name of the Grand Master of the Fédavi.

Had the fortifications of the Louvre been assailed and taken? The walls razed? The garrison massacred or bribed? How else could the assassin have penetrated to the King's most private room? Popular credulity attributed supernatural powers to these Syrian fanatics, but Philip Augustus had no faith in such tales. He still held the deadly little weapon in his hand and was looking at it as if it fascinated him in spite of himself.

"Albret!" he called again, adding to himself, "Can he be the traitor?"

Most men would have felt crushed by this evidence of betrayal, and have cast their suspicions broadcast upon those around them; but his brain remained clear and his judgement just.

"No, no," he said, turning to the door where "The Friend of the King" was keeping guard, "it's not poor Albret. The traitor lies in that direction. But now that I've bolted the door, the assassin will find it difficult to follow his poniard to-night."

He heard a slight noise behind him, and, thinking it was the tardy page, he remarked without looking round:

"You are very late to-night, my dear Albret!"

Then, as there was no reply, he turned, and saw a strange sight. Standing underneath the lamp was a tall, dark man, wearing the turban and costly dress of a wealthy Saracen!

Above his forehead there gleamed from the folds of his headdress an aigrette of rare gems, which scintillated in the light like fiery sparks, and from his girdle, which was interwoven with two ropes of pearls and emeralds, there hung a glittering scimitar.

The King stood aghast, believing himself to be the victim of some optical delusion, and the stranger neither moved nor spoke.

(To be continued.)

THERE was a great bustle and confusion on board the sloop-of-war La Gaillarde. Dieu merci! It was not occasioned by hostile preparation; on the contrary, the general commotion which prevailed was of the most pacific kind. La Gaillarde was to be unrigged, and from stern to stern, from the keel to the tallest topmast, every part of the brave ship was being inspected, registered, stamped, and ticketed with the most scrupulous care. It was no trifling affair, nor a mere formality, but a real methodical scrutiny.

During the past sixteen years that she had been lying off Alexandria La Gaillarde had already undergone several such trials. But all dismantlings are not alike, and a ship may be unrigged by order of the Government at least ten times, without even a single rat in her hold being disturbed in its habits. All the old provisions are kept on board, and the only change that takes place consists in the execution of sundry repairs, and in the renewal of certain details.

Such was the fate of the corvette La Gaillarde. She had been administratively inspected five or six times, but finally strict orders had arrived from the Admiralty for the ship to be completely unrigged while at station in the harbour of Toulon. Therefore the army of rats occupying the hull were in a state of terrible disturbance.

For two days every nook and corner had been ransacked, turned topsy-turvy, and old Quartermaster Lehnblot, who was only too glad to seize the opportunity to revenge the loss of divers pairs of trousers and three or four pairs of shoes, untimely victims to the rapacious quadrupeds, had made a perfect hetacomb of these trespassers upon his private property.

Ah, how merrily the rats had spent their time all these long years, living peacefully and growing fat in perpetual ease and security. How many jackets, caps, crackers, and dried vegetables had been nibbled and devoured in secret? But even a rat's felicity must come to an end.

Digitized by Google

Lehnblot, his hands plunged in the depths of his pockets, and his mouth puckered up in a whistle, stood in a passage-way, looking down upon the slaughtered enemies bleeding at his feet. He was congratulating himself upon his victory over at least this number of the abhorred creatures, who could now torment him no longer. He was sunk in deep reflection, when he heard the lieutenant hailing him from the upper deck. In an instant Lehnblot, twirling his cap between his bony fingers, appeared in the presence of the commander, the purser, the lieutenant, and midshipman, all of whom had just been exploring the vessel together.

"Lehnblot," asked the commander, "how many guns are there on board?"

"Four, sir," answered the quartermaster, astounded at such a question.

"Were there never more than four? You ought to know, as you have been on board longer than anybody else."

"I believe, sir, that I heard the former lieutenant say that there used to be five guns, but I never saw more than four."

"Well," said the commander, "you hear that, purser; there is most likely a mistake in the registers. It is very strange, however, that your predecessors did not verify it, and much to be regretted that you never discovered this error yourself. The case must be made clear. I may rely upon you, may I not?"

"Never fear, sir, I will make a thorough search."

The inspection ended, Purser Lacarlingue went immediately to his cabin, where he commenced thumbing and turning over all the registers, account books, documents, and papers that he could lay his hands upon, but after four hours of hard work he had found nothing.

"Hang the gun. To-morrow morning all the ships papers must be sent in right trim to the Admiralty under hand and seal of the commander. What is to be done?"

That night Purser Lacarlingue dined most uncomfortably. After leaving the table, he sent for Lehnblot.

"You know all about the ship's accounts," he said to the quartermaster, "come and help me to go over them again, we must find that gun," and both men with the same earnestness made another useless search through all the papers.

"'Pon my soul," exclaimed the purser, striking his fist upon the table, "that beats everything I ever heard of! A twenty-seven centimetre gun disappeared without leaving any trace! A cask of rum, or a box of biscuits can be lost, but not a ship's gun!"

"But not a ship's gun!" echoed Lehnblot. "Mon Dieu! A cannon can't be prigged like a quid of tobacco!"

"Allons, mon vieux, let's hunt for it once more," said the disconsolate purser.

Dawn, commencing to glimmer over the blue waters of the Mediterranean, found the two officers still searching desperately but in vain. One gun out of five was yet missing.

"One of the documents must be lost," murmured the wretched purser dolefully.

"Perhaps it has been eaten up by the rats. The cursed beasts are capable of anything," replied Lehnblot.

"Maybe you are right," said poor Lacarlingue, turning over nervously the pages of his report, and casting a melancholy glance at the numerous misdeeds attributed therein to Lehnblot's bitter foes. For a few moments he remained absorbed in thought, then, bounding to his feet, he courageously seized his pen and wrote in a steady hand a few lines upon a sheet of paper, which he presented to Lehnblot.

"What do you say to that, old fellow?" he shouted in triumphant tones.

The quartermaster read the words; turned the paper upside down, and opened his eyes and mouth wide in amazement.

"Do—do you believe that will go—go down?" he stammered.

"No doubt of it. The commander will have no time to read the document; he will sign it, and once in the office, nobody will think anything more about the concern."

Two hours later, a gig left the sloop's side, transporting to the shore the report relative to the inventory of La Gaillarde.

"Is it all right?" the commander had simply asked before sealing the document.

"Yes, sir."

"And how about that lost gun?"

"I found out the mistake," answered Lacarlingue, rubbing his hands together in great satisfaction that the vexatious affair was ended at last.

But the purser's conscience was probably not quite at ease. If you had met him on the quay of Toulon a few weeks afterwards, you would certainly have noticed that he looked troubled, as though some serious preoccupation was weighing heavily upon his mind, and his anxiety seemed to increase whenever he was called to the officers to transact any business for the ship.

One morning, as he was passing through a hall at the "Bureau de l'Amirâtué," he met one of his friends, a head clerk, who rushed up to him, saying: "You have come in the nick of time, Lacarlingue; the inventory report of La Gaillarde has just been sent back to us from the minister's office."

"Have you opened it?" inquired Lacarlingue, breathless with emotion.

"Why, no, I haven't."

"May I see the document?"

"Nothing so easy, cher ami; come, it is here in my office."

Purser Lacarlingue followed his friend; a cold shiver ran through his whole frame when he began turning the pages of that too well-known report. Suddenly he drew a sigh of relief—so deep, so profound, that two underclerks, perched upon their high stools, startled at the noise, turned sharply round, wondering how a whale had ever been able to get into the office.

This is what Lacarlingue had read in the report: First, the following lines in his own handwriting, under the head of "Losses and Damages":

LOST STORES.

NATURE OF OBJECT.	NUMBER.	DATE OF LOSS.	CAUSE OF LOSS.
Twenty-seven centimetre gun.	1	Unknown.	Eaten up by the rats.

and opposite in the column of "Observations," these words, traced by an all-powerful hand:

Approved for the rarity of the fact.
First Lord of Admiralty,
DU HAUBAN.

MARY E. PLUMMER.

Digitized by Google

THE NEW LEMONADE
2 Gallons for 4½d.

Many people suffer from extreme thirst during the hot weather. Messrs. Foster Clark & Co. have supplied the want that has so long been felt by making a concentrated lemonade, which is far more economical than the ordinary lemonade. It is made from the finest lemons, and the great advantage is that it is partly manufactured in Italy, in the midst of the lemon orchards. The lemons are taken direct from the trees to the factory to commence their transformation into the Eiffel Tower Lemonade. You can get thirty-two tumblers (or two gallons) for fourpence halfpenny. If you cannot get it from your grocer, send sixpence to G. FOSTER CLARK & Co., No. 115 Eiffel Tower Factory, Maidstone, Sole manufacturers of "EIFFEL TOWER LEMONADE."

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 42 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

NOSE
A RADICAL PERMANENT CURE
Medically approved for Red Noses, 3/9, post free, under cover. Pamphlet, "Red Noses, Cause and Prevention," 1/-; Machines for Ugly Noses, particulars for stamp.
LEES RAY Specialist, South Castle St., Liverpool.

EPPS'S
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
COCOA

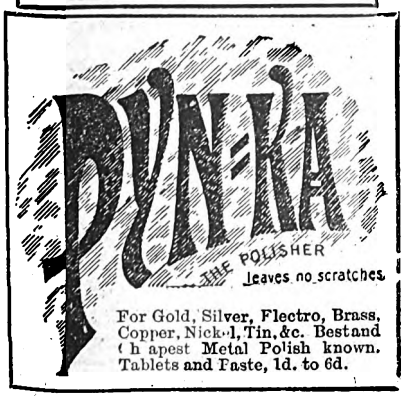
CYCLE DEPOTS — BEST IN LONDON. — RIDING SCHOOLS

Lists Post Free.

High-class Selection of GENTS', LADIES', & JUVENILE CYCLES. From £3 Cash, or on Easy Terms 10/- Monthly. Head Depot: 53 to 55 Blackfriars Road, London, S.E.

Practical Tuition Until Perfect, 10/6. Single Lesson, 2/-. PURCHASERS TAUGHT FREE. Open 9 till 9. West End Branch: 124 King's Road, Sloane Square, S.W.

CYCLEDOM LTD.



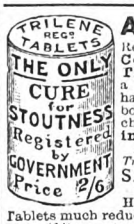
For Gold, Silver, Electro, Brass, Copper, Nickel, Tin, &c. Best and Cheapest Metal Polish known. Tablets and Paste, 1d. to 6d.

NOSE MACHINE.
This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

SILVER QUEEN CYCLES!

Best Value on earth. Immense stock of Ladies' and Gents' machines. New and Secondhand. Wonderful bargains. Carriage paid. Easy payments from 10s. monthly, or large cash discount. 1 year's guarantee. Illus. price lists post free on application. Old cycles exchanged. The SILVER QUEEN CYCLE Co Ltd., 221 Tottenham Court Road, London.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,
For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.
SHILLING BOTTLES.



ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably"

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MR. CLAUDE CARTER, of Thorn House, Johnstone, N.B., says: "Your Tablets much reduced my weight and I have been waiting to see if it was permanent, and so it has proved."

MR. CANHAM, 87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, says: "Tablets cured my wife two years ago of extreme stoutness. It has never returned."

MARION TAYLOR, of Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "Have lost quite two stone."

A. PEEL, of Darley Hydro, Matlock, writes: "They have reduced and benefited me a good deal."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than one stone."

MR. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead. "I think them wonderful not only to reduce fat but as a medicine."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

WADE'S
WONDERFUL OFFER
A SOLID SILVER WATCH GIVEN AWAY.
SEND NO MONEY.

In order to introduce my name into every household in the Kingdom, I undertake and guarantee to give away one of my "World-Famed £2 Silver Watches," last price, Ladies' or Gentlemen's, to every reader who sends me the correct reading of the Rebus printed below. I am preparing to send out immediately 2,000 of these watches. This is a perfectly genuine competition, and the only thing you have to do is carry out the conditions, and if you succeed in guessing correctly you have the advantage of our truly wonderful offer.

These pictures represent three well-known English Wild Flowers. The conditions of the Competition are that you find out what these flowers are, and if you are correct you undertake to purchase one of my inexpensive Solid Silver Chains. These chains are the best made, are marvellous value. Money returned if dissatisfied. Send at once, enclosing stamped and addressed envelope, so that I may inform you if correct.

W. W WADE,
WATCH MANUFACTURER.
Dept. 35, GOLD EXCHANGE,
Hammersmith, London, W.

MASON'S The Only Painless Corn Cure.
Never known to Fail. KILLCORN
Sold by all Chemists, Stores, &c., Price 1/- per bottle, or post free from the Proprietor, 3 Guildford St., Leeds.

£20.
Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (240 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road, & 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

DR MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL SOAP

Prepared with Arsenic, Zinc, and other Ingredients as a beautifier of the Skin and Complexion 6d. & 1/- per Tablet.

Madame PATTI says: "Most Excellent."

Eradicates Spots and all Imperfections.

Of all Chemists, etc., or post free from S. HARVEY Ltd., 5 Denman Street, London Bridge, S.E.

A Sample 4/6 box of Dr. Mackenzie's Harmless Complexion Wafers will be sent post free for 2/9 to anyone mentioning this advertisement. Guaranteed absolutely harmless.

"JUNO" CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

DIAMONDS, £10. 16/8 monthly. Lady's or Gents' £12 12/- 21/- monthly. £14 14/-, 24/6 ,, Chase Cycle Covers, 4/6. Parnell's Safety Stands, 3/3. Standard Cyclometers, 10,000 miles, 2/3 Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories, sent post free METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO. LTD., 75 and 76 Bishopsgate Without, E.C.; and at Piccadilly Circus, exactly opposite Regent Street, London, W. JUNO Riding School, 1,700ft.

KEATING'S POWDER IS USEFUL
in preserving blankets and furs from Moths. Sprinkle well with the Powder before putting away.
KILLS BLACKBEETLES & FLEAS.
Tins 3d., 6d. and 1/- each.

Digitized by Google

I'VE FOUND IT AT LAST,

A. L. would like to know what is the meaning of the term "brass-plate coal merchants," which he saw in an old book.———It was a term used in the trade to denote the middlemen who acted as agents on commission. In the course of a Parliamentary inquiry into the coal trade it was shown that five-sixths of the London public were supplied by these middlemen.

B.—British possessions in Africa extend over an area of two and a half millions of square miles—almost equal to the area of the United States.

PAPER.—Tissue paper was originally made to place between tissue cloth of gold or silver, to prevent fraying when folded.

B. I.—It is estimated that there are 51,000 breweries in the world, and considerably more than one-third of them are in Germany.

MITE.—St. Swithin was the Bishop of Winchester and tutor of King Alfred. His wish was to be buried in the open air, but the monks, on the contrary, desired that it should be in the chancel of the cathedral. The tradition is that the saint sent a heavy rain on the 15th of July, the day appointed for the ceremony, which occasioned its postponement from day to day for forty days. Tired out with waiting they buried him in the churchyard.

COINS.—Twice during the last century a mistake was made in the spelling of the Latinised form of the King's name on our halfpence. In 1730 the name was given as "Geogius," instead of Georgius, and in 1772 some half-pennies left the Mint with the name "Georius." On the latter occasion a reward was offered for each piece returned to the Mint.

ROYAL.—In the way of palaces, the imperial family of Japan leads easily. There are thirty palaces belonging to them in different parts of Japan, but the present Emperor has occupied only three or four, and has never even seen some of them. The quality of several may be described as "doubtful."

PENAL.—The Belgian convict receives payment from the authorities, just as his British companion in crime. Three-tenths of his earnings are given to him when his term of imprisonment has expired.

T. LANG.—It is a strange fact that injuries to the tongue, whether of man or animal, heal more quickly than those of any other part of the body. This is probably because it is kept warm, free from dirt, and continually moistened.

METER.—If you mark a circle one inch in diameter on an Ordnance map of the inch scale, the area contained within that circle will be as near as possible 500 acres. That will probably serve your purpose.

TIME.—Yes, that was the record year in point of length. It is now called "46 B.C." and "the year of confusion," and it had 445 days. The year, as previously arranged, had not been of the proper length, and the calendar and the seasons had got mixed up. Julius Cæsar rearranged the length of the year, and added a number of days to the one in progress in order to bring the months into conformity with the seasons.

H. T. H. asks: "Which people may claim the distinction of being physically the finest in Europe?" ———From an "all-round" point of view, the gipsies of Hungary. They are splendid specimens of humanity, and they are rarely ill. Their wounds heal with surprising quickness and usually without the application of medicaments, thus testifying to the purity of their blood.

L. A.—The word "ax" or "axe" for "ask," which is common in some parts of the kingdom, is really an old Saxon word. You will find it in Chaucer and Wycliffe, and in a letter addressed to Henry VII. by his mother, as well as in other writings.

PLAY.—In proportion to its population, Italy has more theatres than any other country in the world.

R. T.—Yes, the annual fair at Nijni-Novgorod is being modernised, like most other things. It used to be the most primitive in Europe—an exhibition of Orientalism in people, manners, and products; but it is now merely an exhibition to exploit the latest productions of Russia.

NATURALIST.—If you wish to make the experiment of taming a trapped rat, there is no valid reason why you should not do so. Try the plan of making the creature drink all the water it needs from a spoon, which you can insert into the trap through a specially made and narrow opening, holding the spoon by the handle. This plan is frequently successful.

U. S.—The length of the coast line of the United States is 5,715 miles. This is made up of 2,349 miles on the Atlantic ocean, 1,556 on the Gulf of Mexico, and 1,810 on the Pacific ocean.

NEXT week a collecting-sheet will be inclosed with every copy of Short Stories, and I shall be greatly obliged if my readers will see they get it.

W. R.—The entire population of England at the time of the Conqueror did not exceed 2,000,000.

PENMAN.—Reed pens, split at the ends like quill pens, have been found in Egyptian tombs, and probably date back to 2,500 years before the Christian Era.

MEDALLIST.—You are probably referring to the "Indian Chief" medal, an interesting military decoration of the period of George III., which was issued to Indian chiefs during the American War. On the reverse is a representation of the American wolf snarling at the British lion at a respectful distance.

G. H. K.—No, there is not a solitary peer in the House of Lords who was there at the time of the Queen's accession to the throne.

CURIOUS.—The Grand Opera House in Paris is the largest building of the kind in the world. It covers more than three acres of ground, and cost a quarter of a million sterling.

W. R.—The percentage of illiterates in this country is 7. When the Queen came to the throne, 40 per cent. of the people could not write their names.

S. D. has read that there are more than two thousand millionaires in Berlin and emphatically expresses the opinion that the statement is false.———The statement is not improbable. You forget that the Germans do not reckon in pounds, but in marks, a mark being roughly equal to a shilling. A Frenchman is a millionaire if he has a million francs (£40,000).

NAT asks if I know whether a monument has ever been erected to the joint memory of the commanders of opposing forces.———Yes, there is a famous monument of that kind in Canada. On the Plains of Abraham there is a memorial to Wolf and Montcalme, who both fell at the taking of Quebec.

T. B. G.—The longest paved street in the world is Washington Street, Boston, which is seventeen and a half miles long.

Notice to Competitors.

IN all Prize Competitions the Editor's decision is final. No correspondence will be entertained when once a competition is finished and the result published.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE John Noble

Home, Holiday, & Half-Guinea Costumes

Promptly Sent by Parcel Post, safely packed, direct from the Largest Firm of Costumiers in the World, and Originators of Half-Guinea Costumes.

All the Costumes on this page have been made by well-paid workers in the firm's own sanitary workrooms, and are supplied in the following two good durable cloths:

I. JOHN NOBLE COSTUME COATING, smooth-surfaced, medium weight.

II. JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE, weighty and weather resisting.

PATTERNS SENT POST FREE, together with a new 84-page Illustrated Fashion and Fabric Catalogue to all who write and mention Short Stories. (These need not be returned.)

A FULL DRESS LENGTH of either cloth (6yd., 52in. wide) for 7/6. Carriage 8d.

COLOURS of all Costumes are Black, Navy, Myrtle, Ruby, Brown, Fawn, Sage-Green, Purple, and Grey.

THE THREE STOCK SIZES are 34, 36, 38 inches round bust, under arms; Skirts being 38, 40, 42 inches long in front. Any other sizes can be made to measure, 1/6 extra.

John Noble Ltd. obtained their position as "Largest Firm of Costumiers in the World" by giving from their commencement a value for money previously considered impossible. And now that their reputation is so firmly established and their clientele so enormous, they can afford to give, and do give, better value than ever.

THE NEW GORDON COSTUME.

Model 894.—Well cut Bodice, trimmed on fancy stitch-Full wide centre with ing a l'Ecosse Tailor Skirt. 10/6 Price 10/6 complete; carriage 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d.

Model 644.
A NORFOLK DESIGN.
Smart Half-Guinea Norfolk Costume; well-cut bodice, full tailor skirt. Price 10/6 complete; 10/6 carriage, 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d.

Model 684.
Tailor-made Girl's Reefer Coat and full Skirt.
Lengths & Prices:
27 30 33 36 39in.
6/9 7/9 8/9 9/9 10/9ea.
Carriage, 6d.

The New "CURRAGH" Costume.
Model 901.—A smart Bodice, trimmed on facings and sleeves military braid. Full wide Skirt. Price 10/6 complete costume 10/6. Carriage 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6. Carriage 5d.

Model 900.—Smart tailor finished open Coat and full-wide Skirt. Price complete costume, 10/6 10/6. Carriage 6d. extra. Skirt alone for 5/6. Carriage, 5d. Supplied also in good stout Drill or Duck (Blue, Fawn or White) or in White Piqué at the same price. In Covert Coating for 13/6; or in Mixture Suiting for 18/-.

THE JOHN NOBLE KNOCKABOUT FROCK FOR GIRLS

Made in strong Serge, with saddle-top, full sleeves, and pocket.

21 24 27 30in.
1/6 2/- 2/6 3/-
33 36 39 42in.
3/6 4/- 4/6 5/-
each.

Lengths are from top of neck-band to edge of skirt in front.

Carriage 4d. extra.

WOOLLEN KNITTED CAPS (as sketch), 1/-. All shades.

MOURNING ORDERS
carefully executed and sent off in twelve hours.

Ladies can have their own special designs made up in any kind of dress fabric by skilled dressmakers at minimum cost. A Box of of New Summer Dress Goods lent to select from, and forwarded carriage paid.

1.000 PATTERNS

Bankers: "LONDON & MIDLAND" BANK LTD. PLEASE NAME "SHORT STORIES" WHEN WRITING TO

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

Digitized by Google

"BIG WHEEL"
BRAND.
CARTER'S BRISTOL
4½D TIN = 2 GALS. LEMONADE
Lemon Crystals

B&M
Softer with every Wash.
UNSHRINKABLE FLANNELS
For Garments of every kind.
ENDLESS WEAR.
May be obtained through any respectable Draper, Hosier, Tailor, or Outfitter.
For name of nearest agent apply to BARKER & MOODY, Perseverance Mills, LEEDS.

THE "DOLLY" SPECIALITIES.

"DOLLY" CREAM AND TINTS.

"DOLLY" Cream Colour, for Tinting Curtains, Muslins, Laces, Silks, Blouses, etc., a Rich Cream Shade.
"DOLLY" Tints, manufactured in Six Shades—Pink, Terra Cotta, Old Gold, Heliotrope, Sea Green, and Canary Yellow—for Tinting faded Ribbons, Lace, etc. Sold everywhere, 1d. per Bag. Will wash out when required.

Facsimile of "Dolly" Specialities.

"DOLLY" BLUE.

NOTICE.

"DOLLY" BLUE is neatly tied in a white bag to a small handle to hold by whilst using. It is the cheapest and best Laundry Blue in the market.

"DOLLY" BLUE is sold by all Grocers and Oilmen at 1d. per Bag.

"DOLLY" FAST DYES.

The "DOLLY" Dyes are fast on Wool and Cotton alike, and will not wash out or fade. "DOLLY" Dyes are not Tints, but are Solid Colours, viz., Black, Brown, Blue, Green, Red, and Marone. Price 3d. each Dye. "DOLLY" Dyes for Home Dyeing are sold by all Grocers and Oilmen.

The "DOLLY" Specialities are Manufactured only by William Edge & Sons Ltd., Bolton, Lancs.

LYLE'S
GOLDEN SYRUP
LONGEST ESTABLISHED PUREST & BEST.

Reckitt's
Ask for it and See that you get it.
Blue.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

THE BRIGHTEST STORY PAPER OF ALL.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 491. FOR WEEK ENDING MAY 28TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

A LESSON TO BREADWINNERS UPON CHEAP LIVING.

Every one of us, from the highest to the lowest, desires pleasant and palatable food and drink. The only question of how to satisfy this natural desire is too often one of expense. If, therefore, it can be explained how a food that is at the same time a delicious beverage, and thus answers a double purpose in the building up of the human constitution, can be the means of a considerable saving to breadwinners in the household, we know that the explanation will be read with interest by many thousands of readers.

To say that we all eat too much flesh food and drink too much tea or coffee is unnecessary. This is fully understood by the majority of us; but another question arises. De we not, as students of economy in household matters, eat too much bread?

There is no doubt that we live in an age of worry and excitement, and as the struggle for existence is anything but conducive to good digestion or an appetite that can relish anything, the palate of the average work-a-day individual has to be tickled and tempted in a variety of ways.

Many people are bewildered what to turn to for a beverage which shall be at once agreeable to the taste and, in these days of dear bread, supply the desired nourishing and stimulating qualities.

We dwellers in Britain are, to a great extent, the creatures of circumstance. Our insular position makes us almost utterly dependent upon "over-sea" food supplies, and we are helpless in the hands of the merchant-capitalists, whose high prerogative it is to govern and fix the marketable value of our imports. The toiling millions who are using up brain and muscle, sinew and nerve, in life's fierce and wearying struggle, as breadwinners for their helpless families, have to face these stern facts.

This embarrassing condition of affairs with regard to the staff of life—an article of absolute necessity in every home—has called public attention to the merits of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa as supplying a long-felt want in this direction. It is not simply a cocoa, but a preparation of ingredients, which give it great nutritive and invigorating qualities. It is, therefore, not merely a pleasant beverage, but a food and a tonic in the bargain.

Compared with the cost of bread, or any other food commodity for breakfast and supper, it is the means of hundreds of families effecting quite a considerable saving.

The success of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa has certainly been phenomenal—even the Chancellor of the Exchequer admits this—and the reason is obvious. Vi-Cocoa is neither a medicine nor a mere thirst-assuager. It is a food at the same time that it is a beverage, and it is highly serviceable to everybody, especially the workers in mills and shops of various kinds among whom tea has hitherto been so excessively drunk; while it has the further advantage of being easily digested and of agreeing with the most delicate stomach.

We leave it to the reader to consult common-sense, and at once to substitute Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa—if this has not already been done—for ordinary food and drink at breakfast and other meals.

A dainty sample tin will be sent post free if when writing (a post-card will do) Short Stories is mentioned. Address: 60, 61 and 62 Bunhill Row, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.
Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.
A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious, Non-Alcoholic Wine. Agents Wanted.
NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES
are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger Lemon, Orange, Blackberry etc.
YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

Every Economical Housewife
uses
Tower Tea.
Tower Coffee.
Tower Cocoa.
IN PACKETS AND TINS ONLY.
SOLD EVERYWHERE.

WHOLESALE:
TOWER TEA LTD.,
5, JEWRY STREET, LONDON, E.C.

£20
Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (250 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Bldgs., London, W.C.
Invested Funds,
£10,000,000.
Particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

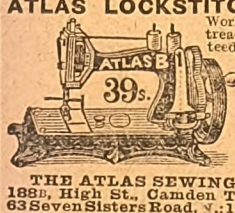
70 SONGS,
1/- Post Free.
Piano and Dance Pieces, with Portrait of Beethoven, and Coupon for Free Gift.
TURNER'S Piano & Music Depot, Preston.

EPPS'S
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
COCOA

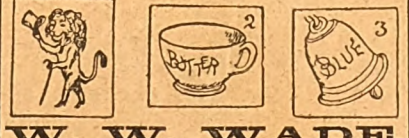
The Best Hair Dye
in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.
39/-
THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,
188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.
63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

WADE'S
WONDERFUL OFFER
A SOLID SILVER WATCH GIVEN AWAY.
SEND NO MONEY.
In order to introduce my name into every household in the Kingdom, I undertake and guarantee to give away one of my "World-Famed £2 Silver Watches," net price, Ladies' or Gentlemen's, to every reader who sends me the correct reading of the Rebus printed below. I am preparing to send out immediately 2,000 of these watches. This is a perfectly genuine competition, and the only thing you have to do is carry out the conditions, and if you succeed in guessing correctly you have the advantage of our truly wonderful offer.
These pictures represent three well-known English Wild Flowers. The conditions of the Competition are that you find out what these flowers are, and if you are correct you undertake to purchase one of my inexpensive Solid Silver Chains. These chains are the best made, are marvellous value. Money returned if dissatisfied. Send at once, enclosing stamped and addressed envelope, so that I may inform you if correct.



W. W. WADE,
WATCH MANUFACTURER,
Dept. 35, GOLD EXCHANGE,
Hammersmith, London, W.

DR MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL SOAP
Prepared with Arsenic, Zinc, and other Ingredients as a beautifier of the Skin and Complexion
6d. & 1/- per Tablet.
Madame PATTI says: "Most Excellent."
Eradicates Spots and all Imperfections.
Of all Chemists, etc., or post free from
S. HARVEY Ltd., 5 Denman Street, London Bridge, S.E.
A Sample 4/6 box of Dr. Mackenzie's Harmless Complexion Wafers will be sent post free for 2/9 to anyone mentioning this advertisement. Guaranteed absolutely harmless.

"JUNO" CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

CASH OR CARRIAGE PAID
Monthly.
Roadster, £10. 16/8
Road Racer, £11. 18/4
Lady & Gent, £12 12/- 21/-
£14 14/- 24/6
£16 16/- 28/-
Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories, sent post free.
METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO. LTD., 75 and 76 Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.; and at Piccadilly Circus exactly opposite the Criterion, London, W. JUNO Riding School, 1,700ft.

KEATING'S POWDER IS USEFUL
in preserving blankets and furs from Moths. Sprinkle well with the Powder before putting away.
KILLS BLACKBEETLES & FLEAS.
Tins 3d., 6d. and 1/- each.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

TALES OF LOVE WIT PATHOS HUMOUR STRATEGY ETC.

No. 491.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending May 28th, 1898.

Edited by ARTHUR PEARSON

The Unprofessional Detective.

PROFESSOR GILMAN was sitting in the library at the Royal Astronomical Society, putting the finishing touches to a lecture on double stars, when a card was handed to him.

He was rather vexed at being interrupted, but he felt bound to see his visitor—Lieutenant Clifford; and, putting his papers aside, he rose and went into the waiting-room.

Lieutenant Clifford met the professor with a pleasant smile and extended hand, and then introduced a gentleman whom he called Mr. Gray. The professor gave this gentleman a keen glance, and then turned to the lieutenant, and waited to hear what he had to say.

The lieutenant seemed at some loss how to begin; but, after a moment's hesitation, said:

"Professor Gilman, I do not suppose I have the slightest right to come here this morning upon the business that has brought me, and it is only at the earnest solicitations of my friend, Mr. Gray, that I have consented to come. Mr. Gray is a detective, and he is at work upon a puzzling case. In conversation with me, last evening, he expressed discouragement in the matter, and I remarked that if he could manage to enlist your services I was sure his difficulties would soon vanish. I then told him of your masterly detective abilities and of the clever manner in which you cleared up the mystery of Colonel Cresswell's death, and nothing would do but I must bring him to you. I know that I am trespassing very greatly upon your good nature, but I hope you will be kind enough to help Mr. Gray, and I think you will be interested in the problem."

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Professor Gilman was a great man in the scientific world, but he was only human, and his vanity was tickled by the reference to the Cresswell case. He had taken that affair in hand when the detectives were quite puzzled, simply because Clifford—the son of an old friend—was pecuniarily concerned in it, and he had solved the problem with surprising rapidity.

He now announced his willingness to assist Mr. Gray, if possible, and a few minutes later the three were seated in the library and Gray was giving particulars of the case.

"This is a case of robbery," began the detective, "the theft of some very valuable diamonds—at least, the jewels have disappeared; and there is every reason to suppose they were stolen. The robbery occurred at the house of a wealthy gentleman named Hilton, in Crown Street. It was first noticed that the diamonds were missing about a week ago. Four stones were missing altogether; one large and very valuable one, which formed the centre of a breast-pin, two lesser, but still costly ones, which were set as pendants in ear-rings, and a fourth, still smaller, which was set in a ring. This fourth stone, and the settings of all of them, have been discovered, but the most diligent search has failed to reveal the whereabouts of the other gems.

"When I took charge of the case, the facts which the owners of the jewels were able to give me were of the most meagre kind. Summed up, they amounted to little more than that the things had disappeared, that there was no evidence of burglars having entered the house, and that, consequently, some one of the servants must have taken them. It transpired that the mistress of the house was very careless about her jewels, that she was in the habit of leaving them in an unlocked jewel case on her dressing-table; sometimes, so her husband averred, she did not take the trouble to even put them in the jewel case, but left them stuck upon a pin-cushion or in some other equally tempting position. Moreover, when she was out in the afternoon or evening, the door of her room was seldom locked; and it would have been the easiest thing in the world for any of the servants to slip into the room, gather up whatever treasures might be lying about, and slip out again without anybody being the wiser. One servant could do it as easily as another. Angie, Mrs. Hilton's maid, would, of course, have a better opportunity than the others. But she is a woman in whom Mrs. Hilton puts implicit trust.

"The first thing I did was to institute a very thorough search throughout all the rooms in the house. Angie, the maid, was not only willing, but eager to have her room and all her belongings searched. People with reputations for honesty sometimes succumb to temptation, therefore, we did not make less thorough search in Angie's room, because of her mistress's faith in her. But we found nothing in her room.

"The other servants included a butler, a French male cook, a scullery maid, and a housemaid. I instituted, apparently with the greatest willingness on the part of each, just as rigid a search in their respective rooms as I had done in Angie's. The result in each case was the same. The missing jewels were nowhere to be found.

"I was not alone in prosecuting the search. The servants, who all knew of the missing stones before I took up the case, were searching, one and all, for the lost jewels. With all the servants cognizant of the loss, and consequently more on their guard against suspicion, my difficulties were multiplied, as you can imagine.

"On the second day after the loss was discovered, François, the French cook, brought me the gold settings of the ring, pin, and ear-rings.

"He had found them in the rubbish box in the yard behind the house—at least, he said so. But the diamonds were still missing.

"Well, I felt convinced that the guilty person was someone in the house; presumably one of the servants, as there was no reason to suspect that Mr. Hilton would steal them from his wife, or that their daughter, Maud, a girl of fifteen, would steal them from her mother. From the list of possible guilty ones I was disposed to leave out also the maid, Angie. This left the cook; Kitson, the butler; Mary, the scullery maid; and Jane, the housemaid.

"The fact that François found the settings may be counted either for or against him, as one views the case; it may have been a genuine discovery or a mere "blind." There is, however, more damaging evidence against him.

"In searching through those portions of the house over which François presided, I was not forgetful of the case in which a chef concealed some stolen diamonds in a loaf of bread, and I was on the look out for all sorts of odd places where these jewels might possibly be hidden. But the diamonds were not concealed in eatables of any kind; for we subjected everything of that nature to the most searching examination. However, this line of search resulted indirectly in the finding of one of the missing jewels—the smallest.

"Kitson, having witnessed some of the odd places and things that had been so carefully examined by me, said jestingly to the cook: 'François, I think you must have those diamonds in that bottle of wine which you are so careful about.' Then turning to me, the butler said: 'François has a bottle of rare vintage, which is his very own, and I don't know how many years old. He takes a little sip of it now and then, but he won't let any of us look at it hardly.'

"'Ah,' I said, 'suppose we look at the bottle.'

"François brought it with great cheerfulness, and hospitably invited me to take a sip. The bottle was about half full, and the glass being clear, I could easily see, by turning it on its side and revolving it slowly, that the diamonds were not in the wine.

"I was about to return it to François, when I bethought me of the cork. Extracting it from the bottle, I scrutinised it carefully, and fancied I could see a faint line, as if the cork had been slit part of the way up and then glued together again. Taking my penknife, I cut the cork in two parts, and lo! reposing snugly in a little hollow in the centre, was the smallest of the missing diamonds.

"François stared, turned pale, and began to protest his utter ignorance as to how the diamond got into that cork. Kitson came bravely to the cook's defence, and said emphatically that he didn't believe François was guilty in spite of the evidence against him. He thought it was 'a put up job,' the work of someone who had a grudge against him.

"Well, there isn't a cork in all that house now that has not been cut in two—or a dozen—parts; but the other three diamonds are still undiscovered. Their whereabouts is a complete mystery. Of course, it looks black for François; but I am not yet convinced that he is guilty. He continues to earnestly protest his innocence, and Kitson stands by him unfalteringly. Every place that I can think of where François could possibly conceal the other diamonds has been most carefully searched. But the result has always been the same. I believe the diamonds must be concealed somewhere in that house, but where is beyond my comprehension. I am at my wit's end in the matter."

Digitized by Google

"And you want to splice my wits on to where yours end? Is that it?" inquired Professor Gilman.

"Yes; that expresses it very well."

The professor sat musing for a moment. Whether this particular case interested him, or whether his appetite for solving difficult problems had been whetted by his success in the Cresswell case, I am unable to say. I have only to report the fact that before sixty seconds had elapsed after the last words of the detective, Professor Gilman said:

"Very well, I will see what I can do. Let us take a cab, and go up to the house in Crown Street."

Lieutenant Clifford, having other duties, left the professor and the detective, and they proceeded to the house together.

Arrived at the Hilton House, Mr. Gray and the professor entered, and the latter asked to be permitted to see the room from which the jewels had been taken. His examination of the room was only cursory, his object being to note its relative position to other rooms in the house, and the ease or difficulty with which it might be reached from the servants' quarters. Then he said he would like to go down to the kitchen.

The finding of the diamond in the cork of the wine bottle had been regarded as sufficient evidence against François to warrant his being detained by the police, and in place of the Frenchman there was now installed a portly female cook, of not uncomely face and figure, to whom Kitson had already begun to make love in a mild fashion.

Kitson had a large flat face and small eyes. The professor cast one of his keen glances at him, then favoured each of the other servants in the same way, and after that seemingly took little notice of them. He suggested to Mr. Gray, somewhat to the latter's surprise, that he ask the servants to help him in the search. The professor made a rather careful examination of the kitchen and the adjacent rooms, propounding an occasional question to the detective. Kitson and the other servants, unaware who the distinguished man was, indulged in some scarcely-concealed merriment at the professor's participation in the case.

After looking about for half an hour, some of the time in what seemed like purposeless fashion, the professor, in a low tone, said to the detective:

"Now, I want you to get these servants away from me—all but the new cook; she's busy about her cooking, and will not mind me, nor I her. The others will follow you easily enough. They're not afraid of me, and they are of you. Ask Kitson and the others to help you look for the diamonds up on the second floor. You've looked there before, but never mind. They'll think you suppose you may have overlooked some place."

The professor was in the scullery in the basement, when he said this, and he stayed there with pretence of poking about while the detective, Kitson, and the maid left and ascended to the rooms on the second floor. Then the professor went out into a back passage which he had a few minutes before been searching. Here his eyes rested eagerly on a row of iron hooks against the wooden partition.

On one of the hooks hung a faded and somewhat worn coat. This the professor took off its hook, and began making a thorough examination of the various pockets. About the only thing he found in the pockets was a soiled envelope which had passed through the post. The professor read the name on the envelope, and then returned it to the pocket. He did not return the coat to the hook until he had felt all along where the lining was sewed to the material. Had there been anything as large as one of the missing diamonds concealed within the lining or in any of the pockets, he would certainly have found it. But he found nothing, and after hanging the coat back on the hook he stood with a perplexed look on his face.

After pondering a little while his face brightened suddenly, and he went down into the kitchen once more. In his previous search there he had noticed a screwdriver among other tools in a box. Securing this, he returned to the passage.

A quarter of an hour later the professor appeared in the room where the detective and the others were searching. For a few minutes or so he joined in the search, and then he remarked that there was no use searching in this blind fashion, and suggested to Gray that they had better give it up for a while and take a walk.

The butler let them out at the front door, casting a rather derisive smile after the professor as he descended the steps.

"Well," the detective said, after they had walked a short distance, "have you formed any opinion as to who is the guilty party or as to where the jewels are?"

"Yes," replied the professor. "I may say that I formed an opinion about the thief before I came to the house, and after I reached there I verified it. Kitson is the guilty man."

"Kitson!"

"Yes. And as to the jewels——"

"You think you know where the diamonds are?"

"Yes, I'm sure I do. I've got them in my hand!"

And the professor unfolded a piece of crumpled paper and exposed to the detective's astonished gaze the three missing diamonds.

The professor enjoyed the detective's astonishment for a moment, and then said:

"Listen. I will tell you how I came to find them so quickly. When you told me how the smaller of the missing stones was found in the cork I at once thought, 'That proves the cook's innocence rather than confirms his guilt. If he had known the diamond was concealed in the cork, he would certainly have substituted another before bringing the bottle to you. He would have taken no risk.' That he didn't, I say, is proof that he didn't know it was concealed there. But somebody, of course, did know it. And who was this person? Naturally, the one who suggested looking there; and Kitson was that person. It's simple enough, isn't it?"

"Yes," returned the detective. "Of course, I have thought Kitson might be the guilty person, and the fact that he suggested examining the wine bottle is against him. The thought isn't new; it occurred to me at the time. But the manful way in which he defended François staggered me. If he wanted to cast suspicion on him, it seemed to me he wouldn't be the first to defend him."

"That's where the man's cunning comes in. His cunning isn't of a specially high order; still, he has considerable of it such as it is, and he doubtless thought that if he could once get suspicion definitely directed towards François he could very well afford to defend him—first, because such defence would count for but little for François, and second, because it would have the effect of lessening suspicion against himself provided any were disposed to suspect him on account of his suggestion that the bottle be examined. Kitson wasn't really wise in the matter, else he would have put all the diamonds in one place and made no attempt to cast suspicion on another, but simply taken his chance with the rest. Had he been wiser he would have reflected that when a guilty man is confronted with proof of his guilt, nine times out of ten he will falter and confess. He, of course, knew that when the diamonds should be found in the cork François could not confess and tell where the other stolen diamonds were, for the good reason that he didn't know.

Digitized by Google

"Kitson should, therefore, have known that when a detective, familiar with this principle in crime, saw that François failed to confess, the finding of the diamond in his bottle would tend rather to remove suspicion than to cast it upon him.

"I reasoned thus, at all events, and I entered upon the task of hunting for these diamonds, reasonably certain that François was not the thief, and equally confident that Kitson was, because he was the person to throw out the hint about the wine bottle. Perhaps you will inquire why he selected François as the person upon whom suspicion should be cast—what animus prompted that particular selection? I can't tell you. There may have been jealousies; I haven't inquired.

"Convinced in my mind of Kitson's guilt, when I arrived at the house and began a search in his presence I did a very simple and natural thing—I watched him. I didn't seem to, it is true, and I suppose he has no idea that I did. In fact, I think he summed me up as a harmless and rather brainless old man—one of whom he need have little fear. While I was searching, and seeming not to notice him, I kept my eye constantly upon him, noting the slightest changes of expression on his face. If the diamonds were concealed anywhere about the house I believed that so long as I had Kitson with me I could tell when it was 'getting hot,' as children say when they play 'hide and seek.' That was why I wanted him with me in the search. I proposed to make him tell me, not by words but by his face, where the diamonds were hidden. And I made him do it, though he doesn't suspect it yet.

"I could see, when we were searching in the kitchen, that he was unconcerned and quite easy in mind. But when we came into that passage there came upon the face of my man the very expression I was looking for.

"It wasn't a marked change of expression. Not at all. It was a change to be felt rather than seen, if I may so state it. It was as if his own growing trepidation of spirit on approaching near to the hiding-place of the gems, his own vague apprehensions that, after all, the hiding-place was not secure, were subtly communicable to me. It was thus I read him, and I said to myself as we went into the passage: 'It is indeed, getting hot. In another moment he will tell me where the diamonds are hidden.' And he did. He cast one quick, apprehensive glance at the wall where an old coat hung upon a hook, and I said to myself, 'Now, Kitson, you can go; I have no further need of you.'

"I made a pretence of searching further, until Kitson's apprehensions were quieted and I could say a word to you. Then, after you had all left me, I returned to the passage. 'He's a bolder man than I thought,' I said to myself, as I took the coat from the hook and began to search pockets and lining. Yes, sir, I actually thought, at first, that he had counted on the very boldness of such a course misleading people—that no one would subject an old coat hanging up in such a conspicuous place to a thorough examination, and therefore, that the diamonds might safely be hidden in the lining. Such an act would have been folly or genius, according to how it resulted. But Kitson's genius was not of that bold order. I did not find in the coat what I was looking for, and when I had fully assured myself that no diamonds were concealed in it, I thought, 'Is it possible I was mistaken in Kitson's look? If I was, then I am at sea, and may as well give up.' But I did not really believe I was mistaken.

"I pondered a little, and then the idea which should have come to me first, flashed upon me. Getting a screw-driver, I removed the screws that held in place the iron hook on which the coat hung, and snugly ensconced in a little hole behind the hook, I found, wrapped in a piece of paper, the things I was looking for. I secured the hook in its original position once more, and Kitson still fancies the diamonds are safe. Now let us go back to the house and inform our cunning butler that his booty has taken wings."

"Professor," said the detective admiringly, "pardon the expression, but you are a gem!"

The professor smiled.

"But," continued the detective, "Kitson will deny all knowledge of how the diamonds came there. How are you going to prove his connection with them?"

"Patience!" returned the professor.

Kitson met them at the door, and seemed a little surprised at their early return.

"Kitson," said the professor, without any preliminary beating about the bush, "we have found the stolen diamonds, and we know that you are the thief. You may as well acknowledge it first as last."

The butler's face grew red with rage, and his small eyes looked hatred at the professor.

"You lie, you old idiot, and you know it!" he cried. "You come poking about here, and then accuse a respectable man of being a thief. It's my belief that you, and this other smooth-faced scoundrel!"—with a glance at the detective—"know a good deal more about them stolen goods than you've told."

"It's true; we do," the professor said blandly. "And it's our purpose now to tell what we know. You stole the diamonds, threw away the settings, placed the least valuable one in Francois' bottle in a mean attempt to cast suspicion on him, and then concealed the others behind a hook in the passage downstairs."

"You lie!" shouted Kitson, but his face blanched.

"Steady!" said the professor. "When you hid the diamonds you forgot that you were hiding with them convincing evidence against yourself. It wasn't shrewd of you to roll the diamonds up in an old envelope that was addressed to you," and the professor produced a little parcel. Unfolding it, he displayed the diamonds to Kitson, and held up to his gaze the paper from which he had just unrolled them. It was the old envelope which Professor Gilman had found in the coat hanging upon the hook. It was addressed to "Mr. J. Kitson."

Kitson stared dumfounded. Then he found his voice.

"I didn't wrap them in that paper. I wouldn't be such a fool!"

"What did you use?—a piece of newspaper?" inquired the professor innocently.

"Yes; I was very particular not to take anything that would—" then he stopped abruptly.

"Well, it's unimportant what paper you used," the professor said, with a cold smile, "since you admit using some. Mr. Gray," turning to the detective, "I will leave this man for you to deal with now. I must go and finish my lecture."

James Perry.

Digitized by Google

Born of a Tear.

In bygone ages, and in a distant land, there once lived an old king and bard, who was wont to sing a beautiful poem as he sat on the shore of the murmuring sea. His own tones impressed him so deeply that he would weep, and the tears, rolling down his cheeks, fell into the waves below, where they were changed into pearls.

About three hundred years ago it came to pass that a fisherman found in his nets one of these beautiful pearls, shaped like a heart, and the Doge of Venice presented it to Her Excellency Centarina Centarini, the wife of one of the lords of the Republic.

In spite of youth, wealth, and beauty, Centarina was not happy, for, in the third year of her married life, she had lost her only child. Twelve anniversaries had come and gone since that fatal day, and neither she nor her husband dared hope that Heaven would send them another treasure in place of the little dead girl.

One day, as Centarina was stepping out of her gondola to attend a sermon at the Church of San Zanipola, a poor old woman, followed by two lean and ragged urchins, begged her for a little alms in very pathetic tones. Centarina handed her a sequin, which the beggar received with an outburst of gratitude, crying:

"May Heaven bless your excellency, you, and your children! May the Holy Madonna fill you with joy!"

The fair Venetian was somewhat affected by these words as she entered the church, where a monk was preaching on education. He illustrated his discourse by the story of the Roman matron, Cornelia, who had said of her sons:

"These are my jewels!"

"Ah," thought Centarina, "If only I still had my precious child instead of the costly pearl the Doge has given me!"

After the sermon, as she was returning to the palace of the Madonna dell'Orto, she fell asleep in her gondola, and thought she heard a voice utter the strange words:

"If you do not wish to lose her, beware of poetry and of music!"

She awoke with a start, bewildered by her dream, and filled with an unaccountable anxiety. On reaching her palace an unusual disturbance was the greeting that awaited her, caused by a dispute among the servants, who ran towards her, all talking at the same time, each accusing the other of having left the front door open. Some person, they said, must have entered the palace stealthily with a small child, whose cries were even now plainly audible, and who had been discovered in her excellency's private apartments, nestling in the silver crib that had been empty for twelve years.

Centarina would listen to no more explanations, and, waving off the domestics with an imperious gesture, she flew to her room.

There in the silver cradle lay a baby, white as marble, with eyes like the waves of the ocean, and who, on seeing Centarina, instantly ceased wailing, and stretched out its little arms in confiding, trustful innocence. Centarina ran to her jewel-case. It was open, and the famous pearl of the Doge had disappeared! And she understood that the Almighty had read the desire of her heart, and had granted the prayer of the old beggar woman on the church steps.

Wild with joy, she snatched up the child, dressed it in the clothes of the dear departed one, and sent for her husband, to whom she confessed all—the lucky omen, her prayer, and the miracle that had befallen her. His Excellency Giovanni Centarini replied that probably a thief had carried off the gem and forsaken the child; but his wife seemed to find so much happiness with her new treasure that he gladly adopted the little one, naming it Margherita, whose saint's day it happened to be.

When the child commenced to talk she persisted in calling herself Malgari, till at length everyone adopted that curious appellation. Malgari grew rapidly, and would have been the loveliest child in Venice but for her extreme and strange pallor. The servants of Centarina's household and the Venetian ladies who were jealous of the child's good fortune maintained that this pallor was the certain sign of a base origin: but her features were so noble, so delicate, her voice so harmonious and gentle, that such insinuations became ridiculous.

She was ever bright and happy, flitting through the palace like a ray of sunshine, while her silvery peals of laughter resounded everywhere in bird-like, merry trills. But when, perchance, she overheard a rough or unkind word, or witnessed an act of brutality, if a story of pain or poverty were told before her, if her father and mother disagreed on some trifling subject, and, above all, if a falsehood was uttered in her presence, Malgari became strangely melancholy and silent.

She was about four years old when, one summer's night, a barge floated by the palace on the canal of the Madonna dell'Orto, bearing a singer, who accompanied himself on the guitar. Malgari, who was sleeping with her mother, awoke, slipped out of bed, crept to the window, and stood there motionless, listening intently to the sweet strains until they died away in the direction of San Arloris, when she fell fainting to the ground.

On regaining consciousness in her mother's arms she begged to return to the window where she had heard those lovely strains of music.

For three days and three nights the child was a prey to a violent fever, and in her delirium insisted that some one was calling her, that she wanted to go away, that she was not a Venetian, and embracing the poor distracted Centarina, she pleaded: "Mother, take me away! Take me away!"

Digitized by Google

Centarina then rememembered the words she had heard in her dream, and, convinced that in Venice it would be out of the question to keep Malgari deprived of music or of songs, she asked her husband to start for Syra, a small island of the Greek Archipelago, where she owned a palace hidden in a grove of olives, oleanders, and orange trees, right by the sea coast. The only inhabitants of the island were some gardeners and others in the employ of the family.

His Excellency Giovanni Centarini told her she was foolish, and that he could not leave Venice under any consideration. But his wife had her own way, as wives ever will, and started off alone with the child.

The small population of Syra suddenly received the order to give up all musical instruments and songs—even the church bells became silent; for, on the evening of Malgari's arrival, at the hour of vespers, the child had been greatly perturbed by the gentle chimes mingling with the roar of the wind and of the waves. Her illness seemed to have carried away with it her former joyous disposition. She seldom played, and laughed more seldom still; but found great comfort in the companionship of the sea, to whose mysterious and fascinating voice she would listen for hours at a time.

As she grew older a great thirst for knowledge manifested itself, and the library of the palace was a true paradise to her curious mind. There her mother found her one day, devouring a volume of Tasso, betraying her emotion in her gleaming eyes and feverish pulse. Centarina lost no time in having all the books taken down and burnt then and there, notwithstanding Malgari's distress.

Giovanni Centarini came to Syra but twice a year, and then only for a few days. At first he had been greatly annoyed by what he called his wife's folly, to which, however, he finally submitted, seeing it was useless to argue with her. Malgari suffered in secret for the estrangement between her parents, and more than once she had begged her mother to resume their former life at the Palace dell'Orto; for, being ignorant of her mysterious origin, she considered their flight from Venice as the humouring of a sick child's fancy. But Centarina had implored her with so many caresses—nay, even tears—not to insist, that the subject was dropped, and life in Syra went on as before.

Malgari was about thirteen years old when a dismissed servant revealed to her, out of spite and vengeance, in what manner she had entered the Centarina household, and how she had been brought by some thief or vagabond. Malgari shuddered, and turned whiter than a pearl, but all she could say was:

"I forgive you."

She hastened to her mother and requested, with the serious firmness of a young queen, to hear the true story in all its details. And, trembling with emotion, Centarina related the beautiful mystery, making the child's lovely pale face light up with heavenly flame, like the first timid streaks of rosy dawn.

"Yes, mother," she murmured, "I feel I am not a vagabond's daughter. I know I must be the pearl, but do not speak of it to anyone—not even to the air that will not turn me yellow—nor to the sea that will never take me back into its cold arms."

And embracing her tenderly, Malgari whispered:

"I should like to return to Venice!"

Towards evening the girl wandered along the seashore until she came to a small creek between some dark rocks, where the waters splashed gently on the fine golden sand.

Malgari's heart swelled with a powerful adoration for her friend the sea, as she stretched herself along the very edge of the water that came to caress her feet and her locks. And the waves were so warm, so tender, so soothing, that in a low, soft tone Malgari began to talk to them, evoking her primitive existence when she was a pearl, opening her heart to the dear motherly waves and begging them to give her once more the sweet, overwhelming joy that had swept over her, one night in Venice, years ago, and again another time while she had been reading the immortal story of Clorinda and Tancredo.

Softly, gently the waves answered, and in their consoling tenderness Malgari felt the magic thrill of her two joys, with the promise of a yet greater happiness to come.

Was she awake or dreaming? The sky was growing dark, but yonder, at the horizon, innumerable silvery lights were rapidly moving towards her. And presently in each one of these lights she could distinguish a human form—fair and dark haired girls swimming in the phosphorescent waters, waving their small hands, that shed a shower of sparks all about them. They did not enter the creek, but passed swiftly before Malgari's enraptured eyes, and their brightness suddenly illuminated the surrounding cliffs, the coast and the woods beyond.

As they swam by, each head turned to gaze at the girl, but not one of these apparitions approached her, until the last of the group, dropping off from her companions, turned into the creek, and stopped at a short distance from the shore.

"Who are you?" asked Malgari.

"Sea nymphs," was the answer.

"Sea nymphs! Oh! then surely you can foretell the future? Won't you tell me mine?"

The little sea nymph looked at her for a moment and said:

"You were born of poetry and of music, and of them you will die."

She had a delicate, childish face, but her eyes were beautiful, deep, and mournful.

"How lovely you are!" said Malgari. "Come and kiss me."

"I dare not. Sea nymphs must never touch the shore."

"Shall we ever meet again?"

"I belong to the sea," sadly answered the dark-haired apparition, "and you are of Heaven."

Without a word of farewell she quickly sank into the water and disappeared on the other side of the rock. Malgari returned to the palace, but did not speak of her encounter, even to her mother.

From that day she ceased to smile, and became even more gentle and more pious. She brought help and consolation to every sufferer on the island. She entered into the dwellings and into the hearts of these poor people, and dwellings as well as hearts were resplendent with her radiance. Many a time in the mild evening hours she returned to her favourite spot between the rocks, but the sea nymphs came no more.

At fifteen, Malgari's beauty and development were those of a woman, and Centarina wondered if it were not time to look out for a suitable match. Giovanni Centarini had not visited them for two years, but his letters arrived at regular intervals, when the vessel Dei Borsari, of the Rialto merchants, stopped at Syra on its way to Smyrna. One day, instead of the accustomed missive, came the news that a severe epidemic had broken out in Venice. Centarina was terrified at the thought of her husband's peril, and of her own remorse if he were to fall a victim to the plague during her absence, but her terror increased ten-fold when Malgari declared, in resolute yet gentle tones, that it was their duty to return to Venice without delay.

Digitized by Google

A fortnight later the two women entered their palace, where Giovanni Centarini had breathed his last a few hours before their arrival.

When Centarina's first outbursts of demonstrative grief had somewhat subsided, she suggested that they should leave the city where nought could detain them. Malgari, who had neither wept nor grieved outwardly, replied, that as their father and husband had died in solitude, the sin lay on their shoulders, and had to be atoned for. She had resolved, moreover, to devote herself entirely to the sick of Venice, and to set to work without delay.

The wretched people, who had been forsaken by their nearest relatives—so great was the panic—were left to suffer and die in the streets. Malgari, with her mystic beauty, gentle voice, and skilful hands, that scorned no kind of work, became the ministering angel of rich and poor, who prayed to her and blessed her, calling her La Madonna dell 'Orto.

Among the sufferers stricken by the plague was a young foreign musician, who had come from some northern clime to study his art in the land of the beautiful—a poor, noble, fair youth, whose gratitude, for Malgari's gentle care soon blossomed into a more tender feeling. But the confession that trembled on his lips never found shape in words, for Malgari, with a woman's infallible intuition, had divined his secret, and, deeming that this was not the proper time to speak of love and happiness in the midst of death and suffering, suddenly discontinued her charitable visits.

The Senate loaded her with honours—the Doge did more; he asked her to become his wife. Centarina, in spite of a hundred secret forebodings, in spite of Malgari's cold resistance, was of opinion that one could not refuse a Doge. Still, the girl did refuse him, and, out of mischief, promised to reconsider the matter if the ruler of the Republic consented to give a dowry to all the poor girls of Venice, and to provide for all the beggars. She further demanded that the "Campanile" of the Piazza San Marco be taken down, for she hated it, and if all this were done she would accept his suit.

The Doge readily complied with the first two requests, and pledged himself to fulfil the latter three years after his marriage. Malgari suffered at the thought that her refusal would deprive so many human beings of food, shelter, and happiness, but she still hesitated. Not for long, however. This new sacrifice presented itself as a duty, and as such she accepted it.

At Malgari's request, the nuptials were to be celebrated at the palace on the island of Syra, and, accordingly, the affianced couple left Venice on two of the Republic's vessels, accompanied by their parents, friends, and domestics.

One night, when all on board was still, and the full August moon was shedding its brilliant light on the trembling waters, Malgari, unable to resist the serene glory of the Mediterranean enchantress, crept noiselessly on deck, and was soon lost in admiration. How long she had been listening to the music of the beloved waves she knew not, but she suddenly looked up, and noticed a sailor, who seemed desirous of approaching her, without daring to do so.

Malgari very graciously dispelled his timidity, and soon discovered that he was no other than the foreign youth she had nursed during the plague. This unexpected encounter affected her very deeply, and as she listened to his words of gratitude, for the first time in her life a faint colour stole like a shadow across her pale face. She did not question him as to how he happened to be on the vessel in a sailor's disguise, but made him speak of his native land, and of his life there.

It was some distant country far up in the north, round which a wild sea dashed in summer, and huge blocks of ice floated in winter—a poor, desolate country made of rocks, lakes, and forests of birch trees that, in years of famine, were stripped of their bark to feed the starving people.

"It is a country poor in gold," concluded the youth, "but wealthy with the two most beautiful things on earth: music and poetry!"

Malgari started.

"What makes you say that?" she cried.

And he told her of an immortal poem that the people of this country still sing in the cold winter nights, seated round the cheerful blazing hearth, and in summer when meadows are green and the blue lakes dotted with flowers. It was a poem of love and hate, of strife and peace, of joy and sorrow.

And at last he told her the story of a grand and glorious old man, who was a poet and a king, whose tears falling into the ocean were changed into pearls.

Malgari gazed at the speaker, bathed in moonlight. She listened to the narrative with dilated eyes, clasping her hands on her throbbing heart that was ready to burst with love and anguish.

"Why," she murmured, "Oh, why have I not met you before this?"

Suddenly realising the import of her speech, she turned from him, and sat silently gazing at the waves.

But what was that? There, at the horizon, appeared the floating silvery light, and with it the heads of the sea nymphs. Malgari thought she recognised her own particular maiden in the group.

"Sing," she said to the youth, "sing me the song of the old poet."

When he had brought his instrument, an Italian violin, she concealed herself in a remote corner of the vessel, saying she did not wish to be seen if any one of the party came to look for her. And the stranger sang, putting all the ardour of a patriotic soul into the most sublime strains of music that mortal ears ever listened to. The dolphins, fascinated by his inspired tones, followed the ship. In a few moments the entire deck was crowded with sailors and officers, lords and servants, who stood round him enraptured and entranced, while he sang on without heeding them.

Suddenly becoming aware of their presence, he broke off in some confusion, and rose to pay his respects to Malgari.

She had disappeared, and all he found was her handkerchief steeped in tears. Had she thrown herself into the sea to escape becoming the wife of the Doge? This was the surmise of the dull, senseless crowd.

Poor Centarina died of a broken heart, thinking that her adopted daughter, changed into a pearl, had returned into the mysterious depths of the sea.

But we know better. If nothing was left of Malgari but a handkerchief wet with tears, we know that the pearl had been made of the tears and of the soul of a great poet—we remember the melancholy words of the little sea nymph:

"I belong to the ocean and you to Heaven."

ANTONIO FAGAZZARO.

Digitized by Google

FOR HIS MOTHER.

HE first appeared, one cold autumnal day, on our front porch, clothed in rags, with an air of deprecating apology for living, and a wistful roll in his pale blue eyes.

"You ain't got no food to spare, 'ave you?" he remarked in insidious accents, shifting from one bare foot to the other. "Mother's a little way down the road there, and she ain't had nothin' she seemed to fancy to eat lately. But I think a little milk would tempt her. I seed a cow walkin' round here just now, and I thought if she could drink some milk and eat a little somethin', she might feel better. But mother ain't what she used to be. She ain't took much notice of things lately; she don't seem to care for nothin'. Ain't never seen her carry on so."

"Where is your mother?" I asked, interrupting the flow of his confidences. "Are you tramping—er—on foot?"

"Yes-m," he answered, with a sudden change of tone from extreme despondency to one of cheerful alacrity that was quite startling; "yes, we're walking about now, 'cos we was burnt out a little while ago. I say, ain't it pretty country about here?" he added, with the air of a man who is making a tour with every convenience and luxury, and has plenty of leisure time to devote to scenery.

"Mother used to be fond of looking at the fields and the trees and the 'ills before she went blind. I like 'em myself. But she didn't stir out much lately; she just set still in the house, and did the bit of cookin' and tidyin' up there was to be done, before she lost her sight, and after that I waited on her."

"What is your name?" I asked, interested in this strange specimen of humanity.

"My name's Jawn," he answered promptly; "Jawn Bradford. I was christened that, and have allus been called Jawn, so I s'pose it's my name. Never been called anythin' else."

"Well, John," I replied, "if you will come into the kitchen, I will give you some milk for your mother, and we will see what else we can find for her."

John followed me in a brisk but awkward shamble to the back regions, where he was soon made happy by sundry donations in the gastronomic line, which he proceeded to do up in remarkable and pathetic haste.

In fact, he was already departing when I called him back, and suggested his eating something himself before leaving.

"I'll be back here again directly," he remarked in a confidential aside. "I'll just take these things over to mother, and empty out the milk and bring you back the tin can. Yes," he continued, regarding that article with lingering affection, "a tin like this would come handy." Then in a tone of naive reflection: "I don't know as I have a tin to fetch things in, our things were mostly burnt up. Well! A good evenin' to you!" he concluded, with that sudden hilarity of tone which had amused me before, and off he went.

Would he come back, or was it the last of a passing tramp? I wondered, as I turned back to the house with a half qualm as to what Sarah would say when she discovered that one of her kitchen utensils had disappeared, permanently, no doubt.

But I was doing "Jawn" an injustice. The sun was just dipping below the horizon when he returned, bearing the tin can and wearing an expansive smile.

"Mother had a good drink of the milk," he assured me. He also informed me that he had found an old dilapidated cottage in the wood where they purposed to spend the night, and "if mother was feelin' better in the mornin'," he would come over and help me, "if I wanted a job done." To which I assented, and after seeing that he had some supper given him by Sarah, I further braved her displeasure by presenting him with the tin can for which his soul pined.

"Come in!" said a quavering old voice in response to my knock the following morning on the door of a dilapidated cottage buried in the heart of a wood not far from our house.

I entered quickly, the wind slamming the door behind me with angry violence. It was so dark inside that for a moment I could distinguish nothing but a bent form huddled over a little fire of sticks that flickered feebly on the old disused hearth.

The floor was rotten and gave under my foot as I stepped forward and greeted the old crone, who was mumbling to herself there. A sudden flame leapt up and disclosed a countenance mummified by age, and hardly human in its withered aspect. One shrivelled hand grasped a stick on which she leant, and her sightless orbs seemed to gaze at you from out of an illimitable past of suffering and privation. Why, she must have been over a hundred!

Her reply to my inquiry concerning her health was almost unintelligible, but I gathered that she was feeling "bad," though not as poorly as she had been.

Thinking that deeds, not words, would be more to the point, I looked round for something to feed the fire with, and discovered some wood in one corner which John had probably brought in overnight. I soon had a good fire for the poor old creature, who could feel the warmth but not see the cheerful blaze.

The bright flames, which now danced up the chimney, revealed the interior of the hovel in all its dilapidation. Cobwebs hung from the rafters, and a small opening in the wall, stuffed up with rags, was the only indication of a window. It had in former years been used by a keeper, but had long been left to decay.

And the central figure! Barely human—a mere animated bundle of dried skin and bone, crouching in the chimney-corner, and crooning to herself. It was appalling, and I confess to a start when the door opened suddenly to admit, not ghost or goblin, but "Jawn," who came staggering in with a huge bundle of firewood, flooding the hovel for a brief moment with sunshine.

"I've got plenty of wood, that's something" he exclaimed, with the delighted accents of a child that has made a discovery. "I seed you comin' across the fields, and stopped to pick up a little more. It takes a lot of wood to keep mother warm. But she's been sleepin' under the 'edges and in sheds lately, and she's got chilled inside I expect."

Digitized by Google

"I should think so!" I exclaimed faintly. "But I am afraid, John," I continued, "that you won't be able to stay here. I don't know whether you will be allowed to stop, though perhaps I could manage that. But it's so—so bad. We must find you a better lodging than this. It is all falling to pieces."

John rose from stirring the fire, with an air of slightly dampened complacency.

"It does want a little doing to," he remarked with reluctance, "and a winder in it, too. But I can make it do, if they would let us stop. Can't you get 'em to let us stop? Soon as I got mother comfortable, I could begin on it. An' I've got a few cooking things," he added, with a delightful irrelevance. "Had 'em given me round about. If I can ketch a few rabbits about here mother can have 'em for her supper. He—he—he!" and he laughed his queer laugh.

The old creature by the fire stirred at the sound, and worked her mouth round in a very suggestive manner, disclosing a single fang of a tooth in the operation which heightened her witch-like appearance.

"She knows what you're sayin'," John chuckled, jerking his thumb towards her. "She'll be worrying me about that rabbit now till I git one. If I had a trap I could set it to-night."

"I think there is one at home, John. Come over to-day and cut some wood," I remarked, not considering the legality of the matter, "and you can bring back a few things that will make you more comfortable."

"Good-bye, Mrs. Bradford, I am going to send you something I think you will relish for your tea to-night," was all I could find to say, a little later, as I took my leave of this poor remnant of humanity, storm-beaten and buffeted in life's tempest, anchored now for a brief space in a haven that most of us would shudder at and condemn.

Our acquaintance with "Jawn" ripened very quickly, and hardly a day passed that he didn't turn up to do some work. Having held a family conclave on the subject of the Bradfords, and finding that we could easily arrange for them to stay in their present quarters, which John thought a good deal of, a carpenter was sent to mend the floor, stop up the cracks, put glass in the window, and generally patch up the cottage, which only contained two rooms.

I learnt that Mrs. Bradford had refused to go into the workhouse, and that John, poor, simple John, had energetically supported this decision. They had lived somehow until three weeks before I saw them, when their cottage had caught fire. The parish refused further outdoor relief in order to force her to go into the county asylum, and they had set out on a tramp for another home.

The delight of John over these arrangements was perfectly unbounded.

"Why, we're goin' to be just like other people!" he exclaimed with unconscious pathos, when next I saw him. "I've got some shelves put up in the kitchen there, and the chiny your ma give me a-settin' on them. Mother, she went round and felt all the pans and things, and she just laffed! I ain't heard her laff for ever so long," he continued reflectively.

The winter came on quickly, and set in very severe that year. We saw John less frequently, though we heard that he was able to get enough work to keep him going. The old woman, though, from little things that escaped him when he did come, was evidently getting feebler, and as her age was getting buried in the mists of antiquity, it was not to be expected that she could live much longer. That this idea had dawned upon John we finally discovered, though no actual admission of the fact ever escaped him. To keep her alive by every means in his power, to work, beg, borrow, do everything but steal, which he never did, even in his hour of greatest need, was the one thought that possessed him.

Some intensely cold weather made it hard to get about, and we saw nothing of our protégés for some time. Then one night came a heavy snowstorm, and, becoming anxious as to their condition, we decided next day to brave the elements and go and see them. So, in goloshes and an Arctic outfit generally, we made our way across the fields to the little cottage.

As we neared the door, deep groans and convulsive sobs told their own tale. The feeble flicker of life had gone out with the storm, and in the darkness of the winter night the soul of the old woman had fled. We could only be glad that a great human love had sustained her to the last.

After the funeral it was proposed that John should come and live with us and work on our farm, but nothing could induce him to leave a spot so full of associations.

"I seem to see her sittin' there in front of the fire," he would say, nodding his head slowly up and down. "It don't seem to be true for her not to be there."

But the impossible had happened to the poor fellow, and when the iron of that truth had fully entered into his soul it was the laying of the axe to the root of the tree.

A perfect dismemberment of his whole being seemed to take place. He would neither eat nor sleep. Nothing would comfort him and no argument could reach him. He would sit staring into vacancy by the hour, the house uncared for and the food which the neighbours brought him left untouched.

And when he did rouse himself sufficiently to take nourishment and go about his work once more, we all saw by the look in his face that the beginning of the end had come.

So the winter wore away and the spring was upon us, and "Jawn" grew more gaunt and wretched with each succeeding day of budding tree and blossom.

And when Nature had clothed herself in all the glory of her maturity his summons came, and mother and son were together once more.

FRANCIS WALKER.

Digitized by Google

The Tale of the Yellow War.

BY M. P. SHIEL.

Author of "The Man-Stealers," "Prince Zaleski," "Shapes in the Fire," "The Rajah's Sapphire," etc.

CHAPTER XXXI.

The Chinese Scream.

The French invasion was two-fold, one-quarter of the Italian Chinese crossing into the Gulf of Lyons to Cette by towed floats, and so along the canal from Cette, across the narrow part of France, to where the canal meets the Garonne near La Reole, and then to the Gironde and the Biscay coast. This horde, with half the French horde proper, making altogether twenty millions, were to be British.

So it happened that, while the French horde proper were pouring through Belgium by Verviers, Liège, Namur, and Charleroi, pressing towards the practically unfortified northern frontier of France between Maubeuge and Rocroy, at Hirson, five million Italian Chinese had already decimated the western sea-board, and had been organised into stores-collecting and barge, raft, lighter, and tug-collecting and constructing brigades.

All behind these two invading hordes what resistance there had been was over, with the exception of some half-dozen detached strongholds, whose garrisons were gradually yielding to famine; and everywhere to the east and north of France, again with some exceptions, was the unsparing pigtail. These exceptions were Hungary, Turkey, Lapland, and Finland. For in Europe, the Mongolian invaders found some twenty-seven millions of Mongolian inhabitants already there, and it was one of the purposes of that great inventor and consummate statesman, Yen How, that these should be left alive to form (the Hungarians especially) the nucleus of a new civilisation, which was to be neither like the old western, nor like the old eastern, and like nothing in the world save something which he, Yen, had quite definitely mapped out in his own wide space of brain.

The western sweep of the Yellow Wave had, in fact, been slightly swelled by some hundreds of thousands of European Turks and Magyars.

Near Charleroi was made what was practically the last battle-field stand of Continental Europe. The Elysée, with rash pride, had issued a manifesto to the people of France, inviting all who could not fly to give in their names as fighters at bureaux established in various quarters of various cities. To this call 200,000 French youths and old men responded, and an untrained army, of which the last residues of the Reserve of the Territorial Army formed the nucleus, set forth to hurl themselves upon the infinite.

It was computed that each fighting European destroyed, one way and another, thirty yellow men. But could the arm of each, dead weary of slaughter, have destroyed three hundred, or three thousand, still the effort would have been wasted. Over the carcases of a thousand dead straggled a million living. To shoot the vagabond Atlantic with cannon is a mockery of one's self.

The garrison of Paris remained; but the occupation of the French capital, supposed to be impossible to any other army, was, though bloody in its accomplishment, not extremely difficult to this.

A corps and a half, making nearly twice the number which, in its palmiest days, had inhabited the city of light and joy, sat down along the northern valley of the Seine, their lines occupying a length from the Achères-Poissy railway-line to the Forêt de Bondy, well beyond the outer ceinture of fortifications composed of great strongholds such as Cormeilles, Franconville, Cotillons, Montmorency, Domon.

The first care of the besiegers was to isolate the city; and in every direction, during one night, all the lines of railway radiating from the centre were blown up along a distance of some score of yards.

Then at once with light siege train, a brigade was thrown forward, and an attack began upon St. Germain-en-Laye.

Precisely what was the thought of the French general, what his ultimate hope, in making his determined resistance is not known. But a determined resistance he did make. Such had always been the splendid desperation, the tragic pride, of France.

The Chinese, on their part, might very well have drawn lines round the entire outer ceinture, and waited there, till all the cats and dogs of Paris and its villages had been eaten; but this no longer suited their mood. The yellow man, in his senses is, indeed, afraid of cannon. But the entire race was by this time no longer in its senses; here was a people dancing mad, gorged with gore, flushed with victory, greedy of agonies. Fear they no longer knew. To celebrate for ever a jubilee of devils in a scarlet world—to raise ever higher monuments built of human corpses, and shriek and dance around them—to live, to roll, to die in red—this was their sole remaining instinct.

Digitized by Google

General Saussier, sitting at St. Cloud with his staff, received telephonic message from St. Germain:

"Chinese are being mown down by thousands, but still they come."

And half-an-hour later by telegraphic click-clack from the mighty seven-battery Fort de Marly:

"Strong assault by Chinese. No. 2 redoubt carried by gangways and scaling-ladders in teeth of guns. Loss of enemy immeasurable."

And an hour later from St. Cyr:

"Chinese now swarming over glacis. Battery in rear carried. Ammunition cannot, I fear——"

No more. So southward, and eastward spread the tale of huge carnage, of steady, rabid advance. By nightfall of the first day of siege, St. Germain, Marly, St. Cyr, Versailles, Châtillon, had fallen.

It was on the next morning, at the hour when the sun should have been seen to rise, that men were first startled by a continuance of the darkness of the night.

The secret of this phenomenon was, of course, unknown at the time. In England, presently, it was given out by the scientists that some monstrous thing had happened, probably in some region of the South Sea—some unparalleled passion of Nature—which had poured over the earth in inconceivable mass its scoriac and tufaceous particles and multiform volcanic ashes, darkening the day. That some new properties were present in the atmosphere could not be doubted; for at the same time an intolerable oppression settled upon the chest, and, perhaps by reflex action, down sank the spirits of men; the mind of the children assumed the garb of crape and sackcloth which the Mother had put on; and an awe, and a charnel horror, and a fear, such as the heart had never yet known, gripped it now.

In England, it may be presumed, this unutterable pall of gloom lay much less heavily upon the imagination; for here the Chinese and their reign of terror were a mere inconceivable nightmare, not a present fact. But in England, too, the universal nerve felt the strangeness, and the thrill, of that ghastly obscurity.

One lifted a club to smite a head.

It was ghastly, because it was not complete. Utter gloom would have been more tolerable. Toward noon, during all the week, the sun was not wholly hidden, but appeared as a garish blotch of leprous lavender, giving nothing that could be called light, making only the darkness visible; while, as if to vie in chromatic hideousness, the moon appeared one night for an hour as a hollow, black eye-socket, with a rim of pallid green, and then disappeared.

The sickly gloom of the daytime was just sufficiently relieved to enable near objects to be discerned by the troubled eyes, while distances were lost in unrelieved blackness.

The event at Timor, by which the entire island was destroyed, was of so extraordinary a character that positively the whole planet, with the exception of some parts of America, may be said to have been infected by the catastrophe. Nagasaki disappeared, with many of the inland towns of Japan; a tidal wave inundated a large tract of the Kimberley district of Australia; Vesuvius plumed her cones with a rufous fume of lurider red; and old Ætna, purring and stuttering her thunders, broke into strange and gruff garrulity. Over Europe, from the Mull of Oe to the Urals, there was an almost continuous, just perceptible quaking of the ground, which nowhere broke out into violence, nowhere did damage, yet was remarkable for its menacing continuity, its unparalleled universality.

Not a breath stirred the air.

If beneath such a sky, and upon such a quaking earth we could really conceive "the Chinese scream," we should then really understand the speedy delirious deaths of the few successful fugitives from Europe during that week of apocalyptic woes.

At Auxonne, in the Place d'Armes, where there stands a statue of Napoleon I., the whole remaining population assembled, on the irruption of the yellow man, almost filling the open space, and fell to their knees with clasped hands, waiting. They only knew the nearness of the Chinese, who always and everywhere, ran noiselessly, barefooted, or in soft shoes, when the sudden scream at the glimpse of the crowded victims burst upon their ears.

One of the terrors of this massacre, and of others, was the uncertainty as to which sort of death any given victim might die; one of the horrors was, that whatever death a Chinaman inflicted, he loudly imitated with his lips, in an instructive way, the nature of the death. They came pelting in their swinging run, into the Place at Auxonne, and as one lifted a club to smite a head, he screamed inarticulately; and as the club fell, he cried "Shrash!" And as another caught a flying child by the heels, he screamed inarticulately; and as he swung the frail skull against the base of the statue, he cried, "Pop!" And as another aimed his pistol at a near man, he screamed inarticulately; and as the pistol went off, he cried "Bam!" And as another seized a woman from behind by her hair, he screamed inarticulately; and as he danced and jumped upon her crushed body, he cried "Wash!"

Digitized by Google

A very large proportion of the populations of Europe had been absolutely unable to fly; many had not had time, when the Chinese were upon them; many, with infinite effort, had reached the coast to find no craft there to bear them away. Roughly speaking, about one half, calling upon the rocks and caves to cover them, remained; many, as at Auxonne, shut up in fortified towns. For a time the darkness of day and night enabled many to hide about the country; but it is doubtful if any considerable number could have owed a final escape to this means.

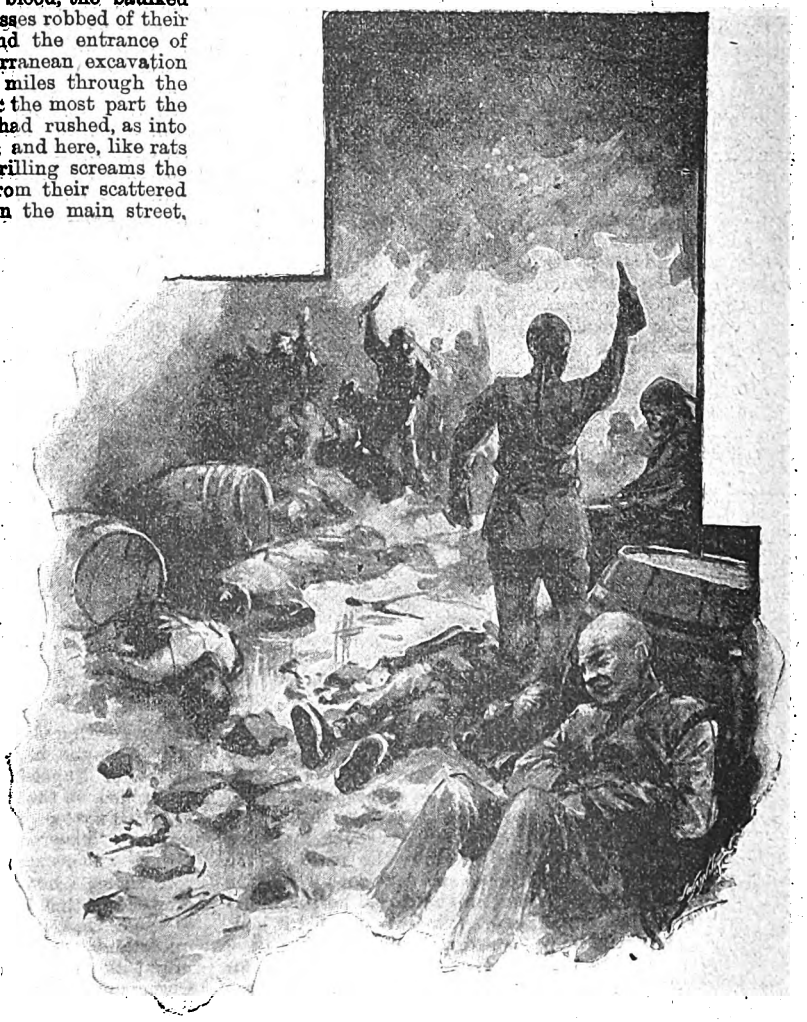
At Epernay, half a regiment having entered the town toward night—though between day and night there was small distinction now — went marauding with flaring torches into every house, searching for victims and finding few. The streets were empty—the inhabitants had vanished. In this surprising famine of blood, the baulked hordes poked furiously about, like tigresses robbed of their young. At last a party, ferreting around the entrance of M. Moët's cellars, discovered the subterranean excavation which extends in vast vaults some nine miles through the chalky rock of this region. Hither for the most part the doomed people, in unreflecting panic, had rushed, as into the last hole left on earth to cover them; and here, like rats in a trap, they were caught. With thrilling screams the Chinese, at the signal, ran swinging from their scattered search about the town, toward Moët's in the main street. It had been drizzling all the day, and their feet were dabbled to the knees with the soft clay of the neighbouring hill of Montigny, of which was made the Epernay earthenware; so that within an hour, the long ramifications of the ransacked excavations were a filth of dabbled gore and mud.

The vaults contained several millions of bottles, with from four to five thousand pipes of the best champagne; and here at this depth of forty feet below the streets, in the midst of this gloom relieved by rare lurid flares, there was transacted so red an orgy of massacre, screaming lust, and sighing drunkenness, so mixed a drama of filthy infamy and sabbatic Satanism, as earth, and perhaps hell, never saw. In the matter of crime, the yellow man is ingenious; what we cannot conceive, he can do; so that where we end he begins, his natural talent being for the grotesque and the macabre. And when the orgy grew still for very surfeit, when there welled from him the sigh of perfect peace, down dropped his head upon its pillow of flesh, and his snoring breath fanned the hair of the naked dead.

Simultaneously, the other wine-vaults of Epernay were invaded; and, above, too, the streets were strewn with dead and drunken. The town was burnt down before the night was over, some thousands of Chinamen perishing in the flames.

As for the Parisian corps and a half, fort after fort of the outer ceinture glutted their monstrous batteries with carnage, and yielded. At Meudon two gallant companies of chasseurs à pied flung themselves down an escarpment to hurl back an assault with scaling-ladders; they hurled back the assault, and were literally trampled under foot by the swarm of on-coming multitudes. Then it was the turn of Mont Valerien. Bouviers fell, de Buc, Bois d'Arcis. At Satory every siege-gun of the Japanese was uncarriaged, and the fort was only taken by the sheer powerlessness of the great guns any longer to keep range with their mangled rifling. Issy fell. At Châtillon the whole stock of ammunition was exhausted in slaughter. Vanves fell, Ivry fell, Montrouge fell. Nearer and nearer closed in the inevitable crowding circle. The Chinese were at St. Cloud, at Putoux, at Suresnes, and at Sèvres.

Even while the war was raging round southern forts they came screaming through the Porte de St. Cloud, and went swarming into the Bois up the Allée de Longchamp, making for the Porte Maillot which gives direct access to the city. The iron-barred gate was closed, and the foremost, pressed forward by the now disorganised mob behind, fainted and perished in the block. Still onward surged the crowd, trampling itself in frantic, blind rage into a ghastliness



An orgy of massacre and sighing drunkenness . . . as earth never saw.

Digitized by Google

of heaped-up death, while the gendarmerie which lined the walls sent whistling gusts of lead through the trees upon the ever-advancing hosts. Then a stream of Chinese extricated themselves sideways, and with a half turn to the right sought to make through the trees for the fosse, and so for the fortifications. And as they turned, they fell; and others following, turned and fell. And now, the whole current began to tend in the way of these pioneers. Forward they are pressed, and press, and fall; but they fall ever nearer to the fosse; and now they are falling into it; and down through the wide, ever-filling ditch they press, treading upon a carpet of dead flesh only; and now there is no more a fosse, but a level floor of bodies; and across this they rush, and attempt to climb, and fall; and the level floor is no more level, but slants upward to the parapet; and along this sure gangway of soft and sinking luxury, this vast snake-nest of intermixing pigtails, they press, they run; now they cannot fail; they gain the parapet; they scream; and Paris is Gomorrah.

They hurled back the assault.

The mystery of license to which, during all that week of black horror, the chief of the cities of men was a prey, can only be hinted here. It was well understood that Paris was to be the capital of the new Chinese world; and it was therefore with a certain feeling of old proprietorship that the Chinese entered it. They dealt with the inhabitants as a man, returning from a long journey, makes short work of an accumulation of rats in his chief cellar.

They stormed in a solid body up the wide Avenue de la Grande Armée, and also in two solid bodies, right and left, just within the fortifications. Near l'Etoile, stretching right across the breadth of the avenue, and also across the Boulevard de Berthier, there were barricades of the Garde Municipale, and street-fighting, and massacre, and mounds of trampled yellow corpses. But the flood behind swept onward the flood before with the inevitableness of the ocean-tide. Within a few hours all that length of thoroughfares which the Parisians call the "boulevards extérieurs" were occupied; and the inhabitants were driven inward like wild horses within a ring of prairie-fire.

Another host had entered south by the Porte d'Ivry into the 13th arrondissement, another from Montrouge by the Porte d'Orléans into the 14th; and now, swarming in their millions, they infested the ways and bye-ways of the city, its squares and its bed-rooms, its stables and its public buildings, with glad rage, with prying Bacchic stare, with gaping mouth.

Here was the New Pekin.

The bony visage of the yellow man, in moments of unbridled lust and mad excitement, is a brutal spectacle. The countenance is a travesty; the divine image becomes a mask of hellish farce. It is as though a panting skeleton played a comedy. There all is seen—the nakedness of the passions, the bare, rampant hideousness; the face becomes an indecency. What added to the frenzy of these riots was the fact that among the invaders were sweating women, crazy with heat and dust, and the instinct of blood, and the ultimate wantonness of crime.

On the night of the entry, on each of the iron railings in the wide space of the Place de la Concorde glared an impaled head. At the Invalides, in the circular pit where lies the tomb of Napoleon, there lay a compact mass of bodies reaching to the level of the railings; and on this bed of mortality lay a score of Chinese men and women in exhausted sleep.

Here, too, was subterranean massacre in catacomb and égout. On the Quai St. Michel a body of fifty Quartier Latin students stood waiting in proud, pale, silent patience, holding hands, and died smiling.

While the city from La Vellette to Boulogne was still one shrieking Sodom, Yen How arrived in Paris.

Though eager to be away to the coast, he had come hither to inaugurate a Ceremony, which was to be memorable. This was on the Tuesday of the sunless week.

He lost no time. He summoned to him at the Elysée captains and generals of brigades, and commanded them to make ready the people for the long-predetermined Ritual.

To-day he was no more Yen How, the General, he was Yen How, the Prophet-Priest.

He had with him the Chiam, the hereditary high priest, counting an Aaronic ancestry of a thousand years; he had with him a gorgeous retinue of bouzis; he had with him the idol of Quanheim, the Chinese Virgin, sitting among cushions in rich robes—the idol of Matsoa, who swam from a far country to China through many seas in one night—the idol of Quonin, Virgin of the North—the idol of Fe, the eagle-headed joss—the idol of Minifo—the idol of many-handed Puffa—many idols; he had with him the books of Confucius, and the books of Tansin; and he draped himself in the robes and solemn gauds of the Arch-Priest, that he might inaugurate and set up in one central Temple of the West the religion of the East.

He chose Nôtre Dame.

And the work of torture, and infamy, and slaughter, now nearly over, ceased; and on that day, the people flocked toward the Cité, and that ancient church of Christ.

Digitized by Google

Never was assembled such a multitude within a city. To lend the last impressiveness to the ceremony, Yen How had ordained that these should be the sole public idols, for the time being, brought over from China. A Chinaman without idols is like an opium-smoker without opium. This gorgeous ritual, therefore, was in itself quite sufficient, once for all, to fix and establish Paris as the centre of the new Empire. In the earlier hours of the day messages were everywhere flashed over the Continent, and to China, stating the exact hour of the Inauguration; and at that hour, account having been taken of differences of longitude, by far the greater portion of the yellow race bowed its muttering head, prostrated itself, and turned a jaundiced eye to Heaven.

Yen How, with thick ivory ring on thumb, arrayed in a blaze of colours, was borne in open palanquin of gold all along the Rue de Rivoli and by the Pont de l'Arcole through the kneeling throng, proceeded by thousands of bouzis, bearing the majestic god Fo and the huge-bellied, broadfaced Gan.

He began to kill scientifically.

The line of route was illuminated with the myriad variegation of lanterns, as was also the interior of Nôtre Dame. While everywhere, from Montmartre to Montrouge, a noise of jangling bells rang through the sombre air. At the hour of the sacrifice, steaming human heads were offered to Matsoa, as a variation on the usual boiled heads of the pig.

In the tiny shrines which, on three sides, surround the nave, where pricket-candlesticks and rich, religious decor had long represented the rather foppish religiosity of the Parisian "dévote," were set up the statues of grotesque and grinning josses. The Crucified gave place to Fo, and the Immaculate to Quanheim.

The studied pomp of this memorable Hegira was simply overwhelming in its effect. The prostrate multitudes groaned in inward agonies of veneration; and the God of their veneration was, in reality, Yen How.

When the sacred books were opened and solemnly presented, it was not forgotten that Confucius, who wrote them, was mysteriously there, in carnal presence, before their favoured eyes.

He, for his part, the little doctor—even in that grandiose hour of his triumph—smiled inwardly, as usual. In all the sun and earth there was hardly heat to melt that ice.

Only where the focussed rays of Self touched the secret spot, he warmed, and flowed, and felt.

The pageant of Inauguration was at two. By four the broken Paris-Calais railway was repaired, and Yen How with his retinue set off westward.

Already Paris presented a strange sight, apart from the heaps of dead in the streets, and the bodiless heads and arms with which the screaming Chinese played ball. She looked Chinese. The Mongolian race, like the English, can adapt itself readily. All the winding length of the Rue du Faubourg St. Honoré was, in two days, bright with gauds and hues. Shops had been appropriated by individuals, who made haste to find pigments to daub the legend in characters which seemed to grin. Lanterns were hung out. The gay city assumed another tone of gaiety: vermilion on her houses, and vermilion in her streets.

Digitized by Google

The work of blood recommenced.

At Marseilles, the Chinese, entering by the Boulevard de la Madeleine, found a deserted city, filled with the roar of the famishing animals at the Zoological Gardens. Their only prey was the very aged, and a number of nuns, medical men and invalids, collected chiefly at the New Hospital. In their squeeze to get at these a number of Chinese were crushed to death.

At Lyons an incredible mêlée, made up of the madmen of the hospital of Antiquaille, of Chinese, and of Sœurs de la Charité, raged for an hour through the vast, straggling building. Beneath the Pont de la Mulatière there occurred a block of corpses which spread gradually upward between the banks of the Saône; and this, within two days, aided by the stifling heat of the stagnant and sunless air, resulted in a pestilence among the invaders. At once the dying men were seized with the instinct to rush northward toward Paris, the home of the gods; and it was only the promptness of Yen How, who ordered the clearage of the river, and the instant shooting of every sick Chinaman, which presented more widespread disaster.

At old Valence, where some failure of commissariat —caused by the deportation southward of provisions, and the voluntary destruction of the vineyards—had occurred, there was scarcity for a day, and food in plenty the next. The low hedge that divides the yellow man from omnivorousness was in Europe found to be very low indeed—where the flesh of men is not yellow, but pink, like the newborn mouse. At the first spur of hunger, the hedge was leapt with an easy bound.

For a day hard Scarcity; the next, flesh in plenty—roast and sodden, bake and stew.

Meanwhile, if there was a man in Europe who had a strong will neither to be eaten when dead, nor tortured alive at slow fires, nor shot with arrows, nor pierced with bullets, nor pulped with the clubs which the Chinese use for pounding rice—that man was the duellist Edrapol.

Thrice had he been caught, and thrice he had escaped.

He reached Dieppe, and for the second time within two days, he had no sooner reached his point of aim than the irruption came.

He ran at the first breathless news of the Chinese approach down to the basins; and, with the crowd of hunted men and women around him, he saw the last little boat making her way, crowded with people, out of the mouth of the outer basin.

He had forgotten, in his mad haste, both sword and pistols; and as he saw all hope cut off by way of the sea, his first instinct was to rush back, and get what was like life to him—a weapon in his hand.

Even as he ran through the street, along which men and women were rushing in wild-eyed distraction, he heard The Scream. It had reached Dieppe.

Edrapol stopped, and gazed crazily about. His big soft felt hat was pressed back hard on his head; the long hanging ends of his white moustache shook. It was not a moustache—it was a drapery.

Here was a stern end to an existence of pleasure; here an absence of all punctilio intruding itself upon a life which had made punctilio its bride. The Chinese slew without "seconds" or ceremony; though the aggressors, they chose their own weapons. The trifler's heart sank within him.

Round he leered, standing a moment in the third position, as if to parry the tierce thrust—his hat pressed hard back on his head.

The Scream came from a side street; it was very near; his inn was before him; he flew forward.

He reached the deserted house, rushed up the stairs to a room, and dropped to his knees before a portmanteau. From his arsenal of weapons he chose a six-chambered revolver and a dainty rapier. With these in his hand he felt better.

He stood and listened, his beard, his whole body, shaking.

In about a minute, the place was filled with noise, shouted gibberish, shrill laugh. Edrapol bolted his door.

But it was soon discovered, and battered in with clubs. About ten Chinese, hot, crazy, bent upon blood, rushed in upon him, screaming.

But this time they reckoned without their host. A man does not acquire a European reputation for nothing.

Edrapol put his legs into the exact pose of elegance suited to the occasion, and with the revolver in his left hand and the rapier in his right, he began to kill scientifically. Every shot entered the middle of a heart or brain, and every stroke failed not to sever the intended artery. The last pig-tail dropped upon the writhing corpses of his fellows, and Edrapol leant a little on the handle of his dripping rapier, the model of grace.

It was near sunset then, about two weeks before the dark time.

He crept from the chamber. The house was empty. He found a recess in a wine-cellar, in which he hid till three the next morning.

The house was then full of other Chinese, and the corpses of white women; but the living were as unconscious as the dead, drunk with the orgie of the day. Edrapol passed through them, and made his escape from the town eastwards and southwards.

For a week he lurked in a little empty farm-house between Dieppe and St. Valéry; and then some Chinese came to the farm-house; but Edrapol escaped.

For another week he seems to have dodged and lurked about in that neighbourhood, near the shore, in the vain hope of somehow getting away in a ship. But no ship came.

He was carrying about with him a piece of cheese which he found at the farm-house, and this, with occasional autumn hedge-fruit, appeased his hunger. He remembered the bon-bons of Moissier with regret.

Unexpectedly, one midnight, walking along the beach, he came upon a broken hut, and near it a small seamy skiff, containing half an oar. He was just able to move her; and after three hours' work, got her to the water's edge.

He put off in her, and as the water oozed in, he baled it with his voluminous hat. When he was not baling, he paddled.

His notion of reaching England in this fashion was hopeless; but the old duellist, the luxurious boulevardier, clung to life with the desperation of a pampered woman. And he fell upon his feet where another would have failed.

On the third morning, he was picked up, half dead, by a barque, almost in mid-channel. She was the Conrad, which had borne Hardy to Nagasaki; and was then, for the first time, on her way to England. So that, late that night, Edrapol's glittering fingers pulled the patriarchal tassels of his moustache on Newhaven broken wharf. And there he examined the edge of his rusted rapier.

(To be continued.)

For the first time in the history of British journalism a serial story of a war is running concurrently with the actual fighting.

This story is entitled

"Contraband of War,"

and has just started in Pearson's Weekly.

Get a copy at once; you will not regret it. A concise summary will enable you to start right away.

Pearson's Weekly is published every Saturday, and costs one penny.

Digitized by Google

THE TUG-OF-WAR.

A SMART phaeton came rapidly down the avenue, and, dexterously driven, turned into one of the side streets and pulled up before a house. The sudden quiet after the pounding of the hoofs attracted the attention of a man walking, and he looked absently at the woman who was being assisted to alight, while a trim footman stood at the horses' heads.

In an instant his expression changed, and he quickened his steps, reaching the woman as the phaeton was driven off.

"Miss Reddington!"

At the sound of his voice, the woman stopped at the steps, and for the first time saw the man, whose face was alight with expectancy and eagerness.

"Mr. Crofton! What a surprise; and how delightful!" She put out both hands. "Really, this is charming; but what did you call me?"

"It was horribly formal, was it not? But it is so long ago, I was afraid! May I begin where we left off?" His voice was as persuasive as ever, she decided, and the fascination was the same, yet her tone was quizzical when she answered:

"It sounded so strange, you know! But you will come in, of course; you must!"

At the door she hesitated a moment, and then spoke to the butler who was turning away.

"I shall not see anyone this afternoon, Edmonds," and continued to Crofton:

"I am going to take you up to the library; it is much more comfortable, and you must stay the rest of the afternoon and talk over old times."

Silently the man followed her up the stairs, his mind filled with the strangeness of the meeting. Thirteen months since he had seen her, and then to run across her in this unexpected way and find her unchanged! At least, so it seemed. Women are deceitful creatures, yet in some respects transparent enough, as he had reason to know, owing to a style of convincing that dissipated any difficulty in discovering the state of their feeling towards him, which, if he had chosen to make it so, was of a kind that justified a flattering opinion of himself. Occasionally, it is true, there was a rebuff, but that only stimulated further effort that resulted in his complacently repeating to himself a certain French proverb about "the one who knows how to wait." This time he had waited in accordance with the dictates of experience, and the result was at hand. The thought pleased him.

In the library the woman stopped.

"Now we shall not be disturbed," she said, smiling. "Mrs Van Nuyster is not at home. Isn't it fine? Voilà!"

She dropped in a big chair and began pulling off her boa, and Crofton took her hand and gently unfastened the glove.

"I never was more surprised than to see you so unexpectedly. You are not changed!"

"To you, no! But fancy my astonishment! I did not expect to see you here."

"I? Oh, I'm stopping with my friends—my dearest friends—the Van Nuysters."

She was spreading out her fingers and closing them, a habit she had after taking off gloves, and Crofton watched her while she talked on.

"That was Mr. Van Nuyster I was driving with. I wish you had met him. He is charming!"

"Ah," Crofton said deliberately, "his wife must have great confidence in you!"

"Why not? I trust you do not think it misplaced!" She took the long pins out of her hat and flung it on a chair. "Suppose we leave the Van Nuysters alone. Accept the good the gods send you; that is, if you regard it so!"

"The 'good' meaning you, I do; but it makes me hate your host when I know what a delightful afternoon he has had, while I——"

"But here is the rest of it for you. What more can you desire?"

"I don't like leavings; I want the first."

"Oh, of course," the woman said teasingly; "you would be first in the minds, first in the souls, first in the hearts of women!

"'Woman' stands for 'women' in many cases! Well, where have you been all these months? Fancy how long ago since we met—parted, rather; yet now it seems like yesterday."

"A long yesterday as I look back upon it," he said moodily; "but now," with an almost imperceptible accent, "I shall expect compensation. How long have you been here?"

"All the winter. I love this great city, you know, and I shall stay until spring."

"You must 'love' the Van Nuysters to stay with them so long," he remarked doubtfully.

"But I do! Mrs. Van Nuyster is a dear; the sort of woman you like," she added, "and Mr. Van Nuyster—well, he is the sort of man I like. I hope you will come and see me often; they make my friends very welcome! You will be asked to dine, I know; I will speak to Mr. Van Nuyster about it."

Crofton stiffened himself. "Ah," he said meaningly, "Mr. Van Nuyster. I do not accept men's invitations to dine at their wives' tables."

"Naturally, but it will be the wife who will invite you. You will come?" Her voice pleaded charmingly. Crofton thought, and the moment was his. To recognise the moment and seize it was among his talents, and one is apt to do well what one enjoys. Mentally he collected his forces.

"Esther, what is Mr. Van Nuyster to you?"

"My dear friend." She was smoothing out her gloves and avoided looking at him.

"Ah, and I fancied, fool that I am, that it was I that you thought of. Heaven knows you should, to make things just."

"And your wife?" she asked softly.

"What is she to me except the bearer of my name? The thought makes me hate her. It prevents my giving it to you if you would have it. But it cannot prevent my loving you, and you only." He was leaning over her until his lips almost brushed her hair. "Esther, have you nothing to say to me?"

"I—I am astonished," she said weakly, when he broke in:

Digitized by Google

"Dear heart, you must have known it. We cannot evade Fate or lie about it; that will not help us."

"Ah, no," she whispered.

Crofton took her hands gently. "Esther, I love you so; will you be patient with me? You could not realise, dear, how the first time I saw you, there crept into my heart a joy that was almost a pain; but when I knew, and there took possession of me a hope that has never left, for sometimes I fancied you knew and were proud of my love, though you made no sign and trusted to my honour not to speak, and I respected your confidence."

He bowed his head until it just touched her hands, and, as though the contact encouraged him, continued:

"There are women, dear, for whom a man would barter everything, fame and honour, and all he has held most precious, and you are more to me than all those, though if Fate had not brought us together to-day I should have kept away and tried to live my lonely life without you. You believe me, Esther?"

"Yes," the woman muttered.

"But having found you again, I cannot let you go. Do not tell me there are obstacles; there need be none if you love me."

The woman sprang out of her chair.

"You must not," she exclaimed. "Do not make it impossible for me to see you again. Let us be friends. Ah, think of your wife!"

"Have I not thought of her for ten long years? Can the memory ever depart, I wonder? Esther, will you take me into the warmth of your love and let us forget everyone in the world but ourselves?"

"Mr. Crofton, I want to be friends with you——"

"Friends!" he interrupted scornfully.

"Though after to-day probably you will not want to see me again; but first," she turned and faced him squarely, "I want to tell you that, with one exception, I believe nothing of what you said—that is if 'Fate' had not thrown me in your way to-day, you would have kept away. I do think that, because you simply would never have thought of me. It sounds discourteous; I am sorry, and much to blame for letting you go on as I did, but the temptation was too great. You have won a bet for your wife."

"What do you mean?" he demanded.

"I like your wife, Mr. Crofton, and from the bottom of my heart I pity her. You are charming to talk to, delightful always, but to marry—ah, c'est autre chose! She is plucky, too, one never hears a complaint or a murmur, and she philosophically takes what life offers and does not pine for the unattainable. Decidedly, she is to be admired! You may be surprised how well she knows you. That is what I mean about the wager, for one day she wagered that you would say you loved me madly. She had no feeling about it, and I was never so astonished in my life, but she said she did not mind any more—one got used to anything. Yet, poor soul, people say she loved you devotedly when you married her."

The man seemed to have lost the power of speech, the turning of the tables bade fair to crush him, and the woman went on:

"I am sorry all this happened, because I wanted to have you among my acquaintances, yet the fault is mine for I could have prevented it; instead, I encouraged you, tacitly, it is true, but encouraged you all the same. I am like all women, though you have called me unique: we like to have men's devotion and attention.

"You are simply an extreme, for if a woman be clever enough to interest you, then you are seized with a desire to make her believe she is your affinity. You say unutterable things just looking into a woman's eyes, and a pressure of your hand seems to imply life-long devotion. You are one of the most charming men I ever met, and quite the most sincere!"

A little vein about Crofton's mouth, invisible usually, was deep blue, a sign always of intense anger, and he stood confronting the woman.

"Miss Reddington————"

"Ah, that is a mistake. Evidently you have not heard. I am Mrs. Van Nuyster."

"You!"

"Yes. I was engaged at the time I knew you—over a year ago—but it was not announced till two months ago, and we were married just after. I am that creature of composite newness known as a bride!"

"You!" he repeated. "I hope your deception about your friend amused you!"

She laughed a little at the recollection.

"It was a deception—but true, too. They are my dearest friends, and you would like Mr. Van Nuyster." She went a step nearer him. "I thought you would like Mrs. Van Nuyster," she said doubtfully.

For a second the man hesitated, but genius, he recollected, was equal to occasions. "If she will let me."

"She will be delighted to. Mr. Crofton, will you understand when I say that, if I thought you meant what you had said this afternoon, I should never offer you my friendship. The combination would be impossible. But you were simply trying to—to—what shall we call it? Nothing. But don't try again, and let us be friends. Here is my hand on it."

"Thank you," said Crofton gravely. "I am truly honoured. May I kiss my friend's hand in token of fealty?" He touched it lightly with his lips. "And will you excuse me now and let me come again?"

"My friend will always be welcome, and I want you to meet my husband. You must dine with us as soon as we have a free evening. I shall send Mr. Van Nuyster to look you up. You will accept his invitation to his wife's table? Ah, that was too bad! Forgive me! Do!"

"There is nothing to forgive, and while life lasts I am in your debt."

"Between friends there is no question of debt; it is only with acquaintances one compares accounts." She touched the bell. "I shall not say good-bye, but—au revoir! When you dine with us, you will bring your wife." And Crofton passed beween the portieres as the maid pulled them apart.

A moment later Mr. Van Nuyster entered.

"I met someone just going out," he said.

"Yes. I am sorry you were not here before. Or, no, for that would have prevented a most artistic finale!"

"Meaning?" he asked, kissing her.

"Meaning," she mimicked, laying both hands on his shoulders, "that he thought himself madly in love and was telling me about it."

"With you?"

"Dear Van, with himself! His regard for Ego would prevent an inconvenient passion for anyone else and be his safeguard."

"But he might be able to make the woman think differently."

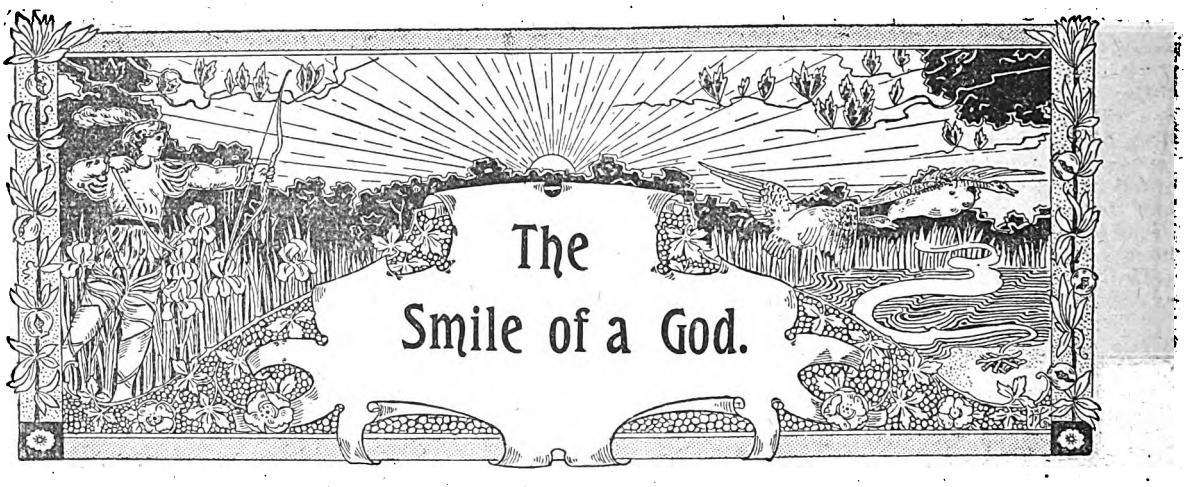
"Then she would be a fool."

"True; which you cannot comprehend. But you are a clever woman, Esther!"

"Thank you, dear," she said softly. "Perhaps the lesson will do him good and make life more happy for his wife," she added.

H. Ormond.

Digitized by Google



The Smile of a God.

A sensitive man has no business in the desert. He will get prodded everywhere. If he takes offence at rough banter, Heaven help him when he gets into a mining-camp. If he wears his heart upon his sleeve, let him steer clear of the Mexican towns and the pretty señoritas. If he would know any peace, let him keep away from the cattle-range, for the cow-boys' jests are as keen and cutting as the spurs at their heels.

Frank Robbins was beginning to find out some of these things. But if you gave him a whole decade he would not find them all out.

"What the boy wants is toughening," said Mart Selby.

Mart was big and tough, and he saw no good reason why anybody but a child or a woman should be tender.

"He's a young colt that wants a Mexican bit shoved into his mouth, and then be ridden through the cactus."

At Lucin's ranch the boys joked and irritated Robbins, but it did not seem to toughen him. They cared nothing for whisky that didn't scratch as it went down, and when he put water in his they called him a perfect lady and laughed loudly.

"Stand their joking," said Mart to Robbins, "and you'll get along better. They'll always make it hot for a man that don't joke back."

"Oh, I don't mind it," replied Robbins, badly overdoing his effort to look unconcerned.

It had been the same everywhere he had been in the West. He was one of those men who are never anything but tender-feet. He simply would not take men as he found them, though they were perfectly willing to take him so. And the absurd ideas that had lodgment in his head! Chief among these were, that he must have a friend—a chum—who should be a man after his own heart. He had been looking for such a man for two years. He picked him out occasionally, but he never found him to suit. This one was not truthful, that one was not temperate, and the other was not nice in his speech. There was something lacking in each one.

"What I want is a whole man," he sighed; "I never could take up with one of these half-made fellows. But it is not so easy. Even when I find a man that is temperate and intellectual, he turns out to be selfish. What would I not give for a whole man for a friend and companion—a whole man!"

He would not take up with Mart Selby, though Mart saw "the young fellow" sorely needed a friend and helper, particularly one who would toughen him. He kept on looking for his made-to-order man, but he never seemed to hit upon him. Few such men as he was looking for are to be found within a thousand miles of Lucin's. In fact, at Lucin's you would be at a loss to discover a single man who did not like to take observations of old Ashby's cloth-and-paper ceiling through the bottom of a whisky-glass, and if you heard a voice, I will give you my word of honour it was not a cherub's.

One day the boys outdid all their other little meannesses to Robbins by getting him hopelessly drunk. Of course, it was no killing matter; but he had never been drunk before, and he took it very seriously, and resolved to leave camp next day.

Mart did not like this. His heart had warmed towards "the young fellow," and he hated to see him leave the place. Finally he resolved to go with him.

They agreed between them that they would not go on the range again. They would go prospecting for gold.

And thus it was that they came to make the journey over the desert towards Dead Horse Gulch. Now, as everybody in that country knows, the wealth of the Dead Horse Gulch is great, but it is very hard to reach. Miners who have lived out the awful heat of the alkali plain that lies all around the buttes wherein the gulch makes its gash, have come back with full belts, but none of them have ever gone a second time.

In suggesting this journey, Mart Selby had a double object. First, he wanted to toughen "the young fellow," and next, he wanted to enrich them both. Mart knew that Robbins had come out West to make enough money to marry a nice girl that lived in England, and he knew, too, that "the young fellow" had found money-making very slow work.

From Lucin's to the great alkali plain that lay before the buttes in which the gold was hidden was a long and toilsome journey. But the real work only began with the crossing of the alkali desert.

White and naked lay the dead land before their aching eyes. The eye of Heaven shone down with most relentless fierceness. No breath of air was stirring, and the whole world was to them as dumb as death.

Mart had counted on the journey being a hard one, but not so hard as this. He had not dreamt that the water would give out so soon, nor that the horses would sink down and die as they did.

Digitized by Google

Still they staggered on, their forms, bent under their heavy burdens, standing out sharp and raw above the white earth on which their clearly defined shadows fell with inky blackness.

In that cloudless, mistless air, distance seemed set at naught, for they travelled on and on towards the buttes, and yet they seemed to grow no nearer.

It was towards evening when they reached a rocky islet in the sea of alkali, and there, after a very bad meal of hard tack, they fell asleep, Robbins dreaming of clear cold water, drawn from marble fountains in crystal goblets. The young man was the first to awake. The sun was beginning to shoot his fiery needles over the mountain. Robbins lifted his hand to rub his eyes.

"R-r-z-z-z!"

Then a tongue of flame darted towards him, and struck him on the palm of the hand.

"Oh, Heaven!" he groaned. "it's a rattlesnake, and he's bitten me!"

His voice seemed to awaken a hundred echoes, and to these responded a hundred rattles.

Selby sat up in his blanket and stared at him stupidly. As he made the movement, a rattlesnake struck him in the face, and another at his side would have done the same had he not thrown himself out of reach of its deadly fangs.

The rattles resounded on every side. The two men ran back to a stretch of sand behind the rocks, and gazed at each other wildly.

"Hold still," demanded Mart. "Let me look at your bite." He grasped the boy's hand.

"Thank Heaven, it's not in the vein!"

He seized his knife, and quickly hollowed out a piece of flesh.

"There, hold your hand down and let the blood run free, while I tie this cord round your arm." He twisted the stout cord until it cut into the arm. "Now the whisky," he gasped.

"No," said Robbins, "let me cut the poison out of your wound."

Mart held still a moment while this was done.

"Now the whisky—quick!" cried Robbins.

But Selby did not look for the bringing forth of the flask with any light of hope in his eyes.

"It is yours," he said quietly. "There is only enough for one, and barely that."

"Then it is yours, Mart."

"No—yours."

"But you are the worse bitten. Your face is already beginning to swell. Drink it."

There was anguish in the tone, as there was heroism in the words; but it was heroism of the weakly sort. He held out the bottle at arm's length, while he turned his face away.

"No, no! It's yours, boy!" came in firmer and more commanding tones from Mart Selby. "You have a mother and a sweetheart back in the old country. And I—I have nobody. There was somebody once, but there ain't nobody now—nobody at all."

In the face of this fearful temptation, Robbins felt himself weakening. He grew less strong of resolution with each tick of the watch in his pocket, heard so plainly in the desert stillness. What a coward he felt himself; but—how sweet was life!

Was there no help to be had from other sources? He could not take this. The drinking of that liquid, was the drinking of Selby's life, and that life meant much to him now. Here was the whole man!

His eyes swept the hopeless plain. He looked for the "dust" of a traveller, but he saw none, The heat of the day was growing. He thought he felt the poison pulsing through his veins.

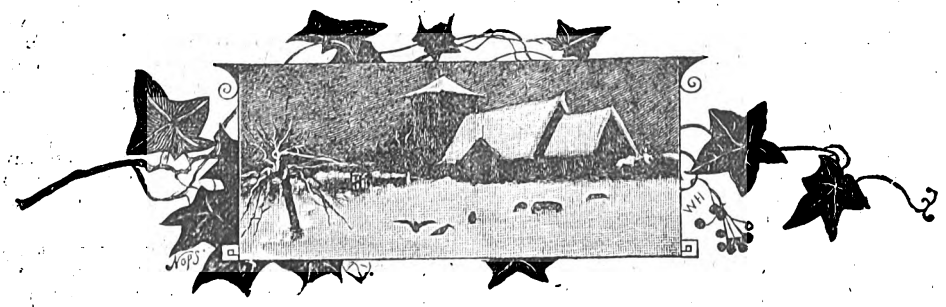
"No—no," he said, sinking down upon the sand. And there was a pitiable weakness in his voice.

Selby took the bottle from his hand. As he did so, a shade of fear arose to Robbins' face. Selby saw it and smiled. The swollen face made the smile grotesque; but, none the less, it was the smile of a god. He came forward, and knelt beside the crouching form of Robbins, who, lying on his face, with his eyes shut, begged him not to think of him, but of himself. But the tone was growing weaker.

The other said no word, but, lifting his friend's head, he uncorked the bottle and held it to his lips. A look of remonstrance came to Robbins' face, and he raised his hand to push away the bottle. Just then he glanced upwards. A buzzard was circling round in the clear blue air. He shivered, and, as the neck of the bottle was forced between his teeth, and Selby was holding back his head, how could he help swallowing? The look of remonstrance faded away as the liquor gurgled from the bottle. Soon it was all drained. The boy's head sank to the ground, and a heavy sleep laid hold upon him.

When he awoke there lay by his side the body of a man with a revolver bullet in his head.

T. A.



Digitized by Google

A Change of Subject.

What in the world is the matter with Abbé Bernard, who is going, as usual, to the Sacred Heart Convent of Lille to initiate the prettiest girls of Flanders into the mysteries of the French language and literature?

He is wearing his shabby, everyday cassock, his nose is red, for the cold January east wind cuts his face, and his feet are frozen, for he has been walking in the snow for the last ten minutes, without even troubling himself to take the little path trodden along the streets by the first passers-by.

There is nothing extraordinary in all that; but it is certainly very extraordinary to see the good face of this worthy Abbé without its habitual smile. No, the Abbé is not smiling—a thing which has not happened for ten years; the Abbé is anxious—very anxious. He walks in the snow unconsciously, and even when he passes under the porch of the large convent, he does not reply to the "Good-morning, Monsieur l'Abbé!" of Sister Ursule, the worthy portress. There is certainly something the matter with Abbé Bernard—at least, that is the opinion of Sister Ursule, who, grumbling all the while, continues to sweep away the snow which obstructs the entrance to her domain.

If the Abbé is preoccupied, uneasy, the class of big girls is in a state of feverish agitation which the two under-governesses, Sister Madeleine and Sister Babette, can hardly control.

To-day is a great day. It is composition day. Up there, on the desk of Abbé Bernard, a large yellow envelope contains the subject of the composition, elaborated by the Superior Council and approved by the Bishop of Amiens.

All these heads, brown, blonde, and red, are in a state of excitement. What will be the subject of composition? They begin to argue about it. Will it be religious! Tall Adèle maintains that it will. Philosophic little Victoire says not; nor will it be scientific, as Mademoiselle de Saint-Roc strives to make them believe, and there is ceaseless prattling, cries and laughter.

At last the Abbé appears. They think he looks ill. Little by little silence is restored, and soon nothing is heard but the tic-tac of the old clock and the oppressed breathing of Sister Babette, who has a cold in the head.

All minds are intent, all eyes are fixed upon the yellow envelope, which the Abbé will open. But the Abbé, a little pale, although very firm, does not cut open the large yellow envelope, but fumbling in his pocket, draws forth another, a smaller one with five coats of arms.

Yes, it is certainly the arms of the Phalenpins—three martlets of gold on an azure background with the device: "God keep my race"; and in looking at these five waxen seals, he remembers all. The trot of a horse heard at midnight—the bell half pulled off—himself dressing in haste to open, believing that he was sought for some dying one, and his stupefaction on finding himself face to face with the young Marquis of Phalenpin, his well-beloved seignior, whom he had educated and instructed in heart and mind, and whom he loved with all his soul.

"Father," the Marquis said, "do you love me?"

And as he was protesting the strength of his affection ——,

"Good," replied the young man, "swear to me to do what I am going to ask you; swear, Father, for the happiness of my house depends upon it."

"The happiness of the house of the Phalenpins—good heavens!" And the Abbé swore without hesitation.

Then the Marquis, handing him the envelope which just now is puzzling his young pupils so much, said:

"You have the right, Father, to change, if it seems advisable to you, the subject of the composition which you are to give to-morrow at the Sacred Heart. Very well! Instead of the epistle of the Superior Council, read this to your pupils."

The Abbé was stupefied. "Yes," continued the Marquis, smiling at the frightened appearance of his ex-mentor, "you will read them this, and bring me the copies—I will correct them. Promise me, besides, not to break the seals until to-morrow—in front of your pupils."

Then he had departed, leaving the Abbé stunned, the envelope in his hand in the same position it occupies at this moment. But yesterday he was alone; it was night; he believed he was dreaming, whereas now the sun is shining, and he is sure that he is not dreaming, for he can hear a murmur of impatience in front. Besides, Sister Babette, noisily blowing her nose, recalls the fact he is fully awake.

Then, hesitating no longer, he breaks the five seals, and reads in a clear, firm voice:

"We, Jean-Jacques de Marquette, Marquis of Phalenpin, of Fives and of Saint-Juir, Count of Tourcoing, of Saint-Yf, of Blaisy, of Buire, Baron of Rosendaël, of Madeleine, of Stohen, etc., etc., desiring to take a wife, declare that we will divide our goods and lands with, and bestow our names and titles upon, the young and amiable girl who shall best treat the following subject."

Here the Abbé stopped a moment to take breath. He had read all that precedes without pausing, without wavering, but the effort had been very great, and he was forced to rest a moment. Moreover, his stupefaction equalled that of his pupils.

But when his eyes fell upon the title, he thought his sight was failing him; but it was really true. The title was spread out there in beautiful Gothic letters—there could be no mistake about it, and the Abbé read, or rather stammered in a choking voice:

"Simply tell what you think of love."

Sister Madeleine started up, then fell back thunderstruck.

As for Sister Babette, she blew her nose in B flat in such a distressing manner that the whole class looked at her with compassion, and the laugh which hovered on all those rosy lips died away as if frozen with fright.

The Abbé recovered his composure. After all the crime was committed. He could not now draw back. On the other hand, the Marquis being, through his great-grandfather, honorary canon to the archbishopric, took the responsibility in the matter on his own shoulders.

It was therefore in an almost firm voice that he repeated, "Simply tell what you think of love."

For a moment all was confusion. They wondered if he were serious or joking. They looked at the Abbé, who, amazed at his own audacity, appeared graver than ever.

Digitized by Google

All had seen or heard of the Marquis, who was noted throughout the province for his peculiarities, and about whom the most extraordinary stories had been told. He was said to be handsome like his mother, who, with her beauty dazzled the whole countryside for twenty years; brave and proud like his father, who was drowned by the rise of the Escaut, while trying to save a poor wretch of a peasant.

After all, suppose it were true?

Each one sees herself marquise, and without more ado, they set to work.

Then a strange spectacle was seen. Fifty young girls—pupils of the Sacred Heart—oh, bitter irony! writing dissertations upon love under the superintendence of two sisters and an abbé.

All had read at home, in secret, novels or poems which their big brothers had forgotten to take away. All had some words here and there in the course of conversation, which their imagination, more or less weak, had turned, developed, and amplified.

All had some vague idea of this divine flower, whose seeds we carry in our hearts; a seed that, when it grows to blossom, enriches our whole existence, and gives us the strength to live in suffering, and to suffer without complaining.

They set about their work very quietly; but soon they warmed up to their task.

The five flowers of the coronet in perspective seized hold of all their imaginations and fired all their minds. And soon nothing is heard in the silence of the large hall but the tic-tac of the old clock, the feverish grating of the pens, and the respiration, more painful than ever, of Sister Babette, interrupted at regular intervals by the plaintive sighs of Sister Madeleine.

Maguelonne alone, in the midst of this restlessness, remained idle, quite ashamed of her inactivity. Maguelonne was a poor girl without father or mother; she was found when quite an infant at Phalenpin. This had been an event in the village; all the inhabitants had looked with astonishment at the little creature, richly dressed and wearing round her neck a chain of gold worth at least twenty pistoles.

"How heartless to have abandoned this sweet little creature," they said, and they talked and gossiped about it for a long time.

Finally, some kind-hearted peasants took her and brought her up.

Up to the age of twelve years she was allowed to run wild in the woods, barefooted, her hair floating in the breeze, always laughing and gay, gathering strawberries in summer and picking up dry wood in winter.

But one day the Mother Superior of the convent, having stopped by chance at the farm, saw Maguelonne, who looked so sweet and good with her clear blue eyes and long, disordered, golden hair, that, captivated by her lovely smile, she took her away with her to educate her. The pupil made rapid progress, and soon became the pride of her teachers. Her schoolmates grew jealous of her, and laughed at her; they jeered at her singular name, Maguelonne, at her shy, timid, and awkward ways.

Amid the general scratching of the pens hers alone is silent. Yet she writes better than all the others, for she has taken the prize each preceding year.

When the Abbé had commenced to read, "We, Jean-Jacques de Marquette, Marquis of Phalenpin," all her blood had rushed suddenly to her heart and she had scarcely had the strength to write her name at the top of the paper. For the Abbé had recalled to her an adventure which, though but a child, had made a deep impression on her mind.

She remembered it well. She was running about the woods in the winter, free from care and full of life, when she found, stretched across the road, a poor, old woman, unconscious, and with blood on her forehead.

It was poor old Basile, who was a little wrong in her head—all the village knew her well—and there she was alone in the centre of the wood, half dead and with nobody to help her.

As Maguelonne was crying and wringing her hands a handsome young lord appeared suddenly on horseback. He threw himself to the ground, raised the poor wounded woman, and running to a neighbouring stream, brought water in his beautiful velvet hat, revived her, and bathed her wounds.

Then he placed her on his horse, covering her with his own cloak, and all three returned to the village, where Maguelonne learnt that this handsome young lord was the Marquis of Phalenpin.

Maguelonne still sits idle, thinking only of that handsome young Marquis whose face from that time had occasionally troubled her maiden dreams.

But the old clock striking ten in a hollow tone awakens her with a start. What, already! Impossible! She has written nothing—absolutely nothing. She is in despair, but cannot help it. And thus it is that for the first time in her life Maguelonne, trembling and confused, hands in a blank paper.

* * * * *

When the young Marquis, shut up in his room, read those fifty compositions, his hair stood on end. Never, never had he believed in the possibility of such absurdities.

It was with a sigh of relief that he arrived at the last copy.

But—what! The paper was blank. It contained but one word, a name, sweet and harmonious in its simplicity—"Maguelonne." And the Marquis repeated it to himself: "Maguelonne, Maguelonne." Then, struck suddenly as by a divine inspiration, he exclaimed:

"Yes, you, you alone, poor dear ignorant one, merit my love. Your soul, no doubt, is as pure as the song of that nightingale which strikes upon and charms my ear!"

* * * * *

A fortnight afterwards Maguelonne was summoned to the convent parlour. When she entered she thought she was dreaming. Two pages, dressed in blue and gold, and carrying upon two velvet cushions a crown and keys of gold, came to meet her.

Then a handsome young lord approached, and, bending his knee, said to her:

"Maguelonne, I loved you without knowing you. I divined the beauty of your soul. Now that I see you my heart tells me that I am not deluded by a sweet dream. Will you, Maguelonne, live my life, endure my sorrows, and enjoy my pleasures? Will you bear my name, for the glory of my race and the happiness of my life?"

Maguelonne could not believe her ears. She felt her soul open to great, unknown joys, and, feeling as if she were dying—for her heart was beating violently—she burst into tears, repeating mechanically:

"Oh! my lord. My dear lord——"

A short time afterwards Jean de Marquette, heir to fiefs without number, wedded, before God and man, his dearly-loved little Maguelonne.

Guy de Saint-Mor.

Digitized by Google

THE VENGEANCE OF THE DEAD.

I AM a doctor. Some years ago, after spending half a decade in Oriental travel and study, I returned to my home in Naples.

As soon as I was settled, I took the steamer for Portici to visit Claudia. Leaning over the rail, I mused on certain changes which had taken place during my absence. When I set off on my travels, Claudia, then a beautiful girl of eighteen, was engaged to marry my best friend, Count Scala. But very soon the startling news came to me that my unfortunate friend had lost his life, having been washed overboard while crossing from Naples to Genoa. Six months later I learnt that Claudia had married a young Neapolitan, Leone Viotti, who had been Scala's rival, and who, according to certain whisperings, was rather more to the girl's fancy. While I was thus reflecting the steamer arrived, and I made my way to the Villa Viotti.

When she caught sight of me, Claudia came running down the terrace steps with an exclamation of delighted surprise.

"What, doctor, is it really you?" she cried. "So you have returned at last! We were beginning to think you must have turned Brahmin, or that some tiger in the jungle had devoured you."

She held out her hand to me, and I pressed my lips to it.

"You have grown even more beautiful than before," I said, gazing with admiration at her lovely face and dark waving hair. "It is very evident that the sun of love shines brightly on your pathway."

"Yes, I am very happy," she said, lifting her large dark eyes to mine. "I know Count Scala was your friend, but you will not be angry with me. I never really loved the Count, and I implored him to release me, but he would not. I have sometimes thought," she continued, while an almost cruel expression came upon her face. "that the anger he aroused in my heart brought him misfortune. Had he not died, I cannot think what would have happened."

Thus talking, we walked up towards the villa.

"Look, there is my boy!" exclaimed Claudia suddenly, and a handsome little lad of three came running down the path.

We stopped and chatted with the little fellow for a few minutes, and then went on, Pepino disappearing behind a large clump of flowering plants in chase of a pretty butterfly.

The rays of the declining sun streamed across the front of the villa, bathing it in a flood of red from roof to basement. I cannot say why, but I experienced a painful presentiment, a vague fear, as though some sorrow or danger threatened me. Ah! Would to God I had fled from the spot where I was so soon to witness such a tragedy!

We entered a large paved vestibule, and then a small room opening into the conservatory.

"I understand that you do not often come to Portici," I said to my hostess, when we were comfortably seated.

"No, Leone has a sort of aversion to the villa," she replied, "so we are almost always in Rome. My husband is usually very nervous, but by the sea he is worse. He consented to come here now only on account of Pepino, whose health is always better near the sea."

Presently she rose to order some refreshment, and while she was gone, I could not help thinking of poor Scala, whose death had occurred so opportunely, and been so little mourned by her who was to have been his wife. They had been betrothed from infancy. Claudia had appeared to me to feel some affection for him, but she was only a child then, and when her woman's heart awoke, it seemed it was given to another. The Count was not blind to this, but he loved her passionately, and hoped after marriage to win back her heart. His death was very strange. Could it, I wondered, have been a voluntary one?

Claudia's return interrupted my reflections, and when she had again seated herself, she begged me with almost a child's enthusiasm, to tell her about India, "about giant trees, elephants as big as houses, fakirs with birds' nests in their eyebrows, and green gods with thirty-six arms."

I related some of my most stirring adventures, and when I had finished, I questioned her in turn. She told me how her father had died shortly after her marriage, leaving her an orphan. She had only her husband and child left to love, and her love for them filled her heart to overflowing.

She chatted on with a smile upon her lovely face, her chin resting on her hand in an attitude full of unstudied grace. I gazed at her in silent admiration, thinking to myself that the man who possessed her love must indeed be happy.

Suddenly her countenance changed, and she started up with a cry of alarm. I turned hastily. A servant was running towards us with Pepino in her arms in frightful convulsions.

"Oh, madame," she cried, "what is the matter with him? See how convulsed he is!"

I hurried to the child, who was writhing in his mother's arms, and from the bright red colour which besmeared his lips, judged he must have eaten of some poisonous fruit.

"Good heavens!" I exclaimed, "what poison can it be?"

"Poison!" cried Claudia. "No, no; there is nothing poisonous anywhere here. Children often have these dreadful convulsions. But you will cure him, doctor, won't you?"

Digitized by Google

I could make no reply. The child was in a strange, and most alarming condition. While doing what I could to relieve him and watching the symptoms, I fancy I recognised the effects of a poison known only under foreign skies.

"It is impossible," I muttered. "Where could he have found that awful plant?"

I undressed the child and endeavoured to revive him by friction, but without success. Opening his small cramped fingers, I found what confirmed my worst suspicion, the crushed pulp of a vermilion-coloured fruit or flower. An exclamation of dismay broke from me.

"The serpent-flower! Alas, poor child, there is no hope for him!"

The mother uttered a cry which wrung my heart. She threw herself beside the poor little body and covered it with passionate kisses, sending up fervent prayers to Heaven to save her darling boy from death.

The father was sent for, and came in with haggard eyes, and quivering, livid lips.

"Leone, Leone!" cried Claudia, in an agony, "he is dying, our child is dying."

I was unnerved, cut to the heart by the terrible grief of the woman who was just now so happy, and by my own powerlessness.

In vain the frantic mother strove to bring her darling to consciousness; the merry laugh was silenced for ever, the little life was ended almost before it had begun.

An hour later I was walking in the garden, musing. As I strolled up and down, strange memories took possession of my mind. I seemed to see myself back again in Calcutta. I was seated under the verandah of my bungalow, writing a letter. As I indulged in this fancy the scene became more vivid. I saw myself finish the letter, place it in an envelope, drop a few strange-looking seeds, then seal it to Count Antonio Scala.

In a flash the reason of these recollections was revealed to me. The grains I had inclosed in the letter were some seeds from the serpent-flower. I remembered now that I had asked my friend to sow some of the seeds in a corner of his garden, and to inform me if the plants could be acclimatised in Italy. I was at the time studying the properties of the plant, which I thought might prove of value in medicine. But the Count had met his death shortly after the receipt of my letter, and it had remained for ever unanswered.

My musings had carried me thus far towards the solution of the mystery, when they were interrupted by a murmur of voices, and presently a group of gardeners and servants of the villa came along with spades and axes, going to destroy the accursed plant that had been the death of their beloved little Pepino.

I followed them, and soon we came to the place where it grew. I recognised it instantly. The serpent-flower is one of the strangest flowers I had ever seen. It resembles a small sheaf of serpents standing erect on their tails, and bending their heads towards a small red fruit something like a strawberry, but more velvety and flower-like. It is the flowers that resemble serpents; they swell out at the top in the shape of heads, and these heads are marked with two eyes and a sharp thorn which projects like a fang.

Before attacking the shrub, the servants, with the excitability common to Neapolitans, heaped abuse and curses upon it.

"Ah, baneful plant! A flowering devil! Viper knots!" they cried, and then they pounced upon it and endeavoured to pull it up by the roots. But it was firmly imbedded, and at first resisted all their efforts.

Suddenly a portion of the bush gave way, and the men fell back a step or two. But they came forward again and bent over the exposed roots. Then I saw a look of horror cross their faces; a terrible clamour arose among them, and dropping everything they rushed away, crossing themselves as they ran.

I hurried to the opening and looked in. Oh, the terrible, revolting, appalling sight that met my gaze! The roots, like claws, held in their grip a skull, while in a most horrible way they entwined themselves about the body. It was a skeleton with remains of hair and beard, and pieces of clothing mingling with the fibres of the plant. The hollow eyes seemed to gaze at me; they fascinated me, and my hair rose on end with horror. I seemed to hear a groan; then it rose louder and clearer and I distinctly caught the words, "Avenge me!" I stayed no longer, but turned and ran like a madman to the house.

The unhappy parents were still in the room with their dead child.

"Scala, Scala! it is Scala!" I cried, bursting in upon them. In my confusion of mind I could think of nothing else to say; I was choking with fear, frozen with horror.

Leone had risen at the sound of my voice. He gazed at me wildly, with great black rings round his eyes.

"You killed him," I went on, I had recovered from my fear, and my indignation burst forth. "I see how it was. He had my letter upon him, and it held your punishment—the terrible poison, the germ of this accusing plant. His murder is avenged; he has slain your child. But it will not end there! The crime is discovered, the alarm given: the murderer cannot deny his guilt."

My voice was harsh and menacing. I panted for breath.

The guilty man slowly shook his head.

"Deny it! Why should I deny it?" he said. "I know it is all over. Yes, I killed him. I bought my love at the price of a crime. It was so decreed by fate, but I tell you, had it been necessary, I would have strewn with corpses the path that led me to my beloved. You have never loved, you have the right to condemn me, but love will be able to absolve me."

The frankness of his confession disconcerted me, I was silent.

Claudia, wrapped in her great grief, had understood nothing. Leone drew her towards him, gazing at her with unutterable love, and kissing away the tears that blinded her beautiful eyes.

"Listen, my darling," he said, "your poor torn heart must bear another sorrow. For one moment stay your grief while I make my confession to you. Before I go away, I must have your forgiveness."

"Going away?" she exclaimed in tones of wonderment. With a quick gesture she laid her hands on his shoulders, and looked at him with a fixed and anxious gaze.

"Yes," he responded, and then he went on: "You remember, Claudia, that wretched evening when—every hope for us dead—I wandered round your home, mad with anxiety, not daring to enter. I peered into the windows of your lighted rooms, into the light at the open door. You were making one last effort to move Count Scala, to induce him to give you up. Oh, what torture I suffered during those few minutes!

Digitized by Google

"Suddenly you appeared in the light of the door, you descended the steps, and I clasped you, cold and trembling, in my arms.

"'All is over,' you cried. 'He refuses to release me. He is with my father, fixing the wedding-day. Farewell, I cannot live through it!' And you vanished into the red stream of light.

"An hour later the Count appeared at the door with your father. I learnt from their talk that the Count was to take a steamer immediately for Naples on business connected with the anticipated marriage. I wove the fact into the plan of my revenge.

"As he ran lightly down the path, I followed him, hiding in the shadows of the arbutus trees, and gliding along as silently as a beast of prey. Suddenly, I threw myself upon him, seizing him by the throat with one hand to prevent his uttering a cry, while with the other I plunged my dagger into his heart."

"You only acted as I would have done," cried Claudia, who had been drinking in her husband's words. "I should have killed him on the wedding night."

Leone turned upon me with a look of triumph. His wife had absolved him without a moment's hesitation, and her forgiveness satisfied him. He pressed her to his heart, and then proceeded to relate in firmer tones how, by a bold and ingenious plan of disguise, he had succeeded in getting it believed that his victim had been washed overboard from the steamer on which he had booked as a passenger. The Count's body was never recovered from the waves.

"Claudia, being liberated by Count Scala's death," he continued, "her father had no further reason for refusing her to me. She became my dear wife. The bliss of our union filled my whole soul, and drowned all remembrance of my rival.

"Nevertheless, I avoided the villa Portici, until Claudia talked of selling it because of my dislike for it, and thus forced me to come back in order to turn her from such a dangerous idea.

"Two months ago I came to the villa alone, to prepare it for our return. What strange attraction was it that led my feet towards the spot I would have shunned? Suddenly I gave a cry of alarm. There on the place of that secret, unknown grave, I saw that terrible plant, those blood-red flowers with their threatening fangs like serpents. What was it? How came it here? I seized it and tried to tear it up, but it was too firmly rooted, and I only made my fingers bleed with the thorns. Just then the gardener came up.

"'I was wishing to ask you about this bush,' he said. 'I did not like to dig it up without orders. It is a curious plant, and I set great store by it.'

"I thought I might forget the horrible plant, which fear had forced me to preserve, but its fangs had fastened themselves upon my memory, and its venom had entered my soul. I avoided the side of the park where the thing flourished, but I felt it was ever growing, becoming a shrub, a tree, a forest. I fancied I saw its threatening gestures, and heard its cries for vengeance; Ah, I knew he was waiting for us!"

Although he had begun his recital calmly, Leone was now feverishly excited. Claudia was weeping over his shoulder.

As for myself, I was deeply impressed by the man's story, and for Claudia's sake, if for no other reason, I began to regret that the crime had been discovered. As we stood there for a moment silent, many thoughts flashed through my brain, among them the disconcerting one that it was I who had been an indirect cause of all the misery I saw before me, and that it was in a way my hand that had laid the cold chill of death on the little body only a few hours ago so full of life and happiness. Then the present demands of the situation forced themselves upon me.

"How are you to escape from justice?" I cried. "The terrified gardeners have given the alarm. Is there still time for you to fly?"

Sounds were heard coming from the park. Leone listened, then shook his head.

"It is too late," he said; "but they shall not take me alive."

Claudia shrieked, and embraced her husband passionately.

"Kill me first," she moaned; "I cannot see you die."

Her beautiful hair had come unfastened, and streamed in disorder beneath Leone's lips. In the waving tresses shone a crimson flower. Leone's eyes searched the room, as if for a weapon. Suddenly they fell upon the blossom. For an instant he shivered and drew back, then, folding his beloved in a last embrace, he put his lips to the flower and ate it.

"Stop, stop!" I screamed. "It is the serpent-flower!"

"Thank you," he said; "watch over her."

Claudia, pale as death, rose quickly to her feet. She saw her husband's face grow convulsed, his lips bleed; she opened her mouth as if to shriek, and sank, without a sound, and insensible, to the floor.

Claudia never recovered from the shock of that terrible day. Her reason was gone, and six months later she died. The serpent-flower had done its work; the dead man was indeed avenged.

JUDITH GAUTIER.

WHAT DO DREAMS MEAN?

WHO has not at one time or another had some curious dream, the significance of which has perplexed him? Some dreams are caused by an overheated imagination or an impaired digestion, and others are so trivial as not to cause any grounds for a second thought being bestowed upon them.

On the other hand, there are many dreams which have an unquestionable significance. Many of them are influenced by our daily actions and thoughts, and frequently we find ourselves doing in our dreams what we would do in our daily life. These exercise our minds, and if we only knew what they portend we might be able to avoid events that afterwards come to pass. The history of the world is full of instances where dreams of a prophetic character have taken place, and the belief in them is shared by scientific and intelligent writers in every part of the world.

Occasionally a so-called dream book or two has been published pretending to give an explanation of these curious phenomena, but, as we all know, most of them are absolutely unreliable and are nothing but catchpenny publications.

We recently made the acquaintance of a lady who has made the laws of Oneirology a life study, and her explanations we have found to be singularly true in cases upon which we have consulted her. She has the reputation of being the most expert person in the world in this science. Accordingly we have made arrangements with her to give the fullest information to any reader of this paper who cares to send asking her advice. Readers should be very careful to explain in the fullest manner the whole extent of their dream. MADAME GEORGES will reply, giving a full explanation.

Readers should address their letters to "DREAMS," c/o. Short Stories Offices, Henrietta Street, Strand, W.C., and inclose six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope for reply.

Digitized by Google

GREAT - WAR - COMPETITION.

FIRST PRIZE . . £5
Five Prizes of £1 each.

25 Prizes of Handsome Books.
25 Gold-plated Pencil-cases.

In the event of a tie, the prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

SO much interest is at the present moment centred in that part of the world round the unfortunate Island of Cuba, that the competition we have inaugurated, should commend itself particularly to readers of Short Stories.

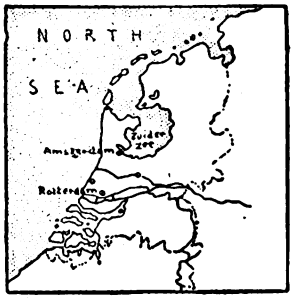
Below will be found eight pictures. Each one depicts the name of some place, or ship, or man associated with the combatants. Five sets of these pictures will be published. Write down the names in the spaces provided, and keep all the sets by you until we ask you to send them in.

The daily newspapers will give you the best help in discovering solutions, as most of the names depicted have already appeared in the press.

PERSON.

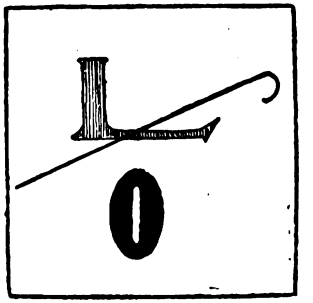
No. 17.....

WARSHIP.



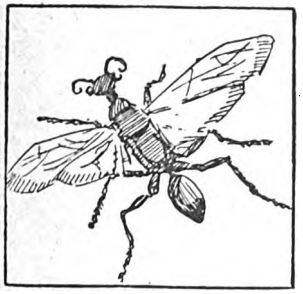
No. 18.....

WAR VESSEL.



No. 19.....

WARSHIP

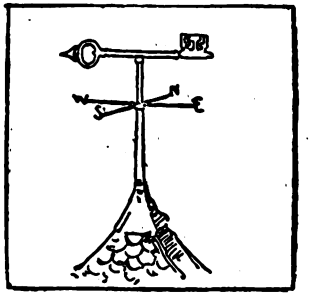


No. 20.....

PERSON.

No. 21.....

PLACE.



No. 22.....

PLACE.

No. 23.....

WAR COMPETITION.

No. 3.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

WARSHIP.

No. 24.....

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER XXIII.

MASTER OF THE SITUATION.

MASTERING his astonishment as best he could, Philip Augustus looked round the room to see by which of the four doors the assassin could have entered.

"I came in by the same door as the poniard," said the Syrian deliberately, as if in answer to the King's unspoken question.

The stranger's voice acted on Philip as the spur does on a thorough-bred, and he drew himself up, calm and self-possessed, in his accustomed royal dignity.

"I expected you," he said, "but not so soon."

There was a tinge of mockery in the answer.

"The King could not fail to expect me, since the 'King knows all.'"

Philip Augustus looked with increased attention at this remarkable man, whose self-possession was only exceeded by his intelligence, and he prepared to study this inscrutable foe, so as, if possible, to turn him to his own account. It might be that he could buy this man's allegiance, and in that case he would win a valuable addition to his informal secret police. One thing was certain, and that was that the man had lost an excellent opportunity by not attacking him when his back was turned, and that might portend that the infidel was prepared to change his master. Now Philip had his trusty sword within his reach, and what dagger could avail against that?

"You do not seem to have much faith in the King's omniscience, my friend?"

"We have a proverb," answered Mahmoud-el-Reis, "which says—'Know all—know nothing'—and that means that human knowledge is blind and vain."

"And did you take the trouble to come here into my palace to tell me the proverbs of your country? It is not generally for that, Mahmoud-el-Reis, that the sons of Ismail insinuate themselves into the presence of kings!"

The Moslem's eye never quailed before the searching glance that met it, and he replied simply:

"I intended to kill you and I could not do it. I could have killed you and I would not do it."

"Your first statement is probably true, but you can't expect me to believe the second."

Mahmoud drew himself up into his usual attitude of calm defiance.

"Last night, at this hour, the King rode through the avenue that leads from the Porte St. Honoré to the Louvre, and he was alone with his page Albret. When the drawbridge was lowered, did the King recognise the archer who came forward to take his bridle?"

Philip Augustus opened his eyes very wide, with the air of one who has just had a difficulty explained away for him.

"It was you. Yes, you are speaking the truth, you might easily have killed me then."

A moment later he added, with an impulse of curiosity that he could not resist:

"Why didn't you do it?"

"Why did you not cut my throat a few minutes ago, when you thought I had come to assassinate you and that I was in your power? Because you wanted to make use of me, and you are wise, for I can do more for you than ten of your proud barons. I did not kill you, in spite of the oath I swore to my father and the Master, because I have a desire, dearer to me than all else, and only the King of France can grant it to me."

"Oh, oh!" cried Philip, "this must be something very precious! Then you've come to make a bargain with me, Sir Mahmoud?"

"Yes, it's a bargain."

"Is it anything like the one you concluded with the Caliph Salim?" asked the King with a smile.

"I related that story to the 'Friend of the King,' so that the King should hear it," said the Syrian gravely, "If not, I should have had to repeat it now, so that the King might know what Mahmond-el-Reis can do."

It must be borne in mind that Philip was strongly imbued with the spirit of adventure, and had been steeped in the romance of chivalry from his boyhood. This strange interview had a kind of charm for him, it took him back to the days he had spent in the East.

"You need not enlarge upon your prowess, friend Mahmoud, for I know it well. The English can hit a mark at five hundred feet, the Danes swim like the fish in their own seas, the Rhenish soldiers can kill a fly with a stone from their slings, and the Italian subjects of the Holy Father have a genius for secret poisoning; but you from the region of the Anti-Lebanon stand unrivalled as accomplished assassins! Every nation has its strong point. Nor is it necessary for you to tell me the hand that really guides your poniard," added the King with an involuntary expression of triumph. "It is not the noble Saladin who fights thus against a loyal friend! Your master has been bribed by that arch-coward, John of England; it is he who has paid the price of blood!"

It is certain that Philip hoped to impress the Syrian by displaying this intimate knowledge of his affairs, but Mahmoud smiled indulgently as one does on a child who is making very laudable efforts which deserve encouragement.

"If the King's unworthy servant were sleeping on the dry moss of the forest between the lair of the lion and the hole of the viper, would he blame the lion for the poisonous sting that caused his foot to swell and awoke him with its agony? The lion and the viper may be known by the wounds they inflict."

Digitized by Google

"And the men of the East by their long-winded metaphors!" said the King under his breath. "Now what do you want with me?" he added aloud.

"First of all, I want to know whether one must flatter and deceive you as a king, or teach you as a man who has yet much to learn?"

"Speak quietly, and with due respect, if I am to listen to you, and you think to carry away your head on your shoulders!" said the King with an angry frown.

"Ah!" replied the Moslem, in a resigned voice, "I fear we have only been losing time, as you begin to threaten me. If you will not consent to treat me on equal terms, I must prove to you that, even here in your stronghold, you are not the master!"

"Take care!" cried Philip, looking at his sword, "I am losing patience!"

"I shall have patience enough for both."

The King strode to where his sword hung, took it down, and seated himself with the bare blade across his knees. Then he began in a severe tone:

"You are here, in my power, Mahmoud-el-Reis. I do not know by what means you entered my presence; but the traitor who helped you to do so, will no longer be able to protect you. Look at me!" he continued, extending his muscular right arm towards the Moslem. "Do you think that if I were reduced to contesting my life with you that victory would fall to your side?"

"On the plain, if you were mounted on your heavy charger, and bore a stout lance in your hand, I daresay you would overpower me, but here, armed as we are, I think my scimitar would tell against your sword."

The King rose angrily, and said in a bitter tone:

"I shall not attempt such an unequal struggle, friend Mahmoud. It would not add much to the fame of Philip Augustus to cleave your head in twain! There are others whose business it is to attend to such small matters."

So saying he went to the second door, near his bed, at which two mace-bearers of his body-guard watched night and day. He drew back the curtains without taking the trouble to see what was behind them, so intent was he upon proving to the arrogant Moslem how perfectly he was protected. No sign of surprise or emotion showed itself upon the dark features before him, and he turned in a state of irritation to summon the guards, when the words died upon his lips and he staggered back in dismay.

Instead of the honest faces of his trusty guards, there grinned at him the hideous countenances of two negroes, who had been painted up to resemble Europeans, and whose dark glassy eyes were glittering with savage ferocity.

"Albret! Come hither!" cried the King hoarsely. "Hither, my pages and equerries. Come hither!"

At last Mahmoud moved and walked slowly to the door opposite the one in charge of his black slaves. He drew aside the curtain and showed the insensible forms of Albret and two of the equerries lying on the floor.

The King gave a cry of horror and grief, for he thought they were dead.

"They only sleep," said Mahmoud quietly, "but he who gave them this drug might as easily have given them a fatal one: only he will never take another life!"

He unfastened his scimitar and threw it at the feet of Philip Augustus, saying humbly:

"Now, will the King believe his servant, and hear what he has to say?"

It was a strange picture! The guards sleeping their enforced sleep; the two grotesque slaves, sword in hand, glaring at their prey, and the King gazing in stupefaction at the assassin who had just disarmed himself. Mahmoud-el-Reis was the first to speak, and there was sadness mingled with the resolution of his voice.

"Whoever fails to accomplish his oath to the Grand

The King seated himself with the bare blade across his knees.

Master, is taken, on his return, through the city at mid-day to the great forest of Khyam, where he is stripped naked and bound to a hurdle. Then all the priests, dervishes and wise men, gather round him to say the prayers for the dead. For twelve hours, and twelve times in every hour, the soldiers and fellow assassins come to strike him across the face, crying:

"'Traitor! Traitor! Traitor!'

"When the twelfth hour has sounded from the minarets of the city, the priests, the dervishes, the wise men and soldiers, the assassins and the people, all combine in one final malediction on the unhappy victim and leave him alone with the executioner.

"This man cuts twelve deep gashes across the traitor's chest, and then retires to a safe distance, knowing that the blood flowing from the wounds he has made will attract the tiger from his lair, no matter how far off he may be. The tiger is not long in coming to complete the butchery begun by human hands.

"That, O King, is the fate to which I have condemned myself, and I accept it willingly!"

Philip Augustus had taken his seat again on a high, carved, throne-like chair over which were the coat-of-arms and the crown of France, while Mahmoud remained standing at some distance from him.

Between the two fell the bright patch of light from the lamp, and all around there was comparative darkness. The King listened thoughtfully, wonderingly, to the measured tones of the Syrian, who seemed to be thinking aloud, rather than addressing himself to his hearer. He resumed his meditative soliloquy.

"I have described to you the destiny I have chosen. Now hear the one which I have forfeited by my own act."

He then repeated, in much the same words as he had used to Ingeburge, the story of his happy wooing and promised bliss with Dilah, which he had chosen in preference to riches, lands, honours or power, all of which were offered to the successful assassin of Philip Augustus.

For a moment his voice failed as he dwelt upon the joys

Digitized by Google

"The bargain's closed!" said the King.

that had awaited him, and his eyes were clouded by a mist as he gazed into the shadows, but his tone was firm and his eye clear by the time he turned to the King, saying:

"That was to be my fate, and I will not accept it."

For a few seconds the King tried to pierce the veil which the Moslem kept so jealously over his inmost thoughts, but in vain. The face was as impassive and impenetrable as ever.

"And what price do you ask me for the renunciation of so bright a lot, and the acceptance of this tragic fate?"

"I come to ask you for that which neither the threats of kings, the prayers of the people, nor the thunders of the Church, have been able to obtain."

The King started in his chair.

"Oh! So you come from Madame Ingeburge?" he said quickly, while his face assumed an expression of suspicion and mistrust.

There was a faint tinge of contempt in the smile with which Mahmoud-el-Reis greeted this question, and his face flushed slightly as he answered:

"Oh, no! You do not know all—or if you do, God has deprived you of your reason! You love and protect her who deceives you, and abandon the one who adores you!"

"I am my own master," said Philip curtly, turning away with ill-concealed annoyance. Then, with an attempt at banter, he added:

"Madame Ingeburge chooses strange ambassadors!"

"Madame Ingeburge weeps and prays," replied the Syrian in a gentle voice, "weeps because of your cruelty and prays for you unceasingly. Five days ago I gained admission to the Abbey where you had imprisoned her. I went to assassinate her, for I had been promised the life of the King in exchange for that of the Queen. But God is great! The hand of God intercepted my hand. I saw the image of Dilah, my beloved, as that of an angel guarding the person of my intended victim, and when your soldiers entered the Abbey, I feared for her at your hands as I had done for her at those of your people, for I was her slave! Ah, you may smile," he broke off, "but we are talking of grave matters, of the destiny of Philip Augustus, King of France! I feared for her because I know she is an obstacle in your path, and such hindrances you get rid of. I would have defended the Queen against the fury of your soldiers, and I would protect her against the intrigues of your policy. If I am wrong, pardon me, and it will soon be seen whether I am right or not."

The King shrugged his shoulders and preserved a haughty silence.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE FATE OF THE STATUE.

"I BORE her away," continued Mahmoud-el-Reis, "from the midst of that carnage in my arms—in these arms which she had had bound but a few hours before in order to protect your life from my poniard. I carried her, fainting as she was, to a sure and safe retreat, known only to myself and my dumb slaves. There, in the deep recesses of the forest, I have guarded her and listened to the sweet tones of her voice, and, if you seek the explanation of my mysterious conduct, and the clue to my seeming irresolution, which have baffled the reasonings of your subtle intellect, of which you are so proud, know, then, O King, that your pure and saintly wife has worked a miracle! I am now a Christian!"

It is hard, almost impossible in fact, for us in these days of universal toleration and widespread indifference, to form any idea of the effect produced on the mind of Philip Augustus by these words. He knew the awful gulf which then yawned between the Cross and the Crescent, he had taken part in the wars that their deadly feuds had called into existence, and which had decimated the fairest families of the West. He had seen the impassioned fanaticism with which the followers of Islam fought for their faith, and knew something of the fate that awaited an apostate at their hands. That a member of the celebrated Fédavi, the picked band of assassins employed by the Lord of the Mountain, should abjure his faith at the teaching of a woman, seemed so incredible to Philip Augustus that he repeated the words as if to assure himself that he had heard aright.

"You are a Christian?"

Then as the other again answered in the affirmative, he added:

"But you will not now return to your native land, where you know that terrible death awaits you? Your change of faith releases you from any further responsibility in the matter."

"I swore to return to Dilah, my beloved, and I may not break faith with her, for she too must learn this wondrous lesson, before we go to our doom together."

There was no shaking the intrepid resolution of this man, so Philip changed the subject and turned to the affairs more closely concerning himself. The night wore on and the dawn was approaching. Albret and the guards still slept their magic sleep, and not a sound was heard in the palace except the voices of the archers at their posts and the chiming of the city clocks.

When the first rays of daylight began to struggle against the fading light of the lamp, Philip Augustus and Mahmoud-el-Reis were still in deep converse. They were sitting close together and their voices were lowered, although there was none to hear them.

"There are eight of them," the Syrian was saying, "There's Herbert Melfast, Lord of Pevensey, who came to fetch me from my home; Maître Honoré, the Freemason, bribed by the Duke of Burgundy; Jean de Valenciennes, paid by the Count Darmartin; Steinbach of Hamburg, in the service of the Emperor Otto; the three brothers Guiscard, who are the creatures of Baldwin, Count of Flanders; and the eighth——" he stopped short.

Digitized by Google

"The eighth came from Denmark, didn't he?" asked the King.

"No, he comes from France."

"Name him!"

"Amaury Montruel, Lord of Anet!"

"The Friend of the King!" added Philip sardonically, while in his own mind he repeated: "Who took Madame Agnes, alone, to the Rue de la Calandre at eleven o'clock that night."

"The bargain's closed!" said the King, rising suddenly, and giving his hand to Mahmoud. "You have the word of the King of France upon it!"

"And you have the word of Mahmoud-el-Reis."

"At midnight, in the choir of Nôtre-Dame!" said Philip.

"At midnight, I alone of the nine assassins shall be alive."

So they parted in the dim light of the early morning, and when his guards awoke, the King did not see fit to reproach them for their unwariness.

In the day that followed this momentous interview at the Louvre, Bishop Maurice de Sully was busily engaged in preparing his Cathedral for its first service of consecration. Though still far from finished, the work was that night to receive the blessing of the assembled prelates, and be the scene of the final decision of the Council.

The work was stopped in good time so that the masons might put the finishing touches to the interior arrangements under the direction of the Bishop himself. It was a red-letter day for all those who had been engaged in the great work. Each man loved the place nearly as much as did Maurice de Sully; he could put his hands on the stone he had cut or fixed in its place. They had all watched the growth and development of the great structure with the enthusiasm of artists and the devotion of Christians.

The whole of the gallery overlooking the inclosure had been wreathed and garlanded with flowers, and the good Bishop had not had the heart to refuse the masons the pleasure of hanging their own banners from the temporary roof that still covered part of the nave. The choir, which was the farthest advanced, had been provided with the proper means of lighting it; but it was no easy task to extend the illumination throughout the body of the Cathedral. It took them all the time from sunset till midnight to fix groups of candles to the capitals of the pillars, and hang festoons of light from the cornices or any other projection that lent itself to the purpose: at last, however, the task was done, and when the High Altar blazed out in its wealth of light and beauty, Bishop Maurice fell on his knees and thanked God for the fulfilment of his heart's desire. Around him knelt the men whose hands had wrought the work, and from the lips of those humble toilers rose the first solemn Te Deum within the walls that their labours had raised to such stately proportions.

The crowd had been gathering for hours outside, for the ceremony was to be a public one, and all who could find room were to be admitted without distinction.

Many dark rumours were afloat. Several well-known men had that day come by violent and mysterious deaths, and it was further reported that the dead body of Queen Ingeburge had been carried into the Cathedral, but that as soon as this service was over, her embalmed remains were to set out under an escort to the coast, to take ship for the kingdom of her brother Canute. Some even said they had seen the splendid coffin and the dark robed nuns watching round it in the apse of Nôtre-Dame.

Towards eleven o'clock the procession of Bishops and other ecclesiastics wended its way from the palace in the city to the Cathedral, preceded by monks and acolytes swinging censers and chanting the eighty-fourth psalm. The banner of Nôtre-Dame and those of the daughter churches were borne in the rear, and the light of countless tapers flashed on the gorgeous vestments and jewelled mitres of the learned company.

The great door at the west end was thrown open to receive them, and as they filed into their appointed places, the Cathedral choir took up the solemn chant. As soon as

A herald . . . proclaimed . . . "His Majesty, the KING!"

Digitized by Google

the members of the Council were seated, the Freemasons ranged themselves on the left of the nave, and then the crowd was free to enter. As they rushed to their places, cries of wonder and admiration were heard on all sides, regardless of the stern looks which some of the ecclesiastics cast at the simple-minded folk.

An open space in front of the altar had been left for the King and his attendants, and special places had been reserved for the great vassals of the crown. The Freemasons were all wearing the dress of their order, and each man bore his blunted lance wreathed with ribbons. When the popular excitement had partly died away, all eyes were turned to the south door through which the King and his suite were to enter, and over which was situated the workshop of the mysterious sculptor Jean Cador.

One side of the shed had been removed, and a strange sight was visible. It was a study in black and white, with a strong light thrown upon it, the figures of two black men, one on either side of a statue veiled in purest white. In point of mobility the living men lost nothing by comparison with the lifeless marble.

Everyone knew that this was the famous statue which Jean Cador had been commissioned to carve—but when was it to be unveiled? And when were those two motionless figures to show some sign of life? All the other beauties of Nôtre-Dame had now been revealed to the eyes of the multitude, and with the perversity of human nature that one veiled block of marble possessed far more charm for the majority than all the treasures that were displayed around them.

In the ranks of the Freemasons they were whispering.

"We are all here but Jean de Valenciennes and Maître Honoré our brother."

"And Jean Cador," put in another voice.

"Oh, he has never been near us since the day he was admitted," said an old mason.

Eric came in with his sister at this moment and heard the remarks his comrades were making.

"Neither Jean de Valenciennes nor Maître Honoré will be with you to night," he said, "for Jean was found with his skull cleft by a sword in his own house, and Maître Honoré was stabbed in the apartments of Herbert Melfast, Lord of Pevensey."

"Woe to that false Saxon!" muttered several voices.

"He has nothing to fear from you," continued Eric, "for the same blade that dispatched our comrade, pierced his false heart."

A dread silence fell on those who heard this tale of summary slaughter. Death seemed stalking unresisted through their midst.

A later arrival brought news that in the middle of the Great Bridge, under the lamp that hung before the shrine of the Virgin, had been found the three corpses of the brothers Guiscard; and at the very door of Nôtre-Dame, a German, named Steinbach of Hamburg, had been struck down by an invisible foe. He had uttered one cry and his blood had welled out on the pavement, at the foot of the steps.

"Room! Room!" cried the heralds from time to time, as one important personage after another arrived and was duly announced.

All the great barons, including my lord of Burgundy and cheery Jean de Nesle were there in all their splendour.

At last a wider passage was cleared in the centre of the nave and a herald, clothed in scarlet, embroidered with the Fleur-de-lis of France, proclaimed, as he flung open the south door:

"His Majesty, the KING!"

All heads were turned, necks were craned and men and women rose on tip-toe to see the arrival of Philip Augustus and Madame Agnes in their royal robes. But there was disappointment in store for them. The King came alone, attended only by his page Albret, and he wore the battered, tarnished armour that had seen him through his worst wars. A few paces behind him came his body guard, under the command of Jean Belin, who led his men to the space cleared for them.

Albret turned to look at Eve as he entered. She was pale and sad. Her eyes bore traces of frequent tears and her dress was all black. She had at last given up hope and donned mourning for her royal foster-sister. She answered his gaze with a tender little smile, but her heart was too full of sorrow for her personal affairs to have much interest at that moment.

"Where is the Queen?" was the question that rose to all lips.

The King knelt for a few minutes before the altar, after which he rose and faced the Council who were sitting in a semi-circle within the choir.

"My most reverend Fathers in God," he said, "whatever decision you may have come to, is now immaterial.

"Your assembly has become purposeless, and I give you my royal permission to dissolve the Council."

"Philip of France," cried the legate, pale with indignation, "you did not call us together and you are powerless to disband the Council convened by his Holiness!"

The King raised his mail-covered right hand to Heaven, and said:

"God works his will without our aid, most reverend Fathers. Your consultations are no longer to the purpose, seeing that the King of France has now but one wife."

A prolonged murmur ran through the ranks of the ecclesiastics, and a cry of horror rang through the assembled multitude, for these words confirmed the worst suspicions of most of those present.

Some of the bolder spirits ventured to say:

"The King had two wives, one he hated and the other he loved. It's the one he hated who's dead, of course!"

"Here comes the one he loves!" cried several near the door. And in truth there was Madame Agnes arrayed in her royal robes and wearing the crown of a Queen Consort, descending from her gilded litter with the assistance of Amaury Montruel.

As she was about to set foot inside the Cathedral, the gruff voice of Captain Antoine Cadocu, cried out: "Halt, there!" and while two halberds barred her entrance to the building her companion was pushed quickly inside. The prelates were holding a whispered consultation, and King Philip Augustus watched the little scene enacted with such rapidity before the door without making any sign of favour or disapproval. It was as if he had not known the people concerned in it.

When Montruel had recovered from the sudden shock, he prepared to advance to the King's side, but as he passed under the shed containing the statue, an instantaneous gleam of intelligence was seen in the eyes of the negroes. There was an imperceptible movement somewhere, the statue tottered on its base, and then reeled heavily forward, descending with a terrific crash upon the treacherous "Friend of the King." In the very way that he had bartered for his master to end his days, he fell himself—crushed and mangled under the image of the woman whose undoing he had sought so eagerly.

(To be concluded.)

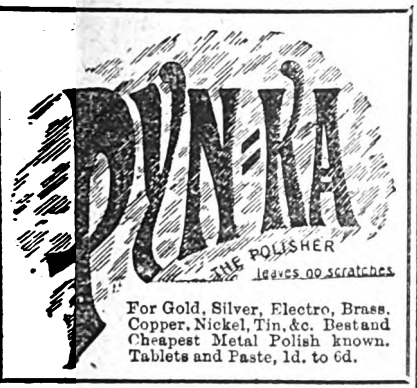
Great Cricket Competition

PRIZES OF £1,000, £100, £25.

In Pearson's Weekly now on sale appear particulars of a big competition in which the above substantial amounts are offered.

A list of fifteen matches appears, and all you have to do is to indicate which club you consider will win, in the same way as the famous Pearson's Weekly Football Competitions.

Digitized by Google



For Gold, Silver, Electro, Brass, Copper, Nickel, Tin, &c. Best and Cheapest Metal Polish known. Tablets and Paste, 1d. to 6d.

TRILENE TABLETS
THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS
Registered by GOVERNMENT
Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably"

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MR. CLAUDE CARTER, of Thorn House, Johnstone, N.B., says: "Your Tablets much reduced my weight and I have been waiting to see if it was permanent, and so it has proved."

MR. CANHAM, 87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, says: "Tablets cured my wife two years ago of extreme stoutness. It has never returned."

MARION TAYLOR, of Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "Have lost quite two stone."

A. PEEL, of Darley Hydro, Matlock, writes: "They have reduced and benefited me a good deal."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than one stone."

MR. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead. "I think them wonderful not only to reduce fat but as a medicine.

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Pinsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

REALLY GENUINE.

In Patent Air-tight Tins. ½lb., 10d.; 1lb., 1s. 4d.; 2lb., 2s. 4d.; including tin and postage.

MRS. CONYERS,
MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps.

ALEX. ROSS,
62, Theobald's Road, London.
Opposite Bedford Row.
(Est. 1850.)
Parcel free from observation

A Model of Comfort and Convenience is what you will find

Your Sanctum or Private Den

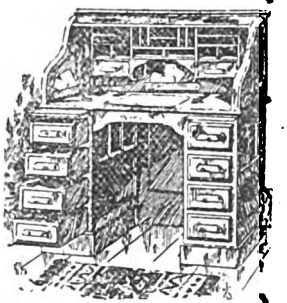
if fitted with one of our American Derby Roll-Top Desks and Tilting Chairs.



A Derby Desk is an Office in itself.

These Desks as to Style, Workmanship, and Durability cannot be excelled: we both recommend and guarantee them. Contrived to embody Elegance, Utility, and Comfort. Each one is made under the supervision of the originator. We pride ourselves on the Quality of all Goods, and stock nothing of an inferior nature.

☛ Special Agents for the celebrated Blickensderfer £8 10s. Typewriter.

FREE! Any Reader of Short Stories can have one of our Handsome No. 61 Illustrated Catalogues on application.

THOMAS TURNER (LEICESTER) LTD.,
44 HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.
7 & 9 NEWARKE STREET, LEICESTER.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. TAYLOR, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

DEER RECTORY, MINTLAW, ABERDEEN,
NOVEMBER 8TH, 1897.

From Rev. J. H. BURN.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

Digitized by Google

AIDS TO ACCURACY.

WITH this number of Short Stories is presented a supplement dealing with the FRESH AIR FUND. I should consider it a great favour on the part of my readers if they would do their best to get together a few subscriptions for this charity. Short Stories has always done its part well during the existence of the FRESH AIR FUND, and I feel sure that its readers will not go back on their past performances. Ninepence, as perhaps you are already aware, covers the total expenses—railway, food and drink—of one little ragged child for a whole summer's day.

R. H. W.—A wind from the south-west gives the steadiest and most continuous rain; the west to north-west the heaviest, but the latter is an intermittent downpour. More rain has been known to fall in fifteen minutes with the wind veering from west to north-west than has fallen during a day during a similar storm with the wind in the south-west.

ABSTAINER writes to ask whether the consumption of beer, tobacco or tea increases fastest in this country.——The consumption of tea has increased most during the last ten years; tobacco comes next, and beer comes third.

W. K.—Henry VIII. was the first of the Kings of England to insist upon being addressed as "Your Majesty." Before that time, the sovereign was addressed as "Your Highness," "Your Grace," or "Your excellent Grace."

CABBY.—Yes, it is quite true. If you had lived two or three centuries ago, you would probably have had to choose some other way of making a living, for in the year 1635 a royal decree was issued to the effect that no hackney coaches were to be "used or suffered" in London or Westminster, unless they were to travel three miles out of town, and it was further provided that no one should go in a coach in the streets unless the owner of the coach constantly maintained four able horses for the Royal service when required.

D. D.—You may be surprised to hear that if the Queen were to call all the policemen of England with their officers to a review, an army of nearly 40,000 men would have to pass before her.

I. I. I. wants to know if blindness is more prevalent among women than among men.——No; quite the contrary. Blind men outnumber blind women two to one.

R. E.—Earthenware sleepers are in use on some of the Japanese Railways.

NOVA-SCOTIA.—The number of men estimated as being employed in the world's navies, is 1,693,000.

A NOTTINGHAM reader, signing himself "Shoreham," writes: "I send you herewith a cutting from the Nottingham Evening Post, of Tuesday last, and I think you will admit it is sufficiently startling when taking into consideration the possibilities evolved by Mr. M. P. Shiel in his most excellent story, 'The Empress of the Earth.' Evidently something is going to happen in that part of the globe, and it is apt to make one wonder whether Yen How is simply a creation of the novelist's brain or an actual possibility and fact." The newspaper cutting reads as follows: "According to a North China paper, the people inhabiting the Yangtse Valley have recently begun to quietly arm themselves, and they are being gradually supplied with firearms though various influential quarters. Something is evidently expected to happen in the near future, and the leaders of public opinion amongst the masses are apparently trying to prepare the minds of the latter for some crisis."

"THE Empress of the Earth," has, it appears, aroused the interest of our readers in all things Chinese. Several readers have written to ask why the term "Celestials" is applied to the natives of China.——This appellation is probably the outcome of the Chinese custom of speaking of the reigning dynasty as Tien-chao, or "Heavenly Dynasty." The designation is no doubt based on the claim of the founder of each successive dynasty to have received the command of Heaven to punish and supersede a line of wicked rulers, he and his successors therefore becoming Tien-su, or, "sons of Heaven."

H. V., another admirer of Mr. Shiel's story, asks: "What is the circumference of the walls of Pekin, and how many gates are there?"——The outer great wall of Pekin is twenty-seven miles in circumference. There are thirteen gates, but though finely arched, they are insignificant, being only twenty feet high. At night they are closed with great doors sheathed with iron, and no one can pass in or out.

C. C.—The umbrella was described in early dictionaries as a "portable penthouse to be carried in a person's hand to screen him from violent rain or heat." John Macdonald, writing about the year 1778, says that he had a fine silk umbrella which he had brought from Spain; but when he went out with it, people called him a Frenchman and asked him why he did not hire a coach. The drivers of hackney coaches were much annoyed, believing that the introduction of the umbrella would seriously affect their trade.

COTTON MILL.—The finest cotton in the world comes from Egypt; the only kind that can compete with it is the Sea Island (America) production, which is limited in quantity. Indian cotton is poorer in quality and has only one-eighth the yield per acre of Egyptian cotton. Jumel, a Frenchman, conceived the idea of cultivating cotton in the land of the Pharaohs in 1820, and astute Mehemet Ali saw the value of it and favoured the project.

EQUINE.—A blind horse will gallop round a field without knocking against the surrounding fence. The sense of smell informs the animal of its proximity.

KATIE asks: "Who was 'Peter the Wild Boy'?"——He was a savage creature found in the Harzwald, in the Electorate of Hanover, when George I. and his friends were hunting. He was walking on his hands and feet climbing trees like a squirrel, and eating grass and moss. That was in 1725, and he was supposed to be thirteen years old. He was brought to this country and lived for a number of years, but no change could be effected in his habits.

CHARLES G. writes: "My sister and I have been having a discussion on the subject of biting off the ends of thread or silk instead of using the scissors. I contend, among other things, that it is likely to be dangerous from a hygienic point of view; she replies that I am too fussy about health. What is your opinion?"——That the weight of evidence appears to be on your side. It has recently been discovered in France that lead poisoning has resulted from biting off the ends of silk. Investigation revealed that advantage is taken of the dyeing process to add lead salts, which the thread partly absorbs. That makes it heavier, which means so much extra profit, because silk thread is sold by weight.

Notice to Competitors.

IN all Prize Competitions the Editor's decision is final. No correspondence will be entertained when once a competition is finished and the result published.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A CHANCE OF A LIFETIME.

GIGANTIC CLEARANCE SALE.

£50,000 worth of Goods Offered at Half Price.

THE ENORMOUS STOCK OF CARPETS, CURTAINS, SHEETS, BLANKETS, QUILTS, &C., MUST BE CLEARED WITHOUT REGARD TO COST, OWING TO THE L.C.C. REQUIRING PRESENT PREMISES FOR STREET IMPROVEMENTS.

New Premises having to be acquired by us, this Sale is held in order to Clear Out Heavy Stocks previous to the removal. NEW GOODS have to be sacrificed, together with all Regular Stocks, as it would be almost impossible to remove the Valuable and Heavy Stocks to New Premises without great risk and loss by damage to the Goods in transit, and this renders AN ABSOLUTE CLEARANCE IMPERATIVE. The magnificent opportunity is therefore afforded the readers of Short Stories of buying the NEW SEASON'S GOODS that are just coming in fresh from the looms at prices lower than the cost of production; and in many cases the Goods are being offered at less than HALF PRICE.

This Offer Will Not be Repeated.

ALL GOODS WARRANTED ABSOLUTELY PERFECT IN EVERY WAY. Money Willingly Returned if not Approved

Lot 1.—4s. Lace Curtains for 1s. 11d. These beautiful Lace Curtains, containing about 6 yards in the pair, 48in. wide, shaded ground, taped edges, with handsome double borders. Undoubtedly the cheapest ever offered. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 5s. 6d. Satisfaction guaranteed. — 4s. Lace Curtains for 1s. 11d.

7s. Lace Curtains for 3s. 11d. — Lot 2.—7s. Lace Curtains for 3s. 11d. per pair, measuring 3½yd. long, by 52in. wide, shaded ground, taped edges and handsome double borders; wash easily. 3 pairs for 11s. 3d. Money returned if not approved.

Lot 3.—Specially handsome Drawing-room Design, entirely new and most successful. In white or cream, with scolloped and taped edges, made from thoroughly sound cotton yarns; warranted to wear well. Sale price, 5s. 11d. per pair. Each Curtain measures 3½yd. long by 60in. wide. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 17s. Money returned if not approved. — 10s. 6d. Lace Curtains for 5s. 11d.

Lot 7.—10,000 Special Extra Quality, Heavy Loom Kitchen Table Cloths, made from the heaviest and strongest Linen Yarns. Numerous artistic patterns. Specially recommended for hard wear. Warranted to give the best possible satisfaction, being very neat, inexpensive, and durable.

Size 54in. by 45in., price 1s. 2d. each, or 3 for 3s. 3d.
Size 56in. by 56in., price 1s. 5d. each, or 3 for 4s. 0d.
Size 62in. by 62in., price 1s. 11d. each, or 3 for 5s. 3d.
Size 68in. by 62in., price 2s. 2d. each, or 3 for 5s. 11d.

Lot 22.—10s. 6d. White Scotch Blankets for 5s. 9d. per pair, measuring about 56in. by 76in.; light, warm, and durable. Admittedly the cheapest blankets ever offered. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 15s. 6d. Satisfaction guaranteed or money returned. — 10s. 6d. White Scotch Blankets for 5s. 6d.

25s. Special Heavy Blankets for 14s. 9d. — Lot 23.—25s. Special Heavy Witney Yorkshire Blankets for 14s. 9d., measuring 75in. by 96in. Manufactured entirely of pure long staple wool, bleached by the sun and beautifully white. Give endless wear, and are easily washed. For perfection of finish, durability, and economy, they are unequalled. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 42s. Money returned if not approved.

WITNEY BLANKETS.

EXCEPTIONAL VALUE.

Lot 24.—800 pairs of best quality Witney Blankets, with fancy borders, very soft, warm, of great durability. Made from the best wool, and warranted to give every satisfaction. Prices given below are little more than half the original cost.

Size	Weight.	Price per Pair.	3 Pairs for
53in. by 70in.	4lb.	6s. 3d.	18s.
60in. by 80in.	6lb.	7s. 9d.	22s.
70in. by 90in.	8lb.	11s. 6d.	33s.
75in. by 96in.	9lb.	13s. 0s.	37s.
80in. by 99in.	10lb.	15s. 3d.	43s.
86in. by 104in.	11lb.	16s. 9d.	48s.

Lot 30.—9s. Bleached Twill Sheets for 4s. 11d., measuring 64in. by 84in. Made from the best cotton yarns, thoroughly shrunk, soft finish, and hemmed ready for use. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 14s. 3d. Satisfaction guaranteed. — 9s. Twilled Sheets for 4s. 11d.

15s. 6d. Sheets for 7s. 11d. — Lot 31.—15s. 6d. Bleached Twill Sheets for 7s. 11d., measuring 90in. by 100in. Made from the best cotton yarns, thoroughly shrunk, soft, finish, and hemmed ready for use. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 22s. Money returned if not approved.

Lot 39.—1,500 yards of Best Quality Kidderminster Carpeting, 36 inches wide, at 1s. 11d. per yard; usual price 3s. 6d. per yard. Can be supplied in numerous handsome and effective designs and rich colourings to harmonise with all requirements. Impossible to repeat this offer. Money returned if not approved. — 3s. 6d. Best Quality Kidderminster Carpeting for 1s. 11d.

3s. Best Brussels Stair Carpet for 1s. 9d. — Lot 48.—3s. Brussels Carpeting for 1s. 9d. per yard, 22 inches wide. Handsomely bordered, superior quality, light and dark shades, magnificent design and colourings. Satisfaction guaranteed or money returned

10,000 RUGS

GIVEN AWAY.

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Lot 50.—THIS PHENOMENAL OFFER is made to the readers of Short Stories only. On receipt of Postal Order for 6s., or 74 stamps, we will forward DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, etc., handsomely bordered and woven in 50 different patterns and art colourings to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for the goods of the British Carpet Weaving Company BELOW THE ACTUAL COST OF PRODUCTION. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained Direct from our Looms, thus saving the Purchasers all Middle Profits.

GIVEN AWAY.—WITH EVERY CARPET WE SHALL ABSOLUTELY GIVE AWAY A VERY HANDSOME RUG TO MATCH; OR WE WILL SEND TWO CARPETS AND TWO RUGS FOR 10/6.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

THOUSANDS of REPEAT ORDERS & UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

BRUSSELETTE CARPETS.

ADMITTEDLY THE CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD.

Seamless, Woven, and Reversible, Rich Turkey Patterns and Colourings, Superior Quality, with Handsome Border to match; a Marvel of Excellence and Beauty.

Lot 60. SIZES and PRICES. No.	ft. in.	ft. in.	Sale Price.	Former Price.
1	9 0 by 6 0		5/6	9/0
2	9 0 by 7 6		7/0	11/9
3	9 0 by 9 0		8/6	13/6
4	10 6 by 7 6		8/9	13/9
5	10 6 by 9 0		10/0	15/6
6	12 0 by 9 0		11/6	18/0

Lot 60. SIZES and PRICES. No.	ft. in.	ft. in.	Sale Price.	Former Price.
7	12 0 by 10 6		13/6	20/6
8	13 6 by 10 6		15/3	24/0
9	12 0 by 12 0		15/3	24/0
10	13 6 by 12 0		17/0	27/0
11	15 0 by 12 0		19/0	32/0
12	18 0 by 12 0		22/9	36/0

These Carpets are splendid imitations of real Brussels Carpets, the designs having been carefully copied from the originals, both as regards colourings and patterns, so that when in use it is almost impossible, except by close scrutiny, to detect the difference. All designs are registered, and deservedly considered works of art. We can confidently recommend them for use in the dining and drawing rooms, or any rooms and landings where hard wear is a necessity.

GIVEN AWAY.

As an advertisement for the introduction of these goods to all readers of Short Stories we have decided to give away to every purchaser a very handsomely-woven Hearthrug, 6 feet long and 3 feet wide, to match carpets in colours, etc.

THOUSANDS of REPEAT ORDERS & UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

DEAR SIR,— 9 Bedford Row, High Wycombe, Bucks.

I have seen some of the Carpets and rugs sent by your firm, and think they are really a marvel. Please forward goods as follows, etc.—Yours faithfully, Rev. F. H. MAY

"SHORT STORIES" COUPON
On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. for amount we guarantee to send any goods as above.
THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED OR MONEY WILLINGLY REFUNDED.

All Orders despatched same day as received. Cheques and Postal Orders should be made payable to J. HARGREAVES, and crossed UNION BANK. ADDRESS:

THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING COMPANY, Sale Dept., 31 OLD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE NEW HOLIDAY ALPHABET.

A is for ANGLING, Oh! sport filled with bliss.
(A for the Aches BEECHAM'S PILLS can dismiss.)

B is for BATHING, of all fun the king,
(B for the Bloom BEECHAM'S PILLS always bring.)

C is for COACHING, o'er mountains afar.
(C for Convenient, BEECHAM'S PILLS ever are.)

D is for DANCING, by bright 'lectric light.
(D for Dyspepsia BEECHAM'S PILLS soon put right.)

E for ENJOYMENT of every kind.
(E for Expedient BEECHAM'S PILLS you will find.)

F for FLIRTATIONS—so oft doomed to vanish.
(F for the Faintings that BEECHAM'S PILLS banish.)

G is for GOLFING, on earth the best game.
(G for the Guinea of BEECHAM'S PILLS fame.)

H is for HAPPINESS, health will ensure.
(H for the Headache BEECHAM'S PILLS always cure.)

I is for INNOCENT—we ever are that.
(I for Insomnia, BEECHAM'S PILLS can combat.)

J is for JOURNEYS by sea, lake, and land.
(J for the Joy BEECHAM'S PILLS will command.)

K is for KISSES—a few on the sly.
(K is for Keep BEECHAM'S PILLS always by.)

L is for LOVEMAKING, delights never dying.
(L is for Languor, BEECHAM'S PILLS can send flying.)

M is for MUSIC, each day on the pier.
(M is for Matron who holds BEECHAM'S PILLS dear.)

N is for NOVELS, to read at your ease.
(N for the Nightmare BEECHAM'S PILLS can appease.)

O for the OCEAN, alive night and day.
(O for Obstructions BEECHAM'S PILLS clear away.)

P is for PICNICS, for pleasure in quest.
(P stands for Pills, BEECHAM'S PILLS are the best.)

Q for QUEEN'S WEATHER, that all may go well.
(Q for the Qualmishness BEECHAM'S PILLS quell.)

R is for ROWING, for young men the thing.
(R for Relief BEECHAM'S PILLS quickly bring.)

S is for SWITCHBACK, the fun of the age.
(S is for Sickness BEECHAM'S PILLS soon assuage.)

T is for TENNIS, the game to allure.
(T for the Trembling BEECHAM'S PILLS always cure.)

U is for UNDER THE AWNING, at night.
(U for Unfitness BEECHAM'S PILLS soon put right.)

V is for VALLEYS and wide wealth of view.
(V for the Vertigo BEECHAM'S PILLS soon subdue.)

W for WHEELING, which thousands love well.
(W for Weariness BEECHAM'S PILLS dispel.)

X is for 'XTRAS you find in your bill.
(X stands for 'Xcellent BEECHAM'S PILLS still.)

Y is for YACHTING, grand sport here revealed.)
(Y for the Youth BEECHAM'S PILLS quickly yield.)

Z for the ZOO, for young folks just the thing.
(Z for the Zest BEECHAM'S PILLS ever bring.)

Digitized by Google

BANK HOLIDAY NUMBER.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 492. FOR WEEK ENDING JUNE 4TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH

DEPENDS LARGELY ON THE PURITY OF FOOD.

Beware of Mixtures.—"We cannot imagine that our ideal pure Cocoa—a perfect food in itself—can be improved by such additions (as Kola and Hops). In fact, we are of opinion that its dietetic value would be altered, and that it would become a medicinal preparation."—Guy's Hospital Gazette.

"Kola is a Drug pure and simple."—Epicure. "Kola is not harmless."—Medical World.

CADBURY's Cocoa is Absolutely Pure.

CADBURY'S

Cocoa is the most sustaining beverage for brain fatigue and for muscular force.

"Consumers should be supplied with a dietetic article whose purity is unquestioned, and without doubt this essential quality is the characteristic virtue of Cadbury's Cocoa."—Public Opinion.

CADBURY'S

Cocoa stands among the highest, if it has not attained the first place for its purity. According to analysis it stands head and shoulders above all other Cocoas."—To-Day.

"The name of Cadbury may always be accepted as an unimpeachable guarantee of excellence."—Happy Home.

"CADBURY's Cocoa knows no superior as a perfect food, and is absolutely genuine."—Gentlewoman.

When you ask for CADBURY's Cocoa see that you get it, as commoner and mixed qualities are often pushed for the sake of extra profit.

Digitized by Google

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably"

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MR. CLAUDE CARTER, of Thorn House, Johnstone, N.B., says: "Your Tablets much reduced my weight and I have been waiting to see if it was permanent, and so it has proved."

MR. CANHAM, 87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, says "Tablets cured my wife two years ago of extreme stoutness. It has never returned."

MARION TAYLOR, of Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "Have lost quite two stone."

A. PEEL, of Darley Hydro, Matlock, writes: "They have reduced and benefited me a good deal."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than one stone."

MR. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead. "I think them wonderful not only to reduce fat but as a medicine.

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Bldgs., London, W.C.

Invested Funds,

£10,000,000.

Particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 183a, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.: 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

70 SONGS, 1/- Post Free.

Piano and Dance Pieces, with Portrait of Beethoven, and Coupon for Free Gift.

TURNER'S Piano & Music Depot, Preston.

GOOD WRITERS (either sex) Wanted; genuine employment at own homes; stamped address for particulars. Box 321, Circular Addressing Company, 27 Eldon Street, Finsbury, London.

WADE'S WONDERFUL OFFER

A SOLID SILVER WATCH GIVEN AWAY.

SEND NO MONEY.

In order to introduce my name into every household in the Kingdom, I undertake and guarantee to give away one of my "World-Famed £2 Silver Watches," last price, Ladies' or Gentlemen's, to every reader who sends me the correct reading of the Rebus printed below. I am preparing to send out immediately 2,000 of these watches. This is a perfectly genuine competition, and the only thing you have to do is carry out the conditions, and if you succeed in guessing correctly you have the advantage of our truly wonderful offer.

These pictures represent three well-known English Wild Flowers. The conditions of the Competition are that you find out what these flowers are, and if you are correct you undertake to purchase one of my inexpensive Solid Silver Chains. These chains are the best made, are marvellous value. Money returned if dissatisfied. Send at once, enclosing stamped and addressed envelope, so that I may inform you if correct.

W. W. WADE,

WATCH MANUFACTURER,

Dept. 35, GOLD EXCHANGE,

Hammersmith, London, W.

THE NEW LEMONADE

2 Gallons for 4½d.

Many people suffer from extreme thirst during the hot weather. Messrs. Foster Clark & Co. have supplied the want that has so long been felt by making a concentrated lemonade, which is far more economical than the ordinary lemonade. It is made from the finest lemons, and the great advantage is that it is partly manufactured in Italy, in the midst of the lemon orchards. The lemons are taken direct from the trees to the factory to commence their transformation into the Eiffel Tower Lemonade. You can get thirty-two tumblers (or two gallons) for fourpence halfpenny. If you cannot get it from your grocer, send sixpence to G. FOSTER CLARK & Co., No. 115 Eiffel Tower Factory, Maidstone, Sole manufacturers of "EIFFEL TOWER LEMONADE."

£20 Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (230 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

SILVER QUEEN CYCLES!

Best Value on Earth.

Immense stock of Ladies' and Gents' machines. New and Secondhand. Wonderful bargains. Carriage paid. Easy payments from 10s. monthly, or large cash discount. 1 year's guarantee. Illus. price lists post free on application. Old cycles exchanged The SILVER QUEEN CYCLE Co Ltd., 221 Tottenham Court Road, London.

THE John Noble

COSTUMES COMPLETE, 10/6 SKIRTS ALONE, 5/6

HOME, HOLIDAY, AND HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

HIGHEST KNOWN VALUE FOR MONEY.

Sent by Parcel Post direct from the Largest Firm of Costumiers in the World, and Originators of Half-Guinea Costumes.

PATTERNS

of these Costumes, which are made up in Two Good Durable Cloths—

I. John Noble Cheviot Serge, weighty and weather-resisting.

II. John Noble Costume Coating, smooth-surfaced and of lighter-weight—together with NEW ILLUSTRATED 84-PAGE CATALOGUE for Ladies and Children, to all who name Short Stories.

SENT POST FREE

A Full Dress Length (6yd., 52in. wide) of either cloth for 7/6; carriage, 8d.

COLOURS of all Costumes: Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Ruby, Sage Green, Electric, Fawn, Purple, and Grey.

The Three Stock Sizes are 34, 36, 38 in. round bust (under arms), Skirts being 38, 40, 42 in. long in front. Any other sizes, made to measure, 1/6 extra.

Ladies' Own Designs made up in any kind of Fabric by Skilled Dressmakers at minimum cost. A Box of 1,000 Patterns lent to select from, and sent carriage paid.

Mourning Orders executed and sent off in 12 hours.

Bankers: LONDON & MIDLAND BANK Ltd.

PLEASE MENTION "SHORT STORIES" when ordering from

JOHN NOBLE LTD.,

Brook Street Mills,

MANCHESTER.

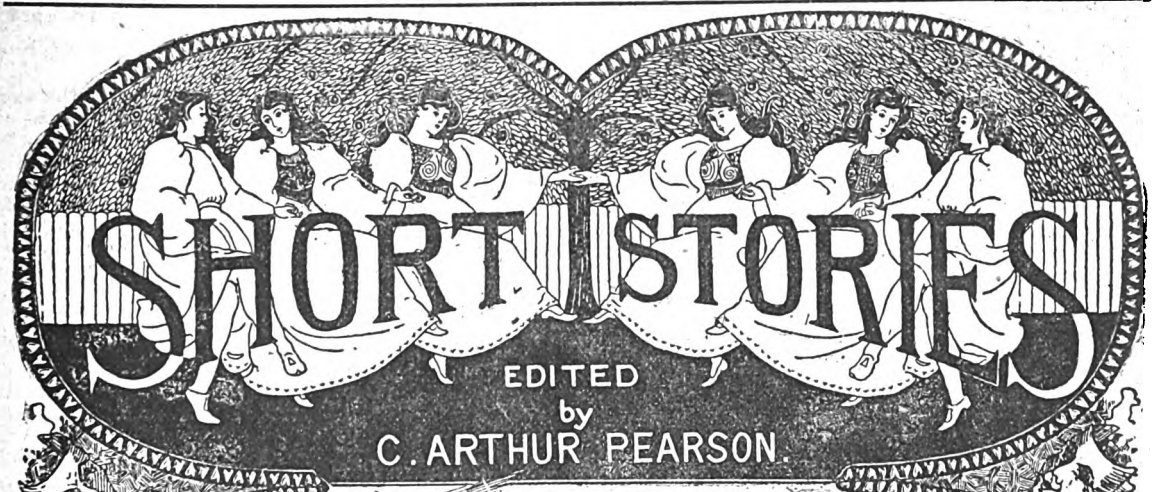
Model 894.
New "Gordon" Costume.
New design, with well-cut bodice trimmed fancy stitching, Tailor-made Skirt, full-wide. Price 10/6 complete; carriage, 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d.

Model 644.
A Norfolk Design.
Smart Half-Guinea Norfolk Costume. Well-cut bodice, full tailor skirt. Price 10/6 complete. Carriage, 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d.

Model 900.
New Tailor-made Suit.
Very smartly-shaped Coat with velvet collar, ample skirt in the latest design. Price for the Costume, 10/6; carriage, 1d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d.

Digitized by Google

WHITSUNTIDE NUMBER.



No. 492.] [ONE PENNY.
For the Week ending June 4th, 1898.

A NIGHT'S SERVICE.

AFTER Sir Lucius had won my horse and my sword there was naught left me to send after them, so I sat playing with my dice box and studying the black shadow of the table on the floor and the carved legs of my companion's chair; I did not care to look him in the face.

I heard the click of the bottle against the glass as he filled another bumper, and the rustle of his garments as he settled back in his chair; then, after an instant's dead stillness, in which I knew he was watching me, he spoke out gently:

"No need to be down-hearted, Wat."

"Not for you," I replied rather savagely.

"Come, come, take it not so seriously," he answered with a kindness that, added to the Spanish wine that had gone to my head and the hopeless feeling of desolation that was griping at my heart, made me forget for the moment to distrust him. "You've those tough young sinews of yours still left."

"Yes; I might turn ditcher for my living," I retorted.

"No, no; you misread my meaning. You've still the strength in your body left to set against my goods."

I glanced up quickly, but he was snuffing the candle just then, so only shadows fell on his face and I could not read his look.

"Say, now," he went on, "we throw once more; I stake the horse and sword I had of you; you stake twelve hours' service with them for to-morrow night—no, for to-night," he corrected, as he pointed to the window, where through the stripped branches of the trees that pressed close to Adlingstead we could see the dun eastern sky with a grey slit across it.

"All one to me," I replied. I threw and lost, just as I had lost during all that sitting. Then I pushed back my chair and left the room, shutting the door quickly, so I might not hear Sir Lucius' courteous, "Till to-night then."

* * * * *

There was distant kinship betwixt Sir Lucius Ingram and myself, sufficient to enable me to accept of a plate at his table and a bed under his roof, now that the failure of His Majesty's plans had left me a lieutenant with neither company or hire, yet not sufficient to make him yield such hospitality generously.

Hardly a friendly word had I had of him, save when we were at dice, the whole three days I had spent at Adlingstead, so it made me more uneasy to find him so civil the afternoon succeeding the game just referred to, and I began to fear he had some serious service to ask of me.

It was a relief when, towards mid-afternoon, he bade me follow him out through the western door into the lower end of the garden and so, by the postern gate, into the lane, where stood my horse, the Don. At the sight of him I knew we should soon come to business.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Sure enough, Sir Lucius spoke out at once:

"You know the way to Frith?"

"Old Henry Mayeson's estate?" I queried. "Surely." And in the relief in discovering the service was not likely to be a midnight assassination, which, as I knew Sir Lucius' temper, I had rather feared. I turned to the Don and began rubbing his black nose. The old fellow pressed his nose against the front of my jacket and whinnied softly, till my heart smote me that I could have thrown him away, and to Sir Lucius, of all men.

"Then perchance," went on Sir Lucius, with his cold eyes on my face, "you may have heard of Sir Henry Mayeson's heiress, Mistress Cordelia Mayeson?"

"Why," I blurted out, "that is the gentlewoman whom you——" I had the wit to bite down on my tongue there. 'Tis poor policy to remind a rejected suitor of his failure.

"Exactly," replied Sir Lucius, with a flicker of a smile on his thin lips. "And she is the gentlewoman you must make shift to bring hither to-night."

I ripped out an oath at that, but he held up one hand and went on as if I had not spoken.

"Ride at once to Frith. Tell Mistress Mayeson that Master Fulford, her guardian, lieth ill at Stowbury—so he doth, of the gout—you shall say 'tis a fever, or what you will. Only see that with her ready and dutiful affection my mistress doth dispatch at once to his side, under your escort, my honest-faced gentleman. And you shall lose your way and stray hither."

"I shall do nothing of the sort," I choked out. I think I should have knocked him down, only he was such a puny little wretch I was loath to strike him. "Why, 'tis infamous!"

Sir Lucius waited till I had done storming, then said:

"'Tis no great harm the wench will suffer in being wedded to a man of her own rank. And I entertain an affection for her. For her estate, too, you would say, Master Wat? Well, well, her lands detract nothing from her personal charms; but, be that as it may, 'tis my purpose to make her my wife, and, with your aid, I shall bring it to pass ere the week is out."

I fumbled at the Don's reins a moment, then muttered:

"But if she does not incline thereto, I want no hand in the matter."

"You passed your word," said Sir Lucius coldly. "I have ever held you a gentleman of honour, Walter Staplegate."

"If you call me otherwise," I retorted, with my hand on my hilt.

"Ah! The sword you wear on suffrance;" he replied. "Never mind, Wattie, bring the girl hither this even', and you shall have your cutting tool and your evil-tempered horse, all in free gift."

Then he turned his back in dismissal, and swinging into my saddle I rode away down the lane.

I went slowly at first, for I had no great liking for an errand such as this, but after I got out into the road to Frith and the Don fell into his good, smooth trot, I got to looking at it in a pleasanter light; for, after all, Sir Lucius would but marry a foolish girl, who, like enough, knew not her own mind. And then, too, I should win back my old Don by the practice. So putting Mistress Cordelia Mayeson quite out of my head, I rode forward happily, with the wind in my face and the sun low on my left hand, so that a long, black shadow trotted at my side.

Shadows had all blended in the dull grey of the early twilight when I drew rein in the courtyard of the old manor house at Frith. I gave a sleek serving man the message Sir Lucius had given me—'twas no lie of mine—then dismounted and paced up and down the flagged walk by the side of the house to stretch my legs. I was just beginning to make friends with a great hound who was loitering there when a girl came running along the walk towards me, a slip of a lass in a grey riding cloak, whom I judged to be Mistress Mayeson.

"Tell me, is it a mortal illness?" she cried.

I had to bethink an instant ere I could recollect who was ill, but she ran on without heeding me.

"And he sent you? Did you speak with him? He wishes to see me? Oh, why doth not Jock hasten with the horses! Poor Master Fulford!"

Then she seemed to put an inward control on herself, for she bit her lips, that trembled never so little, and stood tearing at her gloves a moment and adjusting the fastening of her cloak, ere she lifted her eyes to my face. Her voice was quite calm when she spoke again.

"You are his messenger? I never yet met you, sir."

Happily at that moment up came Jock with her horse and one that bore a man's saddle.

The clumsy fool would have assisted her, but I pushed him aside, and put her into her saddle, all spring and alertness she was, like a squirrel. Scarce seated she was out of the court on the canter, and master Jock and I plodded after her.

It was while we rode thus knee to knee I turned on him, and showing him my pistol by way of argument, bade him ride back whence he came.

"And tell the people at the house," I added, for I had no wish to go sneaking away like a thief, "that I am running away with their mistress."

He scuttled for home as fast as his fat cob would carry him, and I rode on after my young lady. It seemed just as well to keep in her rear and not risk being questioned till we reached the fork where the cross road to Adlingstead branches off from the Stowbury road; but there I came up with her, and clapping one hand on her bridle, turned her steed into the cross road.

Her head was thrown back at once and she gazed up at me, half amazed, half indignant, with a blank:

"What mean you, sir?"

"We are going to Adlingstead," I replied, looking at her head.

I had meant to tell her the truth and have done with it, but I did not want to see her cry.

"This hath all been a trick and we are now bound for Sir Lucius Ingram's house. You are going to marry him."

"Indeed?" she queried.

I could feel the scorn that bit each syllable, but I did not meet her eyes.

Next moment she brought her whip down on her horse's flank and made an effort to dash by me into the Stowbury road.

I caught her rein, and on the instant the whip came slash across my face, three stinging cuts that I, with one hand on her bridle, the other steadying the Don, could not ward off; not till we were pacing along the Adlingstead road could I get an arm free and mop the blood from my face.

Digitized by Google

"That was cowardly done," I burst out involuntarily, still tingling with the shame of such punishment.

"Verily, you have the right to look for generous treatment at the hands of everyone," Mistress Mayeson replied, with an accent that cut worse than her whip lash. She had turned her head and was gazing at me as we rode, but I kept my eyes on the Don's ears, and only retorted sullenly in what poor defence I had at hand:

"Say that to Sir Lucius; I like not this task myself; I do it, but at his command."

"You are Sir Lucius' bondman, then?" she went on. "Prithee, tell me, do you clean his boots, and groom his horses, too?"

"I am as good a gentleman as Sir Lucius," I said sullenly. I had been ready to bear with her crying and be very patient, and good-tempered, but I had not looked for a gentlewoman to rail at me in this unseemly fashion.

"No better?" she asked. "Then you must be the basest of the base."

"I would you were a man!"

I swung round in my saddle and faced her then; I could not make out her features in the twilight, but I could feel her eyes upon me.

"Nay; do not wish that," she said, with a little dry laugh. "If I were, you know well you never durst touch me."

"You mistake, Mistress," I retorted, trying to meet coolness with coolness. "I would seek a meeting with all the swordsmen you can send against me. Indeed, I bade your groom rouse your people to pursue. We shall have good fighting ere the night be over."

"I thank you for your courtesy," she said quietly, and then we went on in silence for a time.

The hunters' moon came up on our left, and the sheen of its clear light lay over the stubbles of the harvested fields. I could see Mistress Mayeson's face when I ventured to glance sidewise at her; very quiet and white she looked, and her eyes, under the shadow of her hood, were black.

"Your kindness will avail little, though," she resumed presently, as if she had never ceased speaking. "Think you that those who care only for the food and garments I give them will risk crossing swords with such as you on my behalf?"

"They are vile wretches else," I said. "Were I in your service——" Then I bit off the words and added coolly: "If they do not come, 'twill prove a dull evening for me."

Her eyebrows arched up at that, but she replied restrained enough: "If you sought an encounter, you should have seized upon a maid who had a father and brothers. There is no one to protect me, you see, only paid servants, for good Master Fulford is too aged to stand against such as you."

I twisted the ends of my reins into a fine knot and prayed that she might begin crying soon, for then I should know what to do. At present I felt like the meanest hound on the face of the earth.

"But hitherto," she went on, "I have found that, because I have no defender, all gentlemen felt bound in honour to protect me."

"Let me pass, then, for no gentleman," I said, turning towards her with an effort at surliness.

"Why, your face is bleeding!" she cried, in a very honest surprise.

"Yes," I muttered rubbing my sleeve across the cut.

I felt her hand brush against my arm.

"Here, take my handkerchief," she begged. "Did I do that to you, and you only Sir Lucius's poor tool? Indeed I am so sorry I hurt you, Master Bondman."

"My name is Staplegate," I said, trying to be fierce and sullen, and throughout despising myself more even than I had ever despised Sir Lucius.

"Not Master John Staplegate's son?" she asked blankly, and then half to herself. "Verily, that honourable gentleman would be proud to own you!"

"Let the dead be," I meant to threaten and ended by pleading. "And as for this accursed work, I had never undertaken it, did not honour constrain me."

"Your honour constrained you to misuse a woman?" she asked. "I would you were less honourable and more honest."

"I had pledged my word," I said, and then I told her truthfully all that had passed between myself and Sir Lucius. I kept my eyes on the Don's black shoulders, and the white moonlit road beyond while I spoke, but though I did not see I felt the scorn in her whole face and voice as she commented:

"So you staked my happiness, me, on the throw of the dice?"

"I knew not what 'twas a question of," I said humbly, "and I was near willing to risk my soul to win back the Don. He is too good a steed to be left to such a fellow as Lucius."

"Look at me, Master Staplegate."

But I did not meet her eyes, only took a shamefaced glance at her white throat and round little chin.

"Am I so less worthy than your horse that I should be committed to such a man as the one you name?"

"I am the veriest hangdog," I acknowledged. "I wish you would say outright that you would like to see me flogged at the cart's tail."

"But I should not like to," she said gently. "Your being hurt would not help me."

"I cannot break my word," I muttered.

"Surely not," she assented gravely.

"But I might do this, if you bid," I resumed after a time, in desperation, for on the next hill top I could see the leafless trees and the roof of Adlingstead gleaming in the white moonlight. "Shoot me, and you can ride back to Frith. After I am dead dishonour doth not matter to me."

I looked Mistress Mayeson in the face as I spoke, and I saw her lips quiver and twitch, and then, of a sudden she broke out into a clear peal of laughter that brought the blood burning to my face.

"I offered it but to help you," I said sulkily.

"I crave your pardon, good Master Staplegate," she said very honestly, holding out her hand; she had reined in her horse and I halted, too, at her side. "But indeed—" her lips quivered with laughter again—"I was not prepared for so gallant a remedy. And 'twould be a pity for so honourable a gentleman as you to throw his life away, when I think I can myself find an easier path out of the difficulty."

She sat a moment rubbing the stock of her whip across her lips, and finally she looked at me with her eyes gleaming.

"I have it, Master Staplegate, such an excellent and honourable scheme. Let me whisper it to you."

She bent from her saddle and for an instant the edge of her hood near grazed my cheek; then she sat erect again and smiled at me.

"You have it?"

"Safely," I replied, and daring to look in her face

Digitized by Google

now I noted the dark curls that strayed from beneath her hood across her forehead and the bright flush that was on her cheeks.

Then we put the horses forward briskly for the little that was left of the journey, till we drew rein outside the postern gate at Adlingstead. I lifted Mistress Mayeson from her saddle, and, having slipped the bridle reins over the fork of a tree so that they might easily be cast loose, I held out my hand to her.

"You dare trust me still?" I asked, watching her face.

"Aye, Master Staplegate," she replied, laying her little hand firmly in mine, and then, with eyes twinkling:

"I knew from the first you would never do this thing."

I might digest that as best I could, for there was no space to reply before she had drawn me along to the half-open gate as we entered the garden.

The wall made a black shadow all along its length, and the clumps of bushes had thick shadows at their feet, but out in the open, where the path ran up to the house, all was clear, gleaming whiteness.

On the steps by the open door stood Sir Lucius in his best velvet doublet. 'Twas so bright I could even see he had on his most courteous smile.

"I shall not fail you now," I said under my breath to the girl.

For answer I felt her fingers press tighter upon my hand.

"Welcome to Adlingstead, sweet Mistress Mayeson," said Sir Lucius, descending the steps: and he made a movement to kiss her hand, but quick as a flash she clasped both her hands about my arm.

He looked a bit disconcerted thereat and said curtly:

"You may go, Wat."

"Then my task is done?" I queried, mastering myself, though my blood was boiling at being thus ordered about like the meanest lackey.

"Yes, yes."

"The service I pledged myself to?"

"Yes."

"And the Don——"

"Take your sword and your horse and go."

"Good even then," I said curtly, and turned on the word, and Mistress Mayeson with me.

"Not so fast," cried Sir Lucius, stepping in front of us.

"'Twas not in the bargain that Mistress Mayeson should stay at Adlingstead," I explained courteously. "You bade me only bring her hither. I have done what I was pledged to do, and now she wisheth me to escort her to Stowbury."

For once he let his civility drop.

"You'll trick me, you cursed beggar, you rascallion!" he cried. "Here, Giles, Nicholas, out with you!"

"Run for the horses," I said to Mistress Mayeson, for I could hear the grooms stamping down the corridor within. Sir Lucius seized her by the wrist, and at that I let go remembrance of such benefits as he had hitherto shown me, and catching him by the scruff of the neck I struck him in the face. I meant not to hurt him, but I fear I struck harder than I thought, for when I released him he went down all of a heap by the steps and lay there groaning.

By that the two grooms were upon me with their staves, and had me at a disadvantage, for I scrupled to use my sword on such churls. For an instant I made good havoc with my fists, and then, wrenching the staff from Giles, laid him flat with a blow on the coxcomb; and beating off Nicholas, I got safe through the gate. Mistress Mayeson was sitting upright upon her horse with my bridle rein in her hand, so I had but to leap to my saddle and we were off, full gallop across the fields.

We had risked our necks over three hedges ere I felt we were in little danger of pursuit, and bade her slacken speed.

"So you have had some fighting after all, Master Staplegate," were her first words.

"Aye, but 'twas mere churl's work," I replied, rubbing my head that still ached from Nicholas' cudgel.

Just then Mistress Mayeson put her hand to her eyes and burst out crying, and, faith, I'd so little expected that of her that now I had clean forgot what to do, so I sat staring at her helplessly, till at last I ventured to query:

"Have I done aught amiss? Would you wish to go back——"

"Have you no wit at all, Master Staplegate?" she sobbed out.

"Then have I not done enough? Shall I ride back and kill Sir Lucius?"

"No, no," she said. Then with a laugh breaking through her sobs: "How droll he looked, just like a puppy, when you picked him up!"

Then she mastered herself once more, and as we rode on began furtively to wipe her eyes with her glove. So I took her kerchief from the breast of my jacket and held it out to her, "I did not use it," I said. "Here; but prithee, give it back to me again."

"Then there is something more in this world besides your horse and your sword that is precious to you?" she asked.

"Yes, now," I answered. And we went in silence the little way that was left.

It was not yet midnight when we rode into Stowbury; the moon still made the High Street light. We reined up before Master Fulford's great house, where candles were shining; perhaps tidings of Mistress Mayeson's flight had come thither, for the instant we halted, the door at the head of the stairs was flung open and the light from the candles, streaming out, merged with the moonbeams. Against the square of vivid yellow light that the doorway framed stood an old man, who, peering down at us, called:

"'Tis you, Cordelia? And safe?"

"Aye, sir," she cried, as I helped her from the saddle.

"God be with you, Mistress Mayeson," I whispered, for I had no wish to tarry and speak with Master Fulford.

"God be with you, too, Wat Staplegate," she said with her sweet face sober for a moment. "And may you ever keep your precious honour safe as to-night," she called down with a little laugh from half-way up the stairs. Then, as her form became clearly outlined against the candle light from within, she turned suddenly and threw me a kiss with her ungloved hand.

Next moment the door had closed, and I was left blinking with the light that had just gone out before my eyes.

BEULAH DIX.

Digitized by Google

A MAN.

AFTER mass the priest, Legrand, returned to the vestryroom. The dull light of a November sky glimmered through the panes of the only window. Out of the obscurity there arose a woman, a pitiful object, with her little kerchief knotted beneath her chin, her face bathed in tears. She threw herself at the feet of the priest, crying out: "They are going to shoot him!"

"Shoot him! Who?" asked the priest.

"The Prussians—my husband"—and a sob choked the unfortunate creature. Very much affected, the priest quickly set down his chalice on a table, and, taking the hands of the poor woman in his own, made her stand up.

"But how—your husband?"

"Yes, on account of the Uhlans that were killed yesterday by the sharpshooters. The Prussians have had lots drawn this morning, and three men are to be shot; Vincent, Laideur, and my husband. Save him, reverend sir!"

"But I can do nothing," replied the priest with a discouraging gesture, and then, his bowed head resting on his hands, he began to reflect. The thought of the misfortune that was about to befall his parishioners and his own inability to avert it grieved him deeply. Not to be able to meet them—his flock, for whom he spent himself unceasingly, devoted even to sacrifice. Should he allow her to depart thus, this weeping woman who had come to ask him for her husband? "I must save them at all cost," he said to himself; and turning to the woman, "Take courage," he said, "and hope."

Hastily he took off his priestly ornaments, and directed his steps to the Mayor's residence, where was installed the captain commanding a platoon of Uhlans sent as an advanced guard. The naturally pale face of the priest grew paler and paler as the road shortened. The idea of this formidable interview made him quiver with excitement, but his excitement banished his timidity. He was conducted into the council room. Seated at a table, the captain was signing some papers. He looked the priest full in the face, and in order to anticipate a request that he dreaded, said in French in an abrupt manner:

"What do you want, sir?"

"I have come to ask pardon for the people of this village—they are innocent," stammered out the priest.

"War has terrible necessities," replied the captain. "Your sharpshooters kill a number of our men every day. We must have done with them. So much the worse for the villages that harbour them."

The priest tried to argue the matter, but all his reasons were shattered against the pitiless logic of the German officer. At length, convinced of his inability, he tried only to save one of his prisoners.

"Grant me at least the pardon of Leroy. He has three little children."

The captain showed some sign of pity; but, pointing to the table on which his papers lay, he said: "The orders are explicit. I would be untrue to my duty as a soldier. You ought to understand me, sir; you are a priest. Three of our Uhlans have been killed; we must have three victims."

Nothing was left for the priest to do but to depart; however, he did not stir. After a somewhat protracted silence, the captain raised his head from the papers with which he was busy, and snapped his fingers with a gesture of impatience. Suddenly the priest advanced, and, as if almost ashamed, he murmured:

"I have neither wife nor children. Will you accept me?"

The officer fixed his eyes upon the priest with a look of sympathy. After a moment's silence he said:

"This is a serious thing you ask of me. You are young yet. Think of it well."

"I beg you to grant it," said the priest.

Without replying, the captain began to write. Then he arose, and, holding out a sheet of paper, said:

Digitized by Google

"Here is the order to set the man Leroy at liberty and put you in his place," and, in a grave tone, he added: "Reverend sir, will you do me the great honour to give me your hand?"

The priest extended his hand, and heartily clasped that of the German officer.

With a light step, so happy at the thought of his sacrifice that, regardless of his dignity, he was disposed to run, the priest rapidly reached the school where the condemned men were imprisoned. The commander of the guard, a Uhlan officer, trailed his sabre before the door with a great clank. Without deigning to answer the salute of the priest, he took roughly the sheet of paper; but, after reading it over, the harsh expression of his face grew softer. He drew himself up to his full height, and, raising his hand to his shako, he said respectfully:

"Will you please enter, sir?"

At the door of the school-room the priest begged the officer to summon Leroy, who, overwhelmed with grief, seized the hands of the priest, murmuring:

"My wife, my poor little ones."

"Courage, my friend," said the priest. "Do not lose hope."

With tact, he told his parishioner that he was pardoned on account of his family. The man began to laugh and dance, almost beside himself. He wanted to run home immediately, but the priest succeeded in calming him, and at length they both set out on the road to his house. Near a gate the priest said:

"Remain here. I am going to inform your wife."

She, surrounded by her children, whose merry voices were now hushed, was sadly working in her humble cottage; but the beaming face of the priest as he approached announced the joyful news.

"He is free!"

Without replying, the priest smiled.

"He is coming," and husband and wife were in each other's arms in silent joy.

"We have not thanked you," said the man at last.

The priest, very much moved, replied: "Your happiness is my reward." He clasped the hands of the husband and wife, kissed the children and hastened to return to the school. In a corner of the school-room the forest-keeper, Laideur, a veteran of the Italian and Crimean campaigns, gloomy, his arms crossed, stoically smoked his pipe. Near him, Vincent, a young man about eighteen years of age, his head resting on his hands, seemed to sleep.

The priest sat down between the two prisoners. His exhortations and his encouragements made the young man sob; Laideur swore. The priest took each by the arm, and, knowing that no one would communicate with them, he said to them:

"We must stand together by-and-bye. You, Laideur, must set us an example, an old soldier like you."

"You are going to be with us?" asked the forest-keeper.

"Yes, indeed, instead of Leroy, you understand. He has a wife and children."

Carried away with enthusiasm, Laideur exclaimed:

"You are indeed a hero! Surely, we will stand by each other. If I could only have killed a few more of those cock-sparrows, but my rheumatism——"

With a smile, the priest calmed the excitement of the worthy fellow, and then, turning to Vincent, asked if he wished to confess. The young man consented. "And you, Laideur?" he asked.

"Oh, as to me, you know I am not pious."

"Do it for my sake."

"Well, now, would that give you pleasure?"

"Much pleasure, my friend."

"Very well then," said the forest-keeper, pulling up his sleeves as if about to unload a heavy burden.

On his return to his vestry—for he had obtained permission to remain free in order to make his final arrangements—the priest asked the sexton to summon the inhabitants of the village to meet him at the church at three o'clock.

According to habit, after his breakfast, he took some bits of bread and sugar and went into the inclosure in front of his house. On catching sight of him his donkey stopped feeding and advanced towards him. The priest put his arms round her neck, and with the palm of his hand stroked her velvety nostrils, repeating: "My good beast! My good beast!"

His tenderness was extended to all the animals, companions of his solitude, and these, rendered gentle by his great kindness, offered themselves to his caresses. Meantime the donkey had freed her head and walked round her master, snuffing the air, and then began to bray.

"Greedy one, is that what you want?" said the priest, drawing out from his cassock a piece of bread.

Sounds of clucking and flapping of wings now claimed his attention. He stopped, and cocks and hens came to peck from his hands. His rabbits were not forgotten, either. While giving them some bran he slowly passed his hand through the fur of their rounded backs. As his donkey had followed him he handed her a bit of sugar, and the beast began to munch it, shaking her ears with visible satisfaction. Her round and gentle eyes seemed to regard her master tenderly. The priest felt a cold chill pass through his frame, and, with bowed head, his hands behind his back, he went into his garden.

In the midst of the squares of earth glittered the clean gravel walks. The leafless pear trees stretched their arms, covered with straw, in parallel lines along the wall. The priest fastened up a loosened branch with a bit of osier, and dreamily continued his walk in the bright sunshine along the garden wall. Pausing at length, he opened a little door looking out on the fields.

Silent, bathed in light and moisture, the plain stretched far away. In places, stacks of wheat, rounded like dovecots, or similar to little houses, formed hamlets of straw. To the left, a forest of beech trees joined the pine wood, which barred the horizon. For a long time the priest fixed his eyes on this familiar landscape, as if to imprint it upon them; then he closed the door. But his look, passing above the walls, stopped at the church clock. The short hand was between one and two, the other had passed over the half of the dial-plate.

Digitized by Google

"In three hours I will be dead," thought he, and instinctively he crossed his arms over his breast as if to protect it against the bullets. Three hours longer and he would be nothing more than a lifeless body, nailed up in his coffin. In his morbid imagination, he seemed to hear the dull thud of the first spadeful of earth upon the wood.

To die thus, in full health, in the vigour of life, was this possible? How many simple pleasures in his happy life, without desires and without ambitions; the duties of his priesthood, the alleviation of the poor and suffering, the intercourse with his brethren, the care of his animals and of his garden. Ah! why had he committed this folly of offering himself as a sacrifice? Distracted with anguish, he sprang with a bound to the gate and opened it abruptly! His look followed the grassy path that led from the foot of the wall, and winding between the ploughed fields, joined the road. In thought he hastened along this road, dashed through the forest into well-known paths; yonder, some miles away, was a railway station.

The priest bent his head forward in anxious gaze. The plain was deserted as far as the horizon; no one would see him flee. He would reach the station, take the train, and go far, far away; would be free, would live, would live!

Maddened, he was about to rush forward, bare-headed; but his word of honour—but Leroy.

With a sob, he closed the gate, and, kneeling, he called to his aid, with all the strength of his faith, that Saviour who, at the approach of death, had experienced in the garden on the Mount of Olives all its terrors, all its agonies—dying as it were, in advance. He besought Him to aid him to the end, and restore to him his fortitude. Then, with renewed strength, and recognising that solitude and reveries induced weakness, he hastened back to his house. His accounts made out exactly, his little property classified and valued, he made his will, leaving small sums to the most needy of his parishioners, and little souvenirs to others. Finally, he bequeathed his donkey to a wealthy family, with the request that they would never sell her, and thus spare her from spending her last days in misery, dragging along the roads the cart of some pedlar.

Having completed these arrangements, he passed a long time in fervid prayer, asking pardon for his faults and relying wholly on the mercy and justice of God.

As the clock struck three the priest descended the stairway of his house and proceeded to the church.

This was as full as on days of high festival. In the presence of the misfortune that was about to fall upon the village, even the most thoughtless had come to assemble about the man who represented the highest moral authority. In his surplice the priest passed through the crowd of worshippers, and, ascending the pulpit steps, after a few moments of meditation, he said:

"My brethren, I am very glad to see you gathered here in such great numbers. The authorities have been pleased to grant me the pardon of Leroy; but I have not been able to obtain that of Laideur and Vincent. I have seen them and comforted them. They are ready to die as Frenchmen and as Christians."

Without fine phrases, but with perfect simplicity, he spoke of duty, self-sacrifice, and love of country. His words sent a thrill through this assembly, whose ideal was ordinarily confined to material interests.

Turning towards the altar, he intoned in a firm voice, the De Profundis. Then he gave his blessing to the congregation, praying for patience and resignation, and requesting each one to return to his home and there remain. Leaving the church, he was seen to direct his steps to the school.

The next morning the inhabitants of the village learnt that their priest had been shot by the Prussians.

MAURICE LEMERCIER.

M. A. P.

EVERYBODY has heard of Mr. T. P. O'Connor. Many people know him as an Irishman, many as an M.P., and many again as the most brilliant journalist living. He founded The Star, he established The Sun, and by them made possible the halfpenny daily paper as exemplified in The Daily Mail, The Leader, The Morning, and others in the Provinces.

Amongst the various good and bad qualities incidental to T.P.'s nature it is, however, not so well known that he is on the friendliest terms with more well-known people than most men, that he is a capital after-dinner speaker, with an exhaustless fund of anecdote and humour, that he is to be found at every social gathering of distinction in London, and that, therefore, he ought to be, if he could only be induced to be, a perfect editor of a Society paper. This latter thought seems to have occurred to T.P. For some months past he has been laying his plans to bring out a paper which without doubt should become the most interesting ever published.

It will be remembered that in the early days of T.P.'s journalistic career, when he started The Star, the most noticeable feature in that then most noticeable paper was the column headed "Mainly About People." Before that time no journalist had been bold enough to exploit the personal par and tell us what famous people were doing in their leisure hours, in their houses, and the hundred and one things we now hear about them. It was in that column, too, that T.P. proved that, brilliant as he was as a literary critic, slashing as a political leader-writer, he was at his best in drawing a pen portrait of a man or a woman; in describing the one or the other, from the innermost beats of their hearts to the cut of the coat or the colour of the frock.

This feature in modern journalism was, as I say, initiated by Mr. O'Connor, and he now intends to enlarge upon it by editing a paper to be called "M.A.P.," which means "Mainly About People." It will be published from the Offices of Pearson's Weekly, every Thursday, at the price of One Penny.

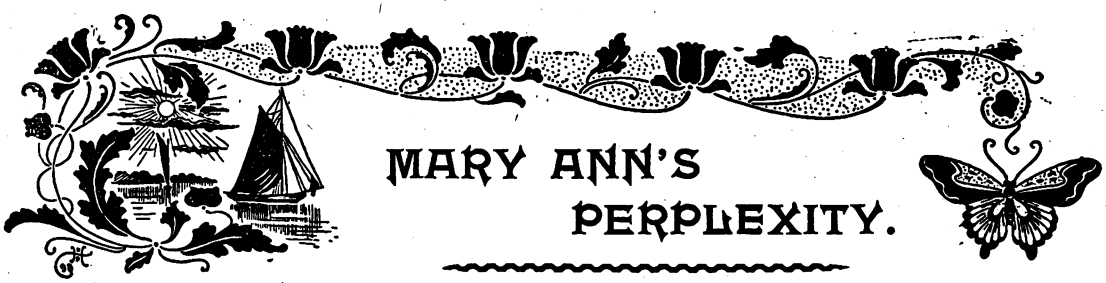
It is not advisable at the present moment to give away too many of the distinctive features of "M.A.P.," but one or two may be revealed. First, the paper will be entirely non-political and non-sectarian. There will not be a line that is not personal, and yet there will not be a line that is not pleasant. The reader will not have to tear off its cover, or to leave it behind in the railway train, or to hide it from the boy or the maid; and the husband who does not bring it home to his wife will have to face a clouded brow and a divided household. Influential people in every branch of life have given Mr. O'Connor interviews, articles from their pens, and information generally that would never see the light of day except it were given to the friend as apart from the journalist.

ASK FOR THE FIRST NUMBER OF

M. A. P.

∴ ON THURSDAY, JUNE 16th. ∴

Digitized by Google



MARY ANN'S PERPLEXITY.

Mary Ann Davis was in sore perplexity.

In the first place, her bread had refused to rise, for almost the first time in her experience as a housekeeper, and on the following day the minister was coming to tea.

And in the next place, Mr. Popham, the grocer, had proposed to her.

He had already proposed to, married and buried, three estimable women.

Mary Ann lived in the square white house which had been her father's, with no companions but her cat and the old man who took care of the garden. One after another of her family had gone away never to come back, and the old house had grown silent and lonely as the changes went on; but Mary Ann was attached to the place, and it seemed to her that nowhere in the world did the sun shine brighter and warmer than it shone into the windows of the old house.

Mary Ann had been a pretty girl, and though she was now past forty, her hair was still soft and abundant, and lay against her white, wrinkled forehead in little golden crinkles, and the bloom on her cheeks were still delicate and dainty.

The time had been, and it was not so far distant either, when the people of Harden had fully expected and believed that Mary Ann Davis and James Meader would be made one, and live out their quiet and uneventful lives side by side, as the majority of Harden people had done before them.

James was "well-to-do," and the Meader farm was one of the best in the country. James fully sustained the family reputation in this respect. But time went on and he still continued single; and it "really did seem that he didn't get on one mite with his courtship," so the wise women of Harden said as they talked the matter over.

The Meaders were notoriously slow people, and if James had any designs on the heart of Mary Ann Davis, he probably thought that there was time enough. "No use to be in a hurry," was the motto which should have been inscribed on the family coat of arms of the Meaders.

Mary Ann herself had not been without some expectations in that direction, but it had been so long about, and nothing had come of it, that she had practically given up the idea.

James had a practice of coming over to her house regularly every other Tuesday evening, and staying until nine o'clock, never later. His conversation was mainly about the weather, past and present—the meetings at the school-house and the crops round about Harden.

And whenever he came, after he had seated himself in the chintz-covered chair and stroked the cat's back, he took out his pocket-book and extracted therefrom a large blue envelope which seemed to contain something bulky. He would hold it in his hand, feel it as if to make sure that nothing had been lost out of it, and then return it to his pocket, and he always sighed when he put it away,

This performance had become so much a matter of course that Mary Ann had ceased to wonder at it, or to feel any curiosity in respect to it.

But now, as stated in the beginning, Mary Ann was in sore perplexity.

As troubles never come singly, so in the midst of this perplexity about the bread, Mr. Popham's proposal had come suddenly into the contentment of Mary Ann's life. The idea that she might be considered eligible to the position of Mrs. Popham No. 4., had never flashed across Mary Ann's mind.

"Goodness me!" said she, "you could have knocked me down with a feather when he said: 'Miss Davis, the life of a widowed man is very lonely, and I want someone to help me to look after my business. Will you be Mrs. Popham?'"

And this was how affairs stood at the time we introduce Mary Ann to our readers. She had given a great deal of time and thought to the grocer's proposal, and suddenly it flashed across her that in all troubles and perplexities, people generally applied to their minister for advice.

And how providential it was that the Rev. John Tuttle was coming to tea! Mary Ann did the best she could with the bread, and resolved to confide in Mr. Tuttle.

So when they were comfortably seated at the table and the minister had done ample justice to the cake, and was busy with his mince pie, Mary Ann told the reverend gentleman that Mr. Popham had proposed to her.

The food was excellent, and the minister passed up his plate for a second helping before he replied.

"Well, Miss Davis, our neighbour is an exemplary man, but the question at issue is, do you love him well enough to promise to honour and obey him until death does you part?"

"I—I'm afraid I don't, Mr. Tuttle."

"I tell you what, Miss Davis," said the minister, after a pause, no doubt inspired by the pie, "let you and I join ourselves in wedlock, and that will be answer enough for the grocer."

"Oh, good gracious, Mr. Tuttle!" cried Mary Ann, feeling, as she afterwards said, as if she should sink down into her boots.

The minister pressed his suit with ardour, and so a third perplexity came into Mary Ann's life. But it was finally decided that should have a week to consider: it was now Wednesday, and as the grocer was coming for his answer on Wednesday week she appointed Thursday for the minister.

As the days went on, Mary Ann's perplexity increased.

Digitized by Google

She was no nearer a decision than she had been at first. However, she decided she would offend one.

Right in the midst of it Tuesday came round again, and James Meader dropped in to make his usual call. Being shown into the parlour and duly installed in the armchair, he stroked the back of the cat, hemmed and cleared his throat, then took out his pocket-book and examined the blue envelope. Then he sighed and returned it to his pocket.

Mary Ann fidgeted about, upset a pot of geraniums, and knocked down James' best hat which he had placed carefully on the cover of the sewing machine, and when she should have said "yes" she said "no," and when she should have said "No" she said "Yes."

"Mary Ann," said he at length, with an effort, "Mary Ann!"

"Well, Mr. Meader?"

"Something or other seems to trouble you."

"Yes. There is something," said Mary Ann, feeling the sentences jerked out of her by some influence she could not resist. "I am awfully bothered. I was never so upset and perplexed in my mortal life. Never!"

"Why, Mary Ann? Is it about the cows, or—."

"It isn't anything of that kind," said Mary Ann tartly; "you see the fact of it is, James, I have had two proposals of marriage."

"What!" ejaculated James, rising slowly in his surprise, "not two from one man?"

"No, two from two men."

"Great goodness, Mary Ann, what men are they?"

"Mr. Popham and the minister."

James began smoothing the back of the cat in deep thought.

Then he took out his pocket-book and produced the blue envelope, felt it, replaced it in the pocket-book and sighed.

"What are you going to do about it, Mary Ann?"

"I don't know," said Mary Ann, nervously plaiting and unplaiting the hem of her white apron, "if I have the minister the other will be put out, and if I have Popham, the minister will be put out."

"Well, yes, that stands to reason," said James, feeling the pocket-book where the blue envelope was lying, and evidently resisting the impulse to draw it forth again.

"I'm in a dreadful fix," said Mary Ann, "for you see this is Tuesday, and Mr. Popham is to come for his answer on Wednesday, and the minister is to come for his on Thursday."

"My goodness!" said James, rising to the occasion, "there is only one way out of it; I'll come for my answer on Tuesday, which is to-day," and James put his arm round Mary Ann's waist—a little shyly at first, but growing bolder as he got used to it.

"Why, James Meader!" cried Mary Ann.

"It isn't any use to put it off," said James, drawing her nearer as he became accustomed to the situation. "I've been coming here quite a long time, Mary Ann, but I never felt as if it was best to hurry. Marry in haste and repent at leisure, you know."

"Oh, my! This is so sudden," said Mary Ann. "I don't know as I shall ever get used to it."

"Yes, you will," said James warmly; "I'm getting used to it already. My goodness, Mary Ann, the more I think of it the more I'm convinced that I've been a fool for putting it off for so long! But I always was a leetle bit slow. And I wanted to have a window cut in the back-kitchen and the water put into the sink before I asked you. But I'll see to it as I go home. Great goodness, Mary Ann, I come pretty nigh losing you!"

And suddenly releasing Mary Ann, he produced his pocket-book and took a hasty squint at the blue envelope.

"James," said Mary Ann, "before this goes any further I want to ask you what is in the envelope. I've seen you take it out over and over again, and I've got to know what is in it before I decide between the grocer, the minister, and you."

James looked a little abashed, but he opened the envelope, and there, tied by a faded blue ribbon, was a lock of yellow hair—the hair of a child—and written on the worn piece of paper which inclosed the hair were these lines:

If you love me as I love you,
No knife can cut our love in two.

Tears came to Mary Ann's eyes, and she drew close to the side of her old lover.

"Why, James!" she exclaimed, "who'd ever have thought of keeping that?"

"I did. Yes, Mary Ann, that's the little lock of hair you cut off from your head and gave me when you were ten year old and was agoin' to spend the winter with your Aunt Nancy. I always carry it with me for fear the house might catch fire and it would get burnt up. And shall it be the grocer or the minister or——"

"You," said Mary Ann, and the blush of her cheek was just as becoming to her as if she had been twenty-five years younger—at least, that was James' opinion.

OSCAR.

WHAT DO DREAMS MEAN?

WHO has not at one time or another had some curious dream, the significance of which has perplexed him? Some dreams are caused by an overheated imagination or an impaired digestion, and others are so trivial as not to cause any grounds for a second thought being bestowed upon them.

On the other hand, there are many dreams which have an unquestionable significance. Many of them are influenced by our daily actions and thoughts, and frequently we find ourselves doing in our dreams what we would do in our daily life. These exercise our minds, and if we only knew what they portend we might be able to avoid events that afterwards come to pass. The history of the world is full of instances where dreams of a prophetic character have taken place, and the belief in them is shared by scientific and intelligent writers in every part of the world.

Occasionally a so-called dream book or two has been published pretending to give an explanation of these curious phenomena, but, as we all know, most of them are absolutely unreliable and are nothing but catchpenny publications.

We recently made the acquaintance of a lady who has made the laws of Oneirology a life study, and her explanations we have found to be singularly true in cases upon which we have consulted her. She has the reputation of being the most expert person in the world in this science. Accordingly we have made arrangements with her to give the fullest information to any reader of this paper who cares to send asking her advice. Readers should be very careful to explain in the fullest manner the whole extent of their dream. MADAME GEORGES will reply, giving a full explanation.

Readers should address their letters to "DREAMS," c/o. Short Stories Offices. Henrietta Street, Strand, W.C., and inclose six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope for reply.

Digitized by Google

The Ladies of the Earth

The Tale of the Yellow War.

BY M. P. SHIEL.

Author of "The Man-Stealers," "Prince Zaleski," "Shapes in the Fire," "The Rajah's Sapphire," etc.

CHAPTER XXXII.

The Meeting.

As for the girl Seward, Hardy was told by his agent that she occupied a flat in Bloomsbury, a flat rather well furnished, where, with a servant of her own, she lived alone. And, without five minutes' delay, Hardy was in a carriage hurrying to the address given.

He doubted if this could be the girl he wanted. She lived, certainly, under another name. And how came Ada, the nurse-maid, to be flourishing in such a style? Morbidly anxious as he was to have her safe and sure in his own keeping, it hardly occurred to him that this very opulence accounted for the reticences and hesitations of her brother with regard to her.

But in twenty minutes he was sure. On a third floor a servant led him into a snug drawing-room, and there, on the wall, he saw an oval coloured photograph: and he recognised the slim bust, and the little Chinese eyes, and the piquant Geisha-girl face, warm-yellow in tint.

At the door, the servant, a narrow-browed, mean-looking creature, had told him that Miss Seward was away; and as he wished to speak further, she had asked him within.

Where, then, was Miss Seward?

She had gone away.

When?

Four hours before.

Where to?

To Dover.

Was that certain?

Quite certain.

But whatever had she gone to Dover for?

That the servant could not say, or would not say.

But was Miss Seward coming back soon?

The servant did not think so. Miss Seward had left her sufficient money to keep her for some time.

Did the servant know much of Miss Seward's private affairs?

She knew something. She and Miss Seward were very good friends indeed. Miss Seward sometimes spoke of things to her. But, of course, she did not know everything.

What did "everything" mean?

It meant nothing.

Then Hardy began to woo, to implore; then to speak of big matters; to say that all this was important to more than he could name. But the girl smirked, and did not follow that flight. The last thing that occurred to him was a bribe; only in the final moment of his despair did the thought flash through his mind. He hinted at hazard a hundred pounds, and the promptness of the response surprised him.

It was a large sum for a poor girl.

Yes; and all he wanted to know was why Miss Seward had gone to Dover.

She had gone in order to go over to France to the little Chinaman who was in love with her.

And now it was the turn of the servant to be surprised—at the swift energy with which Hardy vanished from her eye-sight.

He bore on his breast the initials of this girl, Seward; she was his, his very own.

But he was in this dilemma: that things far more momentous on their surface demanded his personal presence where he was. It needed all the acumen of his shrewd eye to determine which was the main fact which must influence his conduct.

He drove to the nearest post-office, and telegraphed to the manager of the London, Chatham and Dover railway.

There was at this moment not a hope left to Britain. The Admiralty had chains of steamers, intercommunicating with each other, and with the south-east coast, whose task was to watch and to report. And the nation now knew that on the morrow of this final-looking, sunless Wednesday, was due the horror of ultimate overthrow—the going beneath the wave of the last emerging rock of the old world.

Nor had the general mass of the nation the faintest suspicion of any power in the earth which could save, or even momentarily help, it.

If a heavenly host should appear in mid-sky wrapped in flames of vengeance, then, perhaps, that surge might be stemmed. But though the people were now far from doubting the interest of the gods, their reasons were the offspring of too advanced a period of Time to await any such manifestation.

Digitized by Google

It was known that a wholly inconceivable number of floating things of every kind were massed upon the extreme north-west coast of France; and that in their passage over to England they would have one of the finest war-fleets the world had ever seen to protect them—against nothing!

And now—in this hour of world-tragedy—the British people offered to the "Eyes that regard" a good spectacle. The panic was gone. In such a place as the City of London there was, of course, no business done; but everywhere else there was business done. Shops were open; post-offices were open; the printing-press throbbed. If a man met a man in the street, one pallid lip spoke to the other pallid consciousness of the dark weather, of a business matter, of a family affair—of everything except the Chinese. The subject of the Chinese in these last days was rather looked upon as being in bad taste. The lower classes spoke of them—but, in general, with splendidly curved lip. With a sublime stoicism, with a regal disdain, Britain waited for her overthrow.

Nearly everyone made a point of going about his ordinary work.

In the last resort, the lip remains. It is the final retort of a noble man, of a grand nation, to Destiny. "The mind and spirit remain invincible. . . ."

What could Britain do now? She could smile.

And by this her pallid smile in that hour, she proved, in truth, her divine right to the Empire of the Earth.

Besides smiling, every man, and most boys, managed to provide themselves with some sort of weapon, sharp or blunt, dull or gleaming, which they laid quietly by.

A gentleman at Highgate had for a week been training a fine specimen of the British bull-dog to fly at a Mongolian effigy set up in his garden.

In reality, the arm of England was as strong as her soul; but she knew the strength of her soul, and did not suspect the strength of her arm.

Her arm was John Hardy.

At least he was the main muscle of it. He was as much the West as Yen How was the East.

But what is this shadow that dogs his steps?—something absurd, grotesque, yet terrible?

At eight he had sent the telegram to the railway company. At nine he drove away once more from Cavendish Square, leaving a host of orders with an almost permanent committee of naval men who now attended upon him. And he had no sooner driven away, than a man in wide sombrero was asking at his door if he was at home.

In this man, Edrapol, there was not now, if there had ever been, an atom of venom against Hardy. He was merely the slave of punctilio. In the view of that frivolous old brain, nothing in the world could compare in importance with the importance of an affaire d'honneur, a delicate point, a shade of usage. The thing first of all that a gentleman must do—in every case—whatever happened—was to settle "a delicate point."

Also, he knew the greatness of Hardy. And his vanity was prone, the moment he found himself in safety on English soil, to measure swords with him.

He knew, too, that soon the Chinese must be here also, and then . . . . what could be done? Voilà une affaire manquée. Nothing could be more annoying to a gentleman than an affaire manquée.

It was clear that whatever he did must be instantaneously done. The morrow would, perhaps, not "do his affair."

He took the broad hat from his long-haired white head, and he bowed largely, as old Bobbie himself informed him that Hardy was from home.

Edrapol asked whither he had gone, and the old man said:

"To Dover, sir."

Hardy vanished from her eye-sight.

Edrapol asked no more. He had brought over on his person a good sum in specie; he had also rings on his fingers worth money. He jumped into a cab, and drove in haste away.

With that noble phlegm of which we have spoken, things in England still, at this eleventh hour, ran, for the most part, their usual course. Few people were moving about; yet the trains ran empty, and the show of civilization continued when its reality seemed like a spent heart, about to beat its final throb.

So that Edrapol found a longed-for train about half an hour after Hardy's departure; and both engines, flying simultaneously through Kent, were "express."

As for Hardy, he reached Harbour Station in his rocking train within an hour and twenty minutes from his start.

He hurried to the Cross Wall; and there he had no difficulty in learning that the girl had certainly not hired any local craft, nor started from Dover that day. Nor had any craft left Dover eastward for some time.

The natural conclusion was that Ada Seward was still in Dover.

Nevertheless, Hardy spied about the harbour for some time among the steamboats, and pointed out one to a blue-jacket, named Brassey, who accompanied him. Brassey was to arrange with her captain; have her fires lit and banked; and Hardy scribbled a note to South Front Barracks, signing his name with the initials P. C. N. S.; it was a request for a small three-pounder and ammunition, which he instructed Brassey to mount for'ard on the designated steamer. He himself hurried to the Royal Ship Hotel, followed by a train of watermen, policemen, and residents, eager to serve him.

Nothing was so certain as that, if the girl were there, in a small place like Dover, he would quickly know it. In a few minutes fifty men were dissecting the town for him, and very soon he had the whole history of her stay in Dover.

Google

She had put up for two hours at the Lord Warden Hotel; and had then left it, taking her portmanteau, in a cab. In the small period of her stay, she had made herself singularly friendly with one of the chamber-maids of the hotel, and confided to her the surprising secret that she was about to set out for Dunkirk. The cabman who took her away was found: and he stated that, having driven for some distance east towards St. Margaret-at-Cliffe, along the high road, his fare had ordered him to turn down a bye-road, leading directly to the shore. His surprise was immense when, at about a mile from the Upper Foreland Lighthouse, which was burning all day, she again ordered him to stop and take down her trunk. He did so, laid it on the sands, and was paid. The last he saw as he drove away was the girl sitting on the box, with lonely outlook over the dim sea.

Was there no ship in the offing?

There might have been; he could not say. One could not see many yards over the sea through the dark. He was certain that there was no ship with burning lights.

Here, then, was the last link: the chain ending at the girl watching the drear sea from her box on the sands.

It did not, however, need a very vivid imagination to conjecture why she sat there; and in half-an-hour after hearing the news, Hardy had the North Pier Signal-Light dwindling into nothingness on his port quarter; and the downs-trotter which bore him was panting and quivering as she had not panted for many a day. He calculated that the girl had, at most, an hour's start of him.

As he passed out between the two piers, Edrupol arrived at Priory Station, and began to make inquiries for Hardy. After a time he heard the truth; but his disappointment was solaced by the news that Hardy would very likely return before morning.

At this time, Ada Seward, borne in one of those safe, but rather clumsy, Havre-Antwerp boats, was fifteen miles or so on her way from the English coast.

Some months before this a singular adventure had befallen the girl.

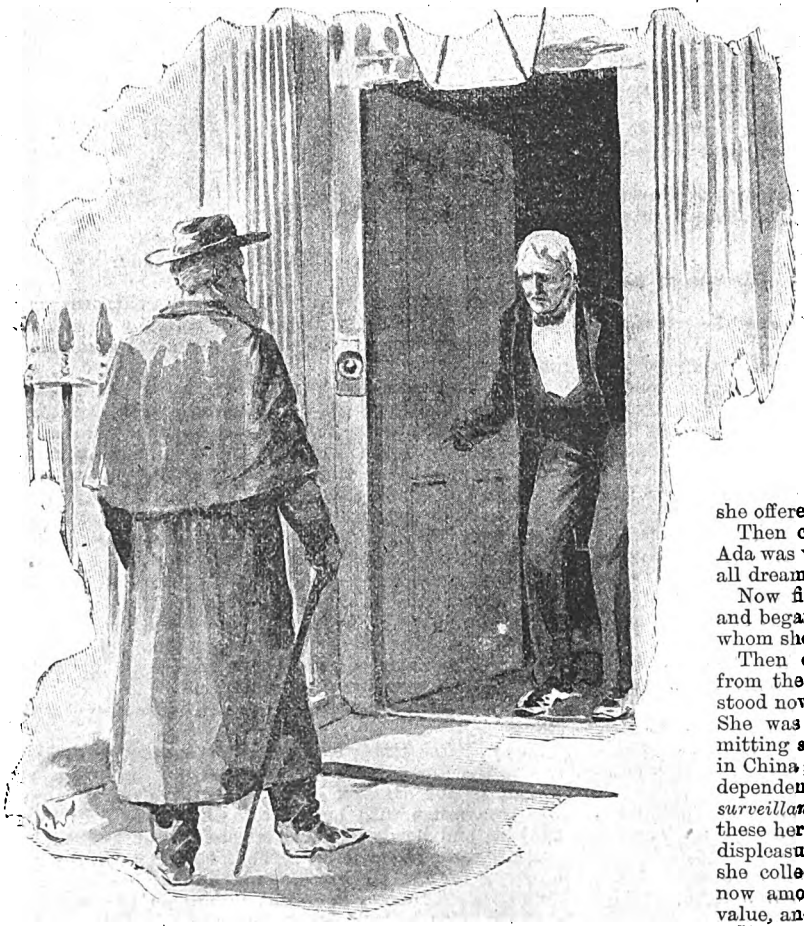
Walking along the street, she had been accosted by a man—a Yankee, as she judged by his goat beard, his lank lounge, and his talk.

He nodded with cool confidence to her, and, with oily modulations, he said this:

"Well, young woman, I guess you are in luck's way this time, anyhow."

In ten minutes he had left her, and leaving her, insinuated £50 in Bank of England notes into her hand. This, he explained, was only "to go on with" for a day or so.

He was not the principal, he said, but only an agent—"matter of business"—in which, to tell the truth, he did not stand in so badly. But he was not the principal in the deal: the principal she would see on the next evening at the hour and place which he named.



Bobbie informed him that Hardy was from home.

The "principal" was a huge pig-tailed, silk-dressed Chinaman—a great man in his country.

All he wanted of Ada Seward was to be permitted to buy her grand houses, and carriages and footmen, and gowns, and luxuries. For this, nothing, on his honour, in return—save that she should be under his eye, and obey him as a daughter. The Yankee acted as go-between; and Ada thought she would like all this.

So, away now with Pattison's, and the nursery; and shopping now all day for Ada at Peter Robinson's, the carriage waiting outside.

She changed her name, breaking with her poor, but proud, relations, who, in spite of her protestations, believed that her foot had slipped. Her brother tossed back the gold she offered him in her face.

Then came proposals from the "principal." Ada was wanted in China, where wealth beyond all dream awaited her. She refused.

Now first she heard the name of Yen How, and began to understand. That little doctor at whom she had scoffed. . . . !

Then came pressure, threats. But apart from the pressure, and the threats, she understood now that she had sold herself into slavery. She was subjected to a most rigorous, unremitting surveillance, like an upper-class woman in China; and she had at bottom a touchy, independent pride of character. Add to this surveillance the pressure, the threats, and to these her uneasy consciousness of her people's displeasure, and what she did may be guessed: she collected all the trinkets about her, which now amounted to many hundreds of pounds' value, and she ran away.

It was then that she set up on her own account in the Bloomsbury flat

Digitized by Google

Already she was too much of a lady to do without a servant.

She hid herself with such absolute craft that neither "principal," nor "agent," nor for a long time the agents of Hardy, nor her brother, could find her.

It was on hearing of this flight that Yen How decided that, whatever happened, none of the women of England must be killed.

Then, when the end was near, when it was certain that England was doomed, a noble throe leapt into life within this girl. She conceived the quixotic, but subjectively fine, notion of sacrificing herself for her country. On condition that England was spared, she would go to Yen.

And boldly breaking from her seclusion, she presented herself with this proposal before the "agent"; and agent and principal, in a room in Portland Street, where the principal lived now in strictest retirement, gloated over this thing.

And they two, with elaborate cautions and precautions, made two voyages to the French coast, one with the glad message in the girl's own writing, from which they returned with Yen How's "Come;" and one to arrange minute preliminaries of the meeting.

And thus it happened that, in order to get to France, Ada Seward sat alone on her box on the Foreland sands, and looked across the sea.

She was genuinely confident that she was "saving" something large and not very definite; and, as she stepped into the boat which quickly made its appearance at the surf, the thought in her beating, yet bold, heart was this: What a One am I!

In order to lay his eyes once more upon this girl at the earliest moment, Yen How was ready to fling to the winds, or at least postpone, a world of affairs which no head but his could surely organise. But the momentum of events overpowered him. He could not go.

He himself chose the safest-looking, tidiest, and smartest of the smaller craft of which the Outer Harbour, the Commercial Dock, and the Naval Dock were now one thickly crowded mass.

He had then been at Dunkirk two days, making the Casino des Dunes his head-quarters. But when he looked abroad upon that once neatest of cities, and considered the heaped-up horror of its red streets, and the whirling drama of mixed revel and warlike preparations going forward within its walls, he knew that here, at least, his bride could not come.

Standing, however, a little back from the Sea Baths at Rosendaël, two miles away, was a lonely villa, backed by the desolate sand-dunes, and within eat-shot of the continual rumour of the shore. Here, at eleven in the night, almost alone, restless, perambulating, expecting, was Yen How.

He had rescued himself with a sort of stealth from Dunkirk.

He was like some singer, the darling of the world, who yet is the secret victim of drink; and while the plaudits still ring through the opera-house, he, in the inmost recess of the green-room, has the tilting bottle at his lips.

By midnight the lights of Dunkirk were well in sight of the steamer which bore Ada Seward. The boat was manned by Japanese, men in whom Yen How had confidence. But she was unarmed.

She was travelling at her utmost speed, and carried only one light—a mast-head light.

This fact made her outré, an object of observation; it was sufficient to hint her identity; and behind her, straining every timber to catch her, came frothing a slightly faster boat.

So that when the boat ahead was perhaps not half a mile from her anchorage nearly opposite Rosendaël, the boat behind was five hundred yards only from the boat ahead; and it was then that the former sent a guess-work shot, but a shot aimed by Hardy's own hand, into the stern-works of the other.

She had been accosted by a man.

The Japanese boat at once shot round, and went steaming in a changed direction, rudderless. Consternation reigned on her decks: over the sea came to Hardy's ship sounds of shouting voices.

The girl, who had been lying in sleep on the red-velvet cabin-cushions, rushed on deck. And as she reached it, again she heard the boom of cannon, and screamed.

And all that happened from that moment during ten minutes was a mere horrid whirl to her; there was a scampering of men, and yells, and everywhere a rush of the sea, and a leap into a boat, and a singing in her ears, and a smell like brimstone, and the flash of a bull's-eye in her eyes.

Then she felt firmness beneath her feet, and presently she was crying, half-lying back on cushions.

Hardy, sitting near, eyed her curiously for some minutes of silence. Here was a force greater than a 100-ton gun, great as the moon and the tides; old Astarté crying there in a dainty West-end bonnet—the strong sex of woman.

The presence of the girl, in his power at last, filled him with a certain calm. With her, he felt he might win.

The sobs died gradually lower. And he said:

"You feel better now?"

"Yes—thank you—sir," she answered jerkily.

Up to now she had not recognised him.

"Then I can talk to you. You understand that it was to get you that I sank the other ship?"

"Me?" she queried, sitting up at once in wide-awake interest.

"Yes. I knew you were going to Yen How, and I wanted at all hazards to prevent you. Whatever induced you to act in that unworthy way?"

"Which unworthy way, sir? But stop, are you——"

"Yes—we have met before. But that is not the point. Tell me, why have you been so foolish and wicked, Ada?"

"Oh, come now, this is a little too much, you know!" cried Ada. "Who are you? And what right have you to take me in this way? I foolish and wicked? It is absolutely untrue; and I don't think you'd be ungentlemanly enough to treat a poor girl in this way if you knew all."

Digitized by Google

He stole stooping up to the window.

"Well then, tell me all. And do not cry, because that wastes time."

"Oh, it is all very well to talk in that way, sir!" she answered saucily, though her heart forbode her at the look of the face before her. "Who are you? I am not aware by what right——"

"But you are wasting my time. John Hardy is my name, and I have the right of a man trying to serve his country. Tell me now."

"Oh, John Har——! Well, you will excuse me, won't you? I was not to know that. But was it you, then, all the time, at the music——"

"Yes. Now tell me."

"Why I was going, you mean? Well, if it comes to that, wasn't I going for the same reason which you say—to serve my country, too?"

"Is that really so?"

"It is, sir."

"And how?"

"Well, since you seem to know about me and Yen How—didn't he give me to understand that, if I came, he would save England from the Chinese? And isn't that why I am going to him? To make him keep his army away from England?"

At this exhibition of inherent confidence in her power over Yen, this radical, unquestioning trust in the might of her sex, a smile flitted through the brain of Hardy. He said:

"Then you are not wicked, after all; but only foolish. As I have you in my hands, and as I am going to take you back to England, I will let you understand why. You are right in believing that Yen How is very much attached to you; that is so; I know it well. I believe that his attachment to you is as extraordinary in its force as the man himself is extraordinary. Well now; but can you be so simple as to think that the way to make use of this infatuation for the good of your country is to come and put yourself in his power in this fashion? Supposing he even tried to keep his armies from going over to England and killing us all, he could not permanently succeed, you know; and supposing he succeeded, you have sense enough to know, have you not, that England would be no good at all with the rest of the world full of yellow men? In that case she had better go under, too, like the rest, don't you think? You would not care to live in such a kennel, nor would I, nor any of us English. So, you see, you are throwing away yourself for nothing. But I, now, have a better card to play, I am thinking! Do you know that I have been searching everywhere for you for weeks? My idea was this: that this vast Chinese people would be no good at all when confronted with the harsh, steady, untiring frown of England—provided we could only get their leader well dead. That is the first thing to do. Yen How is the weak point of all that great host; and you, Ada, are the weak point of Yen How. That is why I wanted to have you safe in my hands all this time, so as to be sure that you were there. If you are in England, I have not a doubt that Yen How will come, like a fish to the bait; and if he comes, as sure as fire we'll catch him. But if I let you go over to him in this way to France, you see, don't you, how that would spoil everything?"

"I see, sir," said Ada.

"Well, now, in what we have got to do to-night you can help us: we want to let Yen How know that you are safe in England, and in my hands. He must not have any doubt about that in his mind; and as he is expecting you, I suppose, in the ship I have sunk, he will have a doubt when she does not arrive, unless we enlighten him. He will think very likely that you are lost with the crew of the ship; and that suspicion may be enough to keep him out of our hands. So, then, I want you to tell me where, and under what conditions, you were to meet Yen How to-night."

"I can hardly say exactly," she replied; "he is in a house by itself near the shore."

"Is he alone?"

"They told me that there was hardly anyone with him."

"There is a single light just ahead of us in shore: is that the place, do you know?"

"It may be, sir; I should think it would be. I cannot say."

Hardy jumped sharply up and called "Brassey!" in a shout that made him cough.

Digitized by Google

Brassey at once appeared—a beardless, Cockney-looking man.

"How far are we in?" asked Hardy.

"About a quarter of a mile, sir."

"No lights on board showing?"

"No, sir."

"Pick three men to go with you and me in the boat; ask if they can shoot at all, and give them the pistols; better look to yours and mine. Tell them to stop speed. And find me at once, Brassey, a pair of scissors, if you can."

On a side-table in the cabin were pens, ink, and paper. Hardy sat and wrote a few words; and almost as soon as he had finished Brassey was at his side with a pair of scissors.

Hardy at once hurried across to where Ada Seward sat; he muttered:

"If you do not mind—just one little lock. . . ."

Before she knew, he had clipped a tendril of her light-reddish hair. He had ever a conspicuous lack of ceremony when at work pro bono publico.

He returned now to the table, and inclosed the hair with the scribbled sheet in an envelope, which he directed: "Yen How, Europe."

On the sheet he had written: "From John Hardy to Yen How,

"Hair of Miss Seward, who is in the safe keeping of John Hardy, at 11a, Cavendish Square, London."

A few minutes later, wrapped to his ears in a long black ulster, he was at the tiller of a boat making for the shore.

The sea was calm, and only a slow, swinging bruit from the breaker-line informed with its murmurous monotone the very drear and dark night.

The air was stagnant as the vapid atmosphere of some dead world. It seemed pervaded by a certain visible gloom.

In ten mintes, Hardy, with a spring, was upon Chinese territory. The three men put off again a little from land: Brassy stationed himself on the wet sand, instructed how to act in case of a preconcerted signal; alone Hardy moved forward.

He had in one hand the letter, and in the other a pistol.

Yonder shining steadily through the murky dark was a light, which seemed nearer than it was; half a mile along the East stretch of fine sand lay Rosendaël, but invisible, deserted. The noise of Dunkirk could not be heard, but a blurred hint of luminosity marked its situation. A stone's throw away, on the left, stood a row of five bathing machines. The upward-tending region of sand-hill and dune behind the villa was lost in gloom.

Yet the near was not invisible. Hardy, having passed the broad band of level sand, was able to make his way with tolerable precision among the knolls, and light, uneven ground. Once he collided with a low, back-less bench, half sunken askew into a scraggy growth of grass; once and again he stumbled into a hole of sand.

The house was very far. It stood on a slightly raised plateau of firmer ground, facing the sea; and the light seen from the sea was in an open window near the ground. The house was white, and small; its doors and windows Gothic.

He stole stooping up to the window, and looked in. The room, lighted by a lamp, was a species of salon. On a chair in a corner burnt a Chinese lantern.

From a window on the right side also he saw ooze a radiance from within, and with cautious tread he approached it also. The casement was latticed, and sparsely overgrown with some bind-weed. But he was able to observe that the room was gaudily decorated, tapestried with green and crimson silks, in the centre a spread table, laden with fruit and plate of gold. A multitude of coloured lanterns made it a nest of variegated glamours. And here, busy about the table, he saw two richly-dressed Chinese.

He made the tour of the house, and saw no other living thing. All was dead silence and stagnation. He came back to the front window, dropped in the letter directed to Yen How, and turned away.

His way now was downhill, and he walked faster, with less precaution, swinging freely along. He had gone on in this way for perhaps five minutes, when he stopped suddenly short, all eyes and ears. He had heard the distinct sound of footsteps near.

In two or three seconds the muzzle of a pistol was at his forehead, and the muzzle of his pistol was at the forehead of a man.

They peered closely into each other's face.

"Well, you do not fire, and I will not," said the man coolly.

He was not an Englishman—something in his intonation showed that; yet he spoke English.

He had recognised Hardy; but Hardy did not recognise him.

"Is it agreed?" the man said.

"Well."

"Drop your pistol."

"You drop yours."

"And you promise?"

"Yes."

There was a thud on the ground, and a moment after another.

"Poh! You have lost your chance," said the man.

Then Hardy knew Yen.

Even though it was a totally different Yen to the pompous, pig-tailed Arch-Priest, the great Apostle, who had been awaiting, with restless wanderings over the dunes, his tarrying bride. It was a Yen in simple English clothes, with a hard felt hat over his bald forehead, and without queue behind.

(To be continued.)

THE RELIGIOUS LIFE
OF
Mr. GLADSTONE.

By One Who Knew Him.

The longest and most exhaustive article on the subject ever written appears in THE SUNDAY READER of June 4th.

It is an article of unparalleled interest, and should be read by all.

DO NOT MISS IT. DO NOT MISS IT.

ONE PENNY. THE SUNDAY READER. ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

GREAT - WAR - COMPETITION.

FIRST PRIZE - - £5
Five Prizes of £1 each.

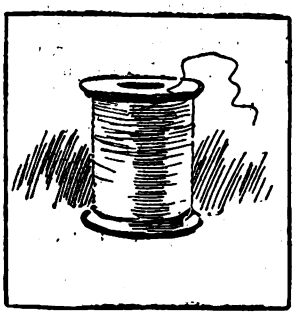
25 Prizes of Handsome Books.
25 Gold-plated Pencil-cases.

In the event of a tie, the prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

BELOW will be found eight pictures. Each one depicts the name of some place, or ship, or man associated with the combatants in the Hispano-American War. Five sets of these pictures will be published. Write down the names in the spaces provided, and keep all the sets by you until we ask you to send them in.

The daily newspapers will give you the best help in discovering solutions, as most of the names depicted have already appeared in the press.

LEADER.



No. 25.....

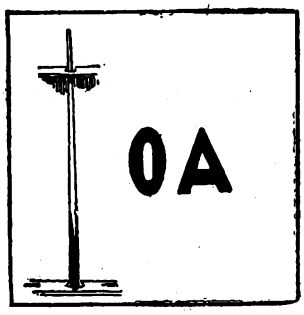
WARSHIP.

No. 26.....

PLACE.

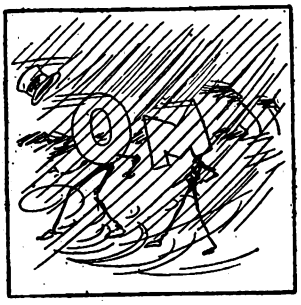
No. 27.....

PLACE



No. 28.....

WARSHIP.

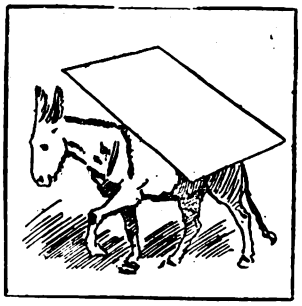


No. 29.....

PLACE.

No. 30.....

PLACE.



No. 31.....

WAR COMPETITION.

No. 4.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

PLACE.

No. 32.....

Digitized by Google

THE CANOE BUILDER'S RUSE.

THE Snohomish River, gathering up the Skykomish and the Snoqualimie, and all the river children within her arms, rushes down the western slopes of the Cascade Mountains and mingles her turbulent waters with the salty tides of Puget Sound just where Chuh-tlahks, the One-with-the-Nose-of-Stone, juts his bold and rugged bluff out into the clear, cold, and mingled waters.

Long before the white man had set his foot upon the land, the Sdohobsch (Snohomish) had dwelt about the mouth of this mighty river which now bears their name.

Among these quiet and peaceable fisher folk two brothers of the tribe dwelt together. One, though in every sense a man, was small and weak beside his brother. This other was a very giant in strength, though a lamb in mood, and his lithe, supple form shot upward for full six straight feet or more.

And so it came about that this hardy Hercules of the western wilds followed the chase, while his weaker brother became a hewer of wood and a builder of canoes.

All the day long you might hear the "pee-yah-kud" (hand-adze) singing tuck-tuck-tuck-tuck as Dus-py-yuk on the beach sent it eating its way into the heart of the cedar that was to become a canoe. And all the live-long day Dus-sluh-hobe ranged the forest, for he was a hunter, bold and brave and daring.

He was wild and roving, and often spent whole days trailing the bear or the deer deep within the forest. Or perhaps he might embark in his light canoe, seeking that king of fish—the salmon. And if luck favoured him he might, perchance, steal upon a hair seal unawares, and gain at once both food and raiment. What a feast they had then in the "ah-lahl" (house) as their friends dined with them!

In time Dus-py-yuk took unto himself a wife to sit beside him, but Dus-sluh-hobe remained unwed. In due season children also came to Dus-py-yuk—many children, and they made the sands of the beach merry all the day long with their laughter and their childish pranks.

But merrier still did they make the heart of the lone Dus-sluh-hobe, and the thoughts of the hungry little ones and their glistening eyes more than once drove the winged shaft truer to its home within the breast of the bear.

Day by day the bond between the two brothers grew stronger; and stronger still the bond of love between the children and the lone one. But the jealous wife fumed with wrath to find her will weighing naught against that of the brother.

Hour by hour the mischief brooded in her breast, until she began to plan her revenge upon her unsuspecting and beneficent kinsman. Sleep sat lightly on her eyelids at nights, and her mind was full of evil thoughts.

As ill fortune would have it, it so chanced that Dus-py-yuk was now called away each day to build a great war canoe some distance down the beach, where the wind with its unseen knife had felled a great cedar that was ripe for the touch of the "pee-yah-kud." This was his wife's opportunity.

Our evil fortunes often come to us in the guise of good, and perhaps that is why Dus-sluh-hobe became unusually successful in his search, for he came back daily loaded with spoil from the chase. The jealous wife did not tell her husband of his brother's great kindnesses to them as they talked together at night and at odd moments in the morning. She had other plans! During the day she herself ate greedily of all that was brought by the brotherly huntsman; but gave the children little or nothing to eat, though the very odour of the feast which they had not tasted sharpened the pangs of hunger.

All through the evening and the night she poured into the unwilling ears of her spouse many stories of the wicked greed and selfishness of the brother, and pointed to the half-starved children to vouch for the truth of her lies. Alas for Dus-py-yuk! How eager was his wish to disbelieve these evil things—how often did he refute them as the idle tales of an idle woman. But the children—he might disbelieve the woman—could he disbelieve his own eyes?

Digitized by Google

Alas! It is the constant washing of the sea that eats into the heart of the hardest rock and undermines it at last. So in time it could not fail but that his wife's tales should have some effect even upon the great love of Dus-py-yuk for his brother.

He became sad and moody. Was he not good and kind to his brother? Why should he treat him so? Were they not bound by the strong bonds of blood? Could any be stronger?

A trouble brooded over loses nothing in the brooding, and the tiny seed of suspicion planted by the woman, sunned and watered by the man's own mood, was not long in putting forth a luxuriant growth, till finally both man and wife were brooding to the same end: how they could rid themselves of the brother.

Dus-py-yuk bethought himself. He was a man of great skill in the use of the "pee-yah-kud." Did he not fashion for his daughter that wooden bear that would roll his tongue? Did he not make for his son that wooden seal that swam upon the water like life?

A seal? Ah!

To the woods he went and built, not canoes, but a seal—a seal like that which he had made for Sta-bill, but larger—and more life-like; for his seal should know how to do all that a seal should do—to swim, to dive, to bark—upon this he pledged all his skill.

After many days his task was done, and the wooden seal was all that his fancy had imagined it. It was nearly time for the full moon, and when Sdoqualb should grow great in the heavens he would go out when the tide was low and place his seal upon the seal rock. Then, when the tide came in, the seal should call his brother to his doom as surely as the darkness follows the night.

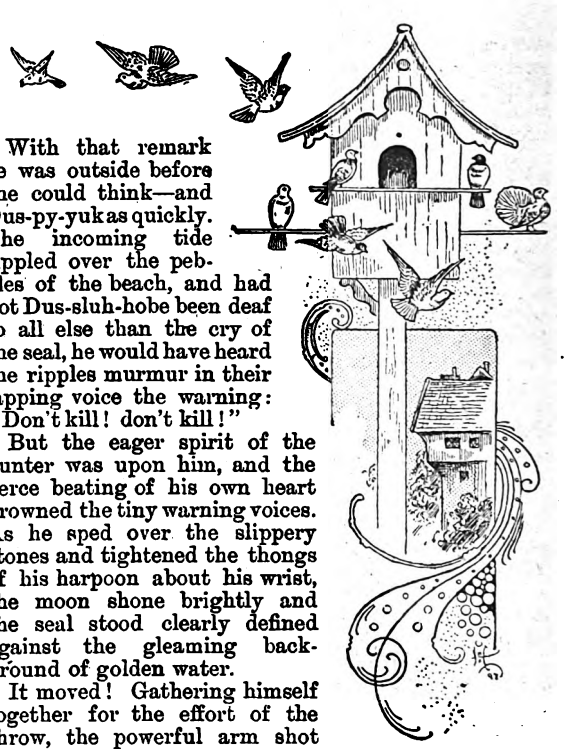
It was the time of the full moon, and the tide was rushing far out. A dark form moved cautiously along the beach here and there, from shadow to shadow, and at last to the seal rock itself. Soon the seal appeared perched high upon its rocky crest, though there was no water near at hand. Again might the dark form be seen working its way cautiously back, till it disappeared in the blackness of the forest that fringed the shore.

Dus-py-yuk returned to the "ah-lahl" as though from his daily labour, and Dus-sluh-hobe welcomed him—thrice welcomed he—asking him anxiously as to the cause of his delay. At the sound of the cheery voice Dus-py-yuk's heart became lighter, though weighted down with its dark secret of death. But the heart of the wife sank within her breast, for she thought her spouse would fail her at the critical moment.

The cheerfulness of the one drove moodiness far away from the heart of the other, until Dus-py-yuk completely forgot his plot. Suddenly a short, hoarse bark smote the air, and they sprang to their feet with one impulse. Dus-py-yuk, quickly regaining himself, spoke first.

"A seal, my brother—it's only a seal!"

"Yes, a seal," responded Dus-sluh-hobe, "but a seal with such a voice means food for days, and clothes for the little ones all the winter long! Ah, my Bright Cheeks, my little one, do you not want a new skirt of sealskin? You shall have it! It waits for you on the beach already!"



With that remark he was outside before one could think—and Dus-py-yuk as quickly. The incoming tide rippled over the pebbles of the beach, and had not Dus-sluh-hobe been deaf to all else than the cry of the seal, he would have heard the ripples murmur in their lapping voice the warning: "Don't kill! don't kill!"

But the eager spirit of the hunter was upon him, and the fierce beating of his own heart drowned the tiny warning voices. As he sped over the slippery stones and tightened the thongs of his harpoon about his wrist, the moon shone brightly and the seal stood clearly defined against the gleaming background of golden water.

It moved! Gathering himself together for the effort of the throw, the powerful arm shot out, launching the weapon like a writhing snake, hurtling through the air. He listened—a thud—was it a groan?—and a splash, almost simultaneously, told him that his javelin had found its mark. Quicker than it takes to tell it, the line sank through space and tightened, and the thong began to cut deeper into the flesh—such a seal!

Instantly he found himself being dragged seawards over the beach, where the prattling of tiny surf still murmured mournfully: "Don't kill! Don't kill!" Moments were precious. Dus-sluh-hobe felt at his belt for his knife—it was gone. It was never away from him—where could it be? Then in the agony of his heart he knew that death stared him in the face.

Bright Cheeks called to know if he was bringing her the skirt—alas! He would never see the little ones more. He turned to his brother, who had turned to fly; but at the sound of the despairing voice his feet faltered beneath his weight. He could not leave his brother to his fate—surely the bonds of blood are stronger than those of evil desire!

He turned and caught one glimpse of a face full of brotherly love—he saw a swiftly vanishing form—he heard a great splash; then the tiny patter of falling spray, like an echo. And then there came wafted to him a gurgling greeting.

"Farewell, oh, my brother! I go to the other land! Farewell!"

In a moment the surging tide of hatred had ebbed from the heart of Dus-py-yuk, as he beheld his once-beloved brother going to his doom through the hand of him who should have given shield and shelter, instead of murder. A flood tide of remorse rushed into his being, sweeping resistless over the thought of his wicked wife, and burying her in oblivion for ever.

With a cry of encouragement he dashed after his brother. Despair lent him strength. He swam towards the tiny speck so rapidly disappearing. Superhuman energy sent the phosphorescent water in long streamers of light from his wildly-beating arms. Swiftly he swam, as never before, yet slowly indeed did he draw upon his brother.

Digitized by Google

At last, nearly dead from his efforts, he overtook the receding form, and clung to it madly, wrapping a portion of the thong about himself.

Together and half unconscious they were dragged away at a great speed, too great to be able to free themselves. For days and for nights the relentless and unfeeling creation of Dus-py-yuk's hands towed and dragged its living freight, creator and victim alike. They passed by strange countries and over unknown seas.

Day by day they grew more chilled, until they reached the land of the "Kway-kwus-sty-bue" (Esquimaux)—the land where the men are all short like children, broad and shaggy like a bear and equally as strong. And there they found themselves free from the seal.

Here they saw a peculiar man with a canoe, and he was fishing, but in a manner hitherto unknown to them. He had neither net nor line, nor bait with which to snare the fish—nothing save his own two hands. As they watched him, they saw him dive under the water, and bring up a fish in his hands.

The brothers watched in great astonishment at the sight. They were quite hungry. As they had not eaten for a long time, the sight of a boat half full of fish made them feel still more keenly the pangs of hunger. But they were afraid of the man. Finally hunger conquered fear, and as the little man went under in another plunge they swam rapidly to the canoe, each stole a fish and returned to shore with it.

Again and again they repeated the trick till they had no fear of hunger for some days to come.

But, alas! their hunger was greater than their discretion, and had betrayed them; for the little man noticed the rapid disappearance of his fish, and flew into a violent rage, which grew greater and greater as he sought for the culprits. He was terrible to behold. Could he not hear their very teeth clack together in fright? Could he not see the very ground itself shake with their quaking?

When at last he chanced upon the stealers of his fish, he vented his wrath upon them in abundant measure. He made the brothers his slaves, and took them home to his people to do the duties of bondsmen.

Long and wearily they worked out the days of their bondage in the land of the "Kway-kwus-sty-bue," till their hearts grew sick for a sight of the groves of fir and cedar at home, and till they grew hungry for a taste of salmon, deer, or grouse. At last, after a weary, weary service, they managed to escape from their taskmaster, but, alas! home was far away, and many miles of ocean rolled between them and it. They must swim back the way they had been brought.

Days passed, and nights passed. They saw strange lands, and the sun grew warmer. The longer they swam the easier it became to swim, and the more they liked it. Then they thought of the years since they had left both home and people, and how their friends must be dead and gone to the other land. Why should they return to a land that would now be strange to them?

So they resolved to become whales, the great swimmers, and swim always. And they became whales and learnt to swim much faster. But though they did not return as men, the bond of blood is strong; they could not forget their people, and so each year they return to Chuh-tlahks, driving the flying schools of salmon before them. And the racks of Chuh-tlahks are red with the drying fish, the very air is oily and heavy with the odour, and the hearts of the Sdohobsch are glad because of the salmon, and glad because the Sdohobsch have not utterly forgotten their own.

And when the salmon are few, when the nets are drawn in empty, and the hearts of the fishers fail even of hope, then the brothers, the whales, rush upon the frightened fish with open mouth; right and left they dash, driving whole schools of salmon upon the beach that their people may have no lack of food.

And so it happens that the teepees of the Sdohobsch are filled with food, and the bleak winter season passes by, and hunger touches them not with its gaunt hand.

GERALD BLAKE.

AN ADDITIONAL ATTRACTION TO DAN LENO'S ½d.
½d. COMIC JOURNAL,
EVERY TUESDAY, IS COMING IN A SPLENDID SERIAL SCHOOL STORY
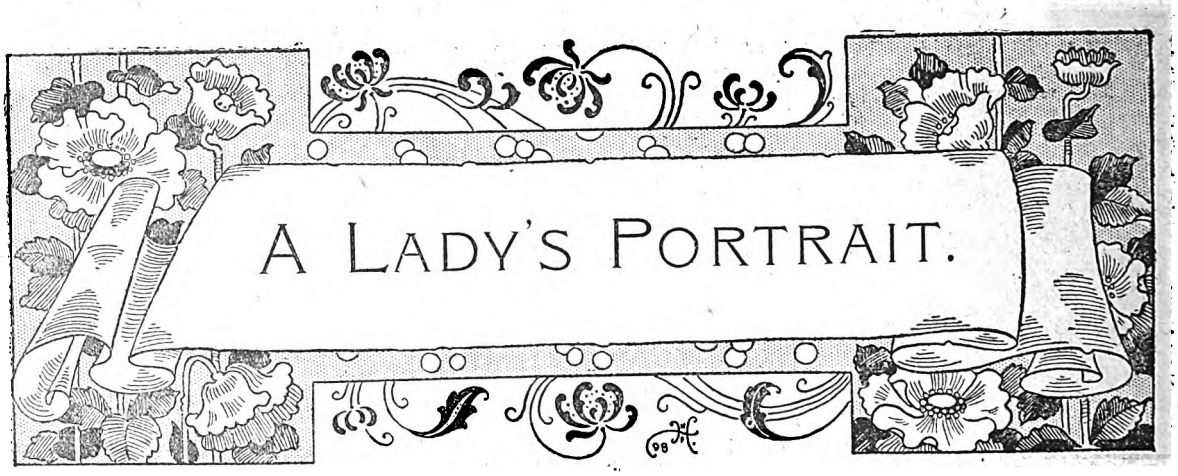
BY
H. T. JOHNSON.
Author of "The Pride of the Ring," "Sawdust and Spangles," and other successful stories.
Keep yourself in touch with the great men of the age.
See what Dan Leno is doing this week.

Take it as a Tonic.
THE BIG BUDGET.
Splendid Double Whitsuntide Number.
Twenty-four big pages crammed with fun and good holiday reading.
INCUBATOR COMPETITION.
Hatching out £5 Notes.
ONE PENNY EVERY THURSDAY
EVERY THURSDAY. ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google



A LADY'S PORTRAIT.

I FELT on very good terms with myself that summer evening as I sat at the window which overlooked the Rue MoMahon, idly smoking and building many a visionary "Château en Espagne." Had not my first important picture, the "Portrait of a Lady," been accepted by the Paris Salon? Had not the critics, notoriously good judges of painting, spoken highly of it? Was it to be wondered at that my modesty for once sank into the background, and that hope spoke kindly in my ears?

My pleasing reflections were interrupted by the entrance of a servant, bearing a letter. I observed, to my surprise, that the seal bore the coat of arms of the Montcour family, which, as all the world knows, boasts a lineal descent from Charlemagne. The Marquis de Montcour I had often heard of as a strong partisan of the Bourbons, but otherwise I knew nothing concerning him. What could be the subject of his letter to me? I opened it and read as follows:

Château Montcour,
June 1st.

The Marquis de Montcour presents his compliments to M. Albert Morton, whose address he has learnt at the Salon. M. Morton would be conferring a favour on the Marquis if he would paint for him the portrait of a member of the Montcour family, and would name his own price for doing so. In the event of this request being acceded to, the Marquis would be glad to receive M. Morton as his guest during the painting of the portrait. M. Morton will be pleased to receive the assurances, &c.

My delight can be well imagined. I had secured an influential art patron, other commissions would inevitably follow, and my future success was certain.

So I scribbled off an acceptance of the Marquis's offer and went to bed with a light heart.

A day later I received a second letter from the Marquis, informing me that his carriage would wait upon me at a given hour, in order to convey me to the Château. It did not take long to pack my bag, and at the time appointed I drove off in the Montcour equipage. After an hour's drive I found that we were in the outskirts of Paris, and seemed to be making for the open country. In another half-hour, the magnificent pair of bays slackened speed, and the carriage drove through the gateway and into the grounds of the Château.

I was told that the Marquis would be glad to see me in his study at my earliest convenience. He was a man of about fifty-five years of age, tall, and well formed. To describe the iron-grey hair, the rigid moustache, the piercing black eyes, would be an easy task; but no words could give an adequate idea of the intense hauteur which shone in every line of his countenance, and was to be remarked in every movement of his body. The man was an incarnation of pride.

After the usual polite inquiries, the Marquis, who, by the way, spoke excellent English, requested me to be seated.

"I am sorry," he said, "to have to trouble you in the first place by confiding a family secret to your keeping. This may seem a strange proceeding on my part, but you will see the necessity of it when I explain. The portrait I wish you to paint is that of my only daughter, Héloise. I have chosen you as the artist because you are an Englishman—a foreigner—and, therefore, there will be less likelihood of my secret being divulged. Will you give me your word as a gentleman and a man of honour, to reveal nothing that I may tell you, or that you may learn while in the Château?"

"Marquis," I replied, "your request is easily acceded to."

"I thank you, monsieur," resumed the Marquis, bowing gravely. "The facts of the case then are as follows. My daughter Héloise, of whom I am passionately fond, has for some time given the greatest uneasiness on account of the eccentricity of her behaviour, and has now, I regret to say, developed symptoms of positive insanity. Acting on a physician's advice, I have reluctantly resolved to place her in a lunatic asylum, where, of course, she will receive the best possible attention. You may imagine for yourself what a grief this has been to me, monsieur."

Indeed, it was very evident from the Marquis's whole bearing and from the slight vibration in his voice, that his iron soul was shaken within him, and I marvelled to see the curtain of pride drawn aside for one quivering moment from the recesses of his heart. He sat silent for a minute or two; then resolutely clenching his hand, he was himself again.

"It shall be given out that my daughter has taken the veil and entered the convent of St. Ursula in Paris. Thus will our family pride be saved."

"Is your daughter's insanity very noticeable?" I ventured to remark.

"I am sorry to say that I have been obliged to place her under restraint. She cannot be allowed, on any account, to leave the apartments which have been allotted to her. I wish," continued he, "to have a faithful portrait of my daughter as she is now, before the demon of insanity has completely obtained possession of her.

Digitized by Google

"Your hours for painting will be from ten to twelve in the morning, and from three to four in the afternoon. Four days from this, Héloise will be removed to the asylum. Is the time too short for you?"

"No, Marquis," I replied, "I think I may promise you that the portrait shall be completed by the end of the fourth day."

"Many thanks, monsieur. A small suite of rooms has been reserved for your use, and you will find your stay in the Château not, I hope, unpleasant."

I thanked the Marquis, and was then conducted to my apartments, where I found supper awaiting me. A valet had been allotted to my use, and I saw that the lines had indeed fallen to me in pleasant places. To my palate, used to vin ordinaire, the Ammontilado of the Château was a revelation. An excellent brand of cigars was provided for me, and the latest novels stood uncut upon the shelves of the bookcase. I went to sleep that night wishing that my old comrades of the Latin Quarter could but have seen me, "nursed in the lap of luxury!"

Next day I was conducted to the western wing of the building. I was astonished to find that the young lady's rooms, like my own, were situated in the topmost story, but, remembering the nature of her affliction, I judged that she had been placed here for the purpose of seclusion.

Yet another surprise awaited me, for on reaching the door which led to the suite, I saw, seated on a chair, with his back to the entrance, a gigantic negro. François, my valet, pro tem, spoke a few words to him in a low tone, and then directed me to go straight forward.

The negro carefully shut the door after me, and I found myself alone in a corridor with several rooms opening from it. At one of these doors appeared an attendant, a stern, forbidding-looking woman, who at once invited me to enter her charge's apartment.

My first hasty glance as I stepped forward revealed to me the fact that the boudoir, for such it was, was furnished with every luxury. The furniture was dainty, the curtains unique, and my footfall on the carpet was as noiseless as on a bank of moss.

The young lady was sitting in the cushioned seat of the bay-window, looking out over the wide prospect. At my entrance she turned languidly round, and the nurse, who spoke in French, introduced me to her. I commenced the usual banalities about the weather. To my surprise, Mademoiselle de Montcour answered me, as her father had done, in English. Then recollecting my business, I said:

"May I hope that you will sit to me this morning?"

"Yes," she replied in a sad, far-away voice; "if you wish."

Accordingly I erected my portable easel, and then began the task of posing my model. She was as wax in my hands, holding her head listlessly in any position I pleased. Finally everything was arranged to my satisfaction, and the sitting commenced.

My clumsy words can hardly pretend to describe Mademoiselle de Montcour's appearance. She was, let it be said, of medium height, and slender. Her hair was dark and luxuriant, her exquisite features were thrown into relief by the pallor of her cheeks, and her sad eyes looked out like stars of the night. I mentally compared her to a proud, pure lily, which some ruthless wind has utterly crushed and beaten to earth.

I went to bed that night in a very restless state of mind, and the reason was this: Throughout the day, as was natural, I had been on the look-out for signs of insanity in my beautiful model, and had observed her very closely for that purpose. But not the slightest trace of insanity could I find. She was languid, and intensely sad; but that was all.

Was it possible that the doctor had been mistaken? Could it be that she was the victim of foul play? Yet I could not but own that the emotion in her father's voice had been real and unaffected. I was completely puzzled, and, with a vague sense that something was wrong somewhere, tossed about from side to side, till at length I dropped into a troubled sleep.

Next day I was up betimes, and was at the corridor-door waiting for admittance, a few minutes before the clock struck ten. I saw nothing of the nurse, so I knocked at the door of the boudoir. The voice of Mademoiselle de Montcour bade me enter. I went into the room, and never shall I forget the change which came over the girl's face when she saw that I was alone. The listless expression fled, and in the place of it I saw surprise, fear, and agitated hope depicted on her features. Clasping her hands imploringly she whispered:

"I am not insane! Do not believe it! Oh, save me, save me!"

And as I looked into her eyes, clear with the light of reason, my doubts melted away, and I would have staked my life that she was not mad.

"Do you believe me, monsieur?" she asked entreatingly. "You can see I am telling you the truth, can you not?"

"Yes, yes," I stammered; "but—your father——"

"Oh," she said; "let me tell you quickly, or that woman will be here. My father loves me, but he would rather that I should die, that he himself should die, than that the Montcours should be humbled. But it happened one year ago—ah, how can I tell you, monsieur?" (and at this point a delicate rose-bloom invaded the white field of her cheeks) "that I met a gentleman, good, noble, and true, and—I loved him. But he was poor and of humble birth, and my father drove him from the Château when he asked for my hand. I was forbidden to breathe his name or to think of him any more.

"Then my father went even further, and descended to threats; but I, monsieur, am of the Montcours, and I, too, have my share of pride, so I determined that nothing should make me promise to forget my lover. At last my father, with tears in his eyes, told me that if I did not give up Alphonse unreservedly, he would take this last awful step. Oh, monsieur, save me, save me, for I vow that I am nearly driven into madness when I think of it."

"But—the physician?" I said, with a most uncomfortable lump in my throat at the sight of her grief.

"The physician?" she repeated scornfully. "Have you never found what money will do? I am so helpless; I have no friend, but you have a good face, monsieur, and I trust you."

At this moment the nurse entered hurriedly, and the conversation was of necessity interrupted.

Before entering the boudoir again in the afternoon, I wrote on a slip of paper the words: "What is his address?" This slip I folded up together with a small black-lead pencil into as little compass as possible, and contrived to slip it into Mademoiselle's hand while posing her for the afternoon's sitting. I gave her several intervals for rest during the progress of my work, and she employed the time well, for, as I posed her for the last time, I felt something pressed into my hand, and I knew that my inquiry had been answered.

Digitized by Google

When I had finished for the day, I hastened to my room, and eagerly examined the paper. On it were written the words: "M. Alphonse Perret, 26, Rue Lamartine, Paris." I at once sat down, scribbled a few lines to this address, and managed to get my letter posted without arousing suspicion.

But the hardest part of the task was to get Mademoiselle de Montcour out of what was virtually her prison. For hours I sat brooding over this problem, but no solution seemed forthcoming.

At last I resolved to go to bed, and, perhaps, in the morning some happy inspiration might come to me. But sleep felt a thousand miles away, and, putting on my dressing-gown, I sank into an easy chair, and gazed thoughtfully at the ceiling. Strangely enough, it was from the ceiling that I derived the idea which afterwards matured into a successful plan.

Almost above my head was a trap-door, opening, in all probability, on the leads. A thought flashed into my mind, and I soon had the dressing-table moved to the necessary position, and, placing a chair upon it, forced open the trap-door, hoisted myself up, and emerged upon the roof of the Château. It was of irregular construction, and I found progress rather difficult.

Keeping the geography of the house well in mind, I contrived to pilot myself to that part of the roof which I judged would cover Mademoiselle's apartments. Then I lay flat down, and, at the imminent risk of my neck, peered over the edge.

Taking a piece of string out of my pocket, I fastened my penknife to it, and lowered it down till it was opposite the window. I had to risk the chance of the nurse being in the same room, and I began swinging the knife slowly backwards and forwards.

Presently I heard it tapping against the window, at first gently, and then louder and louder. An anxious minute passed, and then I could hear the sound of the window being raised, and I saw a head looking out. It was too dark for me to distinguish the face, but Mademoiselle de Montcour's voice was not easily mistaken.

"Who is there?" she whispered.

"It is I, your friend," I answered softly.

"Mon Dieu, you will kill yourself, Monsieur! what can you be doing there?"

"Listen," I said, "to my plan for your escape. I have written to your lover telling him to be at the gate the night after next with three swift horses. At half-past eight you will hear my knife tapping at your window again. Then I will let down a rope to you, and we must get you pulled up here somehow or other, and the rest will be fairly easy, I fancy."

"Oh, Monsieur, how can I thank you? I feel free already, but—but—it is impossible for me to get to the roof. I should be killed."

"Oh, no, you wouldn't," I replied unceremoniously. "I'll see about that part of the business; so you must not worry about it."

"I cannot but trust in the only friend I possess," she answered, and was just about to say something else, when some sound alarmed her, and she hastily drew in her head and closed the window.

I made the best of my way back to my own room, and, tired out by my day's work, slept the sleep of the just.

Next day, I kept my eyes sharply about me, and was rewarded by seeing a long rope in one of the outhouses. I contrived, by wrapping the rope round my body, and buttoning my coat tightly above it, to get it smuggled up to my room. I now breathed more freely.

I held no further communication with Mademoiselle de Montcour, but was able to inform the Marquis that the portrait would be ready by the next evening.

The hours seemed to creep by with incredible slowness.

At last, however, the eventful night arrived, and early in the evening I handed over the portrait to the Marquis, and received my cheque.

Then I went to my bedroom, and locked myself in. How often I looked at my watch I cannot tell, but at length, to my great relief, I discovered that it was half-past eight o'clock. Taking the rope with me, I mounted once more upon the table and chair, and emerged upon the roof. Luckily there was enough light for my purpose, and I walked cautiously to my post above Mademoiselle's window. I cut the rope into two equal parts, and made a number of knots in one of the pieces. Then I firmly fastened the end of each rope to a chimney-stack immediately behind me. Lowering my penknife, I tapped at the window as before. Mademoiselle de Montcour opened it at once.

"Courage!" I said softly. "You will soon be safe. I will tell you just what you are to do, and I depend on your bravery as my chief assistance."

"Oh! I dare not, I dare not," she moaned. "I shall become giddy and fall."

"Nonsense, you will do nothing of the sort. It will be impossible for you to fall if you obey my orders. Come, Mademoiselle, shall it be said that a Montcour was afraid?"

"No," she said impulsively; "tell me what to do, and I will do it."

"Bravely spoken. I now lower two ropes to you, one of which is knotted. Fasten both firmly round your body, under the arms; seize the knotted rope and pull yourself up, hand over hand, with all your strength. I will pull the other rope, and we shall have you here in no time. Do you understand?"

"Yes," answered she.

My instructions were obeyed, and at my signal she mounted upon the window-ledge. I pulled with all my strength, bracing myself against a small battlement which bordered the roof. The brave girl assisted herself as well as she could, but the strain on my muscles was something fearful. The sweat poured down my face, my brain seemed on fire, and my eyes appeared to be wrenching themselves from their sockets.

At length my strength was fairly exhausted; but I clenched my teeth in despair and rage, and by one superhuman effort managed to drag Mademoiselle into safety. The instant the intolerable strain was relaxed I fell down, fainting, and it was not for some minutes that I was able to get on my feet again. Mademoiselle de Montcour, though feeling rather sick and giddy, was not much the worse for her adventure, so we were soon safe in my room. I produced my travelling flask, and we each had a small glass of brandy, which restored us to our natural selves.

The clock struck nine, so there was no time to be lost. We took off our boots, and crept stealthily along the passages and down the stairs towards the side entrance. Once I thought I heard a footstep behind us, but could see nobody. The stairs creaked in a most alarming fashion, and my heart was in my mouth half the time.

Digitized by Google

I opened the door, and Mademoiselle passed through, and at once ran towards the wall which surrounded the grounds of the Château. Taking the key, I was about to lock the door from the outside, when I felt a heavy hand laid upon my shoulder. I turned round, and was confronted by the huge form of the negro. His face wore a malicious grin. He seized me by the collar, and I closed with him desperately. I was lucky enough to get a firm hold, and we swayed to and fro; the negro exerting his tremendous strength in the endeavour to throw me, and I trying all I knew to keep my feet.

Fortunately, my antagonist disdained to shout for aid, so we struggled savagely together, the silence being only broken by our quick gasps for breath. I still felt the effects of my earlier struggle, and I knew that in another minute I should be thrown to the ground. The negro's grinning face was near my own, and I could feel his hot breath upon my neck, when suddenly I remembered a wrestling trick which I had once learnt from a Cumberland man. I had just strength enough to put it into practice, and the negro, taking in the snare, fell heavily to the ground, still encircling me in his arms.

As he fell, his head struck the stone step with great force, and, thick as his skull was, he was knocked insensible for some seconds. I raised myself from the ground, and ran as quickly as I could towards the wall. A man who was seated on the top called eagerly in French:

"This way, monsieur; the lady is already over."

By his assistance I was soon in the high road, where I found Mademoiselle de Montcour mounted on a spirited steed. The negro had evidently recovered, for we heard voices shouting, and it was evident that the alarm had been raised in the Château. We sprang quickly to the saddle, and dashed along the road at full speed, till the home of the Montcours was a dark speck in the distance.

When we reached Paris, M. Perret, for he it was, proposed that we should ride at once to the house of his mother, who would take charge of Mademoiselle, and they could then be married quietly in the morning.

So we parted, with many expressions of good-will and gratitude on the part of the happy pair. As for me—well, I had the cheque to assist in consoling me, and I went cheerfully through the silent streets to my lodgings, happy in this, that I had done my duty as "a gentleman, and a man of honour," to quote the words of the Marquis de Montcour.

W. Francis.

The Count's Wooing.

Count Adrien Mac Trevor, notwithstanding his Scotch name, was a Frenchman, and a Parisian at that. In the face of aristocratic prejudices, his grandfather had made a fortune in the iron trade. Adrien's father had continued the business, and had been able to leave to his son an enormous fortune, together with a spotless escutcheon.

The count had passed the first years of his life in the pursuit of pleasure; but now he had decided to marry and settle down. Desirable matches were not lacking, but courage was. "Women are such enigmas," he argued, "that one can never tell how the affair will turn out."

He was too intelligent to want a simpleton, and too honourable to want a coquette. The time for romance was over with him, and he desired to make his married life a charming reality. To sit opposite him at his fireside he pictured a gentle companion, refined and sincere, with enough elegance to make his home brilliant, and enough culture to make it respected. He asked a great deal, it is true, but as Fate had ever kindly smiled upon him, he still relied upon her.

This degenerate Parisian, while not believing in women, still believed in a woman. Beneath the surface of a social sea, swarming with life of all kinds, he knew there were pearls waiting to be discovered.

All the winter long Adrien had waltzed with blushing damsels, who responded to every smile bestowed upon them by this young man who was declared by mammas to be a "splendid catch!"

At a grand ball given by a Russian banker he had met Mdlle. Clary Bernard, a veritable "queen of hearts." She was a dainty blonde with brilliant black eyes, who dressed perfectly, mingled words from all languages in her conversation, and made a display of artistic tastes and aristocratic pretensions. She had a superb dowry, too, and it seemed as if Adrien need look no farther.

He hesitated, however, as his fastidious taste was not quite satisfied. Mdlle Clary prided herself on being a descendant of the great Samuel Bernard, and made this a pretext for covering her fans, her handkerchiefs, everything she owned in fact, with the coat-of-arms of the celebrated financier. She was thoroughly informed of everything pertaining to him, and she missed no opportunity of displaying her historical knowledge when she discussed the Regency.

Adrien wished the fans and historical notions at the bottom of the sea, along with Samuel and the Regency. He liked nobility, but not that sort of nobility. His good sense led him to repudiate everything not established on a solid basis.

At a charity concert given by the Duchess de Coutances, he was listlessly looking on when he chanced to hear some remarks exchanged by two young girls near him. What they said did not interest him, but the voice of one of them went straight to his heart. It was so clear, it was so correctly modulated that it suggested the music of a running brook. He turned and looked at the young girl whose melodious accents so aroused him. She did not seem to be very beautiful; she was tall, fair as a lily, with shining auburn hair twisted close to her shapely head, an oval face and eyes like Greuze's "Girl with a Broken Pitcher."

Digitized by Google

He inquired who she was and learnt that the angelic voice belonged to Mdlle. Marie d'Aspremont, one of the most aristocratic young ladies of the noble Faubourg.

A moderate fortune, no mother, a host of little brothers and sisters to whom she was devoted, a rigid education, a good heart and fair intellect; these were the facts he learnt concerning the young lady. He secured an introduction to the family.

The Marquise d'Aspremont invited him to her Thursday reception. At precisely nine o'clock he rang the bell at the entrance of the modest mansion where the old marquise resided.

A servant in English livery showed him into the drawing-room, which to his surprise he found furnished in true Louis XIV. style. Nothing was lacking. The Marquis, having been obliged to sell a family seat, had reproduced in his Parisian home the room of his grandfather, a colonel under Louis XIV. On the grey woodwork with white carvings, medallions by noted artists stood out in relief. The large easy chairs, with high backs of gilded wood, were covered with royal blue silk brocaded with silver. The sun-shaped clock with its Apollo borne on four marble pyramids had marked the hours, sad and joyous, for two centuries. X-shaped seats, covered with sapphire velvet, reminded one of the presentations of duchesses.

Tea was served on a Boule table crusted with copper and silver which was worthy of the great Condé.

Near the fire-place was seated a priest with violet hose who was addressed as "Monseigneur." Mme. la Marquise d'Aspremont sat facing him. She appeared to be a good enough person, though abrupt of speech. She wore a cap of old point lace surmounted by two immense grey butterflies, and a plum-coloured dress of China silk. She discussed all known topics without reserve and with that simplicity which calls "a spade a spade."

The company consisted of two other elderly ladies, an Academician, an old general, a young man from the provinces who had nothing to say, the grandnephews of the Marquise, her son, and Marie hemmed in by a crowd of youngsters. The lady who had introduced Adrien was the only Parisian present.

She had dined with the Marquise; and as soon as Adrien arrived she tried to entice Marie away from an exciting game with the children. The girl waited until it was ended, then reluctantly entered the circle of grown-up people.

It was absolutely impossible, however, to draw her into conversation. With her dress of grey wool, her white guimpe, and her great cross, she resembled a "tableau vivant" of a pupil of the Saint Cyr school. Timidity and embarrassment were stamped upon her countenance. She had the appearance of one who would like to sink out of sight. It puzzled Adrien to imagine what they could have told her about him to frighten her so.

Was she unsophisticated or stupid? A little of both, the young man decided. She was asked to play, and at once obeyed; but never was ear vexed by so many false notes. In the midst of this brilliant execution she suddenly stopped, saying:

"I fear I have forgotten the rest."

"It seems that you have forgotten it all, Marie," said her grandmother, "and that you forgot it before you began."

At this the girl rose and excused herself, saying that she would return when the children were asleep.

On passing out, she caught her feet in the scarf of one of the ladies, picked it up awkwardly, and disappeared. Even her silvery voice had changed, and Adrien no longer felt the spell of its music. As may be readily imagined, she was seen no more that evening.

The next night Adrien danced several times with Mdlle. Clary Bernard, took a flower from her bouquet, and saw, as in a dream, the crest of the great Samuel on her fan. The day after he called on the friend who wished to see him marry the descendant of the old nobility, thanked her for the intended honour, but also informed her that he needed a little more brilliancy in his abode.

"I do not pretend that Marie is a Mme. de Sévigne, but you should not judge of her intelligence by a single interview. I believe that if you were married to her you would never regret it. Call again and give her a fair trial."

"Thanks, but a life trial would be too long."

"Well, give her a fortnight's grace. It must not be said that you refused her on account of a nocturne badly played and a scarf awkwardly picked up."

Against his will, Count Mac Trevor went to the Marquise's the following Thursday. The same experience awaited him, no music this time, no awkwardness, but the same inexplicable silence.

The Marquise and her friends filled the evening with conversation on two equally edifying topics: the corruption of the age and genealogies.

"A young girl must be kept a child," repeated the dowager, "else she will not be worthy of becoming a woman."

Marie broke the silence which enveloped her only to ask Adrien to buy tickets for a charity fête in which she was to take part.

On returning home, he found a perfumed envelope containing tickets for the same fête, where Mdlle. Clary Bernard was also to shine. Decidedly, matters were growing interesting! Adrien could well understand the fair Bernard would be charming, but how about the little girl in the grey gown?

* * * * *

The gaiety of the fête was at its height when Count Mac Trevor entered the grounds where it was held.

The trees were hung with many-coloured lanterns, which shed their soft rays on the happy crowd. The military band, the joyous shouts of children, the creaking wheels of fortune, the eloquence of Punch and Judy, the gay chatter, all made parts of a symphony round him; and with a blonde marquise in heliotrope selling American beverages on one side, and a duchess offering him flowers on the other, Adrien found it no easy task to make his way about.

Called here by a smile, detained there by a pair of lovely eyes, he at last reached a "tombola" where a foreign princess was chatting with true Parisian wit.

Suddenly a shrill voice said close behind him.

"A cigar, sir?"

Turning, he recognised the triumphant Clary in the garb of a shepherdess; white gauze spotted with red, a large hat trimmed with white plumes and red pompons, a long sash of floating ribbons, a silver chatelaine suspended from her girdle, and a little apron trimmed with dainty lace.

Digitized by Google

Adrien gave a hundred francs for a cigar and followed the fair merchant.

She offered her wares right and left, all the while rebuking him for his tardiness.

He looked at her with some perplexity. She did not quite come up to his expectations.

Something in her manner, the coquettish tossing of her head, betrayed an affectation which jarred on her admirer's artistic nature. Then the little forced laugh that took the place of words displeased him. That silly laugh betrayed the embarrassment of vanity seeking in an empty brain for ideas, and finding nothing.

Just then Adrien found himself near a wheel of fortune behind which was the friend who had introduced him to Mdlle. d'Aspremont. Marie was with her.

The girl's simple toilette consisted of a skirt of white woollen stuff, a high white bodice embroidered with silver, the high collar and sleeves trimmed after the Valois fashion. A toque of white straw, trimmed with great blue wings, completed the resemblance to a maid of honour of the court of Charles IX.

"Does one win every time, mademoiselle?"

The silvery voice said so many appropriate and pleasing things in reply that Adrian stood rooted to the spot in astonishment. Gold pieces fell like drops of rain in the little platter. In the excitement of her charitable endeavours the girl was no longer recognisable. The woman was foreshadowed, and such a woman! The blue-bird had broken its shell and was already spreading its wing for flight!

Adrien had drawn back, fearing lest his presence might silence this babbling brook.

When she at last noticed a gentleman near her wheel she said without a trace of embarrassment:

"And for you, sir, shall it be green, red, or blue?"

"Does one win every time?"

"Certainly, sir. Anything you wish! Even he who loses, wins, you see."

"I would prefer one of your roses."

"But they are very dear."

"How much?"

"Just as much as you are willing to give."

"They are dear, that is true, but no amount is too great to pay for your smile!"

And Adrien emptied his purse into the platter.

A scarlet flush spread over her sweet face and she could only murmur:

"Thanks!"

* * * * *

Adrien married Marie.

During their wanderings in Italy, as he listened to her appreciative discussion of works of art, the wealth of information possessed by the quiet girl astonished him!

Kissing her little hand he exclaimed:

"To think that I believed you stupid!"

"Oh, you see, in our circle, girls are taught not to talk. They fill our minds with treasures, then lock them up and leave it to a husband to find the secret of the lock."

"It seems that the key was found at the charity fête."

"That was because I saw you and sent some one to aid you."

"Who?"

"Love."

JEAN DOMBEY.

The June Pearson's.

ON SALE SATURDAY, MAY 28th.

The most Luxuriously and Exquisitely Illustrated of Magazines, containing 120 splendid Pictures.

CONTENTS:

PICTURES AND THEIR PAINTERS. (Illustrated.) Nothing could exceed the beauty of the pictures which accompany this feature. A series of panels by V. TOJETTI, illustrating the five senses, are specially worthy of notice.

NIGHT PHOTOGRAPHY. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By AUSTIN FRYERS. This article is illustrated with some wonderful photographs which were actually taken at night; a description is given of the means employed in obtaining these remarkable effects.

REAL GHOST STORIES. No. VI.—The Story of Yand Manor House. Illustrated by B. E. Minns. By E. and H. HERON. The story of Yand Manor House is the last and perhaps the best of this fascinating series.

TWO FOOLS. (Illustrated by S. Nation.) By PHILIP HEMERY. Verse.

HOW SOLDIERS FIGHT. No. III.—Infantry. (Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood.) By F. NORREYS CONNELL. Mr. Norreys Connell contributes a forcible and most interesting description of the duties of the Infantryman on the field of battle. This contribution is realistically illustrated by Mr. Stanley L. Wood.

THE RED CARNATION. (Illustrated by W. Dewar.) By BARONESS E. ORCZY. A complete story.

BLACK DIAMONDS. (Written and Illustrated by J. HOLT SCHOOLING.) In this interesting article by Mr. J. Holt Schooling, the extent of our coal supply, the annual amount consumed, and the likelihood of the supply giving out, are illustrated by means of the author's well-known statistical diagrams.

THE COST OF THE MAUVE SATIN DRESS. (Illustrated by A. Jule Goodman.) By EVELYN ADYE. A complete story.

IN THE LAND OF THE MERMAIDS. (Illustrated by D. Murray Smith.) By RUDOLPH DE CORDOVA. This article contains a remarkably interesting account of the many ingenious schemes which have been devised for the recovery of sunken ships and lost treasure. Striking illustrations of the wonderful apparatus employed are reproduced.

CHINESE FAIRY TALES. No. III.—The Children who Fed the Bear of Shang-Te. (Illustrated by C. Lawson Wood.) By ANNIS LENNOYS. A very amusing little story.

A GARDEN OF CHILDREN. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By MARCUS TINDAL. In this article is given a short, popular account of the Kindergarten methods, illustrated with delightful photographs specially taken, showing classes of children engaged in their interesting lessons.

FROM THE DEPTH. By JOHN C. WINDER.

A LOYAL TRAITOR. (Illustrated by H. Piffard.) By JAMES WORKMAN. A complete story.

FAMOUS FOLLIES. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By E. LE BRETON-MARTIN. In this feature is reproduced a collection of very interesting and curious photographs of colossal buildings and unsightly towers which have been erected in different parts of this country for no other apparent purpose than to satisfy some personal whim of their owners. Huge sums of money have been spent in building some of these "Follies."

THE TOY ARMIES OF THE WORLD. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By M. DINORBEN GRIFFITH. An interesting account is here given of the manufacture of tin and lead soldiers. To such of pitch of perfection has the manufacture been carried, that it is really quite difficult to tell that the tin and lead soldiers shown in the accompanying photographs are not real soldiers of flesh and blood.

THE ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN KETTLE. No. XII.—The Wreck of the Cattle-Boat. (Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood.) By CUTCLIFFE HYNE. A complete story.

THE SHIP OF THE DESERT. (Illustrated with Photographs). By HERBERT VIVIAN. This is a most popular account of the habits and uses of the camel, and is illustrated with some unique photographs.

THE PEARLS OF MADAME DE POMPADOUR. (Illustrated by J. S. Crompton.) By E. W. JENNINGS. A complete story.

LIFE'S LITTLE WORRIES. (Illustrated by A. Popini.) By W. L. ALDEN. Plenty of genuine humour will be found in the five pages devoted to Life's Little Worries.

A BIG BABY. By C. ARTHUR PEARSON. An appeal for the Fresh Air Fund put forward on somewhat unconventional lines.

Digitized by Google

THE RIVAL QUEENS.

A TALE OF OLD FRANCE RETOLD FROM THE FRENCH BY MARY FERMOR.

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

CHAPTER XXV.

Mahmoud-el-Reis Keeps his Promise.

"To the Castle of Étampes!" shouted Antoine Cadocu who had, with small ceremony, hoisted Madame Agnes up into the saddle in front of him. Without further delay they started off, accompanied by an escort of twelve Free Lances, who carried with them, as a prisoner, the crafty clerk, Maître Samson. They crossed the river by the ferry that had brought back the empty litter of poor Agnes the Fair, and made their way rapidly towards the forest.

Agnes de Méranie's heart was ready to burst with rage and mortification at the ignominious way in which she had been deprived of her expected triumph, but she recognised her master in the rough soldier whose prisoner she evidently was, and hoped by a semblance of submission to temporise till an opportunity for vengeance should offer itself to her.

"The Castle of Étampes belongs to Lord Amaury Montruel, does it not?" she asked, when she heard their destination.

"Amaury Montruel is dead, and the castle belongs to Captain Antoine Cadocu," was the answer; which made her hopes fall considerably lower, though she kept her own counsel, and the darkness concealed the hot burning tears that rose to her eyes.

"To the Castle of Étampes!" shouted Antoine Cadocu.

The clocks of the city were striking the first stroke of midnight, and the solemn Mass was about to begin.

The tumult and excitement caused by the abduction of Madame Agnes, and the apparently accidental death of Amaury Montruel, had drawn off the attention of the crowd from recent arrivals in the Cathedral; but when people had once more time to look round, a striking pair was found in the vicinity of the King. One was a woman, closely veiled, but wearing a crown and royal, gold-embroidered mantle. Her companion was a man dressed in the full richness of a magnificent Saracen costume.

As soon as they noticed her, Albret, Eric and Eve all left their places and hurried to her side, forgetful of all else than that they saw her whom they had begun to mourn as dead.

The Saracen advanced leading Ingeburge by the hand, and bowing low before Philip Augustus, said in a clear voice:

"The hour of midnight is striking, King, and I alone survive of the nine assassins who were pledged to take your life. Now fulfil your promise, as I have fulfilled mine."

The King advanced and took the trembling hand of Ingeburge from that of the Saracen, and as he raised her veil a shout of jubilation rang through the building, for they recognised the fair face and delicate beauty of the long lost Queen.

Philip bent down and kissed her forehead tenderly, and if his conscience smote him for this tardy reparation, his heart was full of thankfulness that she had been restored to him in time.

He then led her to the Altar, where they knelt side by side as he uttered the following words:

Digitized by Google

The King took the trembling hand of Ingeburge.

"This is my wife in thy sight, O Lord God."

Then rising, they turned to the people and he proclaimed solemnly.

"From henceforth love and reverence Ingeburge as your Queen."

The Lord Bishop of Orvietto, Legate of his Holiness Pope Innocent III., did not at all approve of this summary settlement of affairs in which he and his compeers were allowed no share. He was looking round in search of someone upon whom to vent his righteous indignation, when his eye fell upon the striking, and somewhat incongruous figure of Mahmoud-el-Reis. He strode towards him, saying haughtily:

"Infidel! How dare you defile this sacred edifice by your presence! What brings you here?"

"I came to seek instruction for Holy Baptism, and to abjure my former errors, Sir Legate," replied the Syrian, unabashed, and, it must be confessed, with decided satisfaction, as he saw the crestfallen way in which the proud Bishop retired to his seat, muttering:

"This must be inquired into. It is some profane joke, I fear!"

Though Ingeburge had been in some measure prepared for the sudden and happy change in her lot by the confident, if somewhat vague, assertions of the Syrian during the time she had been under his care, she felt so overwhelmed by this new-found joy, that the King almost feared she had suffered too much at his hands ever to shake off the effects of her long imprisonment, and the terrible experience on the last night of her stay at the Abbey St. Martin.

When, however, they had reached the Louvre after the long and trying ordeal, her spirits rose, and her eyes gleamed with their depth of love and tenderness, and when with gentle diffidence she would have thanked her lord for this realisation of her dearest hopes, he took her in his arms and said with deep emotion:

"How can I ever atone for all you have suffered at my hands? Your countrymen rightly call you 'Angel' and you have been my guardian angel. I owe my life to you, and, perchance, my soul's welfare. If Heaven will spare me that life, I swear it shall be devoted to making you forget the dreary past."

Within the next few days the Council released the kingdom from the Interdict, Philip Augustus was publicly reconciled to the Church and his marriage with Queen Ingeburge ratified at a service of general thanksgiving. Mahmoud-el-Reis was received as a catechumen by Bishop Maurice de Sully, who was thus compensated by the exchange of a living stone for the spiritual temple in place of the lifeless image that had fulfilled so gruesome a destiny.

Albret and Eve were married soon after, and both retained their places in the love and confidence of the royal pair. Eric returned to his northern home after seeing his little sister and Queen Angel secure in their well-deserved happiness.

Maître Samson paid the price for his double dealing with his ill-favoured head the day after his master had come by his awful end, for King Philip thought it advisable to dispense with the services of even so able and subtle an agent, in consideration of his tendency to try and serve two masters.

State affairs did not suffer the reunited King and Queen to remain long together, for he had to take the field against his ever-turbulent enemy John of England, and in this campaign he was again accompanied by Captain Antoine Cadocu, who performed acts of prowess and valour that would have done credit to our own King Richard himself.

During his absence he left Madame Agnes under the care of "La Fontanelle," whose experience in the management of her sex he had reason to admire. The lot of the deposed favourite was a very bitter one. Upon her arrival at the Castle of Etampes she had been received by Catherine, Alix and Jeanne, her three successful rivals in the nocturnal competition at the St. Landry tavern, and they had promptly

He took her in his arms.

Digitized by Google

He kissed it reverently.

taken possession of the jewels and rich clothing that she had donned so proudly that morning, giving her in exchange some left-off garments of their own. She was then bidden to wait on her new master at his supper, and when she showed signs of resistance, he found summary means of reducing her to submission. She was kept in close confinement, and never allowed to move without one of the three attendant maidens at her side. It may safely be assumed that they lost no opportunity of humiliating and torturing the wretched woman who had once stood so far above them. The bitterest drop in her cup was the knowledge of her hated rival's restoration and the constant reports that reached her of Ingeburge's growing popularity. Had it not been that she still cherished plans of revenge, she would have taken her own life rather than submit to the hourly indignities she had to endure.

Cadocu had told her that the King was fully aware both of her visit to him at the tavern and of her intrigues with Amaury Montruel, so that she knew he would never forgive the deceit she had practised upon him. Appeal to such a one was worse than useless. Montruel, her slave and plaything, was dead—as she had more than once wished him—but now she reviled the ill-fate that had removed the one man who would have stood by her in her disgrace. No thought of sorrow or pity for his untimely end ever crossed her mind, she only felt a sense of mad, selfish anger at losing her forbearing and ever ready friend, just at a time when she had no one to replace him.

How she longed, too, for those costly pearls she had wasted upon that faithless Mahmoud-el-Reis, who, instead of killing her rival, had worked the destruction of those who had employed him! If she only had had money or jewels she might have bribed someone to let her out of this ghostly castle, haunted by the vision of her murdered namesake who had thought to be its mistress, and of the man who had received it as a token of affection from the King he had so basely betrayed.

Her dazzling beauty faded, and her companions did not fail to tell her so; the fires of hatred and revenge burnt within her till she seemed like a shadow of her former self. With hollow cheeks and sunken eyes she wandered restlessly about, or sat moodily gnawing her nails and refusing either to speak or eat.

The war, or rather the campaign, was brought to a successful termination, and Philip Augustus went with his Queen Ingeburge in state to Nôtre Dame to return thanks for his safe home-coming. Just as the Queen descended from her litter, a woman, dressed in the ragged remains of tawdry finery, darted forward with an uplifted knife in one hand ready to strike Ingeburge as she passed. The King stepped between them, knocked the weapon from the woman's wasted hand, and bade his guards seize her.

With a cry of impotent rage she fastened herself upon his arm, saying wildly:

"Have you forgotten your wife, Agnes de Méranie? A malediction upon that white-faced witch who stole you from me! She never loved you as I did, and she shall not live to enjoy what I——"

Her sentence was never finished, for the mob had closed in at the sound of her name, and, before the guards could secure her, she had fallen a victim to the violence of the populace.

Cadocu expressed the deepest regret that she should have thus thrust herself upon his royal master, but explained that for some time past she had been much more docile, and in apparently such bad health, that he had ordered their vigilance to be relaxed. He now understood how deep had been her duplicity, but felt a grim satisfaction in the knowledge that she had but hastened her own end by it.

The day after this tragic episode Mahmoud-el-Reis, to call him by his old familiar name, was baptised in Nôtre Dame by Bishop Maurice de Sully in the presence of the King and Queen. After the ceremony he accompanied them back to the Louvre, and took leave of the many friends he had made at court, including the Queen's private chaplain, good Prior Anselm, as well as Eve and Albret, whose dread and hatred had speedily been turned into love and admiration when they knew the noble part he had played on behalf of Queen Angel.

The King and Ingeburge accompanied him to the door, where his magnificent Arab was in charge of the two black slaves.

Having taken leave of Philip Augustus, who would even now have persuaded him to remain amongst them, he turned to Ingeburge. With tears in her eyes she held out her hand to him.

Digitized by Google

He kissed it reverently and pressed it to his heart for some seconds. His full, rich voice trembled slightly as he said:

"Adieu, Queen! I leave you happy. God grant you may long continue so! I go now to Dilah, your twin soul, to teach her the lesson that you have taught me. Pray for us that we may both stand fast, and for our souls, that they may rest in peace."

He turned away, and with one more look at the woman who had so strangely affected his destiny, he dashed over the draw-bridge and was soon lost in a cloud of dust.

"There goes one of the noblest men that ever breathed," said Philip gravely; to which Ingeburge added in a low voice:

"And it is to him, under Heaven, that we owe our happiness, my dear lord. Would that his own had not been sacrificed to procure it!"

* * * * *

Months passed and there came news of a hideous tragedy in the Far East. Mahmoud-el-Reis, faithful to the last, returned and accomplished his self-imposed mission. Before presenting himself to the authorities, he sought out Dilah in the shady groves of Pur, and told her the strange story of his broken vow, and of the wondrous truths he had learnt from the lips of her twin soul. His love and burning zeal, now transferred with increased intensity to his new-found faith, soon worked as he desired upon the gentle heart of Dilah, and when she had declared herself willing to stand by his side in death, as she had hoped to do in life, he signed her brow with the cross and they went forth together.

Unflinchingly the two faithful hearts bore the double penalty accorded to their two-fold crime of apostasy and treachery.

Their torture was extended to twenty-four hours instead of twelve, and the only earthly consolation Mahmoud-el-Reis had in that terrible time, was the knowledge that the soul of his beloved had passed hence before the fangs of the tiger could reach her body.

THE END.

A Splendid New Serial Story, entitled "THE GLADIATOR; A Tale of Eastern Empire," will begin shortly.

AN OLD WOMAN'S LOVE.

THE Marquis Dizios, first secretary of the Spanish legation, was a man still in the prime of life, with great personal advantages and a most distinguished presence.

He was as popular socially as he was successful diplomatically.

No little informal dinner, indeed no festivity of any kind, large or small, was deemed complete without the presence of "that delightful Dizios."

Ladies in the most exclusive circles of fashion had lionised him to an extent that came near to making him hated by his own sex in the capital. Yet he never indulged in any flirtation or showed preference for any particular woman; and the smiles of the younger ladies failed to make the desired impression upon him.

He was dining at his club, one evening, with the only intimate friend he had made since his appointment.

A certain Arnold Hemingsen by name, an attaché of the Swedish legation; a charming fellow in his way, but the very opposite to Dizios. As they were finishing their coffee and lighting their cigars, the conversation turned upon women.

The Marquis' manner instantly changed, he grew cold and reserved, and merely answered in monosyllables.

Hemingsen generally respected his friend's peculiarity, although his interest had always been more or less piqued by the marquis' invariable taciturnity regarding the fair sex; to-night, however, he was in a more reckless mood than usual, whether it was owing to the exhilarating effects of an excellent meal, or to a generous absorption of the "rosy" to quote from Mr. Dick Swiveller's classic phraseology, I really could not say.

After staring at Dizios thoughtfully for a moment, while he turned his cigar carefully round between his lips and puffed a short white cloud into the air, he unburdened his mind by bluntly asking his friend how it happened that so popular a man as himself should never have found one lady fairer than the rest?

The marquis was more surprised than angered by his friend's crude curiosity, and only replied after a moment's hesitation.

"My dear Hemingsen," he said, "there is a story connected with my aversion to flirtation, in the ancient as well as in the modern sense of the word, which, if you care to hear it, will define my antipathy to that species of society sport better than any explanation I could offer you. It is rather long though, and some other time——"

"No, no," interrupted Hemingsen, whose face expressed the liveliest interest, "don't bother about its length. Let us hear it now."

Digitized by Google

"Well," said the Spaniard, "this is what happened, and as the heroine of the one love affair of my life has been dead now for many years, I may, still with profound respect for her memory, tell you the story.

"I had been spending a few weeks of my leave, one summer, with my mother, in Spain, and as I was about to start for Paris, she begged me to make a stay at Poictiers in order to visit her dear friend, the Duchesse d'Ormont, who was living in her chateau not far from that town. She lived in great seclusion, owing to the death of her only daughter.

"I will not deny that the idea bored me immensely, but as I wished to please my mother above all things, I carefully concealed my annoyance, and vowed, at the same time, to make myself as agreeable as possible to her friend.

"My mother wrote the Duchesse of my approaching visit, and when I alighted from the train, I found a brake waiting to convey me to the castle; it was drawn by a pair of the most splendid thoroughbreds that I have ever seen, and I never wearied of admiring their action during the drive.

"The Duchesse received me at the foot of the grand stair-case. She was very simply dressed in the deepest mourning, without a single ornament of any kind to relieve its austerity save for one ring, a magnificent ruby which I noticed upon her finger as I raised it to my lips. To my surprise she blushed as I did so, but instantly controlling herself, she welcomed me in an almost regal fashion; indeed, I have never been more impressed by so curious a mixture of simplicity and grandeur.

"Perplexed by that curious blush, a sudden mischievous idea of paying a little court to the poor lady entered my foolish brain. I would show her, I thought, the same flattering attention which a young man would offer a young and beautiful woman of exalted rank whom he admired: that is to say, with a carefully blended mixture of deference and gallantry.

"For the first half hour our conversation never deviated from subjects relating to my mother, of whom the Duchesse seemed very fond, for she asked many questions concerning her health and her life in Spain; she thanked me, too, very graciously for coming so far out of my way to see her, and begged me to consider myself quite at home at the castle during my visit.

"'When you know the dinner hour your lesson will be learnt,' she said with a charming smile. 'Pray arrange your day to suit yourself, choose your own horses at your ease; the country round is celebrated for its views, and I am sure you will find many places of interest to visit before leaving.'

"I answered with energy that I had come to see her and her alone, and I begged her not to deprive me of her society for the few days I was to remain.

"She blushed again! And to hide her confusion gave her nephew (who, I had forgotten to mention, was present at my reception) instructions to escort me round the park and show me the lake and the flower gardens, of which, she added, she was very proud.

"The Duchesse, who was innately gracious, promptly consented to be my guide herself when I warmly urged her to grant me that favour, and donning a large hat, she led the way out upon the terrace. The view across the park was very fine.

"The velvety green lawns felt softer than Persian carpets beneath our feet, as we paced slowly along side by side under the spreading elm trees to the lake; the gentle breeze hardly rippled its placid surface as we followed the walk which ran round it; while the greedy swans glided hopefully along beside us, fluttering their wings and clapping with their bills—in other words begging us in 'swan talk' for some favour in the way of biscuits or bread-crumbs.

"I persevered of course, in my endeavours to entertain my hostess and finally succeeded in making her laugh; for up to that moment her demeanour had been grave, almost stern.

"As our promenade was drawing to a close and we were returning through the flower garden, we paused simultaneously before a beautiful jasmine in full bloom. After inhaling its fragrance for an instant I begged her very humbly and almost in a whisper to make me a buttonhole of the blossoms.

"'How capricious you are,' she returned smiling, while her supple fingers cleverly twisted a few leaves and buds into a little bunch which she placed in the lapel of my coat. 'That is my favourite flower, too,' she added, raising her sweet eyes to mine; but she dropped them again hurriedly as they met my gaze.

"Just what she read in my eyes, I do not know—admiration possibly, a tenderness of some sort, surely, to which she was unaccustomed. For I myself felt the magnetism as our glances crossed and we retraced our steps in silence.

"The following days were spent in a constant and ideal companionship. We drove about the country during the day and our evenings were passed upon the terrace, or in the great bow-window of the drawing-room, which overlooked the park.

"But our relations grew equivocal. I was dissatisfied with myself and my behaviour; and each day as it dawned, I vowed should end my visit.

"But I still lingered on. There was a fascination about our intercourse which was hard to resist.

"Although her hand had never pressed mine more warmly than on the day of my arrival, I felt that I had made an impression upon her never to be effaced and, alas! my conjecture proved only too true.

"I decided to leave the chateau one Sunday morning, while she was attending divine service in the beautiful chapel which formed the left wing of the castle. I had no heart to bid her farewell, so I left a note, excusing my abrupt departure and thanking her for the gracious hospitality which she had extended to me.

* * * * *

"One year from that day her body was found floating in the lovely lake round whose grassy margin she had strolled with me but a twelvemonth before!"

He paused and then went on hurriedly.

"In her will she left me as a keepsake the ruby ring which I have already mentioned."

"Ah!" murmured Hemingsen, "I have often admired it; indeed, it seems a part of you, for I have never seen you without it."

The marquis smiled sadly.

"Now you know, my dear Hemingsen," he said, "the story of my one love affair and my repugnance to any semblance of false sentiment!"

"But," interrupted his friend eagerly, "do you really think her love for you drove her to——?"

Dizios laid his hand heavily on the young man's arm.

"The Duchesse," he said, "was over sixty years old!"

Alice Henderson.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MAKE PRIME BEER AT HOME

EXTRACT OF HERBS

6D. BOTTLE MAKES 8 GALLONS

NON-INTOXICATING BEER

The most palatable refreshing tonic drink producible.

IMITATED but NOT EQUALLED

Of all Chemists and Stores. Also try Mason's Wine Essences and Mason's Coffee Essence. Sample bottle of either of above post FREE for 9d. Two, assorted, 1s. 3d.; Three, assorted, 1s. 6d. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

The BEST BEVERAGE for YOUR MEALS.

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

CYCLE DEPOTS

High-class Selection of GENTS', LADIES', & JUVENILE CYCLES.

From £3 Cash, or on Easy Terms 10/- Monthly.

Lists Post Free.

Head Depôt: 52 to 55 Blackfriars Road, London, S.E.

RIDING SCHOOLS

BEST IN LONDON.

Practical Tuition until Perfect, 10/6. Single Lesson, 2/-.

Purchasers Taught Free.

Open 9 till 9.

West End Branch: 121 King's Road, Sloane Square, S.W.

CYCLEDOM LTD.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

"JUNO" CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Monthly. Roadster, £10. 16/8
Road Racer, £11. 18/4
Lady & Gent, £12 12/- 21/-
£14 14/- 24/6
£16 16/- 28/-
Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories, sent post free. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO LTD., 75 and 76 Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.; and at Piccadilly Circus exactly opposite the Criterion, London, W. JUNO Riding School, 1,700ft.

Try MASON'S

KILLCORN

The only painless corn cure.

IT HAS NEVER BEEN KNOWN TO FAIL.

Thousands of Testimonials have been received from all grades of society.

READ THIS ONE. Painless Cure!

"Leeds, Mar. 17th.

"Dear Sir,—I had three most painful corns, which were PAINLESSLY REMOVED by using rather less than a bottle of KILLCORN. I now walk with the greatest ease.—Yours, O. B. CARR."

KILLCORN is sold by all Chemists, Stores, &c., in bottles at 1s. each, or sent direct on receipt of value in stamps by the Proprietor,

3, Guildford Street, Leeds.

Pyn-Ka

THE POLISHER.

For Gold, Silver, Electro, Brass, Copper, Nickel, Tin, &c. Best and Cheapest Metal Polish known. Tablets and Paste, 1d. to 6d.

KEATING'S POWDER

DESTROYS BUGS, FLEAS, MOTHS, BEETLES

TINS 3D. 6D. & 1S.

Digitized by Google

MANY HAPPY RETURNS OF THIS PAGE.

C. W.—The speed of transmission of overland telephone wires is at the rate of 16,000 miles a second. Where the wires are through cables under the sea the speed is not more than 6,020 miles a second.

H. wants to know if it is permissible for a town council to choose a mayor outside their own body.———Certainly, and it is very often done.

With reference to a paragraph that appeared on this page a week or two ago regarding the cost of clothing our soldiers and sailors, One of the Sailors writes to say that although Tommy Atkins gets all his clothes provided for him by the country, the sailors have to pay for their own. A sailor has to keep his kit up to the uniform standard in quality and quantity, which comprises about forty items. Should E. S. or any other reader wish to know the cost of these, O. O. T. S. will be glad to supply them with it.

Contango.—Mr. Edison, the American inventor, is not blind, as your friend states. It is true that he is deaf, however, and this calamity was caused by a railway porter having lifted him up by the ears when a boy.

Author.—The biggest fortune ever made by a man solely by his pen was the quarter of a million made by Sir Walter Scott, while probably the single work which brought in the largest sum for its author was Monsieur Daudet's "Sapho," for which he received £40,000.

B. B.—Only pure spring water is absolutely free from alcohol. River, sea, and snow-water all contain more or less.

Walter is in an unenviable position. To use his own words, he is "madly in love with a beautiful girl." Unfortunately, his affection is not returned in the same degree, although the young lady admits that she "likes him," but not sufficiently to become his wife. He continues to press his suit on the grounds that his own devotion will in the end win hers after marriage. The lady in question does not agree with him in this theory, and declines to risk it. Being of a persevering disposition, he asks if we cannot say something which would induce her to change her mind. ———I am afraid not, Walter. In our opinion the lady is quite right; it would be an exceedingly risky thing to do. Of course, it is just possible that such a marriage would turn out happily, but the chances are against it.

G. C. H.—It is by no means an unusual thing for a sovereign never to go through the ceremony of coronation. Neither the Emperor of Germany, the King of Italy, the present and late Kings of Spain, the King of Bavaria, nor the King of Saxony have ever been crowned.

W. H.—The ostrich is the swiftest moving animal on the face of the earth; it has been known to travel at the rate of a mile a minute, a speed equal to that of our fastest trains.

Whiskers writes: "Do you consider a beard an advantage or disadvantage in business?"———The present is undoubtedly an age of young men. In every department of life it is the young men who are most in evidence. It would appear then to be rather a disadvantage than otherwise to be the possessor of a beard, for it invariably makes a man look several years older than his clean-shaven contemporaries, and he is therefore apt to be pushed aside as being less smart than they are. But after all, it cannot make much difference in the long run, for if a man has his wits about him, the fact will assert itself, be he clean shaven or the owner of a beard.

Populous.—At the beginning of the present century there were only twenty-one towns in Europe with a population of more than 100,000.

Six Footer asks: "Where are the tallest men in Great Britain to be found?"———From statistics it appears that the inhabitants of Galloway are on an average taller than the rest of their countrymen; the average height in that part being 5ft. 10½in., without shoes. The average for the whole of England being only 5ft. 6⅔in.

Gardener wants to know why orchids command such fancy prices.——— Probably because their culture is a fashionable craze, together with the existing mania for securing new and rare varieties.

Canary.—The original inhabitants of the Canary Islands have completely disappeared; that is the result of contact with Spanish civilisation. Their mummies are to be found hidden away in holes that honeycomb the mountains. Among the people of that extinct race were so-called communities of women; they lived in an agglomeration of cells, after the manner of the early Christians of Egypt. The remains of one of the singular convents exist on the slope of a mountain on the Grand Canary; there are 300 cells cut out of the solid rock, and on such a slope that only a mountaineer can reach them.

H. M.—The crown of the King of Roumania is made of metal from the cannon captured by the Roumanians at Plevna in 1877.

C. H. L. asks: "When were the first lucifer matches made?"———In the year 1829. These matches, however, were not lit by striking, the wooden splits were headed with a composition of sulphur, sugar and chlorate of potash. They had to be dipped into fuming sulphuric acid to light them; the acid was kept on asbestos in a bottle. Striking matches first made their appearance in 1832, and were lighted by rubbing their heads on sandpaper, usually by drawing them sharply through a fold of the paper between the finger and thumb.

C. Y.—The only Lady Mayoress entitled to wear a chain of office is the wife of the Lord Mayor of York.

Waters writes: "It would interest me greatly if you could give me some idea of the advance our Navy has made since the time of the Spanish Armada."———At the time of the Spanish Armada our very largest vessel was not more than 1,000 tons, and required a crew of 500 men, whereas a vessel to-day of 15,000 tons only requires an additional 250. In 1598 the most popular form of cannon was the "culverin," weighing about two tons, and capable of firing a fifteen-pound shot every ten or twelve minutes, whereas nowadays a modern gun cannon is capable of discharging seven or eight tons of metal every minute. In fact, the only point of resemblance between the fleet of 1598 and the fleet of 1898 is that both are manned with British sailors.

W. W.—The ordinary fog as distinguished from the "London particular" is caused by the condensation of atmospheric vapour, owing to the presence of cold. Fogs, therefore, more frequently occur at those seasons of the year when there is the greatest variation of temperature during the day. In large cities, such as London, these white mists become impregnated with smoke and assume the pea-soup colour.

Notice to Competitors.

In all Prize Competitions the Editor's decision is final. No correspondence will be entertained when once a competition is finished and the result published.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

100

BICYCLE PRIZES.

Ladies' or Gents' £23 A.B. Cycles.

Send Answers Early.

WHAT TO DO.—Make up the best sentence you can of eleven words, the first letter of each word commencing with a letter of A.B. CYCLE FREE in any order. Thus: "You Can Easily Earn An Excellent Light Roadster For Being Clever." It will be seen that the initials of each word, when transposed, form the phrase A.B. CYCLE FREE. The letters "A.B." will be counted as words when used to represent A.B. Cycles or A.B. Tyres. The above sentence is only given as an example of what we mean, and must not be sent in.

An Absolutely FREE Competition. We ask you to buy no Soap or Watch Chains, or articles you don't require, before allowing you to participate in the Prizes. Neither after you have won a prize (if you are fortunate enough to do so) do we compel you to purchase any accessories. You pay nothing to enter, and even if you receive one of our regret notices—and we make no secret of the fact that thousands are unsuccessful—you are only out of pocket for the cost of two penny stamps, which the Post Office get the benefit of. Thus we can honestly and truthfully assert of this thoroughly sound and genuine Competition that it is ABSOLUTELY FREE TO ALL.

All Machines guaranteed for 12 months.

LIST OF PRIZES.

First Prize, £23 A.B. Safety, fitted with A.B. tyres.

FREE OF COST.

Second Class (4 prizes) £23 Cycle for £9
Third Class (6 prizes) £23 Cycle for £10
Fourth Class (9 prizes) £23 Cycle for £11
Fifth Class (15 prizes) £23 Cycle for £12
Sixth Class (25 prizes) £23 Cycle for £13
Consolation (40 prizes) £23 Cycle for £14

TAKE PARTICULAR NOTICE. COMPETITION IS NOW OPEN and Closes June 15th, 1898. Results will be declared soon afterwards.

Winners of prizes must clear them within a week or ten days, otherwise machines unclaimed may be passed on to the next in rotation Prizes may be considerably increased in all or any one class. Unless stamp is enclosed for postage of Catalogue and Result of Competition, the Company will not guarantee to inform competitors of their success. Prize-winners need not purchase any accessories with their machines, unless they so desire. As the majority of the competitors may not be able to call and inspect the machines, we guarantee to refund the full amount paid for a second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, or for a consolation prize (less carriage), if the owner is not perfectly satisfied with it on arrival. We cannot give any money or other prizes in lieu of cycles. We have no agents.

£100

We offer this Reward to any lady or gentleman able to prove that we have ever in the whole course of our existence sold our cheapest machine under £15 cash either to an ordinary customer, agent, dealer or shipper. We mention this fact because several persons erroneously imagine that we do not get full prices for the hundreds of machines we are sending to all parts of the country. We do not allow a shilling extra discount beyond the 34 per cent. off the catalogue price. A machine possessing all those sterling qualities which make a really first-class machine of the highest grade cannot be purchased anywhere in the United Kingdom under £15 cash. Every experienced cyclist knows that.

Mark letters "SHORT STORIES" on left hand top corner of envelope, or the result may be delayed some weeks, and address to the Managing Director,

A.B. CYCLE CO. LTD., 59 & 60 CHANCERY LANE, HOLBORN, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"BIG WHEEL"
BRAND.
CARTER'S, BRISTOL.
4½D TIN = 2 GALS. LEMONADE
Lemon Crystals

NUCOLINE
A PURE VEGETABLE BUTTER.
FOR BAKED & BOILED PASTRY, FRYING, etc.
A PERFECT COOKING BUTTER.
NUTRITIVE, DIGESTIVE, ECONOMICAL. FIVE PRIZE MEDALS AWARDED.
Stocked by all London Stores, etc.
A SAMPLE TIN SENT POST FREE FOR THREE STAMPS. Write
NUCOLINE LTD., SILVERTOWN, LONDON, E.

THE "DOLLY" SPECIALITIES.

"DOLLY" CREAM AND TINTS.

"DOLLY" Cream Colour, for Tinting Curtains, Muslins, Laces, Silks, Blouses, etc., a Rich Cream Shade.
"DOLLY" Tints, manufactured in Six Shades—Pink, Terra Cotta, Old Gold, Heliotrope, Sea Green, and Canary Yellow—for Tinting faded Ribbons, Lace, etc. Sold everywhere, 1d. per Bag. Will wash out when required.

Facsimile of "Dolly" Specialities.

"DOLLY" BLUE.

NOTICE.

"DO LY" BLUE is neatly tied in a white bag to a small handle to hold by whilst using. It is the cheapest and best Laundry Blue in the market.

"DOLLY" BLUE is sold by all Grocers and Oilmen at 1d. per Bag.

"DOLLY" FAST DYES.

The "DOLLY" Dyes are fast on Wool and Cotton alike, and will not wash out or fade. "DOLLY" Dyes are not Tints, but are Solid Colours, viz., Black, Brown, Blue, Green, Red, and Marone. Price 3d. each Dye. "DOLLY" Dyes for Home Dyeing are sold by all Grocers and Oilmen.

The "DOLLY" Specialities are Manufactured only by William Edge & Sons Ltd., Bolton, Lancs.

LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP
LONGEST ESTABLISHED PUREST & BEST.

PURE DRY CRISP.
VERDIN COOKE'S
TRADE EXTRA REFINED MARK
Specially Prepared
TABLE SALT
PUT UP BY SPECIAL MACHINERY IN DAMP PROOF PACKETS
DOES NOT CAKE.
TO BE OBTAINED OF ALL GROCERS
OR WHOLESALE OF J.J. VERDIN COOKE, LIVERPOOL.

ZEBRA
Grate Polish.
In Packets or as a Paste in Tins.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

THIS NUMBER CONTAINS NINE SHORT STORIES.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 493. FOR WEEK ENDING JUNE 11TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

NURSES AND DR. TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

GIVES GREAT SATISFACTION.

Nurse WILKINSON, 30, Russell Street, Clitheroe:
"Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa gives every satisfaction, and I shall not fail to recommend it to my friends and patients."

REFRESHING, STIMULATING, PLEASANT.

Nurse SUNDERLAND, Shewview Villa, Cheam Road, Sutton, Surrey:
"I have tried Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, and find it a refreshing, stimulating, and pleasant beverage."

FOR EXCELLENCE.

Nurse GILKES, 11, St. Paul's Square, Southsea:
"I think Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa is excellent, and very good for those who suffer from indigestion. This I know practically."

NO PRAISE TOO HIGH.

Nurse SAFFREY, The Cottage, Hoddesdon Road, Belvedere, Kent:
"I am pleased to say I think more of the merits of Dr. Tibbles' than even the praise already bestowed upon it."

FOR PHYSICAL AND MENTAL SUFFERING.

Nurse CLARE, "The Laurels," Langley:
"I have much pleasure in bearing testimony to the value of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, as I find it most beneficial to persons suffering physically and mentally. It is most nutritive and extremely pleasant to take, and I shall strongly recommend it to my patients."

CAN BE TESTED FREE.

Address (a postcard will do):
60, 61 & 62 BUNHILL ROW, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

MAKE PRIME BEER AT HOME

Good! it's Mason's

EXTRACT OF HERBS

6D. BOTTLE MAKES 8 GALLONS

NON-INTOXICATING BEER

The most palatable refreshing tonic drink producible.

IMITATED but NOT EQUALLED

Of all Chemists and Stores. Also try Mason's Wine Essences and Mason's Coffee Essence. Sample bottle of either of above post FREE for 9d. Two, assorted, 1s. 3d.; Three, assorted, 1s. 6d. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

The BEST BEVERAGE for YOUR MEALS.

Every Economical Housewife

uses

Tower Tea.

Tower Coffee.

Tower Cocoa.

IN PACKETS AND TINS ONLY.

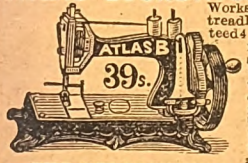
SOLD EVERYWHERE.

WHOLESALE:

TOWER TEA LTD.,

5, JEWRY STREET, LONDON, E.C.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 183B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

£20 Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (259 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Bldgs., London, W.C.

Invested Funds, £10,000,000.

Particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

1,000 GOLD WATCHES FREE

1/-

To introduce our now celebrated Soap to 1,000 more readers of this paper, we have decided to give away 1,000 GOLD WATCHES ABSOLUTELY FREE OF COST. These Watches are REAL GOLD HALL-MARKED, and at retail would cost upwards of 5 GUINEAS. If you want one write to us without delay. With your letter send us 1s. P.O., for which we will send you a tablet of Dr. Garland's Facial Soap and our offer, on complying with which the Watch will be sent free by registered post. We have overwhelming testimony that our Facial Soap is the best ever offered to the British public, and our idea for giving away the Watches is that you may talk about us among your friends, and recommend our Soap wherever possible. Miss H. HUNT, Potbridge, Odiham, Hants, writes: "The gold watch arrived quite safe this morning. I am very pleased with it. Many thanks to you for sending it."

MAY, GARLAND & CO. (Dept. 112), Cheltenham House, 15 MORTIMER ST., LONDON, W.

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

TRILENE REGD TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably"

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MR. CLAUDE CARTER, of Thorn House, Johnstone, N.B., says: "Your Tablets much reduced my weight and I have been waiting to see if it was permanent, and so it has proved."

MR. CANHAM, 87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, says: "Tablets cured my wife two years ago of extreme stoutness. It has never returned."

MARION TAYLOR, of Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "Have lost quite two stone."

A. PEEL, of Darley Hydro, Matlock, writes: "They have reduced and benefited me a good deal."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than one stone."

MR. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead. "I think them wonderful not only to reduce fat but as a medicine.

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

KEATING'S POWDER

DESTROYS BUGS FLEAS MOTHS BEETLES

TINS 3D. 6D. & 1S.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

SHORT STORIES

Edited by C. Arthur Pearson.

No. 493.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending June 11th, 1898.

A Dangerous Flirtation.

CHAPTER I.

"Cousin Mark, I must have that lovely spray of honeysuckle!"

"You have but to command, Cousin Sybil!" pulling up the chestnut mare in the lee of an old, moss-grown wall, over which a honeysuckle threw a reckless profusion of blossom.

They made a very pretty picture of Dignity and Impudence. The girl, with her piquant face and imperious outstretched hand, formed such a striking contrast to the man, whose stern profile and massive shoulders were eminently suggestive of quiet strength. Besides, the girl was in the first bloom of womanhood, while the streaks of grey on the man's temples showed his age to be nearer forty than thirty.

"I suppose you know it is a question of stolen goods, Sybil? Suppose, when we are calling, I betray you to the Heathcotes?"

"But I am not going to call—at least, not to-day."

"Sybil, you forget you promised my mother."

"Oh, well," resignedly, "I suppose I must go; but I wish Miss Heathcote and her brother were not such uninteresting old frumps," she added discontentedly, as the dog-cart drew up in front of an old two-storeyed house, half cottage, half bungalow.

"Master is out, but Miss Heathcote and Master Richard are in the garden," said the rosy-cheeked maid. "Will you walk this way, please?" ushering them through the low French window on to a verandah amply supplied with chairs.

"What a garden! I never saw anything so lovely," cried Sybil, gazing admiringly at the wilderness of flowers. Roses were everywhere—climbing up the pillars of the verandah, standing primly on bushes, or rioting in the wildest profusion over a rickety summer-house. No sound disturbed the drowsy summer silence save the hum of countless bees, till, suddenly, there came from the direction of the summer-house the clear sound of a woman's voice—"Dick, how dare you! Give it back to me this moment, you little wretch!" —then a rush, and a boy ran quickly down the garden, followed closely by a girl in a white dress. Up and down and in and out they raced, the boy brandishing an envelope above his head, the girl, flushed and panting, demanding its immediate surrender. They were utterly unconscious of spectators, till suddenly the boy doubled down a side path which brought him face to face with the group on the verandah. A moment later came Bee, flushed and panting, her white dress upheld in one hand, while with the other she was evidently trying to secure her loosened hairpins. At sight of the visitors Dick dropped the envelope, and, with a murmured exclamation of "Great Scott!" disappeared like a flash, while Bee went forward to greet her visitors with as much calmness as she could assume, while conscious of missing hairpins and flaming cheeks.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"Cousin Mark, Bee is delightful!" was Sybil's verdict as they were driving home an hour later, "and I mean to flirt desperately with the fossil brother and Dick."

"Do you?" said Mark smiling. "Then I hope you will be merciful as you are strong. And, by the way, Sybil, talking of flirting, I wish you would be careful how you treat Mr. Sebastian. You know I don't object to a little innocent flirtation, but with Mr. Sebastian it won't do; the game is too risky—he—he might think you meant it."

"And supposing I did?" glancing sideways at Mark's rather stern profile.

"Sybil!"

"Well!" petulantly, "one must have some excitement in this dull place, and Mr. Sebastian is handsome and a gentleman."

"Oh, yes, he's handsome enough, and he's a gentleman in a way, of course."

"But if he is only a gentleman 'in a way,' why did you have him here?"

"My dear girl, a man may be an excellent manager of a mine without being the sort of fellow one would like one's womenfolk to—er—er—"

"To carry on a desperate flirtation with?"

"Precisely; so I hope you will see the advisability of checking anything of that sort on Sebastian's part."

Sybil's big blue eyes scanned Mark's face with a curiously intent expression, as she said gently, "Do you care whether I flirt with Mr. Sebastian, cousin Mark?"

"My dear girl, of course I care. Haven't I just been explaining that one's womenfolk——"

"Oh, bother, there isn't time for a sermon; we are ten minutes late already," and without waiting for her cousin's assistance, Sybil jumped from the cart, ran lightly up the shallow steps of the Manor, and disappeared.

CHAPTER II.

Sybil had organised a picnic—"just as a mild protest against the general dullness of the neighbourhood, my dear," she had explained to Bee, with whom her friendship had advanced by leaps and bounds during the past six weeks. This was how it was that Bee found herself sitting with Sir Mark Rainford under the cool shade of the beeches in Eversham woods.

"I had no idea picnics were such pleasant affairs," said Mark, "and to think Mr. Heathcote was nearly depriving you of all this;" waving a comprehensive hand in the direction of the green aisles and dappled sunlight, "'for the sake of those old Egyptian buffers' as Dick so aptly puts it."

"Oh, you musn't blame George, he is so near the end of his second volume, you know."

"H'm, I see; ah, well, I suppose we old folks are all apt to be a little selfish."

"Do you consider yourself George's contemporary, Sir Mark?"

"Well, perhaps not exactly that. You see I haven't found an equivalent for the Egyptians yet, but I've no doubt I'm tending that way. By the way, Miss Heathcote, I often wonder at that calm, contented air of yours, which seems to ask nothing more of life than what you have—and yet——"

"And yet?"

"Well, somehow I had imagined a more eventful history for the enthusiastic, fiery little girl I left—let me see—how many years ago?"

"Thirteen," said Bee quietly, "thirteen this month."

"Not really?" sighing, "ah, yes, I remember it was in September. We were in the orchard and you had on a grey frock, and your fleece of hair shone in the sun when you gave me—something I valued very much; can you imagine what it was?"

"Something that I gave you before you went away?" raising a pair of questioning grey eyes.

"You don't remember?—Miss Heathcote—ah, I see you have not quite forgotten," watching the delicate pink flush mantle in Bee's cheeks in answer to his look.

"Oh, yes," the blush deepening, "but you must remember I was a very sentimental little girl, and, besides, it was such a long time ago."

"Yes, it was a long time ago," repeated Mark, idly plucking a handful of moss, "and now I have grown old."

"How absurd, a man of forty-five is in the prime of life!"

"Perhaps, in a sense; but he is too old for some things, nevertheless—for love, for instance."

"Is one ever too old for love?" murmured Bee dreamily.

"Miss Heathcote!—Bee!" eagerly, "do you think it possible that—but no! What have I to offer a young girl in exchange for her youth and love? Why, these grey hairs," passing his hand wearily over his whitened temples, "ought to have taught me more sense; and Sybil——"

The pink flush had gone from Bee's face, and it looked singularly white and drawn as she rose from her mossy seat and said, in a measured voice: "I'm sure you exaggerate your disadvantages, Sir Mark; many women would be quite willing to overlook your grey hairs."

"Perhaps; but supposing she has a fancy for someone else? Someone who knows how to write impassioned love letters, for instance?" glancing keenly at Bee's averted profile.

"A girl has many fancies, but they do not often last. After all," with a sad little smile, "what we women most crave for is the steady, honest love of a man—one tires of impassioned love letters when they are just the outcome of one's own love of excitement."

"Then you really think ——" making an eager step forward.

"That you must be patient and trust to time, Sir Mark."

"Time!"

"Time, indeed!" echoed a shrill voice just above Bee's head, "a nice idea you seem to have of it, Bee!

Digitized by Google

You and Sybil promised to help Mrs. Mayfield with the tea at five o'clock, and I left her a moment ago simply raging because it was a quarter past, and neither of you had turned up!"

"Oh, Dick, I'm so sorry, I'll go at once. Have you any idea where Sybil is?"

"Sybil! Oh, she is mooning about with that Spanish chap in a boat on the mere."

Mark drew his brows together in a sudden frown as he murmured something about the chances of a thunderstorm, and strode off in the direction of the mere.

CHAPTER III.

A FORTNIGHT later Bee was listlessly gathering a few late roses, when she caught sight of Dick limping painfully down the garden path.

"Bee—Bee," he called in evident excitement, and his face looked singularly white and scared as Bee hurried to meet him.

"Dick, what is it?" anxiously, "have you hurt your knee again?"

"Yes, beastly nuisance—slipped as I was getting down Forwood's Bank. But never mind about my knee," sinking into a garden seat and wiping the perspiration from his white face, "that can be seen to presently."

"But, Dick——"

"Now, don't worry, old girl; I know what to do all right, and there is something much more important to think of just now.

"You remember my telling you about Sir Mark's row with the Spanish chap on the day of the picnic, when he annoyed Sybil and said she had led him on to think she cared for him, or some rot of that kind; and when Sybil told him she cared more for Sir Mark's little finger than Sebastian's whole worthless carcase, how he behaved like a chap in a melodrama, and swore that Sir Mark should never marry Sybil?"

"Yes, yes, I remember," acquiesced Bee eagerly.

"I told you at the time that I didn't like the look of Sebastian when Sir Mark appeared on the scene, and after a tremendous row, suggested the manager sending in his resignation. Sebastian looked murderous, simply murderous; but I thought it was only a way these excitable foreigners have—until to-day," added Dick, almost in a whisper.

"Dick, what do you mean?" cried Bee, in a voice tense with anxiety.

"I'll tell you, but you mustn't interrupt me, old girl, for we have no time to waste," said Dick quietly. "Sir Mark came back from London last night, and was down at the mine this afternoon—they are sinking the new shaft, you know."

"Yes, yes, I know—go on."

"Well, Sir Mark told Mr. Sebastian that he wished to inspect the shaft this afternoon with the new manager. He said he might be a little late, but Sebastian could dismiss the men as usual, just keeping Barlow in the engine-room to work the cage. Sebastian answered in as few words as possible, and then turned on his heel and went back to his office. Sir Mark called me up just as he was getting into the dog cart, and asked me to tell Sebastian that he would be back about six o'clock to go down the shaft. I went to the office and knocked, but got no answer. So I just peeped through the pane of the inner office and saw——"

"What, Dick, what?" cried Bee in an agony of impatience.

"The Spanish chap on his knees by the safe, carefully examining what looked like—like a bomb—a dynamite bomb!" said Dick in a half whisper, as he wiped the drops of perspiration from his forehead.

"Dick, you must have been mistaken."

"No, I wasn't, I've seen scores of pictures of those things, and, besides, the Spanish chap was muttering something about 'That finishing Sir Mark's business for him; once down the shaft and then it would be easy——'"

"Dick, how horrible! Of course, you warned old Barlow and——"

"No, I just came up here. I thought the shortest way would be to meet Sir Mark on his way from Ringley, then there need be no fuss, you know.

"Then I slipped down that confounded bank, and had hard work to get here. However, if you hurry, old girl, you'll be in plenty of time. Thank Heaven it's a straight road, so you can't miss him. You will hurry, won't you, Bee?" his voice suddenly betraying the anxiety he felt.

Without waiting to reply, Bee sped up the garden path, rushed upstairs, flung on a hat and cloak, and started off down the Ringley road. It was a lonely road, bordered on either side by high hedges that loomed out like ghostly forms in the gathering dusk, but Bee had no room for minor terrors as she rushed blindly on. She had been walking for about half-an-hour when the sound of a horse's hoofs struck her ear, and in a few minutes a dog-cart, drawn by a chestnut mare, came trotting up. Yes, it was the Rainford dog-cart, but—Bee's brain reeled as she recognised the fact—it was empty, save for the groom. "Where is Sir Mark?" she said, her voice coming in sobbing breaths as she laid an imperious hand on the chestnut's bridle.

"Sir Mark is at the mine, miss; just set him down there a moment ago. 'E's gone to inspect the sinking of the new shaft with the manager—I mean the new man——"

But Bee gave him no time to finish his sentence.

"Then drive me there this moment," she cried, jumping quickly into the cart. "Don't lose a moment, for the love of Heaven; your master is in danger!"

Young Dobson, who was Sir Mark's devoted slave, needed no second bidding, but turned the mare's head, and in a moment they were flying down the road in the direction of the mine.

"I thought Sir Mark was to meet the train at Ringley?" said Bee, when she recovered her breath.

"Yes, miss, but we met the telegraph boy with a wire, mentioning the 5.30 to Barford, miss, so we turned at the cross-roads."

When they arrived at the mine: "Go to the engine-room and tell them to bring up the cage at once, and then follow me," she said quietly, and sped up the incline in the direction of the new shaft. Bee looked eagerly round; the wheels and machinery of the mine looked strangely black and weird silhouetted against the evening sky, but there was not a sign of Sir Mark, nor indeed, of any human being.

Stay! What was that? Was it a man, crouching over the mouth of the shaft and apparently gazing down into its depths?

Bee's heart stood still, as she recognised the Spaniard. In another moment she had reached his side, just as he stood erect, and, raising something in both hands, made as though he would hurl it down the shaft.

Quite silently, but with a spring like a panther, Bee threw herself on him from behind; there was a man's hoarse cry of baffled rage, a deafening explosion, and then, silence.

Digitized by Google

A moment later the cage came rapidly to the surface of the shaft, and Sir Mark Rainford jumped out, while the young groom, followed by several miners, came running up the slope.

"What has happened? Good Heavens! Miss Heathcote!" cried Mark, in horror-stricken tones, as he bent over the girl's prostrate form. "Here, fetch a doctor, one of you. Does anyone know how this happened?"

"If you please, Sir Mark, Miss Heathcote—she stopped the car, and told me to drive 'er 'ere. She seemed kind of frightened like, and said something about danger to you, sir; she jumped out of the cart, told me to go to the engine-room and 'ave the cage raised at once, and then flew up this 'ere slope. I began to get scared like, and so I 'urried up after 'er, when I see——"

"Well?" impatiently. "Go on, man."

"I see Mr. Sebastian, sir, a-standing over the mouth of the shaft with something 'eld above 'is 'ead. Miss 'Eathcote didn't waste no time screaming, or the like of that, but she just jumped on 'is back like a cat, and wrenched that 'ere bomb out of 'is 'ands."

"Bomb?" cried Mark.

"Yes, sir; at least when they fell together it exploded, and Miss 'Eathcote, she were thrown one way, and Mr. Sebastian——"

"Go on," said Sir Mark quietly, as he tried to force some brandy between Bee's white lips.

"Unfortunately, there ain't much doubt as to what has become of Mr. Sebastian, sir," said old Barlow at this juncture; "he must have fallen down the old shaft. The explosion broke away the iron railing, and I've just found his hat jammed among the twisted ironwork. Shall I see to the recovery of the body, sir?"

Mark nodded, and, motioning to a group of miners, Barlow withdrew.

CHAPTER IV.

"Is Miss Heathcote asleep, Dick?"

"Asleep? No; but she won't have the lamp lighted—prefers the firelight, you know. Shall I tell her you're here?"

"No; I can find my way, thanks. The little parlour, isn't it?"

Dick nodded acquiescence, and Sir Mark opened the door of the little parlour.

"May I come in?" he said quietly, pausing an instant to take in the picture of a cosy room, bright with the profusion of flowers, and a couch drawn up in front of a cheery fire, whose ruddy gleams lent a glow to the pale face lying among the cushions.

"May I come in?" repeated Mark.

It was not the firelight this time that gave the vivid crimson to Bee's cheek as she answered softly: "Come in, of course you may, Sir Mark. I wanted to see you so much, if only to thank you for all these lovely flowers," waving her thin hand in the direction of the bowls of roses.

"You want to thank me! That is rather turning the tables, isn't it? I was under the impression that it was I who had to thank you—for everything—life itself, in fact. Miss Heathcote, do you know you are a very brave young woman?" taking the girl's hand and gazing into the quiet depths of her eyes.

"Oh, don't let us talk about it, please, Sir Mark; of course anyone would have done the same, and as Sybil was not there I——"

"Sybil!" in accents of astonishment.

"Yes, I mean, of course, she would like to have been there instead of me, but——"

"As Sybil would probably have had an attack of hysterics, I think it was lucky for me she was not present. But what made you think of Sybil?"

"I thought—I mean—Sir Mark, you remember my telling you I thought your winning love was a question of time? Please let me finish," in answer to a gesture of astonishment from Mark. "Well, I have found out—I mean that you need not wait any longer."

"Well, I'm glad to hear that, at any rate," said Mark quietly, smoothing the ripples of Bee's dark hair.

"Sir Mark, what do you mean?" turning her glowing face towards him.

"Need you ask, Bee, my darling? Only that I love you, and it is happiness indeed to hear you say I need wait no longer to win your love," bending his bronzed face to meet hers.

"Please, don't, it is all a mistake. It is Sybil I meant. Oh, you must know!" a vivid crimson dyeing cheek, throat, and brow.

"Yes, I think I know all about it; but, as you say, it was all a mistake. It was you—not Sybil—whom I despaired of ever winning. Don't you understand, my darling?"

The answer was not audible, but was evidently satisfactory. There was a pause, filled up as lovers' pauses frequently are, and then:

"But, Mark, poor Sybil, how shall we ever tell her?"

"Perhaps we might leave that to young Festing."

"Mr. Festing, your new manager?"

"Yes, Sybil and he informed me the other day that life would be unendurable if they spent it apart, so I have given my consent—provided they are both in the same mind a year hence."

Another pause, during which the fire winked fitfully at the close proximity of the grey head and the brown.

"By the way, Bee, I can't help feeling rather sorry for the other chap."

"The other chap?" repeated Bee, bewildered.

"Yes, the writer of the impassioned love letters; I'm afraid you are rather a fickle little person, you know, for you seemed dreadfully keen on rescuing his letter from Dick——"

"Hullo! who's taking my name in vain?" cried Dick, entering the room at that moment. "What, no lights yet? Here, Mary, bring the lamp; I've brought you a letter, Bee," mysteriously, "from 'him.'"

"Thanks, Dick," languidly, holding out her hand.

"Hullo, young woman, you aren't as keen as usual about it; perhaps you would like me to read it aloud, or possibly, Sir Mark would oblige?"

"Yes, Dick, you can give it to Sir Mark," said Bee quietly.

"Whew!" whistled Dick. "Well, all I can say is, it is the first time anyone has been allowed to read Bee's poem before publication."

"Poem!" repeated Mark in astonishment.

"Yes, Bee's a blooming poet, writes things for the Argus, all about roses and cuckoos, and rot of that sort," said Dick with fine contempt. "However, in spite of her poetry and all that, Bee is not a bad sort of girl—taking her all round, you know."

"Just my own opinion, Dick, 'taking her all round, you know,'" repeated Sir Mark, as he quietly slipped his arm round Bee's waist.

Maud Coleborn.

Digitized by Google

A BID FOR A PRESIDENCY.

Sir Gaveston Basistow was an expert in mendacity, also an accomplished villain.

It was owing to his being endowed with the above characteristics that he left the chalk cliffs of Albion, together with a vast army of creditors, behind him, and betook himself to Truxillo, on the distant shores of Honduras.

Sir Gaveston Basistow had a good look round for a month or two on arrival, then being still penniless, and possessed of illimited impudence, he smiled to himself, and decided that Honduras was in every way congenial to his health, and suitable for the retrieval of his fortunes.

Chance favoured him a few days after his arrival, when he had the good fortune to save Antonio el Marcias from a band of roughs. From that hour the two fraternised.

Antonio was a señor whose reputation was shady; but what mattered that? Was not Basistow's equally so? Perhaps the baronet might have had qualms of conscience in accepting the friendship of the black sheep in question, had Antonio not been a man of reals. As it was, Basistow linked his arm familiarly through that of Antonio, jingled two five real pieces in his pocket, and talking of British freedom and future possibilities for Honduras, led Señor el Marcias to a certain caba, well-known to patriots as a place where they could converse with perfect safety on the—weather!

"See, Antonio mio," exclaimed the baronet, drinking a deep draught of wine, "You have reals, I have courage!"

"Ah, you have courage, amigo," sighed Antonio admiringly.

"I am an Ingles," remarked Basistow modestly. Then he continued musingly: "President Bogran is no wise ruler for Honduras. We came to that resolution weeks ago. In a week or two General Bogran will be——"

"Hush!" cried Marcias, glancing uneasily round.

"We are perfectly safe," retorted Basistow, smiling suavely. "Is not the padrone in the movement? Let me continue! In a week or two we shall interview the President—at what hour is quite immaterial to the present discussion. In all probability an hour or two before dawn would be most suitable, but this is merely by the way. I believe you do not want to come too prominently before the Honduras Government—just at present, eh, amigo?"

"No, amigo, I am too lazy."

"Quite so! Now listen! In a fortnight from to-day General Bogran"—he dropped his voice to a whisper—"will be as dead as Pizarro! Half his soldiers are in the movement. The flame of revolution will flare throughout Honduras the moment the general's hate has been rendered void by steel. Amigo, may I inquire who is to be the new President?"

"Do you think, señor, that I have been financing this revolution from a feeling of patriotism?"

"Such was my idea," replied Basistow mendaciously, helping himself to another glass of wine.

El Marcias smiled bitterly.

"My friend," he remarked gravely, "I gave you credit for greater perception. The future President is at this table!"

Basistow smiled languidly; then stretching out his hand, which Marcias grasped cordially, said:

"Thanks, amigo, thanks! I accept the post!"

El Marcias' face expressed blank amazement.

"Amigo, you mistake!" he whispered. "'Tis I who will replace General Bogran!"

"You?"

"Precisely, myself."

"Amigo," replied Basistow sternly, leaning across the table, "it is time we talked sense; I am risking my neck day by day by mixing in this revolution. If the game were spoilt who would suffer? Why, myself! Being the recognised leader—your name wouldn't even be mentioned in the affair. If I run this affair, with my life in my hand, I'm going to get the reward. Money is what you want, Antonio, and you shall have it in the form of land. But I reserve the Presidency and the handling of the Honduras treasury for myself."

"I refuse!" replied El Marcias warmly. "I've spent a fortune in this affair!"

"I can't help that!" replied Basistow coolly. "You'l get it all back with interest when I'm President."

"Impossible, my friend! I have set my heart on being President of Honduras!"

Digitized by Google

"So have I! Odd, isn't it? Do you think I'm going to settle General Bogran for your benefit?"

El Marcias glanced gloomily at his companion.

"I have paid you to do so!"

"Paid? Pooh! Do you think money will pay me for risking my life for two whole months? No, friend; rest assured that it will not. You may have all Honduras, except a few miles, but I reserve the Presidency."

"And if I refuse?"

"I shall carry it through by myself, or else spoil the revolution."

El Marcias thought deeply for a few moments; then, lighting a cigar, remarked meditatively:

"Your method of carrying on Honduras politics is commendable, if somewhat novel; yet, if I may dare say such a thing, your policy has a flaw."

"Possibly; most policies have flaws," Basistow replied, yawning. "What is the flaw you see?"

"Myself."

"Indeed?"

"At the present moment you are the leader of the Revolutionists. You follow me?"

"Perfectly."

"If anything were to come out about it, the person who told tales would gain honour and riches, while the leader of the Revolutionists would——"

"Suffer for his patriotism," interrupted Basistow.

"I see you appreciate the position," remarked El Marcias suavely. "Shall I continue?"

"By all means."

"It is possible that the informant might gain the highest position of trust in the Republic, provided, of course, he was a man of means. He might then, when the time was opportune, desiring to become a president, remove the ruler of the State! Do you follow me?"

"Perfectly," replied Basistow, with a smile; "but those nice little plans might be upset."

"True," answered El Marcias thoughtfully. "How do you suppose they could?"

"Well, a knife tickling the would-be informant between the shoulder blades might induce him to change his mind," remarked Basistow. "What is your opinion?"

El Marcias shrugged his shoulders.

"Have an absinthe with me? I desire to drink your health—the health of the new President of Honduras!"

"Señor, I accept the absinthe and the toast." Basistow replied smilingly, "and will now tell you something. I have arranged that General Bogran shall die to-night."

"To-night?" echoed El Marcias. "To-night? You jest, of course. You mean two weeks hence?"

"I mean what I say!" retorted Basistow sternly. "Are you not aware that he is at this moment in Truxillo, at the house of Don Ipeo Mercedez?"

"No, por Dios."

Basistow smiled compassionately at him, then remarked:

"Amigo, you have but a poor head to manage a revolution. When one carries one's life in one's hand, an enemy's movements should never be missed. No, not even the most trivial. The blow will be struck at midnight. I shall await you at a quarter before the hour, in the Plaza Santa Anna. Buenos."

They bowed nearly to the ground; then Basistow sauntered away, leaving Antonio el Marcias alone.

"Carmilita," he cried, addressing a waitress a few yards from him, "an absinthe. Por Dios, an unmannerly boor. Still, I am the price of an absinthe the richer. He a President? Fool that he is to speak so soon—he should have waited longer before he proved himself dangerous! As it is——"

He finished his sentence by smiling enigmatically.

* * * * *

The hour of midnight rang out clearly on the still night air.

Antonio had as yet not appeared on the silent plaza, deserted but for the motionless figure of Sir Gaveston, who, beneath the shadow of the statue of Santa Maria del Pilar, awaited the arrival of El Marcias.

The quarter past chimed in cracked notes across the silent city before Antonio appeared.

"Confound you, man; you're late," growled the baronet. "You are enough to ruin any revolution! Do you know that the revolutionary force of Truxillo are only waiting to hear the report of my revolver before they revolt openly?"

"I was detained!" murmured Marcias apologetically.

Basistow sneered; then shrugged his shoulders and pushed forward at a rapid rate in the direction of the house of Don Ipeo Mercedez.

The door was slightly ajar. Pushing it open, Sir Gaveston entered cautiously, followed by El Marcias, closed the door quietly, when they were challenged:

"Ah, Pedro!" whispered back the baronet. "Is all safe?"

"As the grave, señor," replied Pedro in a low voice. "Who is with you?"

"A friend, amigo! A doctor to see if Bogran's heart beats the same an hour hence as it does now!"

The door-keeper sniggered softly, and stood aside to let the two men pass.

Cautiously the pair crept along the passage and up the stairs, and came to a halt in front of the door of the President's bedroom. Here Basistow took an oil-can from his pocket, and carefully commenced to oil the hinges and the lock before he attempted to open the door.

"An instant's precipitation will spoil our plans!" muttered the baronet, gently turning the handle.

A loud creak answered his remark; the lock was evidently rusty.

Great beads of perspiration stood out on his brow as he heard the noise. Gripping the butt of his revolver, he placed his ear against the keyhole and listened.

Silence reigned, disturbed only by the snoring of the unsuspecting President.

"Thought I had mulled the affair then," muttered

Digitized by Google

Basistow in a relieved tone of voice, as he carefully oiled the lock again.

Replacing his revolver in his belt, he drew his bowie-knife.

"Steel is safer than shot!" he whispered in the ear of El Marcias in so sinister a voice that that worthy recoiled. "It makes no noise, you know!"

Once more he turned the handle. This time it answered the touch of his hand without creaking. Gripping the haft of his knife more tightly than before, he pushed the door cautiously open, peered furtively round, then entered the apartment on tip-toe.

By the light of the moon, then at its full, the revolutionists were able to see the bed on which slept the President. He was sleeping restlessly, his arms outside the solitary sheet which formed his only bed covering. His face, ghastly pale, was turned towards a chair on which a revolver lay within easy reach of the sleeper.

"Dios! Sleep ever rests lightly on the suspicious," remarked Basistow in a whisper. "Still, light as it is, it will serve my purpose!"

El Marcias' face was ghastly in its pallor, his form trembled like an aspen, as with hands clenched he followed Basistow, who, creeping forward, approached the bedstead of General Bogran.

"If he should wake," muttered Basistow thickly, "I should have to fly, and lose all!"

He raised the knife above the sleeper's chest; then El Marcias sprang forward, and, seizing the weapon from the grasp of the amazed baronet, shouted in a loud, resonant voice:

"Bogran, awake! Your life is threatened!"

"You blackguard!" shouted Basistow furiously, grasping El Marcias by the throat with a grip of iron, as the President, leaping from his bed seized his revolver and stood irresolute, uncertain how to act.

Like a flash it dawned across the baronet's brain how he could score against El Marcias.

Banishing the thought of stabbing the President where he stood, an attempt which would have been rendered abortive by the presence of Bogran's guards, who, hearing the noise of a mêlée, had rushed in, he cried:

"Help! This man has attempted the life of General Bogran! I denounce him!"

El Marcias fought like a tiger at bay, but being no match for the athletic baronet, found his level in a very short space of time on the ground. In a second he was disarmed of Basistow's knife, which he still held in his hand, and bound.

The baronet leant against the bedpost, breathing hard. He had a strong desire to be theatrical.

"Excellency!" he gasped, pointing to the pinioned man. "I denounce that man as a revolutionist. By merest chance I passed down the street, and saw him creep into this house. I—I followed and—was just in time!"

"But the sentry?" exclaimed Bogran. "Where was he?"

"Away! Perhaps he has fled!"

One of the President's guards testified that Pedro was not at his post when he had passed a few minutes before.

"Excellency!" cried El Marcias, almost choking with passion. "He lies— he——"

"Silence!" interrupted Bogran in a terrible voice, then, turning to the guard, continued: "Let him be shot at once!"

"Mercy! He lies—he——"

"Silence him!" interrupted the General; then, as a soldier did as he was bid with the end of a rifle and dragged him out of the room, Bogran turned to the baronet, saying: "Señor, words are too feeble to express my thanks for this signal service. A deed shall prove my gratitude. Which would you prefer, wealth or position?"

"Being very short of money, I should prefer the former," replied Basistow genially.

"So be it. Good-night! Have you a cigarette?"

Basistow opened his case, and, as the President selected one, a rattle of musketry without announced the execution of Don Antonio el Marcias.

The following morning Basistow received a draft on the Truxillo branch of the Banque Nationale for 700,000 reals, which he promptly cashed.

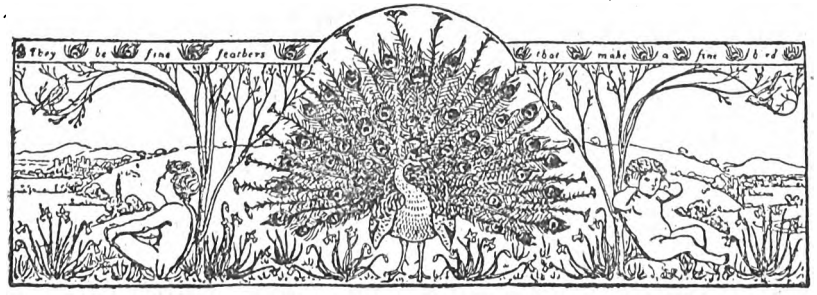
The day after, the house of El Marcias was searched from attic to basement, with the result that a quantity of letters bearing the signature of Sir Gaveston Basistow came to light.

The perusal of the correspondence in question induced a smart body of infantry to visit the house where Sir Gaveston lodged.

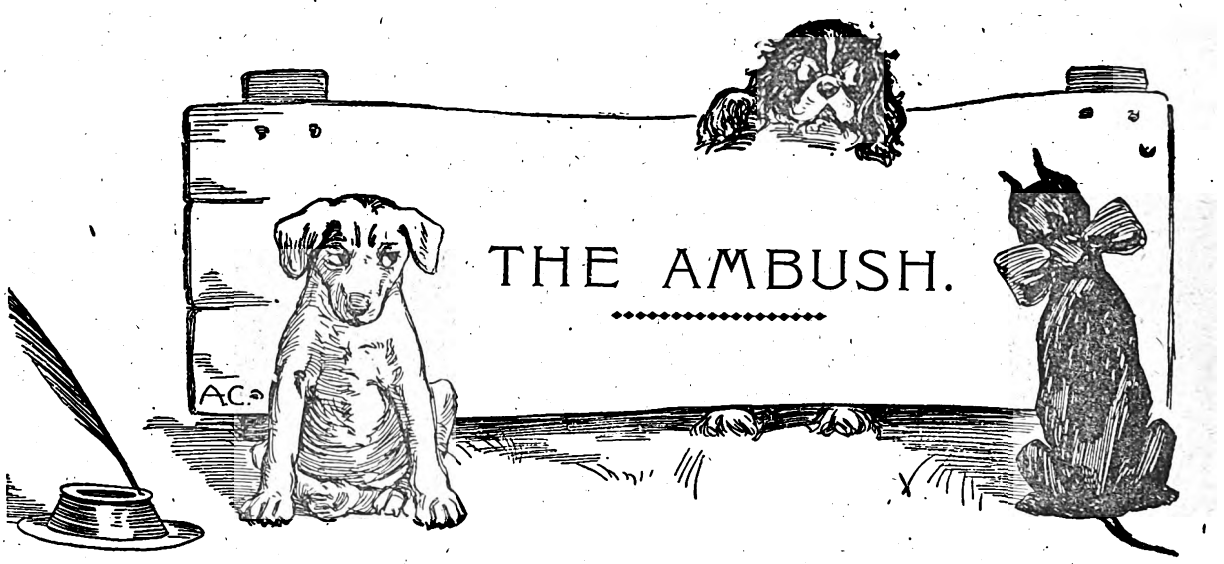
The landlord met them with open arms, called on every saint in the calendar to bless them, and then inquired their business.

On hearing what it was, he informed them that he was much grieved, but that the hidalgo had sailed the previous day with the cash.

TRISTAM K. MONKE.



Digitized by Google



THE AMBUSH.

"PIGOL! Artaud! Didier!"

Each man answered "Present" as his name was called, and, rising from his straw bed, took his rifle from the rack, and went silently out into the court.

Five o'clock struck from the steeple of a distant church, each stroke vibrating with a dismal sound.

Without a word the sharpshooters drew up before the half open door of the post, through which came puffs of warm air, and whose windows were dimly lighted by the rays of a petroleum lamp. There were ten men, their hands in their pockets, their guns hanging from the shoulders by a strap, the collars of their jackets turned up, and shivering from the first contact with the cold morning air.

At a distance, by the walls of the farm, a sentinel was pacing up and down, peering into the menacing darkness, with ears alert for the vague sounds of the country. He saluted with a "Good luck, comrades!" and after halting a moment to watch us descend towards the Meuse by a path leading through a little hollow, continued his monotonous promenade.

We followed the bank of the river. The water flowed beside us with an intermittent splashing and a gentle rustle against the rushes. We could see nothing distinctly. The river and the town were asleep, and the fields and sky seemed blended in a uniform tint of Indian ink.

My men marched without speaking a word, and with the cautious wariness that proximity to the enemy gives to the bravest. At such a time, when plunging into an unknown danger, there are few but would feel a shiver run through them, and I, myself, having tolerably excitable nerves, feverishly fingered my sword knot beneath my cape.

When we passed our last outpost we halted, and in a few words I explained to my men the work which lay before us.

Every morning at daybreak a platoon of Uhlans made a round between Warcq and Darmouzy, two towns occupied by a Prussian observation corps. They were seen to file quietly along about twelve miles in advance of their lines. We had orders to lie in ambush for them in the woods of Etourneaux, through which they had to pass.

We soon left the towing path and cut across the fields, by a difficult ascent, where our feet sank in the long grass.

The wind had risen, driving away the clouds, and a dim light fell from above. About two hundred yards before us a dwelling outlined itself—the farm of Grael, recently burnt to prevent the Prussians from establishing themselves there.

One soldier was sent forward to scout, and went off like a hare, crouching and using the greatest caution. From the ditch where we were hidden, with weapons ready, we watched him for some time; then he disappeared in the dusk. In about five minutes he returned, having seen nothing suspicious. Then we crossed the courtyard of the farm. Only the four walls were still standing, but half crumbled away; the burnt débris crushed under our feet, and a strong smell of smoke almost choked us. Perfect silence reigned—the silence of new ruins, where life has not yet had time to graft itself upon the death of former things.

A grey light appeared in the horizon; the wind wafted us the sound of a clock striking the half-hour, and the voices of cocks saluting the dawn.

As we reached the wood the day began to break. We marched in single file along an indistinct path, obstructed by overhanging branches which scratched our faces or fell with a dry crack. The dead leaves, blown here and there by a puff of wind, awakened echoes in the wood; then again all was silence.

"Halt!"

The sun rising behind us in the fog threw a red light across the coppice, and the dew sparkled on the borders of the leaves. An early chaffinch sang above our heads.

Stationed on the bank overhanging the road, some of the sharpshooters squatted on their heels and hastily ate a piece of bread or drank a swallow of brandy; the others waited, lying on their stomachs, their elbows buried in the moss. They all looked serious, with pinched noses and set lips.

Daylight increased. Already we could see the white trunks of the birch trees, looking like stiff phantoms among the mottled foliage. The morning dampness penetrated me to the bone in spite of my cape, and I dozed with my eyes open, made light-headed by the odour of the moist leaves and the anticipation of the coming fight; odd dreams and fantastic hallucinations wandered through my brain, and tangled rings of Uhlans seemed to dance around me. After many wakenings, I mechanically drew out my watch—the hands seemed stationary, for they moved with such exasperating slowness.

Digitized by Google

"Lieutenant," a sergeant whispered in my ear, "there they come—there they come!" I drew myself up. "Attention, comrades! On no account fire without the word of command. Our lives depend upon it. Do you understand?"

The trot of the horses became more and more distinct. Suddenly it ceased. The Prussians consulted together before entering the Etourneaux woods. Soon one of them rode forward as a scout, revolver in his hand, and passed about ten paces before us—a handsome fellow, sitting upright on his horse, whose crupper was covered by the long cape—his colours, black and white, floating behind him in the wind.

He advanced a few steps, carefully scrutinising both sides of the road. He hesitated a moment and listened, then he drew up his horse's bridle, and almost immediately a whistle sounded, telling his companions that the road was clear.

From our shelter we could hear the Uhlans laugh and joke, chopping their harsh Teutonic syllables, and swearing at their sturdy Mechlenberg horses when they stumbled in the heavy leaves, wet with dew.

A strange emotion took me in the throat, as if a hand grasped me there. I certainly had no fear, but it seemed to me as if I was about to commit a cowardly act in killing these men by surprise, almost by treachery, without allowing them to defend themselves. Yes; I hated the Germans, those odious conquerors, whose halting places were marked by executions, pillages and arson, and yet there was a feeling stronger than myself, a supreme pity took possession of me, my flesh revolted, and I would have wished to beg for mercy.

They were plainly in view against the blue sky as they came towards us, their bodies shaking gently, their helmets securely fastened over their foreheads, the lance resting in the stirrup and held by a strap beneath. The scabbards of their swords clashed against their saddles, their horses' bits flashed in the green reflections of the wood, and the Uhlans continued to laugh and joke.

One was quite young, almost a boy, and did not laugh with the others. I noticed him especially, and thought of the mother he had doubtless left behind in Germany. I imagined a room, shining with neatness, with a large earthenware stove, the father seated in his easy chair smoking his porcelain pipe, and beside his table sat the mother and sister ravelling lint for the wounded. There is a knock. "Ah, it is the postman," cries the young girl joyfully. "News from brother," going quickly to open the door, while the mother rises hastily.

"Why, this is strange! It is not his writing!"

For a moment nothing is heard in the room, but the roar of the stove, and the rustling of the envelope hastily torn open—then the poor woman falls backwards with a loud cry: "He is dead! He is dead!"

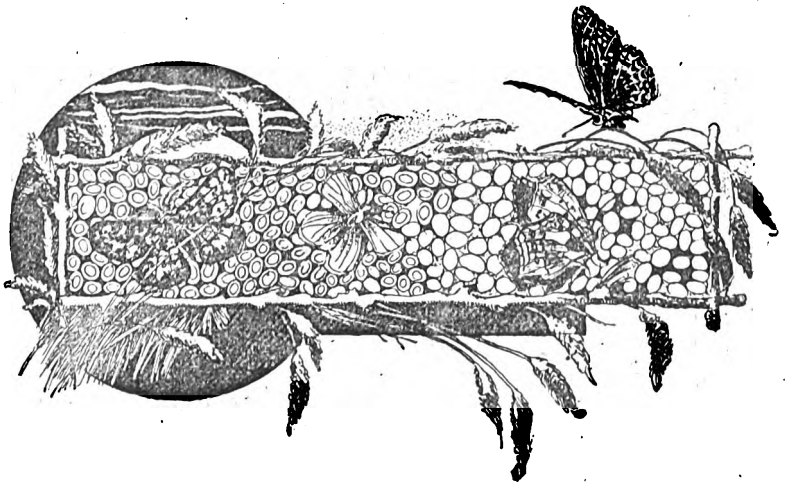
But now the riders were just passing us. There was no time to hesitate. I straightened up and gave the command:

"Fire!"

Ten reports sounded at once, together with cries of pain and the sound of furious galloping, then we perceived four men and two horses lying upon the road, mortally wounded, and among them the little Uhlan, with a bullet hole through his forehead, stretched upon his back with his legs apart, and his hands clinched. The others had turned horse and fled on a gallop towards Damouzy.

We returned without being molested, were cheered by our comrades, congratulated by our colonel, and received our orders for the day. But, in spite of all, there remained with me for a long time a nervous depression, a bitter memory—something like remorse for a duty fulfilled.

P. Labarrière.



Digitized by Google

BY M. P. SHIEL.

Author of "The Man-Stealers," "Prince Zaleski," "Shapes in the Fire," "The Rajah's Sapphire," etc.

CHAPTER XXXII. (continued).

THE consciousness of failure, of folly, thrilled through Hardy like a pain.

He had, in truth, lost the best possible chance.

"Well," he said after a minute, "and you have lost yours, too, Yen How."

"I will get you another time, boy."

"If I do not get you."

"Well, well," said Yen.

They had moved on a few steps—together. There was silence in the darkness. Already in the two men was working the strange law whose operation they were to feel for long hours that night: the law which made it next to impossible to them to tear themselves one from the other.

Yen How hit upon the same half-sunken bench upon which Hardy had previously stumbled. Hardy put his foot upon it, and leant his elbow on his knee at one end. At the other Yen How sat down. Below them was the undulant spread of weed-patched sand, and the vague noising of the sea.

Yen How, who was smoking, took the cigar from his lips, and said:

"So you got away, after all?"

Hardy did not answer.

"How did you get away?" asked Yen.

"Heaven, I suppose, let me free, that I might strangle you yet, Yen," said Hardy.

"Poh!" said Yen How.

* * * * *

Minute after minute rolled by in a silence punctuated by the faint puffing sounds of Yen How's lips—a quarter of an hour, twenty minutes. Hardy was looking forth with wrinkled, speculative brow over the sea.

Yen How said:

"Did you have anything to do with the capture of the nine ships?"

"Which nine ships?" said Hardy.

"The Japanese war-vessels."

"Go to the devil, and ask me no questions."

"I suppose it was your doing, boy?"

"Perhaps."

"What have you done with them, then?"

"I have them."

"Not in Europe—come now."

"How do you know that?"

"I have searched."

"Europe is a good big place, Yen."

"Big, no. A green billiard-table, my son——"

"With pockets."

"So you have got them—in a pocket—really?"

"I may. There is no telling."

"If you had, you would not try to make me think that you had."

"Ah," said Hardy, of the two one fathom the deeper.

* * * * *

Caught in a sort of fascination, in a feeble, flaccid species of mutual mesmerism, they could not leave each other. Intense hatred and intense love are, of course, inverse forms of the same thing, and their manifestation is the same—an instinct for contact. A stab, a kiss—these are resultant varieties of the instinct. Through a grating a dog and a cat will maintain a mutual watch, lingeringly, for hours, averse to part. Here was something of that sort—a warfare and an attraction between a whale big as an ocean, and an elephant, monstrous, four-headed, big as a continent.

And as all grand intensities are elementary, simple, and resemblant to the passions of childhood, so the talk of these great men was not altogether unlike the wrangle between two bitter, lingering school-boys, sitting on a bench, with lumps in their throats—fastened together, unable to part.

There were few words, and a long interval, and few words, and a long interval. So a dark hour passed.

* * * * *

Hardy said:

"What a beast you must be, Yen, to torture a poor boy like that! What a sad beast!"

"Poh! You do not know anything. I had worse in store for you than that, boy."

"What an infernal reptile for God to make!"

"Abuse away! Your mind is not really first-class, after all. You are the slave of old, popular surface-ideas. A reptile is no worse than anything else, boy. If he is stronger than other things, he is better than they."

"Ah, well, if that were so, I should be glad, too, Yen. There is not much to choose between us, now, in that way."

"What, you are of the species, too, then?"

"Something of that sort, perhaps—if venom makes the reptile. It is your own fault. You have made me like yourself. By the Lord, I warn you, Yen How!"

"Poh! it is a question of strength, not of venom. You can be as venomous as you like. But what can you do?"

"Nothing perhaps; and perhaps something."

"Suppose you had a fleet to beat me at sea. Do you know how many I am sending over? All at once? You can't dream. Twenty Millions. What could you do with them? It would take you a year to shoot them all. But suppose you did; there will be some more hundreds of millions left. You cannot exclude the innumerable. What could you do with them? Be as venomous as you like, my son."

Digitized by Google

"Ten good men against a hundred million rats—I bet on the men."

"Poh! I bet on the rats."

"On the side of the men—Science."

"Science? What sort of Science?"

"The Science of the gun-maker, of the tactician, of the—"

"Well?"

"Need I say it?"

"Yes, say it."

"Of the—Chemist."

And at the word Yen How started as though pricked by a goad. He said nothing.

* * * *

"But, after all, you are a fool, Yen."

"Ah! How so?"

"Well now, I suppose you are a learned sort of dog. You know Science, I dare say; you know History, and on what trajectory the world has run so far. But it seems to me—can it be that you have really never caught a glimpse of the one big, fugitive thing?"

"And you, my son?"

"Yen! sometimes it hits me straight in the eyes in one blinding flash of lightning — a momentary flash, happily, for no staggering eye-ball could bear it long."

"Ah! And what is it you see?"

"A tendency in the world—the hell of a current — a secret design, Mr. Chinaman."

"Well, suppose I have seen it, too, boy, or guessed it? Why call me a fool?"

"Because this invasion of yours is not in accordance with the tendency so far; and the tendency is jolly strong!"

"You think the tendency is English in trend; and I say it is Chinese; that's all."

"I'll swear it is not Chinese, Yen How."

"Well, I don't care. Tendency or no tendency. Poh! A tree has a tendency to grow, all the universe is trying to make it grow—but how if I come with a saw and cut it down, my son?"

"If you cut it down, yes. But if it is older than that old sea there, and has in it the toughness of eternities, and is as wide as the girth of the earth. . . ."

A murmur of contempt came from Yen How. But his left eye glanced a moment upward at the darkened heaven.

"But what is it you are doing here, my son? How if I have you captured, now?"

"You cannot. I have help near. I could more likely capture you."

"I would not be easily captured, you know. But what is it you want here, sir?"

"I received your present of the child's heart. I came to make you one in return. I have dropped it inside the window of the house yonder."

"Ah, what present?"

"The present of a lock of hair."

"Ah, yes. Is she safe?"

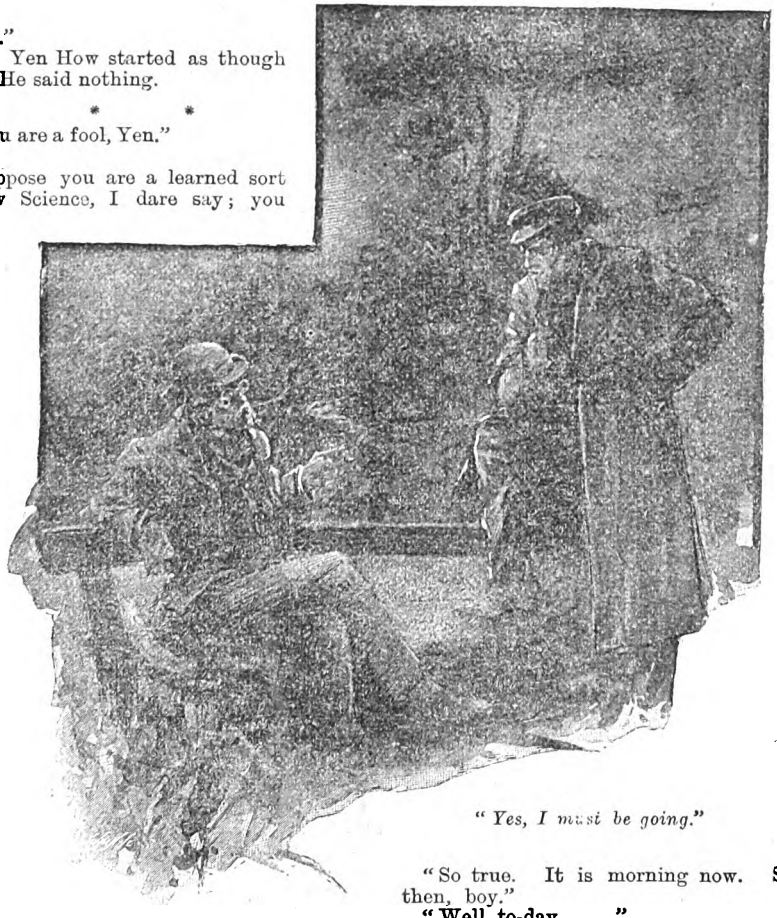
His voice dropped low, clandestine, wheedling.

"Yes, she is safe."



"Yes, I must be going."

"So true. It is morning now. Say to-day, perhaps, then, boy."

"Well, to-day. . . ."

One walked hurriedly away; and the other, sitting there in the dark, smiled above his nose.

As for Hardy, he flung himself upon the cabin-cushions of the steamer as she turned her bows westward, and for four hours slept there, Ada Seward asleep, too, on the opposite side.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

"TO-DAY."

SUDDENLY, a breath, a murmur, a thrill, a word of Life, ran like an electric wave through the length and breadth of Britain.

By wondrous marvel there were once more solid war-ships in Portsmouth port—ships friendly, belonging to England,

"On board your ship?"

"Yes."

"I knew. I heard your cannon. You are a devil for cannon, my son. But I do not look perturbed, I think. A man like Yen How knows how to wait."

"Then, wait."

"I am waiting."

"It need not be for long, Yen."

"Poh! a day, or two."

"So soon?"

"Meanwhile, if you do not want me to strangle you, get off this soil."

"Yes—I must be going."

* * *

Another half-hour, and Hardy sprang suddenly upright, a lank dim figure in his ulster. It was not very far from morning, yet no sign of light.

"We shall meet again, then?" he said.

"To-morrow, perhaps," answered Yen How.

"Or to-day."

Digitized by Google

One walked hurriedly away.

not made for England by English hands, come from nowhere! By wondrous marvel . . . . by the might of the Almighty God . . . by His unspeakable favour . . .

With this miracle was coupled by the people, without knowledge, by mere infallible intuition, the magic name of Hardy. . .

Early on the Thursday morning the wild rumour spread, incredible, yet believed. And at once the entire nation rushed into undoubting hope, gladly casting off its gloom, smitten with new and strange assurance of its high and world-wide Destiny.

And all the daily private business of life now, for the first time, utterly ceased; and men stood wondering to wait and watch the throes of Time, agape as though scribbled across the sky in characters of everlasting red they beheld the signature of God.

As for doubt, with rash faith they flung it quite away. In England—once more—were ships; and in England—once more—a Captain of ships.

At this thought a thrilling heat swept through the blood of every British being.

And there was a rumour abroad that, beside these marvellous battle-ships—nine, it was said, and more—there lay suddenly assembled that Thursday morning in the inner harbour of Portsmouth, a quite unaccountable crowd of other ships, Atlantic grey-hounds, Norddeutscher and Austrian Lloyds, Royal Naval Reserve Merchant Cruisers, prodigious four-masters, tenders, Scotch and Irish coast-guard vessels, unarmoured cruising ships, transports, colliers, trawlers, wooden merchant-men of every build, thronging the harbour!

A great unseen ferment and movement, a wide business of preparation, unknown to the general mass of the nation, must have been going forward for many days. But to what end the concentration of all these promiscuous crafts? Clearly, not a fighting end!

At eight Hardy stepped upon the Dover Cross Wall; and as if to show how with the awful and momentous is mingled the grotesque, and how "something infects the world," there, before him, on the quay, stood a bowing, long-haired figure.

Hardy recognised him at once, and a sound of vexed impatience started from his lips.

Edrapol tendered his card. Hardy did not take it. He said: "I know."

Edrapol was all bows. He said:

"I take this liberty, monsieur—sir. I find myself without a friend to make me a small service in this country. . . ."

"Well, now, is it possible?" said Hardy.

"You refer to——?"

"To your frivolity, monsieur."

Edrapol bowed.

"I am here in response to your letter, monsieur. Between gentlemen——"

"I have no time! Is it that you still wish to fight with me?"

"The question is explicit, monsieur—sir. Can you ask? Am I not here to make you a favour, since you were unable to present yourself with me? Such terms, between gentlemen——"

"But you know, do you not, that it is not legal to fight in that way in England?"

Such a smile smiled Edrapol! It was withering.

"Monsieur——!" he said reproachfully.

"Well, come now, I will fight you," said Hardy suddenly.

Out swept Edrapol's arms, and down curled his complying back.

"But not to-day, you understand."

"To-morrow—perhaps—the deluge!"

"I cannot help that, sir. You are, I take it, a great man for rules and ceremonies. Well, then, I keep you to your rules. It is not, I presume, a usual thing in your country to fight duels at a moment's notice? Well, then——"

"But, monsieur——"

"No. I have no time. I am going away to sea to-day. If I come back safe, we fight at the first moment, as I promised. Even if you choose to meet me at my landing-place, which will, I think, be Dover, we fight there. You will easily find me; and I will provide you with a second, and everything. If I return at all, I shall be here by to-morrow week—nine days. I think that is not beyond the usual interval which one takes to arrange preliminaries, so you cannot complain. I cannot stay longer. Bonjour, monsieur."

Hardy walked away, while Edrapol shrugged, looking after him. With the girl Seward, Hardy proceeded to the Ship Hotel.

He at once wrote a letter to old Robert Mason, bidding him come for the girl, recommending her to his strict surveillance, and making certain monetary provisions for her future.

He then dispatched four telegrams, one to Portsmouth, announcing his coming; one to the Admiralty; a third to a Dr. Fletcher of Harley Street, in these words: "Send at once the things promised to me on board Hirosaki"; the fourth to one Henrik Björnson, a Norwegian, living in Parliament Street, Westminster, in these words: "Hope you will not fail to be with me by noon."

He himself made his way without delay by the South-Coast Railway to Brighton, and thence onward by the coast to Portsmouth, arriving there shortly before eleven.

Digitized by Google

Looking abroad from the Hard, the Cumber, the quays of Portsea, the whole harbour seemed a mere endless tangle of masts and rigging.

By this time the four thousand gentlemen who formed Hardy's army of blue-jackets were distributed among the nine newly-arrived ships of war, the rank and file partly furnishing their own former officers, and being partly officered by the remnants of the regular service.

The entire still-living crew of the Iphigenia—the "Hundred and Eighty"—were borne in the Hirosaki, flag-ship.

We have not spoken of the doings of this gallant cohort subsequent to their departure from far Eastern waters.

They had found at Hong-Kong some coal-ships which they loaded, and brought forward in their wake. Again they had stopped at Singapore, and doubling the Cape, steamed by night, near by the African coast, through the Straits of Gibraltar; the garrison on the Rock, at a loss as to their identity, concluding that they must be Italian.

They were well provisioned in proportion to their number, and well coaled; so, passing south of Sardinia, they steered northward to M. Dumas' uninhabited island of Monte Christo (which is some twenty-five miles distant from the nearest land), prepared for a lengthy stay, there being two or three coves and bays affording very good anchorage.

The steam-pinnace of the Iphigenia carried a small quick-firing gun mounted on a pedestal for'ard; and Hardy, on leaving his men, gave instructions that any craft which might come near enough to sight the fleet, should be chased by the pinnace, and, if not captured, sunk. As a matter of fact, only three small Corsican craft were captured, and their crews retained at the island.

Hardy himself left them in the Conrad, and at Ile d'Elbe contrived to make terms with the padrone of the Maltese speronare in which he reached England.

The Conrad he left behind, in order, in the event of contingencies, to serve as a dispatch-boat.

Here, then, during some weeks, remained the Hundred and Eighty under the lazy Italian sky, shooting goats, and looking to their ships and guns. The Japanese whom they had with them they retained till the end of their stay at the island.

At last, with glad hurrahs, they saw the ship, flying the agreed flags, which came to recall them; and on the fifth morning they were at Portsmouth.

If it was true, as Hardy maintained, that it was men and not ships which fought a battle, the ships being only the tools of the men, then the Hirosaki was a great fighter. She was gallantly manned.

In addition to this, she was a wonderful tool; the largest effective-tonnaged ship that had ever been launched anywhere; the latest, and most exquisite product of the Thames Ironworks and Ship-building Company.

But with the fleet which we may call British collected at Portsmouth, the resources of Europe were not wholly exhausted. Among them, arrived during the night, were four ram-cruisers, a large corvette, two ram-monitors, and five torpedo gun-vessels from the Netherlands, the remainder of Holland's armament having been caught by the Japanese, or being with her East Indian Navy; there were also three small Norwegian torpedo-vessels; also, the first question asked by Hardy at Portsmouth was this: "No sign yet of the Spaniards?" There was none: the reason being that, as the entire home navy of Spain left her by America lay at anchor in Lisbon harbour, together with some Portuguese, they had been attacked, and for the most part annihilated, by a Japanese cruiser-squadron. Not one escaped without damage; yet as the Portsmouth force passed down Spithead, they were joined by a force of ten sail, mostly small, consisting of torpedo gun-vessels, all unarmoured.

Thus in this new Greater Armada, the Spaniard and the Englishman, in strange neighbourhood, fought side by side; this last answer of white Europe to yellow Asia being, as far as possible, unanimous.

There could be no doubt as to the day, or even the hour, of the final forward step of the yellow races. Already two hours after midnight of the previous night it was known in London that incalculable masses of men had put off from Dunkirk, Calais, Boulogne, St. Valéry, Tréport, Dieppe, all along that coast, borne mostly in flats with single paddle-wheel astern, in French-barge fashion—the most elementary form of steam motion—involving a journey of from eighteen to twenty hours to attain the nearest point of the English coast.

The front of this floating host must therefore be upon

With the girl Seward, Hardy proceeded to the Ship Hotel.

Digitized by Google

The Hundred-and-Eighty remained.....shooting goats.

British soil at some almost calculable moment during the afternoon.

They were, as a matter of fact, retarded by an event which, though normal, came upon everyone with the effect of a surprise: the air, which for six days had seemed settled in a thick stagnation, at about ten in the morning—moved. A sensible breeze sprang up from the N.W., driving the sea-surface in sharply-lined hollows before it.

And at once there was a slight lightening of the dismal murk of the atmosphere.

Near noon a brief meeting of captains, summoned by Hardy, took place at Government House. He had little to say, except to point out that the battle upon which they were about to enter was with men of different, less nice, morale and training, than ordinary European sailors—clever apes—islanders, yet real foreigners on board a western ship-of-war. He tossed his hand, and added: "It is true they are flushed with a consciousness of power, gentlemen, and are greatly superior in metal and numbers. But that will not weigh too much with you."

He also said that when the more definite orders for battle went abroad on the impending of the contest, it was his will that his purposes should be clearly explained by captains and commanders to every person in the fighting fleet.

He also said that they would be wasting their energies uselessly in this battle, unless one man, whom he had reason to think would be with the fleet, were killed or captured; and he himself undertook to discover, without fail, in which ship that man was borne.

Immediately a move was made by captains toward ships in the port outside, and a few minutes after twelve the signal "weigh" went up.

At the same time a great bustle of preparation was taking place within the harbour itself. Dark smoke left particles of soot on flapping sails. A host of boats flitted to and fro. Never did Gosport, Portsea, Portsmouth, Southsea, and the forts around them, and the still harbour between them, hear so widespread a rumour of rattling chains and hurrying feet, and shouted God-speeds, and ordering voices.

Cumberland and South Sea Castle Forts hooted a volley of blessings and farewells as the war-ship fleet slipped down the flood tide. A few minutes later the ten Spaniards hove in sight.

The fleet was also augmented by the Hero, the Nile, the Sfax, the two gun-boats taken in the battle of the Channel, patched up now, and three French composite gun-vessels captured during a Mediterranean battle.

They made up a respectable fighting-power: the nine ships being considerably the most powerful of the Japanese navy, and the Hirosaki the most powerful of ships.

Yet it was only the audacity of Hardy that would, with any sort of hope, have led this force against, we will not say the weight, but the numbers, opposed to him; and the havoc which overtook his comparatively little fleet in the battle that followed would certainly, had his judgment been absolutely cool, have been foreknown to him—or perhaps was foreknown.

Since the year 1892 Japan had placed orders with various firms all over the world for a hundred and seventeen new ships, making an aggregate of some hundred and fifteen thousand tons, half to be completed by 1902, and half by 1906. At the period of this new programme, she already possessed a very respectable navy; and at about the time of the outbreak of the European war, nearly one half of the new ships were already in her hands.

Hardy therefore opposed a fleet of forty-three ships all told (only eleven of them being ships of a high class) to a fleet of one hundred and thirty-nine sail, including the Chinese vessels, mostly of extreme modernity, and high fighting power.

His main dependence at this time seems, as he said, to have been upon the comparative morale of the two crews. He commanded a fleet composed, except for the Continentals, wholly of British gentlemen; the other crews were imitators, acquainted with tactics recommended in books, incapable, he conceived, of originating, incapable of combatting originality. He guessed, too, that small as was his force, he happened to have a superiority in one weapon—not in general a very reliable one—the Torpedo.

Perhaps trusting to one or both of these things, he contrived to give the impression (though it is questionable if he were as sincere as he usually was) that, on starting from port, he was without any suspicion that he might now fail to account for Asia as he had accounted for Europe.

The breeze freshened, but the air, though lightened, continued murky; there was some difficulty in deciphering signals; and to facilitate messages by trumpet-call, the ships moved onward in close formation, the Dutch to the extreme starboard, the Spaniards to port.

Ten miles astern spread far the great mass of other craft.

Alone sat Hardy in the Hirosaki's conning-tower, which stood on the after-part of the forecastle-deck, very strongly armoured, and communicating by an armoured tube right down to the armoured deck, and the bowels of the ship.

In that hour so great a travail came upon this poor, troubled soul, that he could hardly bear to live. Here was the Gethsemane of the young man. All the Care of earth burdened upon him; all the floods and the waters of Destiny passed over him. He groaned; the forehead that rested upon his hand sweated great drops. A year ago he had thought himself a simple Hampshire sailor-lad—and see, now, with the cracking thews of Atlas he must uphold the world! "Oh, if it be possible—if it be possible—" This old cry of passionate agony rived through all his being. That he alone should bear the whole, he,—one frail back,—that he should be the ordained to shriek in solitary travail with the birth-pangs of the new Future that was to be, and be rent to shreds and atoms in the eruption of his monstrous offspring, this was piteous. To be a Saviour, it seems, is no light matter: the Redeemer from Hell must himself traverse the flames. At all events, the brain upon which what we call civilisation now depended was near to frenzy. That his toiling back could bear the horrid mass at all proved the dazzling [illegible] hour of the boy—but he writhed. The weight was [illegible] his sinews creaked. Also, in that hour of his [illegible] his shattered nerves represented to him the world which he upheld as a world black, draped in crape. "Oh, if it be only possible . . . ."; again and again, in groan on groan, he uttered his agony of spirit, longing only to die, to die. And even as he longed, he sprang up briskly, and he cried:

Digitized by Google

"Twelve knots!"

A little S.W. of Beachy Head the fleet was joined by the fast private yacht of a gentleman who was acting as scout. He went on board the Hirosaki, and was conducted to [illegible] Hardy.

The Japanese fleet, he said, were on the way between the Somme-mouth and the Sussex coast, but very much spread out, not apparently expecting serious opposition, and steaming at the rate of perhaps four or five knots. A vast breadth of channel was parterred for league on league with masses of barge-like crafts, which, if one might conjecture, were concentrating toward the narrow part of the Strait. Their progress was very slow; but some were by now certainly not more than nine or ten miles from the Kent coast. The gentleman had passed so near to one mass as to see through his glass a distribution of some sort of green pottage in one barge, and what looked like a fight between two Chinamen in another. He had not been fired at. The boats were incredibly over-crowded. He had heard, he said with a smile, that about 70,000 men were massed upon Hastings, and that forty Maxims were in position on the sea-front.

Shortly before four a scout of the enemy directed from beyond effective range the rays of two electric searchlights upon the British, and at once hasted back to eastward.

By half past, the British made out a great bank of cloud to eastward. The breeze had now freshened to a moderately stiff gale from the north-west. For the first time for a week, hurrying dark clouds above were visible athwart a gloom of twilight. The sea was curling into fore-running hollows before the British stems, like backing pages, who, with bows and graces, usher in the visitor.

John Hardy's brain, and heart, and life was in his eyes. He glared through his glass like a famished wolf.

The bank of smoke quickly cleared; he could discern forms of ships—eight miles from him, in line abreast—and moving, it was clear, rapidly. Legion was their name. His eyes started, and stared; he muttered with his lips.

He gazed for two minutes, crazily, hundred-eyed; then he started, and hissed a swift, "By Heaven!" Then he flew to the tube.

To be signalled to the fleet:

"Keep speed and formation. Use no torpedoes in combat."

To his own engine-room:

"Full speed ahead!"

The engines of the Hirosaki instantly quickened their throb and complex turmoil. She forged forward. Her best speed was nearly nineteen knots. She was like an ugly, stout island in a hurry.

The wondering question went pervading his fleet—was he about to fight the entire navy of Japan alone? Was he not rushing like the demented whom the gods destroy into the very mouth of Hades?

(To be concluded.)

Will be Published

ON FRIDAY, THE FIRST OF JULY.

PART I. OF

The Pilgrim's Progress.

BY JOHN BUNYAN.

With an Introduction by the Rev. H. R. HAWEIS.

Embellished with over one hundred and twenty designs, done by three brothers—

GEORGE WOOLLISCROFT RHEAD,
FREDERICK RHEAD, LOUIS RHEAD,

who for three years have been engaged in illustrating this favourite classic. The drawings themselves have recently been on exhibition in London, Paris, and New York, and are unique. Speaking of them

The Athenæum says: "These excellent examples of the right way of illustrating Bunyan possess those masculine qualities, that directness, and the robust energy that the themes demand. As to the higher elements we associate under the name of design, there is not the slightest doubt Bunyan, could he go to Bond Street and study the works of the Messrs. Rhead, would recognise in them a crowning mercy, specially reserved till now for himself."

The Daily News says: "At first glance these drawings, which are done in pen and ink, with occasional aid of the brush, appear to accord in strong family resemblance, but in reality the three brothers differ considerably. They have worked, of course, on the same lines to some extent, evolving a curiously archaic representation of the principal personages as they suppose them to have existed in the imagination of John Bunyan. . . . Mr. G. Woolliscroft Rhead has chosen the more weird and dramatic scenes in the journey, such as Christian entering the Valley of Death, and the men among the tombs and congregation of the Dead, the Land of Beulah, a by-way to Hell, the appearance of Apollyon and the escape from Doubting Castle, these and many other episodes being conceived with considerable invention and imagination, with realism and symbolism blended profusely. Mr. Frederick Rhead has aimed rather at facial expressions of character in detail, contrasting the greater virtues and vices as well as the lesser comedy of manners appertaining to humanity in an emphatic way that approaches grotesqueness in several instances. The incident of Pliable's return home to a boisterous welcome, the vivacity of the group where Talkative is at the ale-bench, the crowded assembly of Vanity Fair, and similar episodes, are done with skill and a bold touch."

The Daily Mail says: "Messrs. C. Arthur Pearson Limited, are about to publish a new edition of Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress,' and to three brothers—Mr. George Woolliscroft Rhead, Mr. Frederick A. Rhead, and Mr. Louis Rhead—has been intrusted the task of doing the drawings. Most of these are fine, virile pieces of work; all of them are full of imagination and reverent feeling. It is interesting to notice that, although the methods of the brothers are closely akin, there is just sufficient temperamental difference in the work of each to suggest individuality."

This Work will be Issued in Twelve Monthly Parts, with Coloured Wrapper price 6d. each part.

Also an Edition de Luxe of this Work will be issued, limited to 200 Copies for England and America, numbered and signed by the Artists, printed on hand-made paper, and bound in buckram.

IMPORTANT TO CYCLISTS.

We still have left a few of the Cycling Road Maps issued last year with the Athletic Record, for Essex, Devonshire, Kent, Sussex, Herts, and Derbyshire. We will send these six, until the stock is exhausted, to any reader who sends us three penny stamps and a self-directed wrapper with a halfpenny stamp affixed.

Digitized by Google

THE ILLEGIBLE SIGNATURE.

It was about fifteen days ago, at the country home of Brignac, on one of those exquisite afternoons when, although one shivers at the thought of the approaching autumn, the sun throws here and there mild though already paler rays.

While awaiting the hour for taking up the nets in the pretty bend of the Marne, a river which loiters indolently along the meadows, winding like a great silver snake, we are talking on the wide verandah which was filled with the heavy, intoxicating odour of heliotropes.

A charming man is Brignac. Formerly an officer in the light cavalry, he is a man of majestic chest, large face, a trifle too flushed, with an immense white beard and square features. Born at that period when the empire was at its height, he had taken pleasure as it came to him, and it must be said that the advent of the Republic seemed to him an insufficient reason for renouncing the pleasures of this world. He amused himself under M. Thiers, under MacMahon, and even under M. Grevy. Brignac was then—but why disclose the age of a gallant man whose friendship is true and whose cook is without equal? He was advised to try the baths.

It was there, near a spring, whence bubbled up a hot liquid which smelt like a bad egg, that he met a young English girl, straight and slender as a pretty bamboo stalk. He had still a gallant air and quite a fortune, she very little. The next winter the pretty English woman married the former cavalry officer. They have one child—they are happy.

Only Brignac has aged a great deal, and has become horribly serious. He is a good comrade for me. He gave me, when I was very young, that practical advice which is never forgotten, and I am happy from time to time to be with him—for an hour or two.

While talking, as we passed by a little room opening on the conservatory, I saw in the corner of the room, soberly seated before a table, my host's son, Gaston, a pretty, dark child. He had let his pen roll across the table, and with a glance that seemed to me full of melancholy, he followed the rustling flight of the swallows that were skimming close to the lawn, flying through the swarm of gnats.

On such a beautiful day, in this room which, in contrast to the sunny verandah, seemed more gloomy than a dungeon in the Palace of the Doges, the sight of this child-prisoner gave me pain, and I could not refrain from saying to my friend:

"How have you the heart to shut up this child at such a time?"

And Brignac answered:

"My dear friend, when he knows how to write I will leave him alone, for he is not yet five years old and very intelligent; but he must learn to write, and write well, I mean."

"That is, without doubt, because your own handwriting is like cat-scratches."

"That might be a reason. We should endeavour to help our children to avoid such of our faults as have troubled us in our own career, and besides——"

"My dear Brignac, I do not know whether it is because you live too much in the country, but it seems to me that you are becoming very much of a Prudhomme."

He interrupted me with some spirit:

"Perhaps I am like Prudhomme. Prudhomme was an individual who paddled his own canoe very well; besides, do you wish me to tell you why I am anxious that my little scamp should write well?"

"It is a story of that time when you would not have called me Prudhomme. It was a long time ago—'63. At that time Baden-Baden was Baden-Baden, and Monte Carlo nothing but a little fishing village. Everyone who was in the swim, or considered himself so, hurried to Baden-Baden as soon as July came round. At that time the club-rooms were empty—not more so than now during the week of the races at Deauville. That year I had remained at Paris, where in my little suite on a ground floor in the Rue Taitbout, I had not been so frightfully dull, when one morning a letter was brought to me. The letter was a demand for money—not one of those vulgar, begging letters, heaping upon one recitals of ill-luck, swearing eternal gratitude and everlasting devotion. No; it was short and to the point, without any beating about the bush.

"'I have not a single sou. Send me immediately a thousand francs that I may pay my hotel bill and return to France to enlist.'

"This letter, horribly scrawled, was dated from Baden-Baden. As to the signature, it was impossible to read it.

"I made every attempt, examining it letter by letter; searching among my papers for the name of the person who could have been guilty of this vile scrawl. It was absolutely impossible to discover any clue which would put me on the right track. At Baden-Baden? I had three hundred friends at Baden-Baden. But this unlucky name—still, I must find out what it was. For two days I did nothing but turn it over in my mind, seeking the solution, giving everyone whom I met this signature to decipher. Absolutely useless. Each person gave a different opinion.

Digitized by Google

"You can imagine into what a fever this had thrown me. At the time I was full of a great many no ions. I imagined that to refuse money to a f.iend was meanness. We are all simpletons when young. But what caused me the greatest annoyance was the thought that perhaps this note was from someone for whom I entertained a real friendship.

"I telegraphed to ten or twelve intimate friends—none was the author of the note. Then I betook myself to experts in chirography. One said the name was Casernier—had no doubt of it; was willing to swear it. The second said that he challenged anyone to read the name otherwise than Sutinais, and was willing to swear to that name; and, finally, a third declared it was not a name at all, but a word. In his opinion it was 'Cicilities.'

"Sutinais and Casernier were alike unknown to me. I turned over the club directories, I again reviewed my book of addresses, name by name. Nothing! I could discover nothing. I was almost crazy, you may imagine, and I had even lost sight, to some extent, of the original reason for all this trouble, thinking less now of obliging a friend than of discovering this name so carefully concealed.

"On the third day an inspiration came to me, so simple that it had occured to me only after all the other attempts had failed. I wrote to Baden-Baden for a list of the Frenchmen staying at the hotel of the unfortunate scribbler. I would need only to write to all whom I knew in the place. This calmed me. And, in truth, I needed it, for I had conceived an inexplicable rage against all this, as if something mysterious and fatal pursued me.

"I returned early on the evening of the third day, and soon fell asleep.

"I ought to tell you that I then had—I still have, in fact—the habit of using a night lamp. I cannot bear to feel myself in total darkness for an instant.

"That night—it is truly a singular thing, and I have never been able to think of it without a strange sensation—that night I was awakened by a sharp cracking sound in the great silence. I have never known what that noise was—doubtless the night lamp going out, for it was perfectly dark. At first a feeling of awful anguish oppressed me, a feeling I always have when in the dark, and before I had had time to fully awaken, I heard—yes, my friend, I actually heard—the effect of nervousness, you say? It matters not; I heard a voice, which whispered very low: 'Jacques Lerminier.'

"A cold shiver ran through my whole body, though I saw no reason for it. In a second I had risen, lighted a candle, and re-read the letter from Baden-Baden. Why had I not deciphered it before? It was perfectly plain.

"Lerminier was a refined boy, obliging, but a little wild, whom I had loved much when we were young together; soon lost from sight, then found again in those momentary encounters where a rapid clasp of the hand and an earnest: 'Do you remember?' is all, and then separation, perhaps for years.

"Poor Jacques! That is what we always called him at the school of Saint Cyr.

"He should certainly have had his thousand francs.

"I looked at the clock. It was past midnight. Nothing could be done until morning. Immediately I wrote a letter to Baden-Baden, excusing myself and explaining all. I placed the money in it and sealed it. And while I did this, I remembered that the whisper which I had heard erewhile, was exactly like the voice of Jacques when deeply moved.

"How strange is the work of memory in our brains, I said to myself, and how was it possible for me to recall at the same time and while yet asleep the name and the voice of 'Poor Jacques.'

"Then I went back to bed again, satisfied and calm. I did not dream any more of the whispering voice in the blackness of my silent chamber. No, indeed; I thought no more of it, until two days later, when I received a dispatch from Baden-Baden, My registered letter had been remailed to me.

"'Poor Jacques' had killed himself at midnight two days before—at the moment when my sleep was interrupted by a sharp crack—the sharp crack like the report of a pistol."

Brignac coughed silently to clear his throat.

"I positively insist that my child shall write a legible hand," he said with a sad smile.

J. Ricard.

Spell It. M. A. P. Spell It.

EVERYBODY has heard of Mr. T. P. O'Connor. Many people know him as an Irishman, many as an M.P., and many again as the most brilliant journalist living. He founded The Star, he established The Sun, and by them made possible the halfpenny daily paper as exemplified in The Daily Mail, The Leader, The Morning, and others in the Provinces.

It will be remembered that in the early days of T.P.'s journalistic career, when he started The Star the most noticeable feature in that then most noticeable paper was the column headed "Mainly About People." Before that time no journalist had been bold enough to exploit the personal par and tell us what famous people were doing in their leisure hours, in their houses, and the hundred and one things we now hear about them. It was in that column, too, that T.P. proved that, brilliant as he was as a literary critic, slashing as a political leader-writer, he was at his best in drawing a pen portrait of a man or a woman; in describing the one or the other, from the innermost beats of their hearts to the cut of the coat or the colour of the frock.

This feature in modern journalism was, as I say, initiated by Mr. O'Connor, and he now intends to enlarge upon it by editing a paper to be called "M.A.P.," which means "Mainly About People." It will be published from the Offices of Pearson's Weekly, every Thursday, at the price of One Penny.

ASK FOR THE FIRST NUMBER OF

M. A. P.

∴ ON THURSDAY, JUNE 16th. ∴

Digitized by Google

THE KISS OF DEATH.

OFF the West African coast, in latitude three degrees south and longitude thirty east, lies the picturesque island of Anno Bom. Surrounded by the blue waves, girdled about by foam, rich in tropical verdure, it is like a gem of the ocean.

It is peopled by the descendants of Africans who were in captivity, and who, according to the romantic legend told by the present islanders, had a wonderful escape from a slave-ship, and were cast upon this land of refuge and freedom.

The legend, which serves in lieu of history for the people, includes the narrative of a heroic young African girl, who, inspired by love of her people, pure in heart, bold in resolve, and gifted with such talent for dissimulation and stratagem as might have belonged to the woman who overcame Samson, laid down her life for her kindred, and her final act was to liberate them while her blood was chilling with an insidious poison.

The story is given in the words of the King, as he narrated it to me.

"Listen, now, my guest and my children, to what Umzula's father spoke to his son, and my father repeated to me.

"The tribe of Kalamba dwelt, from the beginning of the world, in peace and freedom in their valley under the shadow of Kilimanjaro, until one dark night, when the tribe were all sleeping. Then, when no danger was feared, a host of Arab slave-traders fell on our village, and all that they killed not in our battle with them they made captives.

"Wooden yolks were placed about their necks, and they were driven with whips and sharp-pointed sticks—men, women, and children—for many moons, across deserts and mountains, and through terrible forests and rushing rivers—even the women, with little children tied on their backs.

"Many died of hunger and thirst. Many were devoured by wild beasts. Some were killed by serpents. Others were stolen by other slave men.

"At last, at about the second hour of night, they reached a great water. Next day, from a great ship that lay near the shore, there came many white men that were armed with swords and spears and guns.

"These white men had much cloth and beads, money and chains. They also had bracelets and anklets of heavy iron, which, after much speaking with the Arabs, they fastened upon the hands and feet of our people. The Arabs returned, rejoicing at all that the white men had given them for the tribe of Kalamba.

"The white men then drove us into their boats. We had no tears left and could only groan. The white men laughed and forced us down into the inside of their ship. We only knew that it was day when the streaks of the pitying sunlight came in through our prison door.

"One time our hearts leapt within us when the waters dashed over the ship, for we thought that our God was opening the great waters to swallow us up and give us freedom in death.

"A strange fever began to rage in us as the groans and wailings of our wives and little ones sank like fire into our ears and hearts, and made us writhe and hiss like snakes. In our despair we were planning to beat each other to death with the iron rings in our hands, the women asking us piteously to kill them and their little ones first. But the white men opened our prison door, drove us up, and fastened us with iron rings to the deck.

"Once more we saw the sun rising, and beside us we saw a great white cloud that seemed to stand on the water like the white head of Kilimanjaro over the plain of Kalamba. We were turning away, thinking it a cruel dream, when suddenly the cloud opened, and there stood before us a beautiful green mountain, fresh as the valley of Kalamba in the spring time, with silvery streaks of water rushing down its sides.

"Frantically we struggled, but the white man's chains held us, and his cruel laugh mocked us as we sat and looked at the beautiful land.

"That night Umzula, the eldest of our young women, and the betrothed of Nalunga, once the pride and flower of our tribe, but now the slave of the slave man, crept stealthily from where the slave men were playing with cards, to where her mother sat with her other children.

"She looked alternately at the darkening island and the faces and fetters of her father and mother, while her eyes glowed as if some terrible resolve had begun to burn in her brain. She spoke to her mother in a firm and determined tone, that reached every ear and made every slave chain rattle.

"'Oh, mother,' she said, 'although the slave men value every slave, even the babies at the breast, as rocks of gold, nevertheless are the slave men as children before the love dance. Only teach me the secret of the kiss of death. Teach me this, and to-morrow the tribe of Kalamba will dance and sing in great joy and freedom in the beautiful land that God has sent in the white cloud.'

"Umzula's mother looked from her daughter to the chains of her husband, the once proud chief of the Kalambans, and upon Nalunga, sitting, like his chief, with his brow resting upon his shackled hands, then upon the remainder of the once happy tribe, and then towards the mountain.

"Embracing her daughter, and having spoken into her ear secrets well known only to the wives and daughters of great chiefs, she gave her daughter two small vessels containing a liquid. Umzula glided away to answer the slave man's call.

"Umzula danced the love dance, and the white men, with poisoned kisses on their lips, fell one after another, sinking into death. Then Umzula, her eyes gleaming, lips swollen, and gasping for breath, staggered to her mother's feet and unlocked her mother's fetters.

"'Oh, my daughter,' cried the mother, 'why did you not drink of the liquid in the larger vessel to save yourself?'

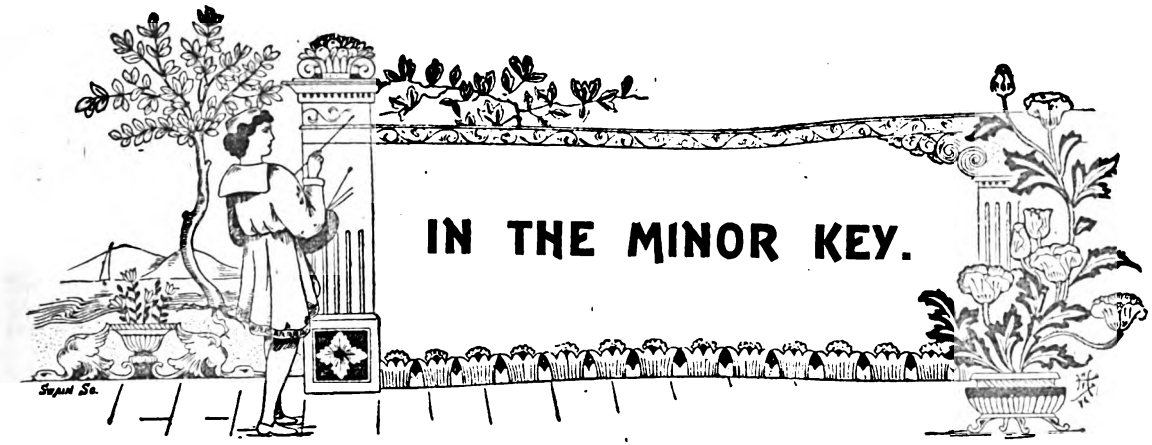
"'Only enough to save my life long enough to save you. Tell Nalunga that Umzula, defiled by the kiss of the white man, dies with her last thought of him.'

"She fell dead while the chains rattled about her, and the sound of the cry of freedom rang in her failing ears. The slavers were all dead.

"The next day the ship was dashed against the rocks of this island. Over the grave of Umzula is a cross made of all that is left of the slave ship."

HERBERT POTTER.

Digitized by Google



IN THE MINOR KEY.

"Vaulting ambition which o'er leaps itself, and falls."

"It is useless trying again, Mrs. Sefton, it is as I feared, your voice has utterly gone."

"Don't say that! Let me try again, perhaps I am a little tired to-day, perhaps——" But the sentence ended in a dreary little sob.

Professor Meredith rubbed his spectacles assiduously. He did not venture to speak or look at the little woman standing before him; but a sad shake of the head spoke more forcibly than any words.

"Then everything is over, all my years of study, all my hopes for the future, everything is in vain! Is that what you mean?"

Mrs. Sefton's voice sounded shrill and hysterical. Professor Meredith hurriedly rolled up a piece of music, and put out his hand.

"It is a shock and disappointment, I know, and no one feels it more keenly than your old master, who had hoped to——"

He checked himself abruptly.

"Good-bye, good-bye," he said nervously, taking the limp hand of his favourite pupil, and not trusting himself to further speech, he hurried from the room and out of the house.

As the front door banged, Mrs. Sefton started, and looked round her little room. The light of a dull winter's afternoon was fading slowly away, and the blazing fire light illuminated the walls and furniture. It was warm and cosy, but its occupant shivered as if with cold. From somewhere upstairs came the sound of a baby's laugh.

Hilda Sefton frowned as if the sound annoyed her, and she commenced to pace up and down the room with quick, agitated steps. A clock on the mantel-piece chimed the hour; she heeded it not, although its silver tone should have heralded her husband's footsteps.

"A telegram, m'm," said a servant opening the door suddenly.

Mrs. Sefton read it mechanically.

"Shall be late to-night, important business.—Dick."

"There is no answer."

Then, as the door closed, she flung herself into a chair, exclaiming:

"Thank God, I could not bear him near me yet."

For a few minutes the tears stole silently down her cheeks, then she spoke aloud to the now dying fire.

"So this is the end of all my hopes, for this have I studied and worked from morning till night, for this I have denied myself all pleasures and amusements, so that I might study, and my voice grow stronger and more beautiful. All gone, my voice which was to charm thousands. Better I had lost everything than that. Oh, God, why did I marry him? . . . What am I thinking? . . . . I feel as if I must hate him—and baby, too."

Hilda Sefton gave a bitter cry and slipped on to the rug, where she lay with her face buried.

"Oh, for a miracle," she sobbed. "A miracle, dear God—give me back my voice—take everything but that."

The days of long ago came back with painful memories—the days when she had been free, when she had studied and hoped, growing unknowingly full of a boundless ambition—the days before Dick had wooed and won her, and the days before her child was born, the child who had cost her so much pain and suffering, who had laid her on a bed of sickness for months, and had now taken from her her voice. For weeks she had hoped against hope as the days crept by and brought renewed strength.

"It will come back," she had whispered to reassure her sinking heart, and now she knew, alas! it would never come back again, and she must go through life with a heart well-nigh bursting with ambition which could never be satisfied.

"Oh, for a miracle, a miracle—anything but that!" she moaned.

In the darkness there was the slightest rustle of a woman's gown, and a faint perfume filled the room. Then there was a low sigh.

"Give me back my voice!" wailed the prostrate figure on the hearthrug.

"Child, do you know what you are asking?" said a quiet, strangely musical voice.

Hilda Sefton sat up and peered through the gloom.

"Yes," she said fiercely. "Yes."

Her head throbbed and burnt and she felt a difficulty in breathing; she could not even think clearly.

"And you would give up everything?" the voice went on with a stress on the last word.

Hilda put her hand to her head. She did not wonder who had entered under cover of the firelight; all such mundane matters had gone in her one absorbing grief.

"Everything," she answered, "for my beautiful voice to come back with its old power."

"Your child?" asked the voice very softly.

"My child, my baby, how can I look at her again? She has stolen my voice from me."

Digitized by Google

"Your husband's love?" the voice was lower still.

"He can never take the place of my lost voice," cried Hilda bitterly.

Then there was silence, save for the cracking of the dying embers in the grate.

"And if your voice should be restored to you, would it atone for an empty, loveless life? Answer not hurriedly," implored the strange speaker.

"If it could be restored to me I would regret nothing," answered Hilda, with sudden firmness. "Nothing. But who are you to talk thus? What power have you to give or take?"

"None," answered the voice sadly; "none, save where the human heart is lost to all except ambition."

"I do not understand," stammered Hilda.

"When a human soul cries out to God even as I did, rejects all love and mercy even as I did, then it is my punishment to give even as I was given.

"Hilda Sefton, your voice shall be restored to you, but unseen, unheard, it will be my portion to journey through your loveless life by your side."

In the growing darkness for one second, Hilda perceived a face. A woman's face, sad with unutterable sadness, a face of beauty marred by the look of pain and weariness in the dark eyes, which were gazing at her with a strange tender pity which seemed to chill and awe her with dim forebodings.

There was a rustling sound again, and the faint perfume in the room died away, as with a wild scream Hilda fell insensible. The scream was echoed from the room above, then there was a deep, ominous silence. When Richard Sefton returned from his office it was late and he was tired. He noticed with surprise that there were no lights in their cosy little drawing room, and it was with a sense of coming evil that he let himself in with his key. No little wife came to greet him as he entered. He stood in the hall listening. From upstairs came the sound of a man's voice, an echo of stifled sobs, and at length someone appeared and descended the stairs.

It was with a certain knowledge of disaster that Dick greeted the doctor.

"What is the matter. My wife—?" he stopped, for the gravity of the doctor's face made him afraid to frame his question.

"It is your little girl—the nurse let her fall off the table, she struck her head against the fender. Hold up, man, hold up, for your wife's sake."

Dick Sefton broke from the doctor's detaining hand and sprung upstairs. Outside the nursery door the nurse was crouched, sobbing loudly. Inside, on her tiny bed, lay Dick's little eighteen-months-old daughter, dead, while his wife, with wide open, staring eyes, was rocking to and fro in a chair, singing softly to herself an air from some opera.

* * * * *

A year passed away, and it was the night of Hilda Sefton's début in the musical world.

The night of her triumph, the reward for which she had worked and longed! As she looked at the sea of upturned faces in the hall she enjoyed the feeling of her coming victory. No dread or fear of failure oppressed her as she stood there with smiling lips. Her voice had returned with added richness and purity, and she was fully conscious of its beauty and worth.

In the plaudits of the people would come the balm for all her sufferings, all her pain and loss. And Dick, too——

Her eye ran along the front row. Dick 's seat was vacant.

So he had not come to hear her sing, he had not cared enough for that; well! no matter, she wanted not his praise. But nevertheless she sighed.

And Dick Sefton meanwhile?

He had been detained late in the city and had rushed home to find an empty house. His wife had left early for a final practice with her master. He hurried through his lonely dinner; it was not the first by very many he had eaten alone during the past year. Hilda was often away singing, or studying, or resting, and must not be disturbed, and by degrees he had come to look upon these lonely meals as the usual thing. His meal finished, he went upstairs to dress. The room was littered with his wife's things, and he hunted for his dress clothes, turning various articles on to the floor in his unsuccessful search for a clean white tie.

"There is a lady downstairs wishes to speak to you at once. She is a nurse, I think," said the servant, meeting him as he was about to descend the stairs.

In the drawing-room stood a little figure in grey nursing garb, with soft fluffy brown hair escaping from her bonnet and falling round her face.

"Why Maysie, Maysie dear!" cried Dick, his face lighting up with pleasure (he did not know how much it expressed) as he seized the hands of his cousin and one time playfellow and sweetheart, "what lucky chance brings you here?"

The girl looked up at her old playfellow wistfully. She noticed how tired and worn he looked, how he had aged since she had seen him last, and how something was missing from his face—its old brightness and life.

"Your mother is very ill, Dick," she said gently. "I am going down to her to-night. Will you come with me?"

In less than ten minutes Dick Sefton and his cousin were hurrying to the station.

It was indeed a night of triumph.

As Hilda Sefton drove home, the ringing plaudits of the people still sounded in her ears, and the hearty congratulations, poured upon her on all sides, were such as even satisfied her boundless desires. But, as she entered her home, a sense of disappointment fell upon her. Something was missing. After all, had her success given her the pleasure she had anticipated? As she went upstairs she paused at the door of a room, which was seldom opened now, and went in. The light from a lamp-post outside illuminated the room faintly. Hilda stood still and gazed at the tiny bed.

Suddenly the sense of a faint perfume roused her from her reverie, and, looking up, she thought she saw a face, a woman's face looking at her with sad eyes of loving pity. And then she knew that she had worked in vain, that she would have sacrificed all the triumphs of the night for the sound of a baby's laugh.

* * * * *

The greatest singer of the day, the idol of the people, sat in the splendid drawing-room of her London flat.

"You are surely not going to sing this to-night?" asked Professor Meredith, picking up a song which lay on the table.

"Why not?" asked the singer indifferently.

Her old master looked at her critically.

"Because if you do, you will fail," he said slowly.

Mrs. Sefton merely raised her eyebrows.

"I am going to tell you candidly what, fortunately for you, the world has not discovered yet. There is not one atom of pathos or human sympathy in your voice. As long as you confine yourself to brilliant music, or to anything, in fact, but these simple old ballads, whose only merit is their pathos, you will succeed. To sing this would be fatal."

Digitized by Google

"I am going to sing it!" replied Hilda Sefton obstinately.

"Then I prophesy failure!" retorted the Professor; and, rising, he abruptly took his leave.

When he had gone Hilda Sefton took the song and read it through. It was simple and quaint, breathing of love and tenderness from beginning to end. She laid it down with a sigh, and rang for her carriage. Wrapped in her rich furs she descended to the street.

"To the Park, m'm?" said her coachman, expecting the usual reply.

"No, James, drive to——" and Hilda named an obscure street in an unfashionable neighbourhood.

"Put me down at the corner and wait," commanded his mistress to the man's utter mystification.

With slow steps Hilda walked down the quiet road. When she came opposite a certain house she paused. It had been the home to which she had gone as Dick Sefton's bride. She glanced at an upper window. A little girl with golden curls was looking out.

"My baby's nursery," muttered Hilda, looking at the child with longing eyes. The little girl was about the age her little one would have been had it lived—four years old. With a sigh she retraced her steps.

It seemed such ages ago since she had lived there, unknown, obscure, and happy.

What was her splendid home compared to that, and Dick!

She counted on her fingers the weeks which had passed since she had seen her husband last. They did not often meet now. He was away all day, and she was absent at night, absorbed in her work and public life. So they had separated, and Dick spent his evenings in the country now. His mother's death had left him with a country house, and Maysie's mother lived there and kept a welcome for him.

Maysie Breton! Hilda's foot beat an angry tatoo on the floor of the carriage at the thought of the girl whom she had been jealous of in the far away days before they were married. Now he was always with her. What did it matter? she cared not for him—she lived solely for her Art's sake.

But a face arose by her side, and she knew that she lied—that she loved Dick as she had never loved him before—loved him only too late now that she had lost him.

For his heart, yearning for love and comfort, had turned to the playmate of his childhood, and now his wife was nothing to him. If she went out of his life to-morrow he would not miss her, only welcome his release.

His release, yes, that was it. Who would miss her if she died? She could not count a single friend. For the moment she was the idol of the people, and yet so great was her loneliness there was no one to whom she could pour out the bitterness of her heart.

"No one? Yes, one." The sad face which was ever by her side, which haunted her night and day, which looked at her with those reproachful eyes in the moments of her greatest triumphs, and in the long silence of the night-time.

Hilda dimly wondered if she too, in some future life, would be doomed to haunt some victim like herself.

Fame, riches, honours and glory, what were they but empty-sounding names? To dust and ashes they had turned in her grasp, and for these she had bartered the sweet love of husband and of child. In her own room the full misery of it all fell upon her. There was no retracing her steps. Nothing could bring her baby back to life, nothing could wake again her husband's love.

"Oh, Heaven, be merciful, be merciful," she moaned, "and give me release," and the sound of the spoken words woke the echoes of another prayer of long ago. "A miracle, a miracle, give me back my voice!"

When the great singer appeared that night some few noticed that her face matched in whiteness the magnificent bouquet of roses which she carried.

One man even saw a strange tremor pass over the usually cold proud face. He did not know the reason.

Far back in a gallery Hilda had seen her husband with a grey robed figure by his side. As they scanned the programme their heads were close together, and once Hilda saw Dick's hand steal out to seek for that of his companion. She understood its motive. The words of the song she was to sing would appeal thus to lovers, and Dick was drawing Maysie's attention to it.

Then she smiled a sad smile, a smile which had puzzled her old master already once to-night. She had met him as she entered the hall.

"So you have come to hear me fail?" she said kindly. "I am glad, for to-night will be my greatest and my final triumph," and she had left him with the same strange smile with which she now faced her audience.

For years after, many people, besides Professor Meredith, could not hear the words of that song without tears coming into their eyes. Those who heard the famous singer never forgot that night.

It seemed as if all the pathos, all the love and sweetness in the world were gathered into her voice, and the silence at its close was more eloquent than a thunder of applause. When the audience had recovered and clamoured for her re-appearance, it was announced that the singer had been taken suddenly ill, and could not re-appear.

But behind, in the darkened artists' room, lay Hilda Sefton—dead.

Had God in His mercy given her release?

MARY WEST.

NEXT WEEK

The Summer Double Number

OF

"HOME NOTES"

WILL BE ON SALE.

Readers are strongly advised to order it in advance, as, owing to the enormous expense at which it is produced, only a limited number of copies will be printed.

You may guess the rush there will be for it when you are told that there is a FREE SHILLING NOVEL presented with it; also the PATTERN OF A LADY'S SHIRT.

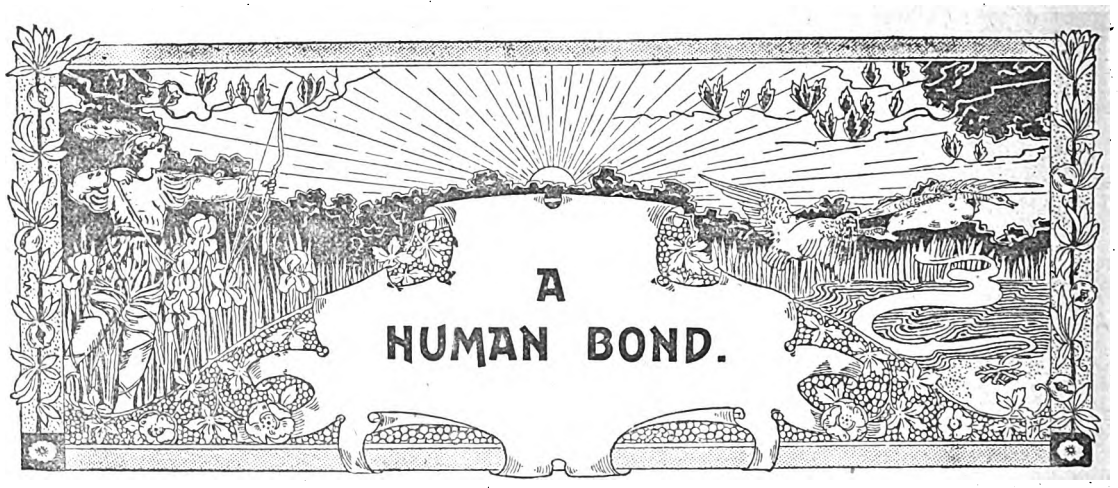
It contains the beginning of a new serial: "THE PRICE OF WISDOM," by Lillias Campbell Davidson; SOME DRAWINGS BY HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN NEVER BEFORE BEEN PUBLISHED; "A GIRL'S FIRST SEASON IN TOWN," described by herself; and a host of other good things.

If you don't believe this, buy it and see. It isn't always that your curiosity can be satisfied for twopence, and that you can be entertained for hours into the bargain.

"Home Notes" Summer Double Number,

READY JUNE 18th.

Digitized by Google



A HUMAN BOND.

I.

"Would that I could pass the examination of your heart. How I would cram for it!"

"Hush!"

Sir Lionel and Lady Charteris, of Linden Gardens, were giving a private dinner party to celebrate the promotion of their son, Jack Charteris, to a captaincy in the Guards. There were, perhaps, not more than a dozen or so of their friends invited; but young Doctor Charles Keppell, a tall, well-built young fellow, dark, with clean-shaven face, was amongst the number. He was an accomplished vocalist, and on this occasion used his splendid and well-trained tenor voice oftener perhaps than was his usual wont.

But he sang to Alice Charteris, who accompanied him on the piano. He was deeply in love with her, and in a certain measure his love was returned, but there was a prior claim to it which another held. All the ballads that Keppell sung were those that told of love requited and unrequited, pathetic stories of this life's sorrows, measured by the human breath in a few lines only, every word, though, having a world of meaning.

He sang these songs because he thought they touched his own sad love story, and perhaps hers. He laid considerable stress on the touching lines in "Alice, Where Art Thou?"

> I've sought thee by lakelet,
> I've sought thee on the hill,
> And on the pleasant wildwood
> When winds blew cold and chill.

She caught the inspiration, and looked up into his face and smiled.

During the evening, the twain managed to slip away unperceived, and held a hurried tête-à-tête on the staircase landing, beyond the drawing-room.

"We're all so very pleased that you got through yesterday," said she.

"Yes, by a fluke, I fancy. Anyway I'm through, and it's now Charles Keppell, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.," he replied with a quite indifferent air.

"How delighted you must feel."

"Not a bit of it. I am as dull as ditch water and a good deal duller. My delight doesn't run on those kind of wheels. In one way, of course, I'm pleased. I've managed to satisfy my examiners, and its nice to feel I'm qualified, but, Alice," and here he became very sentimental, "my joy is wetted with the rainy dew of a keen love disappointment, my enthusiasm is damped, and all my hopes and ambition are absolutely drowned. Would I could pass the examination of your heart. How I would cram for it!"

"You have passed that, Charlie, and with honours, too," said she with considerable feeling.

"Then I want my parchment to certify that; I want you to be my wife, Alice."

"I want to be your wife, dearest—no, I shan't say 'want to be,' because the feeling is inherent with my great love for you, and is prompted from a heart which is all yours; but, as I have already told you, there is Jesse Conway to be included in the reckoning."

"Ah, that reminds me, Alice. I had a letter from him the other day threatening all sorts of things if I didn't cease to visit here at once. He is watching me at every turn."

Alice Charteris turned away, deadly pale.

"Have you the letter with you?"

"No; I tore it up into shreds, and threw the pieces on the fire. Why do you ask?" he inquired.

"Well, it may only be fancy, but I dreamt last night that he had written to you."

"Oh, and what did you dream I did in the matter? I hope you dreamt good things of me—dreamt, you know, that I gave him a good hiding for his impertinence, for that is what I should feel inclined to do if he wrote to me again. How can you think of marrying a man who has taken to drinking, and leads a common dog's club life?"

"Oh, I know. It is a horrible thought. But you don't know all, Charlie. He holds a mortgage on this house, and Jack, too, owes him thousands."

"Heavens! And you are to be their victim—you are to be sacrificed on the altar of this man's passion because of his money! By Heaven, Alice, you shall not! You shall not be thrown to him like a bone to a dog, and when he has done with you—when he has bared your heart of all feeling to prolong a miserable life—as yours would be if you married him—throw you into a corner, and leave you there to decay! Oh, my darling!"

The lights blazed away in the hall and about the staircase and landings, and everything looked so bright and cheerful, that not a guest there would have thought, surveying the palm-decorated and flower-bedecked house, that financial difficulty lodged there, and that Alice Charteris was a bond for borrowed money. Yet so it was. Poor Sir Lionel had lost the best part of a considerable fortune through the escapades of the National South African Company, and it was Jesse Conway's money that was tiding him and his family over the present financial pitfalls. Alice Charteris was a very pretty golden brown-haired girl, with deep blue eyes, and features that were regular and very attractive. She was a general favourite, and had known young Keppell a long time. The Charteris family knew quite well that Alice loved him and hated their "friend," and they tried their very best to delay all matters in connection with the latter's marriage demand for goods received.

Digitized by Google

The Charteris family doctor had been persuaded to certify that poor Alice had developed symptoms of weakness that required her to be carefully nursed in a warm climate for two years. But, of course, she didn't hesitate to wear Conway's magnificent and costly engagement-ring. That pleased Conway, and the Charteris family, too, immensely. It was one way out of the difficulty. As a matter of fact, Alice was a bright, cheerful, and healthy girl. They merely played up to Conway.

"Alice, I want you, my child," said Sir Lionel, hurrying from the drawing-room, and holding a telegram in his hand.

Miss Charteris hurried towards her father.

II.

"You really must not say such things, Mr. Keppell."

"I can't help it, Lady Charteris."

"Your success ought to goad you on to make a name for yourself in your profession."

"A name for myself? I don't want to make a name for myself. There's no fun in that. There would be something in my making a name for somebody else, somebody I loved. When I step into the arena of the world to fight with it for a name it shall be only when my success is fanned by the breeze of one woman's love, Lady Charteris."

Her ladyship sighed. She knew he meant Alice.

"Sir Lionel has received a telegram from her fiancé inquiring if you were here," said Lady Charteris, with a struggle, for Sir Lionel had asked her to perform an ungracious task, failing himself to summon courage.

"Would Mr. Conway, then, in his arrogance, assume the office of censor and limit the right of a host to invite anyone whom he thought fit? And would he dictate to a guest? Lady Charteris, his conduct is insulting to you, to Miss Charteris, and to me. I can avenge his insult by remaining where I am, unless it be your wish that I should withdraw and leave your house, in which case that cur should only be my victor for a few hours, for I declare I would go straight to the Lotus Club and horsewhip him."

"It isn't for me to make any comment on what might take place elsewhere, but I am sure, Mr. Keppell, you would be the last man in the world to make a scene here, and I am afraid that if Sir Lionel does not send an immediate reply to Mr. Conway to the effect—er——"

"That I am not here, Jesse Conway may take a cab and come straight on here and create a scene, I suppose you would say, Lady Charteris?" broke in the young doctor, who felt, not unnaturally, much angered. Had not Alice told him only a few minutes before of the straits the Charteris family were in it is more than likely he would have said something forcible in condemnation of such an unheard-of occurrence as the turning away of a guest to please the whim of the fiancé of the daughter of the house. Of course, he knew the true reason, and kept it to himself.

"Inform Sir Lionel, my lady, that he is at liberty to send his message worded in that way pleasing to Mr. Conway," said he, rising and bowing towards her respectfully.

"Mr. Conway is so very jealous, Mr. Keppell," said her ladyship, trying to find an excuse other than the right one, "and one does not like to thwart the wishes and feelings of lovers."

"But they are thwarted very frequently. Don't you think so?" said Keppell with pointed effect, having in mind the love affair of her own daughter, whose heart had been bartered away for a monetary consideration, painful though the transaction might have been to Sir Lionel and Lady Charteris.

"Ah, indeed, it is sad to think about it. You are without doubt quite correct, Mr. Keppell; but we are the creatures of circumstances, and the sorrows of the world are but little understood beyond the afflicted ring."

"It is the pride of these creatures which is to be blamed for the sorrows that follow in their trail."

"Not always. If people were to live on the honest side of life and stamp the face of their circumstances with the die of truth—I am referring to those who are passing through a period of tribulation—the world would have but very little sympathy for them. Hence the greater part of the world is living under a mask."

This conversation took place in the library—a small room where Sir Lionel did his writing. That gentleman presently joined them.

"This is more than painful, Mr. Keppell, but Mr. Conway is one of your jealous lovers, you know," and the dear old gentleman tried to smile as if it were a capital joke, whereas he never felt so deeply humiliated in his whole life.

"Pray, don't allude to it, Sir Lionel. Singularly enough, I was about to start for home. Lady Charteris has confided in me, and so far as you are concerned the matter is at an end."

"Excuse me, but I want to send a wire off. Here, I say, Watts! Hand this to the telegraph boy!"

A servant took the missive downstairs. It was a message to Conway to say that Keppell was not in the house.

III.

KEPPELL and Miss Charteris were standing together in the hall.

"Well, once again, good-bye, darling, and don't forget what I have told you, will you?"

"No, Charlie, I promise you faithfully. And you won't go near the Lotus Club?"

"If I should happen to drop in and I find Conway there, you must not set a bar about my lips and prevent me from saying a word or two to him. I promise you I shan't put myself to any trouble in trying to find out his whereabouts, but if Fate thrusts him upon me—well, that's another matter. But you, my darling, will never be his wife. Good-bye."

The door opened, and young Dr. Keppell was soon out of sight in the darkness of the night. The door was closed gently behind him. He had hardly proceeded twenty yards down the road when the people in the houses in quiet Linden Gardens were startled and horrified by the report of fire-arms. Three successive revolver shots, a man's dying groans, and all was over.

Digitized by Google

The Charteris family had greater reason for thinking things than any other family in the road, and it was with alarm and fear and trembling that old Sir Lionel and the rest of the gentlemen rushed out of the house, regardless of head covering, and the fact that it was raining. They were followed by dozens of other gentlemen from the other residences, all of whom ran to the same spot, where they found a policeman and two or three people bending over a prostrate form—the body of a man. It happened in a dark spot, and the poor fellow's features were bespattered so with both mud and blood that they were quite unrecognisable.

Our young doctor friend was busy upon his knees doing what he could for this victim of somebody's revenge, and when Sir Lionel saw him, he threw up his hands and involuntarily exclaimed: "Thank God he is safe!" and at once ran back to the house to inform his wife and daughter.

"Bring him into my house!" said one of the bystanders.

"Is the poor fellow dead?" asked another.

"No, he is not dead," said Dr. Keppell.

"Then bring him into my house," repeated the first speaker.

Accordingly, the mournful procession was formed, and kind and willing hands bore the bleeding body across the road into the opposite house.

Water and sponges were quickly handed to the young but fully qualified Æsculapian, who washed all the blood and dirt off the man's face. He reeled back.

"Good Heaven! It is Jesse Conway!"

IV.

"You see, Alice, it is like this. When a man is finally passed and he receives his conjoint diploma, he has to make a declaration that he will use his best efforts to save human life. It is an oath, and oaths are binding on some consciences. Now you know the reason why I have saved my rival's life. It went against the grain, for had he died no difficulty would have placed itself in the way of our getting married. I knew I was pulling him round and saving his life to marry you—think of it. Wasn't it maddening? But I did my duty, and my reward is the highest fee ever paid to a medical man in all his natural. In fact, all the notes and gold in the Bank of England couldn't pay back that fee. It is you, Alice! you! you!" cried the doctor, with rapturous joy, locking Miss Charteris in his arms, and imprinting kiss after kiss on her hot and suffused cheek.

"He has turned out, after all, an awfully good fellow, now hasn't he?"

"He's a brick. We'll pass over the raison d'être of the man shooting him—that's their own affair, although the fellow's at liberty, and Conway knows him well—and come to our first meeting when he recovered consciousness. How he escaped death is a marvel! Two of the three bullets found their way into his body, and we extracted those at the hospital; but when he fell his head crashed against the kerbstone, and literally split it open. However, he spotted me at the bedside——"

"Remember, Charlie, you are now a doctor, and you shouldn't use such slang," playfully interrupted his little sweetheart.

"Ah, well, it was only yesterday, I might say, that I assumed the frock coat—that visible and outward sign of man's mistake. Well, he recognised me. I asked him the usual questions, to which he replied in proper form. I told him that he was under me as my patient, and the tears rolled down his cheeks. He could hardly believe his eyes. I never saw such a change in any man. 'You've saved my life?' said he. I nodded, but not quite so ungraciously. He then told me the whole story about the shooting business, a bit one day and a bit on another. But it was only this morning—he's leaving hospital to-morrow—that he asked for leave to send for you. Little did I dream it was to release you from your engagement, and to hand you over to me."

The attempt on his life brought about Conway's reformation. From a wild and dissolute man, he became a worthy member of the community.

Three months later Dr. Charles Keppell led his sweet and bonny bride to the altar. Conway was at the ceremony, and the cynosure of many wondering eyes. On the evening before the wedding he had done the graceful act of presenting Sir Lionel with a receipt—the cancellation note of his liability. It represented a present of £20,000.

Mulvy Ouseley.

DAN LENO'S ½d.
½d. COMIC JOURNAL,
EVERY TUESDAY.

WHAT DO DREAMS MEAN?

Who has not at one time or another had some curious dream, the significance of which has perplexed him? Some dreams are caused by an overheated imagination or an impaired digestion, and others are so trivial as not to cause any grounds for a second thought being bestowed upon them.

On the other hand, there are many dreams which have an unquestionable significance. Many of them are influenced by our daily actions and thoughts, and frequently we find ourselves doing in our dreams what we would do in our daily life. These exercise our minds, and if we only knew what they portend we might be able to avoid events that afterwards come to pass. The history of the world is full of instances where dreams of a prophetic character have taken place, and the belief in them is shared by scientific and intelligent writers in every part of the world.

Occasionally a so-called dream book or two has been published pretending to give an explanation of these curious phenomena, but, as we all know, most of them are absolutely unreliable and are nothing but catchpenny publications.

We recently made the acquaintance of a lady who has made the laws of Oneirology a life study, and her explanations we have found to be singularly true in cases upon which we have consulted her. She has the reputation of being the most expert person in the world in this science. Accordingly we have made arrangements with her to give the fullest information to any reader of this paper who cares to send asking her advice. Readers should be very careful to explain in the fullest manner the whole extent of their dream. Madame Georges will reply, giving a full explanation.

Readers should address their letters to "Dreams," c/o. Short Stories Offices, Henrietta Street, Strand, W.C., and inclose six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope for reply.

Digitized by Google

GREAT - WAR - COMPETITION.

FIRST PRIZE = = £5 | 25 Prizes of Handsome Books.
Five Prizes of £1 each. | 25 Gold-plated Pencil-cases.

In the event of a tie, the prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

HERE is the last set of pictures. Solve as many as you can, then place them with the other four sheets and post the lot in an envelope marked "WAR" to the Editor of Short Stories, 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., to arrive not later than Tuesday, June 14th.

When sending your attempt may we ask you to inclose a small donation to the Fresh Air Fund? Ninepence pays for a day's holiday for one child, and £8 2s. for a party of 200.

PERSON.

No. 33.....

WARSHIP.

No. 34.....

PLACE.

No. 35.....

PLACE.

No. 36.....

PERSON.

No. 37.....

PLACE.

No. 38.....

PERSON.

No. 39.....

WAR COMPETITION.

No. 5.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

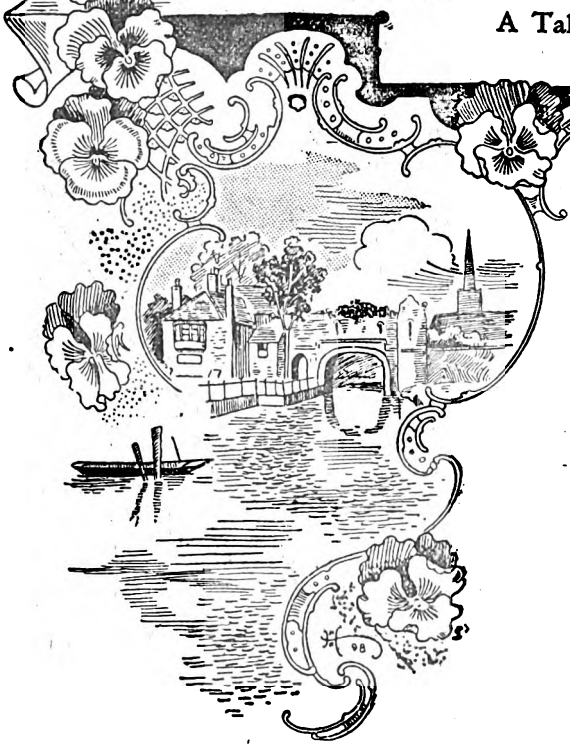
PLACE.

No. 40.....

Digitized by Google

THE HORSEMAN IN THE AIR.

A Tale of the American Civil War.



ONE sunny afternoon in the autumn of the year 1861, a soldier lay in a clump of laurel by the side of a road in Western Virginia. He lay at full length upon his chest, his feet resting upon the toes, his head upon his left forearm. His extended left hand loosely grasped his rifle. But for the somewhat methodical disposition of his limbs, and a slight regular movement of the cartridge box at the back of his belt, he might have been thought to be dead. But he was asleep at his post of duty, and if detected would be dead shortly afterwards.

The clump of laurels in which the criminal lay was in an angle of the road, which, after ascending southward a steep aclivity for two miles, turned sharply to the west at that point, running along the summit for perhaps fifty yards. There it turned southward again, and went zigzagging downward through the forest. At the point of that second angle was a large flat rock, jutting out from the ridge to the northward, overlooking the deep valley from which the road descended. The rock capped a high cliff; a stone dropped from its outer edge would have fallen sheer down one thousand feet on to the top of the pines. The soldier's station was on another spur of the same cliff. Had he been awake he would have commanded a view, not only of the short arm of the road and the jutting rock, but of the entire profile of the cliff below it. It might well have made him giddy to look.

The country was wooded everywhere, except at the bottom of the valley to the northward, where there was a small natural meadow, through which flowed a stream scarcely visible from the valley's rim. This open ground looked hardly larger than an ordinary house-yard, but was really many acres in extent. Its green was more vivid than that of the inclosing forest. Away beyond it rose a line of giant cliffs, similar to those upon which we are supposed to stand in our survey of the scene, and through which the road has somehow made its climb to the summit. The configuration of the valley, indeed, was such, that from our point of observation, it seemed entirely shut in, and one could not but have wondered how the road which found a way out of it, had found a way into it, and whence came and whither went the stream that parted the meadow two thousand feet below.

No country is so wild and difficult, but men will make it a theatre of war; concealed in the forest at the bottom of that military rat-trap, in which half a hundred men in possession of the exits might have starved an army to submission, lay five regiments of Federal infantry. They had marched all the previous day and night, and were resting. At nightfall they would take to the road again, climb to the place where their unfaithful sentinel now slept, and, descending the other slope of the ridge, fall upon a camp of the enemy at about midnight. Their hope was to surprise him, for the road led to the rear of his camp. In case of failure their position would be perilous in the extreme; and fail they would were accident or vigilance to apprise him of the movement.

The sleeping sentinel in the clump of laurels was a young Virginian, named Carter Druse. He was the son of wealthy parents—an only child—and had known such luxury and civilisation as wealth and taste were able to command in the mountain country of Western Virginia thirty years ago. His home was but a few miles from where he now lay. One morning he rose from the breakfast-table and said quietly, but gravely:

"Father, a Union regiment has arrived at Grafton. I am going to join it."

The father lifted his head, looked at his son a moment in silence, and replied:

"Go, Carter, and whatever may happen I hope that you will do what you conceive to be your duty. Should we both live to the end of the war, we will speak further of the matter. Your mother, as the physician has informed you, is in a critical condition; at the best she cannot be with us longer than a few weeks, but that time is precious. It would be better not to disturb her."

Digitized by Google

So Carter Druse, bowing reverently to his father, who returned the salute with stately courtesy, left the home of his childhood to go soldiering. By conscience and courage, by deeds of devotion and daring, he soon commended himself to his fellows and his officers, and it was to these qualities and to some knowledge of the country that he owed his present perilous duty at the extreme outpost. Nevertheless, fatigue had been stronger than resolution, and he had fallen asleep.

What good or bad angel came in a dream to rouse him from his state of crime, who shall say? Without a movement, without a sound, in the profound silence of the late afternoon, some invisible messenger of Fate touched with unsealing finger the eyes of his consciousness—whispered into the ear of his spirit the mysterious awakening word which no human lips have ever spoken, no human memory has ever recalled. He quietly raised his forehead from his arm and looked between the laurels, instinctively closing his right hand about the stock of his rifle.

His first feeling was one of keen artistic delight. On the colossal pedestal of the cliff, motionless, at the extreme edge of the capping rock, sharply outlined against the sky, was an equestrian statue of impressive dignity. The figure of the man sat the figure of the horse, straight and soldierly. The face of the rider, turned slightly to the left, showed only an outline of temple and beard; he was looking downward to the bottom of the valley. Magnified by its lift against the sky, and by the soldier's sense of the formidableness of a near enemy, the group appeared of colossal size.

For an instant Druse had a strange, half-defined feeling that he had slept to the end of the war, and was looking upon a noble work of art reared upon that commanding eminence to commemorate the deeds of a heroic past of which he had been an inglorious part. The feeling was dispelled by a slight movement of the horse, which, without shifting its feet, had drawn its body slightly backward from the verge; the man remaining immobile as before. Wide awake, and keenly alive to the significance of the situation, Druse now brought the butt of his rifle against his cheek by cautiously pushing the barrel forward through the bushes, cocked the piece, and, glancing through the sights, covered a vital spot in the horseman's breast. A touch upon the trigger, and all would have been well with Carter Druse. At that instant the horseman turned his head and looked in the direction of his crouching foeman—seemed to look into his very face, into his eyes.

Is it, then, so terrible to kill an enemy in war?—an enemy who has surprised a secret vital to the safety of oneself and one's comrades?—an enemy more formidable for his knowledge than all his army for its numbers? Carter Druse grew deadly pale; he shook in every limb. His hand fell away from his weapon, his head slowly dropped until his face rested on the leaves in which he lay. This courageous and hardy soldier was nearer to swooning from intensity of emotion and excitement.

It was not for long; in another moment his face was raised; his hands resumed their places on the rifle; his forefinger sought the trigger. Mind, heart, and eyes were clear, conscience and reason found. He could not hope to capture that enemy; to alarm him would but send him dashing to his camp with his fatal news. The duty of the soldier was plain; the man must be shot dead from ambush—without warning, without a moment's preparation, with never so much as an unspoken prayer he must be sent to his account.

But no—there is a hope; he may have discovered nothing—perhaps he is admiring the sublimity of the landscape. If permitted, he may turn and ride carelessly away in the direction whence he came. Surely it will be possible to judge at the instant of his withdrawing whether he knows. Druse turned his head and looked down. Below he saw creeping across the green meadow a sinuous line of the figures of men and horses—some foolish commander was permitting the men of his escort to water their horses in the open—in plain view from a hundred summits.

Druse withdrew his eyes from the valley and fixed them again upon the group of man and horse in the sky, and again it was through the sights of his rifle. He was calm now. His teeth were firmly but not rigidly closed; his nerves were as tranquil as a sleeping babe's—not a tremor affected any muscle of his body; his breathing, until suspended in the act of taking aim, was regular and slow. Duty had silenced conscience; the spirit had said to the body, "Be still." He fired.

* * * * *

At this moment an officer of the Federal force, who, in the spirit of adventure or in quest of knowledge, had left the hidden bivouac in the valley, and, climbing the slope, had made his way to the lower edge of a small open space near the foot of the cliff, was considering what he had to gain by pushing his exploration farther. At the distance of a quarter-mile before him, but apparently at a stone's throw, rose from its fringes of pines the gigantic face of rock, towering to so great a height above that it made him giddy to look up to where its edge cut a sharp, rugged line against the sky. Lifting his eyes to the dizzy altitude of its summit, the officer saw an astonishing sight—a man on horseback riding down into the valley through the air.

Straight upward sat the rider, in military fashion, with a firm seat in the saddle, a strong clutch upon the rein to hold his charger from too impetuous a plunge. From his bare head his long hair streamed upward, waving like a plume. His right hand was concealed in the cloud of the horse's lifted mane. The animal's body was as level as if every hoof stroke encountered the resistent earth. Its motions were those of a wild gallop, but even as the officer looked they ceased, with all the legs thrown sharply forward as in the act of alighting from a leap. But this was a flight.

The officer was filled with amazement and terror by this apparition of a horseman in the air. Almost at the same instant he heard a crashing sound in the trees—a sound that died without an echo, and all was still. Pulling himself together he ran rapidly obliquely backward from the cliff to a point a half-mile from its foot. Thereabout he expected to find his man; and he naturally failed. In the fleeting instant of his vision his imagination had been so wrought upon by the apparent grace and ease and intention of the horse and rider, that it did not occur to him that the line of march of aerial cavalry must necessarily be directly downward, and that he would find the object of his search at the very foot of the cliff. An hour later he returned to camp.

This officer was a wise man; he knew better than to tell an incredible truth. He said nothing of what he had seen.

* * * * *

After firing his shot, Private Carter Druse reloaded

Digitized by Google

his rifle and resumed his watch. Ten minutes had hardly passed when a Federal sergeant crept cautiously to him on hands and knees. Druse neither turned his head nor looked at him, but lay without motion or sign of recognition.

"Did you fire?" the sergeant whispered.

"Yes."

"At what?"

"A horse. It was standing on yonder rock—pretty far out. You see it is no longer there. I am a great marksman; you know I once shot a match with Washington's ghost and beat him."

The sergeant was shocked and startled. He looked searchingly at Druse. The man's face was white; his eyes were restless, and glittered with a strange, uncanny light. The sergeant, still on hands and knees, involuntarily backed a little way from him.

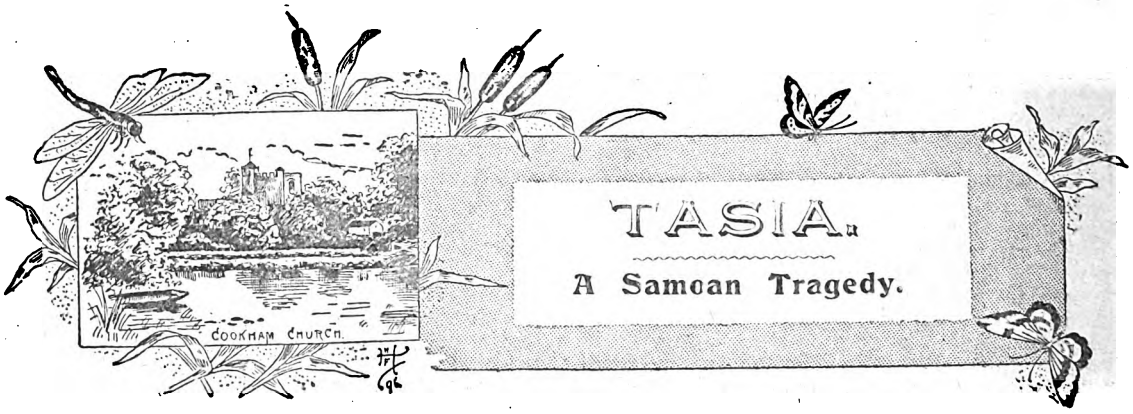
"Look here, Druse," he said, after a moment's silence, "it's no use making a mystery. I order you to report. Was there anybody—anybody at all—except the horse?"

"Yes."

"Who?"

"My father."

The sergeant rose to his feet, and walked rapidly down the road towards the valley. H. T. P.



I HAD stopped for a day or two at the town of Apia on my way back to my home at Satu, far away from Apian civilisation. I had strayed in the direction of the little building that does duty for a police-court, and curiosity impelled me to enter.

At a shabby little desk sat a young Englishman, who was acting as magistrate; in front stood a native constable in charge of a female prisoner.

She was a fine, well-built woman. Her costume consisted only of a scanty white garment, which had probably belonged to some European lady. She had a necklace of red berries, and her jet-black hair—which reached down to her waist—was adorned with red blossoms.

"Back again, Tasia?" asked the magistrate kindly.

"Tofa, my fieni," sang the prisoner in the most unconcerned manner. The crowd of brown-skinned natives, inside and outside the court-house, laughed merrily. The magistrate had some difficulty in preserving fitting judicial gravity.

The words formed part of a Samoan song, which, although of recent introduction, could be heard in any part of the group of islands. They mean "Good-bye, my friend," and the song was an expression of regret at the departure of a friend, but was sung on any occasion when a pretext could be found for singing it.

"She's been like that for a week, night and day, Alii," explained the constable. "She makes such a noise that her relatives won't have her in the house."

Considering that the Samoans are the most vociferous of people, this was rather a strong condemnation. The magistrate looked puzzled; there was no charge against the woman, the constable had taken her to the court because he did not know what to do with her. After having reflected, the magistrate decided to commit her to prison for a month for disorderly conduct.

"She will be well treated among the women," he explained, "and by that time her relatives may relent."

When I returned to Satu, I told a friend of mine, an old trader, the incident of the police-court at Apia, among other events of my journey.

"So you saw Tasia, did you?" he said with a smile. "Poor Tasia!"

I was not surprised that he knew the woman; he knew everybody.

"What is the matter with her?" I asked. "There is some story connected with her, I am certain, and I have no doubt that you know it. I should like to hear it."

"There is a story, and I will tell it to you," he replied, settling back in his rough chair. "It goes back to the time of the civil war among the Samoans—not many years ago, either. Apia was rather different then; you could have seen war parties marching through the town with the heads of slain enemies in their hands! Firing was going on everywhere, and occasionally a bullet from the bush just outside the town would come whizzing through the streets in a most unpleasant manner.

"But there were not many killed. The Samoans fired at anything that happened to be in front of them, whether it was a man's head or the trunk of a tree; but, as they scarcely ever hit the mark at which they aimed, the number killed by bullets was very small. There was a good deal of noise about their battles, but you couldn't exactly call them sanguinary; they had no idea of straight shooting.

"Tasia was not much of a beauty; but she was plump

Digitized by Google

CORPULENCY THE THIEF OF TIME.
RAPID METHOD OF BANISHING SUPERABUNDANT FAT.

That procrastination is the Thief of Time is a truism so obvious that it has no claim to be regarded as an epigram. To more practical purpose it may be urged that Corpulency is, in very many cases, the parent of procrastination. The putting off till to-morrow what can be done to-day certainly becomes a mental habit, but it is unquestionably very frequently begotten by physical conditions which render exertion irksome. That in the majority of cases procrastination is easily curable is one of the considerations suggested by a perusal of Mr. F. Cecil Russell's "Corpulency, and the Cure," whose remarkable popularity is evidenced by the recent issue of the 18th edition. The enormous mass of correspondence which this expert has accumulated, and many extracts from which are included in the 256 pages of this little book, forms the most valuable addition which has yet been made to the literature of obesity. It is specially notable that a very large proportion of Mr. Russell's correspondents who have undergone his course of treatment for the reduction of obesity emphasise the renewed vigour which they have experienced after passing through the process —a wonderfully rapid one, according to this method— of banishing their superabundant fat. The universal adoption of Mr. Russell's system by corpulent persons of both sexes would increase, by a stupendous percentage, the working capacity of mankind. The rapidly-growing popularity of the treatment is due, doubtless, to the author having discarded all the obsolete notions about semi-starvation being requisite to ensure comely and comfortable slimness. It is certain that the more the marvellous possibilities of Mr. Russell's system become known, the less will be the tolerance for the laziness of people who decline to reduce their overweight by the pleasant and facile means which are described in this little book, which can be had, post free, by forwarding three penny stamps to Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.—Liverpool Daily Mercury.

A POSITIVE REMEDY FOR CORPULENCE.
A SPANISH COUNT REDUCES HIS WEIGHT 34LB. IN 22 DAYS.

Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. There has recently been issued a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled, "Corpulency, and the Cure" (256 pages), and is a cheap issue (only threepence), published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. It appears that Mr. Russell has submitted all kinds of proofs to the English Press. The editor of the Tablet, the Catholic organ, writes: "Mr. Russell does not give us the slightest loophole for a doubt as to the value of his cure, for in the most straightforward and matter-of-fact manner he submitted some hundreds of original and unsolicited testimonial letters for our perusal, and offered us plenty more if required. To assist him to make this remedy known, we think we cannot do better than publish quotations from some of the letters submitted. The first one, a marchioness, writes from Madrid — 'My son, Count ——, has reduced his weight in twenty-two days 16 kilos=i.e., 34lb.' Another writes—'So far (six weeks from the commencement of following your system) I have lost fully two stone in weight.' The next (a lady) writes—'I am just half the size.' A fourth—'I find it is successful in my case. I have lost 8lb. in weight since I commenced (two weeks).' Another writes—'A reduction of 18lb. in a month is a great success.' A lady from Bournemouth writes—'I feel much better, have less difficulty in breathing, and can walk about.' Again, a lady says—'It reduced me considerably, not only in body, but all over.'" The author is very positive. He says—"Step on a weighing machine on Monday morning and again on Tuesday, and I guarantee that you have lost 2lb. in weight without the slightest harm, and vast improvement in health through ridding the system of unhealthy accumulations." — Cork Herald.

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS IN THE TREATMENT OF OBESITY

Our corpulent readers will be glad to learn how to positively lose two stone in about a month with the greatest possible benefit in health, strength and muscle, by a comparatively new system. It is a singular paradox that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto, yet notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one or two pounds daily, as the weighing-machine will prove. Thus there is no suggestion of starvation. It is an undoubted success, and the author, who has devoted years of study to the subject, guarantees a noticeable reduction within twenty-four hours of commencing the treatment. This is different with other diseases, for the patient in some cases may go for weeks without being able to test whether the physician has rightly treated him, and may have derived no real or apparent improvement in health. Here, we repeat, the author guarantees it in twenty-four hours, the scale to be the unerring recorder. The treatment aims at the actual root of the disease, so that the superfluous fat does not return when discontinuing the treatment. It is perfectly harmless. We advise our readers to call the attention of stout friends to this, because, sincerely, we think they ought to know. For their information we may say that on sending three penny stamps, a book entitled "Corpulency, and the Cure" (256 pages), containing a reprint of press notices from some hundreds of medical and other journals (British and Foreign) and other interesting particulars, including the "recipe," can be had from a Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.—Extract from The Belfast News Letter.

Digitized by Google

and obliging, and, as she was the adopted daughter of a chief, she was of some importance.

"I was in Apia at the time of the trouble, helping in my friend's shop; we were very busy supplying the natives with salt beef and other things. Tasia used to come in the shop to buy various articles, and as I was always obliging—and an old man—she became very friendly with me, and used to tell me all about the warfare.

"Our friendship grew stronger, and sometimes when the shop was closed I went to the house where her father lived—I mean where he lived when he wasn't away fighting.

"Before the war broke out, Tasia had been engaged to an Aana chief. Everything was settled, and the two young people thought they were on the high road to happiness, when the internal trouble began. The result was that Tasia's betrothed was forced to fight against her people, and the chance of marriage became very remote.

"But that was not all. Tasia was afraid that her father and her betrothed would meet in some skirmish, which would mean the certain death of one. Her father, forgetful of Tasia's feelings, had vowed that he would decorate his door-post with the head of Inasi; while the latter had assured the weeping girl, at one of their secret meetings in the bush, that her father's head would undoubtedly become the trophy of one of their young chiefs. Her father was a great chief and a powerful opponent of the rebels, and the young warriors burnt with a desire to obtain his head.

"When I saw poor Tasia the next time, she had grown quite thin with grief. I tried to cheer her up. She burst into tears and confided her trouble to me.

"'If Inasi should kill my father,' she sobbed, 'he can never marry me. There would be a feud of blood between the families. And my father is already talking of marrying me to the chief of Malie.'

"In the rebel camp, Inasi was getting into hot water because he would not give up his love for Tasia. He was willing to fight against her people, that was his duty; but he was not bound to give up his love for his betrothed—he could not do it, he said.

"There was one thing lacking to complete Inasi's claim to the dignity of a bold warrior; he had not brought in a head. He had been in many skirmishes, and had fired off his gun so rapidly that the barrel had grown too hot to hold; but, although he may have killed some of the enemy, he had never brought home a head in triumph. The younger men began to sneer at him, and even the older ones became very serious about it.

"'Inasi has in his veins,' remarked an old chief at a council, 'the blood of our great ancestor Tooaau, who swam on a stick from Fiji to these islands. None of the race has ever before shown a lack of courage.'

"Inasi could not explain that he did not strive for the head of one of his enemies, lest it might be the head of Tolua, Tasia's father. But the shrewd old men understood how it was, and they finally hit upon a plan which would serve two ends. They called him before them.

"'Inasi,' the leader said, 'it is time that you proved your courage. It is our will that you bring us the head of our great enemy, Tolua. He is a foeman worthy of your steel!'

"Inasi's heart sank within him, but he knew that he must obey. Henceforth, however, life would have no joy or hope for him.

"The great battle took place, and the rebels were driven off. In the evening I went down to Tasia's home, where there was a great gathering of blood-stained warriors.

"I will not harrow your feelings with details of the ghastly trophies. I half closed my eyes as I made my way to Tasia, who sat in a corner, sad and silent, making the kava. That was a duty which devolved upon her as maiden of the family.

"'What is the matter, Tasia?' I asked.

"'My heart is heavy with a double burden,' she replied. 'My father has not returned from the battle; and I can hear no news of Inasi, save that he fought bravely, and slew many of our warriors.'

"Shortly afterwards a fitful blaze of the cocoa-nut shell fire illumined the interior, and I saw a dusky hand thrust through the matted side of the house. A round, reddened object was thrown violently into the circle of boasting chiefs.

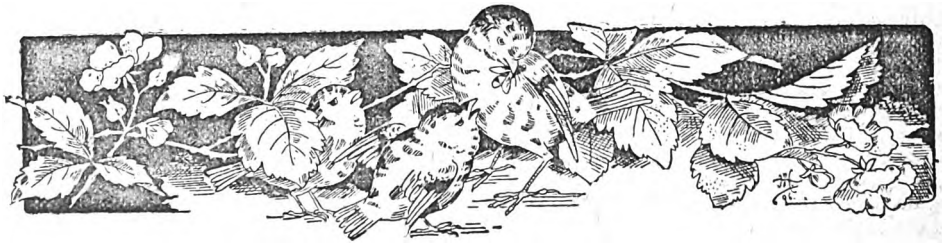
"'Inasi's last alofa to Tasia,' cried a loud voice.

"There was a sudden silence. Then the Samoans sprang to their feet, and rushed into the darkness in search of the intruder, leaving me alone with Tasia.

"The object had rolled along the floor, and stopped in front of the maiden. I looked at the thing, and a shiver went through me. I turned my eyes to Tasia. I had recognised the head of Tolua.

"She was gazing at it in horror. She did not scream; she did not utter a sound of any kind; but her hands dropped helplessly into her lap. The shock upset her reason, and she has never uttered a sensible word since.

"The same night a gunshot was heard within the rebel lines, and Inasi was found lying beside his rifle, which had rendered him this last service." G. D.



Digitized by Google

You Can't Afford——

to be without

Antiseptic.
Pure.
Preserves Food and Milk.
Stops Smells.
Arrests Decay.
Purifies everything.
Invaluable for the Bath and Toilet.
For Rinsing and Cleansing.

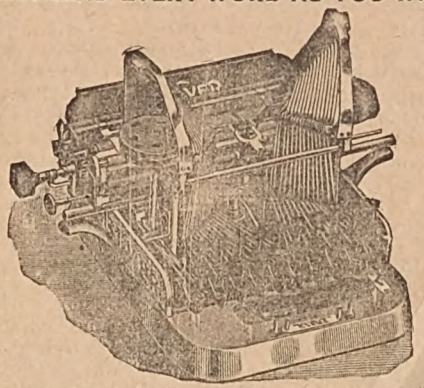
By Special Appointment

Makers to Her Majesty.

THE PATENT BORAX CO. LTD., LADYWOOD, BIRMINGHAM.
LONDON DEPOT: 129 HIGH HOLBORN.
Grocers, Oilmen, and Stores keep it

THE OLIVER TYPEWRITER.

YOU CAN READ EVERY WORD AS YOU WRITE IT.



It is a Machine adapted by its simplicity and rapidity to the most arduous requirements of mercantile, literary, or professional uses. At the same time it is the simplest in construction, and the most easy to operate.

EXCELS ANY TYPEWRITING MACHINE IN THE WORLD.

Wholesale and Export Agents: James Spicer and Sons, London and Branches; Waterlow and Sons Ltd., London and Branches; Thomas Turner Ltd., Leicester and London; Pawson and Brailsford, Sheffield; Cartwright and Rattray Ltd., Manchester and London; Benr se and Sons Ltd., Derby and London; R. Hodgkinson, 4 Bell's Buildings, South John Street, Liverpool; Henry D. and C. Tapp, Charles Street, Bradford. Also for sale by the Army and Navy Stores Ltd., Westminster, London, S.W., and all first-class Stationers

AGENTS WANTED, exceptional terms given, in all towns where not represented. An excellent opportunity to make money. Chief European Offices: Walbrook House, Walbrook, London, E.C. Send for our Twenty-five business reasons, showing why the Oliver excels all other standard machines.

An Elastic Bookcase!

A Living Bookcase that Grows with your Needs!

Always Complete! Never Finished!

Showing Case built round a Pillar.

The Wernicke Patent Elastic Bookcase System is the only perfect System invented. You can commence in one corner of the room with a case large enough for ten books, and this can be expanded upwards or sideways to any extent: the "Wernicke" Bookcase is thus never too large and never too small.

ADVANTAGES.—Gradual Expense—Dust-proof Glass Doors—Any Corner can be fitted—Cases can be Built Square or round a Pillar—Protection of Books—Portability — Elegance — Utility—Economy, etc.

The Purchaser incurs no liability unless absolutely satisfied with the goods.

Special Illustrated No. 61 Catalogue, fully explaining the above, posted free to any Readers of "Short Stories."

THOS. TURNER Ltd. (Leicester).
44 HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.
7 and 9 NEWARKE STREET, LEICESTER.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

Digitized by Google

LAST WRITTEN . . . . . FIRST READ.

All attempts in the great War Competition must be sent in by Tuesday next, June 14th. If you cannot solve all the pictures, do your best, for the prizes go to those who are most nearly correct, if no one gets the whole lot right. At the same time I should like to suggest that you inclose with your attempt a trifle for the Fresh Air Fund. A shilling postal order you won't miss very much, and it will more than cover all the expenses of a child's outing for one day. It is a good opportunity for you to show your generosity.

H. M. asks: "Which novel has had the largest sale during the last century?" ——— "Robinson Crusoe," by Daniel Defoe, published in 1719, and which is even now as popular as ever. Next in popularity come the Waverley novels, by Sir Walter Scott.

A. B. C.—Aerated bread is bread not fermented with yeast, but mechanically charged with carbonic acid gas.

Dolphin writes: "Can you tell me how to make an Æolian harp?" ——— Stretch eight or ten catgut strings of varying thickness, all tuned in unison, over a wooden shell or box, and place it in such a position that the wind would be able to pass between the strings. The sounds produced by the rising and falling of the wind in passing over the strings will be of a drowsy and lulling character.

G. H.—The original meaning of the word "insect" implies a division in the middle, like an ant. The meaning, however, has been extended, for it includes spiders, which have no division in the middle.

Bay.—According to those people engaged in the corn trade, twenty per cent. more bread is consumed in cold weather than when it is mild.

R. G.—Yes, the Queen has the right to pardon a condemned person of her own free will without consulting anyone, but although the right exists, according to constitutional usage, it is never exercised without the advice of the Home Secretary.

A. T.—The sound of the human voice can be heard at a great distance in the Arctic regions. Captain Parry states that he often heard the voices of persons conversing in an ordinary tone at the distance of a mile. It is evident that, even putting aside other inconveniences, the North would be quite unsuitable for a honeymoon trip.

E. A.—It certainly is not correct to write upon a post-card a communication requiring an answer. Probably that is the reason you did not receive one.

Dilemma.—The British Navy is certainly far ahead of any other nation so far as the number of its torpedo-boat destroyers are concerned, having no fewer than ninety-seven, whereas Russia, who comes second in this respect, only possesses twenty-nine, and France comes third with eighteen.

W. S. T. asks: "Is it correct to call the lucky owner of ten millions a 'billionaire'?" ——— No; that is quite a wrong idea. In order to be a billionaire a man would have to possess a million millions.

Pumice Stone.—The bulk of this material comes from the Lipari Islands, and the trade in it was done almost exclusively from Leghorn. But the islands are nearer to Sicily, and Messina is wresting the trade from Leghorn. By their activity the people of the latter place secured for themselves several industries which could have been done better from some other town; now, in the general awakening of Italy, the Livornesi are losing them. The price of pumice stone varies; as much as £30 per ton has been paid for the superior kinds.

Fair, Fat, and Forty.—The average length of a person's life in this country is about forty-three. Do not be alarmed, however. Remember the average is brought down considerably by the tremendous mortality amongst infants.

L. K.—The estimated number of blind persons in Europe is 302,000 in round figures. Of these, 192,000 are subjects of the Tsar; that is, one out of every 500.

Gold.—Some years ago a number of careful experiments were made to ascertain the loss by wear in coins of the realm during a given period. The conclusions arrived at included the following. In 100 years a like number of sovereigns lost £3 9s. 8½d. of their value, while in £100 of half-crowns the loss was £13 11s. 8½d. I give these details on the authority of other people; such few sovereigns and half-crowns as find their way into the editorial possession do not stay there long enough to enable me to make any reliable experiment on my own account.

S. S.—Sedan chairs were first seen in England in 1581, but it was not until sixty years later that they came into general use. One used in the reign of James I. by the Duke of Buckingham caused great indignation, and the people exclaimed that he was employing his fellow creatures to do the work of beasts. In 1634 Sir Francis Duncomb obtained the sole privilege to use, let and hire a number of such covered chairs for fourteen years.

F. A. R.—No, the Queen has never visited any of her colonies, nor any part of Asia, Africa, or America.

B. N.—The delicious drink known as "pulque" is obtained from a plant called maquez. It grows in the uplands of Mexico, 7,000 feet above the sea level, and it is also found in the plains near Apam, about sixty miles from the city of Mexico. One plant will yield about twelve pints a day. A legend concerning pulque is to the effect that it was first extracted by a Toltec of the royal blood, who, wishing to obtain favour in the king's eyes, sent him a quantity by the hand of his daughter. The king tasted the drink, and was so delighted with it that he graciously consented to keep the quantity sent; he also decided to keep the daughter. It is to be hoped that the Toltec obtained the favourable notice which he desired.

Left.—In fifty-four cases out of 100 the left leg is stronger than the right: Which shows that when you are told to put your best foot forward, the left foot is the right one for the purpose.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0	10	0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10	0	0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5	0	0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ,, ...	2	10	0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ,, ...	1	5	0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12	10	0
,, half	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, June 14th, if intended for the Issue on sale June 28th, and dated July 2nd. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Notice to Competitors.

In all Prize Competitions the Editor's decision is final. No correspondence will be entertained when once a competition is finished and the result published.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

HOME DYEING.

MAYPOLE DYES ANY SOAP COLOUR

CLEAN AND QUICK.

NO MESS. NO TROUBLE.

WON'T WASH OUT OR FADE.

ALL COLOURS. 4d. per Tablet. BLACK, 6d.

An ILLUSTRATED NOVELETTE, "Three Daughters of Eve," a Charming Book of Nursery Rhymes, in Colours, an ILLUSTRATED BOOKLET, "Seven Ages of Woman," with Specimen Card of Colours on Satin. Sent Post Free upon receipt of address.

Free Advice given upon Home Dyeing by letter. State plainly your requirement, and when possible enclose a small piece of the material you wish to dye.

THE MAYPOLE CO. LIMITED, 98 & 99 HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. Taylor, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

From Rev. J. H. Burn. Deer Rectory, Mintlaw, Aberdeen, November 8th, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

Digitized by Google

'NOW I LAY ME DOWN TO SLEEP.'

This little prayer of our childhood, so simple, so direct, so full of unquestioning faith: what an innumerable multitude of children have said it at their mother's knee for generations out of mind, what a white-robed host of them are saying it now—night after night as bed-time comes round.

Lots of us oldsters, whose heads are grizzled and grey this New Year's Eve, remember when this tender petition was taught us as though it were but yesterday. In fact, I hope we are not ashamed to repeat it now. The great American statesman, Daniel Webster, never laid his head upon the pillow without having first uttered aloud this infant orison, "Now I lay me down to sleep."

And—so far at least as concerns the children—they do sleep. Not a quiver in their healthy nerves, no haunting persistence of the day's troubles, no fear for any the morning may bring. They do what they lay themselves down to do—they sleep.

But when one lays himself down and cannot sleep; when, the mind being full of thought, every faculty remains at "Attention!" like a file of soldiers on drill; or when Pain fills the bed with thorns—ah then there is another tale to tell. Whistle for your dog and he comes; whistle for Sleep and he mocks you as he flies away.

Preliminary to sound and healthful sleep there must be at least five conditions: First, fatigue of the nervous system; second, certain changes in the state of the blood; third, a cessation of all things which stimulate the nerves; fourth, an exhaustion of the attention; fifth, freedom from pain.

Now here we have Mr. Hunt, of Derby, telling us that for a long time together he was often obliged to leave his bed in the night and walk about the room. When we ask him why, he answers with the following letter:

"For many years," he says, "I suffered from indigestion and dyspepsia. I had no relish for my meals, and after eating, was taken with pain about the chest and shoulders. I was constantly belching up a sour acid fluid, my food turning sour on my stomach. I was frequently so bad in the night with pain that I had to get up and walk about the room. I was never laid up with my ailment, but never free from pain. For years I continued like this, the doctors' and others' medicines doing me no good. One day I read in a book about Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. I got a bottle of this medicine from Mr. Roe, Temple Street, and after taking it found much benefit. I persevered with it and all the pain and discomfort left me. Since then, by taking an occasional dose, I keep free from my old complaint. You can publish this statement as you think fit. (Signed) E. Hunt, 3 Provident Street, Derby, November 27th, 1896."

"The people of America," says an eminent physician of that country, "have already gained for themselves the reputation of being a nation of dyspeptics; they are fast becoming a nation of poor sleepers. Indeed, dyspepsia and insomnia are quite commonly associated in the same individual."

There you have it in a fistful of words. Our friend Mr. Hunt lost his sleep because he was unable to digest his food. A double loss, as you will see. A loss of sleep and a loss of the strength he would had were it not for the perverted state of things in his stomach which transformed his bread and meat into forces that tortured him and threatened his life. A fearful sleep-killer is this same old dyspepsia. It cares nothing for all your cries and prayers. Men and women have committed suicide in the mental wildness and delirium produced by it. It tears the nerves as a tiger's claws might shred the skin.

One point now, and mark it well. If you suffer from the insomnia of dyspepsia don't take opium in any form; don't take the tempting bromides; don't take any drugs to make you sleep, for they merely cause dull unconsciousness, stupor—but not physiological sleep. Let 'em all alone. Take Mother Seigel's Syrup, which will cure the digestive trouble, and then, when you lay yourself down to sleep, you may enter that soft oblivion wherein Nature repairs the losses of the day—even as it is with little children.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 494. FOR WEEK ENDING JUNE 18TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

"FROMMS"

"A COMPLETE FOOD" LANCET

FROMMS EXTRACT OF PURELY VEGETABLE ORIGIN

PHYSICIANS AND SCIENTISTS REPORT THAT

FROMMS EXTRACT IS A PERFECT FOOD FOR INFANTS AND INVALIDS AS WELL AS FOR THE STRONG AND HEALTHY.

HALF THE PRICE OF MEAT EXTRACTS.

SOLD BY CHEMISTS AND GROCERS

10/6 COSTUMES. 10/6

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

SOLE MAKERS OF THE

"Alfosco" Costumes.

These charming Costumes are recommended by thousands of delighted customers, who acknowledge them to be greatly superior in make, style, and value, to any costumes they have ever seen at anything approaching the same prices.

ALLEN FOSTER & Co. have gained their pre-eminence among the costumiers of the world by combining the Highest Standard of Excellence with the lowest possible prices.

Design No. 885. Half-a-Guinea.—A Costume any lady can wear. Made in the world-renowned Specialite Serge—all colours. The bodice is shaped to the figure and very prettily designed. It has a pleated front, and trimmed with a frill of cloth carried over the shoulders, and large fancy buttons. The bodice and sleeves are lined. The skirt is cut full and fashionably. Costume complete, 10/6. Skirt alone, 5/6. This design is also made in the lightweight Venetian Cloth for 13/6.

Write at once for PATTERNS and PARTICULARS.

Design No. 847. Design No. 885.

THE "ALFOSCO" COSTUMES ARE UTTERLY UNRIVALLED ALL THE WORLD OVER.

ALL PATTERNS AND PARTICULARS POST FREE.

Design No. 847.—Design No. 847 is in the Chesterfield shape; a splendid costume for 10/6, made in the Specialite Serge. This design made in White Piqué, or Drill, will be 12/6. Patterns and Sketches Post Free.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO. are offering some very good bargains in Costume Skirts, in Tweeds, plain and fancy Alpacas, Mohairs, Serges, etc.; also some good lines in Ladies' Knickers. Regular Stock Sizes of Costumes are 34, 36, and 38 inches round bust (under arms), the skirts being 38, 40, and 42 inches long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra. Each costume securely packed, and sent carriage paid, 6d. extra; skirt only, 5d. extra. Please mention Short Stories.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., The London Manufacturers,
17 ROSCOE ST., GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

THE John Noble

HOME, HOLIDAY, AND

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

(Highest Value for Money)

Are supplied in the following two good cloths:

I. John Noble Costume Coating, and in II. John Noble Cheviot Serge.

PATTERNS and New Illustrated 84 page Catalogue of Fashions and Fabrics SENT POST FREE to all who name Short Stories.

THE NEW "GORDON" COSTUME. Model 894.

New design, with well-cut bodice, trimmed fancy stitching, à l'Ecosse, Tailor-made Skirt, full wide. Price 10/6 complete. Safely packed and carriage paid 6d. extra. Skirt alone, 5/6. Carriage, 5d.

JOHN NOBLE KNOCK-ABOUT FROCKS.

Thoroughly well made, with saddle top, long full sleeves and pocket.

Lengths and Prices:
21	24	27	30 in.
1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-
33	36	39	42 in.
3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-

Postage 4d. extra.

COLOURS of all Costumes: Black, Navy, Electric, Brown, Ruby, Myrtle, Fawn, Grey, Sage Green and Purple.

SIZES IN STOCK are 34, 36, and 38in. round bust (under arms). Skirts being 38, 40, and 42in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra. Mourning Orders executed and despatched within twelve hours.

Please mention SHORT STORIES when ordering.

Bankers: London & Midland Bank Ltd.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook Street Mills,

MANCHESTER.

For SNOW White LINEN ALWAYS BUY

NIXEY'S BLUE

FLANNELETTE BAGS READY FOR USE.

LARGE PENNY BAGS.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps.

ALEX. ROSS,

62, Theobald's Road, London.

Opposite Bedford Row. (Est. 1850.)

Parcel free from observation

SILVER QUEEN CYCLES!

Best Value on Earth. Immense stock of Ladies' and Gents' machines. New and Secondhand. Wonderful bargains. Carriage paid. Easy payments from 10s. monthly, or large cash discount. 1 year's guarantee. Illus. price lists post free on application. Old cycles exchanged The SILVER QUEEN CYCLE Co. Ltd., 221 Tottenham Court Road, London.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Bldgs., London, W.C.

Invested Funds, £10,000,000.

Particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

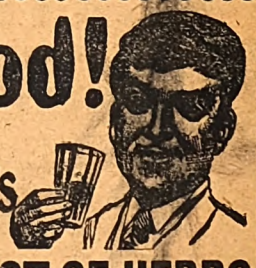
Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MAKE PRIME BEER AT HOME

Good! it's Mason's



EXTRACT OF HERBS

6D. BOTTLE MAKES 8 GALLONS

NON-INTOXICATING BEER

The most palatable refreshing tonic drink producible.

IMITATED but NOT EQUALLED

Of all Chemists and Stores. Also try Mason's Wine Essences and Mason's Coffee Essence. Sample bottle of either of above post FREE for 9d. Two, assorted, 1s. 3d.; Three, assorted, 1s. 8d. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

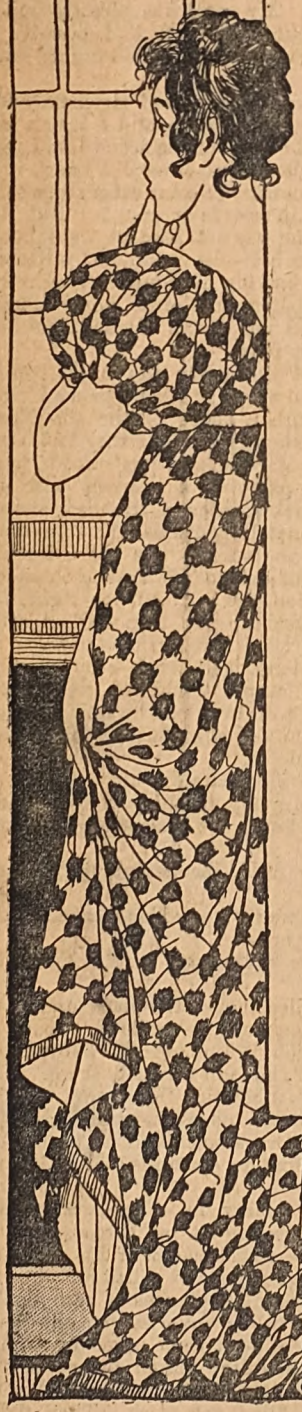
The BEST BEVERAGE for YOUR MEALS.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 494. ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending June 18th, 1898.



- TWO - MIDNIGHT DUELS.

"TO-NIGHT," said Trethowan, leaning back in his chair, "is the twelfth anniversary of the most horrible affair I ever had the misfortune to be drawn into. At any rate, to me it was horrible; doubtless there are men who would go through it without dreaming such awful dreams as I did for months afterwards.

"I was in with rather a wild set during my student days in Paris. Although we worked hard, we lived as fast as our resources would permit. Certainly, there were few luxurious vices in our list of follies. Amongst us was a Bordelais who was studying anatomical drawing under Mallesherbe. He was a quiet fellow, one of the melancholy sort; tall, awkward, thin, with straight black hair, but with the finest grey eyes I have ever seen in a man, and clear-cut lips that, in parting, showed white, perfect teeth. He was far from handsome; altogether a man to excite a smile at first, but afterwards, to compel one's admiration.

"We called him by no other name than 'The Bordelais,' and that term must do now, for, as you will understand, I cannot in honour disclose his identity. He and I became to a certain extent friendly—that is to say, we frequented the same brasserie, visited each other occasionally, and, as far as possible, worked together.

"There was one man we met very often—Jules de Cassagnac, a man whom we both detested. He was gentlemanly enough in manner, fascinating, accomplished, but what little I knew of his real life would not bear public scrutiny. In short, he was a type of those polished, educated blackguards who spare neither man nor woman in their search for gain and pleasure.

Edited By G. Arthur Pearson

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"As I have said, his record was black even for the Rue des Écoles, but he found most of us willing to shelve it for the sake of his agreeable society and sparkling conversation. And he had not that fault that is worse than a crime to the wild students of Paris—meanness. In fact, he was rather too fond of the rôle of 'Le Grand Seigneur,' and spent his money prodigally.

"Of course, having no personal grievance against the man, neither the Bordelais nor I could be other than polite to him. Even Bohemia has its conventions. And so when Paul Deschamps, one of our best friends, gave his farewell dinner, we naturally accepted the invitation, though we knew De Cassagnac would be there also.

"No need to describe a students' dinner party. You know yourself the laughter and noise, the jests, songs, speeches—the boundless gaiety that springs from the free life and animal spirits of Bohemia, when youth colours everything with the rosy tint of its own swiftly flowing blood.

"We sat late into the night amid the mad enjoyment and uproar. Two o'clock had struck from the tower of St. Sulpice. Deschamps was already asleep in his chair, crowned with an enormous paper cap and robed in serviettes by those about him. Toasts were being drunk, faces were growing flushed and hands unsteady. I heard De Cassagnac's deep voice alternating with another's as they discussed their respective skill with the pistol. As for myself, between the champagne, curacoa, and sweet wines, and the bright eyes of the little grisette next me, I was perfectly happy and oblivious to all but the intoxication of the moment.

"Suddenly there was a lull in the laughter and talk; then a dead silence. I looked up in surprise. All eyes were fixed on the Bordelais. He had risen, his face white as the cloth before us, and was standing as one dazed, clutching a wineglass tightly in his hand. He strove to speak, but only a hoarse murmur came from his dry, colourless lips.

"What had happened, I asked myself; and the suddenness of it sobered me at once. I saw his horrified gaze was fixed on De Cassagnac, who sat perfectly self-possessed with a curious, questioning look on his face.

"The Bordelais slowly drew back his hand, as if to hurl the glass across the table. Then the cold, cynical eyes opposite snapped, and the man's teeth set tightly. He was a duellist to the backbone, and the fighting blood rose and dyed his temples faintly as he awaited the insult. A second or two of suspense, and his lips relaxed into a disdainful smile as the Bordelais replaced the glass, and walking heavily to the door, left the room without a word.

"It was useless to try and ascribe any reason for his actions, and De Cassagnac himself could not, or would not, even guess at the motive for such conduct. In a little time the party gradually thinned out, leaving only one or two bon vivants, who still held to their bottles. There was no restoring the mirth and carelessness that had been so suddenly checked.

"I walked back slowly to my rooms with a student of the Sorbonne, who had sat next to De Cassagnac during the evening.

"'What was the fellow saying,' I asked, 'that could have caused such an explosion?'

"The student raised his eyebrows.

"'We were speaking, as near as I can remember,' he said, 'of duelling. Ah, yes; he was telling us of an affair he had once fought in the garden of a house outside Bordeaux—in the dark, too. He and his opponent aimed by the mark their lighted cigars afforded. A strange way of fighting! De Cassagnac hit his man in the throat, and prides himself upon the shot. My faith—Bordeaux—they call your friend the Bordelais! Perhaps——'

"But I heard no more. My mind was already building up theories to account for what had passed; I abstractedly bade my companion 'Good-night,' and hurried on.

"The remainder of the night passed sleeplessly for me. The excitement kept me awake, and I lay on my bed wondering what would come of the scene I had just witnessed. The Bordelais was no coward, I knew, and either an apology was necessary or some other steps that would find their climax in swords or pistols. But the next day to my surprise he was not seen at the schools or the cafés. I called on him—he would not unfasten his door. The concierge, shaking his white head gravely, informed me that his lodger had come home almost insane, had neither eaten nor drunk all day, but had kept himself locked in his room.

"Those who were of the party the night before summed it all up in three words: 'Drunk or mad,' and dismissed the subject with a shrug of the shoulders. Their dinner had been interrupted, and they had been annoyed; they had been startled, and were not to have the recompensing excitement of a quarrel with its inevitable result, so they felt aggrieved. But as it was all over, and they had slept on it, they dismissed it from their minds. I was by no means sure it was over; I could not think my friend cur enough to hide himself to escape the consequences of his conduct. And I was right, for in the evening, as I turned up the Rue d'Orsel, after leaving one of the brasseries, I met him face to face.

"He was hurrying along, and as I stopped him beneath the glare of a lamp, I could see great, dark rims round his eyes and a drawn look on his face, that told of a terrible night and day of suffering. He seemed to have gone utterly to pieces.

"'Come with me,' he said harshly, not replying to my greeting. "If you are my friend you must come with me. I—don't stand still, for Heaven's sake; walk with me—I can't——'

"He paused in his hurried, incoherent speech, and tried to steady himself.

"'Where is De Cassagnac?' he suddenly asked, when we had proceeded some yards.

"'I saw him a little while ago in the Café des Etudiants.'

"We turned in the direction of the place, and as we reached it my companion asked—'ordered' would be the better term with which to describe the abrupt tone and phrase—me to see if the man was still there. Yes, he was there, sitting at a table with Deschamps. When I returned to the Bordelais his excitement increased, and for some moments he stood literally trembling. Then with a powerful effort he controlled himself, and walked into the café.

"He singled out his quarry in a moment, and I thought he would have sprung at his throat, but the glare passed from his eyes; still master of his emotions, he took a seat at the same table, and called for wine.

"Deschamps and I exchanged glances of recognition, but nothing more. The two adversaries (no one could doubt that they were such) eyed each other in silence. In a moment or two the waiter placed before us two glasses and an opened bottle, and when he had withdrawn, my friend slowly filled one glass. Then fixing his eye full on De Cassagnac, he, by an awkward movement, upset it, sending a stream of Chambery over the hand of his enemy as it rested on the table.

Digitized by Google

"De Cassagnac bit his lip. 'Monsieur has had the misfortune to wet my hand with his wine,' he said, with constrained politeness. The Bordelais filled the second glass. De Cassagnac spoke again: 'Monsieur will apologise;' and under the words lay the threat that showed the game they were playing. The other took no notice, but commenced refilling the glass that had been overturned. Now his opponent was before him he had become as cool as ice. Then the man opposite raised his hand and flicked some drops of wine insultingly across the table. Quick as thought came the retaliation—the second glassful right in his face.

"He had on his lips the smile of a demon as he wiped the wine from his eyes, and rose to his feet. 'Deschamps, act for me!' he cried.

"The Bordelais drew me aside. 'Complete my obligations to you, my friend, and arrange this for me. To-night—midnight—and above all things, we fight with pistols and aim by the light of each other's lighted cigars—no other light mind. You will find me at my rooms.'

"It was now nine o'clock, and Deschamps expostulated against the short time for preparation. But events had hurried themselves along so rapidly that I cared for nothing but getting it all over while we were in hot blood. The fight could not be avoided, and my principal, though firm enough to-night, his nerves strung to the utmost tension, would probably break down entirely by the morning. So I carried that point. But on mention of the condition of darkness, Paul Deschamps shook his head resolutely. 'You cannot be in earnest,' he cried. 'Lanterns, torches, if you will, but—Mon Dieu! We have a right to refuse.'

"'There is no unfair advantage to either,' I returned. 'It is deadlier than by flickering torchlight, perhaps, but less dangerous than by daylight.'

"'But it is not the custom; it is unheard of.'

"I remembered that Deschamps had been asleep during the scene at the dinner, and, indeed, it was only now that the words of the student of the Sorbonne came to my mind—'they aimed by the mark their lighted cigars afforded.' Some mystery lay behind it all, and I would see if De Cassagnac knew more than he would acknowledge.

"'It is not unheard of,' I said. 'Consult your principal. Tell him his adversary wishes to fight as the duel in the garden of the house outside Bordeaux was fought.'

"With a perplexed frown on his forehead, Deschamps went slowly across to where De Cassagnac stood, and spoke to him. The duellist looked up quickly and stared across at me. His hand trembled slightly as he curled his moustache mechanically, then, hastily nodding, he moved away.

"'It is agreed then,' said his second reluctantly, and we proceeded to the arrangement of some minor points.

* * * * *

"As our boatman rowed us down the Seine, all was dark except that, behind, in the sky, the lights of Paris threw a luminous haze, and far up the river the lamps on the quays faintly twinkled. Ahead we heard the plash of oars also making for the Ile de la Grande Jatte. The wind swept down the river, cutting like a knife. I threw my cloak over the Bordelais, fearing lest, in spite of his heavy paletôt, the cold would render his aim untrue. He did not move, but looked steadfastly into the blackness. The moaning wind and river, the motionless figure by my side, the silent boatman—these, and the darkness before us, in which lay life or death, thrilled me with unspeakable horror. It was like the passing of ghosts into the nether world.

"I could not see the face of the man beside me, but I felt that if I could it would be that of a doomed man.

"Presently the boat grated on the gravel, and we sprang ashore and hastened up the bank. Our opponent was already in his place with his second and another person whom Deschamps introduced as Doctor Fauchet.

"Then the Bordelais broke silence for the first time. 'Monsieur,' he said to De Cassagnac, 'one, perhaps both of us, will never leave this ground alive. I have something to say to you privately, if these gentlemen will permit. You will be perfectly safe, monsieur,' he added, as the other hesitated.

"'Ah, monsieur, I do not fear you,' rejoined De Cassagnac, stung by the taunt, and the two walked aside.

"Deschamps and I paced off the ground by lantern light, and when our principals returned the pistols were chosen and the duellists took their positions silently.

"Two little flames sprang up and died out again, leaving the full red circles that marked the human targets behind them. As the match on my left flamed up, the face of our opponent, I fancied, was pale, and I thought I saw his lips quiver. It may have been that the flickering shadows deceived me. Indeed, I was in no fit state to notice anything; my heart was beating heavily, and a cold shudder was creeping over me.

"No light now but the two glowing circles, growing slightly fainter. Above the dismal rustling of the trees Deschamps' voice rang out, but with a tremor in it—'One! Two! Th——' but ere the last word could be spoken De Cassagnac's pistol cracked, and the gleaming cigar on my right fell to the ground, scattering a small shower of sparks. A quick, indrawn breath told me that the bullet had struck home.

"I sprang forward. Deschamps cried out at the cowardly shot, and then the Bordelais pistol spoke also, and De Cassagnac staggered, went down with a crash, headlong.

"The lantern was hurriedly relit, and while Doctor Fauchet leant over the dead man, my friend put his hand on my arm. 'Take me away,' he said, between his teeth, 'lose no time.'

"'You are wounded?' I cried.

"'No, no; but be quick.'

"And so we left the two men kneeling over the dead one, and in a few minutes were out in midstream.

"When at length we got into the light of the quays, I saw that a handkerchief was wrapped round the Bordelais' left hand, and from it thick sluggish drops of blood were falling. But he persisted in going straight to his rooms, and once there, he fell into a chair fainting.

"My first thought, on his recovery, was to get a doctor for his wounded hand, but he started up in alarm at the mention of it.

"'No, for God's sake, no!' he cried. 'Do you think I want my shame known to all? I have acted to-night as only a cur, a coward, an assassin could act. You—or someone—cried out in reproach when the dead man's shot was fired before its time. You would have left me without a word if, through the darkness, you could have seen my murderous trick—ay, a cunning trick, the vile deceit of the gambler playing with marked cards—I am a coward.'

Digitized by Google

"I stared at him, believing the awful night's trial had turned his brain. Great drops of sweat stood on his brow; he was in agony.

"'Look,' he said, unwrapping the bandage. Without wincing, he tore it off, and picking up a pen from the table, held it between the fingers of the wounded hand, as one might hold a cigar, but at a distance from his body.

"'Do you think I did not know De Cassagnac would attempt to kill me ere I could fire? I knew it when I told him before we fought the real reason for my seeking a quarrel. I feared I should not have time to kill him, and I held the light—so—in my hand. You see his bullet would have been in my throat, but I tricked him. He struck my wrist only, and left me my revenge!'

"He paused; his hand fell to his side powerless with the strain he had put upon it, and the wound began to bleed fast. Refusing all assistance, he spoke again rapidly.

"'And now for what little excuse I have to make. I am disgraced, if not in the sight of Paris, in my own eyes, but I value your good opinion and want you to know my reason for this treachery.

"'When I was a boy I lived with my father, sister and brother, in a house near Bordeaux. Our mother was dead. One night I lay awake and heard a faint cry come from my sister's room, followed by the deep murmur of men's voices. With cautious haste I slipped on my clothes, listening all the time, and then I distinguished, as I crept to the door of the room, that one voice was my brother's. I heard the window open, and presently there came two heavy thuds on the ground beneath as if the men had leapt out.

"'Hearing no cry for help and knowing Felix, my brother, was there, I thought there was no need to raise an alarm, but crept through the house silently, and down into the old garden. I heard them making their way over the fallen leaves and branches rotting on the ground, and then they came to a halt. "I would have shot you on the spot but for the scandal and my sister's name!" my brother cried hotly in reply to something the other had said. "But we cannot fire in the dark," was the objection. The man evidently wished for delay. "Then we will fire by the light of a match—anything—or at arm's length, the pistol muzzles touching each other's breast—you shall not escape me—and the third stroke of the church clock shall be the signal. It is nearly the hour now." "Let us smoke, then, the few minutes we have to live," the stranger responded coolly. And then followed a proposal to fight by the light of their cigars, as we fought to-night. I lay still on the ground, not daring to move, for I feared my brother's anger. Slowly the church clock struck one, the pistols clicked two, and then, as to-night, came one solitary shot. Felix fell, shot in the throat; his murderer fled. My sister entered a convent, never divulging the name of her lover.

"My father's grief killed him, and I was left, a boy of twelve, the only survivor of the ruin the unknown betrayer and assassin had made. Then an aunt took me to live with her, and I adopted her name. Later, I came to Paris. Last night, for the first time since my brother's death, I found the man who had killed him. I could not challenge the murderer before that mad crowd.

"Everyone would have seen some connection between it and De Cassagnac's story, and perhaps the very secret to save which Felix died would have been common property through my enemy's biting tongue. I lost control of myself then; but still De Cassagnac did not know the truth—that I was the brother of his victim—until he could do no harm——'

"The Bordelais' voice was growing weaker; he could scarcely speak above a whisper, and it seemed an effort for him to phrase his words correctly; he spoke slowly and laboriously.

"Still he went on. 'And so, knowing the foul shot he made ten years ago, I could not trust him, and I—I tricked him, as I told you. There—there is my confession; you know my shame. You will keep my secret? And now, go for the doctor, my friend. But first, can you shake me by the hand and say "Goodbye," if we never meet again?'

"We never did meet. When I returned, a lifeless body lay in the chair. He had bled to death."

WALTER ROTHWELL.

"THE GLADIATOR,"

BY GEORGE C. WALLIS,

Is the Title of the THRILLING SERIAL which will Start in Short Stories Next Week.

It deals with the adventures of a young gladiator in ancient Constantinople, whose exploits will make you fairly hold your breath with excitement from the first chapter to the last.

TELL ALL YOUR FRIENDS ABOUT THIS NEW STORY.

Digitized by Google

TOLD IN THE INDIAN BAZAAR.

By H. HUNTER.

In writing these stories, the purpose of the author is to give the average reader a fairly accurate notion of the sort of tales which are told daily and nightly in the bazaars and villages of India, on the Temple steps, and at the bathing stairs, and which are listened to with unquestioning faith by millions of people.

No. 1.—THE MAN WHO THOUGHT HIMSELF IMMORTAL.

THERE was once in the country which lies beyond the Great River a king whose name was Red Arm. He was a man proud of heart and fierce to look upon, so that all the people feared him greatly.

A glance from his eye could dry up the marrow in the bones and the blood in the veins, could shrivel the skin and shrink the sinews.

When he lifted up his voice in anger the trees in the forest trembled, and the beasts cowered in their lairs. His speech was like the sound of many trumpets, and could be heard across mountains and deserts; and no man dared question the power of his might.

All that land acknowledged him for Lord, and by the people on its borders he was called the King of the Terrible Countenance. But his own people called him Red Arm; for his right arm to the elbow was red like crimson from his birth, which the soothsayers declared to be an omen; affirming that, though he would spill men's blood himself, yet would his own blood never be spilt by them, since no weapon that was wielded by man would ever prevail against him.

So King Red Arm grew mightily in power and dominion, increasing in arrogance with each fresh demonstration of the soothsayer's discernment, till he believed himself to be coequal with the gods, and would have men do honour to him as to an immortal.

Now the fear of Red Arm was exceeding great in Utkala, the glorious country, where for 1,700,000 years, while the whole earth was virtuous, the gods loved to dwell.

The fame of his armies was echoed even in the den of the tiger and the home of the snake. It had travelled down the Sacred River; and everywhere, North and South and East and West, men spoke in whispers of the giants and magicians who followed the fortunes of the Red Arm. And the proud king, the Lord of the Terrible Countenance, when this was told him, laughed loud in the pride of his heart, and said: "In all the earth there is none like me—none. 'Tis I and no other who am Lord of the World, and all people shall bow down and do homage before me."

Then, swearing by his head, since he believed in none greater than himself, he said that he would go down to Utkala, and possess himself of the "Land without Sin," seize the temple, slay the priests, carry off the jewels and, in place of the ancient figure of the Great One, set up an image of himself.

Having issued his orders to his officers, Red Arm went to hunt in the woods, and soon started an antelope—a creature of most lovely shape, but of such incredible swiftness that, though he pursued it the whole day, he was unable to capture it.

At last, tired out with the chase, he threw himself from his horse to rest. Then he perceived that he was alone, and in a part of the forest that was quite strange to him.

For a moment he thought of raising his terrible voice to summon his attendants, but at that instant he caught sight of something shimmering amongst the banyans. Grasping his spear he waited, expectant. Something was certainly moving behind the trees. Was it the antelope? No antelope that was mortal, assuredly. Such a flashing of light, such a ripple of sheen, could proceed from no wild denizen of the waste. The Rakshas? No, the evil spirits sent forth by Shitan* after the sun went to rest, were dark and dusky; only their eyes glowed like balls of fire through the blackness of the night.

While he was still wondering what it might mean, there emerged from the jungle the most beautiful apparition that his eyes had ever beheld—a woman clad in the lightest of muslins, and loaded with jewels.

Pearls and diamonds glittered in her hair; on her arms she wore bracelets of priceless worth; bell-bangles of gold adorned her ankles, and a girdle of rubies encircled her waist. Her face shone with the peerless beauty of the moon when at the full, and the loveliness of her form and features surpassed all that the heart of man can imagine or conceive.

Moving without noise, save for the music of her anklets, she made straight for the place where Red Arm, too astonished to rise, was still sitting.

"Listen, great King!" said she. "I am Lakshmi, the Goddess of Prosperity. 'Tis I you have been pursuing. Under the form of an antelope I have kept you at full stretch till the shadows have begun to lengthen and the mists to rise. But you have spent your strength for naught. You have succeeded only in wearing out yourself—I have eluded you. And now the night is coming down, and the mighty Red Arm, who through the long day has been the fool of Fortune and the sport of Fate, is left at the mercy of the servants of the Evil One. Who forsake the gods, O King, the gods themselves forsake.

"Who would be equal to the Great Ones must stoop to the level of the least. That is a lesson which princes must learn in the school of kings, and the king who forgets it must learn his lesson at the hands of the gods.

"Behold me, Lakshmi! Am I not good to look upon? Have I lost any part of the divinity which makes me the equal of the Greatest, because erstwhile I appeared to thee in the form of one of the lowest? Learn, proud man, that thou, too, art mortal, though no stroke dealt by human hand hath power to slay thee.

"And think not, O King, that 'tis of thine own will that thou doest this or that; but remember that he who will not serve Nárráyan must serve Shitan. And now, O Son of the Earth! listen, and take heed! I have a message from Devi unto thee; and here, under the neem tree, must it be delivered.

"It was Devi who marked thee with the crimson

* The Devil.

Digitized by Google

stain; and, by no man, O King! can thy blood be spilt. In yonder grove you will find her shrine. Go hither and pay thy vow. Offer her, without seeking to know what she would ask, the thing which she will demand; so shall Prosperity continue to attend thee in the way." With which words Lakshmi left him, and suddenly he was alone.

Now Red Arm would have followed Lakshmi even to the banks of the dread river which flows through the kingdom of Yama, for Lakshmi was all light and life and youthful beauty; but Devi, with the four arms and serpent tresses; Devi with the necklace of skulls and brimming goblet; Devi, the mad death-fury — he had no fancy to meet her at the lonely shrine in the banyan grove.

There emerged from the jungle the most beautiful apparition his eyes had ever beheld.

Moreover, he liked not the saying of Lakshmi, "Offer her, without seeking to know what she would ask, the thing which she will demand." There was no such pressing hurry about it, surely! The evil spirits would be flitting about now in the gloom of the wood. He would return on the morrow, in the broad daylight, when, if he had luck, he might see the antelope again.

Then looking about him and perceiving no trace of the visit of Lakshmi, it was not long before he persuaded himself that he must have fallen asleep and dreamt a dream.

So, mounting his horse, Red Arm made the best of his way back to the palace. As he rode up to the gates his son Prince Fazool ran to greet him. But the animal started, reared, and bringing his forefeet down heavily on the youth crushed the life out of him before the eyes of his father. At the same moment a peal of laughter that never came from human throat rang out clearly upon the air. For the first time in his life Red Arm trembled.

In the morning he rose up early and went off alone to the shrine in the wood. All day he searched for it without finding it. At last, worn out with searching, he sat down under a tree to rest. By-and-bye a bat flew into the tree and Red Arm called to it. "Bat, I have a vow to pay at the altar of Devi in the grove. I have a sacrifice to offer, but, alas! I am astray, and fear lest the anger of the goddess should visit me through my neglect. Canst thou not assist me?"

But the Bat said:

"And wherefore comest thou not sooner, O Son of an Earthborn Mother? Devi hath taken a sacrifice to herself, and her altar is removed from its place. It is not here thou wilt find her. But I have a message for thee, O King! The gods have fled from Utkala, and the land is open before thee. Rich booty awaits thee and great possessions. There, too, shalt thou find thy son. Go, seek him in the dwelling of the 'Best,' in the bosom of the Blue Mountain. Sword of man cannot hurt thee, and the gods themselves will make terms rather than see the Land of the Peaceful harried by the Lord of the Terrible Countenance."

Then Red Arm, believing the words which the Bat had spoken, went back to his people; and getting together a great army, took ship and sailed down the sacred river to Utkala, which is by the Great Sea.

But Lakshmi, who sped thither swifter than the eagle's flight, had warned the men of the city.

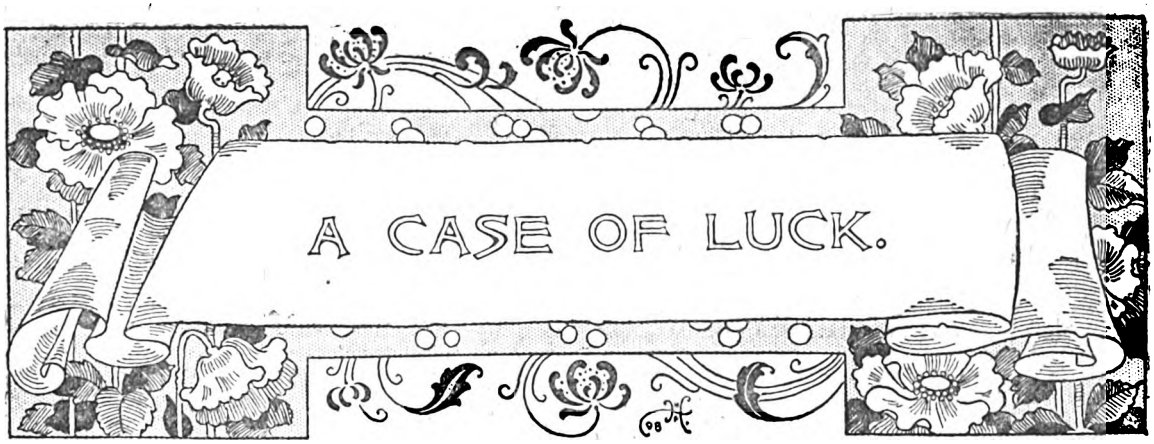
"Watch you," said she, "and when the sweepings of horses is seen on the water, and the litter of elephants is drifted on the shore, fly into the mountains with your goods and your treasure, and leave the gods to deal with the invader of their land."

So, when Red Arm arrived at the city, behold it was empty. Gnashing his teeth as he walked on the beach, he perceived great quantities of litter which had been thrown up by the tide. "Ha!" said he, smiting his forehead, "'tis this treacherous sea has betrayed us. It shall be punished."

Marshalling his army on the shore, he advanced in battle array against the ocean. The waves receded before him. For two miles they continued to recede, and Red Arm to advance. Then of a sudden they rose in their wrath, and surging in upon the proud, presumptuous mortal, swallowed him up—him and all his great army of 1,300,000 men.

But ere Red Arm sank beneath the angry water, he heard above the roar of the waves, the mocking laugh of Devi, and the harsh croak of the Bat.

Digitized by Google



A CASE OF LUCK.

I had, of course, heard of Roland Gay, the detective. Most people had. But I had never come across him. I therefore considered myself fortunate when the waiter whispered to me that the quiet-looking person, dressed like an ordinary gentleman, who shared the coffee-room with me, was none other than the great Gay.

"What is he here for?" I inquired afterwards; for Mr. Gay seemed of a retiring disposition, and soon left me to myself.

"Goodness knows, sir!" returned the waiter.

I ought to have blushed for my innocence. It was not in the least likely that so astute a person would declare his business as openly as people ask for eggs for their breakfast.

Later in the evening, however, I had once more the good fortune to find myself alone with Mr. Gay. We were in the smoking-room of the hotel, he and I.

We had exchanged commonplaces, but nothing more. I felt that I was talking under false pretences.

"By the way," I said, "it strikes me as silly to pretend that I do not know who you are, Mr. Gay. I'm very glad to meet so famous a gentleman."

His smile was good to see. It came and went, however, with remarkable suddenness.

"Oh, well," he replied diffidently, "that's all right. I don't know that I'm altogether so sharp as the papers make me out to be. But I do my best."

"So I should imagine the rogues say whom you run to earth. Your profession must be one of the most exciting that a man can take up."

"Perhaps," he admitted.

"And the most satisfying."

"Far from that."

"Ah! but I am speaking of it in the hands of its leaders—men like yourself. Of course, an unskilful man must often have to groan over failure."

"Yes; but most people are that at first. None more than we, I should suppose."

"No!"

"Fact. Do you remember the Comrie case, fifteen or sixteen years ago?"

"The Comrie case?"

No; I remembered nothing at all about it. Could not even guess whether it was a case of murder or embezzlement.

"Well, then, I'll tell you about it, if you like," said Mr. Gay amiably, as became his name. "I ought to have it at my fingers' ends, for it made me. And yet I was never nearer being baffled than I was by that. Chance, good luck, or what you please to call it, that's the best friend a man in our profession has. He's a bundle of conceit if he thinks differently."

I signified assent to Mr. Gay's words, though, of course, I did not agree wholly with an opinion that robbed him so deliberately of the credit given to him by most people for his talent as a sleuth-hound.

"No, no," he said, shaking his head; "it's luck. The old heathens who made a god or a goddess of Fortune weren't so far out. But I'll tell you about the Comrie case, and you shall judge.

"The facts, briefly, were as follows: A rich old gentleman and his daughter lived in a big house in Lanarkshire. His name was Comrie. In his younger days he had travelled a good deal, and in his travels he had spent a large sum of money on gems, cut stones, and intaglios. His collection was one of the finest in Great Britain. It was valued at many thousands of pounds, and all kept in that country house of his. He took as much pride in the things as a mother in her only child, and wanted to have them near him to finger and handle.

"One morning, when I had been only two years in the force, news came that Mr. Comrie had been found dead in his library, and that a number of the gems were missing. Taylor, Mr. Comrie's valet, was also missing, and so was a woman named Farquharson, who was Miss Comrie's maid. Miss Comrie herself had gone away to some relatives, and had left her maid behind at the Grange, as the place was called.

"It seemed a pretty plain case, you see. Of course, the valet had killed his master and the maid was an accessory before or after the act. They had got off with their plunder, and it was our task to catch them.

"'An easy job for you, Gay,' said the chief, when he put me in charge of it. 'The man's young, and he's bound to be indiscreet, having a woman with him. In less than a week I expect you'll have them. Take my blessing and go.'"

Mr. Gay shook his head.

"That blessing," he continued, "didn't seem to do me much good. Of course, though, I was a bit handicapped by being rather late.

"This Mr. Comrie was in the habit of spending the evening in his library, where he was waited on by no one except Taylor; and he'd go to bed when he pleased at any hour, and not want his valet till he rang his bell at ten or eleven o'clock. You see, too, this library was really a private room for himself, and was only approachable through his bedroom, so that the maids weren't likely to be the first to see him. That arrangement was naturally for the protection of his precious stones and things, but I thought it a very bad plan when I came to the house and understood what a start those two had got through it.

Digitized by Google

"I didn't get down there till nearly two o'clock, and, for anything I could tell, the murder had been committed at eight or nine o'clock the evening before. In fact, that was so; the doctor's evidence confirmed it, and so did the coincidence that no one in the house had seen either Taylor or Farquharson after supper-time.

"It was not their showing up the next morning by nine o'clock, combined with Mr. Comrie's silence, that set the housekeeper first wondering, and then made her suspect something.

"Thus it was twelve o'clock or thereabouts before I could leave Glasgow for the Grange, and, as I said, two o'clock before I reached the house.

"That gave them a good start. An Anchor liner had left that very morning, and there were five passengers who had booked at the last moment, any two of whom, from the description, might have been my birds. Indeed, I was disposed to think they were trying that very tempting but hopeless way of escape. Eventually, though, information from the other side proved that I was wrong on that point.

"Those two had got off wonderfully well. No one for ten miles round had seen two persons even conjecturally answering the description. I could only suppose that they had schemed it out cleverly beforehand, arranged for disguises, and got to Glasgow about daybreak, holding their heads as high as honest folks. My chief agreed with me. I believe he was as disappointed as myself; but, knowing all, he could, he said, excuse my failure.

"It remained to be seen if they would betray themselves by means of their plunder. We were prepared for them on this score. There wasn't a jeweller in the country (I might almost say not a purchaser of that kind of antiques abroad) who was not warned about them.

"However, August came, and still we were quite in the dark. They had done away with Mr. Comrie early in June. You will see that it began to look as though they had got clean away.

"I worried myself almost to death about the affair. It was a terrible disappointment to me, and I had felt foolishly confident at the outset. All the while, though, I expect I was learning some grand lessons. And not the least of them was the need we have of being patient firstly, secondly, and lastly. The man who hasn't acquired a rare stock of that useful virtue won't do much in our business.

"And so, as I said, it was August, and I was about done up with anxiety and running about to no purpose.

"'Look here, Gay,' said the chief to me on the fourth of the month, 'you mustn't break down. You're something of a fisherman, aren't you?'

"I was, and confessed it.

"'Then you'll do me a favour by taking two or three weeks' holiday somewhere, and try some flies a fellow has sent me. I don't think much of them.'

"The dear old chap couldn't have offered me a bait more sure of hooking me. The very next day I was on board the Clansman, and trying my hardest to forget the Comrie murder.

"I didn't stop at Oban. I looked at the map and the 'Sportsman's Guide,' and chose the very remotest fishing-place I could. You don't know Barra, I suppose? Few people go there. It's just the southernmost of the outer Hebrides Islands, with two or three lakes chock-full of trout.

"There were only two visitors there—a middle-aged man with a black beard and a good-looking youth. They had been on the island for six weeks, they told me, and they excused themselves for their rather rough manner (so they said) on the plea of this isolation. Now, their manners were really not at all rough. The younger one was quite gentlemanly and pleasant, and the other was not more reserved than half the men one meets in travelling.

"I soon saw, however, that they did not care for my company. They never asked me to fish with them, and ate their meals apart from me. In the evenings, too, when most men chum over their pipes and Scotch, they left me to keep the smoking-room warm. To be sure, the younger one didn't smoke, but it seemed odd that they should avoid the room on his account.

"I hadn't been in Barra four days when I heard these men were going elsewhere. The landlord told me so, and I said I was glad to hear it.

"'They're not my sort,' I said, 'any more than I theirs, if I may judge from their manners.'

"Then the landlord, with a wink, let me into a secret that startled me.

"'Between ourselves, sir,' he whispered, 'one of 'em is a woman. They've got some game on, though I don't know what it is.'

"'Are you certain?' I asked. How my heart beat to be sure!

"'Well, one wears stays, I know that much!'

"That did not seem conclusive. But my professional instinct was now aroused, and, of course, the Comrie case rushed to my mind.

"'It is the unexpected that happens,' I said to myself.

"That afternoon I made up a little plan. If (as it might be) these two were my two, then the man's beard was false. I must test it.

"I made up a nice little arrangement of pike hooks set back to back—in all, three pairs of them. With these in my hand, I planned to go past Mr. Brown (as the elder man called himself) as he was sitting in the coffee-room ready for dinner. He was fond of the arm-chair, which facilitated matters. If my pike hooks in his beard did not strip him of his hair, I should be in for an abject apology with a vengeance!

"Ah, but it did, you know—or would know if you remembered the case. I ripped the whole thing off him, and recognised Taylor under Mr. Brown in an instant.

"The rest of the business was soon done. I had them both on board the Staffa the next morning. And didn't I get complimented at the head office and elsewhere for what was the purest accident in the world!"

Mr. Gay leant back contentedly.

I thanked him for his story, but did not agree with him that chance deserved all the credit in the Comrie conviction.

"You might have failed to get his beard off; you were not bound to identify them as Mr. Comrie's assassins, and——"

"Oh, but," said Mr. Gay, "when I learnt from the maid that never once had she seen their portmanteaux opened, I put two and two together."

"Which seemed the more to your credit," said I.

Arthur Stenson.

Digitized by Google

THE CLOWN'S VENGEANCE.

A Tragic Tale of the Sawdust Circle.

That evening there was a great concourse of people on the Place de la Liberté. The Rosati Circus was giving its last performance, and the public of Toulon was flocking in crowds to this farewell representation. At the doors, beneath the flickering gleam of the rows of gas-lights, there was a ceaseless crush and movement; an endless line was slowly winding its way in, halting at every step and hammering the sounding planks with a confused clatter.

All around, on the notice-boards stuck in the ground, the colours of the flaming posters were displayed and, bathed in the garish light, dazzled the eye. In the crowd of spectators and idlers everyone was reading aloud the placard which stood conspicuous in front:

POSITIVELY THE LAST TIME
THIS EVENING.
LAST PERFORMANCES
OF PRINCE ICARUS
(THE FLYING MAN),
OF MLLE. RITA
AND OF ÆSOP
(THE GRASSHOPPER CLOWN).

Within the circus the seats were already overflowing, and the same names repeated from mouth to mouth blended into a general murmur deadened by the canvas roof over the ring. Some of the circus-men were raking the sawdust on the track, and, above the door to the stables, the musicians were languidly tuning their instruments, or, at times, addressing friends who passed beneath the gallery. "That you, Marius? How goes it?" etc. In the upper rows the audience was alive with impatience for the expected spectacle, and irritated by the passing of the young fashionable "first-nighters"—envied frequenters behind the scenes—who pressed in a crowd to the narrow entrance leading to the green-room.

Officers in civilian dress, and students, ship-brokers and idle dandies, all wished for the last time to get near the fair Mlle. Rita, the celebrated equestrienne, who, for a month, had been the subject of conversation in every mess-room and every club. They stepped along, the elbowed and the elbowers, between the walls that were covered with sets of varnished harness, and begged pardon every time they jostled a groom.

They stopped at the stalls of Blue Devil and Djinn, the two trick Arabians, and, under pretext of giving some sugar to the horses, fluttered about the extemporized dressing-room where Rita, tranquil and smiling, was donning her attire. Then came in succession the commonplace compliments, to which the star of the circus, unheeding, scarcely deigned to give an answer, without seeming to note the ardent gaze of her admirers.

She was a handsome girl, a careless gipsy, with the sun in her eyes and her blood, accustomed to the atmosphere of admiration, and she finished her toilet without hurrying. At times however, impatiently, and with a pretty, rebellious movement, she gave her shoulders a shake and made the pearls of her necklace rattle.

It was when the little clown Æsop, her husband, who, all befloured and painted, was walking before the room, his huge top-knot swaying at every step, drew near, and with his sharp falsetto voice launched some taunt at the artist's courtiers. They laughed, they even applauded, but, more often, they lowered their eyes before the cutting, cold gaze of the dwarf, whose wan and grotesque face—in spite of the smile of the blood-red and two large lips—seemed at some moments to be fraught with evil.

This evening the mannikin was in worse humour than usual; his jeers were more biting and more bitter, and beneath the coat of flour covering his seamed features he appeared not pale but livid. His eyes had a sharp and menacing flash in them, and never left Rita, who, gayly posed before her mirror, was having her bodice laced by the handsome gymnast Icarus.

In the circus the orchestra was finishing a waltz by Métra. The curious were gradually quitting the stable and returning to their places. The sharp cuts of the ring-master's whip were cracking in the arena; the show had begun. Icarus placed a last rose in the hair of the equestrienne and ran to chalk her shoes. He stumbled against his dwarfish comrade.

Digitized by Google

The clown seemed very busy in examining the gas-meter, and pushed him away with an oath. Then, without more ado, the acrobat sent him reeling, and leaping on a ladder, cried, with a laugh, "Out of the way, you pitiful pigmy!"

Æsop uttered a roar of rage and anger, then suddenly calming himself, returned to the meter, and after having followed with an eye of hatred the ascent of Icarus, began fumbling with the mechanism of the stop-cocks.

A great clapping of hands. A frantic ovation. Two hundred pretty women dropped their fans, and levelled their opera-glasses, and, a trifle pale, smiled with a delicious dread. Icarus was up there—high up at the top of the circus—hanging to the last trapeze, and turning over and over in it, slowly and without an effort.

At times he paused, and his face was seen radiant in the foolish pride of triumph. Below, in the ring, the clowns were stretching a circular net, and in all the circus reigned deep silence broken only by a feminine whisper:

"How graceful! What a handsome fellow!"

The gymnast then, finding his public sufficiently warmed up, raised himself at one pull, stiffening himself on his wrists.

The trapeze, violently thrown back, described a great arc, and, letting go the bar, the man shot forward like an arrow into space.

There was a feeling of apprehension in the crowd, and an "Oh!" of affright uttered by a thousand throats. The acrobat reached the second trapeze, and calmly let himself swing in its decreasing oscillations.

Slowly he thus darted eleven times, calm and smiling as he made the tour of the circus, and rejoicing at feeling beneath him the immense panting of the throng.

At the eleventh trapeze he paused to prolong this emotion—his glory—and his eyes sought out Rita. The equestrienne saw him, and with the handle of her whip threw him a kiss.

The elated Icarus, hanging by one hand, saluted her; then he brought his trapeze to rest. He was about to complete his task.

"Enough," said some voices.

"No! Bravo! Encore!" cried the ladies, eager to feel once more the perverse joy of an enticing pain.

For the twelfth time the handsome gymnast, stiffening his muscular arms, essayed his terrible flight.

But an appalling cry of terror, a frantic shout arose.

In an instant, suddenly—like a candle put out by the flap of a bat's wing—the thousand glistening lights of the circus were extinguished all together, at the precise and fatal moment when the man was darting into space.

At the same instant there rose from the ring a laugh, terrible, vibrating with hate.

Then in the black and hideous obscurity, in the pitchy darkness that filled the circus lately so blazing, poignant shrieks rolled from row to row. Women fainted, and the spectators, with their hearts crushed in hopeless terror, shudderingly sat as if petrified in their places, and peered into the night that filled the dome. The net was empty, the acrobat must be looked for in the gloom. In the search, lanterns were brought and carried toward the top of the circus. Five minutes—five centuries, elapsed. Someone cried "Bengal lights."

Then, while here and there people were trying to relight the burners, a blaze of violet and red, of green and azure, flashed out and with a powerful illumination lit up at one flash every corner of the circus with its fantastic and trembling gleams.

And suddenly, as in the flames of a transformation scene, was seen, rigid, clamped to the trapeze, Prince Icarus, hanging motionless.

An unheard of horror paralyzed him in a supernatural frenzy. His hair stood erect. His distorted mouth grinned an idiot grin terrible to see, and in his face, whiter than that of a corpse, his haggard eyes, protruding from their sockets, rolled convulsively.

Soon his comrades were near him. With the handle of his knife Æsop struck the gymnast's hands, and with great difficulty detached from the bar the clenched hands of the miserable man.

The gas was relighted, and the crowd, silently and without a breath, watched, as it was slowly lowered down, the descent of the living corpse.

There is to-day near Marseilles, in the Asylum of Saint Pierre, a poor madman, who stalks straight forward, his arms held in front and contracted in an imaginary grip. It is a frightful sight. It is "Prince Icarus."

I do not know what jail holds Æsop. As to the fairy Rita, she is now a princess somewhere in Germany.—

Paul Bonnetain.

Digitized by Google

BY M. P. SHIEL.

Author of "The Man-Stealers," "Prince Zaleski," "Shapes in the Fire," "The Rajah's Sapphire," etc.

CHAPTER XXXIII. (continued).

The Hirosaki, we have said, was undoubtedly the best engine of war that was ever devised and built. She was armoured with Harveyed nickel steel, and her belt, which extended from stem to stern, was over eight feet in depth, and nine inches thick throughout engine, boiler, and magazine spaces. Now, above this belt, her side to the height of the main deck was covered with 6in. armour for a length of some 250ft., inclosing two barbettes; while at each end of the belt there was a curved bulkhead, fourteen inches thick, between the armoured and main decks; so that a quite complete citadel, 250ft. long, was formed.

Her gun-casemates, moreover, were shielded both on the inner and outer sides, so that their crews worked under a protection almost ideal; while her barbettes, circular in plan, were protected with 14in. armour, rising to a height of 4ft. above the upper deck.

With such a tool of war something might be dared. Nearer she went, ploughing in impressive, squat haste, straight towards the middle of the interminable Japanese line; and while the rest of the British fleet were still beyond effective range, a sudden rain of shot fell from the military-tops of two cruisers upon her decks.

The Hirosaki did not answer.

With ripped decks and annihilated boats, on she went, straining her engines, every egress from the stokeholds being closed by the devoted men who toiled like salamanders in her depths.

Within two minutes from the opening of fire, a shell from the 32cm. gun of the Akitsuschima (one of the two ships at the point where Hardy aimed to break the enemy's line) had burst through the shield of the fore-barbette, killed or wounded all its crew, and disabled the turn-table.

And now a horror of wonder and consternation spread through the crew of the Hirosaki—at her strange silence—at her frenzied adventure.

Where was Hardy? Was he stricken dumb? Was he dead? Was he dancing mad?

An ashen-faced London barrister in one of the eight casemates of the 6in. quick-firers on the main-deck, gasped in a dry-throated whisper:

"He is dead!"

And Brassey, of Kiao-chau, ashen-faced also, gasped in answer:

"Bah! what are you talking about!"

The engines roared, the sea whitened, the Hirosaki walked grandly down an arcade of flame and smoke.

She had passed through the first line of the enemy betweeen two cruisers, the Akitsuschima, and the Hasidater which she could have sunk by a mere snarl of her broadsides. Yet she did not speak.

Before her came two more, the Ten-rio, and the Takao, and the two before and the two behind concentrated upon her their fires.

Everyone looked to see her sink; certainly, it was only a question of moments—of how many moments the fire continued from such close quarters. The outward appearance of the ship, by the time she reached the second Japanese line abreast, was one of mere ruin and havoc.

The enemy were as astounded at her conduct as her crew. But in a few instants they knew—they thought that they knew.

Twenty or twenty-two cables behind the second Japanese line came a ship of considerable size, alone—that is to say protected by the whole mass of her navy. Yet she was a ship of war.

As soon as the Hirosaki emerged from the world of coppery gloom into which she had passed, as it were, a living thing, to come forth, but for her central citadel and propelling mechanism, a dead—she turned her bows upon this ship.

The ship was the Yoshino; though powerfully armed, she was one of the ships called "unarmoured"; smoking over a map in her cabin sat Yen How.

Hardy had reached him! One well-directed shell, one happy torpedo, and, beyond doubt, the yellow host will be leaderless. . . .

And now, at last, the Hirosaki talks; but she talks in such a sorry, effete, and slip-shod manner, that a whole crowd of Japanese captains who are already hastening to the rescue of that one precious ship, laugh in their conning-towers. Was there ever such miserable aiming? such false sight? Not one of the shots takes effect. The Yoshino keeps on her way untouched. The rash Hirosaki has run that appalling blockade of flame in vain. And to complete her ignominy, immediately upon her first feeble effort, she turns tail, and goes blundering in defeated flight to the S.E.

She was evidently the flag-ship of the British, and the fact that she had reserved her fire in her passage through the fleet, and had then singled out, and fired upon, the Yoshino, proved to the Japanese that the British knew in which ship Yen How was borne, and that their one and only object in fighting now was the destruction of Yen How.

The one and only object of the Japanese must therefore be the protection of that one ship, the Yoshino.

It was in order that they might arrive at this very conclusion, that Hardy had made his awful passage through their fleet, had abstained from firing,—and had fired upon the Yoshino.

Digitized by Google

It was his design that the enemy should be, above all things, anxious to protect her. And he used the Hirosaki for the adventure, because he knew well that no other ship at his disposal could have continued on her way two seconds through that flaming avenue.

But the on-lookers slandered the Hirosaki's crew in supposing them such very sorry gunners. The same mouth which had bid them fire had bid them miss. The Yoshino was needed.

"The morale of the fighters!" With the most astounding precision Hardy seems to have divined it. How much of his mind the enemy would guess, and exactly where their guessing power would cease, he appears by some divine instinct to have known infallibly. A European crew, knowing the fame of Hardy, and observing his present fatuity, might have surmised some design, all the more appallingly rough and rude in its results, in proportion to its consummate depth. The Japanese simply read the surface of his mind, and were proud of their reading.

Smoking over a map sat Yen How.

They concluded that his main design was to destroy the person of Yen How—and it was—they were right. But his thoughts were as much beyond their thoughts as the heavens are beyond the earth.

He goes careering to the S.E., and three very swift cruisers that follow in chase he promptly sinks.

Yonder, at the front, the battle has begun, and a sound breaks out like the sound of ten million rocks clattering in rowdy degringolation down a wooden stair reaching from the moon to the earth. And see how, really, that is good for Hardy—native to the very temper of his mother's womb—the sole rough music in the universe which can make his great spirit dance! It would be hard now to recognise in him the gloomy, cowering, burdened wight, who, half an hour ago, groaned in the Hirosaki conning-tower. His exhilaration is boundless; his face is flushed. If it were possible, joy now would redye the hair which grief had blanched. Here is his element, his day—great *Thurs*day—and he, once more, Saxon Thor, red-handed, swinger of thunder-bolts, tosser of linked lightnings. He feels his arm, his soul, his ordination. He knows that he cannot fail.

He wheels:—the Hirosaki, left alone, is steering S.—S.W.—W.—then W. by N. What is left of the European fleet, thirty-five craft, most of them already gravely injured, have now changed places with the Japanese, they being to the east, and the Japanese to the west of them. Both sides put their helms down to reform and change. Only, a solid phalanx of twenty ships remain in guard about the Yoshino which is slowly forging ahead in her old direction.

The Hirosaki is signalling. The old starboard half of ships are to follow her in single file; the old port are to watch evolutions of the Hirosaki, and follow suit on their side.

Immediately the Hirosaki's bows turn a little to the south of eastward. Nineteen ships follow her with bows a little to the south of eastward. Sixteen ships follow with bows a little to the north of eastward. At the utmost speed of the craft of lowest power they steam away in these directions.

The yellow men discern that the white are flying. Or is it not rather a mere feint to get at the precious, guarded ship? Yes, that is soon evidently it! for the two files of retreating ships turn south and north, and then in wide curves westward. The Japs are after them.

Between the Europeans are intervals of not more than six cables. The crowd of Japanese come two abreast, the nearest two about a knot astern of the hindermost European. The Hirosaki leads the port European limb, the Hero the starboard.

The two hindermost Europeans in the two limbs are the Dutch corvette Van Galen, and the British-Japanese battleship Fugi; these are the only direct combatants, and are using stern-guns. In three minutes the Van Galen dives, and the Fuji cranks and stops. The British force is reduced to thirty-three.

So far not a single yellow ship has sunk. Five, in the first charge, have been disabled, and the rest only seriously injured by the destruction of unprotected crews. Hitherto they are victors twice and thrice.

They gain upon the retreating squadrons. The average of their speed is greater than that of the Europeans.

Suddenly, after four knots from the start, Hardy turns, and in a short inward curve comes back eastward. The starboard limb, with a short inward curve, follow suite.

And now it becomes quite clear to everyone on his side that whatever is his design, he is accomplishing it at a murderous, a disastrous cost. For as the ships come back, they present a long line of broadside to a still greater length of Japanese broadside—at horribly close quarters; and in the sudden, exclamatory, almost momentary, outrage of hell-fire which bursts from both sides, the ships sink fast. The gentlemen of England acquit themselves well, with precision, with tympana that do not quite burst, with brains that do not quite faint, with hands that do not fail. In that loud squall of wrath they send twenty Japanese and Chinese ships to their grave in the two limbs; and they themselves are nine the less. The Japanese can afford the loss. Not they.

And now, in a minute—so fast do they tear along—the hostile fleets are parted. The enemy, all very near together, go on through the evolutionary curves which the British have described, and come following eastward.

They look now for a rush of the British upon the guarded ships, ready to follow. But no rush comes. The British keep on their way almost directly east.

A rush will come. But Hardy intends it to come when the Japs are in a position to intercept and cut him off. His thought, his patience, is far beyond their divination.

On he goes, leading them grandly through the mazes of that tragic, coiling minuet; and they follow, hasting gladly after him, triumphant, blind, fated.

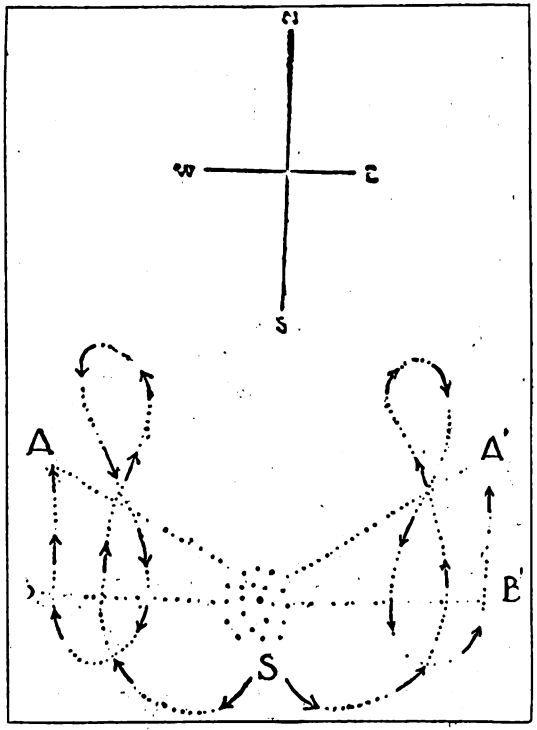
Digitized by Google

The Pied Piper and his retinue . . . !

His ships sink one by one. He is aware of it with guilty disquiet. Will enough be left for his purpose? The falling out of each one by the way-side is to him like the taste of the second death.

The Japanese follow, not gaining ground this time, purposely keeping their distance, even increasing it, waiting for the next curve to westward, and the disastrous swift broadside.

And round again goes Hardy, wheeling outward, this time in a broader curve; and outward wheels his northern limb.



[The arrows in the diagram will show the course which Hardy took, S being the region of his start, and the dots in the central part representing the twenty ships round Yen How.]

And once again clatters the sudden, exclamatory outrage of fire, bursting from both sides, and Hardy comes out of it leaving behind him four, and the Japanese seven ships.

But the numerical strength of Hardy's remaining ships by no means represents his real strength. He is far weaker than he seems. Twenty-two floating craft are still visible to his eye, but craft so broken and undone, that he knows them incapable of further serious combat. Nearly ninety Japanese are as good for fight as ever.

Once more he is running westward, and the enemy, conscious now of victory, follow.

Westward—till his two foremost ships reach the positions marked A and A' in the diagram: and then hard to starboard goes his helm. He goes driving sharp and straight with straining engines for the packed group of ships round the Yoshino.

This, then, is "the rush"! But the Japanese ships, their foremost being at the position marked B and B', are nearer to the Yoshino than the British—are in the exact position, in which Hardy, at the price of so much, has led them by the nose in long twining dance in order to place them.

What they will now do, he knows with certainty: they will cut him off. And, in fact, they turn sharply inward towards the precious, guarded ship, in order to intercept, and with one unanimous battery of their entire navy finish at once his small remainders.

And thus it has suddenly happened that the whole yellow fleet is packed into a mere bundle of ships whose crews can speak to each other, some of whose steersmen need be cautious to avoid collision.

And when Hardy sees them so,—herded together by his harsh and baleful forethought,—like sheep driven into the penfold,—he knows that the yellow wave is dammed, and the greatest of his works is accomplished.

He could shriek aloud with cruel glee.

Abroad roams his eye over the sea at his sinking and battered fleet. And as he looks, he sees the foundering of the Nile.

And swift, with concentrated fury, the massed Japanese open fire upon his feeble residue.

At that moment the two limbs of the British are not more than five hundred yards from the front of the enemy.

And at that moment it is that an appalling, horrid, unparalleled thing is happening to the Japanese.

Hardy has signalled to his ships to launch among the crowding enemy every possible torpedo in his fleet.

His prohibition to use torpedoes in the combat had led his captains to expect some such final order. They were well ready.

The torpedo was, of course, the most deadly of the then instruments of war. If it exploded beneath a ship, without fail it destroyed her. But precisely the most deadly was also, in general, the most unreliable, of weapons. In general it might be counted upon to explode not beneath an enemy's ship, but beneath a friend's, or, more likely still, beneath nothing at all. No serious tactician depended upon it.

In other words, it was not a good engine of aim at a given target, for it usually missed the target. Its course was more or less deflected by the waves—many things happened to it.

It was left to the eye of Hardy to perceive that its proper function was not one of aim at all toward a particular target, but one of loose direction toward a general mass. Under such conditions, it might be counted upon to annihilate in an instant all the assembled navies of the earth.

Prompt upon his order, the rest of his fleet, shattered as they were, were able to launch a ripping navy of nine more torpedoes than there were crowding Japanese and Chinese ships. The Hirosaki sent five: one from a bow-tube above the water-line, four submerged. All the other ships were ships with a varying number of tubes.

Three exploded in mutual collision before they reached the hostile fleet.

The rest arrived.

Men clapped and squeezed their hands upon their ears in expectant horror. The sea began to start, and rush, and quake. A swift series of venomous, behemoth bangs—quickening into ever madder swiftness—and rattling at last into a continuous thundering roar that seemed to proceed from the very throat of Jehovah—split the universal air, and burst the hearing of all about that sea.

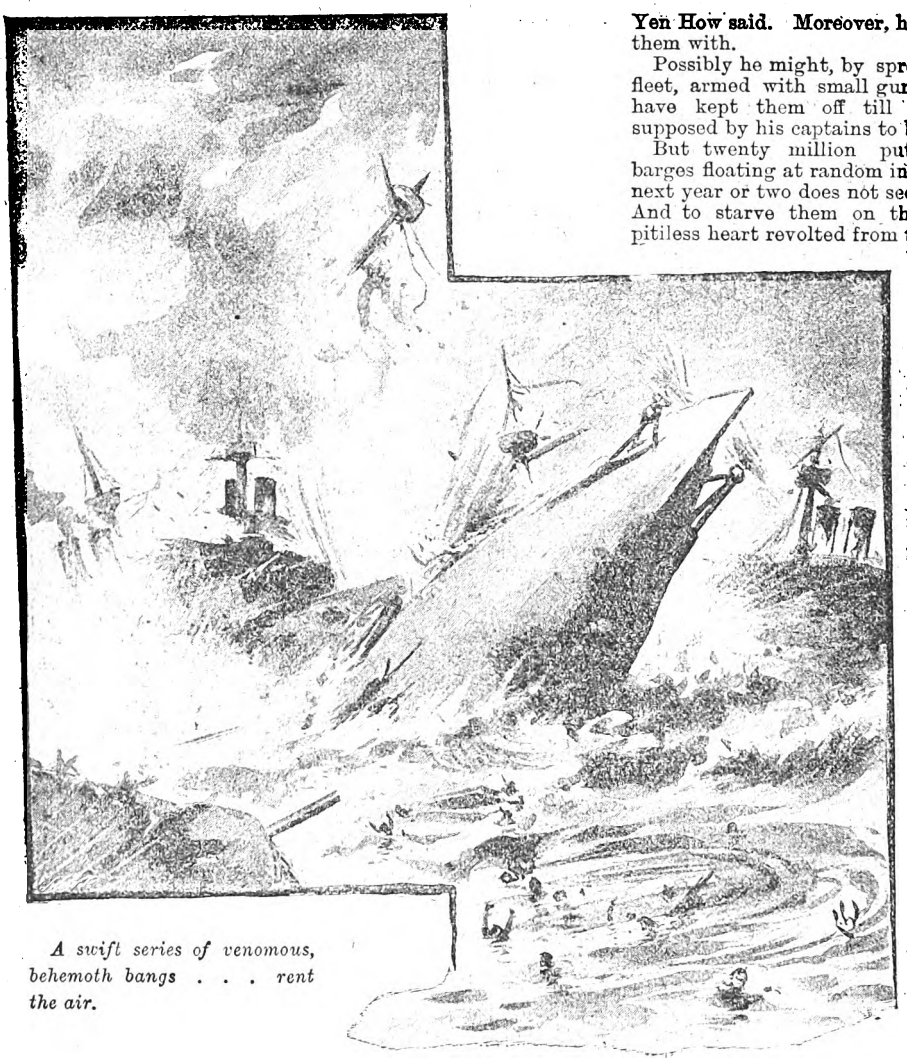
It was heard in London; it was heard in Paris.

The British ships, shocked at each swift-recurrent detonation, jerked and started in convulsive throes, like dying fowl, upon the spasmic, kicking water—started, and leapt, and dived, and sank. And as though in response to some vast upheaval of nature, down upon the sea swept at once a passion of wind, and a furious rain, and a black and utter gloom.

Far over the ocean the floating millions of yellow men heard the staccato of that dread tumult. And many a one imitated and repeated the sound with his lips.

Pop, pop, pop, they went; and pop, pop, pop, they went,

Digitized by Google



A swift series of venomous, behemoth bangs . . . rent the air.

Yen How said. Moreover, he had next to nothing to shoot them with.

Possibly he might, by spreading out his vast merchant fleet, armed with small guns, along the south-east coast, have kept them off till they starved; and this was supposed by his captains to be the course he would adopt.

But twenty million putrifying, derelict Chinese in barges floating at random in the Channel tide-way for the next year or two does not seem to have been after his mind. And to starve them on the open sea . . . even his pitiless heart revolted from that.

Or, they might have been driven back to France; or, seeing that they could not land on England, they might have returned to France on their own initiative. But Hardy did not wish them to return to France, thinking that there were already there a sufficient number of millions to engage the energies of his country for many a long day to come.

And so it happened that with the next morning's light—for at last something resembling a sun was seen, in spite of a furious gale of wind now blowing from the north-west—a strange, new spectacle, somewhere rather south of the latitude of Harwich, was seen—an immense multitude of ships covering the entire circle of sea, crawling painfully northward, each one trailing behind her a long line of barges crowded with men.

Hardy had the twenty millions in tow.

Not one had landed. To this diversion from their purpose, they had made practically no resistance. If a Chinaman fired at the tug which came to secure his barge, the barge was promptly sunk by way of stern example. Most were unarmed with fire-arms.

For many hours during the afternoon and night of the battle they toiled by the aid of search-lights, the ships having rendezvous at the N. Foreland, where, at about midnight, they congregated.

And now began the long, toilsome voyage northward.

What made the sufferings of both whites and Chinese worse, was the fact that, from the first bleak sunrise to the last, a heavy wet sea was running in the direction of the gale, and the burdened and labouring ships continually drenched their length in spray shipped over the dipping bows. A monotonous, light rain fell from the dark-grey and hurrying sky; and far over the heaving, stale sea-water rolled down stretches of foaming sea-spue, as though the sea, sea-sick of itself, spumed the vomit of its bitter old unrest adown its own weary bosom. Through the cordage sang in many tones the gale; and salt was in the weird sagas that it sang, and salt was on the flowing decks, and salt in the wet sea, and the world was made of brine.

Ever and again, a ship staggered through every timber, and stopped, tugged from behind by a backward swing of her ponderous following. Then on, crawling, again.

Here the tail led the dog.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

The "Crime" of Hardy.

It is not our business here to defend what has been called by leisured persons sitting secure in their studies the "crime" of Hardy.

Napoleon, taking the "Laws of Heaven" into his own hands, poisoned at Acre a goodly number of his sick soldiers to save them from the hands of a cruel enemy. This, too, raised a cry, and was called "crime."

Another of that genus took upon Himself to break the old Sabbath, and this raised a cry; but He did not mind.

Personally, we believe that the Great Man has, naturally and properly, these powers; that what He does is right; that the King can do no wrong.

Having cleared the sea of hostile warships in that world-tragedy in the Channel, Hardy found himself confronted with the problem of an army which was approaching a long line of English coast—not far off—an army which was not so much an army as a locust host.

What was he to do with them?

He could not set about and shoot them, for that, supposing he had had a large fleet, would have taken him a year, as

Digitized by Google

Ever and again, pop would go a stout hawser, and away would go drifting to the S.E. the lessening scream of a bargeload of Chinamen.

Northward, northward, in vast funereal procession. And far yonder in the van of all—the Hirosaki, shattered-looking, butting bulkily at the billows, as one who has seen worse things—and come through them. In her cabin, which is crowded with wounded men, sits Hardy; and near him, in long colloquy, a man named Henrick Björnson, a Norwegian sea-captain, who can shout broken English. What Hardy's deaf ears cannot make out, the man writes.

Northward crawls the unspeakable procession. It crosses the latitude of Hull, of Edinburgh; it approaches the Norway coast; it is at Bergen, at Christiansund. Always it crawls northward, and the Hirosaki, like the Pied Piper, leads. . . .

On the Tuesday foreday, the Hirosaki, in latitude 67° 48", slackened speed, and, while the dawning was still grey and ineffably bleak, the stragglers of the fleet came in.

Hardy had reached the grave-side now—the side of the one grave which Europe offered him for the burial of his dead.

Here and now a very great stress and sound of stormy winds were abroad, struggling for the held-on hat, blowing long ribbons of rope, and rolling before it billows of the sea.

The Hirosaki trumpeted a semi-circular formation, and this for about an hour, from ship to ship, went trumpeted till it reached the outermost rings of ships ten miles away. And in another hour and a half the vastest curve of ships, stretching north-east and south-west, that had ever been seen by an eye—the horns looking like tiny toys to the centre, and invisible to each other—lay assembled, slowly steaming, or sailing close-hauled.

The morning lightened, but with ever a slow, and drear, and raw melancholy. It was the morning of an execution.

John Hardy, with the brim of an oil-skin hat about his ears, in oil-skins to his feet, stood clinging to a taffrail aft, facing the strong blast that loaded his breast with spasms of violence, and struggled for the ends of his flapping and quarrelling skirts. And near him, in oil-skins, stood a tall, broad-bearded man, the sea-captain Björnson.

Björnson touched him.

Hardy said:

"Well?"

Björnson took out his watch, held it before Hardy's eyes, put his mouth to Hardy's ears, and shouted:

"It is time!"

Hardy said:

"All right."

Already in the look of the water around, there was something horribly outré. It seemed as if the sea were getting calm—too calm for the wind that blew. It acquired a certain pallid oiliness in its heave.

Hardy called his trumpeter; he said:

"Tell the captain of the Umbria that I want a hundred and fifty Chinamen taken on board his ship—at once."

And down the wind went this command to the neighbouring ship.

And in ten minutes this other:

"Ships to cast off barges, and follow flag-ship in same formation, west by south."

At once the Hirosaki put her bow in this direction. The other ships, as their hawsers astern tightened on their new course, slipped them. A thousand hawsers slapped the sea.

The ships moved on. The barges remained.

But not stationary. They, too, moved—slowly—glidingly—right in the teeth of the wind—northward—all of them, over many a mile.

The barges fell into long strings, and patches, and colonies, like trailing sea-weed, always, as they glided, retaining their fixed relative positions.

The men in the barges saw surely that they moved. But what moved them? The crude early-morning blast blew upon their woeful, sallow faces.

Their rate of motion, from moment to moment, quickened. . .

There was something now detestably baleful in the aspect of the water. The great waves had died to a glassy, heaving smoothness. Only, here and there in irregular patches over the surface broke out stretches of vapid foam, or ghastly bubbles. And the ocean went gadding, gadding northward.

This is the First Mood of the Maelstrom.

Then a wonder happened. A string of barges shot suddenly askew, and went wildly hasting in a long curve to the east; and another string shot askew in a western curve; and in not more than a minute a hundred thousand barges were spasmodically ranging in curves of every shape and direction over the sea, flying a while—then slowly stopping—then flying off in new curves again.

"It is time!"

Suddenly, all this motion ceased. The sea settled into a lake-like stillness, except for patches of bursting, simmering bubbles on its face.

But with the suddenness of the thunder-clap came a change. The surface rapidly assumed a morose hue of the deepest blue, a blue which was liker black. And at once it began to heave itself up into waves, mountain-high, which danced like the Merrymen in a swinging, oscillatory, up-and-down jig, as if buoyed up by some great submarine power which dandled, and tossed, and danced them. And down the steep sides of these cones of water poured the barges of the clinging, staring, screaming men.

But now again, suddenly, the mood is changed—and a voice goes forth over the waters, a doleful sound of the sea. The high, dancing waves die down, and immediately an awful wide change is taking place—a rapid, intense reorganisation of the whole sea-surface—a breathless hurry and scurry of preparation for some unspeakable drama of the deep. There are tracts of black and choppy sea tumbling in roaring haste one way, and tracts tumbling another, as if flying across to take sides in some impending agony. And all at once the whole is over; and every wave, and eddy, and barge, and flake of froth, slips into the sweep of one mighty, bawling, racing whirlpool.

Digitized by Google

Within the writhing uppermost ridge of this vast circumference, invisible under a fierce white wrath of shrieking spray, fly with a thousand wings the barges of the yellow men, fly on even keel, fly uplifted, half in air, spurned from the polished ebony of the dizzy hollow-cone of water. And as they fly, the storm smothers their gasping breaths, and lifts their hair. And as their speed intensifies to the droning sleep of the spinning-top, their queues stiffen and rise horizontal like darting serpents; and twenty million straight and fluttering pig-tails, keeping ever their distances, race in narrowing whorls towards a bottomless, staggering well, that yawns, six furlongs broad, within the central space.

Six miles away, his glasses at his eyes, stands John Hardy, musing. . . . .

* * * * *

Opposite Christiansund, the Hirosaki and the Umbria were very near together; and here a change of crew took place; the entire crew of the Umbria transhipping into the Hirosaki, and one hundred and thirty of the Hirosaki's crew going over into the Umbria.

These hundred and thirty consisted exclusively of the "Hundred-and-Eighty" men of Kiao-chau fame.

It was a mysterious proceeding, incomprehensible to Umbria men, but readily comprehensible to some of the "Hundred and Eighty." These had sworn an oath.

On board the Umbria were a hundred and fifty Chinese.

Murray (he of the Diary) took over with him to the Umbria a small packet which he had received from Hardy's hand—which Hardy, in his turn, had received from a Dr. Fletcher of Harley Street.

The packet contained some hypodermic syringes, and three vials, containing a thick, dark-grey liquid. . . . .

The Hirosaki then continued on her southward way; but the Umbria put in at Christiansund.

There, on the strand near the town, shortly before morning, they landed two of the hundred and fifty Chinamen. In the right fore-arm of each of these two men was a tiny needle-prick; and as they went walking toward the town, an ink-black spot appeared on their cheek, and a black froth ridged their lips. . .

The Umbria then continued her voyage, which lasted two weeks. She stopped at Copenhagen, at Königsberg, at Stockholm, at Petersburg. And wherever she stopped, she landed two Chinamen with black spots on their cheeks, and a black froth at their lips. . .

She continued her voyage. She stopped at Amsterdam, at Boulogne, at Bordeaux, at Genoa, at Constantinople, at Odessa, at seventy-five European ports. At each she left two Chinamen with needle-pricks in their fore-arms. . . .

* * * * *

"Well, well, Brassey," said Hardy in the Hirosaki cabin, his arm flung spasmodically round the neck of Brassey, who had remained with him, "well, well, boy. I was once—I was once—different to this——"

His arm dropped heavily. Then, suddenly, he pushed Brassey violently on the breast.

"Go away—go away, sir," he cried.

And in an instant his arm dropped heavily again, his chin on his breast.

He was no longer sane. His hand was thicker than itself in brother's blood. His final hour of darkness and tragedy was hasting to meet his life. All his sky was an ink of clouds. Now again he tarried cowering in Gethsemane.

He no longer slept. Now he roamed the cabin like a wild man; now he sat still and languid, his head on his hands, his eyes having in them the senility of old people's. Every five minutes he bent double in paroxysms of moist coughing. Always the sailor, Brassey, was by him.

The Hirosaki arrived at Dover on the Friday evening at seven. A red brand of fever was then on Hardy's brow.

He was taken through the crowd in a close carriage to the Lord Warden Hotel. The news was flashed abroad that he had arrived, and all the bells of England gladly lilted and welcomed his coming. Hardy could not hear them.

For him was neither joy nor sleep. Doctors were summoned, but Hardy would not see them.

He threw himself on a bed; but rose again and paced the chamber in shirt, and trousers, and socks, to a late hour.

At eleven there was a ring. Brassey, who was in an anteroom, received a card at the door from a servant, but said that there was to be no admittance of any sort that night.

Hardy appeared suddenly at the inner door of the anteroom; he said:

"What is it?"

Brassey handed him the card, and Hardy looked at it.

"Ha! ha! ha!" he laughed at once. "My friend Edrapol! Ha! ha! ha! Edrapol, my old friend!"

He had wholly forgotten Edrapol.

* * * * *

Behind the ruins of St. Mary's Church, north-east of the town, at two in the morning—they fought.

Here the strong, prone will of Hardy had asserted itself. He had insisted, and could not be withstood by Brassey. Edrapol's second was a sailor-boy from the Hirosaki, Hardy's was Brassey; and the weapons used were Hirosaki swords of Japanese design.

A full moon shone. Yonder on the foot-path leading from the East Cliffs waits a carriage, which has been coach-manned by Brassey.

It is a barbarous duel. There is no doctor there. Positively only four men are in the secret.

They take places, sword in hand, stripped to their shirts. The seconds take their places, too. There are two Admiral Colomb ship-lanterns.

This is a duel without venom on either side. In one mind there is the mere prone desperation of an hour of tragic gloom; in the other a mere coxcombish pleasure at finding once more a sword in his hand, and an antagonist before him.

Only two hearts throb as though they must burst the imprisoning bosom—the hearts of the seconds. The hearts of the principals are cool, though Hardy's body burns with fever.

The moment comes. Hardy coughs; Edrapol waits. Then the swords lift and cross.

And now ensues a three-minutes' contest between the most exquisite conceivable science on the one side, and the shrewdest, quickest wit on the other.

Briskly ply the complex, gleaming steels, with feint and thrust and parry, in tierce and quarte and staccato, stab and hew—to the infinite surprise of Edrapol, who finds here a man that can fight, and is glad.

He braces himself to the matter, Edrapol. He rises à la hauteur of his antagonist. But rise as he may, the fame of great Edrapol is henceforth stained, and his sleeve, —with a thin trickle of blood.

He flushes somewhat, Edrapol. It is necessary, then, to couper court? He rises to a still greater height. Among the long white hairs of the famous man plays the night-wind.

Then there is the sudden "Ah——," and the limp failure, and the strong contrast of red on white, and the sword clattering to the ground. The steel of Edrapol is in Hardy's bosom.

* * * * *

The next morning Britain learnt with woe and terror that he was wounded. He lay at the Lord Warden Hotel, and was unconscious, but, as to the wound, it was not dangerous. So ran the bulletins.

But by the next night, he was tossing in acute hyperpyrexia, and was delirious. Miss Bosey Jay had hurried to his side in almost crazy scare, and about his apartment waited two royal ladies. In one of the ante-rooms of the suite sat old Mason, stricken to death, swaying his decrepit body from side to side.

Digitized by Google

Half-hourly bulletins were issued by the royal physicians.

At one time during the first night, Hardy seems to have gone back in imagination to the period of his tortures, uttering fearful screams, and exhibiting signs of the most abject terror. But towards morning, he became calmer under the influence of opiates.

About noon, Miss Jay's hand being then firmly gripped in his, he said quite coolly:

"A good strong coffin made of Harveyed nickel steel, dropped into the middle of the Channel. . . ."

And there stopped. Nor spoke again till some three hours afterwards, when, lifting up his right arm, he cried in a loud voice:

"By the Lord, I warn you, Yen How!"

After this the delirium appeared to leave him. He sank into a quiet sleep which, however, was made ominous by a throat rattle, and the veinous transparency of his far-sunken eye-lids.

The nation waited on in a bitterness of suspense, humbling itself before the Almighty in anguished prayer for his life, but for his life.

But at seven in the evening the end came. Hardy suddenly woke from his feeble slumber, jerked his body upright on the bed, and as it in answer to some official summons, screamed a sharp "Here!" and gasped, and died.

His Calvary was not heroic—without "vigour and rigour."

That the great man of England should perish by the hand of an impossible, very-foreign professional duellist, here was the very irony of Destiny. But so it was.

CHAPTER XXXV.

The Black Spot.

With the death of Hardy the detail of our chronicle must end.

The results of his malignest act of enmity against the yellow race—results far surpassing in horror and vastness those of any of his other acts—he did not live to witness.

It is certain that he could never have expected so wide-spread a result from the distribution of the injected Chinamen about the European coasts, for the simple reason that he did not know of Yen How's inauguration of the Yellow Gods at Paris, which inauguration was the chief cause of the universality on the Continent of the new Black Death.

As soon as an idol-less Chinaman was griped by the malady, or even saw the black spot on a neighbour's cheek, his first instinct was to rush toward the one place of hope—the temple at Paris. And as he rushed, he went spreading far and wide that winged plague, that more putrid Cholera, dissipating it among thousands, who in their turn rushed to infect wide millions.

So within three weeks perished, it is said, a hundred and fifty millions. Europe was a rotting charnel-house.

The steel of Edrapol is in Hardy's bosom.

But in three months the plague was over; and still England found herself confronted with the long, and sometimes bloody, and always tedious, task of clearing out of Europe nearly a hundred million yellow men.

After all, John Hardy's idea of the extinction of the yellow man never came to pass. Hardy was wise, but Nature is wiser. The yellow man is in the Scheme.

But now this one appalling fact arose upon the consciousness of the British people: that the Continent of Europe was British territory. This meant that all Asia and Africa were British, too. And if Europe, Asia, and Africa, then, beyond doubt, America also; for no two Powers, one so vast and the other so comparatively small, could co-exist side by side without a formal or informal acknowledgment of the suzerainty of the greater by the smaller. The sceptre of Britain, therefore, stretched from pole to pole, and from the river to the ends of the earth.

How now would she comport herself, old England? Would her reign be mild, and golden, and millenial? Or harsh, and vulgar, and triste?

Digitized by Google

Here now was the chance for the rather minor poets of the time to break into measured prophecy, and with a certain real authority, sing for the nation its august present, and define its future. And Mr. William Watson—the man-lyre—say Apollo's lyre, without Apollo—he sang:

Now declare me, my love, my dove,
The Temple you fore-see;
Its frame below, its dome above,
And the Fabric's Summary.

So the lover sitting at the feet of his inspired mistress; and the mistress:

And would you foreknow the seeming
Of the Frame they now shall found?
Like a palace of pearl in mid-air!
And rainbows embosom it round.

Like lambs that bedow the hillside,
Or the flocks of dew at morn:
So natural, various, virgin.
Like a King's Heir, tardy-born.

Like anything mild and pompous,
Like anything based and broad:
Like the ascent with which King Solomon
Went up to the House of the Lord.

Like the minuet's sphere-harmony,
So cultured, measured, gay;
Like the Voice of God in the Garden
When it walked in the Cool of the Day.

It is the Ergon of all the Ages,
And kin to all Works of Art;
It shall stand in the All-Museum
As Man's contributed part.

For Mr. John Davidson, on the other hand (risky Pegasus-rider, he, or say even Pegasus-Jockey, not unacquainted with falls), the throng and noise of martial things had charms, and out, at the spur of the war, he broke:

Already War's barytone
Breaks up the camp of them,
Weigh well the ramp of them,
Marching to Marathon,
World-quake the tramp of them!

And he insists:

Wide, wide is the song of it,
Battle-words, doubtings,
Allalahs, routings,
Mix in the throng of it,
Jericho shoutings. . . .

. . . . .

But Ares, our man of war,
Flames o'er us unequal,
Not doubtful the sequel,
E'en now from the van of war
Rave rumours of triumph. . . .

But in the matter of prophecy, it was the poet, Mr. Francis Thompson—Miltonic, he, if not Milton, seeming sometimes to possess that rarest of all human faculties, the power of expressing an idea (or "thing-seen-by-the-mind") in fated words suggesting magic—he, in a single line, struck the chief motive of the future. For he says, slightly before the war:

I had in dreams an omen of the Year,
And many shapes foresaw, and divers woes;
In earth and sky was storm—till one clear sphere,
Calm as the moon, arose.

I saw processions; runnings to and fro;
One gasped his news, and died, arrived from far;
I heard disjointed trampings come and go,
And trumpets blown for war.

"The people have forgotten God," I said:
Frowns so superb, then war so huge, they showed:
The rocking nations, brazen-throated, dread,
Like Bulls of Bashan lowed.

. . . .

A sunset in the East, malign and drear;
Eclipses boding Change, and divers woes:
In earth and sky was night—till one clear sphere,
Calm as the moon, arose.

And one I saw who steered a boat of air,
A thing with helm complete, and valve, and sail:
He called: "To bring man nearer man I fare:
The gods up here—are well."

This prophesy of the boat of air was quite worthy of a seer: for that—successful aerial navigation—was, as it turned out, the big thing, the paramount motif, of the new century, utterly changing the relations of man with man, and, in fact, making Man a new creature.

When the journey from London to Pekin became a matter of a few hours, and a thing easy to each man, then Man, and each man, might be said, for the first time, to possess the earth.

The immediate result was the establishment, once and for all, of that sole basis of real national culture and of real individual refinement—Equality!

Upon the practical annihilation of one sort of space followed the annihilation of other sorts of space—of the space, for example, between you and me.

Equality! Victoria does not despise the Prince of Monaco. Both are independent sovereigns. The little prince does not kneel before the great queen: they are independent sovereigns. When all men were independent sovereigns, then came Culture, and the golden time.

A democracy of kings . . . . . or, at least, of gentlemen. . . .

The name of this democracy was—English?

The words France, Germany, Russia, persisted,—but only for postal convenience?

* * * * *

No, certainly, that would never do. England, no doubt will, in truth, absorb the world. The Loadstone is within us. But we must change. If the world is to become English, the English must first become worldly. We will not do as we are—we are in shockingly bad form!

Yet, here is a question: how came that epithet "merry" to be applied to our Vulgar-Roman England? How came it?

Is it not for this very reason—that all Man is embryo within us? Man the engineer, Man the conqueror, Man the ruler, Man the Puritan, Man the Greek?

The Greek phase, certainly, is in a state of embryonism "highly elementary"! Our Oxford professors do not crown their heads with vine-leaves—yet. The vine is not, in fact, an English plant. Yet lo! one hears already that it is being grown with success in Wales.

Wales—note the locality. Great England! In her is everything. In her is also—the Celt.

This is what John Hardy meant, when, writing from Paris, he said that all which they had there we should have, too, in time—and much more, much more. And Hardy was a lad likely to know.

England, indeed, is as old as France. But not so "precocious." Just as the French ladies fade sooner than the English, so France has become a modish old dowager, while England is yet a bouncing, crude, coarse-handed lass in her teens.

The centuries are not ended; the years of Destiny will unfold themselves.

On the whole, we here, looking up through the Night at the general drift of the stars, read for the earth a good Horoscope. We bet on Man. He is a right clever fellow—well-meaning—well-made. We lay our money on him—to our last copec, to our final obol, to our uttermost farthing—we bet it all on him!

His past is good—it is even brilliant. And somewhere within it there is a Secret, which at certain swift moments of insight, shocks, and dazzles, and electrifies the soul.

We, then, for our part, believe, and cry aloud, and prophesy. Out of the Eater shall come forth Meat, and out of the Strong shall come forth Sweetness.

"The gods up here . . . . !"

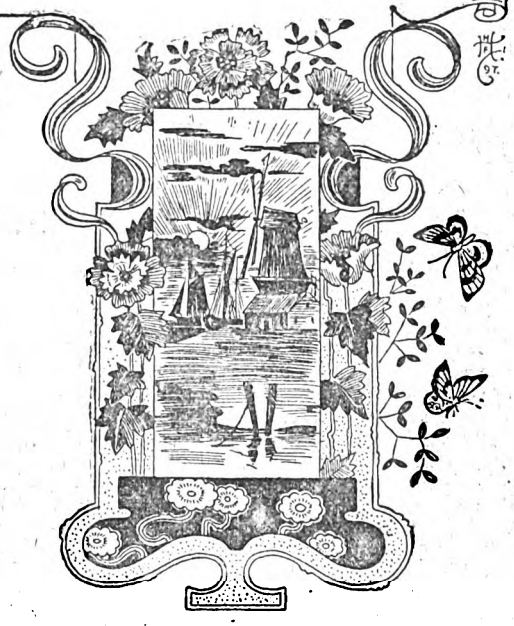
THE END.

Digitized by Google

A SAINT FROM THE SEA.



THERE is a village on the Carribean Sea where the thatch huts and the palms seemed tilted away from the everlasting southwest wind. It straggles backwards over the loose sand from the sweeping beachline that is lost in either direction in hanging mists from the breakers.

A low sand-bar, held out by the river, affords a shelter in fine weather for the canoes; when it storms, the breakers wipe it out and roll back on the beach. On squally nights the sand swirls up the one street, and the whistling of the lashed trees is louder than the roar of the sea behind the houses.

On fine days the fleet of canoes comes sailing home at sunset, and the fish the women pile on the sand are many-coloured. When the weather is heavy from the north and the canoes are out there is anxiety as the black boats come racing home over the dark water, and in the house of Juan prayers are said incessantly.

There is ready help on the beach for those who come through the breakers, and the beacon fires are whipped and beaten down by the wind, giving weird flashes of light. Many a woman has paced the coast through the night in sorrow, waiting for dawn to show the brown body of a fisherman beached among the cold fish.

Nets and lines are stretched to dry in the warm sand between the houses and the line of canoes on the beach. Empty salt barrels litter the village, and drying-frames for the fish are built even to the edge of the forest.

One calm morning the canoes from this village were some ten miles out at sea. Fishing was slow, and the men lolled over the gunwales scarcely paying attention to their lines. Juan Renjifo's canoe had drifted out beyond the others, when Juan's sharp eyes saw wreckage floating on the water.

"There may be tackle or iron work to be had, so we'll run over and see," said Juan.

They found the deck-house of a schooner. It had evidently floated for some weeks, for the soft green sea-grass clung flat to the exposed sides as the wreckage rose and fell on the waves. Juan's men made fast and gathered several lengths of slippery rope, and began prying off rusty hinges and iron rings.

"Hello, what's that?" called the boy who had clambered on to the wreckage.

He was peeping down the companion-way into the still water within the battered walls. He reached in and slowly drew to the opening an object that held the attention of the men crowding behind him. It was the schooner's cabin door, and on the upper side was tacked a large picture. The paper was damp and seaweed grew to the door's edges. As it was drawn out into the sunlight the colours of the picture shone brightly, and through the masses of soft seaweed the men saw the outlines of a fair face and figure.

Interest in the ironwork was forgotten; rough hands brushed the grass from the floating door, and then they clearly saw the picture of a beautiful girl in a flowing, pale blue dress, her arms hanging at her sides. Her brown hair was tossed over her shoulders and the shadow of it was in her eyes. The bottom of the picture was torn away.

"Lift it out carefully," ordered Juan, "and set it in the canoe that the sun may dry it. Look at her! Jesu Nazareno! is she not beautiful!"

The canoe headed for home on the afternoon breeze. The sun dried the picture, and the men wondered who the woman might be and at the strange way it had come to them. Juan, as the captain of the canoe, referred to the find as his own, so forestalling any discussion as to the picture's place ashore.

In the village that evening interest in the haul was forgotten as the women crowded round the painting on the sand. They are a simple fisher people and superstitious, as are all men who follow the sea. As Juan's companions recited the circumstances of their discovery and heard the credulous comments of the women, they invested their find with the mystery and outer significance that had been growing in the mind of each of them during the run home. When Juan and another picked up the door the crowd followed quietly behind. Juan stood it up inside his hut, and there, in the light of flickering lamps, the people came in to admire the graceful form and the eyes and the soft colours.

"It looks like the pictures of the saints in the church at Vallalolid," said one.

The house became popular in the village, and its visitors grew. They envied Juan the possession of the thing, and the man first felt a pride in owning an object so popular, then a certain inexplicable allegiance to the eyes that looked out from the shadows of the hair.

Digitized by Google

* * * * *

Since three in the afternoon Winslow's horse had followed the road that led through the low forest behind the beach. Occasionally he had glimpses of the sea and the murmur of the surf was always in his ears. These tropical lands had a fascination for the Britisher, who spent months wandering from village to village among these sad-eyed, indolent and mysterious people, speculating as to their origin, interested in their ways and minds, and in a vagabondage that satisfied his restlessness. In such a mood he drew near, in search of a bed, to the village on the sands. He unsaddled his horse before the priest's door and the tired animal turned with a contented sigh to his fodder.

Later in the evening, as Winslow walked through the village, he came to Juan's house. His attention was attracted to the picture through the window, and on Juan's invitation he walked in. He laughed as he recognised the familiar poster and recalled the hoardings where he had last seen it.

"How did you people ever get that down here?" asked Winslow.

"It came to us from the sea," said Juan, and he recited the finding.

Winslow listened and understood how the cook, maybe, of some trading schooner had tacked this bright thing to his cabin door; but he knew nothing of the strange, almost religious hold it had already gained in the hearts of these fishing people. He laughed again.

"It's a small world, after all; think of that girl stuck up down in this hut," Winslow spoke in Spanish, and turned away.

"Why—you—do you—know her?" gasped Juan.

"Know her? Why, yes; it's a picture of Marie—what would you call it in Spanish?—Tempest; yes, that's it, Maria de la Tempestad."

Then Winslow turned and walked away, and only the eyes of the picture saw Juan fall on his knees and raise his hands.

Maria de la Tempestad! It was all clear to him now. From the sea she had been sent to help and comfort them. Maria de la Tempestad!—the patron saint of sailors, sent to watch over and guide them, to hear their prayers, to brighten their lives with her sweet mercies.

That night the first candle burnt on the new altar.

Juan related what he had learnt from Winslow. It only confirmed the dim belief of many of the people, and his story was accepted with a fervent joy in their good fortune. The picture was raised high on the wall, and a table before it held the dripping candles. The village girls brought flowers each morning and hung them over the old schooner's door. That room in Juan's house was given over to the new saint, for women came often to pray. Her blessing was asked as the canoes started in the morning, and thanks were given for her bounty when the fish were piled on the beach at dark.

There soon came a night when a fierce wind blew the canoes homeward over the waters. Then the women prayed long to Mary of the Tempest, while the men worked on the beach. Pedro's canoe did not come in, and Pedro's Tulita, in company with Dolores, whose man, Alejandro, worked with Pedro, knelt before the shrine and prayed—prayed until Pedro and Alejandro staggered into the light of the fires, exhausted from a battle with the surf far down the beach. Then ex-voto offerings appeared on the little altar—trinkets sold by Italian pedlars, cheap, tawdry and pitiful—but th cherished possession of some simple girl—or maybe a long strand of straight black hair.

So Maria de la Tempestad was enshrined and the church was neglected. The priest argued in vain. Was she not their saint, sent to them from the same sea that had brought sorrows to them all? they answered. Had she not saved Tulita's Pedro and Dolores's Alejandro?

What she had done for them was sufficient for them: their faith could not be shaken. From the shrine where they had placed her, by the mystery of her coming, by the look of her tender eyes, she ruled them and filled their lives. Men and women from neighbouring villages came to see and envied, just as the villagers themselves had in the beginning envied Juan that which was now regarded as a common good.

* * * * *

A little steamer puffed evenly over the green waves towards this village. The captain had decided to run in here for water and to pass the night should the weather threaten. A striped awning was over the upper deck, and beneath it and in the little cabin reclined the passengers. Forest, the company's advance agent, had brought about this sea trip to vary the heated journeys of the International Variety Company, of London, now touring in America.

With his customary push and knowledge of the country, he had arranged this sea trip instead of the hard overland journey to La Vela, where they were to open Sunday night. That was Foster's way of putting it. The captain smiled as he listened.

The company had played to good houses since arriving, but travelling expenses were heavy, and at the last town some properties had been shipped by mistake to Brazil, and Schaefer, the proprietor, and his son were complaining of business. They were inclined to blame Forest for losing the properties, and the company saw signs of a payday with no pay.

Becker, the stage manager, maligned the country to the good-natured captain; the soubrette talked at the engine-room door with the red-faced English machinist who passed as engineer.

The Japs, on the bills as trapeze performers, sat contentedly and quietly at the stern. La Cigale discussed the recent robbery of her trunk and the £15 she had lost thereby. Thus the afternoon, cooled perceptibly by the sea breeze, wore on, and the steamer headed in for the clearing in the green coast line that marked the huts.

The change in the boat's course aroused the women to a curiosity as to whether they were to spend the night at sea. The steamer swung in behind the headland that gave the village its so-called port. Interest in the picturesque houses and the dark people grouped on the sand beyond the quick reaches of the crumbling waves drew the minds of the soubrette and the dancer from their unanswered questions. They were seeing for the first time some of the beauty of the shores, and it attracted them. The steamer dropped anchor, and the soubrette climbed noisily into the first canoe that approached.

"Take me ashore, you niggers; I want to see your town. You ought to wear more clothes. They'd look at you in Bond Street dressed like that. Come on, Cigale, I'll help you in; come on, Becker, you can stand us beer. Have you got any beer ashore? Cerveza? Cerveza? I must have it."

Becker and the others tumbled clumsily into the big dug-out, while the natives steadied the canoe in silence and marvelled at the strange behaviour.

Digitized by Google

The strangers jumped ashore the moment the wave ran out and started toward the village, bent on reading its novelty. The soubrette tripped in her loose wrapper and the sand filled her unbuttoned shoes. Her hair was dishevelled and of two colours, for the dye worked out slowly.

At the door of the first house stood a native woman clad in a clean, simple dress of the country. She smiled pleasantly as the girl came along, and the soubrette entered her house. Once inside, she ran inquisitively at each object that drew her attention; she laughed at the low chairs, chattered away in English and made fun of the scanty furniture and household comforts.

Meantime the Indian smiled pleasantly. Unbidden, the soubrette passed into a second room and stumbling over a sleeping child, upset a gourd of freshly washed corn.

Then the Indian woman's face set a little and the smile left it—and the soubrette thought of her beer.

"Cerveza? Cerveza?" she asked.

The woman misunderstood, and pointing toward the door, answered:

"Si."

Becker and the others were passing.

"Come on, Becker, they've got beer in here, and she's going to treat——"

But the woman's dark arm barred the way as the others approached, so the girl left the house and followed them up the street, stumbling over her dress in the sand. Smiling men and women stood in doorways as they passed, and gravely offered them seats when they entered. But the visits were short, and like a gust of disordering wind in the neat houses. Becker trailed in the rear, dragging his coat and pulling up his trousers.

As the two came back down the street, the faces in the doorways were dark and forbidding, and behind the older people crowded children, watching the strangers with round eyes. In front of the church Becker and the soubrette met the rest of the party.

"I say, this village will have to do," began the girl, "I'm going to stay here all night—I'm not going to sleep in that little steamer——"

"Ugh!" said La Cigale, "vere will you sleep? Ze peegs walk zemselves into ze rooms, and zere are no beds."

"That's all right, they sleep in hammocks; I'll sleep anywhere. I've got friends all over the town. Becker and I have visited every family here. We'll give a show to-night—there's about ten shillings in the town, I guess. Mr. Forest, you're slow, you ought to have billed this place three days ago, and——"

The bedraggled girl broke off upon catching sight of young Schaefer, approaching with a roll of paper under his arm.

"Hello, Paul, what have you got? My posters, I declare. Let me have one. Are we going to play this town?"

"I've only got one, and it's for the Custom-house man; the captain said to give him one, it would please him——"

"Let me have it, I want it," interrupted the girl; "you can get another. I'm going to bill the town—go on—let me have it; you know you bought the whole lot cheap from the dealer's; it's the first time I ever travelled under anyone else's poster, but these niggers don't know the difference."

She pulled the paper from under Schaefer's arm and ran back to the church wall. She clambered up on an empty barrel that stood there and unrolled the poster to the view of the whole street. She fastened its top between two palm boards. There was the fair figure in flowing pale blue dress, and the serene eyes that looked out from under the shadow of rippling brown hair. "Esta noche á las ocho" ("To-night at 8 o'clock") was printed across the bottom in black letters.

A crowd gathered quickly, but it was a sullen and silent one, and the soubrette went on:

"Esta noche á las ocho—come and see me—Cerveza? No, para mi champagne," and from the unsteady barrel she raised one foot coquettishly.

A tall Indian had gripped Becker by the shoulder and was talking earnestly; the crowd grew, with never a word spoken.

"What's he saying, Jim; you know his talk?"

"He says is that picture of you."

"Yes; tell him yes. Yo, mi—si, si. Esta noche á las ocho,"—and again the soubrette tried to kick from the barrel.

An excited murmur broke from the crowd, and women raised threatening hands.

"Si, si—that's me—esta noche," but that was all. The barrel swayed and Becker caught the girl as she fell. They were quickly surrounded by the outraged villagers, and as the company hurried towards the canoe that had brought them ashore the natives surged round them.

Luckily there were no stones to hand, but they threw what they could. The girl, now in mortal terror, was pale and fainting. She put her arms over her head and stumbled blindly toward the beach. The women tore her clothes from her back. She fell into the canoe bleeding and bewildered. In disorder they pushed off, and Becker's clumsy efforts with the paddle half filled the boat in the breakers.

* * * * *

That night many candles burnt upon the altar in the house of Juan.

THE MARINER.

M. A. P.

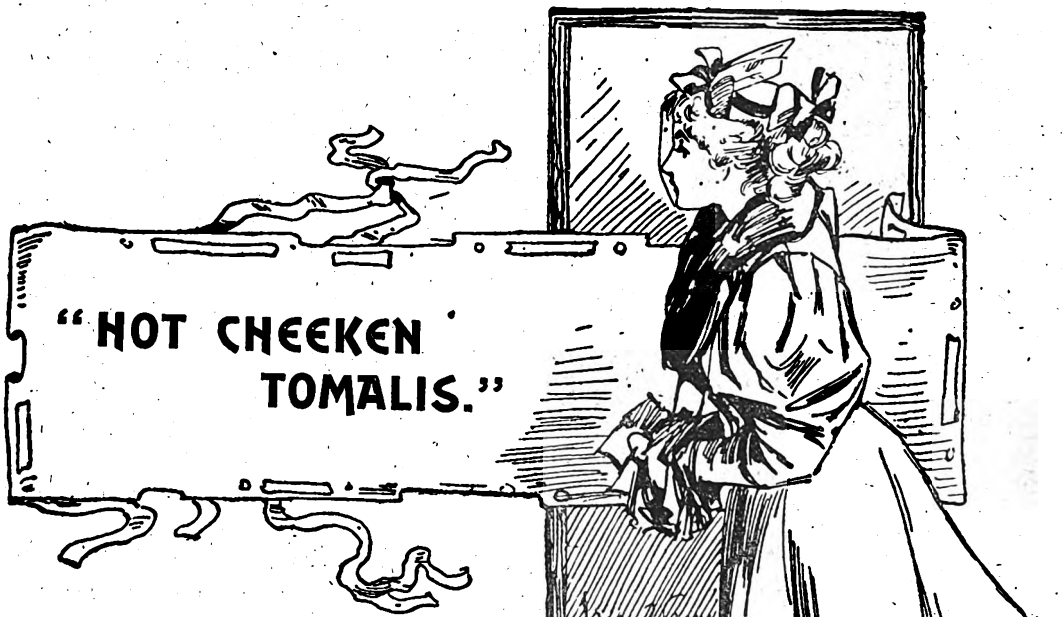
M. A. P. is our Latest New Paper. The First Number will Appear on Thursday Next, the 16th. Go to some News-agent and ask him to keep a copy for you.

M. A. P. means "Mainly About People," and is a High-class, Personal and Society Paper. It will be Edited by Mr. T. P. O'Connor.

Ask simply for M. A. P. It is filled with things you want to know. Its Price is One Penny.

M. A. P.

Digitized by Google



A BRILLIANT sunrise, a tomali stall, a handsome brunette tomali seller, and a savoury smell.

Those were the four things which Cyril Delzan noticed on the Plazadel San Antonio, Vera Cruz, one summer's morn.

Details at their best, perhaps, yet details which struck Cyril forcibly. The sunrise put him in a good temper, the tomali stall and its savoury ware put him in even a better, while the brunette—— But there! Cyril Delzan was impressionable.

He hesitated irresolutely in the middle of the almost deserted plaza. Should he, Cyril argued, return to the hotel for his breakfast, or stop and take a stay in the shape of a tomali? He sighed, stepped forward, stopped dead, then glanced lingeringly at the stall.

An arch smile, which displayed a brilliant row of small white teeth, coupled with the dimpled cheeks of the tomali maiden, decided Cyril. He retraced his steps, and advanced to the stall.

"Buenos dias, señora, uno tomali, uno tomali. Oh, blow! it's if you please, in English! Ingles, if you please!"

The Vera Cruzan maiden smiled again in reply to the lucid explanation and to the upraised sombrero.

Cyril glanced at the tomalis before him, then bending, sniffed suspiciously at the appetising odour, which issued from their tops.

"'Ot tomalis, señor, 'ot cheeken tomalis." More smiles and encouraging nods.

Cyril leant on the stall and commenced to eat.

"So you speak Ingles," he remarked between his mouthfuls. "Fine tongue—bella lingua, Ingles! Bella, than—than tomalis."

Another smile, very marked this time; evidently she understood him. "Very glad you and I can talk—hold a conversazione. Not a Dorcas meeting, is it? What is your name, bella donna? Deadly nightshade, eh? The everlasting Juanita, I suppose; eh, bella persona?"

Another arch smile. She had evidently comprehended the last two words of his speech.

He waited a moment for a reply. Receiving none, he took another bite out of his tomali, then pointing at her with his index finger said questioningly:

"Juanita?"

"Ni! Ni!" she replied brightly, catching the gist of what he meant. "Name? Angelinita!"

"Great Scott! Thanks, gracias señora!" he replied cheerily, emphasising his remark by dropping his pie, which rolled away merrily underneath the stall.

"Anozzer tomali?" she queried archly, holding one up in her taper fingers. "Ozzer mato!"

Cyril glanced at the pie which was being rapidly hidden from view in the mouth of a dog, then took the proffered eatable.

"You make them yourself?" he queried.

"Pedro."

"Sharp boy, Pedro! Well, adieu señora, adios! buena ventura! I don't know what it is, but that's all one. See you to-morrow," he cried, as, flinging the tomalis to the expectant dog, he paid the twelve centavos due for the tomalis and held out his hand.

Unhesitatingly she placed her slim one in his, which he impulsively raised to his lips. He gazed at it for a few seconds, marvelling at its beautiful shape, then glancing at the merry eyes before him, ever dancing with a latent mirth, he dropped the hand suddenly, and laughing merrily, started blithely on his way across the sunlit plaza.

Cyril Delzan was in love!

* * * * *

Digitized by Google

Twenty-eight days had passed since Cyril had first met Angelinita, and eight-and-twenty times had Delzan met the tomalis girl.

"Si, señorita," he exclaimed, taking the usual tomali from her stall, at the customary hour, 7.30 a.m. "This is eight and twentieth tomali I have eaten. Sabe, bella Angelinita, why I regularly eat them?"

"You's hungry, p'raps, Cyril!" she remarked archly, her cheeks radiant with dimples.

"Ni, ni! It's to see you, mia bella querida!"

A rippling laugh answered this enamoured declaration. Cyril felt small.

"Angelinita!" he exclaimed seriously, leaning his elbows on the stall. "I have taught you English, to make you able to understand how I love you. Carisima, you understand what I say?"

The pretty dark-eyed maiden was listening very intently, she dropped her long lashes modestly, glanced coyly at him from under them, then folding her hands together, waited.

"Hot chicken tomalis are very good," Cyril remarked with judicial gravity, "yet they may ultimately pall on the palate! Now, you see, mia querida, you could never do that. I have lots of reals, I am not a hopeless idiot, so don't you think you might take me in hand for the rest of your life, eh?"

"You would ver troublesome be," she remarked, pouting charmingly.

"No, I shouldn't be particularly obnoxious, I assure you," he replied genially. "I should be awfully good. I say, you have forgotten the pepper in these tomalis this morning. Angelinita, will you be my wife? And become an Inglesa señora? 'Pon honour, I have thousands of reals a year, I love you desperately, and all that sort of thing. You can have everything you wish for, and ——"

"Cyril, I do not vant your reals!" she interrupted tearfully.

"That means you won't have me, I suppose," he muttered gloomily. "Well, all right, it's vilely rough on me. I thought you might have loved me for my cash, then I could have had you always beside me! Well! well!" he exclaimed desperately. "I never had any luck, so why should I expect it now—— ?"

"Cyril!" she whispered gently, leaning over the stall till her soft cheek brushed against his, "I loff you vor you, carisima!"

"Angelinita!"

"Cyril!"

"Mia carisima!" murmured Cyril, stealing a hurried kiss, as he slipped over her taper finger a ring of brilliants. "Keep that till I replace it by a simpler one! But one which to me will be far more valuable."

The Vera Cruzan's English was limited as before stated, yet by stringing together the words she understood, she managed to get the gist of what he said. Twenty-eight days' tuition and cuteness had wonderfully improved her knowledge of the tricky language of Albion.

"Oh, it is lofely!" she murmured softly, gazing wonderingly at the ring flashing its prismatic rays angrily round. "Jus' lofely!"

"Not one bit as lofely as you, carisima."

"Bah! y'say zat cause 'oo love me, Cyril," she replied, blushing, as, taking off the ring, she placed it in her bosom. "Adios, Cyril—here, come, man, eat tomali. Adios, till morrow." She blew a kiss airily to him.

"Adios, then," he cried gaily. "Hang the man who wants to eat tomalis!"

"Tomali no sell then!" she replied archly, waving her hand to him.

He laughed gaily, then turned to walk to his hotel.

On his arrival there he found two letters awaiting him; one from his solicitors, the other from his step-mother, Lady Delzan. The letter from the former was cold and formal, and ran as follows:

SIR,

Richard Wingate, Earl of Rosolyn, being deceased, and leaving no heir, you, we believe, have inherited the title and estate belonging to the same. We respectfully urge an immediate return to England.

Yours obediently,
KNOX, BACON & BACON.

His step-mother's was equally as cold:

DEAR CYRIL,—I think it about time you returned to Delzan Towers. Loitering in Vera Cruz will not improve you, so kindly return to 40 Park Lane, at the beginning of the season. Of course you have not forgotten Queenie Somerset or my wishes on the subject—wishes, I may add, it will be unwise on your part to thwart.

Sincerely yours,
CHARLOTTE, LADY DELZAN.

"Charlotte, Lady Delzan," he muttered mechanically, applying a lighted vesta to the corner of the letter. "'Wishes it will be unwise on your part to thwart!' By Jove, if I do, I am penniless! What induced my pater to put that infernal clause in his will is beyond my ken. Queenie Somerset—estimable, no doubt—yet unappropriate! Great Scott! What am I to do about Angelinita? Lady Delzan's back will be up when she knows that the maiden of my choice is only a tomali girl!"

It was six in the evening before he came to a resolution as to what he would do. Seating himself at the table he penned a short note to Angelinita, then taking out his cheque-book he wrote a cheque.

"It's a caddish thing to do," he muttered hoarsely, "yet what can I do? Stay! I'd better not the cheque, I'll put in notes."

The mistake was soon remedied, and he rang a hand bell.

"Carloo!" Cyril exclaimed as a boy answered his summons, "take this to that address, and send the padrone here. I wish to pay my bill."

Carloo bowed and made his exit to give the order preparatory to taking Cyril's letter.

Angelinita received the note an hour later, and opening it in the fast fading light, read the following with rapidly blanching features:

CARO MIO,—By the time you have received this, I shall have left Vera Cruz and all it holds dear behind me. I have just received a letter from my madre, who desires me to marry my cousin. A refusal means ruin. Angel, forget and forgive me! I shall never forget you—I never shall, as Heaven is my witness! I dare ask the same of you? Inclosed you will find notes to the value of £1,000—a slight recompense for those twenty-eight days of bliss I have spent with you; days, alas, which have wrecked my future life, as they have blighted my happiness! Angel, adios for ever! It is useless for you to search for me, but if at any time you are in monetary distress go to Senor Nozes.

Digitized by Google

Yours in memory till death,

Cyril Delzan.

The letter fluttered unheeded to the ground, the notes lying crushed in her nerveless hands, which were pressed in agony against her heaving bosom.

"Cyreel! Cyreel!" she muttered hoarsely. "Did oo tink reals could make me forget? Though I am but a tomali girl!"

Then sinking on a stool, she buried her face in her hands, while dry, heavy sobs shook her slender frame.

Two hours later Pedro looked in the room. The pale moonlight shed its soft effulgence over all.

"Angel!" he cried. "Art here, Caro," then elevating his voice exclaimed, "Carisima, thy brother has come home."

Receiving no answer he entered the room, then uttered a cry, as he noticed the senseless figure of his sister stretched before him, one hand clutching a crumpled note, the other a ruby ring.

* * * * *

Lady Delzan was pleased with herself, decidedly so, for had not Cyril just returned with his wife from a honeymoon, which had lasted eighteen months?

"My dear Cyril," she exclaimed rapturously, the evening following his return, "Queenie looks positively charming to-night!"

"'Umph!" was the sociable rejoinder. "Glad you think so!"

"And she is so vivacious and pretty that she has captured the hearts of all the old bachelors."

"That's always her first exploit when she's at a dance. I wish one would capture her and execute a bolt."

"Cyril!"

"My dear mater-in-law—or, rather, step-mater—please don't look so horrified. You worry me." He smelt his carnation buttonhole.

"Cyril, did I hear you correctly?"

"Couldn't say I'm sure. I remarked that I wished some old Johnnie would execute a bolt with her!" Cyril said callously.

"You are decidedly flippant," remarked Lady Delzan stiffly. "Come to the ballroom, Cyril, the clock is just on the stroke of twelve—it is time for supper! Ah, the lancers just ended; how opportune. You will take the Marchioness of Russleton in. I reserved the supper for you with her."

"Awfully kind of you, but I wish you hadn't."

"Cyril, she's charming! Blonde and sweetly pretty——"

"I hate blonde dolls!" interrupted Cyril irritably. "My wife's blonde."

Lady Delzan ignored his last words; it was politic so to do, for she had no wish to rehearse the stormy scenes he had with her during the days preceding Cyril Delzan's marriage to the Honourable Queenie Somerset.

"Of course, if I had known that you preferred brunettes, I would have asked the Duchess of Bute if she would confer the honour of reserving the supper dance for you. She is a Mexican, and very pretty; they say all Mexican women are pretty."

The vision of Angelinita rose before him as he replied dreamily:

"Pretty? Some of them are infernally beautiful!"

"Cyril! very beautiful," corrected Lady Delzan, tapping him playfully with her fan. "She has taught me how to make a peculiar little pie. It is called a 'chicken tomali.'"

"Eh?" cried Cyril, starting violently. What a flood of sad, yet withal, tender memories these two words awakened within him!

"Chicken tomali," replied Lady Delzan, threading her way through the guests to the ball-room, followed by Cyril. "They are delicious."

Cyril lead his partner into supper, and obtained what she wanted, like one in a dream.

"Are you not going to eat anything yourself, Lord Rosolyn?" asked the Marchioness of Russleton.

"I don't know quite what to have," he replied, smiling at his partner.

"Señor, may I offer you a 'hot cheeken tomali'?" queried a gentle voice at his elbow.

He started. The voice was strangely familiar. Where had he heard it? In a Mexican Plaza. Where?

"Will you not take a 'hot cheeken tomali'?" she queried almost pleadingly.

"Angelinita," he whispered hoarsely.

"Cyril," she murmured gently.

"Angel," he whispered, taking a tomali, "I must see you for a moment. Are you disengaged for No. 20?"

"Yes," she answered hurriedly, "you can have it. I also must see you." Then turning to her partner she began to chatter vivaciously to him.

Cyril was like one in a dream till the band struck up the well-known strains of the "Dreamland" waltz; then he claimed the Duchess of Bute as his partner.

After a conventional turn he led Angelinita to the conservatory.

"Angel," he said hoarsely, "so we meet again."

"Yes, Cyril," she replied softly. "The wheel of fortune has indeed been kind to me—from a social standpoint. In love it has been cruel. I knew you would be here to-night, so I brought you a present which you once made me—£1,000," she said gently, taking the crisp notes from her bosom. "The compensation for a shattered dream of love. The ring I will keep, or, if you desire it, will purchase it. It is a monument, in miniature, of the worth of a man's pledge."

She glanced sadly at the rubies in the ring.

"Angel," he said hoarsely, "do not be hard on me.

Digitized by Google

Do you think the wrench was nothing to me? What I have done I was forced to do. My life is a living purgatory. With you, your life is bliss. Bute is kind, I know ——"

"My husband died a year ago! just two years after we parted, Cyril!"

"Dead?" echoed Cyril, "and I never heard of it! And you are free!"

"Precisely!"

"And I—I am not!" hissed Cyril.

"If you were, it would not make the slightest difference to me," replied Angel coldly, yet withal affectionately. "Cyril, you spurned my love—true I was only a tomali girl—yet a tomali girl has a heart, and resents as much as the highest dame in the land such an insult—an insult may never be forgotten!"

"Angel, on my honour!"

"Cyril, it suits you badly to speak of honour to me! Here, take your notes; I did not need to have so great a sum. Of what count is a broken heart the more or less in this world?" she exclaimed bitterly, extending the notes.

"Take the money," he returned desperately, "and do what you like with it! I don't want it—burn it!"

"No," she replied, "I will keep it in case you die before me——"

"Well, what if I do?"

"I shall expend it on a wreath;" she smiled sadly. "Or if I die first, I shall leave it to you for the purchase of such like ornament! I may as well say good-bye for ever to-night, Cyril! I leave for Vera Cruz to-morrow!"

"Vera Cruz?"

"Yes!" she replied; then suddenly losing her fortitude, she flung her arms round his neck and sobbed: "Oh, Cyril, Cyril! How could you have served me as you did when I loved you so?"

"Angel, my darling, do not make me feel my character of a cad too much!" he cried desperately, kissing her forehead passionately. "Angel, I loved you once better than the whole world, and, Heaven forgive me, do so still!"

"Cyril, have you forgotten Lady Rosolyn?" The question was asked tremblingly.

"No, Angel! Before I married Queenie I told my step-mother I hated her. She laughed and reminded me of my father's will. I had to submit or else go penniless. Angel, forgive me! I know what I ought to have done, but poverty appalled me. To my shame be it said!"

"Cyril! Cyril! I understand," she replied brokenly. "But now, when our day dream is over, you must promise me one thing."

"Angel, you know that I would promise you a thousand."

A sad smile flickered for one moment across her beautiful face, then, looking steadily into his eyes, she said:

"Cyril, promise me now that you will do what I am about to ask you. On your honour."

"I promise faithfully on my honour, as a peer of England, to do what you ask, so help me Heaven!"

"You must forget me, as if I never existed—and though it breaks my heart to say it, you must never think of me again."

"Angel, I cannot! I will not do this thing!"

"You gave me your word," she answered simply. "And I—I wish it to be kept."

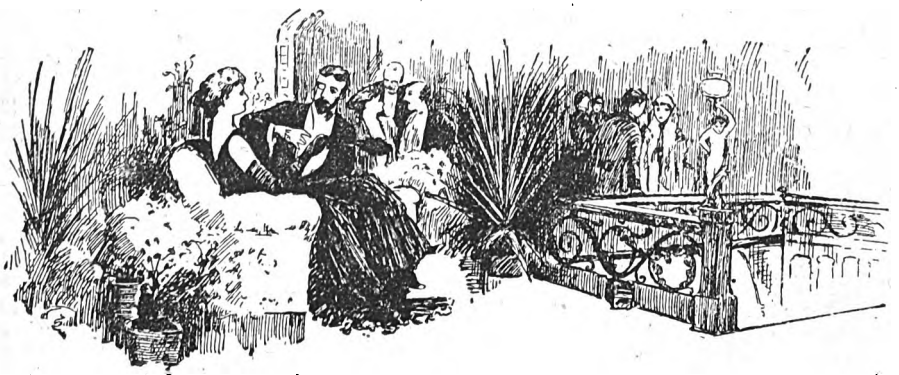
"So be it, Angel; it shall be kept." Then leading her to the ball-room, he stayed beside her moodily till she was claimed by a new partner.

One long, tender glance passed between them; then Cyril, with a stifled groan, passed out of the room and mounted the staircase.

Arrived in his bedroom, he opened a drawer in an escritoire, and, taking out a revolver, examined it and pulled the trigger as many times as there were chambers. It revolved perfectly. He slipped in two cartridges, revolved the chambers till the first loaded one was in position, then placed the barrel against his temple.

Below, the last bars of the final dance were dying away tremblingly on the heated atmosphere, when two sharp, loud reports hushed the buzz of conversation. A dread silence followed the ominous sound, for instinctively everyone realised that Death had visited No. 40 Park Lane.

TRISTAM MONKE.



Digitized by Google

The Man Who was a Corpse.

I was two-and-twenty, broke, and on my way to some new mines in North Queensland, Yarroko being my objective point, but had got lost in the heavily-timbered country beyond Cobra. Neither sleep nor food had been mine for two days. When a man is worn out and his stomach is empty, standing under a big cedar tree watching the rain is not precisely entertaining.

It grew darker and darker; my spirits fell lower and lower; the night came. I was just prepared to advance an opinion that life was not worth living, when my weary eyes caught sight of a twinkle in the distance. Ten minutes after I was knocking at the door of a good-looking sample of a bush farmhouse. While waiting for admission I noticed that there was a substantial barn within fifty feet of the place.

At last the door was opened by a tall, dark, determined-looking, handsome woman, evidently under thirty, who desired to know my business.

I stated with some hesitancy that I was in search of food and shelter.

The woman looked at me, or, rather, into me, as though she suspected I had a much deeper motive in presenting myself. This did not lessen my embarrassment, and I was beginning to stammer out the circumstances that led to my plight when she made an emphatic movement to close the door.

"I am sorry to be an unwelcome guest," I said, preventing her, "but food and rest are absolutely necessary, and I do not propose going any further in search of them."

She seemed rather surprised at my audacity, but did not shut the door, merely contenting herself with the assurance of her inability to accommodate me.

I then offered to forego the meal if she would permit me to dry myself and sleep on the floor of her kitchen. She shook her head.

"May I sleep in your barn?" I pleaded, thinking this would be a guarantee that I had no design on her valuables. Again she shook her head and remarked that it was out of the question.

"Indeed," said I, turning quietly on my heel. "I am going to show you that it is not at all out of the question, and I shall remain in the barn till morning, when I will repay your hospitality by any little job you can suggest. Good-night."

I had gone about ten paces when she called me back, and stepping aside, so that the light from the entry would fall on my face, she stood looking at me as before.

"Well," said I, unabashed, "what is it?"

"It is this," said she. "I have a corpse in the house. My husband died this morning, and he is lying upstairs. I have just thought that you might be willing to sit up with him—I mean 'it'—for a while. I have an errand to do. If I drive, it will only take about two hours. Supposin' you're agreeable to keep the watch till I return, I'll give you supper and a bed!"

I was never timid or superstitious, but, had I been both, these inducements must have overcome my objections, such was my state of exhaustion. At my weird hostess's request I presently went to the barn, where I found a good horse and a country cart. Having harnessed the horse to the vehicle, I drove to the house and tied the horse at the door. I now entered, to find my supper ready, and was about to do justice to the fare when the woman, motioning me to follow her, led the way up a narrow staircase.

In a small, barely-furnished room, stretched on a single bed, lay the corpse—a man of about thirty-eight or forty, with a full beard and a heavy moustache. The woman showing no signs of emotion, I made no remark, nor did I think a reply necessary when, raising her finger towards the corpse, she said, in a casual tone: "He's been gone just ten hours."

We descended almost immediately. My hostess pointed to the supper, and then, hastily donning her cloak and hat, left the house. I heard her drive away, and it was with a queer feeling that I looked at my reflection in a cracked mirror that hung upon the wall.

"Well," I muttered, "this is a strange turn, to say the least." But now Nature began to assert herself once more, and, turning to the table, I sat down and gave my undivided attention to the supper.

I sat eating and drinking for some time, and listening to the patter of the rain outside. Presently I began to feel drowsy, and I fancy that I must really have dozed, for the sound seemed to change. It was like the creaking of footsteps on the stairs. I pulled myself up with a start, for I had every intention of earning my supper, and I had agreed to watch till the hostess returned. The more I listened the more distinct became the footsteps. They were certainly coming down the stairs. I thought I heard the door behind me open, and I turned my head.

The next moment I was powerless to speak or move, for there, standing in the doorway, with his finger on his lips to impose silence, stood—the corpse.

My heart seemed to stand still for a second; another, and I had vaulted over the table, and was vainly trying to unfasten the front door. In an instant the corpse was beside me, holding my arm with the grip of a man very much alive.

Having assured himself that I should make no further attempt to get away, the corpse motioned me to a seat, took a chair for himself, and then, in a voice scarcely as sepulchral as I expected to hear, requested to know how I came to be there, and what my business was. It was some minutes before I could steady my voice sufficiently to give the desired details, but at length the corpse (as I shall still call him) became satisfied of my harmless intentions, and then, as if he in turn owed me some sort of explanation, he proceeded as follows:

"I ain't altogether sartain as to the length of time I've laid up there," and he pointed to the ceiling, "but I've been under the influence for a considerable spell."

Digitized by Google

I suppose he saw that I wondered what kind of influence he had reference to, for he quickly added: "Drugs."

"Yes," he continued, in a meditative tone, "she must have been at it for months, off and on."

"Your wife?" I remarked, more for the sake of bringing him out of his reverie than because I was curious.

"Yes," and he nodded, as if what he was about to mention was a very common occurrence. "You see, it's like this. She's got her eye on another mate, a younger man than me, and much handsomer, too," this with an air of strict impartiality. "Yes, there's no denyin' it, much handsomer. Well, they've had their plans fixed for some time, and I s'pose they're in a hurry to get married. This'll account for the extra strong dose, and to think that it didn't take effect after all. She'll be awful disappointed." He shook his head as if he were truly sorry for his murderous spouse.

He now relapsed imto silence, and, turning to the supper table, began to ply a vigorous knife and fork. He ate rapidly as if in obedience to stern duty. He motioned me to join him, but I intimated that my hunger had been appeased, and I sat silently listening to the patter of the raindrops against the window pane.

Having finished his apparently unrelished meal, the corpse arose and produced a jar of tobacco and two pipes, one of which he handed to me. Together we puffed in silence, which was unbroken till the bowls were empty.

"I reckon they'll soon be getting back," was his first remark.

"They?" said I.

"Yes; she's gone after him and she'll bring him back with her to view the body. I guess I'd better be getting back upstairs. It'll take some time to lay myself out naturally. You don't mind being left, I suppose?"

"Not at all."

"Very well, then, just a word, and I'm going."

"You'll just sit here," continued the corpse, "until they get back, and you won't give no information concerning the company you've had. She'll probably ask if everything is all right, and you'll just give a nod, which'll mean that it is. I think," he went on, "that you remarked as you were a stranger in these parts."

I nodded.

"Well, you won't be detained beyond your original intentions, but you'd better not change your mind nor act in any way sudden."

I made no reply, and my companion slowly made his way up the narrow flight of stairs.

This noise overhead scarcely ceased when the sound of wheels became distinctly audible. A moment later and she entered the room, accompanied by a tall, robust-looking young fellow, who was laughing and chatting; indeed, they were both pretty merry. The drive had revived the lady's spirits to a wonderful extent.

"Everything all right?" she asked; and then, not waiting for a reply, she bade me go and put the horse up, when I should be shown my bed.

It was now about ten o'clock, as near as I could judge.

I rose to do the woman's bidding, and as I was untying the horse from the door-post, I saw, through the half-open door, my hostess and her companion preparing to ascend the stairs. The rain had ceased, and the stars were shining brightly. I led the horse within a few feet of the barn, when a strange impulse caused me to turn and look at the house.

I don't know what I expected to see, but at that moment two pistol-shots rang out loud and clear on the night air, and I stopped as if they had taken effect in my own body. Then I listened, scarcely daring to breathe; but there was not another sound—nothing to relieve the oppressive silence.

I stood as if in a dream, realising nothing until the horse gave a jerk, indicative of his desire for his stall. I took up the fallen reins and was about to follow, for the horse was now leading me, when a voice at my elbow said:

"You seem to be taking your time about putting that there horse up."

It was the corpse. Without more ado he took the reins from my hands, entered the barn, and, with my assistance, locked the stable and led the way back to the house.

Once inside, he motioned me to a chair beside the fire, and, after filling the pipes as before, he took the other chair, and smoked for over an hour in absolute silence. It must have been midnight when he arose and methodically mixed two glasses of whisky punch. He handed one to me and drank the other himself, this followed by another pipe and another seemingly interminable silence. At length he put away the whisky and tobacco, and began preparing a hot meal. He fried some slices of mutton with a delicacy and attention to detail worthy of a chef in love with his business. This done, he set the table afresh, and I, guessing what was expected of me, joined him in dispatching the eatables.

When he had carefully scraped up the remainder of the third slice, in order to relish the last crust, he cleared his throat, looked round with the satisfaction of one who is about to convey some pleasing intelligence, and said:

"Well, I popped them both off. Just a bullet apiece, and no waste. You see, owing to my position, I got a good drop on 'em."

I made no remark, and he added:

"Like to go and have a look at 'em? They're side by side on the single bed. It's a tight squeeze, but they won't be particular 'bout that."

I replied that I had no desire to see them. I fancy he was rather disappointed at this, for he eyed me suspiciously for a few moments, and then asked:

"Have you got any money?"

I replied in the negative.

"Well, here is some dust," and he handed me a small bag containing about £5 worth of gold. My first impulse was to decline his money, but I thought better of it as I caught the expression of his eyes.

"You see," he began, as I pocketed the gold, "I've been sitting here all night wondering what kind of a disposition I should make of you. A man in my place don't want, naturally, to be the subject of discussion, and the best way to avoid it would be to send you along o' them," and he pointed to the ceiling. "But, on reflection, I think you can be trusted to keep mum, and I'd as soon let you go, so long as you get clean out of the country. It stands to reason that you can't get so clean out without funds as you can with 'em. Now my advice is that, having the necessary wherewithal, you go, before I repent of my decision."

I needed no further persuasion, and, notwithstanding the early hour (it was scarcely daylight), I departed with alacrity, and continued my tramp in the direction of Yarroko. Tired as I was, the walk refreshed my nerves, but my absorbing desire was to lie down and sleep, so I busied myself gathering materials to make a fire.

Digitized by Google

These preparations concluded, I made myself as comfortable as circumstances would permit, beneath a large gum tree, and there to the sound of crackling brush, I fell into a blissful slumber. When I awoke it was afternoon, for the sun had already begun his descent. I arose, and remembering my destination, made haste to get over the remaining distance before night should again overtake me.

I had been tramping steadily for an hour or more when I heard the clatter of hoofs behind me. I had scarcely time to turn my head, when, to my amazement, the horse was reined up beside me, and the rider, with a cry to "halt," was covering me with his revolver. "A bushranger," thought I, quite prepared to hand over my gold-dust.

"What do you want?" I stammered, determined to show as bold a front as possible.

"I reckon I want you."

"What for?"

"Ain't you the man that stayed over night at a farm house, back yonder?"

"No," said I, with a presence of mind I could scarcely account for.

"Confound you! You must be the man. If you didn't stay there, where did you stay?"

"In coming along this road, I s'pose you noticed a camp fire under a gum. Well, that's where I stayed," I replied in quiet and measured tones.

"Where are you bound for?"

"Lamb Flats."

Here the rider lowered his revolver, and speaking more gently, said:

"You don't know me without my beard."

I looked into his face and started, as I recognised the corpse of last night.

"Pardn'r," said the man, dismounting, "I kinder repented after you'd gone, so I followed you with the idea of shutting your mouth, but I reckon you're all right and to be trusted. You may take my horse and here's ten pounds. Come, climb up, and having got off, don't stop till you've forgotten where you started from."

"I've got no use for the cash," I answered, "but I'm fond of horses."

The next moment I was in the saddle, and, with a dig of my heels in the horse's side, I was off at full speed.

* * * * *

Twenty years elapsed. I was a man of substance, and was visiting a small but very prosperous border town, representing a rich syndicate. My object was to purchase a very large tract of land necessary for the developing of mines thereby. We had secretly had experts there, and were tolerably certain there were valuable mineral deposits under the property we coveted. It was owned by the mayor of the city. Arriving at the depôt, a tall, fine looking man, white-haired but brawny, came towards me with:

"Are you Mr. Blank, by chance?"

"That's my name, sir."

"Well, I'm the mayor here. You come up to see me. Welcome"—holding out his hand. "To tell you the truth, we've come along in this town in great shape, all but the hotels, so, knowing you were coming, I ran down to say you'll have to come along to my house, where my wife'll make you comfortable."

I was delighted. He had a big, comfortable house, his wife, a bonny woman of forty, was very jolly. There was no style, but every comfort.

Several days elapsed. Our business did not progress We had settled the purchase money all right, but he insisted on royalties if minerals were found. I declared this was so remote a contingency it was not worth a clause, but he held out.

The fifth day after my arrival was a glorious one.

"Let's take a ride over the ground," suggested my host.

Off we went. We admired the scenery, the great trees, enjoyed the vivifying air, and left business alone. Presently he stopped the buggy.

"Hop out, Mr. Blank. I'll show you something."

I descended to terra firma. A short walk into dense timber, and we came across a clearing. I started.

"Somebody's been putting down a trial shaft!" said I.

"Just so," said my host, "and it didn't cost me anything either. Come along, and I'll show you where the men hid and lived while the work was going on."

I felt uncomfortable. Did he know that shaft was our work?

Soon we struck an old farmhouse, rough-looking but evidently weather-proof.

Following my host I walked into the living-room of the house. There was a table and a couple of chairs in the room. My host sat himself down in one; I, half mechanically, took the other. He did not say anything. I experienced the odd sensation one has sometimes of familiarity with a strange place.

"Mr. Blank, don't it strike you that we know each far too well to dicker about this royalty clause?"

"Know each other? Why, I never saw you in my life till a few days ago."

"The ingratitude of this world. Why, I've given you money, cooked your food; I even saved your life!"

"You have?" I jumped up, and peered into his face.

"I suppose I deserve shooting, but I'll be hanged if I've——"

"And I've done my best to stir your memory, too. Look round."

I did. That vague familiarity again.

"Don't the whisky and pipes even bring it back to you?"

It came like a flash. I darted across the room to a door. There should be stairs there. There were.

It was the corpse—of twenty years ago.

"Why, you," I gasped.

"I buried them both out yonder under the trees with my own hand. I recalled you by your voice twenty-four hours after you were under my roof; your voice is peculiar."

"Why, you are a murderer!"

"I've always considered myself my own executioner. If the neighbours had known what she did they'd have lynched her, and him, too. I was merciful."

His voice became vibrant, his expression changed. I recognised him then.

"That woman was starving and degraded. I made her my wife. She tried to murder me. I shot 'em. I was right. I'd do it again. I'm not as rough as I was, but my conscience has never pricked me. My secret's safe with you."

Becoming genial again he added: "Perhaps your syndicate would rather not do business with a man of my peculiar notions, but if they do that royalty clause will have to go in."

It did, quick; for, somehow, though I couldn't quite blame him, and though his home and family were perfectly charming, I wanted to get away.

HARRY ST. MAUR.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

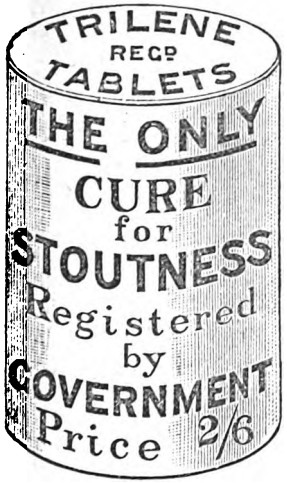
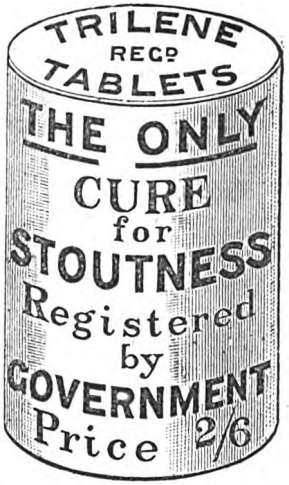
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"67 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

"Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Convalescent Home, New Brighton, Cheshire.

Miss S. J. PRITCHARD says: "They have done me good. I am 2lb. lighter already."

23 Windsor Terrace, Penarth, Cardiff.

Miss M FLAVELL says: "I have lost 2st., and am much better in health."

Mrs. F. HARPER, 61 Portland Crescent, Leeds, writes: "My doctor persuaded me to try a box, and I find they have done my breathing a lot of good and I can get about much better. My doctor did not wish his name mentioned, but they have done him good personally."

A. BROWN, of 25 Edwin Street, High Pallion, Sunderland, says: "You have no idea what a most wonderful effect the Tablets had. I am a great deal thinner, and better in health."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 2lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me.

"Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.

Mr. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st.

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity.

FATHER T. M. BYRNE, of Holy Cross Abbey, Sligo, writes: "When I began your Tablets I was 12st. 5lb.; I now scale at 10st. 11lb.—my case, too, is hereditary."

L. LUDDINGTON, "Sunnyside," Station Road, Sidcup, says: "I have benefited greatly, and have lost a stone."

Mr. MCLEOD, 41, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. P. ATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 4lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Miss A. ATKINS, 328 Southdown Road, Liverpool, writes: "I lost nearly a stone from taking one box."

Mrs. WHITEHOUSE, of Poplar Avenue, Edgbaston, writes: "My husband is in splendid health, and has lost 15lb. in weight since taking the Tablets; I am sure I thank you on his account."

Mrs. JAMES SMITH, of Cowell Terrace, Soham, says: "Your 2s. 6d. box of Tablets reduced my weight 12lb."

Mrs. WOODS, 447 Cowbridge Road, Canton, Cardiff, says: "Tablets have a most marked effect, and I shall take every opportunity to make known the wonders of your remedy."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs, says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mr. BUTLER, Surgeon, of Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient has lost 1st. in weight whilst taking your Tablets."

"Miss HUMPHREYS, of Claremont Buildings, Shrewsbury, has lost 1st. in weight already, and thinks the Tablets deserve every success."

Mrs. O'CONNOR, 2 Kensington Square Mansions, London, writes: "I am much less stout for taking them."

Surgeon Colonel E. S. BRANDER writes from Ihansi, India, in September, 1897: "Your Tablets in my own experience form an excellent remedy for reducing weight."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

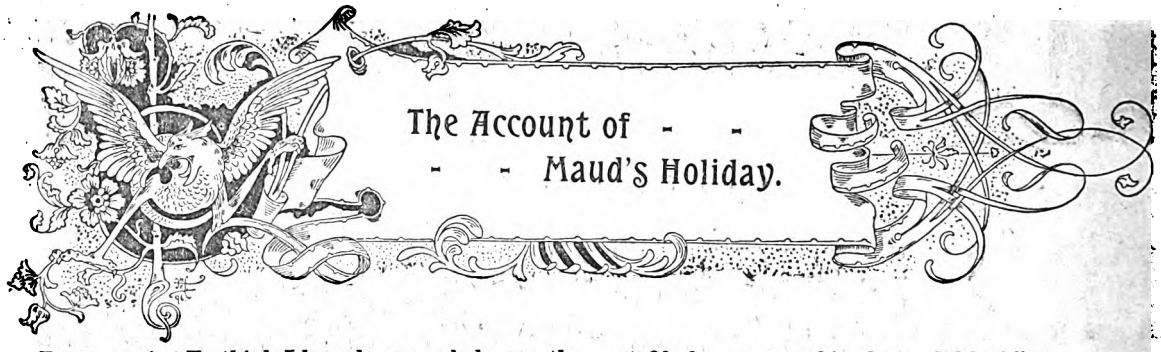
Miss J. GUISE, 3 North End, Croydon, says: "I cannot speak too highly of the Tablets; I was stout all my life until a few weeks ago, when I first began your treatment. I was surprised to find they acted so admirably. I am now getting quite a slender figure, besides being better in health."

Balgowan Lodge, Methven, N.B.

Miss MCPHERSON writes: "I have taken a box, and am reduced 1st. in weight."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google



The Account of - - - - Maud's Holiday.

"Dear me! To think I have been a whole month away! Why, I can't realise it. Oh, I've had such a time! The most de—light—ful holiday I ever had. I wish I were going back again to-day! Aunt and Uncle are so awfully kind, you know. They would do anything for one, and—oh, do you know, I met the nicest young—but you won't tell, will you?"

"No, no, of course not."

"Well, I'll tell you how it was. You know Mr. Grundy, the lawyer, don't you?"

"Yes."

"Well, there's a young lawyer with him now, a Mr. Rosavear—Vincent Rosavear, his name is—pretty name, isn't it?"

"Very. And he's a lawyer, is he?"

"Why, yes; but let me tell you. The McManuses—you know the McManuses—they had a party—a big party—just a week after I came—oh, it was a lovely party, too! I enjoyed myself thoroughly at it. But really, you'd have laughed—I didn't know Vin—I mean, Mr. Rosavear, you know, or anything about him, never saw him or heard of him before; but just after the first dance Miss Harris came to me and said she had a friend who wished to have an introduction to me, and asked me if I had any objections. Well, of course, what could I do? I wasn't going to tell her if I objected to her friend; so I just said I should be pleased to meet him, and then she brought him over and introduced him—and that was how I met Vin—I mean Mr. Rosavear. Wasn't it peculiar?"

"Why—er—yes—that is, it was——"

"Yes, but to think of him asking for an introduction—you know, that's what amused me. Well, we had several dances together—a lovely dancer he is too—oh, he can waltz just to perfection. And then he is so distinguished looking! I noticed it when he was dancing with Miss Harris—just as straight and tall—he must be quite six feet, for I can stand easily under his arm, I know—well, let me see, what was I saying? Oh, yes—he escorted me home that night—I didn't care. I thought, of course, I would never see him again."

"And didn't you?"

"Didn't I! I should say I did! Why, he was up to uncle's almost every night while I was there—he is a friend of uncle's you know—oh, we used to go out riding and to parties, to the rink and the theatre and I don't know where. What did I care? I thought I would have a good time while I was there at all events. But, oh, we had such times too, at home. He's such a lovely singer, you know. How I used to enjoy just being in the drawing-room and hearing him sing! Dear! He has such stirring black eyes, too—long dark hair, and a big moustache—a lovely moustache—I wish you knew him—oh, wait, I'll show you his likeness."

"Oh, he gave you his photo, did he?"

"Why, yes, two of them—I accepted them. What did I need to care? I knew I'd never see him again. He wanted mine, but I refused to give him one; so then he made me promise him one when he comes to see—to—to I mean, when he comes next June——"

"What! Is he coming here next June?"

"So he said, but pshaw! He won't come, I know he won't. It was only in fun, you know——"

"Why, Maud, where did you get the ring?"

"Good gracious! You notice everything! Well, it was one night he happened to take hold of my hand——"

"Oh, Maud, you didn't surely——"

"No, indeed I didn't—I just jerked it away at once, and—and gave him a look—but in a few minutes more he said to me: 'Let me look at your hand, Maud—I mean Miss Finley,' and smiled so mischievously that I thought he was only in fun, and before I knew another thing he caught my hand and sque—and held it so tight I couldn't get away—he is so strong!—and before I knew, he had slipped this ring on my finger—isn't it pretty? I couldn't help it! But what did I need to care? I knew I would likely never see him again.

"Well, that was New Year's night. Next evening he came again, and it was so stormy we stayed in the house. Oh, it was lovely to sit there with him and look into the fire while the shadows were flickering about the room, and we talked and talked there for hours about people we had known, and about how we had lived and how we'd like to live for the future, and I don't know what all. But, by-and-bye, he turned to me and said: 'Doesn't the fire make one feel lonely?' and I said: 'Yes, it seems to give one such a strange, weird sort of feeling—I think I'll light the lamp, it will help to cheer you perhaps.' 'No, no,' he said, 'just let's sit here and talk. I'd like to know more about you, a great deal.' 'Would you really?' I said. I thought he was joking. Well, I didn't light the lamp, and it kept getting darker and darker in the room, and only a little flame flickering away there in the grate, and then he—he just—he just kissed me."

"Oh! Oh, Maud Finley!"

"Oh, I was angry! I tell you I showed him what a temper I had, but he just caught hold of my hands and—and pleaded so hard for me to forgive him, and seemed so sorry, that, when he said he was only joking and promised never to do so again, I forgave him, and we made it up again, and I asked him to forgive me for being angry with him, and—and promised to—to—to be——

"But the rest is a secret. I really must not tell it yet."

W. A. Robertson.

Digitized by Google

EIFFEL TOWER LEMONADE

2 GALLONS FOR 4½D

It is incumbent upon every person who would remain in health, through the great and sudden varieties of weather peculiar to our country, to exercise a zealous watchfulness over the body and its functions to the end that they may always be in readiness to ward off illness. A prudent person will see the policy of taking constant precaution to maintain the blood at an even temperature and in a healthy condition. It is almost incredible to realize how very few people are conversant with the thirst-quenching and cooling properties of the lemon. The acid of the lemon is a natural acid, and eminently suitable to the human system. It cools the over-heated blood, allays feverishness, and keeps down eruptive tendencies. The juice of the lemon, therefore, forms one of the most valuable beverages for summer drinking. The Eiffel Tower Lemonade is lemon at its very best. Why? Because it is a concentration from the very finest lemons the world produces. Sicily is noted for its lemons, and it is here the fruit used in the Eiffel Tower Lemonade is grown. Only the choicest lemons are selected, and these undergo the first stages of concentration on the spot. The final stages of manufacture take place in Kent. Owing to the preliminary treatment received in Sicily the natural flavour and delicious aroma of the newly-gathered lemon is retained, and the result is a refreshing, healthful, wholesome, and natural lemonade, which allays thirst, and revives drooping energies. No undesirable chemicals are added, as is done in so many other cases. By using Eiffel Tower Lemonade you have a dainty fruit drink always on hand, so that friends dropping in for a friendly chat may be supplied with a refreshing draught that will be as welcome as the gentle shower or the cooling breeze. Remember, it only costs 4½d. for two gallons. Of all Grocers, or a sample will be sent free for six stamps, G. FOSTER CLARK & Co., No. 115 Eiffel Tower Factory, Maidstone.

MASON'S The Only Painless Corn Cure.

Never known to Fail. KILLCORN

Sold by all Chemists, Stores, &c., Price 1/- per bottle, or post free from the Proprietor, 3 Guildford St., Leeds.

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

CYCLE DEPOTS

High-class Selection of GENTS', LADIES', & JUVENILE CYCLES. From £3 Cash, or on Easy Terms 10/- Monthly. Head Depot: 52 to 55 Blackfriars Road, London, S.E.

BEST IN LONDON. Lists Post Free.

RIDING SCHOOLS

Practical Tuition Until Perfect, 10/6. Single Lesson, 2/-. PURCHASERS TAUGHT FREE. Open 9 till 9. West End Branch: 124 King's Road, Sloane Square, S.W.

CYCLEDOM LTD.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 183B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

"JUNO" CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Monthly. Roadster, £10. 16/8 Road Racer. £11. 18/4 Lady & Gent, £12 12/- 21/- £14 14/- 24/8 £16 16/- 28/- Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories, sent post free. WERNICKE MACHINISTS' CO. LTD., 75 and 76 Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.; and at Piccadilly Circus, exactly opposite the Criterion, London, W.. JUNO Riding School, 1,700ft.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

The Lustre Lasts!
Pyn-Ka Leaves no Scratches!

Pyn-ka

The wonderful Metal Polisher. Cleans and burnishes gold, silver, plate, copper, brass, nickel, tin, glass, etc., better, quicker, and at less cost of labour and money than any other polish known.

Paste or tablets, 1d. to 6d. All dealers.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (259 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

---

1,000 GOLD WATCHES FREE

1/-

To introduce our now celebrated Soap to 1,000 more readers of this paper, we have decided to give away 1,000 GOLD WATCHES ABSOLUTELY FREE OF COST. These Watches are REAL GOLD HALL-MARKED, and at retail would cost upwards of 5 GUINEAS. If you want one write to us without delay. With your letter send us 1s. P.O., for which we will send you a tablet of Dr. Garland's Facial Soap and our offer, on complying with which the Watch will be sent free by registered post. We have overwhelming testimony that our Facial Soap is the best ever offered to the British public, and our idea for giving away the Watches is that you may talk about us among your friends, and recommend our Soap wherever possible. Miss H. HUNT, Potbridge, Odiham, Hants, writes: "The gold watch arrived quite safe this morning. I am very pleased with it. Many thanks to you for sending it."

MAY, GARLAND & CO. (Dept. 112), Cheltenham House 15 MORTIMER ST., LONDON, W.

KEATING'S POWDER

DESTROYS BUGS FLEAS MOTHS BEETLES

TINS 3D 6D & 1S

Digitized by Google

ON THE BEST AUTHORITY.

J. J. C.—Yes, the soldiers who guard the Bank of England during the night receive special pay for that duty. The subaltern receives one guinea, the sergeants half-a-crown, and the privates one shilling each.

N. G. A.—There are now only five Scottish regiments which wear the kilt. These are the Black Watch (Royal Highlanders, late 42nd and 73rd), Seaforth Highlanders (late 72nd and 78th), Gordon Highlanders (late 73rd and 92nd), Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders (late 79th), and the Argyle and Sutherland Highlanders (late 91st and 93rd).

DRIVER.—The right of permission to allow memorials to be admitted to Westminster Abbey lies with the Dean. The dimensions of the proposed memorial must be first submitted to the Chapter, and by this body is fixed the fee which ancient custom decrees should be paid. The site is then selected by the Dean. For a bust the cost is usually £200, or thereabouts.

C F. L.—The white rhinoceros has become nearly if not quite extinct. There are two stuffed specimens in England and one in the Capetown Museum.

BARONET.—The chief insignia of a baronet's coat of arms is derived from the "Red Hand" of the O'Neill family. It is said that in an early expedition to Ireland, it was given out that whoever first touched the shore, should possess the territory he touched. Seeing that another boat was likely to outstrip his, O'Neill cut off his left hand and threw it on the coast. The princes of Ulster were descended from this O'Neill, and the motto of the O'Neills to this day is "Red Hand of Erin." When James I. (in 1611) created 200 baronets in payment of £1,000 each, it was ostensibly for the amelioration of Ulster, and they were allowed to place the "open red hand" on their arms.

FIRE.—About 300 theatres have been destroyed by fire in Europe during the present century.

A. K.—Mr. R. E. Lawson of Stanhope Street, Blackfriars, originated binding in cloth. The first book bound in cloth was a volume of manuscript music. That was about 1823. Mr. Leighton was the first to stamp the cloth with gold titles; previously, printed labels were stuck on the cloth.

S. I.—There are about 100,000 islands, large and small, scattered about the oceans of the world. There are 5,500, at least, on the coasts of America.

SLANG.—Pierce Egan, the author of a book called "Life in London," and several other stories, was the first to introduce modern slang-writing. That was about sixty years ago. Slang is, of course, not at all a modern invention; it was known to the classic Greeks and Romans, and abounds in the works of Aristophanes, Terence, and others.

CAPUT.—The last person to suffer death in England by being beheaded was Simon Fraser (Lord Lovat). He was executed on Tower Hill on April 9th, 1747, for treachery.

SCHOOL.—The Greek youths may not have gone to college in the modern acceptation of the phrase. Their philosophers used to take a stand at some appointed place, and impart instruction to hundreds of young men who were eager to acquire it. There was the philosopher Zens, who taught in the porch (stoa), from which we get the word stoic. There were the groves of Academus, where the poetical pupils could wander about while receiving instruction. This is not "going to school," say some people. But the pupils went somewhere to be taught, which is really "going to school."

R. J.—You should apply to the Copyright Office, Stationers' Hall, London, E.C., if you wish to copyright a piece of music.

E. G.—There are seven ancient brooms in the Cairo Museum. These relics of olden times are made of straw and closely resemble the straw brooms in use at the present time.

D. W.—The Speaker derives his name from the fact that he is the spokesman of the House of Commons when addressing the Sovereign. You are wrong in supposing that the Speaker can never vote; when the votes recorded by each party are equal, he is entitled to a casting vote.

L. M.—The sign & is a ligature combining the letters et (Latin for and). In the old form (E) the letters can be seen, but the modern style is a corrupt form.

N. N.—If you see a man 328 yards off, he appears to you exactly one-third his proper height. At ninety-two yards further off he appears one-fourth his height, and at 109 yards still further, he appears one-fifth.

A. S. G.—There are about 4,050 postmen in the Metropolis, who cover an average of twelve miles a day.

CHARLIE.—If you want something inexpensive and easily procured to soften the water in which you wash, drop the peel of an orange into the jug overnight. This will soften the water, and turn it into a pleasant skin tonic.

T. T. asks: "Is it true that etiquette forbids judges and judicial officers to ride in an omnibus?"——Not in this country; but in France, where, if a judge does not own a private carriage, he must either take a cab or walk.

A. S. G.—France was the first of the European countries to grant civil rights to the Jews.

K. H.—Yes, the word "hairbreadth," now used for an infinitesimal space, was once a regular measure. It was the width of sixteen hairs laid side by side.

DICK.—Good champagne corks cost when new from threepence-halfpenny to fivepence apiece. They must be absolutely flawless, and are cut by hand from the best quality of Colonia bark.

W. W.—Yes, hunting is a very costly sport. It is estimated that £800 is the average cost of every day spent with the hounds.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ,, ...	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12 10 0
,, half	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, June 21st, if intended for the Issue on sale July 5th, and dated July 9th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Notice to Competitors.

IN all Prize Competitions the Editor's decision is final. No correspondence will be entertained when once a competition is finished and the result published.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A CHANCE OF A LIFETIME.

GIGANTIC CLEARANCE SALE.

£50,000 worth of Goods Offered at Half Price.

THE ENORMOUS STOCK OF CARPETS, CURTAINS, SHEETS, BLANKETS, QUILTS, &C., MUST BE CLEARED WITHOUT REGARD TO COST, OWING TO THE L.C.C. REQUIRING PRESENT PREMISES FOR STREET IMPROVEMENTS.

New Premises having to be acquired by us, this Sale is held in order to Clear Out Heavy Stocks previous to the removal. NEW GOODS have to be sacrificed, together with all Regular Stocks, as it would be almost impossible to remove the Valuable and Heavy Stocks to New Premises without great risk and loss by damage to the Goods in transit, and this renders AN ABSOLUTE CLEARANCE IMPERATIVE. The magnificent opportunity is therefore afforded the readers of Short Stories of buying the NEW SEASON'S GOODS that are just coming in fresh from the looms at prices lower than the cost of production; and in many cases the Goods are being offered at less than HALF PRICE.

This Offer Will Not be Repeated.

ALL GOODS WARRANTED ABSOLUTELY PERFECT IN EVERY WAY. Money Willingly Returned if not Approved

Lot 1.—4s. Lace Curtains for 1s. 11d. These beautiful Lace Curtains, containing about 6 yards in the pair, 48in. wide, shaded ground, taped edges, with handsome double borders. Undoubtedly the cheapest ever offered. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 5s. 6d. Satisfaction guaranteed.

4s. Lace Curtains for 1s. 11d.

Lot 2.—10s. 6d. White Scotch Blankets for 5s. 9d. per pair, measuring about 56in. by 76in.; light, warm, and durable. Admittedly the cheapest blankets ever offered. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 15s. 6d. Satisfaction guaranteed or money returned.

10s. 6d. White Scotch Blankets for 5s. 6d.

Lot 30.—9s. Bleached Twill Sheets for 4s. 11d., measuring 64in. by 84in. Made from the best cotton yarns, thoroughly shrunk, soft finish, and hemmed ready for use. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 14s. 3d. Satisfaction guaranteed.

9s. Twilled Sheets for 4s. 11d.

7s. Lace Curtains for 3s. 11d.

Lot 2.—7s. Lace Curtains for 3s. 11d. per pair, measuring 3½yd. long, by 52in. wide, shaded ground, taped edges and handsome double borders; wash easily. 3 pairs for 11s. 3d. Money returned if not approved.

25s. Special Heavy Blankets for 14s. 9d.

Lot 23.—25s. Special Heavy Witney Yorkshire Blankets for 14s. 9d., measuring 75in. by 96in. Manufactured entirely of pure long staple wool, bleached by the sun and beautifully white. Give endless wear, and are easily washed. For perfection of finish, durability, and economy, they are unequalled. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 42s. Money returned if not approved.

15s. 6d. Sheets for 7s. 11d.

Lot 31.—15s. 6d. Bleached Twill Sheets for 7s. 11d., measuring 90in. by 100in. Made from the best cotton yarns, thoroughly shrunk, soft, finish, and hemmed ready for use. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 22s. Money returned if not approved.

Lot 3.—Specially handsome Drawing-room Design, entirely new and most successful. In white or cream, with scolloped and taped edges, made from thoroughly sound cotton yarns; warranted to wear well. Sale price, 5s. 11d. per pair. Each Curtain measures 3½yd. long by 60in. wide. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 17s. Money returned if not approved.

10s. 6d. Lace Curtains for 5s. 11d.

WITNEY BLANKETS.

EXCEPTIONAL VALUE.

Lot. 24.—800 pairs of best quality Witney Blankets, with fancy borders, very soft, warm, of great durability. Made from the best wool, and warranted to give every satisfaction. Prices given below are little more than half the original cost.

Size	Weight.	Price per Pair.	3 Pairs for
53in. by 70in.	... 4lb.	... 6s. 3d.	... 18s.
60in. by 80in.	... 6lb.	... 7s. 9d.	... 22s.
70in. by 90in.	... 8lb.	... 11s. 6d.	... 33s.
75in. by 96in.	... 9lb.	... 13s. 0s.	... 37s.
80in. by 99in.	... 10lb.	... 15s. 3d.	... 43s.
86in. by 104in.	... 11lb.	... 16s. 9d.	... 48s.

Lot 39.—1,500 yards of Best Quality Kidderminster Carpeting, 36 inches wide, at 1s. 11d. per yard; usual price 3s. 6d. per yard. Can be supplied in numerous handsome and effective designs and rich colourings to harmonise with all requirements. Impossible to repeat this offer. Money returned if not approved.

3s. 6d. Best Quality Kidderminster Carpeting for 1s. 11d.

3s. Best Brussels Stair Carpet for 1s. 9d.

Lot 48.—3s. Brussels Carpeting for 1s. 9d. per yard, 22 inches wide. Handsomely bordered, superior quality, light and dark shades, magnificent design and colourings. Satisfaction guaranteed or money returned

Lot 7.—10,000 Special Extra Quality, Heavy Loom Kitchen Table Cloths, made from the heaviest and strongest Linen Yarns. Numerous artistic patterns. Specially recommended for hard wear. Warranted to give the best possible satisfaction, being very neat, inexpensive, and durable.

Size 54in. by 45in., price 1s. 2d. each, or 3 for 3s. 3d.
Size 56in. by 56in., price 1s. 5d. each, or 3 for 4s. 0d.
Size 62in. by 62in., price 1s. 11d. each, or 3 for 5s. 3d.
Size 68in. by 62in., price 2s. 2d. each, or 3 for 5s. 11d.

10,000 RUGS

GIVEN AWAY.

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Lot 50.—THIS PHENOMENAL OFFER is made to the readers of Short Stories only. On receipt of Postal Order for 6s., or 74 stamps, we will forward DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, etc., handsomely bordered and woven in 30 different patterns and art colourings to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for the goods of the British Carpet Weaving Company BELOW THE ACTUAL COST OF PRODUCTION. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained Direct from our Looms, thus saving the Purchasers all Middle Profits.

GIVEN AWAY.—WITH EVERY CARPET WE SHALL ABSOLUTELY GIVE AWAY A VERY HANDSOME RUG TO MATCH; OR WE WILL SEND TWO CARPETS AND TWO RUGS FOR 10/6.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

THOUSANDS of REPEAT ORDERS & UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

"SHORT STORIES" COUPON

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. for amount we guarantee to send any goods as above.

THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.

BRUSSELETTE CARPETS.

ADMITTEDLY THE CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD.

Seamless, Woven, and Reversible, Rich Turkey Patterns and Colourings, Superior Quality, with Handsome Border to match; a Marvel of Excellence and Beauty.

Lot 60. SIZES and PRICES. No.	ft. in.	ft. in.	Sale Price.	Former Price.
1 ...	9 0 by	6 0 ...	5/6 ...	9/0
2 ...	9 0 by	7 6 ...	7/0 ...	11/9
3 ...	9 0 by	9 0 ...	8/6 ...	13/6
4 ...	10 6 by	7 6 ...	8/9 ...	13/9
5 ...	10 6 by	9 0 ...	10/0 ...	15/6
6 ...	12 0 by	9 0 ...	11/6 ...	18/0

Lot 60. SIZES and PRICES. No.	ft. in.	ft. in.	Sale Price.	Former Price.
7 ...	12 0 by	10 6 ...	13/6 ...	20/6
8 ...	13 6 by	10 6 ...	15/3 ...	24/0
9 ...	12 0 by	12 0 ...	15/3 ...	24/0
10 ...	13 6 by	12 0 ...	17/0 ...	27/0
11 ...	15 0 by	12 0 ...	19/0 ...	32/0
12 ...	18 0 by	12 0 ...	22/9 ...	36/0

These Carpets are splendid imitations of real Brussels Carpets, the designs having been carefully copied from the originals, both as regards colourings and patterns, so that when in use it is almost impossible, except by close scrutiny, to detect the difference. All designs are registered, and deservedly considered works of art. We can confidently recommend them for use in the dining and drawing rooms, or any rooms and landings where hard wear is a necessity.

GIVEN AWAY.

As an advertisement for the introduction of these goods to all readers of Short Stories we have decided to give away to every purchaser a very handsomely-woven Hearthrug, 6 feet long and 3 feet wide, to match carpets in colours, etc.

THOUSANDS of REPEAT ORDERS & UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

DEAR SIR,— 9 Bedford Row, High Wycombe, Bucks.

I have seen some of the Carpets and rugs sent by your firm, and think they are really a marvel. Please forward goods as follows, etc.—Yours faithfully, Rev. F. H. MAY

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED OR MONEY WILLINGLY REFUNDED.

All Orders despatched same day as received. Cheques and Postal Orders should be made payable to J. HARGREAVES, and crossed UNION BANK. ADDRESS:

THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING COMPANY, Sale Dept., 31 OLD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

"BIG WHEEL"
BRAND.
CARTER'S BRISTOL.
4½D TIN = 2 GALS. LEMONADE
Lemon Crystals

'DOLLY' BLUE

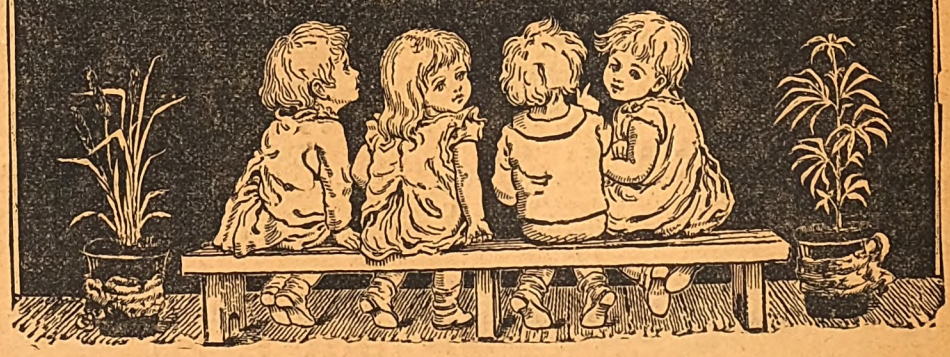
Notice.—"DOLLY" Blue is neatly tied in a white bag to a small handle to hold by whilst using. It is the cheapest and best Laundry Blue in the market. "Dolly" Blue is sold by all Grocers and Oilmen at 1d. per bag.

"DOLLY" CREAM & TINTS.

"DOLLY" Cream Colour, for Tinting Curtains, Muslins, Laces, Silks, Blouses, etc., a Rich Cream Shade.
"DOLLY" Tints, manufactured in Six Shades—Pink, Terra Cotta, Old Gold, Heliotrope, Sea Green, and Canary Yellow—for Tinting Faded Ribbons, Laces, etc. Sold everywhere, 1d. per bag. Will wash out when required.

Sample Box, containing Seven Tints, post free for 8d.
W. EDGE & SONS LIMITED, BOLTON, LANCS.

LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP
LONGEST ESTABLISHED, PUREST & BEST.



Reckitt's Blue.
Ask for it and See that you get it.

A GREAT NEW SERIAL ENTITLED "THE GLADIATOR" BEGINS TO-DAY.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 495. FOR WEEK ENDING JUNE 25TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

A WONDERFUL MEDICINE!

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS

Are universally admitted to be WORTH A GUINEA A BOX for Bilious and Nervous Disorders, such as Wind and Pain in the Stomach, Sick Headache, Giddiness, Fulness and Swelling after Meals, Dizziness and Drowsiness, Cold Chills, Flushings of Heat, Loss of Appetite, Shortness of Breath, Costiveness, Scurvy, and Blotches on the Skin, Disturbed Sleep, Frightful Dreams, and all Nervous and Trembling Sensations, etc.' The first dose will give relief in twenty minutes. Every sufferer is earnestly invited to try one box of these Pills, and they will be acknowledged to be

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

For females of all ages these Pills are invaluable, as a few doses of them will carry off all humours, and bring about all that is required. No female should be without them. There is no medicine to be found to equal BEECHAM'S PILLS for removing any obstruction or irregularity of the system. If taken according to the directions given with each Box, they will soon restore females of all ages to sound and robust health. This has been proved by thousands who have tried them, and found the benefits which are ensured by their use.

For a Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, and all Disorders of the Liver, they act like Magic, and a few doses will be found to work wonders on the most important organs of the human machine. They strengthen the whole muscular system, restore the long-lost complexion, bring back the keen edge of appetite, arouse into action, with the Rosebud of Health, the whole physical energy of the human frame. These are FACTS, testified continually by members of all classes of society; and one of the best guarantees to the Nervous and Debilitated is,

BEECHAM'S PILLS
Have the Largest Sale of any Patent Medicine in the World, BEING OVER 6,000,000 BOXES PER ANNUM.

BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS

PREPARED ONLY BY

THOMAS BEECHAM, ST. HELENS, LANCASHIRE

And sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere in Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

(THE 1s. 1½d. BOX CONTAINS FIFTY-SIX PILLS.)

Digitized by Google

KEATING'S POWDER

DESTROYS BUGS FLEAS MOTHS BEETLES

TINS 3D 6D & 1S

TRILENE REGD TABLETS

THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably"

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MR. CLAUDE CARTER, of Thorn House, Johnstone, N.B., says: "Your Tablets much reduced my weight and I have been waiting to see if it was permanent, and so it has proved."

MR. CANHAM, 87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, says: "Tablets cured my wife two years ago of extreme stoutness. It has never returned."

MARION TAYLOR, of Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "Have lost quite two stone."

A. PEEL, of Darley Hydro, Matlock, writes: "They have reduced and benefited me a good deal."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than one stone."

MR. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead. "I think them wonderful not only to reduce fat but as a medicine.

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION 66 Pinsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

The "YORK" Hand Camera. Takes quarter-plate pictures, and will give most satisfactory results. Provided with acromatic lens, and fitted with instantaneous shutter. Complete with chemicals and instructions, and the full outfit for a beginner. Price 3s., post free. —The NOVELTY IMPORTING CO., 54 Bow Lane, London, E.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Bldgs., London, W.C.

Invested Funds, £10,000,000.

Particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

1,000 GOLD WATCHES FREE

1/-

To introduce our now celebrated Soap to 1,000 more readers of this paper, we have decided to give away 1,000 GOLD WATCHES ABSOLUTELY FREE OF COST. These Watches are REAL GOLD HALL-MARKED, and at retail would cost upwards of 5 GUINEAS. If you want one write to us without delay. With your letter send us 1s. P.O., for which we will send you a tablet of Dr. Garland's Facial Soap and our offer, on complying with which the Watch will be sent free by registered post. We have overwhelming testimony that our Facial Soap is the best ever offered to the British public, and our idea for giving away the Watches is that you may talk about us among your friends, and recommend our Soap wherever possible. Miss H. HUNT, Potbridge, Odiham, Hants, writes: "The gold watch arrived quite safe this morning. I am very pleased with it. Many thanks to you for sending it."

MAY, GARLAND & CO. (Dept. 112), Cheltenham House 15 MORTIMER ST., LONDON, W.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 39 MINCING LANE, LONDON, E.C

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron Frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Riveted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 28 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. CENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 sets of Reeds. 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO., Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.

A SPLENDID OFFER TO "SHORT STORIES" READERS.

25,000 HAND CAMERAS

at 4s. 6d. each.

£150 in Prizes

Given for Photos taken with "Short Stories" Hand Cameras.

NOTICE.—THE "SHORT STORIES" HAND CAMERA.

This Camera is being specially made for Short Stories by one of the largest camera manufacturers in Great Britain. This camera is listed by the makers at 10s. 6d. each, and our readers, by special arrangements, are going to be supplied with it at 4/6, together with a supply of Dry Plates, Chemicals, and a Book of Instructions enabling anyone without previous knowledge to take a photo with the greatest of ease. A Competition List will be sent with each camera. 6d. extra will be charged for parcel post, 5s. in all. This camera has a powerful lens, double dark slide, focussing screen, shutter for time and snap-shot photos. A well-made and neat camera.

"SHORT STORIES" TOURISTS' CAMERA.—This camera carries 6 quarter-plates, and is fitted with a view-finder and shutter for time and snap-shot exposures. This is a splendid camera to take on your holidays. Only 2,000 of these will be sent out. These are offered to our readers by the makers for the moderate sum of 7/6, and 6d. parcel postage; 8/- in all. This is a splendid opportunity for securing a splendid camera for a very moderate sum. With each will be given Dry Plates, Chemicals, and Book of Instructions, Lists of Prizes, and Particulars of Competitions.

RULES.—All persons sending must mark on the left-hand top-corner of the envelope the words "Short Stories Camera," and send it along with postal order for amount to the manufacturers,

THE SILVERITE CO., LONDON ROAD, LIVERPOOL.

NOTICE.—No person will be supplied with more than one Camera.

MAKE PRIME BEER AT HOME

Good! it's Mason's

EXTRACT OF HERBS

6D. BOTTLE MAKES 8 GALLONS BEER

NON-INTOXICATING

The most palatable refreshing tonic drink producible.

IMITATED but NOT EQUALLED

Of all Chemists and Stores. Also try Mason's Wine Essences and Mason's Coffee Essence. Sample bottle of either of above post FREE for 9d. Two, assorted, 1s. 3d.; Three, assorted, 1s. 6d. Agents Wanted.

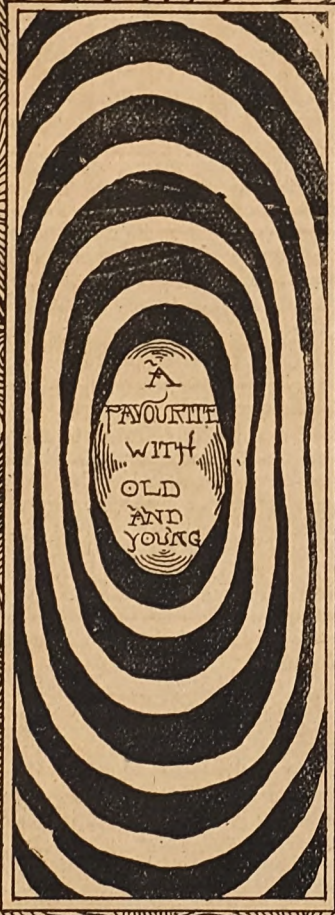
NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

The BEST BEVERAGE for YOUR MEALS.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON



No. 495.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending June 25th, 1898.

TWO ACCIDENTS THAT DID GOOD.

They had agreed to differ about it. Husbands and wives who agree without differing are a trifle old-fashioned and grumpy nowadays; husbands and wives who differ without agreeing are also somewhat behind these times, when a certain calm independence is the fashionable keynote of marital existence, and Mr. and Mrs. Buller were eminently up-to-date.

The first two years of their married life had been spent practically out of the world, in consequence of the state of health of Mr. Buller's father. Then had come their succession to the property, and a period of retirement—they were a trifle old-fashioned in those days, it will be seen, and then they had launched out into the world of Society.

They went with the stream with that enthusiasm which not infrequently attends new experiences. She was an extremely pretty and dainty little personage, with charming wit, and a very few weeks of social life put quite an extraordinary polish on her.

He was good-looking too, not particularly clever, but quite capable of following the lead set him by his fellows, and cheery and good-natured withal.

There was plenty of money; they became immensely

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

popular, and found a thorough-going Society life altogether delightful.

The head of each was a little turned, perhaps, by the end of their first season. Each was secretly convinced that the old "spooney" relations would not do. It was ridiculous to care for the society of your husband or wife. It was "the thing" to live independent lives. Independent lives, however, are not always, it appears, to be achieved at a word by two wholesome-minded young people living in the same house and sharing the same round of pleasure.

Alice Buller was a coquette, but there was a touch of delicate haughtiness in her, and she was incapable of a vulgar flirtation. Also, George Buller would have been incapable of jealousy where she was concerned, so that when at last a tangible subject of dispute presented itself husband and wife alike jumped at it with avidity.

The subject in question was thoroughly up-to-date—which was as it should be. At first it cost Mr. Buller a pang to realise that the side he had accidentally adopted was that behind the times. But he had an obstinate fibre in him, so he nailed his colours to the mast like a man.

The moot point was the bicycle craze.

He would have none of it, in any shape or form; he derided it where men were concerned; for women, he declared it not unsuitable—he knew his age better than that—but, what was far worse, ridiculously unbecoming.

Mrs. Buller, on the other hand, threw herself into the movement heart and soul. Her bicycle was for her the centre of the universe. Nothing could have been better. The husband and wife agreed to differ, as has been said, in most approved fashion, and for the rest of the season they hardly met.

For people who had arrived at so desirable an understanding, however, they were arguing the question rather hotly as they sat over the dinner table on a certain evening in February.

"Where does the fun come in?" Mr. Buller was demanding indignantly; "that's what I can't make out! Of course, one wouldn't care about the thing being dangerous if the game were worth the candle."

Mrs. Buller was drawing patterns on the tablecloth with her dessert fork.

"That's obvious," she returned with spirit, "or you wouldn't want to ride a horrid horse."

"Horses don't side-slip—or whatever you call it."

"Bicycles don't shy—neither do they rear."

Mr. Buller rose wrathfully and walked to the fireplace, taking up a majestic position on the hearthrug.

"One thing is you'll soon be tired of it," he observed. "You never keep a thing up for long."

Mrs. Buller rose impetuously. She appeared to have lost her temper.

"I love it more than ever," she cried, "and I always shall!" With which incoherent observation she withdrew.

The breakfast-room was empty when Mr. Buller strolled down at about half-past nine on the following morning. This did not surprise him, but the message delivered to him by a servant did.

"Mrs. Buller told me to say, if you please, sir," said the man, "that she has ridden over to Fernhill on her bicycle, and will lunch there."

"What time will she be back?" demanded her husband.

"About five o'clock, sir," was the answer.

Mr. Buller unfolded his newspaper and ground his teeth.

"The whole day!" he ejaculated to himself. "Well, I must say—— However, she'll be tired. Forty miles there and back; and then she'll go to sleep all the evening. Well, hanged if I care! Wonder at what time she started, and how far she's got."

As a matter of fact, though Mrs. Buller had started some time since, she had not made any remarkable progress. It was a delightful, spring-like day, but the state of the roads was not all that could be desired. At this identical moment she was walking along a particularly unpleasant combination of ruts and mud, wheeling her bicycle.

Mrs. Buller had her detractors, as have all successful people; and there were those who said that she rode a bicycle because she looked so well in the dress. Her short, tailor-made skirt and neat hat certainly suited her to perfection this morning, and her little feet, in the daintiest imaginable shoes, were a delight to behold. But Mrs. Buller did not appear to be thinking of her appearance just then—she was obviously taking no pleasure in it.

Her piquant face was rosy with air and exercise, but it was distinctly overcast in expression, and her every movement, as she wheeled her machine with incredible carelessness over the ruts, was expressive of boredom and disgust. The bad bit of road passed, she stood for an instant contemplating her bicycle with an indescribable expression.

"I shall never be able to give the thing up," she said to herself despairingly. "Never! If I did, he'd think I wanted—Oh, what a bore it is!"

She mounted as she spoke with a despairing sigh. Perhaps she was careless, perhaps the wheel slipped. At any rate, the next thing of which she was aware was a general upheaval of the universe, which left her lying in the road with a broken bicycle beside her, and every bone in her body, as it seemed, dislocated.

"Oh, what a silly I've been!" she wailed despairingly, and then she fainted.

It was not a lonely road, fortunately, and she was soon found, and taken home. The doctor was sent for, and enjoined by Mr. Buller on his departure to come yet again in the evening; and on coming downstairs after his second visit he found Mr. Buller hanging about in the hall. The doctor did not wait to be questioned.

"Going on splendidly," he said cheerily. "Feverish to-night, of course. But with a broken arm and a very nasty sprained ankle that's only to be expected."

For a man whose sentiments towards his wife are of an eminently philosophical nature, Mr. Buller was looking extraordinarily pale and wretched. He drew a quick sigh of satisfaction; then he said, with an air of stern superiority which ill disguised an undertone of ferocious vindictiveness:

"Wretched things, these bicycles! I've always said so." Then he added: "Is there any reason why I shouldn't see my wife? Would it do her any harm, I mean?"

The doctor screwed up his lips doubtfully.

"Well," he said, "no, hardly that. But she is feverish, as I said, and if she would rather be quiet—why, her wishes must be respected, you know."

"Confound it!" ejaculated the husband, and wheeling round he stood staring into the fire.

"Going out to-morrow?" inquired Dr. Willoughby, as he drew on his gloves. The hounds were to meet next day.

"I don't know."

"I should, if I were you," was the answer. "There's nothing to be anxious about in your wife's condition, and—she's better quiet, you know."

Digitized by Google

A gloomy man was Mr. Buller, to judge from his appearance as he sat in his smoking-room that night, and a gloomy man was he as he came down next morning. He had been to Mrs. Buller's door and had been sternly denied admittance.

He pulled himself together, however, at the meet, and answered the numerous inquiries after his wife with an off-hand nonchalance which did him credit.

There was a long interval of standing about by the cover, and Mr. Buller's mare, a young one, could not stand it. When they got away eventually she bolted, rushed at a fence, missed it, and came down heavily.

It was Dr. Willoughby who undertook to break the news of her husband's accident to Mrs. Buller. She was more feverish that afternoon and dreadfully depressed, but he set about his task with the slightest possible circumlocution.

"Well, Mrs. Buller," he said, "you're not to have the sick list all to yourself, after all. Horses, it seems, can play tricks as well as bicycles."

Mrs. Buller turned her head sharply. She was a good deal bruised, and there was little else that she could turn.

"What do you mean?" she demanded, as the colour rushed into her woe-begone face. "Not George?" Then, as she read assent in the doctor's face, she turned white to her lips. "Oh!" she gasped, with a sudden change of tone. "He's not hurt badly?"

"Hurt badly? No, of course not," returned the doctor cheerily; "a very neatly fractured leg, that's all—a companion to your arm. Nothing to faint about, I assure you."

"I'm not going to faint," declared Mrs. Buller; indeed, a considerable amount of colour had come back to her cheeks, and her eyes were dancing. "Poor old boy! I'm dreadfully sorry."

Her voice gave a curiously different meaning to the words. "I know what horrid pain it is, don't I? But I've always told him that horses were quite as—I mean, I've always told him that you run great risks with horses. How did it happen, doctor? Is he pretty comfortable? Is there anything I have for my arm he would like? Take him some of those grapes, will you? He'll be so thirsty."

During the weeks that followed, the respective attendants on Mr. and Mrs. Buller had a very busy time of it. Each patient took quite an extraordinary interest in the symptoms and progress of the other, and each was, of course, confined to his or her room.

The sprained ankle made progress quicker than the broken limbs. When Mrs. Buller was able to be moved to a sofa, Mr. Buller being still in his bed, Dr. Willoughby suggested that Mrs. Buller should be wheeled into his room and pay him a little visit.

"I dare say he's very dull, poor thing!" she said. "I don't know that there is any reason why I should not go to-day."

"I don't know that there is," said Dr. Willoughby. So that afternoon there was great activity in both the sick rooms. Mr. Buller's nurse had to arrange flowers, to put away this, to straighten that and to shake up the cushions of the arm chair a dozen times. Mrs. Buller's nurse had to change her patient's dressing gown twice, and her maid was requisitioned to do her hair. And at about 4 o'clock a knock came at Mr. Buller's door, and Mrs. Buller appeared, leaning on a stick and escorted by her nurse. She was received by the nurse and established with much circumstance in the arm chair prepared for her reception.

"I'm awfully glad to see you," said Mr. Buller, with constrained politeness. He was rather pathetic in his enforced recumbency, and he was looking very white and thin. "You must have had a horrid time."

"Pretty well," she said; "and so have you, I'm afraid."

"Willoughby talks of sending me to Bournemouth," said Mr. Buller.

The conversation had so far been characterised by the utmost nonchalance and composure, each party having steadily avoided a glance in the direction of the other; but at this juncture he, with a self-confidence entirely unjustified by events, turned politely in his wife's direction. She looked round at the same moment; their eyes met, and—it was all over!

"Alice, my little girl, how white you look!"

"Oh, George, my old darling, how thin you are!"

The ejaculations were simultaneous, and before they had died away, Mrs. Buller, with a little hop and the assistance of the table, had reached the sofa, and had subsided on to the floor with her face buried on her husband's breast.

"Oh, George," she cried, "you were quite right; bicycles are horrid things, and so are horses. Oh, George, you might have been killed!"

"I might, darling!" he said incoherently. "You were quite right, too, Alice, dearest; it's been the very deuce of a time! Do you know how long it is since you really kissed me?"

They went to Bournemouth together, and each was so busy superintending the complete recovery of the other that they quite forgot to be up-to-date, and are no more a strictly Society couple.

MARGARET HUME.

Digitized by Google

BAB-EL-HAWIYAT.

LOUNGING on a bench under the tall date palms in the market-place of Hammam-el-Enf, I smoked a rank cherbli in dreamy laziness. The day was dying; the blazing African sun sank, flooding the broad Bay of Tunis with its blood-red afterglow, and the giant palms cast their long shadows over the hot, sun-blanched stones.

There are no half lights in Northern Africa; all is either glaring brilliance or sombre shadow. Little twilight is there in that land of mosques and marabouts; night follows the death of day with astonishing rapidity. Even while I sat darkness crept on; the squatting, chattering crowd of white burnoused Moors and Arabs and red-fezzed negroes had dispersed, and the sun-baked little village seemed almost deserted.

Suddenly the white figure of an Arab woman glided slowly and ghostlike from the deep shadow of the ilexes. Like all others of her sex, she was enshrouded in a haick, and the lower portion of her face was hidden by her thick white veil, only a magnificent pair of black sparkling eyes and a forehead upon which rows of gold sequins tinkled being visible.

Halting for a few seconds she stared at me as if in surprise, then in soft musical Arabic gave me peace, exclaiming:

"Sadness dwelleth in the heart of the Roumi. Of a verity thou art not more sad than I," and, sighing, she drew her adjar closer across her face and was about to pass on.

"Sad, art thou?" I exclaimed, in the same language, surprised that she should address me, an officer of chasseurs. In the dim light I could distinguish that her hose were of the finest white silk, that her tiny shoes were Paris made and of patent leather, and that the hand which held the haick about her was loaded with valuable rings. "Loosen thy tongue's strings, O one of beauty," I said gallantly. "Tell me, why speakest thou unto me, an infidel; why unhappiness hath fallen upon thee."

"Ah, no!" she replied, in a hoarse half-whisper, glancing round in apparent fear. "My people must not observe me having speech with thee. Ah, Allah may bring one of us certainty before to-morrow, and—if thou wouldst only help me!"

"What service can I render?" I asked quickly, well aware that the fact of her speaking to a European in a public place was of itself a very grave offence in the eyes of the fanatical Aíssáwà. The barrier between Al-Islâm and Christianity in Tunis is still unsurmountable.

"First thou must trust me," she said frankly. "I am called Fathma Khadidja; and thy name—already I know it. It is dangerous for me to hold converse here with you. Let thy footsteps follow mine. Come, and may Allah, who knoweth the innermost parts of the breasts of men, shower upon thee bounteous blessings," and she turned and started off with that peculiar waddling gait of Arab women.

I hesitated. If really in distress, it was strange that she had not called upon her own people to help her, instead of requesting an infidel and a stranger to render assistance.

No, I decided not to go, and sat watching her receding figure cross the market-place where slaves were sold even within recent years, and disappear in the shadow of the mosque.

In an hour I had forgotten the mysterious Fathma and her troubles, and returned to Tunis.

Next afternoon, as I entered my quarters in the Kasbah my Arab servant handed me a note. As I tore it open it emitted an odour of geranium, the favourite perfume of the harem. Having read the three long lines of sprawly Arabic characters it contained, I placed the missive in my pocket and turned away. If I valued my life, I was to meet Khadidja that evening. Was that a threat or a warning? During the remainder of that day I lounged outside the cafés and pondered deeply. For hours I ruminated over absinthe and mazagran, cassis and bock; and, after much consideration, I at length resolved to keep the appointment and ascertain the extent of the mysterious danger of which she wrote.

At the appointed hour I awaited her at a secluded spot outside the Bab Alewa. The clock of the Mosque of Sici Mahrez close by struck solemnly, and as the last sound died away I heard the frou-frou of feminine garments, as a shrouded figure advanced to me.

"Ah, so thou hast kept thine appointment, O Roumi!"

Digitized by Google

she exclaimed, stretching forth to me a soft, white hand. "Thou thinkest because I believe in the One, and in Mahomet, his Prophet, that I am unworthy thy regard; that I am not be trusted, eh?" Then she laughed lightly, adding, "Come let us fly on the wings of haste. I want to have serious speech with thee upon a matter that affecteth us both."

Without replying, I walked on beside her, wondering whether she were ugly or beautiful. Crossing a deserted garden, we passed out to where two asses were tethered, and mounting them rode away into the darkness. I remember that we went through several villages, and at length came to a larger place built upon the low cliffs, where a number of spacious flat-roofed houses overlooked the sea.

Suddenly she dismounted before a low arched door in one of the great square, inartistic, whitewashed residences, and placed her fingers upon her lips indicative of silence. Taking a key that was suspended round her neck, she unlocked the door and led me into a dark passage so thickly carpeted that my sword trailed noiselessly as she guided me onward.

Once I caught sight of a spacious patio, rendered cool by a splashing fountain and green with many leaves; then through two small chambers we passed, until we came to a closed door, which she opened, and I found myself in a spacious, dimly-illumined apartment, decorated in quaint arabesques of dark crimson and dull gold. Everything was rich and luxurious. The air was heavy with sensuous odours rising in a thin blue column from the gold perfuming pan. On the floor lay costly Arab rugs, and a couple of lion skins were thrown down on each side of the centre mat. A derbouka and a ginkri, fashioned from a tortoiseshell, lay thrown aside, and from a magnificent hanging lamp of gold, a soft, mellow light was diffused, though scarcely sufficient to show the heavy draperies that concealed the walls.

"Rest thee a moment, and I will return," my mysterious veiled guide said; and then, drawing aside some of the silken hangings she disappeared through a door that had been hidden.

With hands behind me, I slowly wandered round, wondering what apartment of the house this was, when some half-finished embroidery that had apparently been tossed hurriedly aside upon a coffee stool of inlaid pearl and silver caught my eye. That told me the truth. My heart gave a sudden bound. I was in the harem!

A French novel lay open on one of the little tables. I took it up, and, as I stood in wonderment, a movement behind me caused me to turn, and then I beheld the most beautiful woman I had ever gazed upon. She was not more than two-and-twenty, with a complexion fresh as a northener's, features that were perfect, pretty lips that parted in a glad smile, and dress that was the most gorgeous I had ever seen.

The ugly haick had been replaced by a jacket of palest leaf-green brocaded silk, beneath which showed a rose-pink velvet vest; and, in the place of the baggy trousers, she wore the serroual, or wide trousers, of silken gauze. Her tiny, bare feet were thrust into slippers of rose velvet; on her head was set jauntily a little crimson skull cap embroidered with seed pearls; and her fouta, or sash, was of a tricolor-striped silk richly ornamented with gold. Upon her bare arms and ankles diamonds flashed and sparkled with a thousand fires, and bangles jingled as she walked. She dazzled and fascinated me.

With an apology for having left me, she sank slowly among her cushions with graceful abandon, at the same time loosing one of her slippers, and motioning me to a seat near her.

"Thou thinkest it strange," she said, "perhaps even thou art angry, that I have brought thee hither alone unto this gilded cage. But I must speak with thee—to warn thee;" and her dimpled chin rested upon her dainty palm as she, with seriousness, looked straight into my eyes.

"To warn me! Of what?"

"Thou art threatened," she answered slowly. "Thou wilt, perhaps, remember that a month ago thou wert in Kabylia; and left Fort National for Tizi Ouzou. Thou hadst the careless indifference that youth giveth, and, no doubt, thou wert prepared to meet Eblis himself if he promised an adventure. On that occasion with whom didst thou travel?"

"I journeyed in company of a wealthy man of thy people, who was returning from the wine market."

"True, O friend," she replied. "A week ago thou didst describe the journey in the Moniteur de l'Algerie and ridiculed thy companion. See here—!" and she stretched forth her hand and took up a paper containing the article in which I had treated the journey in a comic vein, and had denounced in no measured terms the religious bigotry of Al-Islam.

"Thou art a homard; and that man," she continued, "hath sworn upon the book of Everlasting Will to kill thee!"

"How dost thou know this, O thou whose face is rivalled only by the sun?" I asked quickly.

"Because—because the man thou hast ridiculed is my husband!" she replied, rising and adding wildly: "Because I overheard the villainous scheme that he hath planned with his brother to take thy life, and at the risk of mine own honour I determined to save thee. Allah alone knoweth how terrible is my life alone in this place with my servants, bound to a fierce, brutal man who loveth me not, and upon whose brow the Câfer hath set seal."

"Is thine husband neglectful, then?" I asked, noticing the poignant sorrow that in that moment seemed to have crushed her.

"Alas! yes. Whithersoever I go the bane of Sajin seemeth upon me," she sighed, passing her slim, bejewelled hand slowly across her white forehead. Tears welled in her brilliant eyes, as she added, in a broken voice:

"I am lost—lost to all, soulless, uncared for, unloved!"

She hesitated a moment thoughtfully, glancing at her own bejewelled hands and then at mine. With a quick movement she drew from one of her fingers a curious ring of silver, round which were Arabic characters in gold.

"See!" she cried, as if a sudden thought had occurred to her. "Take this and wear it. It is my talisman, and as long as it is upon thy finger no harm can befall thee. It beareth the stamp of 'La Belle,' and will preserve thee in health and guard thee in the hour of tribulation."

Digitized by Google

She took my hand in hers, and drawing my own signet ring from my finger, replaced it by her strange-looking talisman, afterwards slipping my own ring upon her hand.

A sob escaped her.

"We have exchanged rings!" she exclaimed brokenly, looking up into my face with tear-stained, world-weary eyes. Then, clutching her bare breast as if to still the throbbing of her heart, she cried: "When —when thou art far away thou wilt, peradventure, sometimes gaze upon mine, and remember that a service was once rendered thee by a poor, unhappy woman—thou wilt recollect that her name is Fathma Khadidja—that —that—ah; forgive me, or I am mad! mad!—that Fathma Khadidja loveth thee!"

Raising my hand to her warm, sensuous lips, she kissed it passionately with all the fire and ardour of the Child of the Sun. Then, releasing me, she tottered back, panting; and sank upon her silken divan, with her face buried in her hands, sobbing as if her heart would break.

"Cama ta f ákal kathêlik tolâ ki," I said, quoting at random from the Koran. "Come, come," I added, sympathetically, sinking down beside her, tenderly stroking her long, silky tresses. "Despair not. The One Worthy of Praise knowest how thou sufferest, and will give unto thee strength in the hour of thy need, and bring thee into the shadow of the great lote tree."

"Ah! Thy mouth uttereth pearls of wisdom," she cried. "But I have touched thee, an infidel, and am accursed by Allah. I care nought for the future, for already I am forsaken, already I have tasted of the bitter fruit of Al-Zakkum, and am doomed to the torture of Al-Hâwiyat, the place prepared for the evil-doers."

Then, raising her face to mine, with an intense look of passionate love, she said in a soft, sibilant whisper:

"Once only! Kiss me once! Then thou mayest go, and never shall we meet—never."

Her beautiful head fell upon my shoulder, and her hair—soft as spun silk—strayed across my face. For a moment her lips met mine in a hot, passionate kiss, a caress enough to make any man's head reel.

"I love thee," she whispered, in low, half-frightened tones, as she clung to me and would not allow me to release myself. "Unseen by thee I have watched thee many moons, and to-night I have brought thee thither to tell thee—to confess to thee my secret."

I tried to draw my lingering lips from hers, but with the fire of love gleaming in her brilliant eyes she gripped me with a force I should not have supposed her capable of. "Stay," she whispered. "Without thee the canker-worm of love eateth away mine heart."

* * * * *

Next day inspection duty took me to the Haras Fortress, away behind the hills of Ahmar, and the voices of the muddenin were already calling the faithful for the maghrib when I re-entered the Kasbah. Hassan, my man, was playing damma in the courtyard, but rose quietly, saluted, and told me that he had taken to my quarters a small package which had been left by the negro servant that had brought the letter on the previous day.

Could it, I wondered, be a present from Khadidja? Rushing in, I found on my table a small box packed in white paper and secured with black seals. Eagerly I tore away the wrappings and opened it.

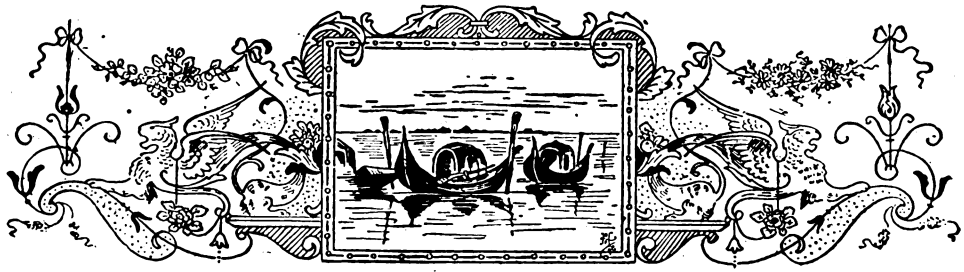
As I did so a shriek of horror escaped me. I fell back awe-stricken at the sight presented. Inside a satin-lined bracelet case, bearing the name of a Paris jeweller, on a piece of pale-blue velvet, there was stretched a human finger that had been roughly hacked off at the joint. It lay, stiff, white and cold, with the blood coagulated where the blunt knife had jagged the flesh. The finger was a woman's—slim, well-formed, with the nail stained by henna. It was loaded with costly rings, which scintillated in the golden ray of sunset that strayed into the room and fell across them, and as I looked, breathless in amazement, I saw among the ornaments my own signet ring.

A scrap of paper that fluttered to the ground bore the words, scrawled in Arabic character. "From the husband of Fathma Khadidja!"

That same night I was pacing the deck of the mail steamer bound for Marseilles, watching the glimmering lights of La Goulette fading at the stern. In fear and trepidation I took the hideous souvenir of unreciprocated love, and when unobserved, cast it far away from me into the dark rolling waters.

Perhaps there, deep in its lonely hiding place, it met the white, dead thing of which it once formed a part—the body of the matchless daughter of the sun whose wondrous hair enmeshed me, whose full, red lips of frailty held me like a magnet, shackling me to the inevitable, powerless and entranced. Who can tell?

ELSAC MARDEN.



Digitized by Google

TOLD IN THE INDIAN BAZAAR.

By H. HUNTER.

In writing these stories, the purpose of the author is to give the average reader a fairly accurate notion of the sort o tales which are told daily and nightly in the bazaars and villages of India, on the Temple steps, and at the bathing stairs, and which are listened to with unquestioning faith by millions of people.

II.—THE APPLE FROM PARADISE.

NOT far from the holy city of Benarès, in the reign of the good King Shalmanazar, there lived a poor water-carrier and his wife.

Every morning from his twentieth year till now, when he was past sixty, Hurree Das, after performing his own ablutions in the Sacred River, had filled his skins from the Holy Stream and carried the precious fluid to those less fortunate individuals, who, unable themselves to bathe in the purifying current, were yet desirous when they left their earthly bodies behind them, of gaining for the new ones a comfortable seat in the Pillared Halls of Indra.

Those who had money paid Hurree Das for his services in coin; those who had none paid him in prayers.

It was "pay what you please" with Hurree. He never grumbled. Whatever people offered him he accepted without clamour or criticism. He never refused money, he never objected to prayers. Money was handy, certainly, but prayers were not to be despised. So Hurree went up and down the city and through the villages beyond the walls, crying "Ganges water! Ganges water!" refusing no man a share because he was poor, and cheerfully accepting as payment a prayer when his customer hadn't a pice.*

"Money," he would say, "is only for to-day; and man, who lives but one day at a time, has enough if he can buy grain for the present. But prayers are for to-morrow, and the profit of them will endure long, as the undying tree in Indra's Paradise shall continue to shower its blessings upon the happy souls who have found a shelter beneath its branches."

In the philosophy of Hurree Das, money was merely for current expenses, while prayer was treasure laid up against future contingencies. And like the wise son of a prudent father, Hurree did not disdain to insure himself against ill-fortune in the next world by investing with Bhugwán all the prayers he received in this. They were hoondees—drafts upon Heaven, possessing an actual value, and would be duly honoured as opportunity arrived. About this Hurree never had a doubt.

Now, a day came, when Hurree, grown old and feeble, was no longer able to go down to Holy Mother Gungá and fill his water-skins with water. When, indeed, his voice turning again to childish treble had become weak and worn, and quite unequal to crying "Ganges water," through the crowded bazaars and teeming alleys of the Temple City—when he could only sit at the door of his humble cottage and wonder why he had been born.

Senatbee, his wife, had that morning husked the last handful of rice in the grain-sack; there wasn't as much ghee* left in the jar as would cover the stone in a mango; and, of salt, no more than two pinches.

Hurree Das and his wife sat in the door of his grass-thatched dwelling in the cool of the day; and the woman said: "Surely, husband, it were better to trust ourselves to the quiet bosom of Mother Gunga, who will bear us peacefully into the Halls of Dazzling Light, than to sit with hands idle waiting for the grim messengers of Yama."

"Can you be sure, wife," answered the man, "that Vishnoo has no further need of us? Think you, he would allow us to continue to live if he had no more work for us to do?"

"Live!" cried the woman. "Call you this living? Dying is what I call it—dying by slow inches. Really, husband, I begin to suspect that you must have been a desperately wicked character in your previous existence, or this misery would not have been permitted to overtake you in the present."

As she spake the words there appeared before them as if springing from the ground a being, of human shape, truly, but of a grace and beauty to which poor humanity could never hope to aspire.

Darting at the woman a look which caused her to bite her tongue in remorse for having uttered her thoughts, the Celestial visitor advanced towards Hurree, who, transported with awe and wonder, had risen to receive him.

"Be not afraid, O water-carrier of the Ganges. I am a messenger sent by Brahma to tell thee that the prayers of the pious have prevailed. Heaven cannot remain in debt to a mortal. Behold this apple, which Brahma bids me leave with thee. It grew upon the first and greatest of all trees. The tree which stands in the centre of the garden of the gods, in Indra's Paradise; and gives to all who ask whatever thing they need. Behold the bloom of Heaven is still upon the fruit. It was plucked but this instant, and upon him who eats thereof it will confer the blessing of everlasting life. Take it, O man beloved of Brahma, and thy happiness shall be as thou understandest thy duty."

The next moment the messenger was gone, and Hurree Das found himself alone with his wife, and staring, open-eyed, at the apple in his hand.

Without thinking, he raised the fruit to his lips, exposing his toothless old jaws, and was just about to make a bite at the golden-hued produce of the Celestial tree, when Senatbee stopped him.

"And, pray, husband," said she, "what would be the good of everlasting life to a poor old useless fellow like you? Are you so much in love with misery that you would prolong it through the ages of eternity? Go to!

"You were a man, Hurree Das, when I married you; but methinks you are now little better than a fool. Everlasting life is a sorry boon to offer such as we.

* The smallest Indian coin.

* Clarified butter.

Digitized by Google

Now, if he had told us to divide the apple, and promised us everlasting youth with powers of enjoyment continually renewed—delights that never wearied and pleasures that never palled—it would have been something like a tale. But to come all the way from Paradise to offer us what we'd rather be without——

"Well, to be plain, husband, I don't believe Brahma would have done it. Depend upon it, for all his soft speech and good looks, that messenger came from the other place."

"Wisdom is with thee, O wife!" exclaimed Hurree, looking doubtfully at the apple. "Thy words have turned my liver to water. Say, now, O wisest amongst women, what is thy word concerning it? In this matter I will be guided according as thou speakest. Protection of Heaven! It's a mercy I haven't bitten it."

And with that he threw the apple from him, as if it were a live coal that burnt his hand. But Senatbee, picking it up, rebuked him for his folly, bidding him not to waste anything which could be sold for money.

"How it may be in the next birth," said she, "we don't know; but in this, money buys everything, and nothing can be had without money."

"I really begin to believe you're right, wife," said the poor man. "Praise be to Heaven for giving me such a woman!"

Now when Senatbee perceived the effect which her words had upon her husband, she rejoiced and was satisfied. She had no notion of letting him eat the apple himself, and so deprive her of any share in whatever virtue it might possess. But now that she held possession of it, and he was willing to follow her instructions, she had another tale for him. Well, he would be ready to swallow that, too, and fifty more after it—now he had made over to her the confidence which he had lost in himself. Women always could twist men round their fingers, if they managed them rightly.

"Upon consideration, husband," said Senatbee, "I think it's just possible that Indra's apple may have been sent thee as a reward for pious services in the past. It would pain me very much to have to think that that fair-spoken stranger was no better than a servant of Safed, the great demon. And now I remember that he said, 'thy happiness would be as thou understoodest thy duty,' which confirms me in my opinion that he really was a messenger from Brahma, for the messages from the gods mostly do have those little tags tacked on to them."

"Wonderful woman!" cried Hurree Das. "Why did I never consult thee before?"

"Thy duty," continued Senatbee, "is plain. Make the best use of the gift the gods have provided. To eat it yourself would be selfish, foolish, and wicked. Nobody wants old men to live longer than they can decently find excuse for doing so. Now, money is always useful—to old and young alike. It is impossible to do without it here; and it would be no bad thing to have a little handy in case we should require it hereafter. One can never tell what may happen on that journey, and it might be awkward if we couldn't pay the toll. Therefore, husband, my counsel to thee is, take the apple to the palace, the King is old, but the Regent, Prince Ramatavi, is young; haply he will give much gold to possess this inestimable gift."

"Live for ever, O Prince!"

So, next day, Hurree went off to the palace, and standing before the Prince, told him all things concerning the wonderful fruit that he held in his hand.

"Live for ever, O Prince!" he cried, bowing his forehead to the dust, "and upon thy servant Hurree Das, bestow a little of the wealth which is in the coffers of the King."

Then, Prince Ramatavi, leading the water-carrier to the door of the Treasury, bade him enter and take as much gold as he desired.

But the poor man, having no pockets in his dhótee*, was at a loss how to carry it. However, he filled his ears and his mouth and his nostrils with the precious metal; and went to his house—unsatisfied. When he had nothing, Hurree wanted nothing; now that he had more than sufficient, he was disposed to grumble.

Having got rid of the water-carrier, Prince Ramatavi rushed off in haste to his zenana—the apartment of his wives—and summoned Shurfan, his best-beloved.

* Waistcloth.

Digitized by Google

"Light of my eyes!" he cried. "Joy of my heart! Eat this beautiful fruit, fresh from the tree in Indra's Paradise; eat, dear one, and live for ever—everlastingly young, everlasting lovely, everlastingly charming."

Now, as, from her first appearance on the scene, woman has ever been a creature of a strange perversity; always thinking lightly of what she possesses, and hankering after what is withheld; so the Princess, although she had for her husband the very best of good fellows, must needs lavish all the love of her idle soul upon Maha-pali, the Minister of War.

"Ah!" thought she, while she thanked her husband prettily for his handsome gift, "what a fine opportunity to convince that laggard, Maha-pali of the sincerity of my devotion," and, slipping into the Audience Chamber after her husband had departed, she sent for the minister, and with many demonstrations of tenderness and affection, presented him with the apple.

Maha-pali had no love to give the Princess in return for all she spent upon him; his heart was a prisoner to Lakha with the antelope eyes, one of the pretty Princess's maids of honour. And to Lakha, as soon as he met her he offered the apple as a token of his love.

Lakha, little minx, was delighted. She gave him kisses and good words, as many as he asked for, and having dismissed him with promises enough to fill a bullock-waggon, went off to seek an audience of the Prince.

"Now," said she, "I shall be sure to win his affection; and after we're properly married, see if I don't open his eyes about the Princess he's so very sweet on."

Prince Ramatavi accepted the apple, as if he had seen it then only for the first time; and bestowing upon Lakha a princely present, bade her return to her mistress and ask her to be ready to receive him in half an hour.

Now the Prince was not quite so ignorant of what went on at the court as pretty Lakha supposed; and the return to him of Indra's apple, confirmed all his worst suspicions. Disgusted with the world and loathing womankind, he determined to abandon the palace for the jungle, where at least he would be able to distinguish his friends from his foes. But first he would execute judgment on the wicked Princess. Entering straightway the apartments of the women, he caused Shurfan to be summoned before him.

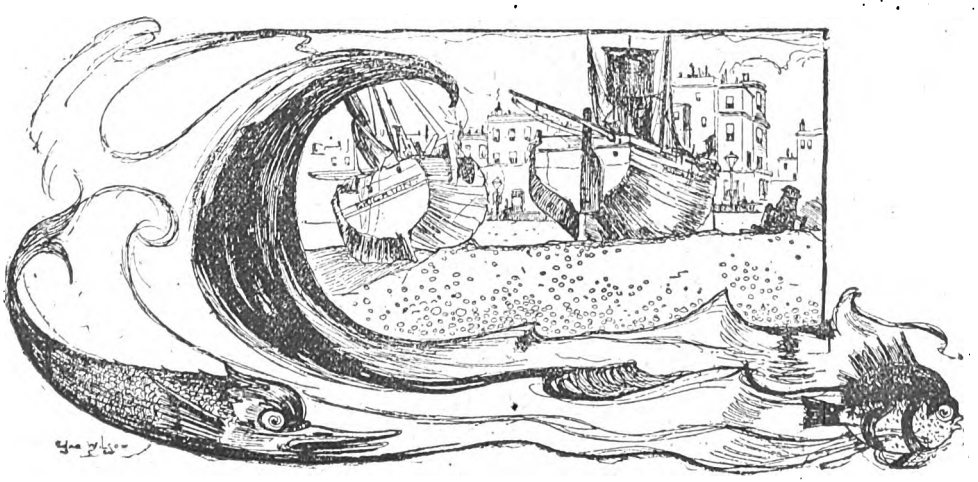
"What has become, Princess," he asked, "of the apple from Paradise which I gave unto thee?"

And the unabashed Shurfan, dissembling much, replied:

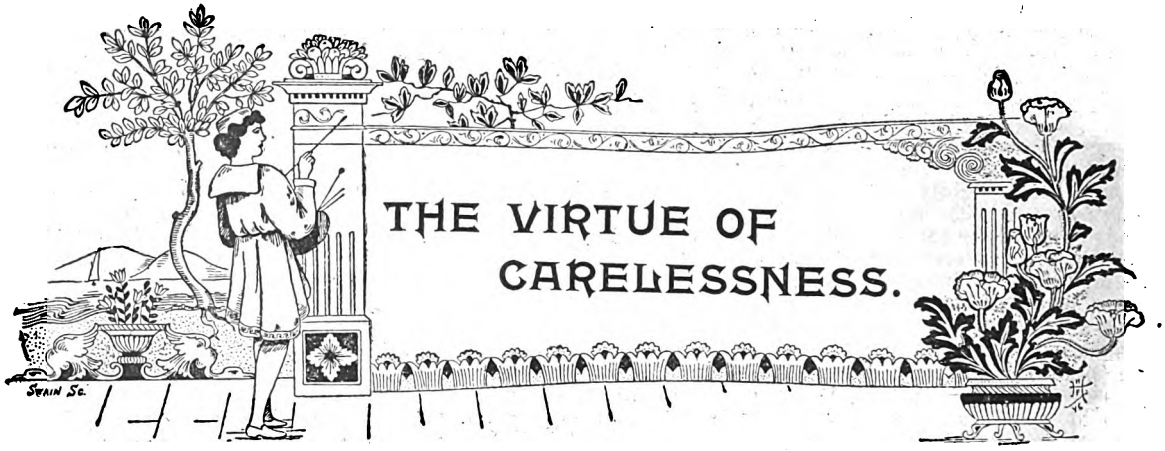
"I have obeyed the command of my lord and eaten it."

Then Prince Ramatavi, producing the fruit, gave orders for her instant beheading; and having first washed the apple carefully in Ganges water, ate it himself.

From that hour the Prince disappeared from the palace; but a Jogi who, men say, was the Prince, lives in the jungles of Oudh even to this day, death having no power over him.



Digitized by Google



IF my wife has a failing, it is lack of reverence. She doesn't recognise those property rights which should inhere to the personal belongings of a husband. I heard that expression uttered by a fellow with a chronic distaste for work, whose wife supported him by dress-making. I didn't tell Minnie where I got the expression when I quoted it to her, but she immediately said:

"That sounds like Bill Sinks."

Then she laughed. My wife has a very musical laugh.

I think that I was mildly reprimanding her at the time for mislaying the gimlet. I'm the most particular fellow you ever saw about keeping everything in its place. When I want a tool of any kind, I want to know just where to lay my hands on it. It's a kind of religion with me, and it hurts me terribly to find things in confusion. That's where my wife's lack of reverence comes in. She has no respect for the eleventh commandment: "Order is Heaven's first law."

Well, now that you understand my wife's failing—I'll admit it's her greatest one—I'll go on with the story with which it is connected.

One day last July, Jim Outhwick came into the station just as I was closing up to go to supper. Jim was the paymaster at the Vulcan mills, and a right good fellow.

"Hello, Joe," he said. "All alone?"

"Yes," I said. "What's up?"

He flung his canvas bag on the table and said:

"I must go down the road to-night to Ashbury. There's talk of a strike among the miners, and I've got to be there first thing in the morning. I'm to offer to pay off the disaffected ones and make a big show of money. That's a bluff that generally tells. The men'll make up their minds the company can't be intimidated, and they'll get into harness again. There's £5,000 in that bag, Joe."

I glanced at the bag on the table and looked back at Jim.

"What did you bring it here for?" I asked.

"That's easily explained," he answered, sitting down. "I got the word to start for Ashbury just half an hour ago. The money was up in a hurry and I didn't have time to go home. I couldn't very well stay at the mill and I wouldn't go to the tavern. So I just thought I'd come down here and get you to stay with me until the night goods train comes along. She's due at 9.30, isn't she?"

"9.35," I answered. "But I'm just off to supper."

"Oh, that's all right," he said. "I feel safe enough here. I'm armed to the teeth, you know, and there wouldn't be any danger until after dark. But you'll come back and keep me company, won't you?"

"I will if Minnie lets me off," I said. "I'm booked for a game of cribbage with her after supper."

There was a stout old safe in the corner of the office that had nothing in it but blank way-bills and reports. I unlocked it and tossed the canvas bag inside.

"There," I said, as I thrust my bunch of keys in my coat pocket, "that makes it a little safer."

I thought Jim looked a bit dubious over this precaution, but he laughed and said:

"All right, my boy; I'll make myself comfortable until you come back."

Minnie didn't like the idea of my going, but I told her Jim counted on me. I didn't say a word about the money, however; I knew it would worry her, and to tell the truth, it worried me a little. I was sorry Jim had brought it there, and I didn't like his talk about precautions.

Well, after supper I went out to see if the dog was all right—I've got the finest mastiff in all Lancashire—and when I came back Minnie called to me from the sitting-room:

"Just a minute, Joe. I'm writing a note for Hattie."

Hattie is the wife of a telegraph clerk, and I knew that Minnie wanted me to leave it at the station, where he could get it in the morning. It was quite a number of minutes, however, before she came out with the note and my coat. It was so warm I had left it off before supper.

"Hadn't you better let the dog go with you, Joe?" she asked, as she helped me with my coat.

"No, no," I said, laughing. "He'll stay at home and take care of you. I'll put the lamp in the window, though, so you'll know I'm all right."

"Mind," she said, "I'll watch for it, and if it isn't there, I'll come down after you."

I'm stationmaster at Y——. Our line is what's called the old line, and traffic on it is mostly light goods. At night the station is deserted, there being no business for telegraph clerk or booking clerk.

I found Jim with his heels on the desk puffing away at a good cigar.

"Not an alarm," he said, in his joking way; "not even a mouse."

Digitized by Google

We chatted away for an hour or more, when Jim suddenly put down his feet and yawned heavily.

"Joe," he said, "if you don't mind I'll go out and take a little stroll."

"Go," I said; "but mind you're not gone long."

I went back and sat down. The more I thought about the money the more I didn't like the idea. What business had Jim to go away and leave all the responsibility with me? Of course he didn't leave it all with me, but he left altogether too big a share.

As I sat there grumbling, a low tap on the window overlooking the platform attracted my attention. I looked up. That side of the building was in the shadow, but I could see a man's face against the pane.

"Joe," said someone outside.

I supposed it might be one of the permanent way hands and stepped across the room.

"What is it?" I called.

"Open the window, Joe," said the voice.

I pushed it up a little way.

"Is that you, Jerry?" I called.

There was no response. I put my head through the opening and looked up and down the line. Nobody was in sight. Just then I heard a slight noise behind me. I drew in my head. Something seemed to crash into my brain. A flash of blazing light blinded me. Then all was dark.

When I came to I was tied in my chair, my head was sore and wet, and two men with stripes of black cloth across their faces were looking down at me.

"He's all right," said the shorter one.

The tall man nodded.

"Get the keys," he said in a queer, hoarse voice.

The shorter man felt in my pockets.

"Not here," he cried.

"They must be," said the tall man, in his hoarse voice.

"I tell you they are not. Bring the lamp."

The tall man took the lamp from the window ledge and came closer to me. But the search was in vain. The tall man placed the lamp on the table, while the short man put a revolver to my ear.

"Come," he said, "where are those keys?"

My head was beginning to clear a little. I saw it all. My wife had taken the keys from my pocket because it was her way, and because she thought I had no further use for them until the morning.

"He must have left the keys at home," said the tall man hurriedly. "Here, give him a sheet of paper and let him write a note to his wife asking for them."

The short man looked up sharply.

"I'll get them," said the tall man.

They pulled the table up to me and spread out a scrap of paper. The short man loosened the rope and let my right hand go free. I reached to my vest pocket half blindly and drew out my pencil, still in a daze. I tried to put my wife's name on the sheet. The pencil refused to make a mark. I looked at it. It was dull and horribly haggled about the point. I pride myself on the fine point I put to my pencils.

Again I comprehended that my wife had borrowed that very pencil to write the note to the operator's wife. I tried to scribble with the blunted thing.

"Confound you, hurry!" growled the short ruffian.

I showed the pencil point. With an exclamation of anger the short man drew out a heavy handled knife and swiftly sharpened the pencil. As he passed it back my wandering vision was caught by the lamp on the table. Heavens! it was no longer in the window! As this thought struck me, I looked towards the ledge and saw there a white, scared face pressed against the pane. It was my wife.

"Write!" growled the ruffian.

My only thought was to gain time. I knew my wife was there. I knew she would bring help.

I took the pencil in my nervous fingers. As I did so a low growl caught my ear. It caught the ears of the villains too. The short man dropped his knife on the table and turned towards the door with his revolver extended.

The tall man drew himself up against the wall.

"It's the dog," he hoarsely whispered.

"Don't miss it, Jack."

I saw the door tremble a little, I saw the short villain's arms rise and my fingers closed on the handle of the knife he had just dropped. Then, as the door slowly opened, I drew back my arm and thrust wildly at the man in front of me.

Something yellow flew through the doorway. There was a wild scream, a heavy fall, and I lapsed into unconsciousness again.

When I came round I was in bed at home, with Minnie bending over me.

"It's all right, Joe," she murmured. "They've got them both locked up safe and sound, and the money is all right, and the mill directors have given you £200 of it."

"And Jim?" I asked.

"Jim!" she cried. "Why, Jim was the tall man. It was all his plot to steal the money and throw the blame on you. And if I hadn't taken your keys—don't scold—they'd have had the money, and if it hadn't been for the lead pencil I dulled—the man you stabbed told the whole story—I wouldn't have got there in time with Hector. The dog almost killed Jim before I could call him away, but I'm not so sorry, because the little man says they would have killed you if you had by any chance suspected Jim's identity."

I reached out and took Minnie's hand.

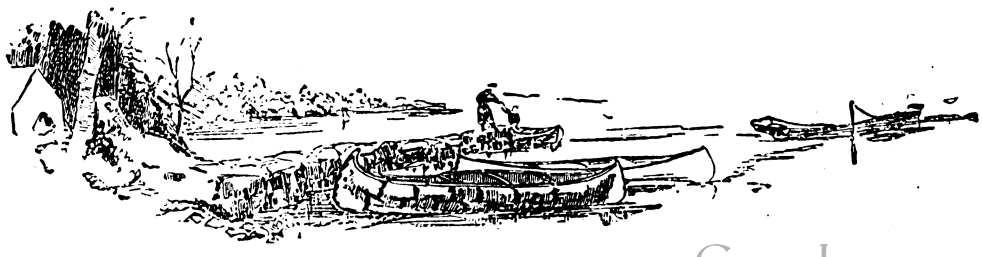
"That £200 belongs to you, dear," I said brokenly.

"Well," she answered, "if you take it, Joe, you may rest assured I'll borrow it sooner or later."

Then she put her cheek against my hand and laughed.

Then she cried.

B. M. G.



Digitized by Google

THE FATE OF CARL BLUVEN.

A Legend of the Maelstrom.

ON that wild part of the coast of Norway that stretches between Bergen and Stravanger there once lived a fisherman called Carl Bluven.

Carl was one of the poorest of all the fishermen that dwelt on that shore.

Notwithstanding his poverty, Carl was on the eve of marriage. His bride was the daughter of a woodcutter in the neighbouring forest, so that the match was pretty equal on both sides.

He dared not launch his leaky boat in such a sea, and yet, if he caught no fish, there would be nothing for supper when he should bring his wife home.

Carl walked out upon the shore and wandered along, uncertain what to do.

He at length sat down upon a shelving rock and looked out upon the sea towards the great whirlpool called the Maelstrom, of which so many fearful things were recorded.

"What riches are buried there," said Carl to himself half aloud. "What casks of butter and hams—to say nothing of gold and silver—and here am I, Carl Bluven, to be married to-morrow, and not a keg for the minister. If I had but one cask from the bottom of the Maelstrom, I would——"

But Carl did not finish the sentence. Like all the fishermen of that coast, Carl had his superstitions and his beliefs, and he looked round him rather uneasily, for he well knew that all in the Maelstrom belonged to Kahlbrannar, the tall old mariner of the whirlpool.

He was just about to return to his solitary hut, when a high crested wave, rushing through the channel beside him, bore a cask along with it and threw it among the great stones that lay between the rocks.

It proved to be the very thing he wanted—a cask of as fine butter as ever came out of Bergen and as fresh as if it had been churned a week ago.

Next morning betimes Carl Bluven was on his way to his wedding, rolling the cask before him, with the larger half of the butter in it for his marriage fee.

For some little time all went well with Carl. What with the provisions he had brought home and the remains of his butter, the newly married couple did not fare amiss, even although the fisherman rarely drew a net.

At length, however, the sausage pots stood empty, and even the Gammel Orsk cheese was reduced to a shell. As for the butter, Carl and his wife had found it so good that the cask had been empty long since.

Carl left his hut, taking his net and his oars over his shoulders, leaving Ulderwalla picking cloudberries, and, unmooring his boat, paddled out of the creek and began throwing his nets. But not a fish could he take. The sun set, and dusk began to creep over the shore. The tide had retired, so that Carl's boat was left dry a long way within water-mark, and he had to walk a dreary mile or more among the black dripping rocks that lay between him and his own dwelling.

As Carl turned away he noticed at a little distance close to the water a small boat that well he knew belonged to no fisherman of that coast. It was the very smallest boat he had ever seen, such as no seaman of Bergenhuus could keep afloat on such a sea, and the build of it, too, was the queerest he had ever beheld.

Raising his eyes from the pools of water, in which he hoped to find some floundering fish, he observed a tall figure advancing from the shore in the direction of the little boat he had seen and nearly in the same line which he was pursuing.

"A dreary night this, Carl Bluven," said the strange mariner, "and likely for a storm."

"I hope not," said Carl, not a little surprised that he should be addressed by his name.

"You hope not," said the other, with an ugly sneer. "And who, I wonder, likes better than Carl Bluven to roll a castaway cask to his cabin door?"

Digitized by Google

"Why," returned Carl apologetically, "what Providence kindly sends 'tis not for a poor fisherman to refuse."

"You liked the butter I sent you, then?" said the strange mariner.

"You sent me?" said Carl.

But Carl's rejoiner remained without further explanation.

"Aha!" said the tall mariner, pointing out to sea in the direction of the Maelstrom. "She bears right upon it—the Frou of Drontheim, deeply laden! We'll meet again, Carl Bluven." And without further parley the tall, strange mariner brushed past Carl and strode hastily toward the sea.

As Carl walked toward his own house he felt almost certain that the tall mariner he had encountered was no other than Kahlbrannar. He reached the water-mark opposite to his own house, and at the same time his foot struck against a cask lying high and dry on the very spot where the other had drifted.

Carl guessed where it came from, and, rolling the cask to his own door, he was soon busy staving it and drawing out, one after another, some of the choicest white puddings and dried hams that ever left the harbour of Bergen.

Carl Bluven had a singular dream that night. He thought that he saw the little boat he had noticed that evening lying beyond the rocks at low tide, and that he walked out to examine it, and, being curious to know whether he could steer so very small a boat, he stepped into it, and, leaning forward, hoisted the little sail at the bow, the only one it had, and when he turned round to take the helm he saw the tall mariner sitting as steersman.

Not a word was spoken, till after a little while the steersman, pointing forward, said:

"There she is, as I told you, the Frou of Drontheim, bearing right upon the Maelstrom, as my name is Kahlbrannar; she'll be down to the bottom before us."

Carl now looked out ahead and saw a fearful sight; the sea, a league across, was like a boiling cauldron, whirling round and round, and gradually, as it were, shelving down to the centre, where there appeared a huge hole, round which the water wheeled with an awful swirl.

A gallant three-masted ship was within the whirlpool; she no longer answered the helm, but flew round and round the cauldron, gradually nearing the centre, which she soon reached, and stern foremost, rushed down the gulf that swallowed her up.

The little boat, piloted by the tall mariner, flew directly across the whirlpool to its centre, and the next moment Carl found himself walking with his companion on the ribbed sea sand at the bottom of the Maelstrom.

What a sight met the eyes of Carl! Mountains of wealth, wrecks of a thousand vessels, and the white bones of mariners, thicker strewn than gravestones in a churchyard. But what mainly attracted the eyes of Carl was the gold and silver that lay about, as plentiful as pebble stones.

"Now," said Kahlbrannar, after Carl had feasted his eyes awhile upon all he saw, "what would you give, Carl Bluven, to be master of all this?"

"Faith," said Carl, "I am but a poor fisherman; you ask me what I would give for all I see here, and you know I have nothing to give."

"There you're wrong again," said Kahlbrannar. "Sit down upon that chest of gold, friend, and listen. You shall be the richest butter merchant and ham merchant and spirit merchant in all Bergenhuus, and have more gold and silver in your coffers than King Christian has in his treasure, and in return you shall marry your daughter to my son."

Carl, having no daughter and not knowing whether he might ever have one, and half thinking the offer a jest, said, "A bargain be it, then."

It was the morning after this that Carl, awakening just at daybreak, sprang out of bed, and, telling Uldewalla that he was going to draw a net that morning, left his hut and walked toward the rocks.

Uldewalla, feeling uneasy in her mind, rose and looked through the small window and saw her husband in the grey of the morning walk out among the black rocks (for the tide was back), and she could see him standing close to the low water line, and another of taller stature standing by him.

Carl, however, was not long absent. A terrific storm soon after arose, and in the midst of it he arrived, rolling a huge cask up to the door.

Next day Carl told her he was discontented with his manner of living—that he was resolved to be a rich man, and that the very next morning they should depart for Bergen.

Next morning saw Carl and Uldewalla on their way to Bergen. Uldewalla proposed that they should take their provisions with them and such little articles as they possessed, but Carl said there was no occasion for such strict economy, as he had a well-stored warehouse and everything comfortable at Bergen.

Carl led Uldewalla to a good house, facing the harbour where, as he had said, everything was prepared for their reception. A neighbour who had lived hard by brought the key, telling them that a good fire was lighted, for a tall gentleman, who engaged the house, had ordered everything to be got ready that evening, and adding:

"The quantity of the goods brought into the warehouse this day is the wonder of all Bergen. They've been carried in as fast as boats could land them, and the boatmen, they say, were all as like to each other as one cask they carried was to another."

Never indeed was warehouse better stored than Carl Bluven's. He was soon looked upon as the most prosperous merchant and the most moneyed man in Bergenhuus.

It is true indeed that Carl had detractors. Some wondered where he came from, and others where he got his money. All his payments were made in old coin, or strange coin, and not in the current money of the country. But prosperity always raises up enemies, and Carl's gold was good gold and none the worse for its age.

To Uldewalla all this was a mighty agreeable change, and in good time Uldewalla became the mother of a girl so beautiful that she was the admiration of her parents and the wonder of all Bergen.

For the first fifteen years after Carintha was born Carl was not only a thriving, but a right merry merchant. His dealings grew more and more extensive, and in respect of wealth he distanced all competition.

But as Carintha grew up Carl grew less merry, and when she had passed her sixteenth summer, and when Uldewalla spoke to her husband about settling Carintha in the world, anyone, to have looked in Carl's face at that time, would have seen that something extraordinary was passing within.

Digitized by Google

It was about a year after this that the son of the governor of Bergenhuus, Hamel von Storgelven, cast his eyes upon Carintha and became enamoured of her. She on her part did not rebuke his advances, except with that maidenly timidity that is becoming, and all Bergen said there would be a wedding.

Carl began to treat all that had once passed as an old story, and, seeing his moneybags about him and his warehouses full of goods, there was nothing to remind him of his hut on the sea-coast and what had happened there, and nothing but what might well breed confidence in any man.

It was a fine, sunshiny day—the day, as has been said, before the celebration of Carintha's nuptials—and Carl Bluven was standing on the quay with the other merchants, looking at the cheerful sight of the ships passing in and out and the bales of goods landing, and chatting about city matters and trade, when suddenly all eyes were directed toward the harbour. Carl's eyes followed the rest, and, sure enough, he saw something that might well create wonder in others and something more in him.

"Where does it come from?" said one.

"What a singular build!" said another.

"Never was such a boat seen in Bergen harbour," said a third.

"And look at the helmsman," said a fourth. "He's taller than the mast."

As for Carl, he said nothing, but remained standing with the group of merchants. Meanwhile the boat touched the landing place, and the tall mariner stepped out, and with a singular sneer on his face walked directly up to Carl Bluven, who had not fallen back like the rest, but manfully stood his ground, and was, therefore, a little apart from his companions.

No one could distinctly hear what passed between the tall, strange, old mariner and the chief magistrate. It was evident, however, that angry words passed between the two. The mariner, darting a menacing scowl at his companion, turned away and descended into his boat, which he paddled out of the harbour, while everyone looked after it and asked of his neighbour the same question as before:

"Where does it come from?"

"I served him right," said the chief magistrate as he walked homeward. "Fulfil my bargain indeed! No, no! If he was such a simpleton as to fill my warehouse with goods, and my coffers with cash upon a mere promise, I'm not such a fool as to keep it. Let me but keep on dry land and I may snap my fingers at him, and, by the ghost of King Kyree, if I catch him again on the quay of Bergen I'll clap him in the city gaol!"

He now knew the worst. His promise could not bind Carintha in any way, who would be secure even against treachery so soon as the wedding ring was placed upon her finger.

For more than twenty years after the marriage of Carintha, Carl Bluven continued to enjoy his prosperity and to exercise at due intervals the office of chief magistrate, and he saw his grand-children grow about him, and at length buried his wife Uldewalla. But the penalty of the rash promise had yet to be paid.

It chanced that Carl Bluven—who, by-the-by, was now Carl von Bluven, having long ago received that dignity—was bidden to a feast at the house of a rich citizen who lived just on the opposite side of the harbour.

Although it was nearly half a league round the head of the harbour and across the drawbridge, Carl walked round rather than trust himself across in a boat, a conveyance which, ever since his interview on the quay, he had studiously avoided.

In the midst of their conviviality, and when it nearly approached midnight, the merriment was suddenly interrupted by the hollow beat of the alarm drum, and all hastily arising, and running to the window, which looked out upon the harbour, Carl saw that his own warehouse was in flames.

It was, as has been said, half a league round by the drawbridge; the merchant saw his well-stored warehouse within a stone's throw of him, burning away—the fumes of wine were in his head—and without further thought he leapt into a boat that lay just below and pushed across.

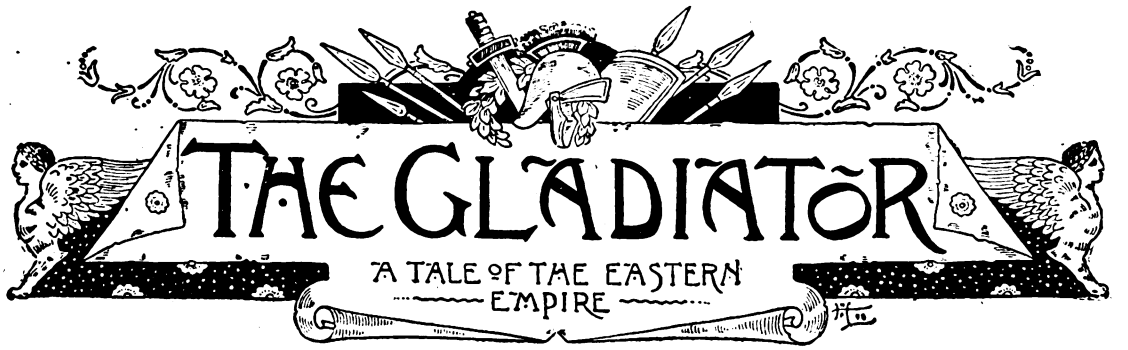
Scarcely had Carl von Bluven done this when he recollected his danger. Paddle as he would, the boat made no way.

Some seamen awoke at the loud cries for help, and some, who jumped out of their hammocks, told how they saw a boat drifting out of the harbour.

Two or three days after this event the Tellemarke, free trader, arrived in Bergen from Iceland and reported that but for a strong northerly breeze she would have been sucked into the Maelstrom; that a little before sunset when within two leagues of the whirlpool, a small boat was seen drifting empty, and that soon after another, the smallest and strangest built boat that ever was seen, passed close under their bows, to windward, paddling in the direction of the Maelstrom; that two mariners were in it, he at the helm of an exceedingly tall stature and singular countenance; that the other cried out for help, upon which the ship lay to and manned a boat with four rowers, but that with all their exertions they were unable to gain upon the little boat, which was worked by a single paddle, and that the boatmen, fearing they might be drawn into the whirlpool, returned to the ship, and that, just at sunset, they could descry the small boat, by the help of their glasses, steering right across the Maelstrom as if it had been a small pond.

H. RIVIERS.

Digitized by Google



By GEORGE C. WALLIS.

PART THE FIRST.

"THE AMBITIONS OF YOUTH."

CHAPTER I.

THE LITTLE MAID.

ACROSS the famous passage of the Bosphorus, through the lightening shades of the sunrise, out of the darkness into the dawn, a ship came slowly, impelled by the lazy breeze. Many days had the vessel laboured in the Adriatic Sea amongst the islands; and the captain, when her prow cut the waters of the Golden Horn and the glittering buildings of the first Christian City in the world uprose on every hand, heaved a sigh of relief. And Rhesus, who saw the splendour of Constantinople for the first time in his life as they stood into that palace-fringed arm of the sea, where the fleets of fifty nations could have lain at anchor, felt the young blood of hope leap within him.

"My father shall see that I am worthy of his name!" he cried to his friend Proclus, as they stepped ashore. "I shall make myself famous here, and he shall hear of my success in his Sicilian home, and own that he did ill to cast me adrift on the world!"

"And what do you call success?" asked Proclus, in his quiet way.

"Fame, wealth, power, the love of beautiful women and the praise of honest men."

"So," said Proclus, "none of them are things worth striving for, friend Rhesus, saving the second, and perhaps the fourth. As for the praise of honest men—that will be lacking for a certainty. Honest men are not to be found in this age; least of all in this city of corruption."

Proclus was a cynic of cynics. Born and nurtured in the polluted atmosphere of the Byzantine Court, and yet being honest and disdainful of ill-gained success himself, he sought refuge in a pessimism that sat well upon him. Rhesus was from distant Sicily, unsophisticated, full of the fire of youth and ambition, and enthusiastic in the faith of the good old gods who ever favoured the strong arm and the stern will, and his cousin's satire jarred upon him.

"Surely we shall find some brave and true men," he said with fine scorn; "surely some who will die for their country, for their faith, for their love?"

Proclus was but a few years older than the other, who was now twenty, was not an inch taller, and had less of a manly bearing, but he stood and smiled at his friend in the busy street as a teacher might at a backward scholar.

"I' faith!" he cried, "you are soft with the blush of youth yet, after all I have taught you on the voyage! I tell you the age is corrupt to the core. The old faith which we two yet hold is fast dying, and can never be revived; the new faith is honeycombed with rottenness already, from its mitred bishops in their palaces down to its credulous mobs that howl and jeer at every Pagan who passes on the street. The Emperor is but a tool in the hands of unscrupulous ministers, and these enrich themselves from the public wealth. Miserie, miserie!—as these Latin-canting Christians say—there is no good in the world. The only thing worth living for is an ample dinner."

Rhesus did not reply. He was busy thinking, resolving, planning. He rebelled against his friend's picture, and determined to prove in himself that all men were not liars, hypocrites, traitors, thieves. And, he also reflected, was it not his secret hope, his cherished ambition, to raise aloft once more the fallen banner of the olden faith—the sturdy Paganism of his Roman ancestors, who in their day had made Rome great—above the sign of the Cross? He would show the world what a Roman and a Pagan could do!

"Well, if you have done day-dreaming, friend," broke in the voice of Proclus upon his reflections, "we will be bestirring ourselves a little better. See, we have left the Convent of St. Conan behind, and in the square yonder is the famous church of St. Sophia; there is the imperial palace; and there, over the house-tops, you can see the walls of the Hippodrome."

"Lead on!" replied Rhesus. "I would fain see the horses I am to drive, if, as you say, you can get me entered for the races of the nones of June. But I wish your green sash was not quite so glaring, Proclus; the citizens in blue seem not so pleased with it."

"I will do all I promised you, Rhesus, when you embarked with me. I have great influence with the keeper of the beasts to our faction in the Hippodrome, and my gold has greater influence still. Besides, your figure and bearing will commend you favourably. Forsooth!—old Sibron would rave like one possessed if he missed the chance of your services, having once seen you! As for the sour looks of our enemies, the blues, confusion take them. . . . Pallas Athene! but that was nearer than to my liking! out with your steel, youngster, as you value your neck, and follow me!"

It all happened so quickly that Rhesus scarcely knew how it was done, but he found himself at his friend's side defending the end of a long, narrow street against a shouting, furious mob of blue-garmented fanatics, whose knives gleamed in the sunlight before him. A dagger, thrown by a skilful hand, flashed before his companion's face, missing him only because he saw it coming and held back, and the two had now turned at bay, raising the rallying cry of "Nika!" as they fought. Friends with tokens of green cut their way to them through the blue throng; others ran to their aid from the rear; cries and oaths, laughter and jeers, arose on every hand; they were engaged in a faction fight and would do well to escape with whole skins.

Digitized by Google

Pictures from "THE GLADIATOR,"

A dagger flashed before his companion's face.

His foe l

START READING TO-DAY.

"I hate you, you great ugly men!"

A Tale of the Eastern Emp

Digitized by Google

Our Grand New Serial Story.

apt upon him.

They thundered on the wooden door of the portal with their sword hilts.

START READING TO-DAY.

"There is a plot brewing."

Empire, By GEORGE C. WALLIS.

Digitized by Google

Something of the insensate enmity and partisanship of the rival factions of blue and green, born in the arenas and nursed for their own purposes by the emperors and the gladiators, had reached to all parts of the decaying empire. Even in distant Sicily the youths had worn the colours in the games, and partly because his father had favoured the green and partly because the blues were the favourites of Court and Church, Rhesus had adopted the first. Yet it was only an emblem to him. It seemed so unworthy of men to come to blows—to blood—over the paltry significance of a badge blue or green, held by most for no better reason than a whim, a fashion, or a folly. But as he strove there by the side of Proclus, the swords of a dozen friends glinting round, he had no choice but to fight as desperately as the rest.

It was a moment or two of frenzy, and then it was over. Knives flashed, swords sang, arrows flew, and more than one blue champion went down before the swinging strokes of the blade his young arms wielded, and then the riot ceased as suddenly as it began. The assailants and assailed melted away before the sweeping charge of the Heruli cavalry, and the friends, running low like foxes, escaped by sundry dark passages that Proclus knew well to the gates of the theatre. They thundered on the wooden door of the portal with their sword hilts, and the servitor, recognising Proclus, let them pass in, making no comment on their red-stained garments.

"Gods! If this comes of wearing the green, I think I shall lay the sash aside," said Rhesus. "Has it come to this, that one cannot walk in the streets of the capital without being called upon to fight for one's life at any time? Methinks it is a wonder that the gods send not an earthquake to swallow up this city, as they destroyed Antioch but a year ago."

"Oh, 'tis nothing!" answered Proclus lightly, wiping his heated face. "I have seen many worse encounters than this, and the cavalry have not often been so early on the scene. We have done well, my Rhesus—and you laid about you lustily. I am more convinced than ever that you are the man I want for this race. But here comes old Sibron himself; he shall decide."

A wiry, sinister-looking, ferret-eyed fellow, his face wrinkled with the craftiness of many years, came towards them from the cage room.

"Back so soon, my worthy cynic?" he croaked in his harsh voice. "Have you brought us a new recruit?—we need one desperately enough, Heaven knows!"

Whereupon Proclus drew forward his friend and retailed his circumstances and his merits as glibly as a dealer bartering slaves; discussing his good points, his muscles, his stature, his enthusiasm, with a wondrous disregard for his feelings, and the end of the confab was that Rhesus was engaged to drive the second chariot of the four that the green faction had matched against an equal number of the blues for the honours of a day of sport. Much hung on the issue of the race, they told him, for the Emperor, although prejudiced in favour of the blue faction by the hatred of the fair Theodora, was inclined to praise success of every sort. In the gladiatorial fights, said the greens, victory would be theirs beyond doubt, so that the chariot race alone would turn the balance.

So, with all youth's thoughtlessness, Rhesus entered with spirit into the cause of the green factions, and the keeper of the beasts was so pleased thereat that he would have no nay but the novice must straightway lead out the steeds and run them round the sanded course.

Nothing averse, Rhesus sprang into one of the idle cars, while Proclus geared in the mettled horses, and shaking the rein with a practised hand, he shot away on the wings of the wind, a swirling dust cloud following in his wake. Once, twice, amid the admiring cries of the dawdling youths of both factions who stood about, he thundered round the arena, and a third time passed old Sibron like a flash. Halfway round, a little girl ran out from the side, clapping her hands in childish glee, and seemingly heedless of danger, stood almost in the way. The off horse swerved slightly, seeing the little figure, and reared, a trace broke, and the two animals shot forward, but not so quickly that Rhesus had not time, in the brief pause, to stretch out a hand to the laughing little maid and lift her into the car beside him. She clung to him confidingly as they went madly round, and when he pulled up and dismounted, still held fast to his hand.

"A sturdy jade for a young one!" laughed Proclus, patting her golden head, "you are indeed a lucky fellow, Rhesus, to have found a love so soon after landing. Who is she, Sibron?"

"She is who she is, most worthy patron," answered the keeper, with an evil twinkle in his eyes. "Her mother, whom she is named after, was Eutasia, and died over her. That is all we know. The little one came here by chance just after you left on your voyage, and none of us have had the heart to turn her away. Sometimes she will go home with me, sometimes with Marcen; cares for none of us, saving to plague our lives, and seems to have no sense of fear."

"She will grow up like the rest, I suppose," said Proclus, turning away wearily, "and either end her days in the galleys or on the throne. I vow the puissant Theodora herself was just such another dare-devil, only that her father was responsible for her upbringing. Well, 'tis the way of the world. And if you are tired of showing off your prowess, Rhesus, and conquering fair damsels with the display, we will be going home. After the ship and the fight I am tired and hungry, and we must get over both, if I am to show you the sights of the city by night. Kiss the little one and come away."

Rhesus bent down to caress the sweet little face held up to him, and as she threw her little arms round his neck with all a child's abandon, old Sibron and the others broke into a rough burst of laughter at the sight. She pulled herself away at that with a finely tragic gesture, stamping her tiny foot on the ground like a veritable fury, and cried angrily:

"Oh, I hate you, you great, ugly men! You are always making fun of me! I like this stranger better than any of you. He is gentle and good, and will not tease me, I know. I hope he will come here again. I wish he would take me away!"

And she stamped her little foot again with a passion that was most amusing. Then she looked up at Rhesus, and he bent and kissed her once more, and came away.

"I am beginning to prove your black picture of the world false, friend Proclus," he said, as they merged with the pressing throng in the streets. "I have already found some good in this city; something with a promise of all that is best in life; something worth loving and living and dying for."

"By my soul! Have you fallen in love so soon?" cried the other mockingly. "And with a waif of the circus, to boot?"

"I think I have," answered Rhesus seriously. "I think that little Eutasia has the making of a good and beautiful woman in her, and it will not be my fault if she is not kept from the harm that lurks round her future life. Might I not do worse? And if I am in love with her so soon and so seriously, what then?"

Proclus did not reply, but led on, an enigmatical expression on his face. And as they went, though all the sights, the dresses, the various nationalities that mixed in the streets, the great buildings and costly shrines, were new to his eyes, Rhesus heeded them not. The rough laugh and light words of Sibron rang jarring in his ears, and all the faces that he saw merged into one face, that danced before him with childish merriment and admiration shining from the bright blue eyes, and the sunlight filtering through the wind-tossed tangle of the sunny hair.

It was the face of little Eutasia, the merry little waif of the Hippodrome. And how often, in dark days and bright, on land and sea, lustrous with love or clouded with sorrow, did he see that fairy face in the after years!

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER II.

The Chariot Race.

Gaily passed the month of waiting before the nones of June came, and the two friends well filled the interval with training and merry-making, and adventures of the wildest kind. Rhesus glided easily into the restless life of the city; it was like a draught of the fine old vintage of the Campania to his provincial mind; and ere the day of the festival dawned he knew most of the forbidden haunts of the capital, most of its streets and secret passages, many of its public characters, a little of its pompous Court. He was even presented to the Emperor Justinian—for Proclus was judicious in the bestowal of his liberal bribes—and in spite of the green badge that he wore, received an assurance that he would be watched with interest in the arena.

As for the enmity between the factions, Rhesus cared little for it, being young and on the threshold of a fresh career. He went with the stream of life, and, cast by circumstance into one of the rival eddies of it, remained there. He got entangled in more than one hot broil in the streets, but fortune favoured him each time, and his skill of prowess, both with the sword and the chariot, made him the talk of the city. Solitary wearers of the blue gave him wide road-room, and the cry of "Rhesus the Roman!" became a well-known rallying cry for his own partisans.

And that there was need for unity amongst them is not to be wondered at, for perhaps never, in the whole long history of Rome's deplorable decline, was the bitterness of the factions so intense as in the five or six years before that short but terrible Reign of Terror which shook the Eastern Empire to its foundations.

The factions were better in their infancy, when there were four instead of two, and their rivalry was merely good-humoured competition in the games: when the whites swore by the snows of winter; the blues by the sky and sea and the mists of autumn; the greens by the verdure of spring; the reds by the sun and the dog-star of summer.

But at this time their enmity was concentrated into two rival parties only, typical of the conflict of earth and sea. If the blues won the games, the fishermen and sailors expected prosperous navigation and rich yields on the deep blue sea; if the greens conquered, the husbandmen awaited abundant harvest and large fruit crops. The rivalry had deepened and spread; rulers and ministers had fostered and intensified it for state or personal gain, thinking to divert the people's attention thus from their own ill doings; the gladiatorial section of the populace encouraged the factions for the sake of their own calling, and the mandates and banes of the Church—thundered with such deadly effect against all heathens and heretics—were invoked in vain on behalf of peace, or not invoked at all.

It was scarcely safe for a well-known leader of either party to be alone in the lower quarters of the city, even in the daytime, and night was a time of utter lawlessness, of untold crime, of violence by dagger and noose.

In the reign of Theodoric, imperial authority had to be interposed between the blues in power and their unfortunate rivals, and in the reign of Anatasinus the green faction had retaliated by murdering no fewer than 3,000 of their enemies at a public feast.

From then the rivalry spread everywhere; became a feud, a vendetta, destined to be quenched only in the life blood of innocent thousands then unborn; and after a brief pause in the reign of Justin, broke out with renewed virulence when Justinian and Theodora assumed the imperial purple, and openly favoured the blue. The privileged party grew boastful, darkly hinting at a terrible reprisal in store for their foes, and went about in the barbaric dress of the Huns—closely-fitting sleeves and ample garments; cultivating the long hair, and imitating the lofty step and the sonorous voice of that people. And as the blues grew insolent, the greens grew desperate, and the bitterness of the feud increased.

So, as the day of the great race, which was fixed for the first day after the Whitsuntide festival proper, drew nearer, Rhesus became a person of great importance, the object of a hundred happily-frustrated plots, the recipient of almost royal care; and when the sun of the eventful morning lit the waters of the bay and gilded the giant cross on Sophia, he was more talked about than anyone in the city. His age, weight, height, strength, health, parentage, opinions and fancies, were common knowledge, and common sources of dispute and wagers in the many drinking places of the gladiatorial quarter, and when he set forth from the house of Proclus to the Hippodrome he went guarded by a chosen band of fifty well-armed friends, all dressed in olive green.

It was a glorious day, and so hot that the great awning was drawn completely over the Hippodrome, to shield the people and the performers alike from the glare of the sun. The circling seats, rising tier above tier, were crowded to their utmost capacity, thousands more stood in the aisles and passages and climbed into the niches of the wall, some even stood on the sand of the arena itself, risking everything for the excitement of the hour. There were all sorts and conditions of women and men, all sects, all nationalities, all fashions of dress. There were arrogant Huns and lordly Vandals, Goths and Visigoths, swarthy Egyptians and darker Moors, Persians and Sythians, and islanders galore. The sombre clothes of the workers were mingled with the gay apparel and bright colours of the parasites of Society—the functionaries of the court, the soldiers of the guard, the ladies free and fair—and through all the throng, here scattered, there massed in clusters, were the badges of blue and green.

The first rounds of the conflict were tame, and interested little. The greens carried all before them, so well were their champions trained, and even in the antique contests of sword against trident and net, sword against spear, foot against horse, revived for the occasion, the blue faction but held their own. Then it was Rhesus' turn.

"Now," said Sibron aside to him, as the first two chariots dashed off from the starting line amid a burst of cheers, "you must make the running from the first, and not draw rein for anything that may be shouted at you as you pass round. There is a plot brewing even now, that I have luckily got some faint hint of, to bring you to grief on your way, and your only chance is to go right on, caring for nothing, but keeping slightly to the front always. Once you fall behind you are doomed."

"I understand," said Rhesus, setting his teeth with determination, "they will try to throw an obstacle in my way, and if I keep just ahead of the other, they will not dare, lest it upset their own chariot also."

"I can trust you now," said the keeper. "And if you win this event, and we can disable one of the blues by this self-same trick, the balance of the day's result will be ours. They have won the first race even now."

A storm of applause, mingled with cries of anger, rose from the mighty concourse as he spoke. The driver of the blue chariot had passed the goal a good length ahead, the blue flag rose above the green.

Then Rhesus sprang into his car and seized the reins of his practised steeds, and side by side with his rival in blue, awaited the signal.

As his gaze passed round that seething sea of faces, all glowering with excitement and fierce hope, he noticed the Emperor and his boldly-beautiful consort in the purple seat, watching with eager intentness, and behind them the Court officials and the rows of bishops and priests, and he turned sick at heart to think how easily that human ocean could be lashed into terrible storm. Then, as the edile cracked his whip and he shouted to his horses, Rhesus caught sight of the face of little Eutasia amongst a group who stood within the ring, and the little maid's saucy nod and smile put new courage into him as he swept away.

At first, Hermiot, his rival, took the lead, but Rhesus laid on the thong with right good will, and heedless of cries from the crowd that his axle-trees were breaking, gradually drew level, and then, with a splendid spurt, gained the inside curve at a turning, and shot to the front. Hermiot flung at him an anathema as he passed with a smile on his face, and lashed his steeds with savage fury, but Rhesus kept to the inside edge and twice went round the sanded course in front and in safety. One more round, and the race would be won.

Digitized by Google

The pace was furious now. Rhesus dared not slacken speed and so reserve himself for the last few lengths, for Hermiot thundered close behind, and the breath of his horses came in hot jets against his back.

Through the cloud of dust that swept round with them, Rhesus saw the people standing up on the seats in their frenzy of excitement, and heard their cries of encouragement or rage, and the odds that were being shouted from one to another.

When half the last round was run, the blue made a desperate effort, and the nostrils of his steeds drew alongside those of the green for an instant. Then they failed again, and Rhesus made up the headway once more, urging on his coursers with both voice and thong. A few more moments of mad energy, and then victory would have been his.

As he dashed on towards the goal, past the place where the Imperial party sat, Hermiot suddenly sprang his horses forward again, and before Rhesus could catch the warning cry that a little green-clad figure uttered piercingly as it flashed across the sand towards him, his foe leapt upon him and seized the reins, and drew his steeds back upon their haunches, leaving his own to go on as they listed.

It was done so suddenly that Rhesus had not time to prevent it, but he turned fiercely when he recovered from the shock, and snatching the thong from Hermiot's hand and seizing him round the neck, bore him to the floor of the car. There they struggled while the frightened animals tore on again.

Hermiot was not the stronger, but he was yet so powerful that Rhesus could not disengage himself as they glared at each other in the swaying car; and the latter felt that the foul trick had lost him the race. He kept his foe down, however, and presently the car steadied, and the galloping slowed considerably and then ceased, amongst a roar of concentrated anger such as he hoped never to hear again. Yet there was a note of admiration mingled with it, and as the two loosed their grasp and looked sullenly about them, they saw the little maid holding the heads of the panting brutes who had borne the car along whilst they fought.

But the empty chariot of Hermiot had passed the winning line first, and the judges, secretly under the protection of the Empress Theodora, and bribed by the blue faction, gave out that Rhesus had been defeated, and the race must go to the blue.

An angry howl of rage went up from the greens at that, and Justinian, anxious not to carry his favouritism too far all at once, overruled the judgment, and held that the event must be considered a tie, as the horses were so nearly equal. The Empress looked displeased, and black glances appeared on many faces, but for once he held firm, and the flags went up together, side by side.

Old Sibron was beside himself with fury, and when Rhesus passed him on the way to the stables, little Eutasia perched upon the back of one of the steeds with all the grave assurance of her dozen years, he grunted surlily that folks who could not keep their eyes open were no good as charioteers.

Before Rhesus could reply, Eutasia, with ready speech, had answered for him.

"It was not his fault, old curmudgeon. He was keeping ahead, as you told him, and could not see Hermiot behind. You had better drive a chariot yourself, Sibron."

The grim fellow's face wrinkled to a smile at her sauciness, and he bade them pass on. As he spoke, a burst of applause told that the blues had won the third race, and by the time Rhesus had came out of the stable again, they had won the last.

It was not safe, as Proclus said, in the state of public temper, to pay the foe back in their own coin.

So they saw the blue in the ascendant for the rest of the afternoon, and when the games were over and the flushed thousands poured out into the streets, those of the green badges hied them away to their homes with all the speed they could.

The city was given over to wild rejoicings and carousals, and so many were the flags and banners and garlands of the conquering faction that were everywhere displayed, that the capital seemed suddenly draped in blue. And all the night long Rhesus heard at intervals the cry of "Nika!"* and the shrieks of belated citizens who had fallen into the clutches of the roving bands of the victors and could not answer to the watchword. It was a night of terror; a foretaste of that still more awful night of fear that was yet to come.

(To be continued.)

* NOTE.—"Nika!"—vanquish—the watchword of the factions.

No. 1 of M. A. P.

IS NOW ON SALE.

IT CONTAINS:

"In the Days of My Youth," by Sir Edward Clarke.

"The Queen of Spain," by Lady Violet Greville.

"The Career of Mr. Hooley," by T. P. O'Connor.

"When I was at School," by Max O'Rell.

And sketches of all the notable people of the week.

ONE PENNY.

M. A. P. IS EDITED BY T. P. O'CONNOR, AND IS THE MOST INTERESTING SOCIETY AND PERSONAL PAPER IN THE WORLD.

Don't miss the first number.

M. A. P. IS ON SALE EVERY THURSDAY.

Do you Want Change for Twopence?

THEN BUY

THE SUMMER DOUBLE NUMBER OF "HOME NOTES."

Here are a few of the many good things it contains:

Some Drawings and Etchings by the Queen. Never before published.

The Commencement of a New Serial Story. By Lillias Campbell Davidson.

The Pattern of a Dainty Blouse, with Instructions for its Making.

"A Girl's First Season in Town." Told by Herself.

"How to Give a Successful River Party."

Boating Hints, and a Record of the Doings of "The Saturday Afternoon Club."

Fifty Pounds are Offered in Prizes.

See the New Conundrum Competition. You can commence this week.

"A Heart-to-Heart Talk with Girls about 'Summer Flirtations.'"

And a Good Deal More of which Space will not Permit the Mention.

Digitized by Google

THE CROCHET NEEDLE.

Miss Lily sat in close companionship as usual, with her familiar spirit, a piece of crocheted edging. Miss Lily was still pretty, with the pathetic beauty held as flotsam from the wreck of years. Her hair was prettier as silver than it had ever been as brown, and her eyes, though they had lost their vivid glow and eagerness, had gained a kindly sympathy.

Her tenderness had even extended to the crocheting in her hand, and imparted something to that usually very impersonal object that her fancy had fretted into thinking a response.

"It's almost done," she thought. "I can go back to the oak leaf soon."

A change in the crochet pattern was the chief diversion of Lily's life, that ran on as monotonously to the observer as the tune of the famous harper who played upon only one string.

She wondered as she sat staring dully at the blaze, how the crocheting had come to mean so much to her, and could not think for the instant; then half remembered, saddened a little, lost the thread of memory again, recovered it, and fell to musing, her elbow resting on the table, her cheek in her palm.

She could hardly believe now that a certain few years of her life had ever really happened. They must have belonged to some other and wandered wilfully into her own, for there was no home for them in hers, or likeness unto anything they brought.

She was still looking vaguely, half wistfully, at the fire when her door-bell rang, and someone had entered the room and was hurrying to her side.

"Aunt Lily," said a girlish, tremulous voice, "I've come to ask you to help me. Mother said you had suffered like this once, and you had learnt to forget, and I thought perhaps you could show me the way."

"What is it, Grace?"

"Oh, it's Phil!" she cried. "He doesn't care for me any more. He's paying attention to Jennie Thompson now, and I can't bear it. Mother said other women have to bear such things, but she'd always been happy and I could come to you. You could help me," she said, looking up appealingly. "You could teach me to forget."

"Yes," said her aunt slowly.

Then it came back to her, all her own little story, and a dim, broken memory of the first heartache and her own longing to forget.

"Poor little girl," whispered Lily, stroking her beautiful mass of golden hair. "How was it I learnt to forget? Let me think. Yes, I remember now. Wait a minute, dear, I will show you."

She slipped out of the room and soon returned, bringing three rolls of very broad crocheted lace.

"Can you crochet, Grace?"

"Not very much," said Grace wonderingly.

"Well, I will teach you. This is the very way I learnt to forget. The needle slips in and out, and the sunlight and firelight shine on it, and the lace grows and is so pretty, and it brings comfort. When I began I couldn't see the needle—Oh, how long ago that is!—for the tears. That was when I knew he would never come again, and I had my wedding dress all ready—it's grown yellow in a chest in the garret. But after a while the lace took up my trouble drop by drop till it was gone, and I couldn't tell you to-day where it is. So I'll teach you, dear. There are the three rolls I did in the three years, one for each. They are yellow now, you see.

"If I'd been a man, I should have gone away to Africa. But I couldn't very well, so I learnt to crochet. I never gave the lace away, you see, because I had worked my trouble into it, and I was afraid. This is the first year's—you see I've numbered it one—and this is the second's, and this is the third's. There's the three."

Lily handled the rolls over and over, lost for a minute in the associations which they revived. Her niece seemed to have forgotten her own grief for the time and was observing her aunt curiously as she bent over the lace.

Lily sat silent for a time, smoothing out the creases of the lace and drawing it out to its length. It seemed to have the effect of an enchanter's wand, for it summoned old scenes and faces at will, and Lily grew blind to the little room, and the needs of her guest. At last Grace moved impatiently.

"Yes, yes," said Lily, like one awakenening, "to forget. This is the way. Here is the old pattern. I will teach you."

Grace took the needle helplessly.

"Do you think I could forget so, aunt?" she asked hesitatingly.

"I did," said Lily.

Grace had returned to her task and made one or two awkward motions with the needle when there came a ring at the door.

"It's Phil!" exclaimed Grace, springing up.

"Grace!" said the recreant lover, standing awkwardly by the door, after Aunt Lily had admitted him and had retreated towards her chair. There were shame and pleading in his voice.

"We'll try the crocheting some other time, Aunt Lily," said Grace.

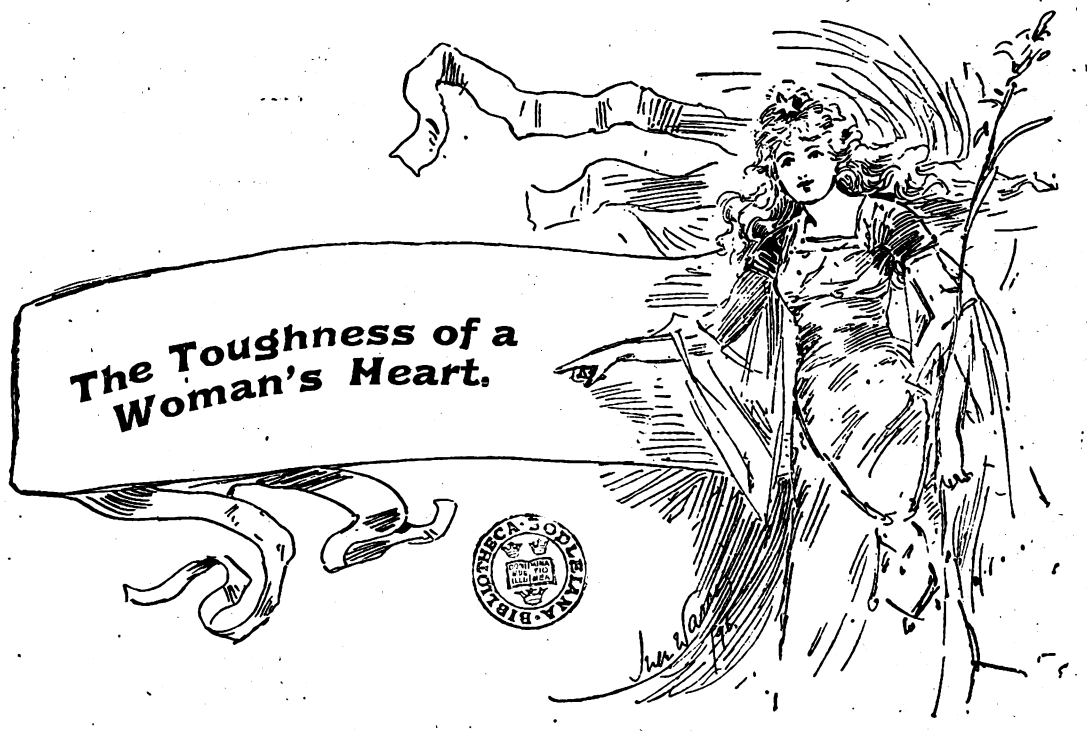
Then seeing her aunt's half-dazed expression, as if she hardly understood this new development of affairs, she ran back and kissed her. Grace's face bore no trace of sadness as she turned to Phil, and they went on chatting merrily.

Lily listened till the last footfall on the gravel had died away, then carefully rolled up the lace.

"She think's she happier, but I'm not so sure. A man's heart is uncertain property, but a crochet needle," as she laid her hand approvingly upon those on the table, "is always the same."

W. Fraser.

Digitized by Google



The Toughness of a Woman's Heart.

FOR five-and-twenty years past I have never seen Romeo and Juliet billed for representation without an involuntary shudder. Is there a story connected with it in my memory? Well, yes, there is, and one almost as tragic in its incidents as those embodied in Shakespeare's immortal story of an unhappy love.

We were playing in a small north-country town. Business was not good, the treasury was sometimes empty, and salaries were not always forthcoming.

It was at Smalltown that Roy Raneleigh joined us. Our first juvenile had left us the week before. Poor fellow, he was in the last stage of consumption, and returned to London to die. Roy Raneleigh, who took his place, was a young fellow who had been lawyer, litterateur, and something of an amateur actor.

He was a born Bohemian, if I ever met one, and the life of a strolling player with its occasional privations seemed to suit a temperament that under the gloomiest skies could be buoyant, hopeful and happy. His very presence revived the drooping spirits of most of us, and with his first appearance business picked up wonderfully.

We opened in Smalltown with The Lady of Lyons, a play not quite so hackneyed a quarter of a century ago as it is to-day. Roy Raneleigh played Claude to as sweet a Pauline as ever held an audience captive.

Caroline Chamberlain might not be called beautiful in the common acceptation of a grievously misused word. Her face defied criticism and baffled description; but it was just such a face as would live in the memory of an artist or a poet for half a lifetime. She was the daughter of an actor, and had already given promise of success in that profession in which she had been born.

It might be truly said she lived for her art, and had no other hope or aspiration but to win distinction in it. But before the expiration of a week I knew that the passion she had so often simulated on the stage had touched her heart at last.

Yes, she loved Roy Raneleigh, and the knowledge came to me with a benumbing sense of dreary desolation. I had known Carrie Chamberlain from her childhood, and although it is not often that a man loves in his maturer years the little girl he remembers in short dresses and pinafores, I nursed against my better reason, that foolish passion in my heart of hearts.

Of course, I quietly submitted to the inevitable, and after all, there is no sounder philosophy than that "which teaches acquiescence and optimism." But there was another member of the company who also divined the girl's secret. He was one of her most persistent lovers, albeit a rejected one.

It is singular how quickly an unsuccessful lover will read in the glance of the woman he loves the message that is meant for another. The man who loves and is beloved may mistake its meaning, but his jealous rival, never.

We were gathered on the stage one gloomy forenoon waiting for rehearsal.

Roy Raneleigh and Carrie were engaged in a quiet conversation at the wings, when Earle Staunton approached me. There was an ugly look on his rather handsome face as he surveyed the pair intently.

"Do you see that rooster yonder? He has been but a week or two with the company, and already monopolises all Miss Chamberlain's society."

"And she seems to like it, doesn't she?" I remarked dryly.

"You think she cares for him, Halstead?"

"I believe she loves him," I answered, and regretted the words as soon as spoken.

Earle Staunton had never been popular with his professional brethren. He was a man of superior education and a fairly successful actor, but morose and cynical; his manner was repellent to those who were disposed to live in a brotherhood of social good-fellowship.

Digitized by Google

As I left the theatre two nights later I was overtaken by Staunton. It was an off-night with him, and he took the opportunity to inflame the demon of jealousy in his breast by strong potations. His speech was almost inarticulate as he muttered:

"That cur Raneleigh had a sinister object in joining our company, Halstead; and I mean to defeat it at all hazards."

"I do not understand you," I said coldly, for his society was particularly repugnant to me at that moment.

"Oh, yes, you do understand me," he answered with drunken insolence; "your friend Mr. Raneleigh is a scoundrel, and he has won Carrie Chamberlain's love for the basest purpose."

"I do not care to listen to this nonsense," I said. "My friend Mr. Raneleigh I believe to be a worthy and an honorable gentleman."

"Oh! of course he is," was the sneering retort; "but like Cassio, you see, he is 'framed to make women false.' I tell you I have the evidence of his villainous intentions," he cried hoarsely.

"Pshaw! Staunton, you are a trifle melodramatic in your virtuous indignation. Go home and sleep, my boy, and wake in better temper. A man is not necessarily a scoundrel because he supplants one with the girl one loves."

The days passed on, and Earle Staunton was steadily drifting on the downward grade. At last the manager was obliged to reprimand him sharply, for stupid from drink he had forgotten his lines, and compromised the success of our performance on more than one occasion. Believe me, he is essentially a weak man who seeks solace in the wine cup for a woman's fickleness.

It was our last night at Smalltown, and Miss Chamberlain's benefit. A week before we had all learnt of her engagement to Roy Raneleigh. They were to be married on the return of the company to London, and both looked forward with the glowing anticipations of youth and love to the day when their lives should be inseparably interwoven.

The play was Romeo and Juliet, and Carrie looked a very lovely heroine as she stood beside her handsome lover before the curtain was rung up. I would not willingly play the eavesdropper to a lovers' tête-à-tête, but I could not avoid hearing the following conversation.

"Dear Roy, I wish you were playing Romeo to-night. I cannot understand why you should have chosen Mercutio instead, when—when——"

"Why do you pause, my love? When you are the Juliet, you would say. My fair Carrie, our love is something too sacred in my thoughts to parade it on the stage to-night in acting the lovers. And then Mercutio is a part in which it is so hard to reach the ideal of the Shakespearian critic. I have been always ambitious to play Mercutio, Carrie."

"Ah! Roy, even when a man loves, his heart owns a divided allegiance. How different it is with a woman!"

As he drew the little head down on his breast and kissed the golden hair that crowned it, a cry of rage, but ill-suppressed, escaped the lips of Earle Staunton. He was standing by my side dressed as Tybalt, his hand clutched tightly his rapier's hilt.

His face was of an ashen paleness, and his bloodshot eyes, inflamed with drink and passion, glared with the fury of a wild beast's on the unconscious lovers.

Shocked and disgusted beyond expression I turned away without addressing him, and took my place beside the prompter's desk.

The opening scenes passed over tamely, but on the balcony Juliet won her way into the hearts of her audience, and Roy Raneleigh, standing in the wings, lost not a graceful gesture of the girlish figure, not an intonation of the sweetly modulated voice that told the story of a coy, impassioned love. I have seen many Mercutios in the course of a long professional career, but never anything finer than Raneleigh's rendition of that difficult part.

He gave the Queen Mab speech with excellent judgment, and rare felicity of expression, but he fairly roused the house in that scene where Romeo declines the quarrel that Tybalt would thrust upon him.

How superbly he declaimed the lines:

> Oh, calm, dishonourable, vile submission!
> A la staccata carries it away;
> Tybalt, you rat-catcher, will you walk?

How vividly the scene that followed arises before my mental vision to-night! At his cue Tybalt rushed back to the stage. The few intervening words of the text were spoken. A clash of glittering steel, a murderous thrust from Tybalt's blade, and Mercutio sank back into Benvolio's arms, pierced through the breast.

Trembling with horror, I lowered the curtain hurriedly as Staunton rushed past me with the bloodstained rapier in his hand.

Dashing across the stage, I tore apart the pale blue velvet doublet that Raneleigh wore. It was dappled with his heart's blood, and a sob burst from my lips.

He looked up in my face, and while a wan smile played round his mouth he murmured the words which now had a terrible reality:

"'Tis not as deep as a well, nor as wide as a church door; but 'tis enough."

They were the last words he ever uttered, for three minutes later he was dead.

After the lapse of so many years I cannot recall without a shudder the awe-inspiring, speechless grief of Carrie Chamberlain, as she sank upon the breast of her murdered lover. We found Earle Staunton in the dressing room, and in his death agony. "The ruling passion is strong in death." In true dramatic fashion, he had fallen on his own sword, and thus expiated the murder he had committed in the frenzy of unrequited love.

But you would learn the fate of the heroine of this story.

No; she did not die of a broken heart. A woman's heart is very sensitive and susceptible to tender impressions, but that organ of her sex is tough, sir, very tough, and warranted to survive a great deal of wear and tear of emotional feeling.

I have found Mrs. Halstead, née Carrie Chamberlain, an excellent woman, who has never allowed the memory of an early love to interfere with her duties and responsibilities as a faithful wife.

J. MACLAREN.

Digitized by Google

THE MAN WHO WAS TOO SURE.

"How can you tolerate it, Lu?" exclaimed Mrs. Gorman. "If he is my brother, I say it is a shame!" Then, allowing her listener no time to reply, the energetic little lady rattled on: "I suppose you and Clarence must have an understanding, or you would have discharged him long ago. Here has Sidney Lawrence been waiting and serving you no less patiently than Jacob for Rachel, these seven years and more, and yet my recreant brother is the favoured one.

"Unless you take him in hand soon your roses and lilies will wither, and even faithful Sidney will come to worship at a younger, fairer shrine. Everyone supposes that you and Clarence are engaged, and yet he has never in so many words made you an offer of marriage.

"Now, while we know that he considers you his betrothed, he does not seem to realise the embarrassing position in which this tedious courtship places you, and should therefore be brought to a knowledge of it, or punished for his delinquency."

During the earlier portion of her friend's remarks a smile hovered round Lulu Brandon's lips, and she continued her task of cutting the leaves of the last new magazine; but as the final sentence was pronounced her face flushed deeply.

"My private affairs need not concern the public, Belle," she replied with dignity. "But I agree with you that I have been too patient. I acknowledge myself to be considerably at fault, for I proved an easy conquest, and Clarence may have grown lukewarm in his affection, feeling so secure of mine. Of course, a word or two from me and I might become a wife within the next month; but all such words must come from my lord himself."

Her brief displeasure gone, with a laugh she rose and linked her arm in that of her friend, and drawing her to a cosy sofa in one corner of the room, proceeded to formulate plans by which she should bring her lover to terms without his knowledge of her conspiracy.

That evening, at tea, Mr. Clarence Curtis suddenly inquired:

"Been over to the Brandons' to-day, Belle?"

"Yes; and, by the way, Clarence, Lu requested me to tell you not to call this evening, as she will be engaged."

"All right, sis; I'll go round to the theatre with Roberts."

There was a significant twinkle in her eyes as Mr. Gorman rejoined:

"I hope you'll enjoy the play. The Kendals are drawing large houses."

Two hours later Mr. Clarence Curtis was leisurely scanning the crowded theatre, bowing to those he recognised, when, just previous to the rising of the curtain, his friend Roberts exclaimed:

"Why, as I live, there's Sid Lawrence! Who knew he had returned? I wonder who the lady is! Can it be possible? It's Miss Brandon! I never supposed she would accept any other escort save yourself. What is it, Curtis, a lover's quarrel?"

Veiling his surprise with a forced smile, Curtis nonchalantly replied:

"Not to my knowledge." Then he added, somewhat impatiently, "I am no ogre. Lu has a right to go where and with whom she pleases."

In spite of the indifferent manner and careless tone, Roberts noted that his theatre-loving friend took far less interest in the play than in the couple who occupied one of the boxes nearly opposite to where they were seated.

Lu had surely never looked so exquisitely dainty and beautiful as to-night. She seemed the embodiment of health, all aglow with happiness. Yet the lovely face and graceful figure irritated him by the very beauty of which he had always been proud. This radiant piece of flesh and blood did not seem so exactly his property as formerly. Was it because Sidney Lawrence was so attentive?

They had been children together, Sid and Lu, and he knew she had always regarded the studious, dignified boy and man as an elder brother, while she gave the love of her young heart to his comrade and chum.

How well he recalled the days, years ago, when Sid had told him with sad eyes and tremulous voice that Lulu had rejected him! He comforted him as best he could, selfishly exulting in the thought that he possessed her love unasked, unsought. Strange that his possession never seemed quite so valuable as to-night! He wondered what Sidney was saying to make her smile and blush so deeply. Well, the act would soon be over, and then he and Roberts would go and see them, and so give the public to understand that matters were as usual between him and Miss Brandon.

Digitized by Google

With this thought he resolutely turned his attention to the stage, and perseveringly held it there until the curtain fell. Then, turning to Roberts, he proposed that they should go over to the opposite box.

As they entered it Sidney greeted them in his usual sincere and hearty manner, while Lulu, with a smile, gave her hand first to Clarence and then to Roberts, at the same time motioning her lover to a seat by her side.

As Roberts for a few moments engaged Sidney in conversation, Curtis managed to ask Miss Brandon why she had not informed him of her desire to come to the theatre. She frankly replied that she had felt no special wish to do so until Sidney unexpectedly called and asked her to accompany him.

This she told him with a manner so devoid of coquetry that he felt reassured, and left her with a complacent feeling that he was quite sure of her affection.

He called to see her the next evening as usual, and nothing was said of the recent incident. Clarence's brief jealousy was forgotten, and he calmly accepted the old conditions of things. Why should he be in haste to marry even the most charming girl in the world?

He hesitated to give up the freedom and luxury of bachelorhood for the restraints which marriage must inevitably bring. Lulu was such a delightful companion and sweetheart! Would she be equally charming as a wife? Whether or not she wished to marry he never conjectured. He had always lived for his own comfort, and self was his first consideration. So when he left her that evening the words were still unspoken which would bind her to him, and he was yet a free man.

A fortnight passed as usual, with no change in the relations of the two. Lulu was a proud girl, and Mrs. Gorman's look of inquiry every time they now met was hard to bear. Matters reached a climax on the day when Belle incautiously said:

"I have been scolding Clarence about you, Lulu. I tell him he will rue his indifference when it is too late."

"Indeed!" Lulu's laugh was rather forced. "And what did my lover say?"

"Oh! that he was sure of you, or something of that sort. He is abominably conceited, though he is my brother."

"Are not all men so?" asked Lulu lightly, but her eyes were like sparks.

When at eight o'clock next evening Clarence called to see Miss Brandon, the maid informed him that she had just "gone out with Mr. Lawrence." Again the green-eyed monster seized the tardy wooer, and this time it wonderfully quickened his latent love.

He resolved to ask the important question at once. Early the next morning he went to the home of his sweetheart, only to find that she had gone out for the day. Clarence was seriously disturbed. He felt that something was wrong. If he could only see Lulu for a few minutes matters would be settled to his satisfaction, he assured himself. But, alas! that little word "if" has often proved a barrier stronger than prison walls or iron bands.

For weeks he was baffled in every attempt to see Miss Brandon alone, until he was forced to admit that she purposely sought to evade a meeting with him. This only made him more eager and determined to bring one about, but more than two months elapsed before he succeeded in securing the long and much desired interview.

At last he wrote her a note, requesting somewhat imperatively to be allowed to see her privately. The reply was brief, simply stating that she would receive him that evening at 8 o'clock.

Promptly at the time designated Clarence entered the familiar room, and was greeted cordially by Lu, who yet evaded the accustomed lover-like caress.

"'Great minds run in the same channel,' Clarence. At the moment I received your note I was writing you an invitation to call."

This little speech quickly dissipated the suspicion which had risen in his mind at his reception, and he resolved to state the object of his call without delay.

"Dear Lulu," he said, taking her hand in his, "I have come this evening to ask you to name an early date for our marriage. I want my wife as soon as possible."

She allowed him to retain her hand, but the crimson deepened upon her fair cheeks as she replied:

"Clarence, I have something to say which may give you pain. During the last few years I have been dimly conscious that we are not exactly suited to each other, although a month ago I should have indignantly refuted such an implication from anyone else. I am now fully convinced that if united we should not be happy. More than this," here she spoke very softly and tenderly, "I have been mistaken in the object of my affection, and I know that I have never truly loved anyone but Sidney Lawrence."

Speechless and pale Clarence's eyes sought hers beseechingly. At last he realised the magnitude of his love for the woman his selfishness had put for ever from his life. But he read no hope in her face and in silence he rose and left her.

Years have passed since then. Clarence Curtis has never married, and the gossips say the handsome bachelor silently worships the wife of Sidney Lawrence.

PERCY GOODMAN.

Will be Published

ON FRIDAY, THE FIRST OF JULY.

PART I. OF

The Pilgrim's Progress.

BY JOHN BUNYAN.

With an Introduction by the Rev. H. R. HAWEIS.

Embellished with over one hundred and twenty designs, done by three brothers—

GEORGE WOOLLISCROFT RHEAD,
FREDERICK RHEAD, LOUIS RHEAD,

who for three years have been engaged in illustrating this favourite classic. The drawings themselves have recently been on exhibition in London, Paris, and New York, and are unique. Speaking of them

The Daily News says: "At first glance these drawings, which are done in pen and ink, with occasional aid of the brush, appear to accord in strong family resemblance, but in reality the three brothers differ considerably. They have worked, of course, on the same lines to some extent, evolving a curiously archaic representation of the principal personages as they suppose them to have existed in the imagination of John Bunyan.

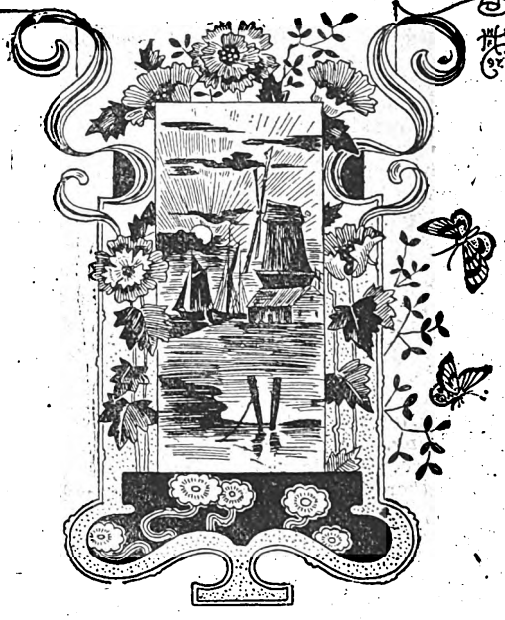
The Athenæum says: "These excellent examples of the right way of illustrating Bunyan possess those masculine qualities, that directness, and the robust energy that the themes demand.

This Work will be issued in Twelve Monthly Parts, with Coloured Wrapper price 6d. each part.

Also an Edition de Luxe of this Work will be issued, limited to 200 Copies, numbered and signed by the Artists, printed on hand-made paper, and bound in buckram, price £2 2s. 0d. nett.

Digitized by Google

THE FOUNDING OF MATANZAS.



There was once upon a time a man who led a very merry life, taking no thought of the morrow; and since to run in debt without having the means to pay is the sure road to the poor-house, in a very short time our hero was left with nothing he could call his own but thirty days in the month, and with nothing to exercise his teeth upon but his nails.

So that little by little he fell into such a state of dejection that he would allow his wife to beat him and his children to abuse him when he returned home at night empty-handed, without uttering a word in protest.

Finally, he grew tired of his life, and, borrowing a rope from one of his cronies, he went into a field to hang himself.

Having fastened one end of the rope to an olive tree, he was about to put the other round his neck when there appeared before him a dwarf, attired in a friar's robe and cowl, who said to him quietly:

"What is that you are going to do, my good man?"

"Cannot your worship see what I am going to do? To hang myself," he answered.

"So you, a Christian, are going to do what Judas did? Stop; that isn't right. Take this purse, which is never empty, and relieve your necessities."

Taking the purse from the dwarf's hand, Uncle Curro, for such was our hero's name, took a peseta out of it, and then another and another, until he saw that, like the words coming out of a woman's mouth, there seemed to be no end to them. Seeing which, he untied the rope from the tree, rolled it up, and started for home.

On the road there was a tavern, which he entered, and calling for the best the house could afford in meat and drink, he paid the score on the spot, for the tavern-keeper, knowing him of old, would not trust him to so large an amount, and he ate and ate, and drank and drank, until finally he fell off his chair and rolled under the table quite intoxicated.

The tavern-keeper, who had seen that the purse from which Uncle Curro had taken the money remained as full as before, told his wife to make another purse like it, and when this was done he took Uncle Curro's purse from his pocket and put in its place the one his wife had made.

When Uncle Curro awoke he set out again for home, where he arrived as merry as a cricket.

"Rejoice!" he cried to his wife and children. "Here is money in plenty; our days of poverty are over."

He put his hand into his pocket, and took it out again—empty; he put it in again, and again he took it out empty.

When his wife saw this she was so enraged that she gave him a blow that sent him spinning.

More dejected than ever, Uncle Curro again took the rope, and went once more into the fields to hang himself. Arrived at the same spot as before, he was proceeding to tie the rope to a branch of the same tree when he heard a voice near by saying:

"What is that you are going to do, good man?" and lifting up his eyes he saw before him the dwarf, seated astride a branch of the olive tree.

"To hang myself, like a string of garlic from a kitchen rafter," answered Uncle Curro very coolly.

"So you have lost your patience again?" said the dwarf.

"And no wonder," replied Uncle Curro, "when I have nothing to eat."

"That is your own fault, entirely your own fault. But never mind. Come here. Take this table-cloth, and so long as you keep it in your possession you shall never want for something to eat."

So saying, the dwarf handed Uncle Curro a table-cloth, and then disappeared among the branches of the olive tree. Uncle Curro spread the table-cloth on the ground, which he had no sooner done than it was covered with the richest viands, so exquisitely prepared, that not the king's cook himself could have surpassed them. Of course Uncle Curro ate until he could eat no longer, and then, folding his table-cloth, he put it in his pocket and set out for home.

Stopping to rest at the same inn as before, he was overcome with sleep, and lay down to take a nap. The innkeeper, who recognised him at once, suspected that he had something of value with him, and cautiously taking the table-cloth out of his pocket, he put in its stead the soiled cloth from the table of the inn.

Digitized by Google

When Curro reached home, he cried out to his wife and children:

"Come, come and eat; and this time, take my word for it, there shall be no disappointment." Then he unfolded the table-cloth, which, instead of viands, was seen to be covered with stains of all sizes and of every colour. At this the storm broke loose. Wife and children fell upon him and beat him, until they left him a fit subject for the hospital.

Uncle Curro took a rope, and went again into the fields to hang himself. This time he persisted in his purpose of hanging himself, and the dwarf persisted in his that he should not.

At last the little friar ended the discussion by giving Uncle Curro a cudgel, telling him that with that in his hands he need never be troubled by anyone again, and that all he had to do was to say:

"Cudgel, lay about you!" for everyone to run away from him, and leave him in peace and quiet.

Uncle Curro took the road home with his cudgel, as proud as an alcalde with his wand of office, and the moment he saw his children coming toward him, asking for something to eat, with insulting and abusive words as they were accustomed to see their mother do, he said to his cudgel:

"Cudgel, lay about you!"

No sooner had he pronounced the words than the cudgel began to shower blows to right and left among the children, until they had scarcely a whole bone left in their bodies.

His wife ran to her children's assistance.

"At her, cudgel!" said Uncle Curro: "at her and with a will!"

And the cudgel belaboured the wife so unmercifully that she died of her injuries.

The authorities being notified, the alcalde, accompanied by his officers, presented himself upon the scene.

"Cudgel, lay about you!" said Uncle Curro, as soon as they appeared; and the cudgel proceeded to deal such lusty blows among them that every blow was worth a peseta; so that the alcalde was killed and the officers took to their heels and were out of sight in a trice.

A messenger was sent to the King to inform him of what was going on, and the King sent a regiment of grenadiers to seize Uncle Curro and his cudgel. No sooner did Uncle Curro see them approach than, throwing the cudgel among their ranks, he cried:

"Cudgel, lay about you!"

And the cudgel straightway began to dance upon the ribs of the grenadiers, making a noise like the clapper of a mill. One it left lame; another with a disabled arm; and the Captain it left blind of an eye.

To make an end of the business, the grenadiers all threw their guns and knapsacks on the ground and ran off helter-skelter, as if they thought Old Nick had broken loose and was running after them.

With his mind at rest, Uncle Curro lay down to take a nap, hiding his cudgel in his breast, lest it should be stolen from him during his sleep.

When he awoke he found himself bound hand and foot and on his way to prison, where, on his arrival, he was sentenced to the ignominious death of the garrote.

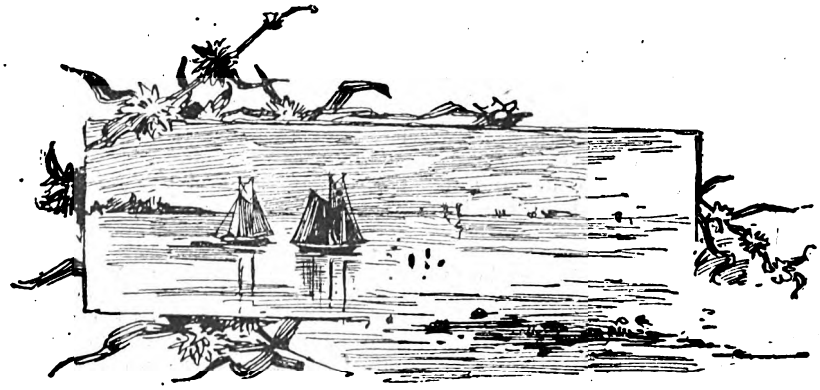
On the following morning he was taken from his cell and led out to execution. On the scaffold his hands were unbound, whereupon he took out his cudgel, and saying:

"Cudgel, lay about you!" he threw it at the executioner, who was quickly beaten by it to death.

"Set that man free!" said the King, "or he will not leave me a subject alive; tell him that I will give him a province in the West Indies on condition that he shall leave the country."

And thus it was done. The King gave him a province in the island of Cuba, where he built a city; and there he killed so many people with his cudgel that from that day to this it has been called Matanzas (the Spanish for slaughter).

Fernan Caballero.



Digitized by Google

A Saurian Slaughter.

ABOUT forty miles above the city of Allahabad, India, there was a village called Gznai. In January, 1869, it was a place of 1,500 inhabitants. It was not built in a day exactly, but it sprang into life and attained over 500 inhabitants within thirty days. Thirty days later the population numbered 1,500. In the course of another thirty days not an inhabitant was left, and vines and plants were taking root in the principal street.

Gznai was what is known as a "crocodile town." Up to the year 1880 that religious sect which for a thousand years had lived along the Ganges and its tributaries was permitted to found these "crocodile towns," or at least the fanatical leaders were not amenable to law. The English discouraged them in many ways, but it was not until the year named that the law dealt them a death-blow. The religion of the Juggernaut appealed only to half mad fanatics.

The "crocodile faith," as it was called, was a mixture of avarice, selfishness, revenge and religion. Gznai was founded on the bank of a small lake. This lake was inhabited by crocodiles. The founder was a wandering "holy man," and no sooner was it known that he had erected his tent and "blessed" the lake than there was a rush of natives to the place.

The matter was kept secret from the British as long as possible, but when the news finally reached Allahabad preparations were promptly made for breaking up the town. About 180 native troops under charge of two British officers were sent down by boats to scatter the fanatics, and through the courtesy of Captain McArthur I was allowed to accompany the expedition.

Many horrible things had happened before we reached Gznai. Any native who wanted to be rid of wife, children, father or mother had only to convey them to the town. They were "blessed" by the old fakir in consideration of a sum of money amounting to about 2d. per head. After the blessing they were flung to the saurians. The man who wanted to be rid of an enemy could do it very cheaply, and in many instances it was done to save paying debts. A lover jealous of another denounced him to the fakir as an unbeliever, and the fakir sent out men from his bodyguard to capture him. The village had been founded eighty-seven days when we reached it, and as near as we could learn, over three hundred people had been food to the crocodiles, and we found fifty-two others held captive and waiting for death.

One of the queer things about India is the universal belief of the natives that what is to be will be, and that no one dies before his time. Everyone, poisoner and robber, has a religion. If "blessed" by an old hypocrite of a fakir a minute before death, he is happy in the belief that his soul will find rest.

Of all the captives brought to Gznai, not one had been bound or guarded. The fakir had placed his hand on their heads and announced that they would find supreme bliss in the future state, and after that they wandered about as they willed, but had no thought of escape.

When we entered the village, some of them threw themselves into the lake without orders, and others had to be driven homeward by switches.

Of the 1,500 people in the village, about one-third were rogues and rascals, gathered there to prey on the gullible. Another third supplied food and drink, and the remainder were fanatics and enthusiasts, ready to obey any command issued by the head fakir. The old rascal was making a good thing of it financially, and just before our arrival had raised his rates 50 per cent. Victims had been brought to him from a distance of sixty miles.

We reached the village at three o'clock in the afternoon. At noon that day ten persons had been given up to the crocodiles. The excitement kicked up by our arrival was intense, as every native realised what the result would be. The first move was to escort the head fakir half a mile out of town and start him off with a warning of arrest and imprisonment if he returned. The wealth he had acquired was then distributed among the captives awaiting death. At the same moment the soldiers were passing round with a switch in one hand and a firebrand in the other, and every hut and tent was soon in flames and the people scattered.

Among the captives was a man about thirty years old, who had been chief of a village twenty miles away. His own brother, a young man of twenty, had denounced him and assisted in his capture. The ex-chief had been "blessed," and was to die at sundown. To prevent him plunging into the lake, he was tied to a tree, and an hour later, when he still refused to go home, two of the soldiers made ready to "lick the religion out of him," as they termed it.

With pliant switches they cut away at his bare back for fully ten minutes before he uttered a yell. When the yell came, however, he was ready to give in and announce that he would head for home, and not tarry on the way. The most curious part of the affair was that the brother who had given him up to death stood there and witnessed the whipping, and they went off in company when it was over.

Before sundown the village had been made desolate; but the work was only half done. The orders were to remove the crocodiles and the lake as well as the people. If the first two remained, some other fakir would found another village within a year.

Next morning a survey was made of the shores of the lake. It was a body of water about six acres in extent with an average depth of ten feet, and there was every evidence that it had been a reservoir for irrigation purposes. The east shore was steep and comparatively clear, but on the other sides the bushes grew close to the water. After a tramp of two hours it was discovered that the whole lake could be drained by cutting a ditch four feet deep and eighty feet long.

Native boats were constantly passing up and down the river, and from these the captain secured a force to handle the picks and shovels. Where this ditch began a strong wooden frame was set up to prevent the crocodiles from passing down with the rush of the water.

Digitized by Google

The saurians had had possession of that lake for scores if not hundreds of years, and the place was literally packed with them.

While the ditch was being dug, Captain McArthur sent a report to Allahabad, and after a couple of days a six-pound fieldpiece, with plenty of ammunition, was sent up to him. His idea was to exterminate the last saurian in that lake, and the work could not have been done by the soldiers' muskets. While we were waiting for the ditch to be opened a native appeared, and asked for an interview with the captain. He introduced himself as a native doctor living in a village about fifteen miles away. On the day that we drove the people out of the village he was being brought in as a captive. When set at liberty, he became filled with anxiety. He had been denounced and captured, but not "blessed" by the fakir. He was, therefore, at a loss to know what to do. Should he return home as if never denounced? Should he hunt for the fakir, and get a blessing, or should he throw himself to the crocodiles, and take the chances of its being the proper thing to do? The man was very much in earnest and would not have gone away satisfied without receiving advice, and after a little thought the captain said to him:

"Perhaps it will be well to have two of my men whip you. I think you will feel easier in your mind after that."

The native agreed that the "experiment" was worth trying, and a couple of the soldiers cut switches, and gave him a beautiful dressing-down. They must have struck fifty blows before he turned to the captain, and said:

"Sahib, it is well with me. I now see my way clearly. I shall return to my village and be as if nothing had happened."

The men gave him three or four extra cuts to bind the bargain, and the fellow went off, with a smile on his face.

The ditch was all ready one morning after breakfast. It seemed as if the crocodiles scented danger, for they began rushing about in a furious manner. The soldiers and natives were stationed about the lake to drive back any of the reptiles which might seek the land, and presently the water began rushing down the ditch and flowing over a plain.

The lake had not been lowered more than a foot when there was a grand rush to escape by the ditch. The cannon was planted within fifty feet of the spot, and three or four shells fired into the struggling mass broke it up. Every crocodile in the lake went to the bottom, and stayed there until only about two feet of water remained to cover them. There was but little mud, and no hiding places.

We expected to see a general rush for the banks, and fires had been lighted at several points to assist in checking it. But the rush we anticipated did not take place. Instead of that there was a battle such as few men ever looked upon. Captain McArthur officially reported "about 300" crocodiles in that lake, but he agreed that the number might be one hundred more. There were no young ones at all, and but few which could be called half grown. The great majority were full grown, and no man had ever seen larger ones in India.

While the lake was a drinking place for thousands of wild animals, many of which naturally fell victims to the saurians, it was evident that the supply of food had been eked out by devouring the small fry. Not a fish or turtle was to be seen, and of the victims cast into the water in the name of faith not so much as a bone remained.

As the water was lowered and the crocodiles realised the situation, they began to fight so fiercely and vengefully that many of the natives ran away in alarm. Mud and gravel and water were thrown over the bushes and into the tree tops as the saurians thrashed about, and the hissing, bellowing, and clashing of jaws made a rumpus which was heard a mile away.

Half-an-hour after the fight began not a gallon of water was left in the lake, and then we had a clear view of the raging battle. The smaller and weaker were naturally killed off first. In a few instances large or small crocodiles left the bed of the lake and sought to escape into the jungle or make their way toward the river, but they were fired upon by the soldiers and driven back. Not a single one of them got away.

At three o'clock in the afternoon there were only about twenty crocodiles left alive, and these were the largest of the lot. Exhausted with the long and continued conflict, and each one more or less severely wounded, these survivors crept to the centre of the lake as if to rest. It was then that the fieldpiece opened on them with shell, and as the first one exploded among them the battle was renewed. The soldiers gathered with their muskets, and between shell and bullet the last saurian was soon disposed of.

The very last one to be killed was perhaps the oldest and largest of the lot. He had been wounded some years back on the top of his head and marked in a curious manner. In his death agonies he had crawled half way up the bank, and he died with his mouth open.

One of the soldiers cut a stick and placed it between his jaws to keep them open, and we were knocking out some of the teeth as relics when a native pushed his way through the crowd and said to the captain:

"Sahib, I would ask a great favour of you. If you do not grant it, I shall wish to die."

"Well, what is it?"

"The village numbered only 100 people when I brought my wife here to be blessed and thrown into the lake. She was a good woman, but of late she had talked too much. She had become curious minded. If I set out on a journey she wished to know my destination. If I was thoughtful, she wished to know if I was ill. If I was jolly, she asked me if good luck had come."

"Well?"

"And so I brought her here to be disposed of. I saw her blessed, and I saw her flung into the lake. That big crocodile got her. I knew him by that mark on his head. I now ask you for one of his teeth."

"Help yourself," replied the captain.

"Thanks, sahib. I will ever bless you. After thinking matters all over I have come to the conclusion that my wife was not such a bad woman after all. I think I was a little hasty in the matter. I will take a tooth and bury it on a hill in her memory and shall then feel all right about it."

With a stone he knocked out a tooth, repeated his thanks, and disappeared in the jungle, and as he vanished the other natives called after him:

"Ah, but he is a good man! When he has had his wife eaten by crocodiles, he does not forget that she had many virtues."

C. W. P.

Digitized by Google

A WOLF HUNT.

A FEW years ago Prince Repnine, with two companions, engaged in a wolf hunt, which brought them more than the danger and excitement they calculated on, and came within an ace of being their last hunt.

The party set out one evening in a large sleigh; each hunter was armed with a double-barrelled gun and a hundred and fifty cartridges. The Prince commanded the road, and his companions took charge, one of each flank.

On reaching the steppe, an immense desert covered with snow, the coachman shook his reins, the horses broke into a canter, the pig began to squeal, a few wolves howled in response, and before long the hunters saw the shadowy forms of half a score of them following in the rear; but they were few in number and maintained a respectful distance, waiting for reinforcements.

But gradually their numbers increased, and they approached the sleigh, which was gliding at an easy but moderate pace over the snow, the coachman holding the excited horses well in hand. A band of at least twenty wolves was allowed to come to close quarters before the firing was commenced. A shot was fired, a wolf fell; there was great excitement, and apparently disorganisation of the troop, and it appeared to the hunters that their pursuers had been diminished one half.

In fact, seven or eight of the more famished brutes had remained behind to feast on their fallen comrade, but their ranks were soon full again; on all sides one heard howlings responded to by howlings; on all sides wolves sprang up as if out of the snow, their sharp noses showing themselves between their glowing eyes. They were at close quarters now, and numerous enough and the three hunters maintained a rolling fire into their ranks; but, although every ball hit, the band continued to increase.

Before long the troop was swollen to vast numbers, which began to crowd upon the sleigh: the pace increased with the excitement and the vast cavalcade flew over the snow, silent as death but for the dismal howlings of wolves. With their centre a few yards in the rear of the sleigh, the troops formed themselves into a crescent, the two horns of which were far in advance of the horses on either side.

The pig, which had been stimulated to squeal, was now kept as quiet as possible; the unexpected number of wolves foreboded danger, and at every cry of the pig their fury and audacity was redoubled. The firing was maintained without intermission, but already the hunters had fired away half their cartridges. There remained only about two hundred between the three of them, and they were surrounded by more than a thousand wolves.

The two horns of the living crescent began now to draw towards each other; the wolves were evidently acting in accordance with a concerted plan. They were bent on forming a circle which should inclose their prey in its centre, and gradually close in upon them till escape would be hopeless; for if only one of the horses were brought down, resistance could hardly be prolonged another minute. The horses snorted, screamed, and plunged frightfully, but nothing gave way, and the coachman maintained his control over them.

"What do you think of it, Ivan?" asked the Prince of his coachman.

"The enraged brutes have tasted blood," he said, "and the longer you continue firing the more their numbers increase. If you will leave it to me, Prince, I will turn the horses' heads homewards, and give them their heads."

"Can you rely upon them?"

"I will answer for them."

"And you will be responsible for us?"

The coachman did not reply; he saw the critical moment had arrived in which the Prince and his friends, awed by the growing terror of their situation, were not unwilling to see him take the command. Without another word he wheeled gradually round in the direction of the château, and gave the horses their heads. The noble brutes, wild with terror and excitement, no sooner felt their heads free than they bounded off at a furious pace, the sleigh scarcely seeming to hamper their movements.

The coachman, letting the horses go at their best speed, continued to wheel them round, and almost in an instant they charged down upon the flanks of the wolves, which scattered right and left as the horses plunged among them.

The horses were not galloping now; they were flying. At this moment the hunters raised their guns for another shot.

"For your lives," cried Ivan, "don't fire!"

They obeyed.

And now it was seen that the wolves had come to a standstill; they were evidently nonplussed by the unexpected manœuvre; their tactics had been spoilt, and they did not know what to do next.

In this minute of indecision the horses, straining at top speed, had shot nearly half a mile ahead, and when the wolves had renewed their pursuit they appeared to follow but slowly; the huntsmen soon ceased to fear that the wolves would overtake them.

But there was no slackening speed, and a quarter-of-an-hour later our hunters entered the courtyard of the château. The Prince estimated that in this quarter-of-an-hour the horses had covered a distance of six miles, but a severe critic might remark that he probably did not look at his watch until some minutes after the start.

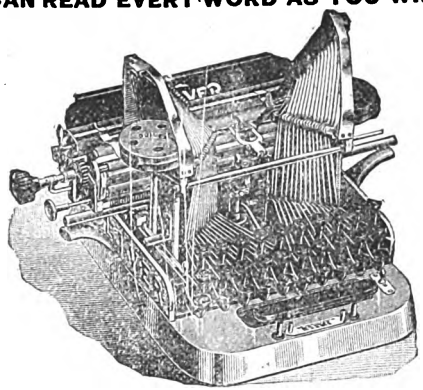
The following day the Prince and his party visited the field of battle on horseback, and the bones of two hundred wolves attested to the steadiness of their shooting, and to the number that were present at the banquet.

A. L. T.

Digitized by Google

THE OLIVER TYPEWRITER.

YOU CAN READ EVERY WORD AS YOU WRITE IT.



It is a Machine adapted by its simplicity and rapidity to the most arduous requirements of mercantile, literary, or professional uses. At the same time it is the simplest in construction, and the most easy to operate.

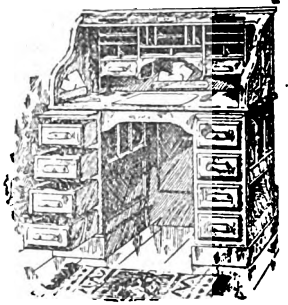
EXCELS ANY TYPEWRITING MACHINE IN THE WORLD.

Wholesale and Export Agents: James Spicer and Sons, London and Branches; Waterlow and Sons Ltd., London and Branches; Thomas Turner Ltd., Leicester and London; Pawson and Brailsford, Sheffield; Cartwright and Rattray Ltd., Manchester and London; Bemrose and Sons Ltd., Derby and London; R. Hodgkinson, 4 Bell's Buildings, South John Street, Liverpool; Henry D. and C. Tapp, Charles Street, Bradford. Also for sale by the Army and Navy Stores Ltd., Westminster, London, S.W., and all first-class Stationers.

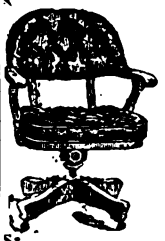
AGENTS WANTED, exceptional terms given, in all towns where not represented. An excellent opportunity too make money. Chief European Offices: Walbrook House, Walbrook, London, E.C. Send for our Twenty-five business reasons, showing why the Oliver excels all other standard machines.

DIRECT FROM THE FACTORY.

THE "DERBY" DESK



Is quite the Finest in the World. Every portion is made under the personal supervision of the Originator. We both Recommend and Guarantee the "Derby" Desk. It has a Roll-Top, which locks all the drawers automatically when shut down; full of convenient pigeonholes, etc. Elegant, Useful, and Durable! All prices from £7; as Illustrated, £8 8s.



Invaluable in the Private Study and the Office. We stock a large variety of Novelties and Specialities in Office and Library Appliances. New Handsome Illustrated No. 61 Catalogue sent free to any reader of Short Stories on application. Filing Cabinets and Elastic Bookcases a Speciality.

THOMAS TURNER

(Leicester) LTD.,

44 HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.; 7 & 9 NEWARKE STREET, LEICESTER.

A. A sum of from 10/- to 20/- per week offered for spare time to either sex everywhere. Work can be done evenings. Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 89, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (239 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

---

The Best Hair Dye

In the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

The Lustre Lasts!

Pyn-Ka Leaves no Scratches!

Pyn-ka

The wonderful Metal Polisher. Cleans and burnishes gold, silver, plate, copper, brass, nickel, tin, glass, etc., better, quicker, and at less cost of labour and money than any other polish known.

Paste or tablets, 1d. to 6d. All dealers.

SILVER QUEEN CYCLES!

Best Value on Earth. Immense stock of Ladies' and Gents' machines. New and Secondhand. Wonderful bargains. Carriage paid. Easy payments from 10s. monthly, or large cash discount. 1 year's guarantee. Illus. price lists post free on application. Old cycles exchanged The SILVER QUEEN CYCLE Co Ltd., 221 Tottenham Court Road, London.

FREE FREE

OUR

£21 BICYCLES £21

to every person taking advantage of this advertisement and the offer we will send. The Bicycle is packed in a wood crate, and is sent to your address FREE of any monetary charge, with one exception, that you pay carriage to railway company when you receive the Bicycle. We are giving these machines away as a startling advertisement, feeling assured that after you receive the Bicycle you will recommend us to all your friends as being a firm to be relied on for honest, straightforward dealings.

£21 BICYCLES £21

For 1s. 6d. we will forward our Gents' Epingle de Cravate, or Ladies' Broché together with our offer, and on your complying with offer, the Bicycle is forwarded Free of Charge as above stated. To save any disappointment, we will refund money in full to any person sending in, after all the Bicycles have been given away.

Send stamped addressed envelope together with P.O. or stamps for 1s. 6d.

THE ANGLO-AMERICAN AGENCY (Dept. 31), 196 St. Vincent Street. GLASGOW.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

"JUNO" CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Monthly
Roadster, £10. 16/
Road Racer, £11. 18/
Lady & Gent, £12 12/- 21/
£14 14/- 24/
£16 16/- 28/
Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories sent post free
METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO. LTD., 75 and 76 Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.; and at Piccadilly Circus exactly opposite the Criterion, London, W. JUNO Riding School, 1,700ft.

Digitized by Google

YOU AND I.

C. N. B.—If your father was naturalised while you were a minor and living with him, this naturalised you at the same time.

CYCLE.—The order forbidding ladies to ride the bicycle in the streets of Petersburg has been cancelled, and the wheel is making progress in that country, but it is not an ideal place for cyclists on account of the too paternal solicitude of the Muscovite authorities. The would-be cyclist has to pass sundry examinations to prove that he is competent before he is allowed to ride about as he likes. And when that ordeal has been passed, riders of both sexes are ticketed with a prominent and unsightly label, setting forth the due qualifications for permission to cycle.

HOOF.—The camel's foot is like a soft cushion, and is peculiarly adapted for walking over gravel and stones. During a journey in the Sahara, the horses of British officers had to be shod three times, but the feet of the camels were not even sore.

SCHOOL.—No, it is Münster, with two dots over the u. It is in Westphalia. The public school which you mention was originally a convent school, and has just celebrated the eleven hundredth anniversary of its foundation.

CHAM.—Some of the large champagne manufacturers in Epernay have underground cellars extending over forty acres, and containing as many as 5,000,000 bottles of wine. Epernay itself may be described as a subterranean city; its streets for miles are hewn out of the chalk, and flanked with piles of champagne of all blends and qualities.

GLASS.—The single opera-glass was first used in France in the time of Louis XIV. (latter half of the seventeenth century); it became the rage, and everybody used one. The double opera-glass was invented in 1825, but did not at first find favour with the men. There is an old French treatise on the art of ogling or looking through the glass; it is quite a treatise on coquetry, and explains how a woman should hold the glass if she has well-formed arms, nicely-shaped hands, and so on.

SMOKE.—The Dutch hold the record as the champion tobacco smokers. Statistics recently compiled respecting seventeen tobacco-smoking countries show that they get through a larger quantity (per head of the population) than any other civilised nation. Our own country stands fourteenth on the list. Italy, Spain and Switzerland smoke less than we, while France consumes a little more. The United States comes next to Holland.

C. L. D.—The tramways, omnibusses, and underground railways in and around London, within a radius of five miles, carry each year about four hundred and fifty-three million passengers.

IGNORAMUS writes to ask why we call the present century the nineteenth, when we are still using 18—— and not 19——.————In counting by hundreds, from 1 to 100 is the first hundred, and so from 1800 to 1900 is the nineteenth hundred or "century."

THEATRE.—In all the capitals of Europe, except London, at least one theatre is subsidised by the Government.

S. I. G.—The largest advertising sign in the world is, of course, just where you wouldn't expect to find it. It is on the hillside of an islet off the Grand Canary. There are four words; each letter is 30ft. high, and 15ft. wide, and the bars or strokes of the letters are 3ft. 3in. broad. The sign is 750ft. long.

FLY CATCHER.—The best fly-destroyer in the world is the "common or garden" wasp. An expert states that he has known a wasp to kill hundreds of flies in one day. Still, on the whole, I think most people would prefer the flies.

PHIL asks: "Is it true that Luzon, the principal island of the Philippine group, was named after one of the discoverers?"————No. The name comes from the native word "lesong," meaning a rice mortar. When the discoverers inquired the name of the place, the natives replied "lesong," apparently under the impression that the new-comers wished to know the name of the utensils that were lying about. It is generally thought that the natives are of one and the same race with the Malays. The chief amusement of the natives of Manila is cock fighting; many of the men think a great deal more of their birds than of their wives. The Government revenue was appreciably increased by the licensing of cock-pits.

NAPOLEON.—If the statement of a recent writer be correct, Napoleon I had no luxurious tastes in the way of food. His favourite dish was a bean salad, and he thought that half-a-crown a day should be enough for anyone's meals. Louis XV. was just the opposite; he had a favourite dish that was made of the eggs of various birds and cost £20.

ARCTIC.—The fossil forest of Atanekerdluk is in Northern Greenland, about 70 degrees N. latitude. It is the most perfect fossil exhibit in the world. Sixty-six varieties of plant life have been found and recognised. It is so well preserved that on some of the leaves of the trees there have been found remains of the insects that no doubt fed upon them.

DON CARLOS.—A British legion fought in Spain against the adherents of the grandfather of the present Don Carlos. The legion was raised by Sir De Lacy Evans, Lord John Hay, and others with the object of assisting the cause of the infant Queen Isabella. The men of the legion did good work, but they could not get a farthing out of the Spanish Government afterwards for arrears of pay.

PIPE.—The latest reports show that the consumption of tobacco is decreasing in France.

BRIDGE.—The greatest natural bridge in the world spans a chasm in Utah, four miles from the little town of Moab. It is about two hundred feet high, seventy-five feet thick, and has a span of two hundred and fifty feet.

WHISTLER.—The whistling moth is an Australian rarity. There is a glassy space, crossed with ribs, on the wings of the insects; when the moth desires to whistle it strikes these ribs with its antennæ, which have a knob at the end. The sound is used as a call from the male to the female.

NAILS.—Finger nails grow, on the average, rather more than an inch and a half a year.

THE proprietor of the Tallis Court Hotel, Broadstairs, has by him a curiosity which will greatly interest our readers. In one of Lyle's Golden Syrup tins, which had evidently been thrown away, and was found upon the bank opposite his house, a robin had built her nest and laid three eggs; with what delight the loving pair took possession of this highly eligible family residence may be imagined.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0	10	0
Double ,, ,,	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10	0	0
Half-page ,, ,, ...	5	0	0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ...	2	10	0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1	5	0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12	10	0
,, half	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, June 28th, if intended for the Issue on sale July 12th, and dated July 16th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

FOR HOME DYEING.

MAYPOLE DYES SOAP ANY COLOUR

CLEAN AND QUICK. NO MESS. NO TROUBLE.
WON'T WASH OUT OR FADE.

Silks, Satins, Cottons, Wools, Feathers, Lace,
ALL LOOK LIKE NEW WHEN DYED WITH

MAYPOLE SOAP.

ADVICE FREE BY LETTER ON HOME DYEING

Sold in All Colours, 4d. per Tablet; Black, 6d.

An ILLUSTRATED NOVELETTE, "Three Daughters of Eve," a Charming Book of Nursery Rhymes, in Colours, and an ILLUSTRATED BOOKLET, "Seven Ages of Woman," with Specimen Card of Colours on Satin. Sent Post Free on receipt of address.

Free Advice given upon Home Dyeing by letter. State plainly your requirements, and when possible enclose a small piece of the material you wish to dye.

THE MAYPOLE CO. LIMITED, 98 & 99 HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. TAYLOR, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

From Rev. J. H. BURN. DEER RECTORY, MINTLAW, ABERDEEN, NOVEMBER 8TH, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

Digitized by Google

THE WORLD-RENOWNED REDUCTION IN THE PRICE OF CARPETS.

SUPPLEMENTARY, 1898.—The Utilitarian Production of the Age in Carpets! One Million to be distributed to the People of this Realm!

THIS PIONEER OFFER

IS MADE TO READERS OF SHORT STORIES ON RECEIPT OF POSTAL ORDER OR STAMPS, VALUE 4s. 6d. (Regd.) We will send you Direct from the Looms, THE LARGEST GENUINE REVERSIBLE CARPET in BRUSSELS FINISH WITH RUG EVER SOLD AT THE PRICE, to any address on receipt of amount, suitable for drawing-room, bedroom, etc., bordered and woven in Brussels patterns, as an advertisement for my goods, thus saving any middle profit. Remember these are woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to wool. Thousands of these Carpets have been already sold at double these prices. SPECIAL OFFER—TWO CARPETS and TWO RUGS, 8s. [Cut this out.]

"We have never seen a cheaper article, the wonder being how the carpet can be made and sold at the ridiculously small sum."—Exchange and Mart.——"Wonderful value for money."—Church Bells.

Hundreds of favourable Press Notices from the Christian Globe, Christian World, Christian Age, Rock, Catholic Times, etc., etc. Greatest bargains ever offered.

Write subject to approval or cash gladly returned. Thousands of repeat orders and testimonials from all parts.

38 Railway Cottages, Willesden, May 25th.

Mrs. Evans writes: "Having had two of your Carpets and Rugs five years ago. They have worn extremely well, being in constant wear. Shall be glad if you will send me two of your "Novel" Carpets and Rugs. P.O. enclosed."

16 Slate Street, Leicester, October 9th.

W. Sawbridge, Esq., writes: "Two or three years ago I purchased one of your Carpets, and we are very pleased with the way it has stood the wear and tear that it has been subjected to. Please send two more Carpets and Rugs as advertised. 8s. enclosed."

ILLUSTRATED BARGAINS CATALOGUES OF CARPETS, HEARTHRUGS, SHEETINGS, TABLE LINEN, CURTAINS, etc., POST FREE.

All orders despatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post.

The "Queen's Royal" Household Carpets and Hearthrugs are extolled by all the Nations of the Earth.

Gigantic Sale of the "QUEEN'S ROYAL" Household

Sale Price. 2/- HEARTHRUGS Regd. Sale Price. 2/-

In Reversible Rich Turkey patterns, measuring 6ft. long, and 3ft wide. These Hearthrugs have gained a world-wide reputation for Magnificence, Cheapness, and Utility, having no equal. Registered New Designs, and considered Works of Art. Thousands of repeat orders and testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 for 5/9, 6 for 11/3, 12 for 22/-.

The "Queen's" Royal Household Carpets and Hearthrugs are patronised by Royalty, Nobility, and Clergy from all parts of the Empire.

Gigantic Sale of the "QUEEN'S ROYAL" Household Reversible Rich Turkey Pattern

CARPETS (REG.)

TRADE MARK ON ALL GOODS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

ADMITTEDLY THE CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD. Woven without seam. Altogether superior quality, with handsome border to correspond. A marvel for excellence and beauty. Thousands of repeat orders and testimonials received giving the highest satisfaction. When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

Reduced Sale Price.	Reduced Sale Price.	Reduced Sale Price.	Reduced Sale Price.
6ft. by 9ft. 7/6	9ft. by 9ft. 11/-	10½ft. by 12ft. 18/-	12ft. by 15ft. 25/6
8ft. by 9ft. 9/-	9ft. by 10½ft. 13/6	12ft. by 12ft. 21/-	12ft. by 18ft. 30/-
6ft. by 12ft. 10/6	9ft. by 12ft. 15/-	9ft. by 15ft. 19/6	12ft. by 21ft. 35/6
	9ft. by 13½ft. 16/6	12ft. by 13½ft. 22/-

COLOSSAL SALE OF RICH VELVET PILE Sale Price.

REAL BRUSSELS HEARTHRUGS 5/6

In Rich Oriental and Indian Art Designs, measuring 6ft. by 3ft., which for price, real value, weight and richness of manufacture will be found unapproachable.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Rugs, 16/-; 6 for 31/-.

"Melville Castle, Glasswade, Midlothian, June 1st.

The Right Honourable The VISCOUNTESS MELVILLE writes: "I am very pleased with the 'Royal' Velvet Hearthrugs to hand, and would like four more Hearthrugs. Her ladyship would also like two Velvet Carpets at 39/-, one ditto 60/6 to match them. Cheque £8 14s. inclosed."

COLOSSAL SALE OF RICH VELVET PILE

REAL BRUSSELS CARPETS

Extraordinarily Heavy, very best Quality, Newest and Choicest Designs. In Old Gold, Sultan, Terra-Cotta, Crimson, Sky, Navy, and the latest colours. With handsome border to correspond. Guaranteed to wear for years, and give every satisfaction. The sizes and prices as follows (all ready for putting down):

REDUCED SALE PRICE LIST,	4½ft. by 7ft. 11/-	VELVET PILE BRUSSELS CARPET SQUARES.	9ft. by 12ft. 38/-
	6ft. by 9ft. 18/-		11ft. by 12ft. 47/-
	7½ft. by 9ft. 23/-		12ft. by 13½ft. 59/-
	9ft. by 9ft. 28/-		12ft. by 16ft. 69/-
	9ft. by 10½ft. 33/-		12ft. by 18ft. 77/-

Altogether superior quality, with handsome border to correspond. A marvel of excellence and beauty. Thousands of repeat orders and testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction. When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

Also RICH VELVET PILE STAIR CARPETS, bordered to match, 18in. wide, 1/8 per yard; 22½in. wide, 2/- per yard; 27in. wide, 2/3 per yard.

640 WHITE HONEYCOMB QUILTS, full size, 4/11 each.

These are sound, useful Bed Spreads, made from good quality cotton yarns, in diamond and various small designs, average size, 2¾yd. long and 2yd. wide, with all round knotted fringe.

OUR NEW VENTURE.—Yes, Two different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One!

H.R.H. Prince L. of Battenberg.
H.R.H. Prince K. Bigit Siam.
Marquis of Breadalbane.
Sir Henry de Bathe.
Sir Henry Bellingham.
Sir E. H. Blair, Bart.
Archbishop of York.
Copyright.
H.I.H. Eugénie de Christoforo.
Princess Palæologœ Nicephorœ. Commenœ
Princess de Croy.
Duchess of Wellington.
Marchioness of Breadalbane.
Marchioness of Hastings.

IN THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (CHANCERY DIVISION). HODGSON v. WEBB BROTHERS.—On the 18th day of July, 1890, his lordship Mr. Justice Chitty granted an interim injunction restraining Messrs. Webb Brothers, of Hackney Wick, from infringing Mr. Fredk. Hodgson's Trade Mark, "Eclipse," No. 93,774 (Leeds).

"Given Away."

SPECIAL. 1898.

SPECIALLY REDUCED INTRODUCTION

SALE PARCEL WITH FREE GIFT

enclosed, consisting of 1 Magnificently Rich Cream-Coloured Curly Sheepskin Hearthrug, average size 6 feet by 3 feet, perfection in quality.

1 Beautiful Reversible Art Crimson Plush Bed Rug, Sofa Cover, or Table Cover, double warp, very heavy, size 50 inches by 78 inches.

2 Beautiful Silver Goatskin Door Mats, lined woollen cloth throughout, pinked edges, best finish, ornamental to any room.

1 Elegant Hair Brush, highly finished, with mirror back.

THE LOT 10/6

The Green, Bolton Abbey, December 18th.

Lady E. D. Newenham takes this opportunity to thank Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son for the 10/6 Owl parcel sent some little time back. Every article was of more intrinsic value than the price charged. Lady Newenham would like two more parcels. Cheque 21/- enclosed."

PRODIGIOUS SALE OF THE "PRUDENTIAL"

REVERSIBLE CARPETS (Regd.)

Reversible, with a different pattern on both sides, woven throughout, with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in twelve sizes only. These Carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian on one side, and on the reverse the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

6ft. by 9ft.	Reduced Sale Price	4s. 9d.	9ft. by 15ft.	Reduced Sale Price	12s. 6d.
7½ft. by 9ft.		5s. 11d.	12ft. by 12ft.		12s. 9d.
9ft. by 9ft.		7s. 6d.	12ft. by 13½ft.		14s. 6d.
9ft. by 10½ft.		8s. 6d.	12ft. by 15ft.		15s. 9d.
9ft. by 12ft.		9s. 6d.	12ft. by 18ft.		19s. 6d.
10½ft. by 12ft.		11s. 6d.	12ft. by 21ft.		22s. 6d.

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

Blairquhan, Maybole, N.B., Aug. 3rd.—Lady Hunter Blair writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son send her another 'Prudential' Carpet, same as before, crimson and gold, dimensions, 9ft. by 10½ft. Cheque enclosed."

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Regd.), to match above Carpets, sent for 1s. 6d. extra, size, 2yd. long and 1yd. wide.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Hearthrugs for 4/3 6 for 8/-, or 12 for 15/6. Sterling Value.

High School, Burnham, Maidenhead, Jan. 21st.

F. W. Baker, Esq., writes: "I have received the Carpet and Rug, and feel I must write to thank you for your excellent choice. I have shown them to several of my friends and they all think them remarkable value and very pretty. I trust soon to give you another order."

Provided Short Stories Coupon, 25/6/98, is quoted, a FREE GIFT will be enclosed—a very handsome Electro Silver Plated "OWL" PEPPER STAND with coloured eyes and gilt feet. Also our Bargain Book enclosed gratis. Cash returned if not satisfied.

(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON. 25/6/98.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send any goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

We rely upon spontaneous Repeat Orders from our Clients for the Maintenance of our Trade. Established nearly a Quarter of a Century. All orders despatched same day, in rotation, as they arrive by post. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to—

F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Telegraphic Address: "ECLIPSE, LEEDS." National Telephone, No. 948. N.B.—Foreign Orders executed and packed free, and shipped at lowest rates.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google